

The Chronicles of Anarchy

By A. Wretch

Table of Contents

Prologue: Chapter 0.....Pg 6
An introduction to the protagonist, who is writing this and why? This chapter sets up the story as a whole, explaining how the “writer” came to the spiritual and Anarchist life.
Chapter 1- Humanity/Life.....Pg 19
An introduction to political Anarchism, explanations for why capitalism is inherently flawed and why abolishing it is required for humanity to reach it's full potential.
Chapter 2 – The Fullness.....Pg 39
An introduction to mysticism and metaphysics, the theory of positive thinking, the universal mind and oneness, the implications of an infinite universe, but also the dangers of mainstream “New Age” thinking, karma and it's justification of hierarchies.
Chapter 3 – Light.....Pg 71
An introduction to the global history of the spiritual use of psychedelics and how proof of the spirit world is available to all those who earnestly seek it. This chapter explores the case for some degree of plant consciousness, but also explains how psychedelics alter the thinking process and inspire philosophical insight. This also starts to go into how governments have ignored the rights of the people regarding psychedelic use and how this is all an effort to stop mind expansion keep people ignorant.
Chapter 4 – Temple.....Pg 97
An introduction to Memes and Memetics, how these can be used for activism and culture jamming, but also how memes are key to understanding how people have been indoctrinated into the government/capitalist cultures. This chapter presents crucial ideas on the theory for the social construction of reality as we know it and how this creates hierarchies in the mind.
Chapter 5 – The Threshold.....Pg 125
An introduction to practical magickal techniques, a broad overview of various Occult schools of thought, their philosophical underpinnings and some historical context for their development. This chapter defines various types of magick and some important terms, it also looks at some theories for why magick works.
Chapter 6 – Roses.....Pg 170
An exploration into the limits of language, science and rationality, but also their importance. How we must consciously integrate these with the irrational parts of the mind and how finding a balance is important for maximizing not only our spiritual awareness, but also our political awareness. Other topics include thoughts on hermeneutics and autodidacts, avoiding gurus and learning to think for yourself, but also the creative process and how chaos applies to artistic creation.
Chapter 7 – Difficult Problems.....Pg 206
An introduction to the history of government atrocities, how the government and hierarchies have tricked us into consenting to terrible things and why we must act now! This chapter deals more with the nature of what government is, who “authorities” are, what Anarchism is and how the people have been tricked into thinking they are free. Other topics are government “black ops” and drug trafficking as through the CIA and others, but also the nature of indentured slavery through the IMF and WTO, there is also further thoughts on activism, tactics and culture war.

Chapter 8 – Wonderful.....Pg 233

An introduction to practical psychedelic ritual Shamanism and how to apply this to your spiritual development, directions are also given for making alcohol extracts of various alkaloids. This chapter details some psychedelic experiences as for example with Salvia Divinorum, it also gives some thoughts on the limitations of relying purely on psychedelics for political and spiritual change.

Chapter 9 - Thus, The open door.....Pg 262

Here we are given more of a philosophical basis for the mystical theories of the Occult, the nature of solipsism and oneness, consensus reality, how the mind generates thought and consciousness and how all these things apply to magick.

Chapter 10 – To Be.....Pg 295

This chapter explains how the subconscious of humanity is controlled metaphysically, it gives ideas on the true nature of “rulers,” the government as the ego of the collective mind, but also Anarchy as a state of mind. Here we are given an introduction into the history of the origins of monotheism, Judaism, Christianity, government Occultism and theocracy, how consciousness is repressed by authoritarian and non Anarchist aspects of the mind and how war is essentially mass human sacrifice. There are also thoughts on developing free will, learning how to learn and the ancient culture war for control of the collective mind through a more detailed explanation of why reality exists, what might happen when we die, why we incarnated in the first place and Anarchism as a magickal force of nature according to “consensus reality.” Here we learn about some of the most Anarchist religions and how despite the arguments of atheist Anarchists, Anarchism and mysticism are completely compatible and ultimately, that all true mystics are basically Anarchists.

Chapter 11 – Pressure.....Pg 345

An explanation of what true equality is in light of notions of value systems, class war, human nature and humanity as animals, authoritarian love and cultural authoritarianism, the balance between social justice and PC Fascism. There are also ideas on Anarchist definitions of Anarchism, activist egotism, censorship and promotion of the oppressed, the difference between offensive and oppressive, the nature of duality, Feminism, Hippies and being loving. This all builds into thoughts on altruism and free will, desire, and Anarchism as a requirement for Crowley's notion of “true will.”

Chapter 12 - There, Inmost point, a Strange land Dwelling in eternityPg 386

The Protest of Reality: An essay on the limitations of traditional forms of protest, art as protest as well as magickal activism and spreading Anarchist propaganda to confront the ugly truths of society.

Chapter 13 – For Adversity.....Pg 405

This chapter more fully deals with Anarchism and the Occult, gives examples and why people should care, thoughts on Gnosticism and Anarchy, how Christianity is really Roman emperor worship, why we don't need a holy war and some more thoughts on why the New Age movement sucks. More practical ideas on magickal activism and tactics, the role of black magick and the question of pacifism and violence in spreading resistance.

Chapter 14 – Gate of the Divine.....Pg 444

This chapter deals with the importance of nature, it's role within Pagan religions and how this relates to language, environmentalism, Alchemy, technology and the origins of science. Here we are given ideas on how the universe is formed by language, how to communicate with the universe using the “Green Language,” this is related to Chomsky's ideas of “universal grammar” but also the creation of the philosopher's stone and the fractal nature of memes and especially language.

Chapter 15 – Abundance.....Pg 503

The writer gives an account of his first Mescaline trip as he is having it, this sheds light on the corrupt nature of Western civilization and especially capitalism and its arbitrary value systems. After coming down elaborations are given explaining modern central banks, fiat currency and economics, but also the history of capitalism, banking and monetary systems and how along with the stock market, these are all perverted Occult technologies. Explanations are also given for how this is directly related to the rise of patriarchy, warfare and agriculture, the fall of the Roman empire and the rise of Christianity. A variety of spiritual implications inherent in the creation of money are brought up and also ideas on why we must abolish money if we wish to live in a sustainable world.

Chapter 16 – Collapse.....Pg 563

This chapter attempts to clear up some famous but generally misunderstood conspiracy theories, it also goes into an explanation of the legal system and especially civil law as a form of theocratic magick. It deals with the Sumerian “tablets of destiny” and the origins of Judaism and Christianity and the Occult war which has been playing out through various secret societies in history. It then goes on to explain a theory of cyclical memetic entropy and how corporations and governments rule over humanity as artificially created entities. It ends by explaining how conspiracy theory alone isn't enough to explain the troubles of the world and why the system itself is inherently corrupt black magick.

Chapter 17 – To Flow.....Pg 647

This chapter explores in more detail what a modern Anarchist spirituality, or for lack of a better term, “religion” might look like, it also gives a myth to provide context for an Anarchist view of history. Here there is a grimoire of Anarchist deities and throughout we are given spiritual practices, some utilizing psychedelics, others not, but all of which are designed to instill Anarchist consciousness and to overcome counter-revolutionary tendencies, or “the cop inside the head.”

Chapter 18 – Good Discernment.....Pg 704

Here we are given an introduction to neuroplasticity and it's implications for how people have been brainwashed using religion and dualism. We also learn of the potential for literature to be used for magickal and Anarchist purposes and how the feminine principle has been demonized and is crucial for setting humanity free. This chapter builds somewhat on the last in that it gives further ideas on Anarchist spirituality and practices and how finding balance between the “feminine” and “masculine” principles and taking a Pagan view of sexuality can help overcome obsessive compulsive tendencies and create freedom in both the mind and the physical world.

Chapter 19 – Agreement.....Pg 751

This chapter goes into far more depth as to how ritual and Occult techniques utilize neuroplasticity, but also how Occultists and mystics have known about the effects of neuroplasticity for millennia. It has a variety of practical advice for increasing consciousness, and explains how neuroplasticity provides us with a whole new way of interpreting mythology, ancient religious texts and magickal practices. Here you will also learn how you can more deeply connect to the Earth and the universe by making your brain “self similar” with it. Towards the end we also gain a deeper understanding of how neuroplasticity has been utilized to control people and how this applies to Anarchism and the fractal structure of culture.

Chapter 20 – Word of Love.....Pg 817

Here we have the culmination of the story and various philosophical problems brought up throughout the book, but also a critique of “Primitivism” and the more naive theories of social change. We are also given further details on how an Anarchist society might structure itself, especially in light of Anarchist spirituality and how we have evolved to function within groups.

Epilogue: Chapter 21 – Magick.....Pg 853

While I strongly recommend everyone read it, this epilogue is presented in a far more academic style and provides many citations for the various ideas brought up throughout the book, but it is intended more for those who already have a fair degree of Occult knowledge, especially in terms of astrological and Kabbalistic symbolism. It provides the reader with interpretations of the “Cube of Space” as it relates to the gematria of magick squares, but also ancient and modern atomic theory and quantum physics. Here the reader is given a detailed explanation for how theocrats created the first governments and have corrupted various religions throughout history, as seen in the many links between the mythology of Enoch and the Watchers, theocratic Goetia and Gnosticism. Dealing with far more than the Abrahamic traditions, this chapter also explains what is basically a universally applicable interpretation of mythology as “memory palaces” which tell of how a flood destroyed societies in the past, and warn of civilization being destroyed by meteorite showers in the future. If you make it through the book and read this chapter, you will never see religions or mythology, or even science the same way again. While some have already found some pieces of the puzzle, to my knowledge it presents an interpretation of Occult and religious mythology found nowhere else. This chapter then ends with advanced ritual techniques utilizing magick squares to create a programming language inspired by set theory that is intended to be used for magick and specifically for hacking your brain. After studying various magickal systems and cosmologies from around the world, I have reconstructed this universal system and built it on the symbolic framework of Shamanic Alchemical Pagan Tantra.

Further Reading Section.....1133

This brief summary of the chapters is a microcosm of the book, but omits many details and ideas as I do not wish to ruin the story for those who have not read it yet. There are things in this book best not described without context, so I ask the reader, if I may seem to be rambling, or to have opinions you do not share, have patience with me, all things in this book have their place and all things are written for a reason. I wrote this fiction not so that everyone might believe everything in it, but because "It is the mark of an educated mind to be able to entertain a thought without accepting it." - Aristotle

“May that grace who is before all things, and who transcends all knowledge and speech, fill thine inner being, and multiply in thee her own knowledge, by sowing the grain of mustard seed in thee as in good soil.” - Gnostic entheogenic prayer.

Prologue: Chapter 0

You are in the real world, my world to you is imaginary, but maybe by the end of this you will find just the opposite. My life so far has been strange and full of surprises, having just turned 20 doesn't entitle me to a memoir of much interest for most people, my whole life is ahead of me, but then this is not my memoirs, these are writings which hope to shed light on the world. To shed light on a point of view, one among many, but one which hopes to figure out just what it means that we all have different points of view, what it means that each life could have an amazing memoir, if the person went after what they really wanted. I have been out of school for awhile now, my indoctrination complete I am deemed worthy of selling my life to make useless crap or flip burgers, all it took was thirteen years of Pavlovian conditioning. I am writing this now, wondering where my life will take me, how I can make the most of it and how I can avoid being a person with regrets of dreams I never followed through on. I would rather have a broken dream, then dreams I never attempted and so I have decided to focus on being a writer, to set out on my path of exploring language and the possibilities of the written word. This will be the story of my life in the future, since I am writing it as I go along, who can say where it will lead, I am now obligated to live an interesting life, this book depends on it! I hope that through my explorations, my journey which I am now beginning, I will in my old age have some insight into how I lived as a young man coming of age and also provide you, the reader, with insight on how you can learn from my mistakes and my search for some truth in this world of lies and exploitation. A fools errand it may be, but then what cautious and conservative person ever had a very interesting life? Where my writing will take me I cannot say anymore then where my life and research will take me, but if I can learn what is really worth seeking, maybe I can in some small measure help others to find their own way.

I was born to a lower middle class family, the youngest of four children, I was born on the sixth day of the sixth month as the sixth member of my family, I can only hope this means I am the antichrist 666. If it means anything to you, my moon is in the 2nd degree of Aquarius, my rising sign the 12th degree of Leo and my sun sign is of course Gemini. My dad was in the military for about twenty years but when I was 12 he retired to work in gas stations and finally in wall mart, obviously the military job he had was stressful but he never really said what made him want to leave. We never really were well off, but things got a lot tighter pretty quickly with four kids and so we entered the lower class. My mom had to start work in a corporate bakery chain and having seen how hard they work, I cannot help but think they deserve better. It has been clear to me for a number of years now just how unfair the economic system really is, just how little the people who really make the world work are appreciated, those who make the most money are those who produce nothing, they just move paper around. The world of rules, the world of the system never made much sense to me, in my experience the more I or others followed the rules, did what was expected of us, the less happy we were. My dad was a perfect example of this, but it was clear to me early on that in order to make my life special, make my life worth living, I was going to have to learn to be different, learn how to survive outside the system.

So it was I began experimenting with vandalism, shop lifting and other ways of breaking the law, not really trying to accomplish much but testing the limits of my reality. I was first arrested at age 8 when I had found myself breaking and entering in to the back of a convenience store, we had hardly picked up anything when the store clerk came to the back and grabbed me, I hadn't even decided if I was going to steal anything or not, we had pried open the door but were standing in the doorway. After the police took me home, I learned how they had embellished the story, my friend had told the truth as he hadn't even entered the store and had actually ran away telling us it was wrong, only I had at this point gone in, but the cops arrested all of us and lied, even though they knew the situation.

It was from that experience that I first learned how dishonest police could be, both my friends parents had been lied to about just how involved their kids had been. I realized there was no point in trying to be honest with the cops, or authority figures in general, it had nothing to do with justice it was all about power trips, the vain notion that the legal system can “teach a lesson” all the while writing up reports in a way that makes the cop's life easier. Despite some close calls I wasn't arrested again until age 10, which was for shop lifting and this time punishment was much more severe, I had been getting sloppy after so much success, but after that arrest I decided to be more careful and only do crimes which were worth the risk. As I grew older and got arrested again and again, each time I dealt with the cops I came to trust them less and less, they were always lying and trying to trick me in to confessing to things, or saying they wouldn't press charges if I told the truth and then would do so. Never really having money I somehow understood even then that those items in the store were the products of a system which exploits people and which only masquerades as freedom and equality. This mentality would help to shape my understanding of the economic system as well as the legal system, knowing full well from experience just what police were capable of, the lies they would tell and how little their justice really meant.

I was lucky enough to be raised in a town with easy access to secluded forests, as a child I developed a pension for snarling like an animal, biting and scratching at people and having been somewhat of a problem child I tended to avoid my parents since it seemed like every time they talked to me, I was getting punished for something. Running around the woods I learned to love nature, I also learned the joy of lighting fires and quickly became a little pyromaniac, unfortunately sometimes this would get out of control, but luckily nothing alive was ever too hurt, except me. As I got older my friends and I took to throwing around Molotovs for the fun of it, one night we watched the first 7 burn as lights in the darkness hypnotizing us with pleasure. Wondering what to hit next, the eighth spilled out on me and I was covered in flames, panic taking hold, by the time we got the fire out my stomach was peeling with first and second degree burns and I had to take my school exams high on codeine. Climbing up roofs and crawling up storm drains, breaking in to abandoned buildings, making homemade explosives and potato cannons, I had a lot of fun as a kid, at night in my small town no one would be out and we would have the place to ourselves, an opportunity we would use to generally fuck shit up. I was always rebellious and from the first time I was arrested I considered myself at war with my parents and the world of authorities, while I would later mature and realize this kind of Anarchy is the bane of activists today, it's all pretty easy to justify as a kid forced to endure an eminently hostile world.

The day after I turned 13, a couple friends and I stole the car of the mother of one of those friends and we went four by fouring in a Buick sedan down to the beach where I smoked my first joint. I was introduced to a new way of looking at the world and while at the time I didn't attach a spiritual value to it, at sunset I saw a great sign in the sky and it would act as a harbinger of new states of consciousness for me. I got into pot slowly over the first year, afraid from propaganda that I would become addicted or dependent in some way, the more I tried it the more I realized I had been lied to about drugs. This further disillusioned me with the authorities as I realized how many millions of people were being locked up for something so harmless. The more I realized I had been lied to, the more I wanted to find an alternative to the status quo, to the government which knowingly sought to control and manipulate me for their own agendas. Years later I came to realize that much of the pot in town at that time had been laced with meth, I had been confused why some pot was so different than others, I remember being disappointed some times when I seemed to burn out much faster than other times. Even after I found this out it was clear to me that the only reason this happened was because I had to buy it off the black market, that the laws were doing more harm than good.

After about a year of smoking pot I began experimenting with mushrooms and then some time later with MDMA, the MDMA didn't really make a big impression on me, but the mushrooms were a further revelation that the world was not what I had once thought it was. I remember the first time I did mushrooms I even heard voices saying that they were the mushroom spirits, I quickly brushed this off as me being high, after all I was a strict materialist atheist, but I did find the idea of having imaginary mushroom friends interesting. Still there was no denying the pot and mushrooms were making me come to amazing realizations and insights into culture and the world, the manipulations of TV and advertisements all around me started to be seen in a new light, started to make me really question the sanity of the culture I was in. Things which had seemed black and white started to become grey, or started to reverse and I could feel a new level of awareness start to develop in me, one which questioned long held assumptions and one which didn't take the word of authorities at face value.

A year or so later I was given a book which helped to turn my life around, it introduced me to Anarchism, a whole new way of life, or maybe I should say I realized what I had always believed but never put into words. It was exciting to know there were people outside my sleepy little town which thought like me, who were free and who understood the importance of making the most out of life, of not letting the conventions of tyrants hold you back. I learned of what it was like to be a travelling hobo, having nothing but a bag and maybe a dog, sure a fool to some, a big zero even, but it was clear to me the real fools were those who never even start a journey of self exploration and spend their lives working to get out of debt for a few conveniences that they could easily do without. I learned of people who ate out of the garbage instead of working, people who had managed to be free rather than spend their lives working in jobs they hate, this had always been the dread of my youth, not out of laziness but out of a matter of priorities. There are so many more interesting things to do than work in an office and I could see from my parents and the parents of my friends, having money was not the same as being happy. I learned of how society could be run without hierarchy and how the capitalist and communist systems were grossly inefficient and inherently filled with corruption, what's more I learned just how meaningless elections are in a country where money determines who can run and get elected. The more I read on the subject the more I realized, I had been an Anarchist the whole time and though I had discovered it a year before, it was at this same time that I really became interested in punk rock and much to my parents horror, I got a Mohawk and became fully immersed in that way of life. At the beginning I didn't feel so much I was rebelling against anything, but living as my true self, embracing who I really was without being scared into conformity. It wasn't until my parents started to impose new rules on me that I started to feel rebellious and even absolute anger that I would be forced to be someone I am not, once I had tasted freedom, my true self, I knew there would be no going back.

By the time I was 17 I had a clear idea of where my life was headed, I knew any future of mine had to be in line with Anarchism, that I had a duty to try and help people to realize the advantages of Anarchy and to help others to make the most of their lives, to oppose tyranny and lies wherever I found it and I knew the best way I could do this was through my writing. Clearly I had and still have my work cut out for me, but once I took acid for the first time, everything would become much more complicated and much much stranger.

Trojan Horse Trixster

Hey there adventurous girl,
You wondered about my mystery, you believed you could handle any surprise,
But something was waiting for you inside me, bigger then what we comprise.
Did you think you could delve my insanity?
Did you think your reason of glib curiosity,
Was enough to be worthy, of turning the final key?
You pretended to give some love,
Hiding your sword behind a dove
I knew your intentions and your selfish way of being,
Never could you expect a complete new way of seeing,
Not knowing what would happen when you drank this mad hatters tea.
Now you scream for relief because there is no way for you to be.
Responsible for everything is now the price you pay,
Next time when you meet a mystery you will be careful what you say.
Now the fantastic freak is finally seen,
You ask for mercy to let this be a dream.
You thought you were playing an epic game of novel fantasy,
No it was not you who was the player, but the timeless form of me.
And the only way its going, is the only way I'm showing,
Falling further down the rabbit hole,
Oh yes you'll pay audacity's tole.
Come with me and step into the magick world,
Now you are lost in oblivion's curl.
Calm with knowing we look at each other with a stern stony gaze,
Forgiveness is always yours, now we shape and see the unseen haze.
I've been here long, to long to count,
A place so high not meant to surmount.
Acid Dream, Never happened,
Living life still 16.
I said goodbye to my future self,
I put that time line on a shelf,
To get back to the past that I once knew,
Before the cuckoos nest over I flew.
To return again to ignorance secure,
Prevent the present from the time warps allure,
To become the lost one that I knew before,
I stepped off the long forgotten distant shore.
Ill send myself back to the present when I was alive,
Back before I saw the truth was there for me to strive.
Some how I must find a way, a person to relate,
Lost inside myself, I hope I find me, before its to late.

It was from acid that I had my first full blown mystical experience and my spiritual awakening if you want to call it that, I can honestly say without psychedelics I would not be a spiritual person at all. I went from being rabid atheist, seeing the very concept of "god" itself as nothing but another dictator, a petty jealous insecure and arrogant monster wanting to enslave everyone, to what I am now. Like so many atheists I hadn't really bothered to do much research on what it was I was so against and instead thought all religions to be more or less be like Christianity. I remember thinking how stupid everyone who believes in anything but science must be. I can definitely say I had no inkling of psychedelic's spiritual potential when I first tried them, nor did I have any desire to believe in some god in an attempt to comfort myself. At that point in my life I would of gladly become a junky to escape reality before I believed in god, but at that point I was quite happy in life, in most ways happier then I had ever been. Ironically its when I became aware of spiritual realities that things became much more complicated, much more depressing as well in that I was much more alienated. Through my psychedelic experiences I have gone through things that were at times incredibly unpleasant to the point of driving me to suicide, but I have also gone through previously unimaginable bliss as well as all kinds of weird experiences I did not know where possible. The following stories will give you some idea of what can happen on drug trips, some of it is definitely not pleasurable. This is not to say you will definitely have a bad trip, but that if you blindly go into it not knowing what you are doing then you might have to learn like I did why these substances need to be used with proper knowledge, intent and in the proper environment. When used properly and when you know the spiritual practices and have the correct mindset going in, when you are willing to face your shadow and your fears, you will have nothing to fear. I do not write the following account to scare anyone, but because it is without a doubt the most important experience of my life, it may have been scary as hell, but I have learned more from this one really bad trip than any other trip I have had.

Up until acid I had only done drugs for pleasure, I didn't realize their was any other reason to take them, besides maybe some creative inspiration. This all changed on my first acid trip, I didn't know it but I had done 6 hits by accident and I was in for much more then I had bargained for. Take this as a lesson to be very careful with blotter acid, its just a piece of paper and you don't really know how much is on it until you take it, or really even what is on it, as we later found out it was also really dirty stuff with relatively high levels of strychnine on it. So then, always make sure you know and trust your dealer. It was just me and one other friend taking the acid, we had three tabs, unknowingly each one had what we would later learn is the equivalent of 4 hits on it, we offed the third tab to another friend but he was scared of acid making him "see demons or some crazy shit." So we split the third tab thinking we could each handle one and a half hits. At first I thought it was all a bit disappointing, much like mushrooms which I had taken perhaps 15 times before, the acid wasn't really holding up to its reputation, though looking back I really didn't know much about acid at all. It wouldn't be long before I realized just what a fool I was.

Although there were only the two of us taking acid we decided to go hang out with some other friends. When we got to where everyone was hanging out everything was alright, except that there were some uncomfortable tensions with the owner of the house, he was a bit of nut and nobody really liked him that much. He was actually an old friend of mine, though later I found out he was an orphaned crack baby and a schizophrenic, most of the time he was harmless, but his erratic behaviour always put people on edge and I hadn't felt close to him in years. He was a few years older then me, tall, thin of Native descent with a troubled look on his face most of the time, but his behaviour was definitely off putting as he had gone pretty crazy since he got in to PCP and all the other drugs. Despite the fact we were on weird terms together, he had played an important part in my life, he was there when I first smoked pot, he had helped to teach me how to shoplift and rebel in general and as one of the school bullies, offered me protection from any of the older kids who might try to pick on me, though later I made friends with pretty well all the dirt bag kids in elementary, so this wasn't much of an issue.

This nutty friend of mine who shall remain nameless had been kicked out of his adoptive parents house when he was 15 and had been living off the government in a small yellow motel cabin in what was probably the lowest income housing in town. Outside it was dilapidated and the wood panelling was coming off, the neighbours were a variety of alcoholic white trash hicks who luckily kept to themselves. Inside the wall paper was coming off and the roof had been attacked to chip the paint, the bedroom/living room was about 8 feet by 13 feet, beside it an even tinier kitchen and a bathroom just big enough for a standing shower and a toilet. So there I am with the friend I was coming up on acid with, we were sitting there on an old pull out couch covered in cigarette burns which seems to have been used as an ash tray, a variety of garbage and dirty dishes strewn about and all the while a Felix the cat clock ticked away serenely, its tail swinging back and forth as a pendulum. All together with about 5 other people, some of whom I was closer to than others, the cabin was cramped, but we had grown accustomed to it through previous long doobie sessions, still it was clear I could of chosen a better place for my first acid trip.

As I said I wasn't too impressed with this acid at first, but it wasn't long before we decided to break out the bong and after a few tokes from it everything got crazy. I had visions of what seemed like the future, my friends were aged maybe 10 years, some of them were dirty looking and seemed like crack heads. As if in guilt for teasing one of the guys there ten minutes earlier, I had a vision of him, he was much much stronger looking than normal and he said he was a crack dealer and was filling a pipe with crack, this was weird because in real life he doesn't even smoke weed, but I didn't seem to question it at the time. In fact in real life he filled the pipe with pot and was offering it to anyone who wanted it, since he didn't want it. I saw him say "this is crack, who's gonna smoke it?" For some reason I volunteered and smoked the pot, which I thought was crack, after toking I dropped the pipe on the ground, but I thought I dropped crack. I do not remember this part but apparently after I dropped the pipe I refused to pick it up because it was "in a vortex" which had opened up in the floor. Seeing him as a muscular crack dealer with a gun he got mad at me for dropping the pipe and threatened to kill my friends if I did not deliver a bag full of drugs somewhere. I remember asking frantically where I had to bring it and then everything went back to normal and the people there looked at me confused and asked me what the hell I was talking about. Throughout this I was having trouble remembering I was on acid, which made it a whole lot harder to calm myself down and tell myself I was just tripping out. Getting agitated by all this I kind of wanted to get away from people, the trip would come in waves and I headed out with my bag to the front porch with one of my friends, who I suppose was trying to calm me down. I had another vision, of seeing this friend at the house and he had a new truck and he was also stronger looking, though he was not threatening at all. I don't remember what he said except when the wave passed he asked if I was alright, I said I was.

Going back inside, the visions would come and go and I was hallucinating heavily, I remember within what must have been the blink of an eye I left my body I was zooming through what I can only describe as outer space, but more of a void and I had no body. I remember hearing a voice in a bureaucratic tone say something like "alright we have another one, give him the standard tour of the universe." It was all void and nothingness, there was no concept of time, only eternity, everything that exists past or future, was in a huge light blue ball of energy. I can only describe it as the colour that some sapphires get and yet I knew right away it was connected to my mind, that it was my mind and everything else in singular oneness. At first this shocked me and instantly the ball seemed to react and shimmer accordingly, realizing it was connected to me and that it actually was me I decided to go into it and everything became bliss, then I became overwhelmed by this and got a little bit of the fear and again the ball reacted, but I remembered that I could go to bliss and so I did. Each time I accepted myself as the ball I became one with the ball and went into it and so I became one with all of reality, time stopped existing, there was just a changeless fullness of bliss and all that I knew was an ocean of love. I remember thinking that watching this ball of eternity react to my fears, my thoughts, it was like watching the whole history of reality, of watching consciousness realizing itself to be one with everything, getting scared, then accepting it, then getting scared again, then accepting it for eternity and everything being alright. I remember intuitively knowing all kinds of things about the nature of reality, understanding that physicality is all an illusion and that everyone is one with all things. I thought to myself "how can I live my life the same knowing its all an illusion?" Trying to calm myself down was irrelevant, I was not exactly scared but it was so much to take in at once, there was no freaking out because that is what someone with a body, who had taken a drug would do. None of that existed here, it was all in one ball of energy with me, there was no telling myself I would come down soon because time didn't exist, no body for me to be in, there was no way I could tell myself it was just a trip because I had just experienced that it was my life that was the illusion. After all, how can you run from the truth of yourself when you are one with reality? Then as soon as it happened it was over, at this point I was back in the room with my body and everything was normal.

Then one of my friends who had been sitting in front of me the whole time asked "so what's it like?"

Horrified I could only think, "YOU WANT ME TO EXPLAIN THIS!!?" I must of just sat there looking at him shocked because I don't remember saying anything. Whats an atheist to do with an experience of the divine being more real than reality itself?

After some time another trip began to build up, I remember it seemed like I was in a completely different room than everyone else, everything was overlaid with hallucination, the walls were lime green and all my friends looked like demons, I wasn't scared but they were saying something completely different from what I thought. Then they started talking normally, at which point I believe they were actually saying what I was hearing, since it was just some regular conversation, however they still looked like demons. I remember telling them this and they looked a bit amazed but they explained they wouldn't hurt me. Its funny to think how cliché such a trip about demons was. I'm sure its because of my friend who had decided not to get high with us, as he said he was scared of seeing demons, but taking such a large dose for my first time, its no wonder things got so weird. I remember all the hallucinations seemed to react and change according to my thoughts, that everything I perceived was connected to what I was thinking, then I thought to myself "I didn't know acid was this trippy".

Then the friend who had asked me what it's like turned and looked at me saying, "no acid is just this trippy." This was of course one of my hallucinations reacting to my thought, I have no idea what my friends really said a lot of the time and I was pretty well lost in my own big world.

At this time the friend who had taken the acid with me was sitting right next to me, he was in his own world as well (I can only guess) but he seemed to have a much less fucked up time or at least he was handling it better. I do remember that when I mentioned I was seeing demons my friends asked him if he saw them as demons and he replied nervously "now I do." I was quick to reassure him that I knew they were our friends and wouldn't hurt us. After this we started to talk about what was happening as this was perhaps 5-10 minutes after we had really came up, though to be honest I couldn't really tell you because time perception was totally out the window. My friend and I now tripping together experienced having a telepathic connection between the two of us, I remember thinking I could hear his thoughts and that he told me telepathically he could hear mine. With my thoughts I told him that if it was true to say something out loud, he did just that and this was later confirmed by my other friends who were there and sober, that we claimed we were telepathic, although they didn't test us on it. All this was too much and both of us decided we needed to get out of there and away from people who weren't tripping out. I remember walking down the street with him and having some vision of myself in a red plaid suit blazer with a twisted grin on my face, further down the road I saw a giant praying mantis creature on somebodys lawn and it tried to talk with me making a noise like TV snow when there is no channel.

I remember at this point being so overwhelmed I wanted it all to end, I didn't like having someone being telepathically connected to me, it was cool at first but once you realize you can't shut it off, it can off putting if you don't want to be totally open with that person. I realized I couldn't walk strait and must of had quite a strange look on my face and paranoia began to creep in, I just wanted to be alone, I couldn't pretend I felt human anymore. My friend and I decided to split up and go off alone, in retrospect this was probably a big mistake, but it was one which would change my life forever. I was by myself and back at home which was just down the street from where we had been, in my room I had another vision, this time I was in a city, with some people I don't know and can't remember their faces, I remember seeing myself older and I was coming out of an acid flashback, I remember saying "whoa man I just had a flashback and I thought I was a kid." Everyone in the circle of friends laughed and then the vision ended.

At some point my dad came in to tell me something, seeing that I was sweating and freaking out he knew I was on something, he was and is very much against the use of drugs and has no understanding about these things. Luckily he had enough sense to not try and freak me out further, I managed to hold it together long enough to say I wasn't on any drugs but pot. I remember telling him I was going to my friends house, getting to the front door and having trouble putting on my shoes, getting confused and telling him I am going to bed. I went to my door and changed my mind and told him once I again I was going to my friends house. I have no idea what must of been in my dads mind but I went to the front door and changed my mind once again, he must of seen me go back and forth at least three more times until finally I said to him. "I smoked way too much pot and I am going to bed!" Surprisingly, but luckily he left me alone.

In my room it was dark, I was alone, I seemed to be in an enclosed universe unto itself, I remember getting stuck in what seemed like a repeating time loop, experiencing the same things over and over again. To get back to reality I would have to recreate the universe, luckily I had an eternity, but it was that same eternity, that isolation that I was trying to escape from. All things existed in that place beyond the physical and all times as well, my whole life and everyone's life in fact, I would go through this eternity with time to explain and define all things, then go back to a time before I started and be able to experience the reality which had been created as if I had never left. This can be imagined much like a book that contains the whole story, a story which you write and yet you can always go back to the beginning and read it. The universe according to experience and knowledge is the mind, with words creating the forms we know, with context determining our perception, so that those who utter the divine speech, can like a magick spell, change the universe to reveal perfect equality and freedom in a secret art, which is the great work of the scribe, upon whom even the gods depend. All of my future realizations, philosophies and experiences were known in that realm and I was experiencing them simultaneously, though some I have yet to remember still. For some reason I thought spinning in a circle would get me out of that time loop, but looking back it was probably me doing the same things over and over that made it appear as if time was repeating. So during this phase of the trip I once again realized reality was an illusion of the mind and as before when I had left my body and left time and space, I felt that the only way back to normal reality was through some kind of realization in the mind. Eventually I had the realization I needed, I had recreated the universe (In retrospect I apologize if its a bit of a botched job, I was kind of in a rush to get out of hyperspace.) and managed to bring myself out of the time loop, but I still was only a few hours into the trip, it would be a long night ahead!

Lying in my bed I had visions of spirits that surrounded me, they cut me into cubes with giant blades and while it did hurt, this wasn't incredibly painful, but it was incredibly disturbing and terrifying. I could feel inside my body as the different cubes rubbed up against each other, I could feel each cube separately, but at the same time and touching each other, then the cubes floated apart from each other in the air. Then while I am floating in pieces a bunch of spears came up from my bed and shish ka bobbed me stabbing through the pieces. I remember all this hurt and yet it didn't, I suppose because I wasn't really identifying with my body very much. The spirits eventually put me back together, I think they may of put something in me as well. I managed to remember I was high on acid and things became better, psychedelics go to the worst trips when you forget you are on them. I lied in my bed for I don't know how long, thinking about all kinds of things, my memory is pretty blank at this time, I remember I dreamt that I ate a toad by a lake under a full moon, but I am not sure if it was a vision, or a dream or both. At any rate eventually I came down and it was well into the next morning before I managed to get to sleep.

While on acid I came to epiphanies and came up with all kinds of theories about the nature of reality, all of which I had no inclination about the day before. I wrote some of these down like the idea that maybe what people today call "god" was just made up by some crazy guy because whoever it was knew people would fall for it, or really that it was the closest thing they could do to explain a psychedelic state of mind to other people. This is not to say there aren't real and true beings that fit the definition of "gods" but that in fact I experienced that we are all part of "god" in what I much prefer to call the divine. While I lacked the mystical keys and as I said I was not especially learned about religion, I thought that many religions seem to be part of it's madness, it's attempt to separate humans from it in the universal mind. It also became apparent that drugs, especially mushrooms could have had a large part in the creation of religion and it was very easy for me to understand how religions were started in direct consequence of psychedelic experiences. That others would later come to misinterpret the psychedelic experiences of their prophets and so form the demented authoritarian religions. This was all before I had any idea psychedelics have had a long history in pretty much all ancient religions. What strange acid this was that could dissolve my ego so completely, I remember thinking that we are all just figments of "god's" imagination and that it was deluded in the present moment, almost like the divine was a drug addict and the world was it's trip, it's escapist fantasy, in fact I remember hearing a voice say something like "god is a junky, how sad." The voice seemed to be referring to me in a way, which was strange since at that time I had never really done hard drugs, it was like it was some future voice warning me, giving me "one last chance" to give up my addiction, either to reality or to heroin, it wasn't quite clear. It seemed like I had to choose to open myself up to realizing the truth, to learning something beyond time, learning how to find reality rather than make a mistake I had made over and over in past lives.

It was the very start of the spring of 2001 and I was 16 when I first tried acid and from then on my life was changed forever. As it was such a terrifying and confusing experience I had tried my best to forget about the acid trip and it took awhile before I remembered certain parts. However memories come in gradually and much of it actually came back to me on a mushroom trip a few months after. By this time I was 17 and at the time I was actually debating a Christian about the existence of god, trying to prove to him atheism! He wasn't making very convincing arguments and I had started feeling pretty arrogant about my view of reality, then he asked me something like, "haven't you ever had an experience you couldn't explain rationally?" All of a sudden as if to humble me, in a flash I remembered much of my mystical experience, yet I was still only having some of the memories return. While I was definitely not convinced of Christianity, I remember walking home in a daze trying to come to grips with the idea that spirituality was in some way real. Then lying in bed and still high on the mushrooms I had new visions about the nature of divinity and I saw the "all seeing eye" and realized how little I really knew. I realized that what people think of as "god" represented by the eye is the eternal, and what people think of as the "devil" is all that is temporary, or transitory. It wasn't really a matter of good and evil, just that the transitory things distract us from the eternal and as the transitory things never last, we are never satisfied, it was not that we are damned for not believing in the right thing, but that we have an ignorant set of priorities which make us limit our love. In the end it is all part of the one, part of the process of realizing what is worth wanting and the principle of change or transitory things is itself eternal. Over the next while on subsequent trips more memories of my mystical experience on acid came back to me, but more than this I was having spiritual experiences every time I tripped, it was like they were all connected through the same timeless realm, though I am sure that to this day I don't remember all of that first mystical experience. It was as if my whole life and beyond were experienced within that one trip, it seemed that it was the genuine experience and life was the hallucination.

Some might try to say these are false memories created by the mushrooms, but that is their own confirmation bias causing them to dismiss evidence which doesn't fit their world view. Given my atheistic attitude at the time and that I know better than then them my own mind, that I had even written down some spiritual things the night of the acid trip, not to mention experienced telepathy in front of sober people, I am confident in saying that the memories are accurate. Then there is the fact that the experience of being cut up in to pieces by spirits and reassembled or speared is a common and global Shamanic initiation, one which I was definitely unaware of until years later. Even if you cannot believe LSD to spiritual, I had a mystical experience on mushrooms when the "memories" came back, not to mention every other trip since.

Apart from "god" (who in this case was me) incarnating through a kind of drug addiction, that first acid trip was a pretty classical mystical trip in many ways, the more I studied mysticism the more I would be able to shed light on what happened to me. There is no way that this kind of thing could have been part of my normal mind or some long forgotten reference to something I had heard about earlier, before this I was a complete and total atheist and quite adamant about it. I had no idea about the spiritual implications about psychedelics and this is really why I had such a bad trip. I don't mean to scare anyone away from psychedelics, but you should know its not all fun. Once a person has a trip outside the body, an experience of cosmic consciousness, which can be done in a very pleasant way if you are sufficiently prepared, then from that time on it is much easier to get into a state of oneness within the body and on much lower doses, even with just marijuana. It is this state of oneness or "samadhi" which is sought after by mystics and Occultists, once you experience it, nothing will ever be the same, and you will never be able to forget it completely.

If all this sounds like the delusional ravings of a lunatic, that it is impossible for someone to experience anything divine on psychedelics, well, I can say you wouldn't think that if it happened to you. You may be an atheist and have that experience and possibly you may be good enough at going in to denial that you continue to be an atheist, but it all depends on how you define "god." To my definition that experience is an experience of divinity, and if you study mysticism then it clearly fits the classical mystical experience which people have gone through around the world. If you define "god" as a state of mind as many mystical traditions ultimately do, then it is not at all surprising that plants or chemicals found in nature, or even chemicals like LSD created by humans would be capable of producing such states. The easy and lazy answer is to dismiss this as a hallucination caused by brain chemistry, but then all of perception is caused by brain chemistry and so this would be your bias.

The question is not is the experience real? But what does the word "real" even mean when you can repeatedly and reliably experience something more "real" than the physical world? The word "real" to most would mean something like, that which exists in reality, something that is true, but the word "reality," or "true" are both things which are defined by that which is real and so the question of what is real makes no sense. The real question is what can I ascertain from my perceptual experiences that will allow me to function better? A hallucination may be a product of the mind, but as a product has a certain kind of reality to that mind at least and since this experience is available to all independent of their beliefs and expectations, (though conscious intention can definitely help produce it) then it is a state of mind which is inherent to our natural consciousness and so describes some aspect of a true reality, even if it is only a human psychedelic reality. Even if the state is not especially spiritual, that a mushroom or plant or tab of acid could create such a profound state of awareness is itself miraculous, even if science did perfectly figure out how it works and in fact more so. If you don't believe me, just eat a suitably strong dose of mushrooms and consider that idea for a bit and you will see what I mean. Given that all cultures claim similar experiences without psychedelics, to dismiss it as meaningless is ignoring the evidence and is certainly not something someone who has had such an experience would do. What's more, even if the experience of the divine is a hallucination, it is a hallucination which has obviously had many major real world implications for humans around the globe and so understanding it is crucial to understanding the story of humanity, the nature of religions in general and the present situations we find ourselves in. So what if the divine is a state of mind? The mind is the part of reality skeptics can be most sure actually exists in reality and so products of the mind should have a certain priority in ontology over all things that are seemingly outside of it. This is not to say that the mind is free of making mistakes, on the contrary, until you correct the mistaken assumptions that are in your mind, you cannot figure out the true nature of anything that seems to be outside of it.

From that first acid trip I became aware of spiritual realities beyond comprehension and I began my spiritual journey. From then on I knew psychedelics were powerful tools to use for exploring reality, I studied more and more learning and trying to make some sort of sense out of what happened to me on that first acid trip. In my studies I learned more about the spiritual world, I also took more psychedelics wanting to try and explore new realities, though I was now much more careful with my LSD doses. On subsequent trips I came to have visions that are common mythological themes, I managed to connect with plant spirits and many other things and from these further experiences I came to better understand that first acid trip.

Here I am now three years later still trying to make sense of what has happened, I have been studying various spiritual traditions as well as more on Anarchism and it is my intention that through my writings I will shed light on how these two seemingly unconnected subjects are really aspects of a deeper truth and can lead a person to a better understanding of life and the nature of reality. That trip changed me forever and in many ways I had to learn to be a whole new person, it was as if my whole life happened in one night, that all of time happened in that one night, I know I have to make sense of it somehow and the more I study spirituality the more I realize it is intimately connected with Anarchism. In my more volatile moods I concentrated on Vitriol and then spewing such acid from my mouth that it would dissolve the ego of the world, but I also knew that in order to explain the stone to those filled with preconceptions, it would require a great amount of work. Although Anarchism is generally secular, a lot depends on your personal definition of “god” and I personally don't like that word, in my opinion Anarchism depends on the truth and everything in me tells me there is truth in the psychedelic experience, even if I can't fully put it into words. I feel that by writing down what I learn as I learn, I will be better able to provide insight to someone who wants to learn these subjects and this will be more helpful to a beginner than if I wrote as an “authority.” You can learn from my lessons as I learn them and from my mistakes as I make them. I don't know where my life will take me, so I can't really say where this book will take me, this world is filled with many horrible realities, but hopefully by the end of it I can find some way to justify humanities existence.

Right now there are people living in horrible poverty for no other reason than the atrocities of capitalism are used to justify the oppression of a prosperous European race and it's struggle to dominate everything. There is a madness that has spread across the world and I can't think of anything better to do than try and stop it. Ironically this was inspired by what many people would consider my own madness, largely influenced by my LSD experience. My question is, what madness is better? One that seeks to end the suffering of the world? Or one that seeks to destroy the natural world and enslave all but a tiny minority? Some may say that I have just “done too much” but I suggest that if much of what I say seems unrealistic, then you haven't done enough, if taking “too much” psychedelics makes people care about the world, makes them believe a better world is possible, then maybe we should all take “too much.” While some of what I have to say may be hard to take and may even be offensive, I ask that you not take me or yourself too seriously and consider my words even if it only be as entertainment. I feel like I am setting out in life, and maybe some kid still stuck in school or some worker who has given up on doing what they really want in life will find what I write, find out that there is hope for a better world, that there is a way to make life joyful, to make it an adventure.

Bad Ideas

Don't know what to do?
Wanna be a poet kid? OK.
Drop some acid and slit a cop's throat,
You'll find something to say.
Its a great big world are you living how you want to?
Are you doing what you do?
Are you seeing your free will?
Or are you scared in the light?
Is it too much to wonder why you question? Or do you feel that you should best run?
Run... Run from your self till your legs fall off and you're left to lie to yourself,
So whats your excuse for living dead when its the time of your life?
Gonna die a poor mans soul with lots of money
And a heart that knows no joy.
You better wake up fuck face.
Get some passion you moron.
Crawl with lusty lips in the absurdity of existence.
You better grow up old man,
Into an irreverent eccentric fool who frolics in ever greener pastures.
Maturity reached through single minded embrace of all truth transmuted into humour.
I say to you it is far more dangerous to live a safe and uneventful life,
Those who fear to attempt, always fail.
Stochastic synecdoche with a serious stop.

Chapter 1 – Humanity/Life

Being in North America it is easy for many people to forget about the troubles of the Earth, from their desire and in their wisdom they look around at the cities they have created, the suburbs where everyone gets a house and a lawn, two cars and all the rest and they think to themselves, our way of life is the best way of life. Still, I can't help but in my silent reflections, wonder if it really is wisdom, or just the results of some kind of wisdom of death riddled in error, that they may in their grief see themselves at the tail end of the social ladder, but to what heights can we aspire and to what depths can we fall? The people of this land may or may not have done a great amount of work for their material forms and they certainly think they are worth their salt and it is true for the most part they did their job, played by the rules and believed in the propaganda, they might wonder what more could be asked of them? Now while they are busy admiring their country it has never occurred to them that despite the fact they paid for what they own, just where does most of it come from? What is the real cost of having a blender and nice big TV? Well if you are Chinese worker it is the cost of your slave labour, labour imposed so that you can try to keep your extended family from starving to death, but who likes to think of this? How little do people consider the source of their wealth, the source of their consumer products? Much of what people believe about the economic system is vague and simplistic, like a foreign religion they know it exists, but know little to nothing about it and it is my intention to show how we can do better, how we can start to take over the means of production and decision making, the means of achieving our will in life through a more conscious participation.

It is not from the consumers own hard work but from the economic plundering of the third world that these products come, the artificially created scarcity of billions of people imposed so that a few hundred million can enjoy a totally inefficient and wasteful standard of living which alienates them and systematically seeks to limit their awareness. If you buy into the propaganda its easy to believe that you deserve what you have, after all you only ever did what was expected of you, the products show up in the store as if by magic, the only problem is these people never really thought about whether or not these expectations were worth while, were really helping anyone or even themselves. It must be hard to hear that you have spent your life impoverishing the world and destroying ecosystems when working at the office wasn't even what you really wanted to do in the first place. It must be hard to hear that you have created the problems of the world when all your life you have been told doing these things is what is necessary for being a good and happy person. When paying taxes and supporting corporations which consciously seek to grab as much wealth as possible and at the expense of everyone and everything else is considered good, it's time to take a hard look at your life and reevaluate your values.

The economic system of capitalism through banks lending on interest has spread across the world and this system is essentially a kind of multi generational pyramid scheme, if one generation does not commit fraud to sell their children into indentured servitude, the pyramid collapses and the generation who does not get people under it in the pyramid has to pay the debt. Like all pyramid schemes this requires a mind for infinite growth and perpetual slavery to the system in the name of "progress" which, is in effect nothing but a bottomless pit of consumerism so that through the destruction of limited resources and ecosystems, this pyramid is the altar of decadence and greed. Since the corporations will never be satisfied, they have not stopped enslaving their fellow citizens, but have insisted on using various means and international banking institutions like the IMF and world bank which have been created to systematically plunder the third world to get them in on the pyramid scheme, one way or another. This system relies on complete privatization of all natural resources and drastic cuts to social services, all must be made subject to the ever growing need for new sources of profit if the pyramid is to keep growing. Anything to make money, either through legal or illegal exploitation and with overt dictatorship already in place in many of these countries, corruption is made all the easier. Just as a magician, I wish I could make all these horrible realities go away with the wave of a wand, but while these are uncomfortable truths it should not be a huge leap to see that if supporting such systems is destroying the world, then we should start to consider alternatives, start to think about what is really healthy for us and what future we really do want to create.

Being a truthful person in world of lies is probably the hardest thing you can do, sometimes it seems like this world is hell and the only way to escape is to be so good that people will turn on you and kill you, a clean sacrifice, but then that seems a bit too Christian for my taste. I have tried to be a good person or at least my true self and for a time I was well liked, but what I discovered from being "cool" was that most people judged me based on my reputation and would not be true to themselves around me in order to raise their social status. This has caused a loss of how I see myself, I am not sure I want to be identified as "cool," nor do I want to be a moron and because of this I have felt quite out of place around pretty much everyone. I don't want to feel like I'm better than everyone but I don't belong in any group that I know. I have felt so insensible for the last three years or so. I feel I am a true individual, although I can relate to everyone I've ever met and yet for the most part I can't relate to anyone. I have become extra mundane, at least without a few cups of whiskey and while I am not sure how to be social appropriately, I could probably make friends with just about anyone. This world of etiquette and ritual for social conduct seems so horribly rigid and automatic to me, I have no interest in playing a role except maybe as someone who destroys the need for people to play a role. It seems for anyone to recognize me as a person they have to be able to put me in some sort of category and although I was generally aware of this years ago, it has become exponentially more obvious as time goes on. Of course having realized this I have realized this is definitely not how most people present themselves, though I think deep down, it is in most of us. Great pressure is now being put on me to choose my career but I feel so inadequate to live in this world. Everyone I know feels so obsessed and immersed in their ego games and its horrifying to think it will always be this way, even more so that these are suppose to be the best years of my life. How does one behave in a human world when they wish to transcend the human world?

I just found out my family has to sell the house I grew up in, my mom lost her job and we can't afford to live here anymore. We have been struggling for quite a long time on my parents small paycheck, but we were getting by, even if we had to eat hot dogs twice or more a week. It turns out my mom has been stealing money from her work in order to keep us fed, she didn't say so but my sister told me, I guess they didn't want to encourage me to steal or something, as if I haven't figured out the morality of such things by now. It feels pretty weird to find out my mom could do that, that someone I thought I knew would do what she had taught me never to do, I knew we were pretty poor but I didn't think we were that bad off, I guess that's because she was using the money to keep us afloat. Over the years she worked at that corporate bakery chain she stole thousands of dollars, it can't be cheap raising four kids, luckily her boss only fired her and didn't press charges. Although I am upset to learn that it has come to this, I am also filled with a kind of pride in my mom, that she would do that for us and risk her very freedom to feed us. I see now my mother is a fine example of the quintessential spirit of justice and freedom which is inside us all, even she is fighting back against the materialist ambitions of the corporate establishment which seeks to turn the truth on its head and dominate all life in this world. While I thought her bourgeois, she did see through the system and she chose to go with her heart and her head, rather than let us starve, rather than cling to some artificial morality which says we don't deserve to have a home, even though my parents work as hard or harder than most people. I see nothing wrong with stealing to support your family when you have no alternatives, especially from a big corporation like the one she worked for, in many ways she seems heroic to me. I guess I was more lower class then I realized, it makes me so angry that anyone should have to steal just to feed their family, all the while food is being thrown in the garbage by the tons.

Walking down the street today I wanted to burn everything down, to let it all go up in smoke, maybe being an arsonist would be a good career for me, I always did like to play with fire. I was so filled with hate today I even had trouble breathing, even though the only physical exertion I had was walking, I wanted to throw up. Obviously this was an emotional reaction to being surrounded by advertisements and people chasing money, trying to sell me my own death, but then when you are surrounded by such things, it sometimes seems doing anything to take up the sword and destroy that system can be justified. I have been fed lies for too long and its really getting old, this system is suppose to be "civilization?" It's suppose to be an evolution from the law of jungle? From us preying on each other like animals? It is definitely strange that people could think our society healthy, worth dying for and defending and yet nearly everyone would complain about the government and think that the poor of the world are mistreated. Clearly capitalism flaunts competition, flaunts its relentless consumption and domination of the elements of the natural world, just because we use money does not mean we are not still using the law of the jungle, it just means we more often use legal measures to take food and resources from other people, the police evicting a family from their home for the banks is not really much different from a lion chasing away a cheetah to take its kill and eat it. If a country doesn't have the economic or legal means to take what it wants from other countries then it goes to war, just as simply as different wolf packs fighting for territory, the difference is humans invent moral justifications of such wars, almost always after the decision has been made to go in there and take what they want. The biggest difference between us and other animals however is that wolves and lions do what they do out of the need for survival, we do it not to feed ourselves, but for purposes of egotism and relentless greed, so in a very real way what we have is less moral then the law of the jungle, what we have is a bunch of intellectual apes who go by the law of genocidal greed.

I have decided that now is as good a time as any to move out on my own, I will be moving to the city to live with a friend of mine there, I was planning on it already but this just means I have to do it sooner. I had spent the past year couch surfing, back packing around owning little and getting buy eating garbage and panhandling, it was fun visiting friends and sleeping under the stars, but in order to write, study and practice my spiritual disciplines its going to be a lot easier if I have a steady place to live. I had temporarily moved back in with my parents until I could figure out what I was going to do with myself, but it appears that it's time for me to move on. I am not sure how I will support myself when I get there, I am going to need more than the few coins I got spanging to pay the rent, but at least I am getting on with things. This isn't exactly how I wanted it to happen, but what can I do? My parents plan on moving to some redneck town where the housing prices are cheap, I don't think I could handle it anymore, I need to go where the action is, I need to start making change in this world, I just hope that I can find what I am looking for in the city, people who can help and a job that is at least tolerable. I need time to write out my vision for the world, to develop the skills I will need to make a difference and bring about real change. Its not hard to imagine something better, I need to set my intention, to cast my spell to bring peace and equality to the planet, balance and wisdom, not an easy goal at all, especially for a 20 year old, but I find the alternatives intolerable.

Those who don't agree with the herd mentality, who don't conform to the state and corporate agenda of working to supply a few alphas with more than they could ever use are deemed to be worthless, insane, and weird. If they do not see value in working to accomplish all that they deem horrible they are considered lazy, as if there is no other possible reason that a person would wish to avoid spending their life working at a job they hate, to support a system which does these awful things. The system knows it is these people which must be alienated, ostracized and condemned before they have even spoken their views, for if the majority of people actually listened to anyone which they didn't already agree with, then they may learn something and once people start learning things they start to question the validity of what they have been raised to believe. If a person admits they have been playing in a rigged game their whole life, they admit they are a loser and their egos have been carefully crafted to abhor losing status in the community, to always keep dreaming that they too can make it big and win the game and so, faced with this reality they find it more comfortable to keep on playing a game that deep down they know they can never win. We have been chasing desire but we do not really know what we want, or how to get it, we have become wilfully ignorant, apathetic to our self awareness and blind to the reality of our union on this planet and so we are not capable of manifesting our will and leave the means of producing the future to those we generally consent to call rulers. When you accept an authorities idea of what you want and what is right for your life, you end up creating your life unconsciously, avoiding the responsibility of free will, but with Anarchism we become capable of taking control of our own life and the world becomes magickal. This line of thinking has led me to explore all kinds of alternatives to capitalism and through my research i have come to the conclusion that Anarchism is the only realistic, fair and long term kind of society that can exist and that any truly advanced and civilized human society or any spiritually aware society would be Anarchist and would not tolerate such gross inequities and destruction as our current system encourages.

Glassy Stare

Making due waiting for sunrise from the dark night of the soul in my upholstered and carpeted padded cell, complete with fridge and TV.
The closer to truth I get, the sooner the apocalypse comes, watching life in fast forward stepped back at a distance.
My hate is like diarrhea I want to shove it in your face.
We all keep what we sow but the only seeds I have are wild, luckily I always liked dandelions.
Staying where its comfortable my technological vision condensed into form creating more complex imaginings.
Cherish the moment, the whole universe was created just for you.
Where are you now inside your house or your mind?
There's no where to run when nowhere exists and you are the whole of reality.
Beleaguered writings of a man out of his depth to which he cannot control the inspiration.
The walls are coming down to be replaced by an abode of vines.
You're comforting yourself through every life that's ever been, the immortals are very old and entertainment is getting very hard.
This poem will be created again and again, each time being the first, each word painstakingly scribbled.

Solemn Bullreshdenkles

I am the only one I am like,
Some words with too much meaning threatening to tear away at the fibres of existence before the left hand is done scribbling them.
Standing by a stream picking my nose and peeing,
I leave my waste to the fishes to see if they can find some meaning.
Sitting on this path and hill by a stream gentling babbling on to any who might care to listen.
Wholesome obscurities to a drug fiend who wishes the best.
Becoming peaceful is tranquilizing,
Still I must resist the darkness and digressions of my life.
I find it better to create my own meaning then live in hopeless nihilism.

Throughout the course of human history we have struggled as a people to find a way to live in equality and harmony. People are constantly trying to satisfy themselves and their desires and for this goal, many theories have been formulated on how this can be achieved with maximum efficiency and so that the most people can benefit from our combined labour. These are the systems of government, in theory they are the attempt of providing everyone with everything they need. Government systems are everywhere in the world and democracy is generally considered the best, but there is no doubt that there is much room for improvement. Absolute power may corrupt absolutely but partial power such as “democracy” corrupts partially, I would go so far as to say the very desire to have power over others, sanctioned by cultural values or not, is itself a symptom of a preexisting corruption within a person, perhaps masked by a sense of duty or altruism, but underneath lies the authoritarian attitude of elitism. In a capitalist society however, exerting power is not limited to being elected, but by your bank account, this is why the philosophy of Anarchism is truly the ideal as it has no ruling class, no plutocracy that has power over anyone else. Power corrupts only when it is power over others, power for yourself is freedom, but with this freedom comes the responsibility of safe guarding ourselves and others from tyranny. “Democracy” may have elected officials but there is nothing to stop these officials from lying about things like who won the election or the real reasons for going to war, why they broke their campaign promises or anything else they feel like lying about. Time after time the “people’s government” has shown no regard for the peoples wishes, the most obvious of the plethora of examples of this being the American war against Vietnam.

The different systems of thought often conflict with each other as a direct result of their inability to tolerate different view points, as well as their means of achieving their own interests. When governments fail to be harmonious they become meaningless in that their sole supposed role in existence is to create harmony. There is no difference between individuals fighting for their own interests and individual governments fighting. There becomes no order among the different orders, conflict arises and in the end nothing is really accomplished. These ideologies have affected and continue to affect people tremendously in both positive and negative ways simply because there is no single perfect way. In creating the organization of the government, power in a ruling class must be established, and by doing so there must be people to be exploited by those with power. For a government to operate, a hierarchy must be established, and by doing so equality is never allowed to exist. The people on the top of this hierarchy will never admit there can be another way, they have everything to lose and so the government and the whole capitalist system there by perpetuate all the greed and competition of the world. Domination and exploitation are a fundamental element of all governments from communism to capitalism, monarchy, or theocracy these systems cannot operate without having hierarchical exploitation.

Anarchism is the belief that harmony and equality can only exist when no one can impose power on one another. The word derives from the Greek “anarkhos” meaning to be without rulers, this however does not mean an Anarchist cannot engage in cooperation and organization within a group, only that it must be done in a non hierarchical way. It is the belief that people can live together without any set concept of rules or protocol that is not agreed upon by the whole of the group. Any individual that cannot see the logic in any rule will not have to follow it as long as they have not previously agreed to follow such rules, or their actions do not restrict the freedoms of someone else. It is the ultimate pragmatic compromise of the people and the idea that the best way to help ourselves is simply to help each other. People believe that laws help to prevent the actions of people’s greed and undeniable self desires, but really these laws only serve to protect those with power from those they have robbed through the mechanisms of the law. The beauty of Anarchism is that it is the best way of achieving everyone's self interest because it means everything for everyone.

There are many kinds of Anarchy (I would argue as many kinds as there people) but in very simplistic and broad terms there are two main types which are differentiated by their proposals for the means of distribution of goods and work. First is individualist Anarchists who believe in private property to some degree, though they mainly believe that a persons labour is their own possession which can be traded for goods and services from other workers, perhaps utilizing some form of currency or more commonly, that while the means of production may be owned by the people, products themselves belong to individuals. Then there is communal Anarchists who believe we should share everything, abolish property, currency and everyone work in a socialist kind of economy, but without a state or hierarchy telling people what to do. Generally however common to most Anarchists is the idea that too much “property is theft,” that usury, rent and personal profit should be abolished. Today the distinctions are more blurred, there is no reason why certain basic living standards could not be communal, then have everything on top of that be based in a more individualist manner, or any number of the many variations on the means of distribution which Anarchists have come up with.

One should ask why would someone desiring material wealth steal when it can be given to them, given to everyone. People generally do not see any alternative to government, people say that without government we would descend into Chaos and that everyone would starve and murder each other, thus being born and bred into bondage they see no other way, it is all they have ever known. When descendents of a long line of slaves began to think that slavery was an essential condition of life, freedom seemed impossible to them and they didn't try nearly as often to escape or fight back. These slaves might have even gotten angry if you suggested freedom was possible, surely most who spoke of an uprising would have dismissed before they were even heard properly, because real hope had become too painful to even dream of. So it is with us, only our masters have managed to out do their predecessors and convince us that we aren't even slaves, that there isn't even any further freedom to dream of and so now it is offensive to the pride of the slave to tell them the truth.

The main problem with an Anarchist society is that it could only function with people wilfully participating as Anarchists and working together in the communal decision making. However this is really the problem with any kind of society, and if everyone consented to be an honest capitalist or communist or whatever else the world would function much better than it currently does. Now certainly some systems are inherently more problematic than others, but more problems occur when people choose to be corrupt according to the values of the government or system, or when people disagree about things and work against each other. Such lack of consent to the system means it is unable to function according to it's ideals and so the real question is what kind of society is most pleasurable to the most amount of people, or rather what kind of society allows for the most level of consent? As Anarchism is fundamentally based on individual consent and allows people to make up their own minds and make their own kinds of societies and also to go their own way when they disagree with a group, then obviously Anarchism allows for maximum consent and so functionality.

When most people think of Anarchy the first things that usually come to mind are thoughts of chaos, destruction and the violence of mob rule. One of the main arguments against Anarchism is that people would form into gangs or small organizations bent on stealing and attaining power but as soon as people organize into these groups it ceases to be Anarchy and would really just be a system under warlords much like we presently have. When it is thought through this erroneous argument basically says that we should keep oppressive groups like the government in power over us, even using violence against the people so that we can maintain our freedom and avoid violence. Even if violence did exist in an Anarchist society, there is no way the disorganized few could possibly match the horrors of institutionalized violence that is so common in the world today. In a true Anarchist society we would be taught from birth to celebrate our individuality and freedom, but also that selfish actions are ultimately destructive to that individual. Living in such a society where everything was shared freely there would be no reason to organize into groups to steal other peoples possessions. The unifying principle of the Anarchist people would be to reject the lies of the power mad, so long as no hierarchy or authority can establish itself, plurality can flourish. We must also ask ourselves why would someone willingly sacrifice absolute power over themselves? Although most people don't realize it, we already have this power within ourselves at this very moment. People are generally too scared, or too willing to blindly follow the herd and in fact have been taught from a young age not to think for themselves, or to avoid anything that might give them any real freedom in the psychological sense and so they surrender that power to whoever seems to be an authority.

People generally want to feel what they are doing is good and to have companionship and with it their own version of love, a society unlike our own, which actually emphasizes these principles, which has a healthy egalitarian freedom loving approach is what will keep people from going on murderous rampages. In an Anarchist society there may be no laws against murder but what would there be to stop vengeance on that person by the victims family? Violence would beget violence and it would only continue an endless bloody cycle not unlike gang wars in cities today, but what will keep people from solving their problems with violence is a society where it is appalled and which unlike our present culture, does not actively create motivations for it. Most murders are crimes of passion, for greed, or to cover up another crime, all of which couldn't have been prevented by the police or anyone else. However within an Anarchist society there would be no need for greed or to cover up other crimes and the passion motive cannot really be stopped by anything, but would mostly be taken care of by instilling in each person a clear sense of responsibility for not engaging in the domination or oppression of others. People are not going to become murderers simply because there are no police, there will still be consequences to your actions, but there will be a lot less motivation for murder in Anarchy and so these fears of murderers is one created by authority figures to justify their existence.

The real motives of violence within our society, are symptoms of a sick society itself and such mental conditions which could allow such intentions to exist are inevitable in a society that is fundamentally based on domination and inter personal subjugation. Many of the problems today are created simply because of the conditioning and the desensitizing that goes on from the time of birth. Violence is everywhere in our world, in our entertainment and in our schools and homes. Some people would argue that it is in human nature and to some degree I think it is in most people, but I argue violence is mostly learned and encouraged in our society. It would be awfully hard to shoot someone if no one knew what a gun was. It is clear to see that violence is so common in our everyday activities as to largely go unnoticed by either people involved, but this is because we live in a violent society masquerading as a peaceful one. That is there are culturally sanctioned forms of violence as with the police and military and there is unsanctioned behaviour as with armed robbery. Sometimes, as with say athletics, martial arts tournaments and mosh pits, violence can be channelled in to healthy expressions and these kinds of culturally sanctioned violence can help to release tensions and even release stress and anger in a basically peaceful way. However when a society glorifies nationalism, xenophobia, the class system and all kinds of prejudice, it is no wonder that people find unhealthy expressions for their aggression. Unless you plan to rule through terrorist means, it is not enough to make laws to deter crime, you have to make people want to obey laws in order to get rid of the source of the problem. Its hard for a starving person not to steal if they have no money, but if bread was free they wouldn't need to. While it is entirely possible that certain individuals may at one time resort to violence to gain their way, might would not be able to make right if people had no need to dominate each other, which would mostly be accomplished with the elimination of the monetary system.

People seem to think no one would work if they didn't have to, but this just isn't true, all people are driven to find contentment and for people to live to do nothing is not living at all. This idea comes from the fact that most work today is not enjoyable, this is because it is largely unnecessary, for the profit of the very few, and because a worker has to deal with the rules and management of a boss who does not respect them or have their interests at heart. Of course there will always be undesirable jobs, however without money many needless and usually undesirable jobs would be eliminated. As for the remaining undesirable work, this can best be treated by dividing it as evenly as possible. The motivation to excel would be that those people who can do specific specialized jobs would do the more technical work, jobs which require education are filled by people with drive and ambition, who desire more fulfilling work. No one can expect a doctor to act as a garbage man when the hospital is overrun with patients, it would of course be done by people with less pressing matters to attend to. However with a free education and a global society from which to draw new applicants, there would eventually be potential for many more educated professionals. If we were free to choose the time of our own hours and everyone did the work then who would mind doing a bit of unpleasant work for the betterment of everyone, especially since then you would be supplied with all the benefits of society and an actually decent living standard.

With everyone in the world who can work available to help, there would not be nearly enough menial jobs to go around and so the time in which each person must work could be greatly reduced. All that would be needed in terms of cooperation, would be assuring that people are given their fair share of material possessions, the only limitations being material resources outside a sustainable framework. There is no doubt all necessities such as food, shelter, education, medical care and fire protection etc could be taken care of for each person, jobs such as these are not chosen because of greed but because there is a genuine desire in the individual for that work. If people are truly too lazy to work these reduced hours for the things they want, then they simply won't be accomplished, if their desire isn't great enough to do the work, then they really don't need such things.

In order to get people on the same level and create the required social change we need to look at what we are doing wrong. Capitalism only promotes greed and competition among the people of the world and will never result in equality. It gives incredible power to private businesses which have anything but societies interests at heart. They only desire to create more wealth for the corporate elite, freedom and equality is not profitable for them. Companies control almost everything in a capitalist society and what they don't control the government does, which generally has the corporations interests at heart. These two forces exist in symbiosis, the companies control the media and information flow indoctrinating them in consumer society, as well as keep the North American masses placated with dozens of useless products, simultaneously keeping the economy flowing and the masses fat, while the politicians get to look good and take out anything that inhibits the corporations greed. Corporations control the workforce, which is the people and therefore is technically the government of a democratic society. However the word "democracy" is literally translated from the Greek meaning "rule by the people" and so this shows that Anarchism is the only true democracy. Our present system is living under representatives, it is a common mistake that we live in a democracy when in fact we live in a republic, this is even less a true democracy since the government doesn't really represent us at all. The idea that the plutocratic system of capitalism can coexist with democracy is a fundamental contradiction.

The government are the spokesmen figure heads of these corporations and do no represent us at all, their main function is to ensure no laws or opposition is brought against the capitalist system, as well as systematically dismantling our constitutional rights in favour of more profitable serfdom. The government is not corrupted by the corporations, it is literally run by the same people who on the surface change professions. The government also functions to further indoctrination through the school systems which are specifically designed to eliminate critical and individual thought and imagination, in favour of regurgitating carefully prepared facts as well as desensitizing us to monotony and arbitrary scheduling by authority figures. Clever snake oil merchants have tricked us to into becoming like cattle, all so that we might be herded and rustled in what is essentially an international kleptocracy, but through learning logic and the use of language that has been hidden from us, we can become messengers communicating the purest distilled truth, as travellers on the roads of knowledge. Finally the function of the government is to create the illusion of a responsible body of representation which creates order in society and "protects" it from other countries. In a capitalist world it is money that controls everything, ruled by the richest few it is a monetary dictatorship. With no accurate and unbiased source of information regarding political and economic power, people cannot form objective and reliable decisions on how to be best represented by their government. People are generally ignorant or apathetic when it comes to politics, which is reflected in the relatively poor voter turnouts. The people know they won't be represented and political parties can even gain power with less than fifty percent of the peoples votes and so this is obviously a highly inefficient means of representation.

Government and economic inequalities are not the only demons we must slay if there is to be an Anarchist society as religion has constantly been an enormous factor in the history of human pain. Religion has created another means of control which has further separated us as humans creating great friction and intolerance between different viewpoints. People generally feel a need to believe in something, anything higher than themselves, either god or the government. However this potentially destructive attribute, to follow things believed to be superior to themselves could also be useful to the Anarchist society. What people have to realize, what is superior to them and their needs is everyone's collective needs, (not their desires) this creates some of the social pressure that would help keep people in line in Anarchy, balanced with the idea that the collective needs individuals to point out the bullshit. While Anarchist philosophy usually considers religion just another means of control and irrelevant, "the opiate of the masses" there are spiritual Anarchists who believe the teachings of various religions yet manage to keep from becoming authoritarian. If someone wants to believe in Jesus or Mohamed that is their right and nobody could really stop them, but what must be stopped is the reliance on organized institutions that take away personal power.

For a Christian or Muslim or any faith if it is a sin to do something then you should know without being told by a priest that it is a sin and you must decide for yourself how to interpret your holy books, you should also trust that "god" made us all capable of deciding this for ourselves without you to take away our free will with which we were created. If you simply have blind faith in the church (which is a very different thing from having faith in "god") then you are cheating yourself and your god of your own true beliefs. I don't know of any religion that does not say god or the gods gave us free will and so in many cases it could easily be argued that they are quintessentially Anarchist. (Especially in Pagan traditions) What must be stopped with religion is the reliance on religious "authorities" as well as the desire to make everyone follow your religion, if people commit a sin in your religion, trust that your god will punish them accordingly if that's the kind of "god" you think exists, being the sin police here on Earth is interfering with the experiment in free will that the Abrahamic "god" supposedly is engaging in. Thanks to their religious institutions the Abrahamic religions have become the pinnacles of religious intolerance and from what I can tell, intolerance, exceptionalism and bigotry are the core principles of those traditions in that to them their god is the only god worth following and all others are demonic and evil. (We might call the followers of these religions Abrahamic supremacists, except that the different groups generally hate each other too.) Only heretics have tolerance for other peoples beliefs, but even still followers of these traditions should by their own logic let "god" be the judge, for it is their arrogance and hubris to think they are worthy of carrying out his will. In Anarchy everyone has the right to believe whatever they want without fear of any discrimination or prejudice, something that is denied to people of different cultures and to some extent present day western society, the only exceptions are people who think their religion tells them to oppress others.

In order for an Anarchist society to take hold it would no doubt be advantageous for there to be the unity of a one world society in order to prevent elitist countries imposing their rule through military means. Before wide spread Anarchy can begin, it is almost certain the whole world will have to be under some form of contemporary "democracy" but who knows, maybe we will get lucky and everyone will rebel before that. In human history Anarchist ideologies have almost always been present, communities of Anarchists who were fed up with the trappings of oppressive government have been set up time and again. For a time they would flourish but could never last as they were too small and peaceful to defend themselves and so were plundered and overrun by foreign invaders. Once a global society is established equality can be better established everywhere, people may not care about feeding starving Africans, but it would be unheard of in our country to let millions of people slowly starve to death while there is plenty of food available for everyone.

The fact is, in the present day most people do not even really know what Anarchism is, let alone how to go about establishing Anarchist revolution, so there must be some progression from now until Anarchism, it will not happen out of the blue with no work being done, what this progression will look like is however very open to debate. It may take some time for society to mature into a moneyless non hierarchical paradigm, but if we don't start heading in that direction soon we are completely doomed. Even if you believe Anarchism will never be accomplished it is important to realize there are much better ways of running society than the current one. We have been fed the idea since we are children, that this is as good as it gets so don't even try to make a difference, this is of course total bullshit spewed by those with their own interests. There are many models of Anarchism that could work and so there are also many ways which we can decentralize power to create more equality and help to instill Anarchist ideas to the average person. Getting power within our current system to be spread as evenly as possible is the first step in transferring power from the oligarchs to the people, while a hierarchical system can not be reformed enough to make it good, anything that we can do to move it in an Anarchist direction should be done. Waiting around for the masses to mobilize themselves and spontaneously learn about Anarchism is like a scientist with cancer expecting the cancer to find a cure for itself.

To combat this and many other problems, general management of all the economic and social programs must be run by the people and for the people without the encumbrances of the management class. Companies are forced to compete and therefore offer their employees as little wages as possible, as well as compromising the quality of the products. To fight this, unions have attempted to unite the workers. This has worked to some degree, but not to its full potential. To better achieve their common goals all the different unions could combine and work together. If a union could be created to encompass all the workers and companies of the world then companies would be powerless to fight the demands of the workers. This has been attempted with the union called the IWW or the Industrial Workers of the World, AKA the "Wobblies" and so far much work remains to be done in uniting everyone, but with the entire work force working together, for the sole purpose of creating equality and increasing workers benefits, huge advancements could be made. By specifically targeting vital industries and bringing them into the union first, massive leverage would be acquired for helping out union members with other professions. If companies resisted, then the vital industries such as trucking, water, power, and the media and others would go on strike, with the media vocalizing the workers plight and water and power shutting down industries owned by the targeted corporation, in my dreams even the homes of the corporate board members could be targeted. The rights of the workers could only improve, not only wage increases but stock options could be put in place for each worker in their company. Eventually the workers themselves could own the companies and phase out the entire management class. This would cause some companies to go bankrupt in the short term, but in this situation the successful companies would expand and buy up their assets and hire their workers.

Workers could form co-op corporations, running their business as they decide, but with horizontal decision making and evenly distributed profits as has been done in South America and Germany, allowing the people who are effected by the work environment to determine what is a fair and safe place for them to work. For example in factories or in any job where something is produced or where a service is rendered, people could be paid according to how much they have contributed to the workers company and so they would be getting paid on a kind of commission. People have the notion that money is wealth while in reality wealth is resources and work force and when the work force controls the resources then they can ensure the people who need the products get them. While workers wishing to do business with other groups would still rely on money, this would be a huge step towards a truly Anarchistic society in which there is real equality in a society run by the people. Depending on how the system is set up if you worked hard you would be paid accordingly and people who were lazy would have to accept a lower pay or work harder, as the more a worker produced the more could be sold and so the harder people worked the more they would profit. If needed, financial consultants could be used but the emphasis would always be on group decision making and equality. Consultants could also work on a kind of commission plan depending on how well they contribute, but in general consultants are not really needed, the workers themselves generally know the business better than the management class, who really focus on getting themselves money and not the company. Decentralized worker owned co-ops are the only way such organizations can have equality as horizontal decision making is basically the definition of equality. Who can argue against the idea that freedom necessitates equality and so as capitalism and hierarchy are inherently opposed to equality, they are inherently opposed to freedom and so are the enemies of all humanity.

Once everyone in a country belongs to a union, it can progress internationally until all of the workers of the world belong to "one big union" which is itself run according to Anarchist principles. If this is achieved the union would be more powerful than the government or any company, competition and wages between the companies could be controlled and eventually everyone could be brought to a much higher degree of equality. If the union was controlled by the workers, it can control the companies and the economy which controls the government, this would mean the workers would control everything, instead of the present situation where workers control nothing. The key factor in this being that the union would give power over to the workers profiting them directly, instead of some private business owners. All that would be required was to make sure that union leaders were not corrupted, this could be accomplished a number of ways, the best being creating a union that is set up in an Anarchist fashion and making it as decentralized as possible. This would hopefully effectively end the wage slavery conditions present in most of the world, and provide lower prices for all products produced, simultaneously creating more of a sense of a global community that works together for the profit of all.

Since the media would be owned by the people and not private corporations, unbiased and legitimate information could be presented, not just on governments but on everything, creating a media that actually tries to inform the public rather than sell the status quo. This idea is not unlike Marxism but is really a basic kind of Anarcho-Syndicalism, that instead of the state owning the industries the people do, which better allows them to provide for themselves and for their own interests, "forming the structure of the new society within the shell of the old." The media of a capitalist society or any society plays a huge factor in how people understand themselves and creates their national identity, it comments on the societal norms and because it can get its message out better than independent media, it largely creates the societal norms by only reinforcing the culture that it likes. Capitalism is one of the major systems that keeps us under the heel of government control and because mainstream media is itself capitalist, it will only ever seek to strengthen the control of the capitalist government system, and so is fundamentally guilty of a conflict of interest to inform the people objectively. Instead of fulfilling our life's ambitions and realizing everyone's individuality to the fullest extent, we are raised from childhood to work for huge corporations, peddling out useless products for us to buy. So the corporations get richer and we buy more and more useless products to distract ourselves from the horror of our own shallow existence. The average person will spend hours a day watching TV, about a quarter of their entire lives in which we are bombarded with commercials and propaganda to still sell us more products and so seizing control of the media must be a high priority.

Capitalism controls many aspects of our lives, as it controls our social stature in most of today's society. Without certain objects people are not considered part of society, without a home a person loses all respect within the community and is not given the same rights as someone with a home. Without certain clothes a teenager might not be accepted as much as someone else. This basically boils down to the perception that someone different isn't as important as the majority. How often do commercials subtly or directly tell us that with their products the opposite sex will love you and you will never be lonely again, never questioning the validity of love based on the possession of certain products, this reasoning is a direct result of capitalism and is no accident. The corporations push distorted perceptions through the media to sell products, and it works like a charm, and so the media has been instrumental in enslaving workers and taking their power.

Anarchists believe that we don't need to pay taxes or put people in a state of artificial scarcity and imposed working schedules to get things done, that the world will not descend into violence without all the rules and regulations imposed through state violence. On the contrary, without government and things like money there would be an end to war, famine and all kinds of social inequalities that go on throughout the world. Another advantage to abolishing hierarchies is people would abandon capitalism and the ideals it teaches: greed, the almighty dollar, and everyone for themselves. If everyone worked together instead of competing with each other, the world would be a much different place, when a person believes the system they work for is fair and just they work harder, they are more productive and this is why the illusion of freedom is so important to capitalism. The whole idea of needing governments supports the idea that we are horrible people and need to be told what to do, or else we will kill each other even when history shows us it is these very governments and hierarchical institutions which cause the bloodshed. Even if murders did occur in an Anarchist society, it would be nothing compared to what goes on with the lust for money and the organization of murder for profit known as war and industry, and many other horrible things which occur everyday in the world of laws. This is not natural human behaviour, in fact if we look at animals, their behaviour is far better than many of the atrocities that man has committed under such governments. As humans we forget that we are still just animals and the only reason we have war, greed and most of the worlds problems, is because we have created them through our own arrogance.

In our various societies around the world, we have come up with different forms of government in which we allow a small ruling class to set up a system of rules which only work to fill their pockets. Not just democracy, but many others such as communism and fascism do this and the whole time these governments are all forced to compete with each other. These governments measure success in monetary terms and concentrate on making money, usually for the oligarchy. If I were to draw a picture of capitalism it would be a pig man gorging himself feeding on all kinds of food, products, guns and drugs, oil and gold sitting in a throne with his foot stamping down on the head of a starving non white person, who is lying in the waste and filth of this pig man. When asked by this third world person if they could spare a piece of bread, the pig mans enraged response would be, "You are trying to take away my freedom, that would be socialism how dare you! You deserve to die in the sweatshops you tyrant!" In order to have a truly successful society, we have to abandon the notion that having money is the sole purpose in life. We need to stop spending most of our lives working to buy some relatively useless products that have been sold to us by faceless corporations.

In the search for equality, new governments come around that promise to eliminate the class system and make things better for everyone, the obvious example being communism. This was clearly unsuccessful in its attempt to depose the class system, this is because although the communists were aware of the evils of capitalism, they oppressed the people they ruled over in a whole new way. Communists attempted (in theory) to evenly distribute the resources, among other things, the problem with this was they were forced to compete with capitalist countries and people weren't given equal rights; they were still slaves to a minority ruling class that took their needs over others. Productivity went down because they would get paid either way and were going to be poor no matter what, the USSR didn't really bother producing consumer goods to distract people from their misery and so people became discontent with work. With a lack of freedom comes a lack of innovation and so the workers saw their labour only going to serve a new ruling class who in many cases were more brutal than the Tzars, destroying individual rights and all non party expressions. These massive failings of communism have been used by the media to legitimize capitalism, as if there are no other alternatives, that anyone suggesting any change can be classed as a communist with all its connotations. Saying that because there are worse examples of tyranny, that we should be content with not being sent to Siberia and should therefore shut the fuck up about criticizing the current system. Capitalist governments are not all that different from the communists who stressed that their way was the right way, and anyone who thought otherwise was evil. Even in so-called free countries like in Europe or North America, when people try to introduce any new way of doing things like Anarchism, they are ultimately considered treasonous and thrown into prison, or at the very least shunned as outcasts, having their message blacked out or twisted by the media. Anyone who gets involved in activism and wants to fundamentally change the system, will quickly learn how little their promised rights really mean.

“Democracy” or at least the system that has appropriated that name for the ignorant masses has been around for a lot longer than the present neo-imperialists called Americans. The Greeks and later the Roman republic were the first to use this basic method of organization. (unless you count some Indigenous cultures which I do not because their systems were often far superior) After enjoying a relatively prosperous golden age both regimes fell to ruins, the Roman “Democracy” was turned into an empire not unlike what seems to be happening in the U.S. and for the Greeks, “democracy” was even more disastrous leaving their civilization in ruins. “Democracy” wasn’t as advanced or “fair” as today but it was still thought to be the best possible form of government, even though by today's standards they couldn't really even be called democratic. This is a fine example of the specious reasoning that things are as good today as they ever could be and therefore it is pointless to even try. Theories of revolution were present even back then as Socrates taught individuality as well as constant debate and thought on all matters of politics and life. Socrates credo was “subvert the dominant paradigm!” Knowing there will always be room for improvement, for all his troubles and good intentions Socrates was forced to kill himself. With the Romans an emperor was installed and the illusion of representation maintained through the senate, if it hasn't already happened it is only a matter of time before the same happens to us, that is if we do not learn from these mistakes. It is at our own peril that we arrogantly think that we could not succumb to the same pitfalls that the Greeks and Romans did, that somehow our technology makes us less susceptible to tyranny, in fact in many ways it is easier than ever for a government today to delude it's people.

Every once and awhile, a government is especially intolerable and a revolutionary comes around promising a better way of life, so the people say no more and overthrow the government. The problem is that the people replace one set of rulers for another, and things slowly turn back to the way they were before. Anarchism has no real state, has no ruling class and is unlike any government that has existed. We must learn that as long as we make these imaginary laws and force them on people there will always be people to break those rules and oppose them indefinitely. It is in the knowledge that we will never be able to make anyone happy if we do not know where our own happiness lies within ourselves, that we can improve this treacherous world we live in. So we must try to learn so that we can understand ourselves, each other and our reality. In trying to reach for better things we must be sure not to impose beliefs, instead we must try and find out the best way to let people find their own way. If for some reason all governments disappeared overnight, there would no doubt be violence, destruction rioting and so on, but this is because people must first learn what Anarchism is and why it is preferable if we are to abolish the culture of hierarchy.

As we progress into the future, more and more manual labour is replaced by machines or becomes obsolete and there will be a time when almost all of manual labour will be automated, the workers of all classes of our capitalist society will be forced into more technical jobs or they will starve on the streets. This can only help an Anarchist in that people will be less held back by monotonous jobs and feel more fulfilled in their work, or they will see that the system has betrayed them and so look for alternatives. While under capitalism robots will inspire neo-luddites, in Anarchism or a society progressing in that direction, eventually as robotics and other means bring production costs down, money could be phased out all together and each job made obsolete would be a triumph not a tragedy. While environmental pressures still need to be taken into account, a society of environmentalists and emotionally fulfilled Anarchists wouldn't produce so much useless crap and so we wouldn't need too many robots to produce what we do need. Exactly what level of technology and “civilization” is sustainable is something I cannot say, scientists have done a terrible job of figuring this out, or at least of making it public knowledge, but it is crucial that we start planning and designing sustainable technology and infrastructure instead of focusing on profits. In an Anarchist society production would not be held back by any kind of budget beyond the environmental impact and the total available resources, thus stream lining the efficiency of our distribution networks, something which in many ways makes individualist economies obsolete. (But it will be a society even better suited to individualist cultural ideas)

Imagine if all the research scientists of the world didn't have to worry about things like a budget, where they could be given the best available equipment. If we factor in sustainability in to our definition of the quality of a product, this would mean inferior products would not have to be produced for people who can't afford the highest quality, instead all production would focus on the best possible products, freeing up much wasted work power for the more important things. In a society that is mostly comprised of educated people, technology would increase at an exponential rate and we would only be limited by how hard we tried. How many Einsteins and Teslas have starved to death in Africa or been forced to work endlessly in sweat shops or because of a world system that does not attempt to help such people?

Due to the fact we are in such a profit driven society, technological and social progress can often be seriously impeded, ironically in the name of progress itself. This is seen when known products are given prices based on what the suppliers think the maximum they can charge is, rather than the actual production costs. Although a variety of costs must be taken into account in the name of maximizing efficiency, people are being over charged for things such as medicines, electronics and software to name but a few. People are not given the medication which they need because they cannot afford the inflated price of a pill that can be manufactured much more cheaply than companies are willing to sell and so instead we have chosen to let these people die. Capitalism is dependent on "artificial scarcity" in order to drive up demand and so prices for their products, in order to have customers, it is important that not everyone have a product, even if it is something they need like food. Capitalism does this through "free markets," and what they euphemistically call "globalization," which is really just making sure every country is in debt and every country is dependent on international cartels which seek to create a global monopoly. Because it is so "efficient" the system also does this by letting food rot while people starve, all the while there is actually a surplus given humanities population, but then they say we can't just give it away. Capitalism likes to always have some people unemployed, when there is a steady supply of desperate workers, wages can also be dropped, scabs can be brought in if the workers strike or unionize and the general standards of workers rights can be held hostage.

People often like the idea of voting in successful business men as politicians because they think they will make the government more efficient, capitalism is so central to modern society, that society itself is seen as a business, "society" then is not about community or people, it is about individual wealth. Capitalism has marketed itself as the most efficient system and it might be true, but what exactly is it is efficient at? Capitalism is excellent at maximizing profits rather than spreading equality, it is very efficient at distributing resources and wealth to a plutocracy, or destroying or co-opting anything life affirming, most of all it is very efficient at getting slaves to accept their servitude and this is what we have come to call "progress." If we look at the world we can see that it is not efficient at using natural resources with maximum conservation, it is not efficient at spreading wealth or even products, it is not efficient for feeding the starving, it is not efficient at making people happy, (or why would we need all the anti depressants?) it is not efficient at spreading awareness, it is not efficient at creating useful technology and it is not efficient at spreading freedom. Anyone who looks into the economic state of the world can see that what capitalism is really efficient at, is creating profit for a small elite, everything else that happens good or bad is just an unintended side effect. Any government which tries to act like a corporation is by definition going the way of Fascism, yet so entrenched is the idea that capitalism equals freedom and efficiency, that few even question it any more and so even well meaning politicians have been made servants to this system.

In a moneyless society where all are given what they needed, provided they contribute to society in some form, (unless disabled somehow) all budgets could be eliminated more or less and we would only be limited by our resources, both human and natural. Only the best of a product would need to be manufactured freeing up enormously inefficient and wasted materials and production facilities. Since profit is the only concern, the natural world is left to be destroyed with no thought to the environmental cost, so long as the monetary cost is the cheapest possible, through abandoning the monetary system we could work to develop sustainable technologies and actually create methods of restoring the environment. Not only this but since the focus of R&D would be changed from making profitable products, to making highly functional, sustainable and efficient ones, technology would quickly become much much more useful and advanced. If this system were in place in the industrial revolution we would all be living in a much more effective society, perhaps even with clean unlimited energy. In our world, any attempt from the genius Nikola Tesla to do this was not pursued because the sponsor Rockefeller “couldn't put a meter on it.” So instead we have oil which is currently putting the lives of everyone in the world at risk. Researchers payment would also be the same as everyone else, even the street sweepers, the motivation for educated employment being that sweeping streets isn't a fulfilling job for most. However it is necessary and it's mundane nature is what makes it worthy of the same payment as any other job. They are all hard jobs in their own way and we all require some mundane work to be done in society and so although almost anyone could be a janitor, we all need janitors, they are still of high value, for they are what let the doctors and scientists do their work, so through this system the educated and uneducated have their incentives to work and excel.

If history is any lesson, I have little doubt that future technology such as genetic engineering and nano technology will be used in less than appropriate ways and could ultimately be used to further enslave human kind rather than set it free. It is a sad thought indeed that here on the cusp of a new era where technology could literally be used to solve all our problems, because of our own immaturity and greed it will perhaps be our undoing. Of course if we were mature enough to handle such technology, there would be much less problems that we need to solve with it in the first place. Genetically modified seeds have been patented so that if a few seeds carried in the wind manage to sprout in a farmers field who didn't plant or pay for them, then he can be ruined by Monsanto or other corporations for copyright infringement. The fact that bees carry the modified genes in their pollen and so violate patent laws is of no concern to the authorities, within a profit driven society technology will ultimately only be a curse to humanity, it will destroy the natural world and it will enslave us in increasingly malevolent and sinister ways. Cloning technology and nano technology are promising and could theoretically help to repair damage that we have done to the world and I do believe that we can figure out a means of acquiring energy that is not horribly destructive to the environment, but so long as it is done for personal profit, humanity will only make things worse. Although I am far from feeling comfortable about the present situation, even if miraculously these technologies could be implemented within the next twenty years, and here's the big IF, that it would have to be implemented by people who actually cared to help people instead of make a profit.

In “third world” areas Anarchist awareness of what the system really is could be especially helpful as they could not only greatly improve their standard of living, but could also avoid making the same mistakes as the west when trying to catch up to us. However it should be questioned whether or not our goal as humans would be to make everyone living as the west does, the simple fact is that this would be impossible while only using resources on our planet. If everyone on the Earth lived like Americans do then we would need the resources of 4.1 Earths, so trying to get all the “developing countries” to live like Americans is truly unrealistic and in fact suicidal. We should if anything be gearing down western civilization in order to prop up the rest of the world, but even the idea that we should make sure they have food, water, medical supplies and some basic kind of shelter is considered heresy, especially since it means lowering the consumption levels of white people. Even if we had unlimited oil which we definitely do not, there is no way the world can sustain seven billion and rising people living in the Western fashion. This is bad news for all of us comfortable people and unless we decide to kill most of the world then it is ludicrous to think some kind of technological wonderland is around the corner that can fix all our problems. Technology can be used to a degree without destroying the Earth and when pursued in a sane fashion has great potential to help us, but the kind of industrialization that exists today is suicide on a global scale. If we are to survive in a world with any kind of wild life then things have to change right now.

Equality is becoming an increasingly quaint and old fashioned idea within society and corporations through neo-imperialism and government infiltration are poised to bring about more misery on the world than was ever imagined before. Some believe that when technology makes human labour obsolete they will literally exterminate the whole working class, leaving only the oligarchs. I pray this is not so, but looking at their history of merciless mass genocide I wouldn't be surprised. This is compounded by the fact that we are an undeniably over populated species which cannot live in harmony with the greater ecosystem at our current levels. I'm not saying killing the majority of humans is the answer, but we do need to do something. If an even greater cultural revolution does not accompany the massive technological revolution coming, then one way or another we will destroy ourselves, or at least create unparalleled agony not worth living in. I do have hope for our species and our world, in many ways it seems like we are on the verge of the actual birth of a genuine civilization. Globalization is occurring but we must make sure it is global freedom rather than neo-colonialism and capitalist imperialism, what they are selling as "globalization" is universal enslavement and a global rape of mother Earth, the death of all that is beautiful and true. I am not anti technology or a primitivist, even though I think the wilderness is the most sacred thing on this planet. Technology itself is not evil, it is how it is procured and implemented in the world that is destructive, I am against the unbridled plundering of nature and pursuit of profit in the name of "progress," I am against technologies that cause decadent dehumanization and isolation at a cost that is unsustainable. For all these reasons and more I believe completely the greatest thing we can do to avoid further environmental and social catastrophe is to abolish the monetary system.

Right now in the present day we have the technology to send humans to Mars but of course it is too expensive, and this is completely insignificant compared to humanities full potential. Because of money, research scientists are considerably held back and medical advances stagnate for no real reason at all. In fact because of money pharmaceutical companies often don't research cures, since that wouldn't make them enough money, they only research treatments which can sell more pills over longer periods of time. Many environmental and supply problems could be solved or mitigated by the growing of hemp, which among many thousands of other products could produce wood for things like our houses as well as food and clothing. The reason it is not currently used is that hemp would put many industries out of business and so has been ultimately ignored and demonized, to the point of making it illegal and all in the name of profit.

There are billions of people who are kept as slaves to the monetary system all over the world, especially in third world areas like Africa, Asia and Latin America. They are held back only because they are too poor to build any fair industry or work force, the majority are held in poverty by North American capitalism, institutions like the WTO, IMF and world bank which have plundered and impoverished their countries in the name of progress, the luckiest third world people finding work in sweat shops. If we would only help them build what they need and educate them, if we would only release them from their indentured slavery with one world working together to eliminate this poverty, then humanity could rise to unparalleled heights. Instead we chose the barbaric and psychopathic, as well as the extremely inefficient tactic of exploiting them for cheap labour to make sneakers, just so that they can attempt to feed their starving families. The search for profits is quickly leading to the complete destruction of the global environment and with that comes the end to most human life and even if technology allowed us to live in such a waste land, would we really want to? While present levels of mass waste are not sustainable in any way, alternative energy sources that would put powerful companies out of business could definitely be found and implemented instead of relying on outdated and hazardous finite fuels. (especially if we had sensible infrastructure that wasn't based on each person owning an SUV) The mindset of a profiteer drastically changes how products are designed, the idea that the market can regulate the effectiveness of a product in terms of social and environmental impact is fundamentally flawed, as the emphasis is solely on how much money can be made, all efforts ignore other more crucial factors.

When we consider how much money is spent on killing each other, how much we spend on militaries, arms and all the rest of the ways society has justified killing others, it is quite possible that we spend more on death, then we do on life and the fact that it is even close is a sure sign of humanities collective insanity in its approach to civilization. To think otherwise, to justify such actions in the name of safety, when the reality is always an escalation of militarism, to see such militarism as a desirable thing for any reason, is in fact a sure sign of your own insanity and unfortunately it is the norm for this planet. When we consider what we could be doing with this money, the society it could potentially create, the staggering waste of resources, time and labour that is the military, it is so mind boggling, so completely irrational, emotionally stupid and pathological that it can only be described as containing the true essence of insanity and humanities biggest mistake by a wide wide margin.

The military is indirectly one of the the biggest producers of new technology for house hold products in the world today. The money or resources that is spent on designing and building weapons could go to an unbelievable amount of better uses. Imagine what could be done if the might of the military industrial complex was used to design means of promoting peace and equality instead of death and oppression. If all of the worlds militaries stopped spending for only three days they would save enough money to educate all the children of the world. While some rightfully point out that no amount of alternative energy can sustain our current living standards, it is suicidal to say this means we should do nothing. Sure, the wind mills and solar panels currently created by capitalist markets have their problems too, but if profit were not the motivation and by actually directing research to solve the problems instead of creating new weapons, we could overcome these obstacles. (I saw once that an uneducated impoverished boy in Africa made a windmill to power his home using nothing but junk he found and so I am pretty sure we can figure something out.)

One of the main obstacles Anarchists will face in the future is high tech oppression from police and military who want to brand all activists and Anarchists as terrorists. These people who will often be completely law abiding and within their rights, will have to face governments capable of all kinds of sabotage and intelligence gathering, not to mention violent forms of crowd control and outright murder. It is not possible that such a militaristic and oppressive oligarchy as found within western society can ever be reasoned with, can ever be talked down from their throne peacefully, it is not unlikely that they would kill all their servants before they relinquish their power over us, but one thing is clear, the current public would turn away from all Anarchists before they would join in any kind of effective armed struggle.

Unlike any revolution involving a power base, the Anarchist revolution will essentially have to be a bloodless one. For Anarchists to organize in armed revolution, to make war against the governments of the world, would be completely contrary and hypocritical to all Anarchist ideals. In our present situation attempting open war with the government, I believe we would be doing more harm to our cause than anything else, if you think you can outfight all the governments of the world, you are delusional. Even if a militant Anarchist group managed to overthrow the current government they would ultimately fail at setting up their political ideals within the current society, as they would have to rule by force and so set up a ruling class, this is because the vast majority of people have no understanding of, and so no will for life in an Anarchist society. No serious armed revolution could possibly take place without first securing the vast majority of the populations consent and support and by that time it would be largely unnecessary.

Still, at this present moment certain illegal actions could be taken with beneficial results, the reliance on legal protest and appealing to authorities as an engine of change is one of the main things holding back real progression. No matter how nicely asked by thousands of people, corporations will not stop logging the forests and destroying the environment in general, the only thing they understand is loss of profits and so activists are definitely justified in doing pretty much whatever they can to hurt the profits of those who would enslave them. So long as the people continue to buy products from their oppressors, so long as they are willing to work for them or to support the capitalist system, new corporations will take the place of the old, mom and pop shops would generally do the same because competition means cut throat hierarchies. So it is we must focus on finding proactive ways to create Anarchism, rather than destroy government, we must make people independent of the system, to create our own means of production which is in accordance with Anarchist principles and thus cut off the food supply of the beast.

History is clear, governments and corporations do not change because protestors convince them of a moral or ethical conviction, but because to continue doing their tyrannical acts is deemed less profitable than conceding to the protestors. Politicians are not driven by a desire to improve peoples lives but by personal ambition, the only way to get them to act on behalf of the people is if the people make them think it will further their personal ambitions more than being a corporate puppet. Change happens only when politicians think that ignoring the people will create consequences that will keep them from functioning in office, that the direct action of individuals will make tyranny too inconvenient for them to pursue. Ideally we should have no government but in the meantime we should use direct action to jam up the system until it is forced to concede changes that benefit the people and standing around with signs picketing a building is generally not nearly enough of an inconvenience to effect much change. The only exceptions I can think of being workers strikes and perhaps retail stores selling furs or other clearly psychopathic products, but this is not because the business men will be moved by the passions of the people, but because the people interfere with profits to such a degree as to make their policies not worth the hassle. Capitalists only care about profits and they will only change if they think it is more profitable than doing what they have always done, business as usual is easier if no one ever opposes them in a direct way and activists need to find more effective ways of doing this than picketing. With corporations the target should be their ability to make profit, with governments the target should be their ability to function, to get reelected and to have unobstructed bureaucracy. Sabotage, infiltration and direct and obvious interference with the machine must occur, simply asking nicely, or chanting slogans is no motivation for tyrants to mend their ways, they must see that their tyranny will not function in a free society.

A do it yourself attitude is crucial to the Anarchist ethic and although its perfectly alright to ask for advice, we ultimately have to find our own answers. There are far too many ignorant people, which is a direct result of the world we live in, a world which is specifically designed to create subordinate ignoramus who know nothing but what they need to in order to do their corporate tasks. If we cannot find it within ourselves to teach each other then things will never get better. Progress is possible and in the search for the ideal, we must learn that if we don't at least try to solve problems, we are part of the problem. To excel as a race we need only to believe it is possible and believe in each other, to do otherwise is to stagnate and in truth only hold ourselves back.

Defining concepts by two dualistic opposites is a narrow and simplistic view, especially within the terms of governments that claim to be "democratic" with only two parties. We cannot define anything without some reference point and with the more reference points available the more accurate the definition. When someone defines a word it would be impossible to do so without knowledge. The higher the vocabulary, the better the definition of the original word, creating the potential for it being expressed through a wider range of linguistic opportunities. Anarchism is a way of defining organization with the most possible reference points, that is one point for each person, it is the ultimate in pragmatic organization, fluid and strong denying no one and through this it allows for the greatest amount of social opportunities. People become convinced that they must hold themselves back by what people think of them and so limit themselves on such fears. Most people believe that if no one else feels the same as them then their own beliefs are somehow insignificant. These people lose sight with their narrow minds, they forget that it is variety and differences that make life worth living. Truth cannot be told but must be found by each individual, but as individuals we owe it to each other to inform, but not correct each others mistakes as we see them. If we do otherwise we may never realize mistakes were being made and people offended, if we force our own "corrections" then we would often force others to live by our own mistakes. Even Anarchists can make the mistake of breaking solidarity over relatively minor things, we must learn to pick our battles, to avoid becoming fragmented over petty differences and minor offences to our egos, for our greatest strength comes from solidarity and solidarity does not require uniformity. We can either believe things will always be the way they are or we can strive to make a difference. If you believe things can never improve, then it will make it that much harder for those who are trying and so you are helping to create the reality you do not like. We must always be searching for more points of view to better define ourselves and gain any real truth. One thing leads to another and with knowledge of what comes later, who would we want to go back? Does anything lead to anything? Only if we believe it does enough to act. It is when we most need help, that we realize we are the only ones who can help ourselves, once this is understood we can help each other by teaching self improvement and individual realization and this can only be done by creating change.

Anarchy is the light in an otherwise dark world, and although most people don't see it, maybe when the corporations and governments have brought us to the brink of destruction, we will decide we all deserve better. When we have no more use for meaningless objects to fill our homes, maybe then we can live in peace and true equality. The masses need to stop expecting people who are routinely responsible for the death of millions as their "job," to be the kind of people who will save them or to fundamentally change the world, it is these very people which we need to save ourselves from and the change we need is the abolition of hierarchy. The people are like a sleeping dinosaur, it may take a whole lot to wake it up and get it moving, but once it does it can crush anything that opposes it. Even if Anarchy isn't quite the ideal society, even though perfection maybe impossible we should still always strive for the ideal instead of living in mediocrity at best. Things will never get better if we don't try to change, Anarchy is simply the ultimate goal. We need a real revolutionary idea, not one which will hope our problems will be solved by someone else, but one which shows us, we are the source of our own problems and it is only us as individuals who can solve these problems. Revolution must originate in the minds of each person, freedom is desired by everyone and social revolution is the only way we can make any real change. Corruption is inherent within hierarchies and people with power always abuse it. The sooner people realize that the better off we will be.

Nullification

Swirling thoughts and feeling of everything at once, Cancelling each other out confusion reigns supreme and paralysis sets in.
Disintegration of the punk community from the blind of a common vision.
This weakness is it's simultaneous strength, let each make their own path, let this bind us unless you don't want it to.

Order and meaning hidden within the screeching Chaos and noise.
Seek out action instead of waiting for your unfailing luck, it was meant to be a bonus not your only means.

A gestalt melting pot of the counter culture, a brutal tolerance of variety enforced by demands of total crushing honesty.

Contrary undefinable freedom freaks with their artwork bodies unanimously seeking unique expressions.

The integrity of one identity attempting to live the beautifully ugly truth.

Will you hold a gun to someones head and say be part of egalitarian society or die?

Barbarians always have the most fun,

Savages have the most passionate music.

Beware the cultural hierarchies and group value system mentalities for their offspring is elitism.

It takes a stronger person to pull people up then to push them down and climb up on their back.

Dehydrated Diarrhoea moshing will help you really find yourself,

The companionship of everyone against everyone, all together, as one for each other.

All are welcome who welcome all behaviour.

Fight now for more than just a nights hedonism, or the crumbs from the horde of their "trickle down theory"

The artist loses themselves in the momentary act of creation,

Let us create the artwork of a society of artist renegades and the passion will be never ending.

Chapter 2 – The Fullness

Ever since that night I took acid things have been different for me, I am haunted by a memory of things I cannot explain, what seemed like a perfectly rational and mundane world is now filled with mystery. The mystical nature of psychedelics is becoming more and more apparent to me and it is clear that my mind has been fundamentally altered, even when I smoke pot I feel connected to everything around me. As cheesy as this sounds, I am one with everything, its really an amazing experience even if it is overwhelming sometimes. All this is very strange to me as a person who used to be atheist, I felt so strongly about it I would debate Christians just for the fun of it, just to watch them squirm. I am definitely still no Christian but I have to say, I have much more patience with their faith in a divinity, though for me its not so much a faith, as having day to day unexplainable experiences and awareness of divine things. I feel a spiritual presence not only when I have taken a psychedelic, but pretty well at all times, plants and animals seem more aware than ever, I can feel energy connecting us, I am sure that all things, even the rocks have a spirit since we are all made of the same fundamental thing, energy, or spirit itself. Clearly institutionalized religion is the opiate of the masses, for many it is an escape from a world they can't cope with, but materialism seems to be the cocaine of the masses, focusing the mind on strictly egotistical and self gratifying things, ignoring vast areas of the human experience for the pursuit of a very narrow view point centred around self and sense gratification. I do not feel religiously inclined, but I have found that religions and especially metaphysical philosophies are good place to start researching if I am going to find any explanation for my experiences other than just brushing them all off as delusions, or hallucinations, after all each consciousness is run on the chemistry of the brain, adding one more does not prove that everything perceived is a hallucination. It is quite the unscientific assumption to say that adding a chemical must make all of the senses totally unreal just because they present some new perspective. Over the past while I have been searching for an explanation and through various ancient philosophies i have heard of experiences much like my own, in some cases identical, the fact that i had little or in some cases no previous knowledge to these ideas before I took acid shows me something is going on here that is not linked to my own personal psyche, that either all religions are based on psychedelics, or that psychedelics take people to the same place that some mystics go to without any psychedelics.

All kinds of coincidences have been occurring leading me to find just the right books at just the right time, to see my thoughts being reflected in the world around me, I have learned these coincidences are called “synchronicity” and it has become obvious to me that like it or not I have been plunged into a world where my thoughts create my reality. As a skeptical Anarchist I have been careful to study these philosophies and religions without getting swept up by authoritarians, or buying in to the propaganda and twisting of these teachings by people who want to use them for their own purposes. My knowledge of Shamanism as well as a wide range of Occult studies and Paganism is increasing all the time, there is an interesting heretical religion that I have been learning about, it was stamped out by the Christians, it was called Gnosticism, there is also Hermeticism, they both seem very psychedelic to me, but the closest thing to an established and accepted school of thought which I have undertaken would have to be the Qabbalah. Although I definitely am not Jewish the Qabbalah is not originally Jewish and it is completely unlike fundamentalist religion, I have been much more attracted to the Pagan gods and goddesses which are easily applied to the Qabbalistic system. Ideas which a few years ago were regarded by me as pure fantasy have proven increasingly real, such concepts such as “magick” are just misunderstood scientific principles of energy flow which has been called “god,” which is everything, the unified field the physicists are looking for. My dreams have also become much more “real” and lucid, but then the world seems more and more like a dream all the time too.

There is a condition of mind called “apophenia” in which a person sees connections that aren't really there, that they project their fantasies on to real world Chaos to suit their belief to create patterns which don't really exist. Synchronicity, the ability to manifest reality might be dismissed in this way, but the fact remains there is no way to say that atheist materialism is not just another highly detailed form of apophenia which perhaps uses the limited scientific understanding we have of an infinite universe, to project through apophenia a reality where we are free of apophenia. By learning to manifest reality consciously, we at least learn to work with our natural and inevitable tendency towards apophenia in an intentional way which can maximize our functionality and our ability to understand the truth. This is not to say all patterns are delusions of apophenia however, since this itself could be a projection, but that "Chaos," the infinite reality we find ourselves in is all patterns, all orders, all projections simultaneously and we can choose from this Chaos the reality we want to create.

I have resolved to learn the truth, whatever that may be, I have no allegiance to materialism, or to spirituality, only to the truth, and pretty well everything i experience these days tell me that everything happens for a reason, my goal then is to find out how and what this reason is. Where am i being led to? What or who is leading me there? I feel like i have been immersed in a mystery, a reality so mysterious that i am only now even realizing it was always in front of me. I guess the acid was my initiation, now i have to learn how to live up to it, not only how to make sense of that reality, but how to integrate it into my life so that i can be in harmony with that truth. Some people may think i am crazy, but to me it's crazy believing as many atheists do the assumptions of people who know nothing about what they are talking about, who know nothing about my experiences or even the philosophies they brush off. It is crazy in this society to believe something that is currently relatively obscure, but which has been a belief since before recorded history, the belief that there is more going on then what the five senses normally say and yet we live in a world filled with evidence of such things and even evidence which is found through the normal five senses.

I have noticed many cosmically ironic things within this life, for example how the universe will give you anything when you have no attachment or need for it. In becoming conscious of oneness i have become increasingly isolated from everyone around me though I have progressed in some ways I feel more alone then ever. I feel that I must hide most of who I am, few people share my interests since I've grown as a person and I am torn between having a social material life and a spiritual life. I used to think spirituality was escapism for people who couldn't handle the truth of atheism, that seems laughable to me now since atheism seemed so adventurous, even romantic to me, it was so much easier knowing I just had to make the most of this one life and that was it, now I have to plan for an eternity of immortality, to take responsibility for all kinds of things I never dreamed of. Now I realize the theory that spirituality is just to comfort people scared of death, is mostly made up by the egos of atheists to make them feel superior to spiritual people and comfort them from the fact they feel alienated, relatively meaningless and perhaps a little inferior because they pride themselves on their intelligence and other people seem to know something they don't. I don't have a religion so i find it hard to relate to religious people or atheists, no ego gratification from conformity there, still most of my friends are atheists and i cannot stand dogma, but then the more i learn the more I notice the dogmas of atheism. Through metaphysics all material things are accessible to me but I have desire for almost none of it. I want to help others but no one I know wants my help, even if they aren't suspicious of my motives.

No one understands because no one really wants to do what is necessary in order to understand. I learn more and more about the state of the world and what we can do and no one cares, the more I know, the more everyone seems oblivious. It doesn't matter what I say wisdom cannot be explained, even when people want to listen and that is because true wisdom, and true knowing are beyond words. To take a hand full of fluid from the ocean of imagination and transmute it through the tides of the moon into terms of the Earthly physical, is to create the greatest artistic creation in all of human history. Reality is the synesthesia of self awareness, the reflection of the heavens on this ocean and the outer representation of inner feelings. I find myself lost in a dream world of my own thoughts doubting the very existence of this reality and all its inhabitants and as much as I probably seem like a space cadet flake to other people, they all seem like sleep walkers to me, the only difference is I know I am dreaming. To avoid getting sucked in to the mass dream I feel the need to protect myself from a conflict hungry world of egos. I can hardly imagine the horrors of my own failings but I am scarcely aware of them or else I'd change. Though I am aware of my inability to deal with my emotions I don't know what to do about them or how to live any other way. Also no one I know has come close to understanding my perspective no matter how much of myself I reveal, this has made my already lame love life even more complicated, especially since I pretty well only hang out with punks. Even the spiritual girls I have met only seem to have a shallow curiosity, they certainly don't feel driven in the same way I do, but then they haven't really had any life changing spiritual experiences. Maybe I expect too much, I don't know, its not like I expect them to be some high priestess initiating me into the mysteries, or some bearer of ultimate truth or gatekeeper to the spirit world, still it would be nice to find someone who had experiences similar to mine or someone to relate to.

Tomorrow I move in with my friend, I am excited to be living in a city on my own, hopefully I can find like minded people there, politically and spiritually aware people that I can learn from, not to mention all the fucking great punk shows out there. There will be a whole new playground to disrupt, to shake people out of their complacency, I bet I can find a girl there who will understand me.

People want answers to their problems, but not ones which require they fundamentally change their lives, often refusing to change those deeper causes of the problem in the first place . Perhaps I am just vain and deluded, I don't know, I want to follow the divine more then anything, besides maybe spreading Anarchy, but then I am starting to see these two things as the same, I am just so lonely I hope things change when i move into my new place. I suppose I cant expect anyone else to go down the same path as me and as hard as it may be, in the end I have to take my own path alone just like everyone else. Hopefully once I learn some more I will be better able to function in this new world I find myself in, I do already feel I have made a lot of improvements in my life, that I can even make my life what I wanted in ways I never dreamed of. I realize now I am just starting to really get some understanding, that I have begun a total transformation and like many changes its going to be uncomfortable at times. I realize now how arrogant I was as an atheist, I didn't even realize my own beliefs were faith based, I realize now that I have to become a better person before I as an Anarchist can hope to know how to best help other people.

Narcissistic Quasars

A demented organ grinder plays a cacophony of disjointed music for sadistic marionettes who dance erratically yet with perfect precision.

A pyramid of puppetry with those at the bottom never seeing who's on top.

Like an ostensible orrery we hurl through existence propelled by mystery.

Ignorance perpetuating ignorance in a brutal display of self automation according to the sense.

Fate is no more real than the future and death is a distant memory of the past.

Assigning meaning to objectivity is self contradictory, but so is everything including that statement.

Making our rounds travelling in circles so vast we forget we have been journeying an eternity.

Nihilistic expressions are a safe bet for truth, but only form a limited awareness.

In a world of commonplace delusions which seem familiar and comfortable, the truth can be frightening beyond all comprehension.

Like a masochistic trial of flagellation to temporarily defeat insecurity for a few eons we live existence, But unless eternal loneliness and apathy is remedied we cannot help but reconstitute.

Learning to spend forever in an empty room alone is no doubt the hardest thing imaginable, but the harder something is, the more rewarding.

Achieving this you will realize the floors and walls are alive, can you ever be alone?

Can you ever not be?

Too many activists or even Anarchists have overlooked the need to change themselves, they instead go around telling everyone how they should live in accordance with their views, but because they have not adequately changed themselves they sometimes become the authoritarians they hate and then go about dismissing and denouncing anyone who doesn't fit their personal view of things. Since many Anarchists are imperfect beings who have not mastered their own minds they have imperfect views, their logic no matter how detailed is still flawed because they have not realized the root of their ignorance. I definitely don't want to say anything about all Anarchists or all activists, but some of them can cause problems by expecting everyone to follow their purist views of what is right. There are no doubt more than a few self appointed authorities on Anarchism who confuse the intellectualism of collecting facts about traditional Anarchist viewpoints, with understanding and living Anarchism. Most importantly these problems appear when they may think they have the right to tell everyone else what to do and ignore the views of anyone who doesn't think like them, to make matters worse many of them do not even realize when they are doing this. Now certainly not all activists are like this, most of them aren't like this to much of a degree, but still there is a need to have yourself worked out before you go around thinking you should try and make the world fit your ideals. You may be right about everything, but if everyone sees you as a pretentious arrogant prick they wont listen to you and it will do no good. The fact of the matter is that many bourgeois and lower class people rightly or wrongly do see activists in this way and I think its a highly neglected and ignored matter within the activist community. Without really knowing yourself, knowing your own faults, knowing what is really right for you, or what is really just something flattering to your ego, you cannot really know anything, so how can you ever hope to change the world?

Clearly the messages of activists, no matter how rational are largely falling on deaf ears whenever they are not preaching to the converted and so activists can just keep chanting, or brow beating people, or they can step back and take a look at why people find consumerism and denial more appealing than the truth. They can then look to more practical solutions than inundating a person who doesn't want to listen, with facts they don't want to hear. Intellectual knowledge of political alternatives and all the various ways in which the government oppresses people is all well and good, but without wisdom, an activist has no hope of accomplishing any meaningful change. Wisdom is found through introspection and through philosophy and I would argue it is found particularly in mystical and Occult philosophy where the emphasis is on the individual self awareness and how to achieve self mastery, things which should be of the utmost importance even to atheists in an Anarchist world. Anarchists want to change the world, but to do that the consciousness of the people must change as well, in order to change consciousness it helps to understand what consciousness is, and this is something that can be learned through Occultism and mysticism. If you believe as many people do that you are only your ego, then even from an atheist Freudian perspective you are delusional, those who overly identify with their egos can do all kinds of authoritarian things, they may even do truly wonderful things, but only to glorify their self image of their ego and with such intentions you will not achieve Anarchy, but only a subtle form of elitism in which you try to create a self image which you will like better than everyone else. What the Occult can show you is that you are much more than just your ego and with the practices that it teaches, that you can access parts of your mind that will allow you to function at all things better and truly get to know all aspects of yourself. We all have unconscious motivations and mechanisms which make us do things for reasons we do not understand, those who haven't faced their own shadow can hardly be effective at facing up to the darkness found in the elites. If we do not understand the cause of why humanity became so greedy, sadistic and hierarchical, then how can we ever hope to stop it? Or prevent it from happening again? We need to understand humanity if we are to make humanity functional, that is a pretty basic idea but one which is all too often overlooked in the tactics of activists. Whats more if you are an arrogant, hypocritical and presumptions asshole then chances are you know nothing about Anarchism... maybe one day I will learn something, but until then you will just have to deal with it!

Without humility and self knowledge you will not be very successful at spreading Anarchism, you will only at best spread some limited artificial construct, subconscious authoritarianism, or reinforce the ideas of people who came before you rather than contribute something original. If you can't even get rid of the authoritarian in your head, then how will you get rid of the ones out in the world? Occult practice and philosophy can very much help with all this and it is what I would consider a very important factor in Anarchist education. We must include knowledge of the unconscious underlying self, focusing solely on political and group Anarchism can teach the theory, but it takes self awareness to actually practice Anarchism. It is too common a human flaw to be very quick to forget your own personal faults and start trying to change everyone else. Not only can Occult information help you understand the world and yourself better, but it can help you to change the world and do so in a manner that is more in line with what your true will is, for with an Occult education you will have a better understanding of what is worth wanting and what is self deception masquerading as Anarchism. Through an Occult education you will also have a better understanding of how this culture has been created and why people think and do what they do, know that when I say "Occult" I do not mean Satanism or any of the other stereotypes which Christians have created, but that the word simply means "hidden wisdom," the principles behind all spiritual thought, the unseen or hidden principles which shape and inspire the world before historians put their spin on things.

Spiritual people with no religion are often apolitical, certainly some in the Occult community might even think any pursuits at activism to be a kind a trap, or at least a distraction from their mystical goals, but I have found there is much that any spiritual person can learn from careful consideration of Anarchism and living an Anarchist life. Spirituality without compassion for others, without taking responsibility for your role on this Earth, without acknowledging the debt you owe to the natural world and the people who make your life possible is a very shallow interpretation of what it means to be spiritual. Some spiritual people will even say that you must be enlightened before you can help anyone, but this is escapism, this is fear and the desire to avoid your responsibility and deny the ramifications of the compassion you should be feeling for others if you have any spiritual attainment at all. You do not need to be enlightened to figure out that you should not support corrupt corporations, you do not need to be enlightened to figure out you should make an effort to rid yourself of prejudices and authoritarian mindsets, you do not need to be enlightened to figure out you should quit that job you hate and spend your life pursuing goals which are in line with what you truly believe. If atheists can figure it out, surely anyone with any real spiritual wisdom can figure it out, can figure out that living according to any spiritual path includes helping those in need. You do not need to be enlightened to resist tyranny for it is natural to all humans and you do not need to be enlightened to show others why hierarchy is ignorant and in fact learning how to do so will bring you to much of the same places. Only those who believe in oppressive spiritualities, (if they can even be called a spirituality) could believe that we are not obligated to resist oppression, this is in fact the test of how tyrannical your world view is and yet who really sees this? The desire to avoid resisting tyranny is the desire of the ego to be comfortable and selfish and so by destroying the bourgeois mentality, you destroy most of the ego in the process. So it is the path of Anarchism is the same as the path to enlightenment, no one starts out a fully aware and functional Anarchist and no one starts out a fully aware and functional divine being and ultimately you cannot do one without the other.

If you believe as many Occultists and spiritual people do that we are all one, then it is your duty to help all people, all creatures live a happy and truthful life, as they are all aspects of you, you can never be truly enlightened until all are free. Spiritual people try to free their minds, Anarchists try to free the world, but in the end neither goals can be accomplished until both are accomplished in all people. There are many lessons to be learned from activist work, and much self knowledge that can be acquired through such practices, but when activism is combined with the Occult a person can find the union of inner and outer, individual and collective. Through this we realize the fundamental union of Anarchy and Occult liberation and then we can change the world and simultaneously become enlightened. Those who live for truth, live that truth, through their actions they cannot but help spread the truth and the truth is the inner and outer worlds are intimately related, you cannot understand one without the other, you cannot be free in one and not the other, so it is you cannot know the truth until you accept responsibility for both and have the integrity to bring them in to a functioning harmony.

With all this in mind, when we consider that when certain stars have burned for long enough, through all its stages, growing from various sizes as well as brilliance levels, at the end of its life as we know it; its function changes from the shedding of light, warmth and star dust to creating a doorway opening to a singularity outside time and space. Though of course it may appear as morbid, something which nothing escapes, in one way or another the concrescence of things is unavoidable and eternal bliss must eventually rule despite our procrastination. How fitting that the singularity be in a "black hole," a place where none seem to desire to venture, a place which is fathomless, awe inspiring and due to gravity not only beyond time but beyond our ability ever completely reach it. In this astrophysical Alchemy it is also interesting to note that all atoms are formed in stars and so all of us as well, not only this but the centre of our galaxy is a black hole, everything revolves around its singularity including the stars. It is foolish to believe the universe consists of multiple things, it is by definition ONE verse, one realm, one all encompassing thing, all that anyone needs to do is realize this. Now just because someone knows this, doesn't mean they fully understand it or have applied it to their life, however its pointless to call things pointless, the hard part is trying to be effortless. Mysticism and the Occult teaches a person to exist in this state of awareness beyond duality, beyond observer and observed and access a level of reality beyond perceived separateness, beyond time and space, this may sound hard but it is only as hard as you make it for yourself.

Before the big bang occurred at all, all matter in this universe existed within a single point, encapsulating all things within a moment outside of time. (Science shows us now there are many many universe's which exist in a higher dimension which we do not know about, but reality remains one undivided thing) When the big bang happened and this universe began to form, the matter that was created is like an Alchemical metaphor showing us the perceived reality of separateness taking form through that matter, all the while everything has the same source, comes from the same "prima materia" or first matter. Quantum entanglement shows that all matter that came from this big bang is connected no matter how far apart they are in space, in fact some scientists think that space is an illusion and we are all still touching, so then there you have it, we are one. This point of singularity before the big bang is "god/ess" (at least at the highest scale that science understands anything much about) and as it contains the energy which became us as well, we have the capability to lucidly navigate to any place in the universe. So then since that singularity is beyond the concept of time and space we are too and so we can access all parallel dimensions and thus all possibilities, all at anytime. The key is understanding our intentions and our thoughts are the extension of our awareness and so creates the mechanisms which determine the level of our awareness. So in order to access that state of oneness we must surrender our attachment to the world of separateness and be comfortable being swept off till we reach the inevitable endless rapture of timelessness. What's left then is the actualization of this throughout all levels of perspective, that all individuals return to the source until separation and fear are inconceivable. When this is achieved for all intents and purposes we will all of reached "god/ess" consciousness, even if there is always something higher and undefinable for us to explore, it will be from that state of mind.

Everything on Earth is touching something even if its just air, this creates one ball of conscious energies of various densities, working together as a microcosm of the universe. The latest science is showing that even the "vacuum" of space is filled with something, whether it is dark matter, quantum foam, the zero point energy field, or photons of light from all the different stars, everything is connected in some way or another, even the galaxies interact with each other. We are all irrecoverably realizing this in an accelerating fashion. All that is holding us back is the joy of anticipating ecstasy, this often masks itself as the fear of being completely overwhelmed by oneness, which creates desire to cling to the memory of contrast, the world of forms and disparate perspectives of matter, this is the dance we find ourselves in.

Consciousness is like an ever expanding sphere, as it increases so does the surface area to the unknown, so we are always becoming more aware of our own ignorance, in this same way the universe is as big and as complex as our minds, as far reaching and deep as we can see. It is the expanding universe itself one with all and not separate in anyway but ignorance. The concept of ignorance itself is not separate either, it exists so that we can learn and grow and become more aware because nothing is trivial, it is the theoretical illusory constructs which present the perspective of change. Since all things in existence are one, all things are linked in the process of understanding oneness and so nothing is trivial, the concept of trivialities is for people who would rather be ignorant. Discretion is valid, such as perhaps deciding whether or not celebrity gossip is really worth spending all your time learning about, but that such things happen is not trivial, at least not to the celebrities themselves, even less trivial is understanding how such distractions are a major means of keeping the masses complacent. Some things may not be very applicable in certain situations, but everything has some impact on the greater whole. There is a need for focus in some physical reality situations, in fact all human consciousness needs focus, at least for automatic body functions such as the heart beating, but this focus must be understood within the context of the big picture.

Even more than this I think the perception of physicality stems from a focus on that which creates the physical world, to put it bluntly we manifest the material world by unconsciously focusing on it. Most people try to increase their focus on the physical world, western culture is obsessed with the material, in a lot of cases valuing it much more than other cultures, certainly there is more who focus on wealth than in depth exploration of the origin of thought and all that is limitless. Those people who have less focus on the ego can learn to create more of their own reality by releasing and “positively” polarizing or transmuting the “negative” energy accumulated from the desire for control and from fear. The more darkness and fear overcome, the more control is acquired, you can thus bring about events and experiences into your life simply by the power of your thoughts. This requires not that you repeat affirmations but that you really know something will happen because you will it to happen. Through this process you can learn one of the greatest lessons, how to truly love everything in a more real and unconditional way, we learn nothing is worth feeling bad about as ultimately feeling bad serves no purpose but to self perpetuate itself, that it is often these very feelings which caused the “bad” event in the first place. This is not to say that we cannot have preferences, some actions are based on ignorance more than anything else and so as we become more aware we will cease doing so many ignorant actions. The difference is that when seemingly unpleasant occurrences do happen we won't be so put off by it, without the bad emotions we won't react irrationally and make a bad situation worse, we also won't identify with the pain which keeps us living in a fearful state that makes us want to be ignorant.

The universe is one single mass of energy completely unseparated from itself, it is ultimately one consciousness, one thing, one mind, but beyond the limits of ego consciousness, it is all things possible simultaneously. There is energy everywhere filling all space although some areas seem to be more concentrated or dense than others. One could think of the collective unconscious or universal mind as a planet, and for each life form or fragment of consciousness there is an island surrounded by ocean. Beneath the ocean all the islands are connected as mountains, but on the surface they appear to be separate. In this analogy the ocean represents fear and ignorance and only those people who are brave enough to explore the depths of the ocean will discover the unity of the islands.

This divine metaphysical energy is the unified field theory Einstein searched for, or the ether of the old school physicists, this may turn out to be zero point energy but no one really understands quantum physics and I won't pretend I do. Still at the very least physics does provide very good metaphors for spiritual ideas and while I have studied it for years now and will try my best to be accurate when writing of science, you may wish to interpret such words as metaphors. For example if the physical universe is the tangible symbol or metaphor of the universal mind, then that mind is simply expanding as it becomes more and more aware of itself and so is represented on a physical level in this universe as the big bang. The cycles of our reincarnation reflect various degrees of light from the universal consciousness, as our minds grow we come to “know” the union of opposites and with full enlightenment we may congeal the unified field, giving birth to a new awareness that is suckled on imagination but as we unconsciously weave the fabric of reality, all of this is driven by our hunt for happiness across an eternal night older than all things. I believe if there is any truth at all to astrology, that it is not that planets affect new born children with some kind of energy, rather that the planets mirror the energy harmonics of a certain time which is expressed in physical form, in this case a human, which is the most complex form of matter we know of.

The concept of time and the analyzing of it, lead the mind through some strange ideas and for something which we are all aware of, we really know very little about it. The concept of “time” is incredibly fluid, even by our own systematic standards, we have day light savings time, we also have twenty four time zones, so that simultaneously it is two days at once and twenty four different hours. This means that if an event were to happen at 6 PM pacific time there is an underlying real time that is different in different parts of the world which we call the present, but which is presently at a variety of times simultaneously. You say that something will happen at 6 but this is no use to someone on the other side of the world who doesn't know your time zone. While we have Greenwich time this is totally arbitrary and this is because all current time systems rely on the consistent movement of matter. Einsteins theory of relativity shows us time speeds up or slows down according to our own speed as well as the amount of gravity present and so we see that the exact present time is even more elusive to our consciousness. The illusory nature of time is made even more evident when we realize the truth is we can only perceive time when there is change, since it is based on the movement of matter, no clock could tick without change. Without at least some kind of change in the universe there would be nothing to perceive and even if there were, the perceptions would be a change in consciousness. The equivalent of millions of years could go by in between every momentary instant and nobody would know the difference so long as there was no change to the physical reality. Nothing would age or putrefy and no electrical impulses could be sent in the brain to acknowledge the true time. This is just one example of how truly etheric the concept of time really is.

If some being were able to access these changeless interludes in a unobtrusive disconnected way then it would be provided ample “time” to learn just about everything and be virtually omnipotent. Perhaps all our “time” is just the perception of changes created by this being. Perhaps it is ourselves making at least certain changes so that we may better direct our futures for our own goals, for what we wish our amnesiac selves to experience. As we are fragments of the divine at least some part of us is beyond time, that part does not change, so a descent into physicality was required to make an immature spark or soul grow in wisdom. Through the ability of time (which Einstein showed is unified with space) to create change (or the perception of change) the spark is able to learn and grow thus avoiding spending eternity ignorant and fearful. Eventually through the process of reincarnation it can spend eternity in unchanging blissful nirvana.

The dual existence of oneness and multiplicity also creates some interesting paradoxes that stretch the mind in some strange ways. Although you and I and everything else are one being, the anima mundi or world soul, the collective unconscious or atman, whatever name you choose for it, we are all the same and yet perceive ourselves as separate on the mundane level. How can reincarnation exist in a linear fashion if we are all one? Does this mean that because of the population growth of the twentieth century we have many young souls incarnated at this time? Although this could be easily argued by seeing our present global situation, it must be remembered that perhaps some eras in history have more lessons to teach than others, or take more incarnations for a soul to learn. Where are all the gurus and enlightened people today if there are so many old souls? Maybe some of them leave this planet for other worlds or other dimensions, maybe after a certain point they reincarnate as a mushroom or a psychedelic plant, maybe we tend to kill these people before they can get their word out, there are lots of possibilities.

I believe we are all one but through each fragmented spark there is a progression of learning which is like a long pearl necklace, each incarnation or pearl is connected but separate, each necklace is in turn woven together with others like it unifying the different progressions. As most people experience reality in a linear and non unified state, there is a “linear” perception of progression at which awareness or the soul grows. Another way to look at it is that the progression from linear worldly consciousness to non linear universal consciousness is a linear process (since you start in a consciousness which believes in time and space as separate from consciousness) until it reaches the endpoint which was present at the start and unified with it, (that endpoint being awareness of all things and existing in a state where all time and space happens simultaneously) so the necklace loops so that it is linear if you are looking at it from the perspective of one pearl to the next, but non linear at the same time if you hold the necklace all together as one.

Reincarnation appears to be a separate progression of one soul, just as each individual appears to be separate and yet it is all one thing beyond time and space, how real this separation is, is a matter of perception itself. In between incarnations it could be we exist within a timeless state from which all existence can be seen, we then incarnate to facilitate change which must happen through the illusion of time. All the while all times and all people are always connected and are all one thing, but simultaneously through limited awareness of that unity appear to be separate, but the perceived change of consciousness seems to have a linear progression because it is entering into time in each life for a different reason or to make a different tweak or change in consciousness. We could say this is like the memory of the divine mind which remembers all things, contains all memories simultaneously and can jump back and forth to different events which involved different people, but during the “time” it is remembering, the memories are experienced in a linear order. Just as there is the perception of time, and a perception of separation from other people and things through a linear progression, there is a perception of reincarnation from one body to one new body rather than reincarnating into all your lives at once. This stops when you are in a total state of awareness of oneness, which was what I experienced on acid, but after enlightenment a person will cease to “reincarnate” and simply be in all that is, in that state eternally. We are all always one, but as new souls are created or inexperienced souls incarnate for the first time they are on one level an ignorant soul, but they are really a soul with amnesia that is already enlightened, but unaware or in wilful ignorance at the same time. This means that no enlightened person is better than anyone else, not only because they are unified with all others, but even if they are more aware than the ignorant, we are all ultimately aware at all times, since we always exist in a realm beyond time.

The universal mind has a linear progression which is the order that it chooses to remember the lessons which brought it to the perfect timeless state, it remembers these experiences through the process of what we call time. This is done in a specific way as if to tell a story which is each souls total progression, so that different souls that believe themselves to be separate are experiencing an isolated progression until they reach the point that they realize there are multiple parallel “transmigrations.” This could be the transmigration of a group soul, soul mates which unify, but these groups would also be part of a larger “transmigration” of the total world soul which is often called Gaia, which is the core of all life on Earth. Some believe this goes on into solar system groups and galactic groups and on into dimensional groups, perhaps the scale increases indefinitely, but at all times each level is accessible to those who learn mastery of their own awareness. Each pearl is a lifetime and each necklace is its own transmigration, but all pearls and all necklaces are made of the same thing, each pearl is the same spark of the soul, taken from the one universal soul, so we are simultaneously one and separate with all. This can no doubt be confusing, especially trying to imagine a realm without time and space and without having conscious memory of it. Imagine how all the characters in one of your dreams are all part of your own mind and so unified and yet they each may have their own story, even their own memories and identity. Now for the sake of metaphor imagine they reincarnate into each of your dreams into a different character or life, it is all part of one being existing outside the dream reality (your waking state) and yet each character appears to have linear and separate consciousness.

Some things can be so obvious that we effectively numb ourselves to them from all our senses, our senses can also atrophy but after time, which may or may not take many lifetimes they can always be returned to what they once were. Like the constant humming of white noise things can fade into the background outside of focus and consciousness and in some cases some people wont even believe you when you tell them there is such white noises. This can happen even with multiple senses and is most often because we are taught to ignore these things, to narrow and limit our perceptions and tune out the things we think we'd rather not see. If consciousness expansion is not our life's goal then it should really be questioned what is? If the desire for growing awareness does not fit into your goals in at least some minor way then the answer would have to be denial, not only this since awareness is a key factor in any undertaking you can attempt, raising awareness of reality and yourself is an important factor in accomplishing anything. There may be no end to our potential growth but its still one astonishing transformation that we go through, the hard part for me now is to focus on more mundane things, but this is because of the focus within the consensus reality on attaining material possessions, people always finding themselves in a state of lack rather than completeness. If we learned to overcome the fear, since reality is the reflection of thought we can create whatever we want by the power of our minds.

The goal is not to believe, the goal is to know and to learn as much as possible. Existence is a game to play for all eternity until we realize we are truly nothing and non nothingness, one with all. If you want to look at it from a dualistic perspective cause must come before effect so if there was a beginning it must be a cause. The first cause is the meaning of life, the cause would be a thought, as there would be no other conscious action possible before all things were created. All things that exist are part of the universal mind and so nothing can exist outside it, the only thing that could come before this universal mind is nothingness itself. The first thought would be a realization of self, this is because if you are aware of something outside yourself, you would first need to know that it is not you, in order to know that it is not you, you need to know that you exist, even if you realized your self awareness through the realization that something else exists, instantly you become self aware because something needs to be in reference to it. Self can exist without thought as feeling but self awareness requires a reference point, an other, with self and other there comes the creation of duality, thought is the first step out of unity since thoughts are observations, something separate from that which is observed.

So it is this divine thinker became aware with the first thought and since the first thought must of been an affirmation of self we could say it must have been "I am." Before such a realization of the original self there could be nothing existing, since there would be no consciousness to observe it, not to mention at this point all that exists is the universal mind. After the first thought a line of enquiry and explanation follows, more "others" are created the more references the thinker has to itself, the more it can see itself and all further thoughts are affirmations on the original "I am". All thoughts are observations or questions about observations and not the observed and so the duality becomes more defined and through these linguistic emanations all possible elaborations are explored. So it could be said the meaning of life is simply the realization of existence and all its possible applications, put simply the meaning of life is to live, to gain experience and to become more self aware thus becoming more alive. So through articulation of different realizations of self in regard to other things which it defines, the logos (linguistic faculty of mind) creates the perception of existence. This is done on the physical level by living in different bodies or lives until we become self aware enough to transcend past physical limitations which are relatively elementary and crude references to self.

There is a catch to this kind of self awareness however, as it is dependent on abstract references (the thoughts of awareness) in order to raise self awareness, through this creation and exploration of duality it becomes possible to be aware of pain and suffering as they become isolated aspects as well.

As our thoughts are separate from the observed and all is one, all thoughts observe the oneness, but all thoughts at least appear as separate from this oneness, so they are distorted reflections of that one awareness. Thoughts are in a sense part of the oneness, but in order to think we have to have the thought that they are not and so they might as well be separate as they create that hypothetical reality, which as we elaborate becomes apparently more and more real than the unity. The consciousness which sees the world as made up of separate things is the identification of self with the observations, rather than the observed, for example “I am here” “that is over there.” In this way separateness is the product of thought, the ever increasing duality, but through learning to stop the flow of thought, of existing without ego self awareness, oneness can again be achieved.

Since we perceive different forms as separate from us, the ground or the chair or whatever it is, these things are essentially a product of thought, an identification of those things not being part of our body or awareness and by focusing on those observations we lose sight of all non thought based states of being. The more we focus on the duality, the more separateness we observe, the more we feel the need to focus on the duality in order to navigate the world of exterior objects and so the more we feel the need to create artificial objects in order to manipulate external realities according to the principles of mechanistic materialism. The more thoughts we have, the more we justify thinking and observing the duality and so the more we learn about the oneness from that dualistic perspective, but this can only happen through sacrificing the actual state and feelings of oneness which existed before the thoughts. So, if we are to return to oneness then we must first try to rationalize ourselves out the need for language, or at least rationalize a way to stop it when we desire, eventually we will probably choose to learn to stop thinking all together, to leave behind the world of forms and simply be.

If we can understand the difference between the observed and the observations, if we have the word for something and an awareness of its unity with us then we can use that awareness to manipulate it within ourselves in a state of oneness, which will then be reflected in the world of separateness, the world of physical matter. This is because all forms are abstractions of the universal mind and so through mastery of the mind comes mastery of all observed phenomena. So with awareness of unity we can change the reflected reference points (“words” but also physical forms) but we also have to have awareness of what we are separating, what the word for something is, so to create change requires awareness of both duality and unity which is represented as time/space with a consciousness in a body, one with everything, yet separate in its body. All things are one so all observations which are separate from the observed (the stuff of the universal mind) are ultimately illusory abstractions, products of that awareness which is imagining something separate as it is only the focusing on that level of reality which keeps these things in a seemingly continuous separateness. This happens because we haven't learned how to consciously step outside of space time by quieting the mind, focusing on this true self without using words. Dualism is potentially unified with monism, so with awareness of unity and awareness that the observations are specific clearly defined abstractions of that unity, you can imagine a way to change those abstractions through changing what is observed and so change the physical world through thoughts. First you identify the word you want to manipulate, then you become aware of its unity to you, then you change the non linguistic feeling or “energy” you have about it, to a feeling of what you want, then the reflection in the world of forms, the world of observations will “manifest” change accordingly. (physics formulas are abstractions which can be used to manipulate other physical abstractions without total awareness of unity through mechanistic means)

While these manifestations can be very pleasing to the ego, I.E. the abstractions you use to identify your body self, it is all still ultimately self perpetuating observations which distort the awareness of oneness, but through learning to manipulate the abstractions of the “outside” world, you can come to learn control and eventually dismantle the abstractions of your ego so that you will no longer “feel” the need to examine yourself through “words.” Since all abstractions reflect the universal you, nothing can be really said to be good or evil, only your observations of the one underlying thing are abstracted into “good” and “evil” categories and it is this preoccupation with sorting out good and evil (a process itself deemed good by most egos as it perpetuates the need for an ego) which keep people from a higher awareness. All things termed “bad” are displeasing to the ego and are its justification for the need for duality, but it is through learning to unify all things to self and self with all things, even the “bad” that we fully understand oneness.

Understanding energy dynamics (the feelings of things you are one with) is the key to understanding reality, we live in the world as a direct result of the thoughts we have. We are always in the perfect place at the perfect time. Even if something “bad” happens it was metaphysically brought on by the oneness experiencing it, as the oneness underlies all people and the experience was something it needed to become more fully aware of existence. Those who hurt others in some way are responsible for their actions, but it was through a kind of metaphysical agreement between the people that such a thing was manifested, the oneness had separated itself in to isolated ego forms to experience being the victim and the victimizer. Some egos are more ignorant than others, but that does not mean we should act ignorantly when they create painful realities for us, it does not mean we are not one with them or that we do not have a choice as to how we define such experiences as identifying as a victim only makes things worse. Once we take responsibility for this we become the masters of our own fate, we can at that time stop having to learn so much by making ignorant blunders and start to consciously direct our own growth by learning how to define experiences in a context of unity, which will go a long way to ending pain. This is like a child who learns fire is hot by being burnt, once we get more mature we hopefully learn better ways of distinguishing such things. We don't realize this very often because most of the time this process goes on completely in our subconscious, we are also too busy identifying with the pain we cause ourselves and creating words or rationalizations to put the observed source (rather than true cause) in the “evil” categories, that is until we lose the ignorance of the underlying factors, such as that “hot” things (unbalanced ego passions) damage our “bodies.” (awareness of oneness and eternal bliss)

The world and reality that is perceived by the ego is nothing more than symbols, words, or at least what we attempt to realize in reality of something far grander, something beyond words and symbols. When we try to look at reality truly objectively we are attempting to categorize things in limiting symbols of distinguishing attributes, but to attempt to define reality which is infinite would put limitations on it and so self negate any definition. It is crucial to realize this in order to step beyond reason into the boundless self.

Life is interwoven strands of perfection, one life is one chord on an endless tapestry of eternity. How much of the tapestry we see is up to us, and really what design we choose to weave, all on our own sections on the fabric of reality, which is rooted beyond in the timeless abyss. We exist beyond time and space, beyond words, beyond everything most people think they know, but how could anyone truly know anything in boundless Chaos we call reality? To know something and imply that the opposite isn't equally true would be to deny real infinity. Language and so reason is only a tool to single out (cut out with the sword of the mind) and interpret meaningful and isolated segments of Chaos, (Infinity=Chaos) but to focus only on reasoning is to miss out on limitlessness. Consciousness is basically two parts: first the experience of life, the great all, everything and ultimately nothing, this is done through feeling through beingness. Second, the interpretation of one of an endless number of different ways of viewing the experience (including nothing) which is done symbolically “I think therefore I am.” However these two seemingly separate parts are actually one thing inextricably linked, that is the true reality, the true awareness which could be called spirit, or atman.

We are it seems, trapped in the delightfully demented quixotic delirium, the irresistible heavenly macabre of the phantasmagoria. We are each a single infinitesimal portion of the condensed energy plane we call physical reality. Energy which is essentially feeling of the universal mind is condensed through abstractions or forms, physical or symbolic, which all happen to be one at the same time with everything. Me pretentious? I hope not, just trying to explain though obviously in vain, the unexplainable, the unspeakable. The world is the eventuality of two variables “Chaos” and “time,” we are the ones with the time to define the order out of Chaos, or the time to learn to transcend time and live in pure Chaos, pure oneness.

People question reality, they think “why do we live?” “Why does everything exist?” When of course they should be thinking how could everything not exist? Since in a boundless universe size is indistinguishable, there is everything inside of everything, and everything outside of everything. Since infinity could not not exist except in our minds, of course it is this way, how could it be any other way in infinity? Each atom must contain a universe within it, and our universe must be itself within an atom for infinity to exist. Not to mention an infinite number of parallel dimensions which must go through every possibility, so it is we happen to be in a possibility with self aware creatures, if we were not in the dimension with self awareness, there would be nothing to ask those kinds of questions in the first place.

Contemplation of infinity brings a person to realize that all possibilities must exist within infinity, this is backed up by quantum physics which has come a long way to proving the existence of parallel dimensions, multiple big bangs and universes. Not only this, but in each universe the laws of physics could be completely different, time and space could flow differently. Since the amount of universes is endless, time and space are on a limitless scale as well. Since the size of this multiverse, this true uni-verse makes the total size of everything limitless, it is ultimately indistinguishable in measurement. The same is true of time, since within all scales of size, all things that happen through all time are always happening simultaneously and repeatedly. The divisions of measurement we place from one parallel dimension to another are all arbitrary in terms of the true unifying reality which is beyond it all. So it is we should stop thinking of scales with definite endings, but instead essentially endless continuums, which means that all divisions we make on them are arbitrary abstractions of our own creation and are within the totality of the one reality. Within this ultimate continuum of all universes we would need infinite resolution to define something which is itself a contradiction, there is only ever continuous refinement of the measurements within an infinite reality which is simultaneously unified and endlessly divisible.

This is only one example in an endless variety of ways the universe was and is created and unified. Within the complete paradigm it is all one beyond time and space, that which is the sum total of everything and nothing, within the Hermetic tradition this is called “the all” and it is the universal mind. The dichotomy of everything and nothing being that which we call “god” the unfathomable universe itself. If everything must be within the all, this surely includes the divine and in fact it would all be one and the same. Belief through will is the variable which guides the consciousness to different abstractions and so different realities and possibilities from Chaos into perceived order. Since everything is true in an endless universe which is “the all,” belief is how we choose to acknowledge and separate or “realize” different things we “imagine” within reality, however we do not really create anything for everything already exists, we simply choose what to experience out of everything. This can be somewhat imagined as an energy of pure potential that can take any form, however this too is an abstraction and so somewhat of a limitation. Anything less than everything is too narrow a conception of the unlimited.

As all divisions of infinity are themselves infinite, uniform universal growth of all of reality will go unnoticed when you attempt to perceive it through a reference point, since all possible reference points in such a situation will also always be affected, all things will be growing and so no change will be perceived. This growth is the self iterating consciousness of the divine, and reality is the contemplation of this existence, the subject and the predicate, the observer and the observed, the infinite and the finite focus of awareness into its endless diversity of topics and attention. Each particle is a singularity, each a universe, each connected to all other things, whole and divided as the yin, yang and Tao. Consciousness is the Ouroboros, a snake devouring itself, referencing itself, mirrors reflecting mirrors, to see all possible distortions and angles of each mirror, but we are the light which makes all these visions possible, we are the mirror, that which is reflected and the reflection.

Enlightenment is the complete embrace and love for all that is weird. Do not be so deluded as to think yourself not deluded, it seems nothing is what it seems, which is quite a pickle indeed. As everything is one, we are one with the divine, though what we identify as self is never the sum total of all that the divine is, which transcends everything. If the divine can create or make anything fade from existence instantly, and we have the powers of the divine ultimately, then how can we define anything as real? The only thing that can truly be real is the creator not the creations, though the creator can do anything and so create arbitrary realness if it so chooses.

People believe that science has proven that the Earth is not the centre of the universe and in a sense this is true, at least from the limited perspective of a finite material universe started by the big bang, however since reality is infinite with no real end to at least the empty void, then “the centre is everywhere and circumference nowhere” and so its all just how we define it. In fact space can be said to not exist at all and so although the Earth appears to be moving, it is never really leaving the centre of the universe, this could be said of anything else, everyone is the centre of the universe at the same time. The concept of space and proportion are illusions created by our minds, because we separate the observer from the observed when in fact we are all connected.

In an infinite reality the opposite of every statement you can make can be said to be true somewhere within that reality, including the opposite of that statement, which paradoxically is the opposite of the original statement itself. So we could make the statement, all statements are false, which includes this statement, and while none of it may exactly be true, it can act as a portal to truth, which lies beyond statements. It goes to follow that in an objective infinite reality everything imaginable must happen somewhere in every conceivable way. All facts are localized, specific to a time and place even if it is a big place like this universe and in this dimension for all time after the big bang. (Though reality is not limited to this one dimension and before the big bang what we know of physics is not applicable) The idea of facts rest on the assumption of a physical unchanging reality, something which is a huge assumption as far as i am concerned, especially when anyone can choose to go beyond it, if they have the right diet. As all things possible happen including things which cancel those first things out, then a person might be tempted to think that nothing really happens, or that all these bizarre possibilities do not effect us in anyway. However while there is the possibility that something will cancel out the possibilities we want, there is also the possibility that we can choose from infinity the possibilities we want, all by focusing our attention on those we want and ignoring those we do not want. This then is basically the theory of manifesting reality otherwise known as “positive thinking” and as it is a possibility, all we have to do to make it part of our personal reality is to focus on it as a reality, then all things we want can become possible without being cancelled out.

Anything that can happen does happen, if there is a one chance in a hundred trillion that something will happen, somewhere in infinity it will happen, including contradicting realities, how we perceive these events or how much we are aware of is up to us, after all there is a chance it is all connected to us. Likewise if you divide infinity by any number, no matter how big it will be divided infinitely, but not only this, each division of infinity will itself be infinite. Each finite number has an infinite number of possible divisions within it, going to infinite decimal places and because of all this, you as an apparent division are infinite, though unified, and so you have the power of infinity if you become aware of that possibility. I never really bought into nihilism, it doesn't really say a whole lot that is new, its the narrowest of perspectives, the whole point is there is no point, if there was then there would be an ending, a form we have to conform to and who wants that? That would be the real nothing. This is really just a continuation of a spiralling thought, this truth could be thought of as the meaning of life, the explorations of “I am” into the nature of truth which is rooted in “I am.” This truth since it is rooted in consciousness lets us decide for ourselves whatever we choose to take into us, some half truth of dualism like reality is nothing, or the whole of the contradicting reality. Some people choose nothing as their truth, something which the mind cannot grasp and so cannot contradict, but this nothingness is more like the all, which is also beyond conception and from it we can select whatever possibilities we want. So then I am a liar and a trickster, because it is the only way to tell the truth. In eternity and infinity is found the perspective where truth can be experienced, there is only one thing and it is the fact, it does not make facts.

Since reality is endless there must be some higher being or force of existence, and I can imagine it would be that something uniting all things, the universal constant. There must be in an endless universe a more highly evolved level of reality and beings of some sort existing besides what is apparent. Really a limitless amount of other species, but there must be a being capable of awareness of the sum total of all life in existence, which is the most aware entity imaginable to me, the one we sometimes call "god" or countless other names. Human life, in fact all life, is eternal, it is just constantly changing, we do not die we simply change bodies. Real death does not exist because although everything must exist including the existence of non existence, everything must simultaneously exist, otherwise the universe would not be infinite, not be complete without you always being present. So what happens in between every moment is non existence and within every moment all things and all times exist simultaneously, and we are of course not able to become aware of non existence as there is nothing to be aware of. We simply perceive life through the five senses of our experience, drawing from the illusion of change and separateness caused by the perception of time and space which are the abstractions of the linguistic faculties, also known as the logos.

All existence within our realm seems to be ruled by cause and effect, but as with all dualities there is an underlying uniting principle outside of that limited conception. Time and space do not really exist outside of perception, there is only the present and some memories, or precognition of the future. Clairvoyance is possible for the reason that all time and all things happen simultaneously, even if it is in a different dimension, everything in all your possible futures has already happened and you can access that awareness. The whole physical reality the five senses creates doesn't exist except within our minds. Essentially all this reality is, is a training program designed to free us from our ignorance which creates physical prisons and to learn control in a seemingly stable environment. At the base of all matter there is but one thing and this is energy, nothing but pure energy. We have within us the power to attract or "generate" whatever energy we want to ourselves either consciously or unconsciously. We choose to attract either "positive" or "negative" energy to ourselves by thinking negatively or positively about something. Though in truth there is no such thing as "negative" or "positive" there is only our own value system, which is all too often based on what other people want us to believe. In truth all things can be seen as "positive," its just that our egos may find certain things more pleasurable than others and we may not see the value of certain experiences right away.

Life can be thought of as a dream, once we realize this, the dream can become lucid and controllable, the hard part is really realizing you are dreaming, not just in an intellectual way but emotionally and in all ways knowing, but this is made much easier with psychedelics. The more understanding of this a person can muster, the more they will want, but to do this we must feel this truth and not just pay lip service to it, not just ponder abstractions about it, but experience what is observed behind the abstractions, when you believe it you will see it and no sooner... unless maybe you drop acid or something.

Although the all is fundamentally one thing, there are many ways to think about it, one way is in a spectrum of awareness which is congruent with a spectrum of energy density so that there becomes ever more etheric energies overlapping each other in different vibrational frequencies. When you learn to tune your mind to "feel" the different frequencies you can open your awareness to a wider range of reality. The universe is not static but flowing and "transmuting" on an endless scope of densities. While some religions believe the denser realities to be evil and only the "godhead" or oneness level is good, to me evil does not exist in the level of oneness since it is beyond duality and since all things are part of this unity, matter is not evil. Even if matter is a delusion, an artificial abstraction or a trap we are here by our own will as divine beings and we are always still one with divinity. Keeping this in mind there is a spark of divinity in all forms of matter, everything is alive, everything has a soul, all atoms contain

Sophia, wisdom and awareness and so all things are divine, it is the abstractions we put on them that is the problem, especially when we start treating the natural world as nothing but a commodity.

The “highest” frequencies are in my experience and others also overwhelmingly amazing compared to most peoples mundane realities, but then making your reality amazing is part of what spirituality is all about. I may use the term “higher” or “lower” but this should not be thought of as a hierarchy anymore then one radio frequency controls another, you just have different “wavelengths” that you can tune in to, depending on what station you want to hear, but in the end it is all one. We are all part of this “God” consciousness, the divine experiencing itself on different densities, different levels of awareness and abstraction, in all points possible in time and space and beyond. Just as there is infrared light or infra sound, there are many forces of nature outside the scope of our sensory organs. Instead of metaphysics we might say there is “infra physicality” which is not available to beings with too narrow a view of the physical, these would be places like the “astral realms” but even magnetism, radio waves, x rays and all kinds of other types of energy could be thought of in this way.

As energy comes from the divine singularity and condenses and solidifies into the physical it goes through a variety of changes like white light being broken up into a spectrum of colours, these colours are the seven heavens, the seven ancient planets, the seven basic forms of energy outside the singularity. As energy becomes more abstracted it becomes more tangible, but by learning to create energy in these astral realms, in the right frequencies, or with the right intentions and awareness behind them, then the physical realm can be manipulated from “above.” In the same way that if you can control your feelings you can control your thoughts, if you can control the energy you put out you can control the physical abstractions that manifest in the physical world. How literal magickal energy and Occult cosmologies are is questionable, especially since there are many different models of these etheric realms, many different abstractions which can be used to categorize the divine energy of the singularity, but this does not mean they are not designed very carefully and intentionally. Each model is accessible and has its uses, even if it is a human abstraction over a plastic astral Chaos, there is much functional advantage in working with these models when it comes to exploring and raising consciousness. You can make your own models of the mind, your own models of the astral and all the energy, but looking at the various traditions will give you a lot of insight into what is possible. For all intents and purposes traditional cosmologies are real enough, especially with psychedelics, though we should always be open to models which give a more functional description, to learn what is personally most meaningful, whether it is our own models or one of the various maps of religions. It all depends on where you want to go and what is the most appropriate for your needs. Having a variety of predetermined energies that you can call upon for a variety of intentions is very useful, as it allows you to build up positive thinking towards methods which are consistent and repeatable but with a large variety of uses, it also allows you to create distinct states of mind for each kind of energy according to will.

There is a long history of mystical belief that states that music or vibration has power to change the energy of something, for example Pythagoras arranged the western musical system so that different notes were assigned different meaning according to astrology. For Pythagoras and others in the Occult, each of the seven old planets (including sun and moon) was a note repeating in octaves, while the zodiac was the 12 note chromatic scale. Others have created their own musical symbol systems and so we can see for the Chinese the pentatonic scale corresponds to the five elements and is based on the magickal “circle of fifths.” So it is not uncommon to associate music with spiritual energies and it is interesting to note that Shamans who use ayahuasca will sing magickal songs called “ikaros” to direct the trip via sound. Each note creates a specific colour which is seen by everyone who takes the ayahuasca as the same as through their synesthesia, so these songs are created not according to how they sound, but how they look. Drums and rattles also give Shamans access to trance states with or without psychedelics. Salvia Divinorum and smoked DMT is reportedly greatly effected by tones of sound, though music on psychedelics is generally much more profound.

Quite probably the principles of sound play much more a role in science than we think, frequency and resonance as well as wave lengths are variables found in all kinds of things from light, to chemistry, nuclear and magnetic energy and in to quantum physics and so clearly the principles were thought to be important to ancient peoples for a very good reason. As abstraction or “language” in the divine mind creates the forms of the physical world, the ancients reasoned the principles of sound could be used to understand metaphysics. In fact there is a whole branch of science called “cymatics” which is devoted to how sound effects and shapes matter. If you take a drum and put some sand on the skin and then play a constant tone under it, geometric patterns will start to form in the vibrating drum skin, the higher the note the more complex the patterns. So we could say the abstractions or “words” of the divine mind, though not necessarily sonic in nature would work in a similar fashion to create the physical world, perhaps using the vibrations of consciousness to vibrate the strings of quantum physics to form into atoms, or at least something similar. The “highest” note of the divine is so high that it vibrates pure energy and creates the physical world, with all its incredible complexity. In the physical world sound is the air vibrating, air is made of matter and matter made of atoms and atoms are made of energy, so sound is literally an energy that vibrates other energy. In terms of the seven Occult planets, they were given a colour as well as a note and a vowel, with colour being in reality a very small wave length of light, it even follows the same basic octave pattern.

The spectrum of density can also be thought of as “positive” or negative” or yin and yang, or as some Peruvian Shamans say, “heavy” or “light” energy, however I want to make this clear that this should not be confused with “good” and evil.” When you exist on the denser sides of the spectrum your focus and consciousness isn't very aware of many varieties of things, a good example of this is the consciousness level of rock or metal. As with all things unless we can change our vibrational harmonics we are only aware of things within our range or lower, though we can fluctuate slightly higher in the spectrum and our unconscious mind always has some access. By using a variety of magical techniques we can manipulate different vibrations to create physical effects in our everyday lives as well as with our own consciousness. By sending out high volume notes of vibration connected with our intentions, it is possible to resonate the lower physical time/space to manifest a sympathetic or similar occurrence, making the note in a sense cascade into a snowball effect of lower expression. The purer the note and the louder the note or intention the better it is able to resonate.

Most peoples minds are a mess of ulterior conflicting intentions which are metaphysically the same as belief structures. Depending on the volume of the notes, or physically speaking the level of air energy vibrating will determine whether or not the high or low note will resonate any other things sympathetic to those vibrations in the area. To change your resonance is to allow higher vibrational influences to come into your life, Karma or to be more precise thought, intention and action are the means used to attract the heavy or light energy. Your awareness of reality is directly effected by your resonance in that you cannot be very aware of the higher notes on the scale that you don't resonate with and so “positive” thoughts are crucial to raising awareness and to creating the kind of reality you want. For sake of a metaphor we could say this is the scale of love and fear, love being a resonating with universal consciousness, fear being notes where you do not resonate well and everything is fragmented, hence you are afraid of things since you do not realize they are one with you. If you only are conscious of matter and dense realities, not only will you be apathetic and too negative to attempt much, you will not be aware of all the actions you can take, metaphysical or otherwise.

To be conscious at the highest level you must be completely filled with love and with zero density and in this state of awareness there will be no abstractions, just pure universal awareness and oneness. This level of frequency, or area of vibration is already within all the others right now, underlying it but existing as white noise, or as being drowned out by our high volume fear based notes. When you manage to bring your entire consciousness to the highest “positive” level then you will resonate and be aware of all things. “Negativity” is used to create the method of how to choose your density, time and place, it is the gauge to which we set the controls of the mind in order to allow us to experience what we want from all the various levels of separateness, isolation, and physicality. “Negativity” and fear are nothing but control mechanisms which ironically make it so that the more present they are, the less control you actually seem to have. This is done by creating a less fluid existence, which keeps abstractions from manifesting too quickly for that consciousness to keep from being overwhelmed. The reason people have fear is because they believe they lack control of reality, the reason they lack that control is because of the fear. If each thought you had manifested instantly, then without control of your mind, control of your fears you would create all kinds of hellish realities, you would not know how to gain control. So from this kind of Chaos, a reality was created where souls could learn to control their minds and reality in a gradual way which according to their will to learn the lessons would reveal to them more of an ability to control reality. This was done by creating abstractions on that Chaos which gave the impression of a stable constant reality in physical space time, a place where you have to really consciously try to control reality in order to do so. The divine could create anything so it created a reality which taught the various scared portions of itself how to deal with being divine, how to deal with Chaos, from this the various gods and goddesses were created in order to shape that ordered reality and act as teachers, but the end goal is not union with any one teacher, but union with the source of all gods and all things.

The denser the reality the less things you will be able to control, or at least the more energy it will take to control something, which for people without control of their consciousness can be a good thing since it takes more deliberate action, more willpower to manifest realities they don't want. So to avoid mistakes in realms with less density takes more control but less energy, in the denser realities manifesting intention requires less control but more energy. For example clay can be moulded more deliberately than air, but air is easier to move and requires more skill to shape consciously. At the densest levels, a consciousness requires so much energy that it seems to have no ability to manifest, but there is always at least some of the divine awareness at work that can alter those dense forms. Changing the frequency of these dense forms is what Alchemists called transmutation and this is how the divine is freeing itself from its denser levels of abstractions. Where as in the most etheric realms you must be in a state of zen to avoid inadvertently releasing even a tiny amount of energy as even one thought, such as “I am” could create an entire universe.

Life forms are energy units constantly changing energy to attain different vibrational frequencies, from the smallest degree in everyday life such as emotion and thought, to larger scale things like the sun exploding. You may not think of a rock as being alive but it too is constantly changing, eroding in the wind and rain, crystals grow and dissolve, minerals take shape and cool from lava, all atoms apart from hydrogen are born in the cores of suns, but all matter is the cooled plasma of the big bang. The more advanced the life form is, the more control it has to achieve different resonances, we are both the instrument and the note itself. One way to think of it is that over many life times each unit of energy like ourselves increases in size, the more positive energy they acquire the bigger they become and so they create more surface contact with the divine consciousness. The more surface contact with the divine, the more aware of it they become by being exposed to greater volumes of the higher notes, so as consciousness decreases in density it expands in volume. So the universe is the interplay of different frequencies, one long chemical, or Alchemical reaction with all matter constantly in flux leading to some outcome we can hardly imagine, an experiment filled with information we can learn from. Matter seems dead to materialists, but all matter is made of protons, neutrons and electrons and so I would ask such people, what is it you think makes your electrons so special and alive while all others are dead? This is made even harder to answer when you realize that your atoms are replaced by the food you eat, a whole bodies worth of cells every seven years, so that you literally aren't who you used to be.

If you have a spectrum that is endless then the meaning of the different segments of the continuum become relatively indistinguishable from each other when seen as a whole. All sense of “positive” and “negative” is irrelevant in a spectrum with no ends, everything is always in the middle and so while hypothetical abstract ends can have their uses, there is only one single paradigm with a varying degree of intensity into boundless proportions. As a life form attracts more higher frequency energy, the stronger the life forms attractiveness or ability to resonate becomes, and with the raise in consciousness comes the awareness that we should be trying to help this process, resulting in exponential energy increase. So as you become more aware, the frequency of high frequencies becomes more frequent. Likewise it is possible to tumble down seemingly uncontrollably into density and separateness, once fears get into someone it is quite possible for them to justify the concept of fear, so that more fear takes hold and in that fear a person lives a life with less awareness and control and so experiences a reality that really is more scary. You will tend to grow more and more in the direction of whatever frequency is dominant, at least until you change your thoughts. The densest life forms which are controlled by fear exist at a level with relatively low surface contact and with the least belief that they can change their reality, that things can improve, which is the nature of the cycle that perpetuates their fear. Physical reality then is all the different divisions of the one mind struggling to determine whether fear or awareness is most justified in their personal definitions of reality.

The higher the note you are while still physical, the more you will have the ability to manifest physical reality, after a certain point you gradually become non physical and so the pleasures of the flesh no longer satisfy, however newer, more profound pleasures are found. We are kept in the denser lower tones by our desires to experience the pleasures of the flesh, it is our desire, will and overall mindset that determine our tone. These “base” desires limit our ability to love by changing the etheric tones to denser ones and so cut us off from spiritual love, which is otherworldly and which we are out of tune with, a place where fear is hard to imagine as there is no desire for you to lack, nothing separate for you to fear. Fear is nothing more than limiting ideas, conceptions and the resistance to possible experiences. Fearing possibilities often attracts the very thing you afraid of, by being afraid you make yourself denser and so you resonate with only denser materials and so you actually attract them into your life. We always gravitate towards the vibrations we are in resonance with and so being aware of what notes or emotional energies you are sending out with your thoughts and actions is absolutely crucial as this will determine your true intentions. Even if you are not fearful or hateful of anything specifically, if you are resonating on a low level, many little or big things could come into your life which you didn't see coming because you never learned to really think “positively” about your ability to control reality. Watching your thoughts is as important as watching your actions, since we are all creating reality in a universal mind it is our thoughts which determine what we imagine in our part of the group dream. If you are not aware that you are dreaming and something bad happens you can get pulled into a nightmare, you attract the scary things to you because they exist solely to try and make you scared, we could say those realities feed off the fear vibrations you create, but if you realize this you can stop feeding them, and there will become nothing to fear for you will starve them.

“Astral projection” is how a human can learn to separate the low density consciousness from the high density body and many claim once this is achieved instantaneous travel is possible to anywhere, anytime. In the closest level of the astral plane you exist on the physical level of reality but in a lower density body, in this light body you can actually see visually peoples thoughts which are in this sense energy vibrations formed by thought and will. That is since the astral realms are more etheric and thoughts themselves are “subtle” or etheric energies, they can take on forms in the astral and these are called “thought forms” as they congeal in to forms that manifest physical reality. Thought forms are a central part of many metaphysical philosophies and it is through learning to become conscious of them and the forms you create, that a person gains mastery over their mind and their world. As you go to more etheric realms, you lose awareness of physical reality and enter into the spirit world where the rules are very different from the physical. The astral body is aspects of consciousness which resonate at the higher levels than the physical and so it is aware of those realities when it is separated from the physical body which drowns out, or has too much volume for the subtle astral frequencies to be perceived by consciousness when it is surrounded by matter.

The non human inhabitants within the astral realm are known to all people, all the legendary species regarded as myth. These are the Faeries and Elves as well as dragons, unicorns, Phoenix's as well as other "mythical" creatures thought imaginary, but the truth is everything we view is imagined in the group mind, and everything we imagine is real in parts of this group mind. These beings exist in some sense on some level of the astral, but I do believe they can at times however briefly come into our everyday physical reality, though it is quite possible most of the time they are seen it is just someone seeing with their unconscious psychic skills, or with psychedelics. (the "hallucinations" of psychedelics could be said to be visions of the astral) There are many varieties of astral creatures, some are spirits of the dead, others are entities that aren't alive in the way that humans are, but are a kind energy reservoir created by our thoughts, created by us or nature and they feed off astral energies, but in every culture on the planet there is some form or another.

Beyond this are other levels of reality, other "planes" which are more etheric and which lead to the universal divinity and all kinds of realities in between, including ones of our own making, the place of our personal dreams. There may also be kinds of "hells" but these are places where a person would go to punish themselves if they felt guilty, or where they go psychologically when they are filled with fears that manifest seemingly out of their control. There is conceivably no limit to the various realms of the astral, the only limitations are those of the imagination, the limits of fear, apathy and ignorance. I cannot say for sure that there even is a universal energy that is vibrating in any real manner, though resonance does play a role in much of physics, but I can say that vibrations akin to sound and light are a great and functional metaphor to explain metaphysical properties of manifestation and planes of reality. Who can really say anything at all is true, such is the nature of the universe we live in, unchanging yet changing, pure and one yet made up of different pieces, contradictory Chaos and order, everything and nothing depending on perception. The way to control your energy, or "density" is entirely in your thoughts and emotions, the same as everything. Carefully constructed phrases backed up by the feeling of certainty, acceptance, and total surrender can make anything happen. The more you can unify your will, the more pure the note you send out, the louder you can make it and the more likely it will be to manifest into reality.

In order to have certain thoughts and ideas it is required that you understand certain concepts before hand, or in other words you have to have a certain level of vibration to attract the higher level epiphanies. This generally means you have to believe before you see, though psychedelics can definitely help some but not all people, once you start to see you will see the world in a whole new way. Psychedelics seem to take whatever vibration you have and amplify it many times over, this can either be very good or very bad depending at where you are when you go into it. Although some people may be reasonably good hearted, they may not have a spiritual experience, perhaps their fears are holding them back, no one really knows why it happens, but if you wish to use psychedelics for spiritual reasons setting clear intentions and having dedication will eventually get you there. If you have the intentions to just have fun then you probably won't get much more out of it then that, surely there are people out there who have taken way more psychedelics than me but never had a spiritual experience. When a person is trying to only have fun on psychedelics, but they are made aware of the higher frequencies they can be shown aspects of reality which cause them to change in various ways, if they want to remain ignorant but can't, it can be hard to maintain a positive outlook. Since their consciousness is amplified any negative thought is also amplified and this can cause them to spiral out of control and have a "bad trip," perhaps filled with scary hallucinations. However the most experienced psychedelic explorers (psychonauts) say that you learn more from the bad trips than the good ones and in my experience this is definitely true. The "bad" part is that you are learning more than your ego wants to accept, because it wants to keep control of your mind and so it doesn't like to learn what is outside of itself. So it is at the point that a trip starts to get scary, that you start to gain wisdom. If your ego is filled with pettiness and fear then this will be made clear to you on psychedelics, which is not a pleasant thing to find out, but it is the place you need to start to become a better person or transmute the energies of your mind which resonate with fear.

Even without psychedelics it is crucial to carefully watch your thoughts as they are the reflection of your life, and your conception of reality is the only boundary limiting it. Within our culture we might use expressions like “heavy heart” or “hard feelings” and these phrases unintentionally suggest the very same energy that I have been talking about. Indeed given the right trigger when I have been depressed my heart does feel heavy until perhaps “a weight has been lifted off my shoulders,” as when someone is happy they are “light hearted,” “on top of the world” or “floating on air.” Within the Egyptian religion if when you die your heart is not as “light as a feather” then you cannot proceed to heaven, but are sent to the denser realms such as Earth. This is because when you die your overall frequency resonance will determine where you gravitate to in the astral realm. According to some Occult traditions there is seven or more other planes of reality, however there are many different ideas on this, according to the Norse there are nine worlds on Yggdrasil the world tree, or ten worlds or “sephiroth” on the Qabbalistic tree of life. With most schools of thought each plane has its own sub set of levels but these are just some of the plethora of possible frequencies of vibrating matter or spiritual energies. Perhaps beyond a certain plane we reincarnate as some other kind of alien life form, according to Occult traditions and Buddhist thought, we eventually stop having bodies altogether and become completely discarnate. Just like different radio stations you can tune into different planes individually which are all running simultaneously, the physical world is how we turn the dial, how we tune our spirits for the afterlife.

For most people these are all of course very bold statements, but I myself have astral projected twice consciously and without any psychedelics and actually, we all astral project every night when we sleep. With my first experience I was given only a little taste and didn't leave my body very far, so I couldn't teleport. The high density of all your bodies atoms seems to keep you from teleporting due to its high attraction of energies or its low resonance effecting the astral body. As well as this experience was another, but it was also quite short and was at the densest level of the astral realm. Astral projection through the various realms can be achieved through a kind of meditation which simply requires practice. There are also technological aides such as “bi neural beats” created by the Monroe institute which teaches how to project, there is also the use of infra sound that is created by Shamanic drumming to induce a trance state. Then of course there is psychedelics which have definitely created the most powerful experiences I have ever had, though I do believe they take you places in the astral realm that are probably often different from meditative forms of astral projection. I wont say either way is better, I believe everything has its purpose and different people need different things, there are many astral realms to explore and each has its purpose.

I would love to learn to astral project better in a non psychedelic way, but for now psychedelic trance is definitely more accessible and more than fulfilling. For example as I explained in the prologue on my first experience with LSD I was definitely on some higher level, I remember even communicating with discarnate entities, this all occurred within a fraction of a second in normal physical time. My state of consciousness was not in anything I could call a body yet there I was flying through “hyperspace” experiencing the interconnected harmony of the cosmic orchestras energy dance. As far as I am concerned it was at its peak more heavenly then I could have imagined. Salvia Divinorum seems to be the most potent of these drugs, I have not as of yet experienced much of the concentrated form of Salvia extract but at high doses time can be obliterated and in the extremely high doses you can reportedly even experience a life time in another world, all within the course of a 5-10 minute high in “Earth time.”

When it comes to spiritual awareness, liberation from the ego and personal abstractions, direct experience of divinity and oneness, that which is called “gnosis” in the west, is all that you need to seek. Gnosis is first built on a foundation of courage and love of the divine but made through various spiritual practice and determination, the ruthless seeking of truth, for gnosis is Greek for knowledge. It is not merely intellectual or linguistic knowledge (though it may include this) but experiential and intuitive awareness of the ultimate reality. While a simplistic definition might be that gnosis is a direct mystical experience of divinity, it is more than this as when understood from a Gnostic perspective it is like having sex with wisdom or truth and ultimately it is not a temporary experience, gnosis is experiencing being divine all the time. Gnosis is the ability to act and have the awareness of a divine being, it may be described as being “enlightened” but is understood from a different perspective in Gnosticism and has other meanings in other traditions. The clearest definition is perhaps that a “Gnostic is one [who] has come to understand who we were, and what we have become; where we were...whither we are hastening; from what we are being released; what birth is, and what is rebirth” all of which I would argue is attainable through a direct experience of divinity, as through psychedelics or other means.

You can intellectually know that the astral exists, that all is one but when you go there you have gnosis and when you have gnosis, you will see what lays behind all things in reality. The more you know the more you will want to know, the more “positive” energy you have, the more aware you become of the counteracting forces which seek to blind you, the more you will realize you were not free and did not even know what freedom was. The first step to wisdom is realizing how ignorant you are, this takes humility, I am not saying I am all that wise but that we could all use more wisdom in our lives. When a person has gnosis of their unity with all things then they will have a much better time interacting with reality and creating the reality they want, both in terms of metaphysics and mundane forms of acting out the will. Try to take each unpleasant experience as a learning experience, and do love yourself, think positively about yourself, but do not lie to yourself about your current limitations, otherwise you will always be trapped by the unconscious forces which bind you. In this way you can gain gnosis of yourself, your unconscious, and you can start to live your dreams rather than be held back by your fears of inadequacy.

While “positive thinking” can create your hearts desire, can manifest your intentions in the physical world, the New Age movement has overly simplified Occult teachings to make them marketable. One of the common mistakes of New Agers is to avoid critical thought, to fall prey to wishful thinking and to believe whatever they want without thinking very hard about the subject, to accept at face value gurus who speak “positively” in that they reinforce what the listener already thought and wants to think. The focus in the New Age is much more often than not to have positive thoughts, to manifest ego desires, where as in the Occult the focus is on raising consciousness and finding the truth. The ability to manifest desires is a side effect of learning control of thoughts and the mind which is the precursor to learning how to explore consciousness, and if you can do that then you will be a happy person with “positive” thoughts. There is more to life than trying to get money without having to work and it is a very negative mind indeed that confuses positive thinking with only material gratification and accepting information at face value. New Agers don't usually like to hear this kind of thing, which generally means they will dismiss it as “negative thinking” so they can continue to go in to denial, but the truth is they are mostly just too lazy to learn much beyond the most basic mental skills. This is because they think negatively about the worth of spending time doing such things, they probably also doubt their ability to really master their mind in any kind of rigorous way.

One of the biggest pitfalls of always trying to think positively in the New Age manner, is to basically be in denial about things happening in the world out of fear of manifesting them more, or avoiding anything unpleasant in there neurotic attempts to suppress their dark side. This is because these people are too scared to think positive enough to both know the truth and know that it can be made better through direct action and through spreading awareness. If you are “positive” enough you can learn about the problems of the world without being dragged down by them, you can also help to fix the problems without manifesting them further by focusing not on the problems so much as the solutions, all the while having clear and definite intentions to improve things, followed up by action. Ignoring problems does not keep them from manifesting, especially in political situations when the victims and perpetrators of those problems continue to manifest them, only by directly becoming involved can that energy be transmuted and the situation changed. Real positive thinking is not thinking only of pleasant things, or trying to manifest consumer products for yourself since that is escapism plain and simple, positive thinking is understanding the world as it is and not letting it control you, not being afraid, standing up against the horrors of this world and making everyone's lives better, both through metaphysical means and physical means. Duality means there are two sides to everything, the positive does not become dominant by suppression of anything, for that is the function of negativity, to destroy, positive energy becomes dominant through awareness of the negative and acceptance of those painful realities, so that they can be implemented in the plan to make a better reality.

It is not positive thinking to avoid all unpleasant thought, real positive thinking is facing all doubt, all criticisms, all negativity head on, so as to have certainty, it is the transmutation of ignorance and negativity into awareness of a holistic unity underlying the egos categorizations. Positivity is not the repression of anything that contradicts what you want to believe, it is understanding all information as important to knowing the truth and therefore it is all "positive." Positive thinking does not mean abandoning critical thinking, caution or logic, in fact it requires that you utilize these parts of the mind more so, so that you are more critical about what the truth is, what is actually positive, what it is you truly want. (just as it is also about increasing intuition) Positive thinking means that you are cautious about not deceiving yourself or just believing what is comfortable and easy, and that you examine your life and your situation in a consistent manner between logic and intuition. Positive thinking is knowing that listening to others who have a completely different view than you is how you expand your awareness, how you grow as a person, especially if they are telling you things that make you uncomfortable or which challenge you to not accept things at face value but to research and learn. Real positive thinking is not focusing on getting that new car, its focusing on how to be happy without consumer goods and luxuries, it's focusing on helping those in need.

If a person is seeking an excuse not to think, if they do not understand the difference between caution and fear, if a person tries to shut out the voice of caution and skepticism then they abandon the faculties of mind which show us that which is least comfortable, and often most valuable. Real positive thinking is not about manifesting a world where your ego will always be happy, but learning to face the parts of it which make you sad and fixing them so that you can deal with unpleasant experiences. You don't think positive by being in denial of all that you consider negative, you think positive by systematically facing all uncomfortable truths and learning to transmute their energy, that which you have been trying to run away from, but which wants to be transmuted by you.

In order to do this you must recognize and accept these uncomfortable truths to even seek them out and always be ready to update your point of view with new information. Enlightenment cannot come from gurus or even words, but only through individual searching, you can learn from all people, you can learn to use tools which teach you how to learn, but even if the truth could be put into words, hearing those words would not give the understanding which comes from realizing it on your own through a complete process. To start thinking positively you first need to accept your responsibility for your own mind, to accept that taking the word of authorities both spiritual or political without really questioning it is negating your ability to realize the truth on your own. If you want to manifest a better situation for yourself and the world, first you must understand what the world is, only then can you start to deal with the causes of what you considered to be "negative" in the first place.

People who go around labelling everything in terms of "negative" and "positive" set themselves against much of reality, hating 50% of reality does not seem a very positive frame of mind but when we use one label the opposite thing is automatically implied. "Positive" and "negative" are just words which can attach to anything in order to manifest that context of that thing in our minds, we can eventually learn to experience anything while maintaining acceptance and happiness and so what most New Agers define as "positive" is really just whatever whim their ego might have. We can manifest things without using the word "positive" and so it is simply a convenient and limited explanation of certain basic metaphysical principles, but which is easily understood by beginners coming from a Judeo-Christian culture. However if left uncorrected this dualist thinking can manifest experiencing those things only in those contexts and so set up the pretence of defining absolute truth within our minds. Using such terms sets up connotations which can define a person as being against much of reality through unconsciously inferring that so many things are always negative and since the New Ager is always positive in their own mind, they ironically often make themselves quite antagonistic towards the world they claim to be so “positive” about. Since they are always “positive” they have a tendency to think themselves infallible and so this thinking leads them to all kinds of denial based escapist manifestations and delusions of grandeur. Everything is as people define them, some definitions are more functional than others, but dualist definitions create dualist realities which often perpetuate in a variety of ways the very things we do not wish to manifest. If the troubles of the world seem “negative” to you, hold off on defining it that way, learn about it, then figure out how to change it and focus on manifesting something you like better.

It is very self serving to only be aware of the parts of life you find pleasant, if you don't know what is happening in reality, you cannot know what you truly want or how to get there. No one wants to add to what they consider to be unpleasant but the fact is the human propensity for sitting by and letting others run amok is one of the biggest parts of the problem. Being a totally loving person demands a certain taste for death and destruction as well, if that's what you want to define as positive, we should not be so quick to define “good” and “evil” or “positive” and “negative” since our egos are not all knowing it is quite arrogant to think we could even come close to using those labels effectively and instead we should focus on understanding the situation. If “beauty is truth, [and] truth beauty” and beauty is in the eye of the beholder then so is truth and if we think that truth, beauty and goodness are all the same as so many philosophers do, then goodness too is an opinion and so it is by knowing thyself you can know what your opinions really are and what you really want to make the world. We simply think about these things in abstractions or words which mask the underlying essence, an essence which is in many ways more than all these most ideal things and at the same time none of them, according to your opinion or view as to how they should be defined. Once we have understanding then we can focus on creating the reality that we really want, not through dividing reality in two but by seeing that manifesting is about focus and intentional awareness not presuming to be the arbiter of simplistic universal values.

You do not so much manifest things by being aware of them, though this is a factor, you manifest them more by intending for them to manifest and having faith that it will do so, otherwise the homes of firemen would constantly be burning down, police would repeatedly be the victims of crime and doctors would dropping like flies. It is fear which says a person has to ignore a part of reality or else it will manifest further out of control, fear created by manifesting an ineffective paradigm of reality which says focus is more important than intention when it comes to manifesting the will. The primary factors which determine your ability to manifest something metaphysically are belief, intention, focus (probability and time frames are important too) and so while focusing only on painful things is a problem, we can still have the belief that it will change and the intentions to change it and we can also focus on changing it, rather than cowering in denial as New Agers implicitly claim we should do. This denial of what we consider unpleasant is the fear that we cannot even consider what is going on around us without being overtaken, where as a person who is totally sure of their ability to manifest will know they can handle any energy and shift it to something useful. (For example Shamans do not ignore sick people, they acknowledge them and heal them.) It is quite fearful or “negative” thinking to think that you have such little control over your manifesting abilities that you cannot even be aware of things, or learn of things without manifesting them by accident. Instead you can manifest a reality where only things you specifically intend to manifest do in fact manifest and then you are free to focus on whatever you want without accidentally strengthening things you don't like. Again, let me affirm the reality, you can manifest things you don't like changing for the better, you are not focusing on painful things manifesting, you are focusing on the CHANGING painful things, (Alchemical transmutation) but to do this it helps if you first understand what you have, learn about it, name it and then face up to the emotions it creates.

This brand of consumer New Age philosophy, is in many ways seemingly designed to keep our minds within a very narrow box which will manifest ever greater amounts of megalomania and egocentric behaviour with tremendous authoritarian tendencies for dictating the polarities of things. (I have chosen to use such jargon as “positive thinking” in this chapter because it is what most people are familiar with, but we shall see that this is essentially erroneous and reality is fundamentally one thing) This also works to limit spiritual growth by creating the delusion of attaining enlightenment because you have successfully ignored everything which contradicts the desires of your ego, any doubt to this false enlightenment is seen as “negative thinking” and is itself ignored since the New Ager believes this would only strengthen a non enlightened mindset.

Perfect bliss cannot be maintained for eternity when it is ignorant bliss, this includes the necessity for knowledge of pain, why it exists and what uses it has and only when such inevitable curiosities have been answered can a soul end any doubts as to the rightness of their total and perfect pleasure in the endless now of potentiality. To understand and experience the truth, you need to learn how consciousness functions so that you can use it to find that truth on your own because no one can learn or experience the truth for you. For this process logic is one excellent tool, but it also requires emotional intelligence, soul searching, imagination and intuition, logic is just how we order these things. Through intuition, self forgiveness and love a person can break the cycles of self pity and bias which keep them in a world which seems so negative. Intuition is the tool by which we learn to overcome and create solutions, which is then double checked by the logical processes to make sure no self deception is present. When learning to use your intuition test it on things that are not that important and go with your first impression, because when you really think “positively” and have knowledge of the power of your intuition, it will stand up to critical thinking because it is truth. No matter how good your intuition, you can never afford to get complacent, to stop improving your ability through constant examination of all your cognitive functions. You cannot increase your awareness by ignoring parts of your mind, or parts of reality and so this practice sets you on the process of becoming capable of total awareness, seeing the positive in everything, as well as the negative, but more than this seeing things for what is beyond their definitions and with this awareness you will also be capable of dealing with the issues created by the ignorance of others.

If you want to attract things into your life, to choose the reality you want from the all, you must first defeat all fear that you will not get whatever it is you want. The more we think we need something the more the universe will show us we don't, that it is merely our egos desire and that we can indeed be happy without it once we face that fear. By thinking we need something we create fear that we won't have it, with fear our intentions become hollow and we do not believe them and so cannot manifest the reality we want and instead we get what we fear, usually doing this completely unconsciously. For this reason ignoring “negativity” can keep us from facing our fears and so keep us from manifesting what we really do want, we may think we need to create a utopian world, but we still haven't learned to accept the reality of what is happening right now. This is not to say we want reality to be painful for so many impoverished people, but that we recognize the truth of the situation, then go from there fearlessly and metaphysically detached. Its OK to want certain things in your life but the moment we think we “need” something or become attached to a desire we unconsciously create resistance to ourselves actually getting it, or keeping it and the more we struggle on a physical level to get this desire, the harder it becomes to bring into our lives. Not only this but through this attachment we destroy a state of mind within ourselves that can be happy no matter what happens, we lose “Nirvana” and enter into ego consciousness which creates ever more fear and pain. To utilize this kind of “Nirvana,” a state of “windless sails” is to neutralize all of your minds energy output, be detached but aware, then once this is achieved you can direct your thoughts energy to gravitate towards whatever it is you want. But you must always be careful to not trick yourself into thinking that you “need” this thing or else the universe will quite rightly show you that you don't “need” anything and that you can grow beyond anything.

You don't even need air, water or food, if your body dies your consciousness will live on undamaged, in fact it will grow like a snake shedding its skin. There is so much illusion it seems impossible to know what is real. I think the only way to know what is real is to decide for yourself, because no one can make you agree or believe anything that you do not consent to believe. Unless of course you can decide that idea is not real, or these ideas I write aren't real, then you consent to create the reality that you have no ability to determine anything. This thinking goes in circles just like everything else, does it lead anywhere? Not really, but all things lead everywhere, but everywhere is anywhere you want. The question is what do you want? I don't know what I want, except maybe I want to want nothing. Maybe my problem has been I think I need nothing. That I think I need Nirvana, but I don't need anything including nothing. I think Nirvana lies within deeper contemplation of nothingness and infinity but can also be understood through contemplation of all things.

There are people who are no doubt ignorant of how consciousness is fundamental to creating our world, generally this is because they have been taught to ignore everything beyond a mundane level of consciousness, I think on a deeper level we all know everything. Plato showed we don't actually learn things, we remember them through a process called “anamnesis,” he used the example of asking an ignorant slave questions which led to him learning geometry without having being given any information. (That elitist Plato and his philosophies was heavily influenced by a number of much older sources such as Egypt, Pythagoras and the Orphics and I have come to doubt that he came up with most of the mystical philosophy attributed to him. I would even go so far as to say that Plato is nothing but the state sanctioned and highly corrupted form of the Socratic school.) The slave was able to figure out the geometry problem only through being asked simple questions, so we see that what may appear like learning, is an awareness that already existed tacitly, or unconsciously, which means that we already know everything, we have just forgotten it. We have disconnected ourselves from the eternal realm, the place beyond time and space where everything exists simultaneously, the collective unconscious where everyone is omniscient. This brings to mind the universal mind remembering forgotten information for the sheer pleasure of rediscovering it and this includes nirvana as the Buddhists say, we are already enlightened we just have to realize it. Remember not just facts of all sorts but knowledge and rediscovery of universal awareness itself through never ending consciousness expansion. This is alluded to in English in that when we re-member something, or re-collect information, we are reunifying fragmented and scattered pieces of awareness in to consciousness, in to wholeness or unity. So then the more aware we become, the more we remember our divinity.

If looked deeply enough into, any fact or insight will lead you into universal truth, a fact being the tip of an iceberg with an endless bottom and that is because of the oneness of everything appearing fragmented. All paths lead to the limitless, all things are simultaneously dual and singular, ineffable, the path we choose is up to us, it is really Anarchy. Since we are already enlightened we just have to learn to let ourselves choose that state of awareness which can be aware of all things. In the same way we are already enlightened we are already in Anarchy, its just that some people choose to do as they are told, we just lack awareness of it, ultimately the only person who can make you realize and live this truth or any other is you and so Anarchy is fundamental to reality itself, we just choose to ignore it. We choose to believe we have no choice so as to avoid the responsibilities of Anarchy, but in this avoidance we are always learning why and how we should take on this responsibility, since all paths lead to this Anarchy, this enlightenment. We cannot help but remember the truth, that it was always up to us to remember the one truth, that it is always our choice to control our reality, even if we choose to create a reality where it seems we have no choice, to fall out of Anarchist enlightenment. Since all is one and since it is a matter of our choice, by realizing this and what we really want and how to make it understood by the universe which we are one with, we can make anything we want happen in reality, we just have to allow ourselves to be aware of it, to want to take control of our own minds and personal universe's.

If it exists, the concept of "karma" allows the divine Anarchy to run smoothly even for those who are ignorant of it, but there is much misunderstanding in the west as to what Karma is to Hindus and Buddhists. Suffice to say that in Asia karma is much more like causality, but even if you wont be the victim of a metaphysical boomerang when you harm another, why would you want to purposely harm people who are one with you anyway? This oneness, that you are joined with all other people may be the real karma in that you will experience through your victims life the damage you have caused them. Karma at the very least can be seen in that harmful intentions and mindsets manifest a greater state of ignorance in the perpetrator, so that the more harm a person intends, the more they spiral in to denial of their oneness and so denial of their divinity.

However this karma is not a punishment but a painful unforeseen consequence of ignorant actions which provide the motivation and lesson for all kinds of growth, if you affirm to yourself painful realities through actions or thoughts, you will to some degree suffer that pain. Although your present life may be horrible you are potentially acquiring valuable "positive" energy for yourself in terms of growth, that is if you can manage to stay "positive" within your mindset, if you can learn to affirm it as a learning process. This does not mean you should be complacent with pain, or that you should ignore the pain of others, but that everything has potential for growing your awareness.

I do not agree with the Hindu idea of a caste system, or the New Age extension of this in allowing others to be mistreated because it is "their karma." Even if these people were horrible in a past life it does not excuse people being horrible to them in this life. (Buddhism enacted a cultural revolution against the caste system in India) Yes there are lessons that can be learned from being mistreated, and you can put a positive spin on it, but by this logic I could do anything I wanted to anyone and just say it was their karma. To do harm to others or wilfully neglect those in need in the name of karma, if karma is real is a way of gaining a lot of bad karma for yourself. Then in the next life maybe you will experience what its like to have someone tell you that you deserve to be where you are and that tyrants don't need to be held accountable because they deserve to be in power, that they have a "divine right." Turning down the needs of the poor while you have plenty is an atrocity, to do so because you think you deserve what you have because of your karma or because you played by the rules of a corrupt system is egoism. Whether or not karma is real, such actions are not any more loving then letting someone rape your daughter in front of you, this is no doubt an extreme example of hippie and Christian morality and yet these kinds of things are justified all the time as being positive and loving through tolerance of hierarchy, the difference is that it is generally done out of sight.

Just because you may have been born into a good environment, whether or not karma is real, it does not justify sitting on your ass and allowing others to suffer. Karma, if it exists at all in the New Age conception is a lesson, not a punishment and if humanity or the individual can get its act together enough to stop the system, then it will of learned the lessons of karma enough that it does not need to keep repeating them. You can learn a lot from painful experiences, but there are other ways to learn other than experiencing what its like to be a victim. If the system is the product of ignorance then to oppose the system is the work of someone with awareness, the more you resist ignorance, the more you will grow your awareness. To avoid dealing with forces that effect the world and hinder the growth of humanity is to become self absorbed in your own escapism and to be totally ignorant of why compassion is central to truth. Even if we are to ultimately transcend this world it will not be done by leaving the neophytes of this world to the mercies of those who seek to perpetually enslave them. Enlightenment will not be achieved by ignoring the injustices and destruction of the life force that runs rampant in these times, such actions are narcissism and selfishness which are not qualities held by those who transcend.

Someone may have done bad in a past life but that is no excuse to treat them bad in this life, as they say, two wrongs don't make a right. Even if you got your good life from past karma treating the miserable as an "untouchable" or as less than you shows a lack of understanding of your divine unity with them, it is also hypocrisy and if there is anything to karma at all, then treating anyone at all badly is going to come back to you eventually. I personally believe that doing nothing to help others who really want and can be helped is not much better than putting those people in a place where they need help, it is all part of the perpetuation of tyranny and stems from selfishness. This is even more true since the very nature of the global economic system means that wealthy countries are responsible for the looting and enslavement of the third world, just because it is done in a "legal" manner which is approved by "authorities" does not change the fact that such a system is totally corrupt and the curse of humanity. Just because the system is legal does not make the acquisition of wealth free of bad karma, specifically in terms of environmental damage, if we destroy the planet, then your future lives are going to be reaping that karma, this is something to keep in mind. If you were to walk by a child drowning in a shallow pool of water you would do the right thing and save them, for most it would be abhorrent to ignore it and let the child die after seeing how you could help. Yet every time privileged westerners waste money on consumer goods we don't need and which support corrupt systems, we are ignoring our ability to save the lives of people in the third world with relatively small amounts of money, we do this because they are out of sight and out of mind, but the principle is the same.

With belief in the New Age conception of karma it is possible for some to get into all kinds of mental pitfalls, from believing we should never help people because they deserve it for some past deed, or in some cases it could create a pathological fear of doing wrong to anyone so as to avoid any punishment from the cosmos. I would suggest that avoiding doing harm to others (if karma is true) simply to avoid punishment is kind of like a Christian going to church just to get in heaven, it's all lip service and means nothing if it is not a fundamental change in self. Doing good for hope of karmic benefits is just as pointless since it too is based out of selfishness. It seems to me, whether or not karma exists in the New Age way, we should act as if it does not, and learn to help others and avoid doing harm to others simply because that is how to stay in line with the truth. As hurting those you are one with makes no sense, neither does abandoning other people to brutalities of this world, the real good karma you get for doing good is getting to experience the feeling of those good acts in the persona of the people you help. At best karma can be seen as lessons we need to learn rather than a punishment or reward, the benefit of good karma is the heightened ability to live in truth. I totally reject the idea that a person who knows the truth would do nothing to help others when there is so many things in the world we could easily do. There are many other ways of learning lessons than through pain, it is simply painful when people refuse to grow and make the best of a situation, if we refuse to learn how to function in a metaphysical reality then there will be consequences to letting those forces run unconsciously. You do not have to run out into traffic to find out it's a bad idea, but if you refuse to learn about the world you live in, you may find out first hand what happens and if it doesn't kill you, it will make you stronger.

The concept of like attracts like definitely has some repercussions as I could definitely see a violent person manifesting violence on themselves, this could in a sense be called karma or it could be called metaphysical cause and effect, but one thing is clear, many bad people do horrible things and yet do not suffer for it physically in their current life. As far as I am concerned worrying about karma is based out of the ego and selfishness, whether to justify doing nothing to help the poor etc, or by refusing to confront people and be your honest self for fear of punishment. You will never learn the lesson of why those desires are wrong if you always lie to yourself about having them. In the growth of many people it is possible to think you have overcome your ego but in fact are so hypnotized by it you believe it does not exist, this is one of the games it will try to play with you so that it will still exist. The desire to let people go through hell so you can sit on your ass and meditate or talk to crystals is in some ways a worse kind of egoism than that of the bourgeois consumer. Be careful of this trap and know that an ego-less person will also act selflessly, will see why it is crucial to help everyone, rather than let them flounder in pain and keep making the same mistakes over and over. It is not enlightenment to see others' pain as part of their lessons, it is enlightenment to help others learn their lessons, to give them help when they want it and to stand up against those who abuse the weak even if it means your own death. If you are truly enlightened then you have no need to be in this world anymore and so should live the truth of your enlightenment until the tyrants come to kill you. (how positive are you?)

You may have learned to contact your soul, (which is individual to you) but still not learned to contact the spirit which is in union with all things, if you had you would of realized you cannot stand by and let others languish in slavery and disease and hunger, you would of realized you are not truly enlightened until all people are free. This is not to say you should become a messiah who thinks they know what is best for everyone, a busy body forcing your views on others as some authority on how to live, but that you are willing to dedicate your life to living as an example of your truth, a Bodhisattva. A Bodhisattva is someone in Mahayana Buddhism who could be fully enlightened, who could transcend this reality but has vowed to reincarnate until all sentient beings are enlightened, until all beings are free, these are the people who realize there is more important things than personal liberation, which is the liberation of all, which is learning to be happy in this world yet fully aware of how to transcend it. What is needed is people who will help those who want help, even if these people have lessons to learn, they are willing to be helped and there are a lot of people who do want help, both spiritually and in more worldly (but still very important) ways. Its important to realize people don't have much time for spiritual growth when they work in a sweat shop, or are starving to death or dying from curable diseases, helping these people will give them more of a chance to grow in every way than if they were left to rot and die, this is true no matter what their karma.

One common criticism of New Age beliefs in “positive thinking” and manifesting reality is that to those who do not think deeply into it, third world people are to blame for their own poverty and all their other problems. While being positive in such a situation is great if it can be done, its important to understand there are other factors involved here, namely that humanity has free will and there are many here in countries with white people that use that free will to do terrible things to others. Some are so intent on manifesting wealth for themselves that they do not care how it manifests, and so they build up and support systems which enslave others and destroy the natural world. People in the third world are I am sure often more aware of the spirit world than lots of well read New Agers, but they exist in an environment which does not provide much hope for positive thinking, especially since they have been purposely mislead and mistreated by the wealthy nations, their realities controlled by foreign lies and their culture and view of reality generally destroyed. All people have the ability to manifest, yet are not necessarily enlightened and so the ability to manifest things does not mean you cannot be fooled, does not mean others cannot use their own powers of manifestation to steal your power and energy.

There are many who are expert at making people even wilfully surrender their ability to manifest, tricking countries into taking out loans they can never repay, making the populace believe they are indebted because of the actions of “their” government which terrorizes people into submission. While positive thinking, like rebellion against the government is great, these governments backed by international systems are expert at manifesting those fears and their infectious sickness that has spread across the world, that is what government and hierarchy is all about. The real problem of the New Age is not that it makes third world people responsible for their problems, but that it totally ignores our effect on them, that all those consumer items manifested by the New Agers are created and supplied by a system that exploits the third world and so those New Agers who are materialistic are manifesting with the rest of the bourgeois, the impoverishment of everyone else and the destruction of nature. A New Ager should understand we are all one, the world is holistic and our actions inextricably effect others and so making your own life positive is not enough, you have to consider your own ability to function in the world and what effects you are having and what you can do to make other peoples lives more “positive.” Manifestation does not create matter out of nowhere, it only helps to create circumstances which select potential realities and since there is not enough wealth for everyone in the world to live like an American, the wealth is concentrated at the expense of others.

This is done systematically through capitalism, providing new potentials of wealth through exploitation, this is the capitalist form of manifestation which is so deeply ingrained into peoples psyches that they do not even recognize it and so cannot think to manifest something else. It is the naive New Agers and ignorant scoffers who forget it is possible to manifest unpleasant realities for others and this is because these people are generally wilfully ignorant of such realities, which are too “negative” to want to dwell on, but which must be transmuted if there is ever to be a sane world. All hierarchies are the result of manifesting a reality where others are in control, where “leaders” have the power to take the manifesting reality and use it for their own purposes. Whether or not those followers are happy about it, by consenting to hierarchy they consent to giving up their own power and they manifest their own doom and can manifest those realities against other countries as well. For these and other reasons, Anarchism is of the utmost importance to those who claim to be spiritual or think positive, it is crucial to stop empowering realities which hurt others, so long as people support such systems, such as by buying those consumer goods and being complacent there will always be poverty and war somewhere in the world. Ignoring such realities, hoping it will go away, means that no energy will be put into creating alternatives to capitalist reality and so we all manifest the exploitation of the world, our complacency is as good as consent.

Even though I think we should try to learn from our painful experiences we can learn lessons without having to go through horrible trauma, it is just that trauma can work in some cases for people who don't want to learn, or don't realize they should be trying to learn. Even if some lessons require pain, it is not necessary to set up a global empire of subjugation and domination, at least not anymore, humanity will learn why this is ignorant or it will more or less be destroyed by it's own actions. I believe it only comes to this because the world is in general such a poor place to get any direct spiritual knowledge, if people were kind to each other, this would serve as a lesson through example as well as providing a better environment to facilitate all kinds of growth and happiness. I am not saying we need to get everyone living in the suburbs, far from it, I am saying that governments and hierarchies need to be abolished and the illnesses caused by them need to be healed so that people will become much happier and aware in this world. Who knows we might even still have forests left if we act to save them, you can learn much more from nature than any self help or spiritual book. When this happens there will be much better methods of growing in every way, including spiritually, the school of life can then get on to better things than the currently commonplace and needlessly painful experiences which are today called karma. If the lessons of government are necessary it is only to learn why we don't need hierarchy and by consciously cultivating Anarchist awareness we can avoid the painful motivations to learn this lesson. The idea that you were born into a good life because of your good karma and how enlightened you are is pure egoism, and in fact those who are learning to live with nothing and be happy like the poor of the world are arguably onto harder and so higher lessons than most westerners. This is not to say we should continue exploiting and victimizing third world people, but that we need humility and compassion for those our society has robbed, murdered and starved as well as everything else.

Reincarnation I do believe is real, and I do believe there are repercussions for our actions, how this takes form metaphysically is questionable, but you should keep in mind you need to learn to be a better person, this includes action, not converting others to your spiritual view point, but helping to make their lives so that they can live comfortably enough to make up their own mind about spirituality or atheism. I do not believe in a caste system, no holy person is any better than anyone else, in fact there is no separation, and unless everyone becomes spiritually aware, which could very well happen given access to a healthy environment and freedom, there will always be portions of the group mind in ignorance of the deeper layers of reality. With Anarchy there will be true religious freedom, or I should say true spiritual freedom, in which psychedelics will be available, as well as philosophies that will grow from a place that is not mired in hierarchical thinking. New spiritual philosophies will arise from a place of practical awareness and not desperate escapism and fear which is so common in religions today, in fact the day to day persona that will be created in a stable Anarchist society will naturally grow to have many of the same qualities of those who are most spiritually aware. Through the kind of lifestyle that will be created and an emphasis on freedom and learning to be egalitarian, we will all become more aware and better people, this awareness which is crucial to spiritual growth will occur to some degree in atheists as well.

The idea that there is something beyond matter, some kind of divine force will seem much more plausible to people if we live in a sane society, one which considers all points of view rather than only the authorities point of view. It could be argued that humanity as a whole is learning its karmic lessons and the group mind will eventually reach enlightenment through all the turmoil that is happening, it is true going to war will probably give you a new appreciation for peace, but I cannot stress enough the need to actively learn these lessons without life forcing them on you. Traumatic experiences labelled karma are only the last resort and inevitable consequence of experiencing why a kind of action is stupid, we would all be better off learning this without having to go through it anymore than we have to. Anarchy will not be free from pain and there will still be plenty of experiences that will be painful lessons, but these pains will be seen as information we can use to better society, rather than as something to ignore and despise. To avoid trying to help the world in the name of karma is to lead to the eventual karmic lesson of what happens when you sit around letting others destroy everything, we can avoid this by acting right now. This awareness cannot be forced or threatened on people, they cannot be scared into awareness, all we can do and should do is help those who want to be helped, and stop those who mean to consciously do harm to others, or at the very least stop our unwitting aiding of those systems. The best way to do this is through the pursuit of global Anarchism, for when you truly understand that we are all one, then setting up hierarchies is pointless and standing by while other parts of yourself are being oppressed is masochistic. When people can live in Anarchy then we can really live in an enlightened mind and no sooner, those who are incapable of living in accordance with Anarchism clearly have no enlightenment worth having. Anarchy requires a high state of awareness of how we are all connected and it is through its pursuit that a person can learn the true nature of reality. A truth learned through individual effort and insight that we are each responsible for the state of the world, we are each responsible for the pain of other people, we are each required to help those in need if we are to live a happy life apart from the abstract lies of hierarchy and separation.

Nothing means Everything, Everything Means Nothing

The moon of the Earth travels our sky,
Is it just a mini planet viewing us from up high?
Or a symbol of the night, the reflection of the suns light.
And are the trees and gentle grass below, something more than we think we know?
To see the world as it truly is,
You must see everything as anything, or else you surely miss,
Its all a point of view of the same eternal thing,
Like a snake eating its tail, is as an ever present ring.
Where one person watches television and sees entertainment,
Another would see zombification and the reality of estrangement.
In cliches and untold novelties lie eternal truths,
The observations and training of a poets mind are the bringer of this fruit.
So is the world around us and the knowledge that we're dreaming,
Dissolution may seem frightening but to the mystic its inspiring.
The world around us is always trying to remind us of our forgotten piety,
We've all lost sight of ourselves that we're fragments of our deity.
Until we see reality as infinite and view everything as the same,
Then we will be forced to reincarnate forever and always play this game.
A tree is not a tree, it is the Sun and Moon, the Wind, a Rock, the Sea.
A word has no meaning, nor letters or symbols unless your mind is free.
Everything will be as nothing, nothing is the source of everything, Anything can mean anything, depending on what message you're sending.
Like a mirror the world reflects our thoughts back at us,
How good or bad we make it we have to discuss,
Revolution is how we evolve and transcend, so go on and make a big fuss!

Chapter 3 – Light

Well, I am all moved into my new apartment, I am pretty happy with the place, my room mate is an old friend and although he doesn't share my spiritual interests, it should be fine as long as I don't try to explain things I can't explain. Still, now that I am living in the city I see that people here are not much different from my small town. Its still hard for me to find like minded people, though I have only been here a couple months now, one thing is for sure, it beats living at home with parents. I have been going to a lot of parties and having fun, but in the back of my mind I still feel like an outsider. Even New Agers seem ridiculous to me, their outlook is so simplistic, they have no real drive to learn anything but fluffy feel good crap about manifesting money into their lives. There are many more opportunities for meeting girls here but still I find it hard to pretend I have anything in common with them, I find it hard to talk about worldly stuff when I know its possible to travel to other dimensions. I have been experimenting more with psychedelics and its clear to me that I can consistently have spiritual experiences if I want, each time I take something, I learn something amazing about reality.

I realize now that being crazy is being outside the majorities view of reality, while the alienation this causes can create all kinds of paranoia and insecurity which only make things worse. If I am crazy it is because of peoples attitudes to anyone who thinks outside the box, while I have had enough sense to keep many ideas to myself, once enough people label you “crazy” it is like a curse which if you are not strong, you may start to actually believe and then manifest like a psychosomatic effect. Some people are clearly delusional, but you are often pretty delusional if you think you can determine who is who by how much sense they make to you. As Krishnamurti said, “it is no measure of health to be well adjusted to a profoundly sick society.” It seems that if I talk to people about my beliefs, especially girls I am at best an intellectual curiosity, not someone who is really of value. I guess I can't expect people to believe me if they have never experienced being out of their body, I know I wouldn't of believed me a few a years ago, or at least I would have reduced it to a hallucination, but just because their skepticism is understandable, doesn't mean it is any less alienating. My love life in high school wasn't that great, especially after taking acid, but I lived in a small town, it was easy to understand why there wasn't any like minded girls, now that I am in the city I realize just how much of a freak I am. It turns out philosophers aren't sexy.

We humans controlled by our egos have two things in mind, how much can I get and how can I get more. Destroying this from my mind and no longer living this way has become increasingly isolating, it turns out the hardest part about being a good person is the isolation. I am not sure how much longer I can live this way and yet I know I cannot honestly live any other way. I have become too honest for my own good. As an Anarchist I am not bound by any imaginary set of rules, I follow only my own sense of right action which is apparently more closely attended to than other people who rely on the “moral majority” for guidance. If you accept that authorities and society know whats right then why bother to question it? But if you don't question it, how can you really understand it? I don't want to be a martyr, I can forgive people for their ignorance but I am really getting tired of paying for it. Standing up for what you really believe is no easy job and I don't take crap, but I find there is more and more people trying to feed it to me. Even the most moral people with the best intentions have proven untrustworthy to me in that I do not fit anyone's agenda, no one wants to hear me out. I am more alone in my life now than I have ever been, but then I guess that is what happens when you think the way I do, it is my destiny I guess. I am starting to miss the forest, being surrounded by living things, the fertility of nature and all that jazz, tripping out in the city is a bit nerve racking and my place seems pretty ugly in comparison to the woods. This stage in life is hard for everyone but I think its safe to say its harder for people headed in the complete opposite direction of the mainstream. This is a very cold world and my only defence seems to become even colder, certainly in the realm of romance talking about my feelings openly has proven a fatal mistake.

The other day I met a homeless girl named Helen, she seems to be about the most HardKore punk girl I have ever met, really quite a freak, incredibly beautiful with deep penetrating eyes, but with a certain sadness about her, though she acts too tough to ever admit it. I tried to get a conversation going, she didn't seem too impressed with me, if I had been drunk I would have been more fun, I might of pissed on things or people, maybe screamed at random people or something, but then she was pan handling and that probably wouldn't of helped the situation. She seemed a bit younger than me so maybe its for the best, still she is the most interesting person I have met since I moved to the city. She laughed at me when I tried to bring up spirituality, she said she used to be in to Pagan stuff but got bored with it, I guess she was just a teenage dabbler, sometimes I think Venus must be teasing me or something. While my attempts to hit on her didn't go over so well, maybe we can still be friends, she seemed isolated too, though for different reasons I guess. It sounds dumb but it made me want to rescue her, I think she might be in to hard drugs, I don't know maybe I just had some kind of unconscious chivalrous impulse or something. While all my logic says I should avoid her, somehow I can't help having unusually strong feelings for her, I don't know her that well, but there is something about her that hits me in the soul.

Her rejection of me is just another reminder I am haunted by something unbelievably strange about psychedelics, my experiences seem to be unravelling some incredibly vast cosmic riddle with depth beyond belief. Previously unseen symbols in the media and literature have become apparent to me as well as common themes behind all religions of the world. I have spiritually awakened as a direct result of psychedelics but I definitely don't think they are required to be a spiritual person. This is definitely the biggest surprise of my life, that there is a "god" or universal essence and we are all one with it. To think that a just a few years ago I was as big of an atheist as anyone possibly could be, I remember spray painting a church with the words "God is a dictator don't be a slave!" Now I realize "god" is an energy inside of all things including each human, not some old man with a white beard, the word "god" doesn't do it justice, there is no gender in it, now it's clear that it's the church who is the dictator not "god."

Always time to begin

I met a woman traveller outside of all that was discreet,
I said to her just look a moment, lets dive into concrete, and so it was we both stood still and lost what once was ours,
Now a storm is brewing to sow the seeds of our fragmented discord.
An Anarchist exegesis, an Alchemist treatise,
The sword in the stone, the mind is no matter.
A wonder to behold, an outsider in a dream,
A world of excitement, the goal of ice cream.
Double layered song stuff, a mood too dark to behold,
Wont you lick me darling or am I much to cold?
I wonder what the future holds, who's hands it rests in,
I wonder what it will take, before the truth sheds its skin,
Wont you talk awhile darlin? Wont you stop and wonder what I mean?
Take a bit of faith in an young old mans fool and buy my magick bean.
Time keeps on turning, but wont stop if we get dizzy,
Don't know what I am doing or where I am going, its a stagger to the sea.
Living on an island its towards the mountains that I am free.
The pain of knowing how others can lose their chains but seeing they wont take the key,
The truth unknown is bitter, no matter how sweet I make the words taste.
Pursuing a new beginning inside myself, the directions go to waste.
Lost again but heading ever forwards up towards the light,
Unaccustomed eyes go blind so I move in stages to gain new sight.
Read how I use my spell, you will find a way that is all your own,
Try to take someone with you and you will find you are all alone.
Proceed in decision and let wisdom make its incision,
On a mind that risks all with fear overgrown, there is no choice but to face it.
Drowning in growth there is no holding back, to a world that once was yours but left far behind.
You may not understand or appreciate, or worse still you do but still cant see whats to find.
You don't need me, know you never did, you can walk your own way, its your heart you hid.
Softening echoes of light fade into the brilliance of depth, from the centre of the empress's sweet despair.
Her's is a dangerous beauty that escapes me, but I cant help but wonder, what could make her care?
For those who live in a timeless fashion, know that death is on the way, being the now, they know what it means, to live for today.

Throughout the world for all recorded history and beyond humans have sought to enter altered states of awareness, in this pursuit various drugs have been used by people and many kinds of animals all over the world, this has been done for various reasons from the purely spiritual and Shamanic to the hedonistic. This is a fact of animal existence that will never go away and it is something that must be understood if we are to create a workable human society. The problems of the world will never be solved by being in denial about them, this is very true of the drug problems of our society, from crack to Prozac and coffee we are a drug taking species. Instead of getting hysterical and locking people away I think a much more mature and sane tactic is to realize these substances are in reality and there will always be people drawn to them, so it is we have to learn what use if any they have and what is the healthiest and most productive or at least least damaging way to use them, then we can start to truthfully educate people rather than giving them propaganda. This is true in an atheist reality, but for spiritual people there is also the inescapable conclusion for anyone who has done any research on the subject, that many people believe the divine must of created these plants and substances for a reason, this is even more obvious to anyone who understands the overwhelming historical role of certain psychedelic plants within religion and spiritual practices. Psychedelics are quite literally seen as the means of entering other dimensions and spiritual realities and if this is true, as I believe it is then to outlaw them completely is even more ridiculous. These psychedelic realities provide insight into why a puritanical Christian society would be so frightened by them, they provide alternative viewpoints and giving people freedom of religion, freedom to explore their own mind in regards to psychedelics makes for competition which wine and crackers cannot compete.

This is not to say all drug use is positive or spiritual, what I am trying to get across is not that you just have to take a pill and you will become enlightened, but that there is a right and wrong way to handle the use of drugs. Although crack and heroin should also be legal since their prohibition turns people with coping problems into criminals, these kinds of drugs are of a completely different nature than psychedelics, much more akin to alcohol in that their use is only hedonistic. Drugs like cocaine and heroin, MDMA and meth are for people who are afraid of their own mind, afraid to take psychedelics, I am not saying I haven't used drugs recreationally and had a great time, but I don't pretend it is anything more then entertainment.

Ecstasy is one example of a drug that is somewhere in between hedonistic and constructive, in my experience it is still one of the most pointless drugs out there and when mixed with harder drugs (which it most often is) can pose all kinds of problems. Although pure MDMA can be used in a very beneficial way to solve problems between people in relationships or in a therapeutic setting for people with post traumatic stress disorder and other problems, it is mostly used for the most superficial of recreational use. This is a big shame as MDMA is potentially one of the best tools possible for therapy but has been made illegal due to repressive governments objections to its recreational use. While MDMA should definitely not be illegal I am more than skeptical of rave culture and their claims of it being anything near as beneficial as psychedelics. It is quite trendy right now to get high on E and dance around and get massages, escape from your troubles and think you are a loving person, this is in some ways better than alcohol, but as a whole I am against escapism which is definitely a common pitfall with ecstasy. Bashing ravers is too easy, and if any of them are reading this my real point is, quit wasting your time when there are drugs that are so much better! MDMA can make you happy for a day, LSD can teach you how to be happy for a lifetime.

People today are starved for honest love, and I don't just mean in the romantic sense, this world has become conditioned to manufacture and sell an image to the masses. The younger generation is of course especially targeted to manipulate them into thinking that by wearing certain clothes, listening to certain music and taking certain drugs they are effectively rebelling and changing the world. (ravers are obviously not the only targets of this) Though deep in their hearts (or maybe not so deep) most of them know they have no serious intentions of revolution, they only want to "belong." This is perfectly natural but this mockery of real social progress has the opposite effect, as it has been perfectly designed to systematically break the wills of the people and distract anyone with serious intentions with brain killing drugs. I am fine with people wanting to have a good time but for me MDMA is not really that fun, if you are a happy person already then it really doesn't do much for you. Psychedelics do not make you happy, they simply amplify what is in your mind already, they also can show you why you aren't happy most of the time and the ultimate party killer, they make you think! If a person wants to get high and dance that should be their right, but they should not fool themselves and think they are contributing to social progress or accomplishing anything but having a good time. Psychedelics used in a rave setting are not likely to be much more useful than MDMA, but used as tools for seriously exploring consciousness do create real revolutionary potential through their ability to get people thinking outside the box, to get people to reexamine themselves and their culture.

The real problem is not the drugs at all, not even crack and heroin can be blamed, the real problem is the society that creates people who feel the need to escape with these drugs. The children of today more often than not don't want revolution they want an excuse to get high, dance and have lots of sex and generally escape from the problems of the modern world, so that when they are old and living a life they hate they can look back on "the good old days." I am not trying to say the revolution depends on people dropping acid, but that people in general use drugs of all kinds, even sometimes psychedelics in their search for something to do other than get involved politically, but with psychedelics there is real potential for creating revolutionary consciousness.

Real intellectualism is so dead within mainstream society that to have or show any interest in learning anything or raising awareness is to risk being labelled a nerd or worse a bore, and so follows excommunication from the status quo, this is true even within some of the most deviant sub cultures. Even when intellectualism is sought after it is generally within the confines of materialist ambitions, this trend is becoming more and more prevalent with all the fancy new toys people are becoming addicted to. How do you rebel when revolution is bought and sold? If you live in a small town there is little opportunity for finding activist groups already in place and to live outside the materialist paradigm is to become to some degree a recluse reject. That there is no truth within the group maybe true to some but it must not be seen as a reason to shut the group out completely. All my attempts to inspire revolution in my peers in any way that doesn't involve hedonism have failed miserably.

This world and the people who live in it are so alienated from anything they can truly call real that we seek it in all kinds of imitations. Reality has been manufactured and sold to us, our very concepts of what it means to be human have been deliberately manipulated to distract us from the truth. Everyone over the age of five has at least some notion of this and yet it is quietly tolerated that we live in a world where greed reigns unfettered and murder is considered patriotic. Although we cannot depend on them for a revolution, psychedelics do make us more conscious of our social programming and allow us to write our own much easier. They can do this because they allow us to see from a perspective outside everything we thought we knew, they show us just how relative and arbitrary our beliefs really are. When almost all the stimulus you get says one thing you tend to believe it, psychedelics allow us to gain a new context on these stimuli and also the culture that surrounds us by giving us new insights that would otherwise go unnoticed. A person actually has no choice but to redefine their perspective after taking a suitably strong dose. Here also lies the danger of inappropriate psychedelic usage, people often first take them looking for a cheap thrill, I did this myself. These people usually soon discover this is not at all what psychedelics are about and if still in search of that kind of drug experience they quickly move onto other drugs such as MDMA, cocaine, meth and sometimes heroin or any number of other things. These people don't so much put their body at risk with psychedelics but their minds, or at least their comfortable delusions about what reality is.

Trying to fill a bottomless void with narcotics often brings about paranoid isolation and addictive personality traits which can set in so gradually as to not even be noticed until its too late. I may be isolated in a way because of psychedelics, but my isolation is really from being interested in ancient philosophies and Anarchism, rather than habitual drug use. By taking psychedelics with this escapist kind of mindset you will pave the way for a “bad trip” to come out as fear in one way or another which is being repressed, in these situations people often do drugs to feel naughty. One of the main differences between psychedelics and other drugs and the main reason they are non addictive is because anyone trying to escape from their problems will have just the opposite happen, they will be confronted by those problems, sometimes to the point of being shown visions of them, they are shown a picture of their own mind whether or not it is a happy mind.

Of course the best way to get out of a bad place in psychedelics is to assert that you have control and that it is impossible for it to be otherwise, for if you feel out of control it is because you have allowed yourself to believe it was possible, you created in your mind the idea and fear that you are out of control. So in that sense you never lost control you just directed your mind to appear out of control and so by realizing this you can make yourself stable and able to accept what is happening. Of course it should be questioned why we need to control our thoughts during specifically allotted times in the right conditions, it should also be pondered how anyone really could lose control of their mind as there is no one else to control it for them. Fear in this way manages to present itself as a separate entity which is in control but it is really not, it is a deceptive servant of the mind but it does have its uses, it is the means of pointing out that which we do not wish to face. Nothing you can experience is separate of your mind and whatever is in your mind is always in your control, what causes the fear is that your mind is much larger than you realized and the idea that there is much to your mind that was previously unknown. Once you realize you don't really know your own mind you realize you don't know that well how to control it, you realize you don't know much of anything and so previously familiar and cherished things can create a fear of the unknown, but this can be overcome by having the right intentions before using psychedelics.

The idea that psychedelics could be used for spiritual purposes is no doubt silly or even offensive to some ignorant people, but they do not realize they have been used this way from time immemorial. Psychedelics have a long history of religious use and really there is no time that we can definitely say that there were humans, but nobody using psychedelics. All over the world psychedelics have been used to explore consciousness and when used for spiritual purposes there is a newer term, “entheogen” and this means “generating the divine within,” so that an entheogen is a drug that creates divinity within a person. It is a common misconception that drug use did not exist in the ancient world, when in fact depending on what was locally available it was probably even more common, for all kinds of purposes. So with this in mind it is no wonder people believed in what we now consider to be “mythical” creatures like fairies and unicorns. The idea that entheogens cannot be used for spiritual purposes spits on the roots of pretty well all religions, but especially the traditions of Native Americans who use them to this day after thousands of years of practice. From peyote to ayahuasca, morning glory flowers and magic mushrooms of various kinds, as well as datura and other kinds of entheogens, there is no doubt many Native Americans from the north and south have made these plants a central part of their spirituality. For example for the Aztecs there was the Shaman god Xochipilli, “the prince of flowers” who served as a god of entheogenic plants, writing and art. While European culture is quick to dismiss these ideas as “primitive” delusional or even demonic, it is clear that Native religions produce a much more valuable and experientially profound spiritual viewpoint than you will get at a modern Sunday service, though entheogens are a vital part of our lost western traditions as well.

I believe psychedelics are the keys to different views of the spiritual world, the most beneficial and well known probably being cannabis, mushrooms, cacti with mescaline, LSD, LSA, DMT, Salvia Divinorum, and iboga and if used properly Amanita muscaria. All of these besides LSD has a long tradition of spiritual use but even with LSD it was first popularized due to its spiritual potential and as we will see, LSD/LSA was taken in the form of Ergot fungus potions. It is possible that there are still a variety of new psychedelics left to be discovered, either in species of plants we already know about or other ones yet to be discovered. (which is one more reason to preserve the rainforest) Is it really incredible to think that if there is some divine force that created all things that it did not have an intention in creating these plants which effect us so much? Even Genesis says that “god” created ALL the plants for the use of humans. What better way for a divine force to make itself known then through plants which must be consciously and wilfully ingested, which can then alter consciousness and provide mystical states in a scientifically provable and repeatable manner. There have been many books of the cultural role in many religions that these kinds of plants have had, so much that it is far too much to sum up here.

Littered throughout human history in the myths and written works of the ancient cultures we get references of psychedelic use, and while you may not believe me, if you research it yourself you will find it even in reference to Jesus, Moses and Santa Claus in the west, it is literally confounding how much of our culture really is influenced by drugs. The word Christ means “anointed one” which was not a name but a title of a special kind of priest, which some scholars argue was done with an oil that had large amounts of cannabis in it. Other scholars, such as John Allegro, who was the only non Christian to translate the dead sea scrolls argue the ancient Christians were actually a mushroom cult, which as absurd as it sounds gives new meaning to the death and resurrection of the saviour and the eating of his flesh and drinking of his blood. (It is too much to explain fully here, but see his book “The Sacred Mushroom and the Cross,” as it has since inspired a lot of further scholarship on this subject.) The mushroom Amanita muscaria has a red cap and would be placed in water after being thoroughly dried, turning the water red or into “wine.” While obviously not accepted by scholars with a Christian bias, so much of history is fallacious that the more I learn, the more I realize nobody has a clue and that in this case there are some very interesting arguments which are worth looking in to, especially when viewed from the context of Gnosticism being the original Christianity. As for Santa, in Siberia on the winter solstice, Shaman reindeer herders would pick the mushroom under pine trees, coming in through the chimneys of the peoples homes since the door was snowed in, they would dry the mushrooms by the fire. Then in a ceremony dressed in red and white (the colours of the mushroom) the Shaman would call upon magical elf helpers.

Witches of the middle ages and long before used belladonna as well as other herbs such as mandrake root, and the Amanita muscaria mushroom. These Witches or “cunning folk” made powerful concoctions which were apparently capable of giving the “sensation” of flying which is in fact classic Shamanic flight, or astral travel. On my one and only to date experiment with datura (very low dose) which contains the same kind of chemicals as belladonna, henbane and mandrake, I could indeed feel an out of body experience about to occur, though it never did. These concoctions or flying ointments as they were called (because the astral body would leave the body and fly around) were applied to the vagina of women with a broomstick giving us the classic image of a Witch. Atropine and scopolamine are the active chemicals in belladonna and are capable of incredibly intense and perfectly realistic visions. These chemicals are however the most poisonous and overall dangerous and difficult to use of all the psychoactive substances used for spiritual purposes and most experiences I have heard from their use has not been at all pleasant. This class of chemicals are not considered to be psychedelics, but “delirians” and while they have a long history of spiritual use they are by far the most likely to kill you or severely hurt you, and should be avoided. They should only be taken by those with the most experience in such matters and who have done thorough research and who have a proper experienced guide to show them how to use them properly, and what kind of dose, but even then there are other psychoactive plants which are safer, more enjoyable and more spiritually useful and preferable for a number of reasons.

Drug use was very common in the ancient European world and even marijuana was used by people like the Celts and the Norse, who also used a variety of other psychedelics. Psilocybin mushrooms were probably used by the Norse and the Druids and even mistletoe, a plant held in the highest esteem by the Druids, is when properly prepared psychoactive. In the Norse Religion Odin drinks the psychoactive mead of inspiration, which quite probably contained henbane, though it could be any number and combination of psychoactive herbs such as bog berry or at times quite likely some kind of mushroom. There was also a wolf cult of berserker warriors who would become unstoppably ferocious while intoxicated, they were also most likely on henbane, though Amanita muscaria could have been used and it is from this tradition that we get legends of werewolves. While not exactly a happy example of entheogen use, the stories of the brutality of werewolves is to a large part from Christians who found themselves having to deal with the Pagan resistance to their oppression in the middle ages.

Mother Earth as the goddess of all plants is a goddess of plant entheogens, all her creations are sacred and so it is not surprising that plants would be used in such a spirituality. For example, according to the ethnopharmacologist Christian Ratsch, the oldest archaeological evidence for marijuana use comes from Germany, where people would go out stoned into the weed fields on May 1st and have an orgy as a fertility rite to their Goddess Freya, making her their goddess of Cannabis Sativa as well as love, nature, fertility and magick. It has been theorized she was married to Odin, god of poetry under the name Óðr which among other things means “divine madness,” thus uniting the two most entheogenic divinities of their pantheon, both of which are also associated with the Norse Shamanism known as Seidr. As with the Celts, the Norse loved poets and thought them to have divine inspiration, but this is also psychedelic inspiration. My goddess cried tears of amber in search of poetry, so I may drink some amber mead for fermenting inspiration and write such aesthetic poetry as to charm my way to her love, adding her emerald green herb I would gain victory over those who's vanity makes them defame her soaring beauty.

In the myth of Heracles the last labour he was to perform was to capture Cerberus the hell hound. In order to do this he went to Eleusis and was initiated in the Eleusinian mysteries to learn how to enter and exit the land of the dead while still alive. When Heracles did eventually drag Cerberus out of Hades the dog's saliva hit the ground and in that place aconite or foxglove as it is more commonly known sprouted where the saliva fell. Aconite is an extremely potent and poisonous plant, with similar chemistry to datura and mandrake etc and so one way or another, either by death or through out of body experiences, it is very capable of taking people to Hades. It is widely believed by scholars that Ergot (a fungus that LSD was originally derived from) or some other psychoactive plant would be consumed in a drink to teach the initiates the mysteries at Eleusis. (It could also be different depending on what was available) If you consider the idea of the collective unconscious or the Hermetic idea that all that exists is mind, then it is quite easy to see that a journey into the land of the dead and a journey to the unconscious would be the same, that “manifesting the mind” is the same as “generating the spirit within.” Hades was also considered to be a god of wealth as he owned all the precious metals in the Earth, so on one level this could mean the unconscious has riches like the gold of the Alchemists and so we should learn to explore it. Hades realm was a key part of the mythological story of Persephone and Demeter as enacted at Eleusis and its initiations included most of the greatest Greek thinkers including Socrates and Plato, but also slaves as anyone who could afford the cost was welcome.

The Greeks were taken to drink all kinds of “strong wine” which were laced with various herbs from mandrake to marijuana and opium. The god Dionysus was a god of wine but also intoxication in general, as the Greeks would use wine to make tinctures of all kinds and thus the god was associated with a variety of drugs, from cannabis, to Amanita muscaria and opium, but I would not be surprised to find out that mandrake and originally even psilocybin mushrooms were used as well. Dionysus is also associated with specific kinds of ivy plants and although chemists cannot find any psychoactive compounds within ivy, the Greeks and others since do say that it is psychoactive, however it's ritual use may be due to a synergistic effect with other herbs. The priests of Apollo would also use datura to enter in to trance states and he is associated with Amanita muscaria as well and so we can see that this fungus has played a huge role in world religions.

When the Buddha reached enlightenment it rained datura flowers from the sky, this was after he had lived on nothing but cannabis seeds. The lotus flower so often found in Buddhist and Egyptian art is also psychoactive and can aid in meditation and I have found it has definite synergistic effects with cannabis which was also used by both Egyptians and a variety of Asian peoples. Lotus flowers were added to wine by Egyptians but Lotus use can also be seen in the Greek myth of the Odyssey, while the characters are on the “island of the lotus eaters.” Tibet and Nepal have a long history of marijuana use, even in their Buddhism and while not so much in the orthodox monasteries, it has been used in the more Shamanic Tantric traditions. In China hemp and cannabis was widely used, it turns up in medical texts and Taoist Alchemy in which it is said to help make a person immortal, but also was said to be useful for divination and creating mystical states and could make a person see spirits, or drive away evil spirits. In Egypt we also know of their ceremonial “incense” and potion kyphi, a recipe of which was recently made by scientists and this contained among other things, cannabis. Even more astonishing is the use of coca and tobacco plants by Pharaohs as the chemical analysis of the remains of royal mummies shows, meaning that Egypt must have been in contact with South American Natives. Egyptians also partook of opium and mandrake and so were no strangers to psychoactive plants, though unfortunately the details of their use seem to have largely been contained in oral traditions. (Like so many of the most important spiritual teachings of other religions.)

In Hinduism there is a whole yogic path centred around herbs called “aushadhi” which when used properly with the right intentions can give temporary glimpses of samadhi or enlightenment. Shiva is credited with the creation of marijuana, (cannabis indica) to bring joy to the hearts of people and it is used to this day for meditative and ritual purposes by some of his followers, as well as some Buddhist monks who have taken to making hash. There is also the ancient Indo European plant/god Soma/Haoma which is undoubtedly a psychoactive plant of some kind. Archeological evidence shows that it was a combination of cannabis, ephedra and opium, this mix was probably the inspiration for many traditions from Hinduism, to Zoroastrianism and Mithraism and so would of had a very strong influence for European religions as well. It is quite possible Soma was a term that related to entheogens in general and scholars argue it was everything from Amanita muscaria (which has the most support from scholars) to an orally active DMT brew made from acacia and Syrian rue which would be chemically analogous to the ayahuasca of South American Native religions. Psilocybin mushrooms (whether or not they were called Soma) may have also originally played a role in the religion and may be connected to Shiva and Krishna who love to hang out with cows, a reference to how magick mushrooms grow in cow dung, while the blue skin of Shiva is reminiscent of the blue bruising of psilocybin mushrooms. This fungal fertilizing cow dung, along with their milk/marijuana mix (bhang) is probably some of the original main factors in why cows are thought sacred by Hindus. Shiva is also said to smoke opium to calm himself down so that he does not get angry and destroy the universe, so from this perspective without opium nothing could exist!

Entheogenic plants and fungi were created by the the divine for a reason and in my experience it is to illuminate our ignorance and educate through pure direct experience of awareness. It is no coincidence that these substances have all been sacraments in people's spirituality for thousands of years. It is astonishing that with all the clues the ancients gave us including literally telling us about these substances, scholars are still unable to understand for the most part the context in which these people constructed their cosmological paradigms. Historical entheogen use is taken to be the mistake of ignorant cultures without any real consideration at all, if you watch someone tripping out you have no idea what they are experiencing and they may in fact look stupid, but to the person having the experience it is quite another matter. This lack of exploration has left us at the mercies of our egos indefinitely, in fact most westerners don't even believe it is possible to experience anything else.

Psychedelics can give a very real experience of exploring new dimensions of the mind and so also what we call “reality,” this idea is widespread throughout the world and history and has been shown to be the main influence behind many things we would not normally expect. Dismissing such experiences as mere hallucinations shows little to no understanding of the experience, nor of basic logic, there is much more to psychedelics than what you see, but even when it comes to visions, real or not they have real effects on the person experiencing them, effects which can lead to life changing benefits. To say the visions are all in your mind is redundant, all things you perceive are perceived by the mind, that is what defines it. It could well be that the brain only perceives itself and the body as being flesh but in reality all that is, is a discarnate mind with an incredibly active imagination run by a powerful subconscious. Like it or not there is no way for us to know if your brain only perceives your eyes as existing in flesh as a product of consciousness, as a functional communication about some deeper reality. This subconscious apparently dislocates itself from the conscious mind, so that the conscious mind can have perceptions without being overwhelmed by the knowledge of the subconscious. The mind is capable of imagining itself having a body with eyes to perceive things that it imagines to be separate from itself, which is interpreted by a metaphorical mirror image of the mind imagined as solid matter. Need some proof of this? What do you think happens when you dream at night? There are all kinds of new ways of looking at things and experiences that give a better understanding of the mind when psychedelics are properly used, they are I believe the best tool a person has for getting a better view of what really is in between their ears.

Sometimes I have strange thoughts in my head that seem to come out of nowhere, like its my own and yet not at the same time, like it was an idea sent to me, the word "inspiration" actually means in-spirit-ation or bringing the spirit in, no doubt this feeling is increased after smoking some pot or eating an entheogen. The very fact the mind is capable of creating hallucinations either auditory or visual should raise serious questions to the validity of all our realities. Even though psychedelics may be responsible for creating hallucinations, if a chemical is capable of creating perceptions that seem to be more real than reality itself, whether or not the hallucinations are real is relatively inconsequential. What is important is that our minds are capable of creating something that seems more real than normal waking states and also providing us with previously unknown information. Thus the very concept of "real" becomes relative, something that can only be defined in personal terms. This brings up many doubts as to how real our so call objective reality really is, how do we know life isn't a hallucination?

To say that the chemicals in a brain are more reliable than entheogens is an unproven statement of faith, it is even less credible when you know that DMT, an incredibly powerful entheogen found in many plants is also created in the human brain, it is in you right now. So when trying to determine what truth is, or what the real world is, it is quite the bias statement to dismiss the entheogenic experience as a hallucination. This is rooted in the bias that a mystical experience shouldn't come from something external, but what entheogens show you is that all of reality is one, the mushroom or whatever it is, is not separate from you, but one with you and like all things in nature, it is sacred. Maybe you hallucinated yourself having a body and eating mushrooms, which was the unconscious symbol to activate perception of the true reality? This in many ways seems to be true, it might as well be true, and there is no way for us to know for sure, except possibly through serious study of entheogens and consciousness.

There are plants that heal the body when used properly, and entheogens are the plants that heal the mind and soul when used properly and there is no doubt that this world is mentally ill and severely in need of healing. Due to the fact that many kinds of animals use various drugs, entering into altered states has been theorized to be a natural urge similar to sex, sleep and food. Perhaps plants and fungi are more karmically advanced than humans as they not only are generally incapable of causing harm to others, they often sacrifice themselves to us so that we may live and learn, if Jesus was a human he's got nothing on mushrooms. I believe first and foremost that death is impossible and that our purpose is to become more aware of our immortality, the fact that entheogenic experiences are so similar to near death experiences is no coincidence, DMT is released at death and at birth, so for those wishing to get a glimpse of the other side it is a very reliable and safe way to do so. After enough dedication and learning we will all transcend this world completely, we will experience pleasures unrivalled by anything on this world, but it is only through facing our darkest fears. Escapism is not the goal, it is actually to find what is real, to face the true self and the unconscious, and to take responsibility for controlling it. Earth is the place of learning, of overcoming our delusions and mental illness and it will most likely always be painful until possibly we all realize our oneness in a revelation and come together as never before.

In my experience nature is not just some blind random occurrence devoid of awareness and communication as most westerners seem to think, in fact she is speaking to us constantly in a variety of ways. Sometimes, like with entheogens this is a very overt and obvious, if you believe in the Gaia hypothesis then it is not at all unreasonable that the Earth organism would have a means of communicating with all its different cells. What better way to do this than with plants and mushrooms? Our bodies too use chemicals like hormones, to ensure that the cells are keeping to their purpose and working together cohesively. When cells stop working for the benefit of the body and simply reproduce we get cancer. Whether or not entheogens are exactly like hormones modern humanities general state of mind is disconnection from nature, in terms of environmentalism it is cancerous and its getting worse, this is the direct result of us losing awareness of our place within the whole of the ecosystem.

All of our brains are the physical manifestation of our minds and operate on different chemicals most notably neurotransmitters. If these chemicals are responsible for producing consciousness then isn't it reasonable to think that its at least possible that some chemicals found in nature could be used to alter consciousness in a way that is beneficial? That we may have even evolved to ingest these chemicals for beneficial purposes? Why shouldn't it be possible to alter consciousness, to chemically improve it at least in certain respects for a limited period of time? Psilocybin, THC and LSD fit into the receptors of the brain remarkably well, so that on a chemical level we're just substituting one for another, but these can have profound effects on our consciousness on the immaterial level. If serotonin is like a fuel for different aspects of brain functions, then LSD and psilocybin are some kind of premium rocket fuel blasting us off into parallel realms of thought and human imagination. However if used improperly the extra speed can make a crash that is much more volatile. When possibilities seem limitless then the hard part becomes deciding what to do.

Scientific studies suggest that DMT in some way or another keeps us on certain channels of perception. These channels exist independently but simultaneously within different parameters of time and space. Or brains simply act as the television sets which are capable of tuning into different channels. To almost all humans there is only one channel (if anyone actually thinks about these things) but after a few high dose psychedelic experiences the idea that all of reality could be experienced through only our everyday five senses is a pretty naive thought. The fact that we are taught to believe in such a narrow viewpoint, that it is actually materialistically beneficial to think in these terms has created the present day elitist class war. We are encouraged to believe in "God" only in terms of obedience to a church while competition is the sole means of having any stature within society. Instead of being an experience, "god" has become an authority. How "successful" we are is superficially defined in monetary terms rather than happiness or awareness. This sideways view has created allegiance to everything that's within the possibility of ignorance, it is so ingrained into our way of thinking that no human I know of is fully aware of it. If DMT became legal and widespread it would be the end of hierarchical religion, it would also not be long before people started valuing awareness and truth over consumer goods and with that capitalism and the government would be dealt a very heavy blow, however such a powerful and short experience is not likely to become widespread specifically because it is not appealing to the capitalist mentality.

To use psychedelics in a recreational way can be extremely enjoyable but ultimately that is a considerable waste of a much higher function. They have the power to shed light on the darkest most unknown recesses of our minds, of things we've not only been taught to subconsciously ignore, but also things previously unimaginable. It is an undeniable truth that psychoactive plants have been used by the earliest religions in almost all of the world, this cannot be a coincidence, our ancestors left us all the information necessary to understand their way of thinking through the plants they used. Entheogens are in my experience a form of chemical communication from plant and spirit to the waking human consciousness. This no doubt sounds outrageous and ridiculous to most, but this is what humans have believed for most of our existence. It is interesting to note that plants do in fact communicate with each other using chemicals they release, similar species might warn each other of attack from insects, or a weed might scream out a battle cry as it slowly strangles the roots of another plant. Science has shown that plants have the ability to hear noise, from human music to small clicking noises created by other plant's roots, or noises created by plants release of gas and from this understanding of plant language, science has also shown they are also very much aware when something is eating them or damaging them because they make noises or in a sense "scream." Codariocalyx motorius also known as the "dancing plant" will actually start to move and appear to dance when you play music for it, but not only this it learns to dance better and shows that some plants at least have a memory and are capable of improving skills. I believe scientists are in many ways just scratching the surface of understanding non human consciousness, could it be plants are using certain chemicals to try and communicate with us for symbiotic reasons? Or as hard as this may be for some strictly evolutionist atheist people to fathom, that a creature would have altruistic intentions towards us, in some cases to the point of sacrificing its own life to give us a message from Gaia? Perhaps they are the neurotransmitters or hormones of Gaia and we are the brain cells or we could have some other function altogether. It is possible we could be the genitals who's function is to spread life to other planets, but perhaps we are just some kind of infection, killing other cells in the planets body with no regard to the overall life system. One thing is certain, the use of entheogens must be taken with the most reverence and care possible, to me they are holy sacraments and the most serious but blessed experience possible to living humans.

One idea is that plants as the base life forms of the ecosystem for the Earth are responsible for creating our present state of consciousness, this is undeniable in terms of their role within the food chain. Carnivores would be able to get whatever is necessary for this from a herbivores body, higher level predators could possibly get something from eating other carnivores. All food is matter and all matter is essentially energy, perhaps by taking in different atomic structures or more likely the energy patterns of plants, certain kinds of reality are created, we just do not notice this since most plants seem to take us to the same kind of reality. While obviously true on a biological level, it is possible some plants have alternate states of mind that they create for us, which seems to be the doorways to things beyond normal imagination. In this perspective food is a drug making us have a group hallucination we call reality, entheogens are simply drugs which take us to other realities. These are manifested in our materialistic reality as chemical compounds within a plant or synthesized within a lab. Many spiritual traditions teach a vegetarian diet helps a person to become spiritually aware, I would suppose because meat would have a denser energy vibration, or to put it another way eating meat is like eating a whole bunch of plants all at once, the plants to which that animal ate and so the consciousness is more deep into the materialist trip. If a person stops eating, as through a fast they go through withdrawals and can have spiritual experiences, if they continue to fast long enough they go right in to the spirit world when they finally die, or in other words their trip ends and they go back to reality. Biology does show us plants are in fact responsible for the basic chemical building blocks of neurotransmitters, for example tryptophan is a chemical found in plants from which our brains creates many chemicals that it needs. tryptophan is also the chemical precursor to many tryptamines, like LSD and psilocybin and so its not so much of a stretch to say that they are just alternative sources of possible neurotransmitters found in nature, but since they are not commonly ingested and produce previously unknown perceptions, we mistake them for being alien to our natural processes. We all share the same molecules, the same consciousness creating chemicals and so if we have spirits, we get it from plants, once we realize this, it is not hard to see that all life on this planet is connected through the Gaian mind and all organic beings are part of the same organism going through an Alchemical process of natural evolution.

One might even wonder if plants as some of the oldest forms of life have not evolved so much so that they have figured out how to create and breed animals such as humans to do their bidding. Perhaps human civilization is a ploy for wheat and corn to take over the world and we are their unwitting slaves, sugar and coffee take over a persons soul or so it would seem, but maybe we are just abusive. How do symbiotic ecology dynamics effect us? These are important questions which would be better answered if we did not destroy nature on a whim and instead met with our plant allies and created a permaculture. What we can say for sure is that psychedelics do have the potential for creating massive change within conscious and should not be put in terms of true and false realities, but in terms of potentiality for improving your life and the world. Entheogens, as alternative neurotransmitters could be our traditional plant allies, quite often with a longer history of symbiosis with humanity then food plants cultivated through agriculture. The common brain chemistry is regarded as the consensus reality because everyone gets their source of neurotransmitter molecules from the chemistry of their food sources and when a person switches on to psilocybin or LSD, the tolerance quickly builds up after the first dose so that by the third day it can take much higher doses to reach the same place. Once the tolerance builds up enough you can use psilocybin mushrooms as a food source with little to no effects, and while this is disrespectful and wasteful, it points out that the varieties of food sources that we have contribute to how we perceive ourselves in relation to Gaia's consciousness. Demanding that some people be unable to use a plant or fungus for food sources when it can be used to provide brain stimulation or alternative neurotransmitters is complete psychological terrorism on various alternative states of mind and so if freedom is important at all, then people should be free to use whatever food sources they want.

These plants open us up to otherwise unimaginable realities and are a mystery unlike any other on Earth. However once these plants do what they do, once they have awakened a person to infinite possibilities, that person will never see things the same again. Many gurus claim we can go further then any psychedelics can take us and that we should focus on spiritual practices and meditation. My feelings on this are that using psychedelics alone is not a good idea and that meditation and spiritual practice alone is workable but not nearly as effective as when you combine the two together and that really it is likely Yoga and meditation were invented by entheogenic using Shamans. Having a devoted spiritual practice is key, but they are only some of the tools that can be used, but they are not the only tools and a wise person learns to use whatever they can on their spiritual path. This would be done according to most through meditation and astral projection, through Occult ritual and I do feel these to be the most important skills any person can learn, it is not a question of which is better, but how they can be used harmoniously. Mantras and visualizations etc are not better than psychedelics for spiritual growth, nor is psychedelics better than mantras etc, the key is to do it all together. We could say a psychedelic is your vehicle and your ritual meditation is the path you take to your intentions, you can walk the path without psychedelics, or you can take the vehicle to all kinds of other places, but when you combine the two magickal things happen. Those who say entheogens cannot work for a person are really just saying they have never tried them, or that they do not work for them personally. It is true entheogens do not agree with everyone, but given enough dedication (and probably lifetimes) meditation will work for anyone. While ascetics often ignorantly think of entheogens as hedonistic, especially in their modern context, even the Buddhist or Christian monk who has never touched a psychedelic still uses food to keep his consciousness in a certain place and compared to the naked Natives living in the bush, all monasteries are decadent and luxurious.

All things on Earth and in creation both physical and metaphysical were created at least indirectly by the divine, all things have purpose. Our consciousness is represented on the physical level by chemicals, this is indisputable. Plants are alive and I believe much more aware of their environments then we give them credit for, they are the oldest creatures on Earth and yet we think because they do not have the same bodies, the same chemicals as animals that they have no perception. They have electrical impulses and in some form or another I believe they are definitely conscious. Anyone who has ever heard of a Venus fly trap cannot deny this, but there is definitely more to it than this, as plants do respond to music in growth, they hear and yet have no ears and so we cannot expect them to have sensory organs like us. That is not to say all plants are equally conscious or that they are definitely as conscious of the physical world as animals, as this is not very necessary for obvious reasons, however plants do move as well as grow, they just usually do so too slowly for us to notice. Trees planted under power lines often know to grow and branch out away from the danger, at night some plants visibly curl or fold up and go to sleep. It is a common fallacy that brain size is a determining factor in intelligence, if this were true whales, dolphins and elephants would all be smarter than humans and ants would not be capable of doing many of the things they do to construct their civilizations.

It is also unscientific to assume that awareness cannot exist in plants because at first glance they do not have brains like ours, for all we know plants have greater awareness but a completely different method of biologically producing it and we are not smart enough to recognize it. Through assumptions it has become a widespread myth that plants have no awareness, but this is totally contrary to the majority of human natural philosophy. Of course a lot depends on how you define awareness and if you define awareness purely in human terms, then of course nothing else has awareness! Actually plants quite often have the same kind of structure as your nervous system and brain, we even recognize this with the term "brain stem," but we ignore all kinds of data because it does not fit with what superficial observation tells us with the majority of plants. Not only do plants use a variety of chemicals for communication with each other and with other species, but the root structure of plants resembles a human brain's neural branches, the stock is like a spinal chord and branches resemble the nervous system which take in or are receptive to external forms of energy much like a leaf. The roots of plants especially the tips or "root apex" do in fact seem to function like the brains of a plant, complete with electrical impulses and chemical transmitters that determine the actions of the plants. Trees and fungi are by far the biggest entities on the planet, with some not only dwarfing blue whales but living longer than anything else on the planet, providing them with lots of stimulus with which to develop their awareness.

In different species of fungus the tiny root-like mycelium take over soil like tiny networks of awareness, which in the right conditions can grow so thick that in one square foot there can be as many cross connections in the mycelium network as there are synapses in a human brain. (they grow much bigger than just one square foot) The mycelium of some kinds of mushrooms can grow into the roots of different trees and plants and trade a variety of needed nutrients and even water across different species, including the mycelium itself, thus uniting large areas of land in a forest. This network of mutual aid sends food to where it is needed most creating an incredibly complex symbiosis, to the point that I would consider the forest to be made up of these super organisms. The different species of trees each have different strengths and weaknesses so that during different times of year, or when there is a sudden environmental shift those which are best adapted can help those other trees in the mycelium network to survive, promoting biodiversity as a kind of symbiotic repertoire. Mother trees feed their offspring through these fungal networks which balance the ecosystem and ensure the full cycle of life, allowing bigger trees to grow, but also as the old trees begin to die they redistribute their own nutrients to the younger trees and then when they fall down they will be eaten by the fungus so that they can replenish the soil. This creates a kind of internet brain of the forest which is also a stomach and the very foundation of the food pyramid for that whole ecosystem. These mushroom mycelium exhibit awareness of the physical world in a number of ways such as responding to disturbance in the ground, so that fungus can grow where trees fall because the mycelium feel the fall. As a mycelium starts to eat some new food source the tip will explore the food and experiment on the best way to digest it, as it learns it will then send back information to the rest of the mycelium network to teach the other parts how to digest this particular food source in the future. This works so that different parts of the mycelium network can test out different strategies and come up with the best method through trial and error. Even when you look at the mycelium the similarity to a human brain is startling, especially when you eat some magick mushrooms and they start to talk to you.

It is humanities arrogance to ignore types of intelligence and awareness in other creatures, to assume so much about the nature of consciousness and dismiss so many other beings despite the evidence, much of which is beyond the scope of this book. The truth is, you cannot tell what the consciousness of something is just by looking at it, this is not scientific at all, you cannot even really determine that other humans have consciousness, so how can we pass judgement on plants? Well certain plants and fungi seem to have the ability to communicate with us, if we are willing to try and learn their language, if we are even willing to communicate with them, but we have to give up assumptions the only way to communicate is by vibrating the air to form words. The skeptical conclusion is that notions of plant communication under the influence of entheogens is some aspect of the subconscious, while this may be the case (at least to a degree) this does not change most of the case for plant awareness, but it does say a lot about the nature of our subconscious which may be an even more important discovery in many ways, especially since entheogens seem to be capable of giving at least some new information not consciously known by the individual.

One thing which people also fail to even consider is that plants could be conscious of non physical realities, that consciousness is not limited to this physical world, this is true of all humans and probably all animals, who is to say a plant is not in its own non physical reality? We do not consider these things because most of us are way to caught up in our own physical realities. Perhaps naturally occurring psychedelics are in fact some kind of chemical consciousness, this is impossible to say, but so much of existence is currently impossible to prove, clearly dogma is not useful but neither is a refusal to investigate or consider possibilities. To those inexperienced with entheogens it is strange to suggest that LSA, or psilocybin could be like plant neurotransmitters, but they don't realize DMT is also quite possibly responsible for much of our consciousness including our dreams, though to be fair it is still a scientific mystery just what role it plays in our brains. But what is known is that DMT is found in many many plants and many other entheogens are chemically similar to DMT and so it must be doing something important. By ingesting entheogens we seem to become aware of the fungi or plants perception of reality and especially the non material aspects of it. Am I taking the plant? Or is the plant taking me? If DMT or psilocybin makes my nervous system aware of non physical reality, it could do it for the organisms that produce them as well and if you were rooted to the ground it would make sense that you would want to be able to astral project or live in a dream world.

Traditionally entheogens seem to be the physical manifestation of other non human entities who have been known to personify themselves and appear in visions, sometimes looking like humans, sometimes more like plants, quite often like fairies, elves or dwarves of some kind. For peyote there is one called Mescalito, though San Pedro and Peruvian torch also have similar spirits and for wormwood or absinthe there is the famous green fairy. For Salvia Divinorum there is a "goddess" often called the shepherdess and equated with the biblical Mary by the Natives, but representing a Christianizing of an earlier plant goddess, which is a very interesting choice as Mary is derived from the wisdom goddess Isis or Sophia. In the African Bwiti religion their sacrament of Tabernanthe Iboga is used to make contact with the plant's spirit, which plays a central role in guiding the initiates through a spiritual awakening. Belladonna and henbane were among the sacred plants of Hecate and datura was used by the worshippers of Kali, though other practitioners also use these plants, the character of these goddess's is very similar to the character of the altered states produced by these plants and so we can think of them as the goddess over-mind of these plants. For DMT there are various kinds of elves, depending on if it is sniffed in a snuff or smoked, on ayahuasca there is also "the queen of the forest" but this is a misleading translation given the indigenous people have no concept of monarchy and instead we see she is the Earth mother. If she is a monarch, she is the empress of life, the master of fecundity, she does not make decrees from on high but we walk on her below and so as she gives all and asks nothing but respect, her rule if it is anything is naturally that of pure creation, beauty, sensuality and delight; so it is those who disavow her, betray all life, for she provides all fruits free of charge, as she is our mother and loves all creatures as equals. Not only this but on ayahuasca other plants which happen to be around in the jungle and are not entheogenic can each have their own spirit or fairy which becomes visible and communicative and are seen and heard the same by all people who have ingested the entheogen.

Elves have been known to appear on other entheogens as well, especially Amanita muscaria mushrooms and psilocybin varieties, but mushrooms can also speak in a less visual and personified form. It is possible this voice is of the elves or it is possible the mushroom itself is speaking and the elves are one of the many possible spirits that can become visible when an entheogen opens a person's psychic vision up to the astral. With Amanita muscaria mushrooms the spirit is said to be a small red man and in Japan it is called beni-tengu-take which means "scarlet long-nosed-goblin mushroom."

There are a variety of other plant allies which have been shown to have plant spirits, I have recently read even opium has a personified female figure but this is less known, though an argument could be made that Persephone is a poppy plant spirit as she was associated with them in a number of ways. I have personally communicated with a vision of the Hawaiian Baby Woodrose plant as well, though these days I purposely try to communicate with the entheogen's spirit whenever I take one. LSD is an exception since it doesn't seem to have a spirit in the same way, presumably because it is not naturally occurring, though Mexican mushroom Shamans were given some synthetic psilocybin and they said they could still communicate with the spirits. This indicates that the chemical is not necessarily related to specific plants or mushrooms, but opens a person up to visions of the astral where the spirits exist, but then this has been the contention of many Shamans and magicians from the beginning. In many ways the astral could be thought of as the unconscious, as most people are literally not aware of it, but it is the collective unconscious and the realm of all creatures, just the place you would expect to communicate with a plant spirit. While if you consume a particular plant it would make sense that you would contact its particular spirit, I have met a variety of other spirits on plant entheogens and it is not any more strange to think that synthetic entheogens could create contact with plant spirits which hadn't been incarnated in some time, or were themselves astral projecting. In Pagan and animistic cultures, they make no bones about it, everything has its own spirit even rocks, this is something that can be clearly experienced through the use of psychedelics in a very convincing way.

While it is widely known that entheogenic plants are traditionally seen as having spirits by Shamans, there is very little specific scholarly information dealing with plant allies and their cultural or objective forms, this is of course because not too many scientists have even dreamed that real and intelligent plant communication is possible. It is also possible that various entities in the astral which are connected to plants could take on different appearances and forms according to the cultural projections of those who use them, so that Kali and Hecate may be two faces of the same goddess in many ways, but each of those goddesses also has a variety of forms. Though to be clear there is a lot of anecdotal evidence to show that people can experience the same plant spirit without any cultural awareness of what they should be seeing within that cultural context.

Even if these personifications are all the products of the user's mind, it is still hard for a scientific rationalist to explain how there have been so many common experiences going back thousands of years by people who could not of known anything about them, or had it in their individual subconscious. Of course if everything is in our group mind then it becomes a pretty pointless question to ask if these personifications are in our mind. I do not however find it totally unreasonable to believe higher souls could incarnate as plant teachers, or even that plants have evolved far beyond what we give them credit for and are indeed communicating with us. We humans seem to measure evolutionary success strictly in terms of the intellect and technology and while it is clear to anyone who has had a conversation with an entheogenic plant spirit that they are very intelligent and articulate, it is even more clear that intellect is far from the be all and end all of evolution and awareness.

Through the use of psychedelics it is quite possible our sub conscious and intuition sometimes presents itself through a plant spirit who is given access to our memories and sense of self when we ingest it. The plant spirit articulates a "logical" version of irrational intuition through its anthropomorphism and so since these spirits reside within the group mind beyond our egos it is possible to receive previously unknown information through communication with them. The role of the plant spirit is to act as a guide and filter of the unconscious, working directly through language and at higher doses other senses as well. The plant spirit is able to see our minds and souls and so tailor its communication to the most effective form and give the most relevant information. Is the plant spirit a projection of your personal mind? Well yes probably, but so is everything else. Anyone who finds this totally unbelievable would do well to look into the experiences of DMT and Salvia, where whole worlds of alien entities can be visited and communicated with face to face. It is all too tempting for those who have never done much or any psychedelics to brush all experiences off as hallucinations, that anyone who believes it are people who have "taken too much" or gone nutty, but then this is a presumption and is unscientific. skepticism has its place but the kind of thinking that would deny things before they are investigated is the kind of thinking that would prevent the experience of any new truth that is astonishing enough.

Some people believe entheogens to be a spiritual short cut, I personally disagree, there are no short cuts to infinity. However entheogens are very useful catalysts in psychic analysis and the development of all faculties of introversion. The fact that someone could experience more divinity in a single LSD session (or similar tool) then in ten years of meditation is no doubt very important, but I think anyone looking for an easy way out will be most disappointed as entheogens will in fact show you just how long and arduous a journey you have, especially if you are the kind of person who wants to take the half asked, instant fix happy pill approach. Even after a very beneficial psychedelic experience it is crucial that follow up integration is pursued and applied otherwise you might as well never of taken it in the first place. Meditation allows for very deliberate and gradual growth, when you take entheogens you better be ready to potentially face all your demons in one day, if you are not ready you can come out worse than before. It should also be noted that psychedelics are not guaranteed to give anyone any kind of spiritual experience, in general the set and setting must be right and intention is very important. That is while psychedelics can raise your consciousness what will you be conscious of? What will you be doing and focusing your heightened consciousness on? A heightened consciousness focused on secular music or movies will not be conscious of spiritual things so much as if it were trying to focus on those things. Though as I found out with my first LSD trip, it is possible to have spiritual experiences while being an atheist in a terrible environment and not knowing about this potential in entheogens!

When one takes an entheogen as for example mushrooms, it is as if the thoughts in your mind become so much more profound and in such a complete way that it is almost like you are having multiple thoughts at once, though there is usually no extra words in the thought articulated. This is because entheogens can be used to raise the awareness of a person so that they are processing more than regular amounts of information, when a person takes LSD for example its like switching gears on a bike so that all the power is being driven from a smaller sprocket. Once you get going on a harder gear each cycle happens in a shorter distance and you an get much more power for each push of the pedal or turn of the sprocket. To put it another way the weight of the bike is divided among fewer teeth on the smaller sprockets and in this way each thought has more power or awareness behind it, thus allowing you to travel faster or cover more information in the same amount of words. This sprocket was always there we just weren't in that gear, and like riding a bike if you change gears to a harder setting starting on a hill (a bad state of mind) it can be very difficult. Also just jumping to that gear right from a complete stop and not gradually building speed can be very difficult to get going, or in a car it is hard on your transmission. You see so much deeper meaning and layers for each thought or turn of the sprocket and so tackling the more difficult confusing aspects of reality can be overwhelming without building up to it, such as can happen when smoking DMT and especially Salvia extract.

This mode of awareness can come on slow with LSD or many entheogens but it eventually becomes like large profound blocks of information in the form of only a few words. Blocks which were not only previously beyond words, but if you were to hear the same words before in your normal state of mind you wouldn't be able to appreciate as much meaning. As the trip builds, these blocks of information behind each thought grow in size until it can be very difficult to say anything at all as each thought has so much relevance that to make an effort to stop and speak seems ludicrous. Not only because of the effort required in the mechanics of speaking but because the meaning becomes more important and tangible than the words themselves. The world becomes permeated with salience and insight, you are opened up to patterns of reality which seem obvious in that state but which are ultimately untranslatable to normal consciousness. To interrupt the flow of thought, to try and communicate the true depth of the thought to someone else, especially if they aren't high generally becomes pretty pointless and would require so much prefacing and elaboration that by interrupting the train of thought you would miss out on unbelievable amounts of insight. Its hard to focus when you are being overwhelmed with overflowing unarticulated meaning, this is why some people seem spaced out when they are high, but it is not that they aren't paying attention, its that they are enthralled in their own insights. To someone who hasn't experienced this, someone on psychedelics can often look very stupid, this is not generally the case, it's just that the predominance of logic and ego become overcome by the intuitive and creative mind of which they are lower functions.

Our reason claims to be logical and objective which seems reasonable since we usually miss that bias or conflict of interest and so we believe it, especially since it helps us function in the world. But on psychedelics its clear these so called logical thoughts were born from far less constricting and limited sources, the imagination guided by our intuition. The intellect abstracts or encapsulate the essence of a thing but cannot abstract the totality of a thing since that would require endless detail. Logic would be relating different limited intellectual abstractions and this is where even more information is lost, but through entheogens we are able to see or fit more meaning or essence within the abstractions our mind creates. Various layers of information, allegory and metaphor naturally become articulated in ways that a more superficial state of mind cannot fully appreciate without careful in depth consideration. Someone not on entheogens may not recognize this, they often miss the totality of this in the statements of someone who is in this higher state of mind. By comparison the structure of everyday logic and personal dogma become our prisons and we are completely surrounded by it, in our rush to think we lose awareness of the essence of things and are cognisant of only abstractions. Anything which threatens the structure becomes a frightening enemy to the illusion of stability which we have created and maintained. The fact that psychedelics either open the door of the prison or in the more extreme cases bring the whole thing down is the main reason they are generally despised. Though a look through the larger human world history has shown that they have mostly been revered with the exception of recent western culture which does not place any value at all in freeing the mind, as the ego is thought to be the only thing that is important. Indeed for someone not thoroughly prepared, having your whole belief structure shown to be a shallow illusion can be extremely devastating which is why the utmost care is required. However this is not a reason for prohibition, especially when one considers that minimal to no physiological damage is created by the most used psychedelics. Indeed by making psychedelics illegal we set up a context where not only is misinformation spread, but very negative set and settings as well as intentions for people are created, not to mention questionable purity of the substances. This and more shows the laws do more damage than the drugs and that freedom of religion is itself a myth perpetuated by those with faith in the civil religion of the state.

The cultural viewpoint that psychedelics make a person worth locking up, that they are the same as crack and heroin can further alienate potentially productive citizens as well create the seed of fear leading to the notorious "bad trip." They say psychedelics are illegal to protect us, but if people weren't afraid of being arrested or getting in trouble with their family and or the rest of society and were given the opportunity to create suitable environments, the possibility of negative experience would be dramatically reduced. There is also the fact that legalization would set up an environment where Shaman type figures could guide new comers. If the the proper spiritual context was provided or even encouraged then society would finally find what it has been looking for, a source of newer more open and flexible structures of abstraction which could be created. But then this is why the government hates them as they do not support the impossible delusion of some eternal objectivity of complete infallibility, but instead create a structure constantly being rearranged to maximize usefulness in the current situation. This structure would be open to all, not limiting anyone and seen as a consensus project rather than an imposition which must be adhered to. A guide line of communal shelter where people are free to come and go rather than the prison which we are taught is all that is.

It is obvious to anyone who studies the effects of drug laws and who does not have a bias axe to grind or profit to be had that the drug laws do more damage then the drugs themselves, whether heroin or marijuana. Of course these drug laws make perfect sense when one realizes that it is not in any power structures interest to supply its populace with a means of seeing an outside context, or anything that stimulates thought aside from the goals of the hierarchy. Prohibition has proven over and over again to cause more harm than the drugs themselves, this is the position of doctors and many police officers, not to mention most drug users themselves.

There is no doubt that people interested in following an entheogenic spiritual path have lost their freedom of religion, like so many other rights which are laughable lies of the government those who are oppressed are left to just suck it up. It is inconceivable that the government does not know directly that most psychedelics are not physically harmful, to the point that some have no known lethal dose, you cannot even say that is true of water, a substance which people have overdosed on. Even if this wasn't true it is of course a blatant inconsistency with tobacco and alcohol or any number of prescription drugs. It is clear that the government has a political agenda when it comes to psychedelics and drugs as seen with the work done by the CIA in their MK ULTRA mind control program to determine the validity of brainwashing techniques. The science is clear as shown in the multitude of work done by respected psychiatrists who have conclusively proven the ability of entheogens to deal with various forms of addiction, depression or terminal patients scared of death, as well as causing scientifically repeatable and consistent mystical experiences. This is not to even mention the vast number of medical and industrial uses for marijuana, because of all this it is naive to think that the government is not aware of the potential positive uses of entheogens and has chosen to ignore the data for their own reasons.

One is left only with the conclusion that they do not approve of the kinds of changes which can occur when properly used by someone. They do not approve of the realizations that occur on entheogens or ramifications of people having their own connection to a spiritual dimension, of being able to heal themselves psychologically from the damage created by society. If people were committed to altruistic actions and stopped being motivated by individual greed and started caring about the environment, then how would institutions based on greed and autocracy maintain their power over the masses? This war on drugs is largely popularized and justified by Christian notions of "family values" which is a clear attempt to force religious bigotry on other people masked under a thin veneer of public health. The simple fact is that if you are the kind of person who wants to get in to heroin, meth or crack, you are the type of person who doesn't give a flying fuck if it is illegal or not and putting depressed addicts in to prison (where drugs are quite available) is about the worst way conceivable to get them to want to clean up. To me the flawed logic of the drug war, especially against marijuana is about the same as if I were to organize public bible burnings in an attempt to wipe out Satanism, I could rationalize that if there was no Christianity then there would be no Satanists, and Satanists are so evil that we have to wipe them out. If a person abuses entheogens they are kind of like psychedelic Satanists, however this logic would not fly with many people when applied to Christians and yet often these same people heartily endorse the drug laws. There are people who abuse drugs, who are what sincere entheogenic users might consider to be sacrilegious, but this is largely due to the total annihilation of Shamanic and Pagan knowledge by Christianity, the lack of real drug education and the criminal culture created by prohibition. Then there is the fact we live in an incredibly depressing society ruled by unnatural hierarchies and which encourages escapism and self indulgence as oppose to solving the cause of your problems. Anything that raises consciousness is the enemy of the state, anything that makes people more aware of the environmental consequences of their actions, and more devoted to loving each other is absolutely the enemy of the state. To think that a state of mind is illegal, is essentially saying that thoughts, feelings, and sensations are illegal, to think that a life form as is the case with certain plants is illegal, that a life could be illegal is pure insanity. When we consider that DMT occurs in our brains naturally, in every lawmaker and enforcer and is illegal we cannot escape the fact that we are ruled by hypocritical and deranged morons, but the only way for them to justify their insane actions is with more insanity. Even if you are no Anarchist the war on drugs is perhaps the most blatant disregard for our supposed constitutional human rights taking place against the western world, to be locked away for possession of a plant is unjustifiable to anyone with common sense and who has done the slightest research into the matter. This is especially true in regards to the lie they call "freedom of religion" and even just talking about the possibility of religious use of entheogens is likely to open yourself up to all kinds of prejudices. In terms of understanding the natural world we are in many ways in the very darkest of dark ages, we have not only lost our best connection to nature, we have made it illegal, made whole states of mind illegal, if humanity is to ever have freedom of thought or freedom at all, this must change.

I wrote the following on one of my first LSD trips, it is somewhat confusing even to me, seemingly unconnected topics dancing around and yet some how it all fits together, it is a good example of what I mean by thought sprockets, which is itself an idea that occurred to me on mushrooms as I could see my thoughts as rounded fractal patterns. I include it here because it shows me Chaos is simply order too complex to perceive, but that doesn't mean there is no meaning to it.

Well here I am sitting in the woods on a weirdness, everything is making sense yet simultaneously unfolding into unknown regions so that I might learn something. Why have I come out here? Is this all just a distraction from my daily life? Will I be a better person by the end of it? Even if I am, the world will be unchanged, but I guess I can try and grow enough so that it wont bother me anymore. (or even better so that I grow till I can do something about it) Coalescing waves of euphoria cycling like the tide to wash the beach and feed the barnacles. Perfectly cliché quintessential meaning repeating to drill the point in.. YOU WERE ALWAYS CONTENT YOU FOOL!! You just tricked yourself into believing otherwise for the joy of overcoming an obstacle in the illusion of disharmony.

One of the most interesting things about the ecstatic state is that in such a state seemingly normal and unimpressive thoughts and observations can apparently be pretty meaningful under "regular" conditions. Intuitive articulation can mean anything to anyone but then what cant? Another interesting thing is that the mundane things of a regular state seem very significant in an ecstatic state. There is as much meaning condensed into a leaf as all the works of Shakespeare, the bible and much more combined. (for example biology, chemistry particle physics, inspirations for philosophies such as this and art as well as much more) If anyone other than me should ever read this I would really wonder just how much sense this could mean to anyone other than myself. The feeling behind thoughts is what I am trying to put to words. I have no reference for myself, I don't know if I look like some vain freak rambling on in a book which almost certainly won't be read by anyone, especially within my life time. I wonder if my thoughts or opinions have any relevance at all or am I just fooling myself? Does the insecure question itself even have any value? What is value? What is quality? I suppose these questions are at the very core of humanity. I wonder how normal I am and all these thoughts that I have. For all I know everyone else in the world has a book just like this one and has written down word for word all of my thoughts. Just how unique is everything? Well infinitely it seems. . . If everything has been done before then I suppose the only quality, value or relevance in this book or experiences only matters to me in the end. How good do I think I am writing? Good enough to speak some garbled English. Hah, I am pretty sure of that much at least, however I do like to prove everything to be wrong. This book is after all (what a weird phrase "after all" is) a book of my life and my philosophies and so after all I am the only real critic of my work. After, all, I can be pretty hard on myself, I think... I think I probably take myself too seriously, at least for my age if not indefinitely, but then the serious side of myself insists on being productive in some form or another, and that it's not so important what you do as long as you do it as well as you can, with what you can. And after all...

I want to write the best book I can to try and encapsulate some of my feeling into words, because the person known as Wretch, whoever that is, wanted to have some permanent physical mark as to what his thoughts were, narcissistic though it may be, perhaps it will be a good book to read in my next life so I can catch up where I left off and avoid making all the same mistakes over again. Though I suppose the most self-romantic part of all this is that no one will ever read or understand who I was or am from it, and that the whole point was to look beyond the meaning that words can give. This is where all human minds are more than extremely inadequate, it's not just my own lacking lexicon, even to claim that I am a humble servant is nothing more than ego-maniacal blasphemy. I curse my human weaknesses of even daring to comprehend that I am worthy of being in comparison with the all's unlimited meaning. It is after all a pretty tall order to fill, which human hands are not capable of really doing, otherwise they would cease being human. To try and articulate the divine's creation and so dilute it with the distilled honour of my purest intention is pointless, but the impermanence of all things suggests decomposition.

Attaching meaning to silly things such as ideologies is what's gotten the world to the place that it is, which is dreadfully serious to so many people. I am writing things in this book that could change the world. The very act of reading this page being history, a revolution in the ever-unfolding stream of the human drama, do not mistake this for delusions of grandeur, even if it accomplishes nothing it is part of time and so I did something, whatever that is. Pretty words are nothing more than that to most people and words without action fade to nothing, I strongly question if words can ever impact any permanent meaning. Even the Buddhist doctrines of impermanence will one day be forgotten and all books of written meaning will be burned away by barbarians claiming they have the monopoly on enlightenment. People are too unwilling to put any real thought into their existence and I recognize that

I'm weird, but the superficial existence of most people is just as ridiculous to me, so much so I wonder if I'm a good person, or have any value at all because I try to avoid it.

The suburbs of humanity are conformist factories carved into the immaculate perfection of the divines wilderness. I must love myself because there is no one else to love. Seeming stupidity often masks underlying genius. Forbidden ideas or taboos are so obviously ridiculous to me I fail to even conceive of an argument for why such things exist. I should be naked on the streets yelling at everyone, I see how absurd they all are for wanting to throw me away for even daring to think of such an idea. Everything that can exist is in the divine's creation and is inherently natural, but I am a recluse, a social deviant in these times, simply for wanting a raw unfiltered reality. Wanting nothing more then for a love of all things, that being of the highest treason in this world. To simply speak ones own mind without having to worry about how others perceive you is freedom in its purest form. I wonder why no one can see as I do. I feel like a conduit of meaning.. like my in-spirit-ation comes not from me. I can sense we all want the same things, most often it seems we all want someone to lead us out of the darkest wilderness imaginable. There is an underlying form to all of reality which is the same from all possible perspectives, varying subjective views equalling objective flux. I could write out all the mysteries of the universe but no one would care to read it, out of fear of desperately holding onto old preconceptions on how things are. We as a species are killing each other for really no reason at all, but I suppose reason has nothing to do with it. Humanity is the manifestation of "god's" insanity?

I must be one self absorbed prick sometimes, I just wish people would honestly tell me what they think of me, but of all these seemingly small things, to have a conversation with someone and to ask out right for them to describe themselves, or for them to describe how they saw me, apparently this is too much to ask from other people. I guess I am just too up front for most people, to crude, and to blunt. Which I must admit I don't have much of a mind for subtleties or "tact." I think the important things are important and am very up front about it, but I should try and be more aware of people I guess, and their strange social nuances and customs. I wonder most of all, just who am I? And does anyone honestly know who they are? I know it's a mistake to look to define your self or self worth from other people, but still perhaps there is some value in outside perspective, things you may of missed otherwise. I suppose though that knowing that they don't know themselves, it would be pretty silly of me to ask them to explain themselves, or to explain me for that matter. It would be wrong of me to judge them because they cant articulate their feelings, still it is annoying to see that most people do not even try.

We are all prisoners here on this Earth, and we are all each others jailers. Only humans could take the boundless potential of possibilities and create a world such as this. The gates of heaven are in place to protect from us! Only humans could take something as simple as loving each other and then turn it into a competition and conflict. We are in Eden now we just don't recognize it because there's so much shit everywhere, stuck in this hell that we've created as the fruits of our materialism. Its hard to see paradise when your staring at a fucking television, and here we are voluntarily filling our own heads with lies and bullshit as a means of escaping our own fear. The nice man in the suit will tell you who to hate, then pat you on the back and with an encouraging smile assure you you're fighting for freedom. Our freedom to choose how everyone else lives. Shoot first and no one will be around to ask questions. We need bigger cars!! Bigger houses! With three different platforms stacked up so that we can have three different shades of green on three different lawns! More! More! More! Lies! Lies! Lies!

Desensitize the masses with violent media, rest assured the world is more horrible than you can imagine, and always have no doubt that there is nothing you can do... but support us we are in control. We control the majority by creating the image that the majority even really has a sense of itself as one localized infallible morality. Just keep telling them this is the way it is and everyone is so desperate for some reality, some truth.. some consensus of sanity that they just go along because they don't know what else to do. If you start to doubt the image you are presented with, why then you're whole fucking reality could fall apart, and that would be scary! The human race is to oblivion, we are about to smack right into a concrete wall at 500 miles an hour. There is no armour, there is nothing to cushion the blow. The western world wants war and hell and we are all going to get it. All the while millions of arm chair politicians will sit obediently waiting for the news... Only when the war is brought here will they understand just how wrong they were. Chemical diseases and literally all the worst things humanly possible. Fear has got us in its grip. Fear and nothing else, and like any scared wounded animal the U.S. is dangerous, beyond all past measure combined and cubed for fucks sake, but then maybe a little nuclear and biological annihilation is just what this planet needs. Out with the old and in with the new, the second dominant dynasty of Earth and we still haven't evolved much from mindless predators. Apes hitting each other over the head with tree branches because they are too bored and too stupid to think of anything better to do. Two apes hitting each other with clubs while spewing Shakespeare are still two apes. (I don't mean to insult apes however)

Us “humans” hate junkies and bums and all the loathsome trash of the world so much. They forget they're even human. The worst criminal junkies are humanity in its purest and rawest form, willing to kill for pleasure. Chemical emotions of synthetic happiness because the real world is just too fucked to handle, and so we choose to hate them and point the finger when they are the symptoms of our incredibly sick society, not the cause of the sickness. Obviously junkies do it to themselves but why would they be so eager if the world we've created is so wonderful? There is a growing gap between the middle and upper class. People have always been aware of the bullshit, but its piling up so high its piled right into our homes, our beds and even our tables, and the pigs just keep shovelling it into our mouths, its coming out our ears and we're choking on it. We are gasping for clean air out of this all consuming suffocating crap... pure and simple. Then we blame the most sickly if they happen to mess up the place a little.

We are no where as ingenious as our egos make us think, how could any ingenious species be at war with itself? Of course there is the divine genius but that is not the kind of genius that makes nuclear weapons and guns and big screen TVs. We as a race, not just our culture but all of humanity has to realize a number of things. First to try and escape and deny our atavism only manifests it in more destructive subconscious forms. We have to learn to embrace our crude and down right fragile sensitivities and accept a balance of the masculine and feminine. This is not just so in our patriarchal view of might making right, but in all aspects of life. Secondly our traditions and limited views as precious as they seem to us are exactly the past that's brought us to where we are now. We're all so caught up in all these labels and judgements that we've forgotten what platform we're judging the judgements from.

I wonder why I even bother to write, I don't know what I hope to accomplish. Even my skills at writing legibly are no doubt in serious question to any who try and read it. Might as well be a drunken madman for all this world knows and perhaps they are right, and that I am insane, that I desire unreasonable and unrealistic things. I know I am selfish and certainly too self important to understand where other people are coming from. Everyone is afraid, everyone's afraid of real honesty. A masochistic vessel filled with hate and sent out into the vacuum of space, I don't know how to see myself anymore and I certainly know no one else can tell me, or who would do so honestly if they could. Everyone has their own intentions at heart, if we are all one then perhaps altruism is an illusion of liquid chemicals melting to the harsh realities of concrete existence. We have an inescapable need to seek what is good for ourselves and so have created egotism. I myself am certainly not immune to it, but my intentions were never to create suffering, I don't mean to make myself look good or bad but just be as real as possible, in whatever manifestations that happens to occur. Expressions of emotions run deeper than words will ever do. I think actions speak louder than words. There are way too many words but not enough action, not to mention words can lie, a good deed done in silence only speaks truth. This is why words are so appealing, otherwise the fucking fascist pigs with their gestapo police, who just keep wearing different costumes would have been out of business a long time ago, because they are in the business of selling us bullshit.

Want to be free? DIY. The system is designed to manufacture bullshit. The mouth opens and plants and protein are taken in to manufacture one ever present thing uniting all humans.. Shit!! This is what our so called great civilizations has accumulated ? Its laughable. We are a pretty pathetic bunch of primordial trash. All we have accomplished with all our technology and progress is the further alienating of ourselves from our desires. We really are ironic creatures. It seems I was given a talent for philosophy as well as for head butting things, surely the universal mind has an ironic sense of humour. Most of us just seem to of been left out of the joke. I feel I have written what we all know within ourselves and it is only fear that will ever try and convince us otherwise..

The details are in the vagueness and ambiguity, the real question is how can atheism exist at all? Why does the divine go to all the trouble of creating this physical universe with all its history of time to create doubters? It is so great and boundless perhaps it wants to marvel at its own extensions of self in a scientific perspective, to experience that which it seemingly isn't. Free will can lead down some strange avenues for an all powerful being. Us modern day maniacs judge the spiritual as seeing things that don't exist, that we are delusional and that we are just believing out of desperation, it really is a miracle that such people could exist at all, though no doubt such an assumption is all too often true. However all existence is self evident miraculousness witnessing itself. Perfection even in the creamiest bullshit. Things may look bad now and we may certainly bring ourselves to perhaps merciful self destruction, but it will still have served some importance to the divine if it has happened, since we are it, then it must have importance.

What is the purpose of an atheistic and literally "Satanic" culture (the best example being "Christians") mocking the very fundamentals of the divines truth beyond time? This is beyond any imaginary rights given to us by our governments. According to their own metaphysical trap of a book called the bible, the adversary was given dominion over this world and so it has been for as long as humanity can remember. I realize how completely insane I must sound, especially since I don't even believe in the devil, still he is a useful symbol. Me and my hubris to think I know the divines will at all. Continuous purification to the divines truth is my only goal. This modern day is the result of the "Satan's" unmatched horror and yet Christians who are demonstrably some of the worst people think they are free from what their own religion says, that Satan rules them.

This world is destroying itself in the name of love itself, we're all just arguing on how to best express it. The absurdity of humanity is self evident, and yet ignorance roams wild for all to see. Everyone is too caught up with hiding a naked child in their own sense of shame and pain, the poor thing hasn't even been given the chance to mature and be natural in the world. Just eating, sleeping, fucking and shitting. We are joy machines for the experience of the divine itself, each allowed to determine for ourselves what is good, even if we decide what is good, is to be told what is good. We have the right to happiness as it is our inescapable destiny despite all our fears and convictions. Those limitations will be mercilessly obliterated from all memory so that no fear exists ever again. Though it never really did exist in the first place, fear is a creation of something which doesn't exist which is capable of keeping the game of eternal fishing going. This can delude us from the truth that there is a nothing but truth, nothing else is possible. We are "god" itself and our fear is the divines fear. Nothing apart from ourselves can save us, but in truth there is nothing to save us from, except ourselves. This is the madness of mankind.

It seems to me if the divine was capable of fear, it is a fear of eternal loneliness, and so through this fear has created all humanity. But trying to abandon this loneliness has only created destruction and a further blossoming of all our own fear, self hatred, and self pity, at least as it exists generally within this world, but then maybe this world is how the divine is facing all its problems. It's amazing how many things are so obviously wrong but are surprisingly seductive, especially in a society of depravity and shallow desires such as this. People are desperate for unconditional love, they know they haven't found it in all there hedonistic attempts. It is but an impression of the divine trying to capture itself like hands grasping at the air trying to reach the heavens, as if actually expecting to find something to hold on to, but all the while always being in contact with it, breathing it in as its very life depends on it. There is no more divinity in thin air than anywhere else, there can be no more love when all is love.

The divine is one and it is everything, and to fear anything at all within its creation is to fear the divine itself, I see "know" wisdom in this, only ignorance. This is the philosophers stone, the bedrock or foundation for which all just knowledge springs forth. It is the seed of the tree of consciousness manifested as the fruit giving knowledge of good and evil. To know all, come from the only possible source which is the divine. It is to realize the ultimate cosmic joke that it always has the intention of love, but some kind of ignorance perpetuated by the fear caused by this same ignorance has created the problems of the world. People we hate are our own problems and will never go away until we learn to deal with them, and the only way that can happen is with open and above all, honest conversation, not with an intention to change or impress them, but to understand one another. It must be honest if for no other reason then it is good to be good. As simple as this is, fear has created unlimited means to suggest this impossible. In this way we can safely discern that fear is in a sense a self perpetuating entity, working to keep justifying its existence when it really has none. We've created our fears for the fun of facing them, the world is a horror movie. So now when the eyes of truth looks back at this it can seem very ugly and depressing, this idea of self perpetuating fear itself can be scary, but this perception is nothing but another fear to be faced and embraced.

To not embrace everything in the divines creation, especially fear is to be at war with the entire universe. A universe at war with itself will never solve anything and both sides of all ideologies are meaningless unless one thing is to be expressed, only one thing and that is pure love. Any ideology which goes to war for any reason is wrong. (I do not define self defence as engaging in war) This is self evident, but many things are apparent in this world and yet go so unnoticed or at best are not acted upon, after all there is money to be made and principles will bend for a price. I have no idea how I can best try and help this world. I m not even sure how I can stay in it personified as this Wretch, but I think self exploration is the only hope of finding out. To face head on whatever demons I have created, maybe I can sort it out through writing and learn who I am through it, as a means of exploring myself and all humanity, so that even if I cant fix things totally, I can maybe help some individuals and let them learn from my mistakes. Maybe I can make them so sick of self absorbed behaviour it will leave them all together.

Last night on acid I saw a bunch of faces which were mostly eyes and they were all looking at each other and me simultaneously and all I could do was look back. It seemed metaphorical to me as many LSD hallucinations are in some way, of the concept of the objective underlying form, which is the same from whatever viewpoint you have. All parts of the universe are conscious, I think this is why I see faces so often when I trip out, all things are watching each other, experiencing each other, self referencing consciousness, masks with no one looking through the eye holes, or only one person looking through all of them. I also saw a weird sea shell shaped creature smiling up at me from the foam of my piss in the toilet, that however was just funny.

The Reign Of Fear

Skulking through the jumbled time soup is dread.
Of nefarious and sinister intentions is this self perpetuating misery mutating, adapting to the most sublime environments.
Hatred through perceived separateness resulting from voluntary amnesia.
Procrastination to divinity as a single moments realization hurls one to the highest stratas of perspective possible.
Everyone it seems is waiting for some magickal phrase which doesn't exist to set them free and destroy all doubt.
Just a simple sentence to impart all universal truths.
A few miraculous symbols of infinite meaning.
Oop Aak Eegak, Jwo Brop Trop
A lack of faith exists because a faith that things will always be as the are.
The proclivity for wilful ignorance is the result of a deeper ignorance
And the dream fish can show you but its something in us all.
All the scared people wait for someone to show them how to think for themselves, with wretched frustration at their own incompetence.
The strength to endure this adventure is found when you see you created all adversities.
And all their troubled hatred, of all the them and us's flows down the drain in the swirling suction of the whizzing whirlpool.
The final truth when seen for itself is recognizable to all.
And the ties that bind us to our knees, which pull at us in the tug of war, will all give way as soon as we try to stand up...
Together.
All moving in one direction never severing our connection, forever as a universe united.

Chapter 4 – Temple

I have been living in the city for some time now, it is really interesting, I feel like I am on safari studying animals or something, but then sociology or anthropology is studying animals. I have been learning a lot, seeing a lot of synchronicity, especially since I began practising meditation and some basic Occult rituals. This has been kind of difficult living where I do, lots of drunk punks coming around and stuff, I have been partying as well, though I can see that I will grow out of it. There is a saying in the Pagan community, about people who hide their beliefs being “in the broom closet” and I am definitely in there. I am all for being real, but nobody really even cares to talk about this kind of thing, just because I won't be burned at the stake doesn't mean I will be understood or taken seriously, besides I am not trying to convert anyone. As an individual I find no “truth” in the group, when I am alone I find myself different, almost in the sense that I have no reference to my thoughts and action, no reference to who I am as a person, I see myself without any depth. When I am around people I see nothing but what I don't want to be. Sometimes when I am drunk I can be overly friendly, I suppose lots of people are like this but it is getting to the point where people think I am weak, I have noticed that as I become nicer, the more I care about other people, the more unreal I seem to other people. I suppose in the world we live in after a certain point of niceness in anyone it stops seeming genuine and might even look sycophantic, which is pretty discouraging for someone who is genuinely trying to do good, but then when the world is filled with liars and so who would believe someone who is actually telling the truth? This is probably even more confusing for me and others because I am generally pretty withdrawn when sober, even angry a lot of the time, I guess my shifting personality makes me hard to figure out as a person, especially if I blurt out something about ancient philosophy. I also often have the urge to headbutt and or bite people and things... if only I could learn to projectile vomit on command, this level of contradiction is a bit much for many people. As depressing as this can get, I know that it is all part of the divine and myself learning about itself through different perspectives. It seems I am destined like many people to feel like this my whole life, however I realize that this is only because of my current programmed mindset.

I have been the clown and felt quite accepted for most of my life, but lately it really has been getting old in many ways. I have no interest in most people and its getting harder and harder to amuse myself even with drugs (entheogens are not for amusement) and alcohol. Unlike some people I never did any research into what I thought a punk should be, I love the music but I never looked into obscure bands for the sake of obscurity, I never dressed in a way that wasn't based on my own taste, I just happened to like that style of clothes, to mosh and smash things and I did enjoy shocking people but that was as close as I got to shaping my actions to suit other people, unless you count the little experience I have with activism. The seemingly endless game of trying to exercise wit, making fun of friends and having them try to joke back is getting pretty boring, I just feel like there are more important things than always trying to be funny. I have been popular within the punk community but it can be really creepy to see people imitating you, or making assumptions about you based on gossip and reputation, no doubt high school is fucked for most people but for me it was just as weird being well liked. Against everything I thought punk was about, some punks definitely try to climb a hierarchy and take over the pyramid, but I have no desire to be like some scuzzy emperor, sitting on a throne in his court of freaks, I don't want to be better than anyone, as we are all one its fundamentally impossible. I want us all to be independent, amazing, filled with fires of passion and initiating revolution, and so I don't want to waste my time butting heads with other kids like a bunch of wannabe alphas who are just horny and trying to stake out their territory. Surely other people had a harder time in high school, but that all changed after my first acid trip, it is possible to be too weird for those who normally think of themselves as freaks.

Being impulsive, truly trying to find what I really want or who I really am is different when I have no concern for money, I learned long ago trying to manipulate people into liking me wasn't as effective as just being myself, but now being myself means I am not that comfortable being liked by many people. Now I can like punkers completely for who they are, but I cannot say it is all that I am anymore, I can say I should just be me and show my spiritual side, say fuck it to anyone who doesn't like it, but then I can't even really talk about it to anyone in any way that is convincing. So I can't really blame them for not understanding, not liking it, who wants to be told that they are not their ego? That the world they think is so important is ultimately an illusion? That they don't even know what reality is? This is not something that will be believable, or at least understandable to anyone who hasn't experienced it and so I am still real, I just don't talk about everything with everyone, but then who does? Being real doesn't mean boring people with information they don't care about, that is not my real intention, to convert anyone, so I am happy to stick to what is pertinent in the situation. Hippie culture has some spiritual people in it, but in my experience they are generally way too shallow in their approach and way too easily offended, they claim to be loving, to think positively, but they reject anything that isn't part of their New Age cultural ideas of "love." I still like to party, but its not what I want my life to be based around, I just want more to life then finding bits of culture which will make me seem important to lots of different people.

Each person I meet offers a reflection of me and I give them a reflection of themselves, I don't mean conformity, I mean our own views of the world shape how we see other people so more often than not, we see in others more of ourselves than we actually see of them. This is especially true as we are all one and each individual consciousness is the means through which the universal mind is self aware, although I see nothing that great generally, still I try not to judge too harshly. The all seeing eye sees from all eyes in existence, they allow us to view the world differently, not always in a good way. Still I must be tolerant to experience new things and fulfil my purpose in existence, I am forced to dance like a puppet perhaps for all eternity simply in different lives. This may sound pretty self centred, but really it is less selfish then doing this unconsciously, like most people in the world who then think themselves fit to judge everyone around them. At least I realize I am projecting on to other people, realize the current view from my body is delusional, most other people are in denial about that. How do my eyes view this aspect of reality? I am not sure, I might as well try to see it as a fun thing. With all these viewpoints on reality the all's omnipotence is acquired in infinity with the ever growing knowledge of existence, viewpoints watching viewpoints from various changing perspectives. This isolation I feel is caused by an ignorance of anything real in this world, clearly this can make it hard to have close relationships with people.

All I can do is learn more, but is ignorance bliss? Sometimes I am not sure if transcendence is possible for me or even if I really want to transcend. I think I would really just prefer to cease to exist when I die. Things were so much simpler as an atheist, considering immortality is much less comforting than believing I would die and that would be it. Is this just spiritual laziness? Just another product of my ignorance? Still I cant help but laugh now at how I, like many atheists thought all spiritual people believed what they do out of fear of death. Thinking I only had one life to live was exhilarating since it made me want to live life to the fullest each day, now I know there is no escape even with suicide. I suppose the real irony is I think I know what other people should do yet I also know from experience no one wants to hear it, being happy means ruthlessly confronting your pain and ignorance and so most people prefer to remain at some level of unhappiness because they think it is easier, safer, more familiar. There must be problems with the way I think, I know I must be wrong about some things but I don't know what. Its so hard to trust people, I want to open my mind completely but I know I cant exist within society if I do that. If society is filled with selfish liars then they will turn on whoever tells the truth, most of all they will turn on anyone who points out they all lie to themselves.

There is an unbelievable amount of hate in the world, so much that it is accepted far beyond any reason, hatred is tolerated but not the possession of certain plants and because of this people are dying in the streets. Junkies and whores, gangsters and capitalists, this is how many people of the twentieth century lived and it's showing little signs of ever improving in the twenty first. Possibly the biggest depravity and injustice is the bourgeois lifestyle of materialism and the cultural programming of TV. Apathy reigns supreme, a unanimous lethargy of total inactivity to anything truly productive. Economic "progress" is nothing but a joke. The morality of civilization has been plagued since the beginning of the monetary system at the very least. Besides maybe as a giant corporation, the global community has no real sense of itself, it often seems like I can only wait and see as society crumbles progressively, as we destroy all life on this planet and enslave each other in the name of personal freedom. All too often I want to live off somewhere on an island or off in the middle of no where and just live in safety off of the land. The only problems are a sense of obligation and responsibility in the world and the fact that I cant find anyone to do this with anyway, that it would only be a matter of time before the destruction of the environment reaches me, there is nowhere safe of this planet. I don't think its actually possible for me to live a normal life anymore, but being such a complete freak, even a functional and well liked freak can have an unfortunate side effect known as loneliness.

People in a way seem to want to be manipulated, the majority of people don't seem to want to think, which is not surprising since they are taught from an early age to suppress their humanity and just shut up and do as their told. While there are exceptions and people can change, we are trained to believe that we always have to wear a mask within society and that we are scum if we try to be different. It is this deep rooted flaw in most human minds that is the source of all our problems and misconceptions, since if we lie to ourselves we can never be truthful to anyone. Pretty well everyone is playing make believe that they don't play make believe with everyone else, they have been doing it for as long as they remember, almost continuously and much of the time they cannot even tell the difference anymore. When I meet someone these days too often it doesn't seem like I am really meeting them, I am only meeting the lies and stories they tell themselves and others that they are. If all humans come from Africa then there was a time we all shared the same culture, really all culture to come after that is just an elaboration, just a spiralling out of that original African Shamanistic culture, parents taught their children who taught their children and ideas passed and were created but were rooted in the teachings of the original ancestors. People repeat the stories of their lives, they tell them to different people, they wear the same kinds of clothes, like the same brands, do the same kinds of things but it is all just elaboration on their life and the story they tell themselves to make sense of their memories. Like hypnotized robots designed to repeat and create the new combinations of old elaborations which will present them with the illusion of their individuality, of their originality and they become so wrapped up in their own personal story they never think to learn about the world around them. To find out who you are it really helps to understand not only what you believe, but why you believe what you do and to do this we have to go back, get to the bottom of things, figure out how our elaboration, our amplification and dissection of the original culture got so messed up. If you can get back to that root then you can see where all forms of culture come together and if you can do that then you can really see which cultural elaborations are worth identifying with. Not all mutants have evolutionary advantages and maybe our culture has mutated into something that only has short term advantages, there is no doubt we can't carry on as we have been, so either we mutate into something happier, or we learn to live in a wasteland.

I have learned through observation how to manipulate people but I lament the fact that I am forced to either be alone or control my image as to how I am perceived. I guess I cant blame people for misunderstanding me, I just don't have a mind for pretence, I say and do what I want often at the expense of my social standing. Human interaction and reality itself has become very unreal to me and I often feel very cold. Not because I don't care about people but because I care so much that it causes problems and so I feel the need to protect myself. I have experienced things totally outside the context of everyday reality and so I have a point of view which reveals information that is not seen by people who have not had similar experiences. They all could experience that point of view if they were willing to take the medicine, but they aren't and so my views will often be misunderstood by those who don't have the same context, who don't see reality the same way or even try to find out what reality is. Despite my best intentions it seems I am unable to help anyone, at least within a personal context. I try to keep the mind set that anything is possible but sometimes I still have self doubt.

We all make our own models of reality, some are more complex than others but each is unique and needed in its own way. It is personal faith in ones own reality construct, or models of abstraction which is created and reinforced by our thoughts, emotions and experiences. This sounds deceptively simple but our reality constructs are often incredibly convoluted and contradictory. This same reality construct largely determines which opinions and thoughts we then have, which become our beliefs, which determine our actions, which limit our perspective, which create our personal view of reality, which then strengthens or weakens our belief in our reality construct. This cycle can make it very hard for anything too far outside the reality construct to penetrate our awareness and creates an awareness wrapped in an egocentric reinforcement of preconceptions. These reality constructs are to us apparently built upon the information we acquire through experience which we regard as true, which is defined by the reality construct and thoughts that we have, that is our presumptions which are based from our memories. From the different people we meet we gain understanding into new insights, the more alike two people are the more similar their reality constructs are. To be clear, this construct determines how you perceive everything that you experience and it controls your thoughts and thus your actions and your life, it is your story of abstractions, starting from your first thought, your first moment of "I am."

Your paradigm is made of memes and memes are the fundamental units of culture, the idea of a basic form of a quantitative measure of cultural expression. To put it another way a meme is information that is mimicked, or repeated from person to person, such as shaking hands, language, anything within societies that is a shared expression of some kind of idea. To put it yet another way, memes are to culture what genes are to biology, they evolve and compete, the prey on each other and society is the ecosystem, a persons memes are the cultural expressions they accept as valid for dealing with other peoples memes. Memetics is the study of memes and all information true or not is memetic, in that it is passed from human to human repeatedly and due to the infinite nature of reality, all information is also essentially a product of culture, in that the opposite statement can also be said to be true somewhere in reality, even if it is only in a parallel dimension. In this way memes are really a superficial materialist view of thought forms, ironically created by the atheist and biologist Richard Dawkins, but which was in fact discovered millennia before by mystics and elaborated far beyond what scientists today understand.

The more rigid your beliefs the less possible experiences you limit your self to, to be flexible to all possibilities, to fear nothing, that is the way to have the widest base foundation on your thought form structures. Without certain incredibly supportive thought form foundations, all progressive thoughts afterword will be meaningless and false. The more open and accepting, the more courageous the thought in regards to reality, the more enjoyable your experiences will be. Most people do not know what they really base their beliefs on, they falsely think they are objective, but if you have a guiding principle such as "love" "truth" "unity" or "perfection" which you hold as the ideal then you will naturally seek to integrate memes that are congruent with that into your reality construct. You will start to see your ideal everywhere if you set that intention, they are flexible and vague on purpose so that they can be applied to reality as a whole, which will then become like a big mystery story and everything you experience is a clue. Whatever idea you strive for will shape your reality construct, my ideal is to strive for the truth which is applicable in terms of unifying the infinite, and so I am led to recognize all kinds of things happy or sad, but according to my ability with some human idea of truth. We could also say that by having the intentions and thoughts to know truth or to live by Anarchist ideals I manifest it in my life and so the world, that since reality is in a universal mind, all information is memes inside that mind. This is expressed in my life as really just doing what I know to be right, not lying to myself in any way and acting with the best intentions possible, but also in my research and attempts to raise my consciousness through Occult practices.

Different religions use different symbols of personification to define reality constructs, science is another incredibly complex reality structure with all its subdivisions, it is experimentally based mythology which is an elaboration of mysticism. In some ways science is more tolerant and open minded, as the majority of science is based on theory supported by evidence and not faith, but in other ways it can be just as dogmatic and blind as any religion. All politics control information and the world, all are run on words and thoughts, letters and numbers. In the structure known as “cause and effect” it is most advantageous to direct your actions energy in the most all encompassing form possible. Always try to see the biggest picture you can. It is through words and symbols that the world has been created, all technology is the physical abstraction of an idea, all intentions are the result of thought and the struggles of the world have been the struggles of different schools of thought.

The Greek philosophers had their different schools of thought such as cynics, stoics and the Orphics and Pythagoreans, whom personally I find the most interesting. These reality constructs and many others have all contributed to my personal beliefs but as I attempt to see the thought form paradigm in its entirety, I cannot help but look past these, beyond the construct altogether. I make sure to be completely fluid and flexible, in the form of no form and thus I am able to examine any thought form from the inside out. Progressing on an endless exponential incline seen as a graphed line representing spiritual growth, the outer arm ever stretching outwards accelerating in acceleration forms a spiral, this abstraction is one way in which thought takes form. Eventually we can do without reality constructs all together and see things the way they truly are. As the spiral progresses outward the arms circumference gets larger and requires more energy to make another revolution, you have to spend energy to express energy and get the gears of the universal mind going. If you put enough single concentrated energy into a thought form it doesn't matter what it was, it would eventually come to exist within reality in accordance with how much energy you put into it. The foundations you set determine the structure you will build on top and so the actions and events that will transpire in your life, so take care to make sure you do not base your life on fearful things.

Archetypes as I see them could be viewed as the framework or metaphysical structure of the mind, or the architecture of the mind, they are according to some interpretations universal patterns of key concepts within humanity and exist throughout the collective unconscious. Archetypes are connected to memes in my view in that all memes are based off archetypes, they are the descendents of archetypes and the elaborations of their various aspects. An archetype is pretty much embedded into all humans whether they are aware of them or not, as they make up the various aspects of the mind, they shape various kinds of memes, though since memes are of cultural significance and are usually much more directly conscious to the individual, a meme is not necessarily part of everyone's mind. Memes could be categorized according to archetypes, archetypes are the framework of the mind, the blueprint where as memes are the building blocks and emotional attachment is the mortar that keeps it all together. You could say archetypes are the different roots of your reality construct and the memes are the different branches that grow out of it, or maybe that archetypes are the original memes and all the others are just different cross breeds or mutations.

If you were to try and visualize what your mind looks like then it may be seen as a jumbled framework, each beam being an archetype which then supports different kinds of memes and from which different sub archetypes are built off of. Archetypes can take different forms, such as various Earth goddesses or sky gods and this is the result of the memes which are built around it according to that individual, however we all have at least some vague concept of Earth and life and this is the archetype. If the physical world is really an illusion of the mind then these archetypes and memes in a sense are the true “physical” portion of the mind, not the brain. From the construction of this paradigm structure in most people a hierarchy of beliefs becomes apparent with varying levels of importance to the structure, at the bottom is the foundation from which all other beliefs are built upon. We may all have some indirect knowledge of the archetypes but through different memes we support the framework and see the archetypes differently depending on how we like to decorate our structures. This depends on what materials there are available, that is to say which memes we use in the construction. Memes can be seen as Tetris blocks interlocking, from which different perspectives are experienced and so are connected to the different emotional responses that we give out, with this image of keys I cant help but be reminded of neurotransmitters being plugged into our brain.

When different groups of memes are often found together they are called “memeplexes” and one example is a Christian, who once becoming Christian usually takes on a variety of Christian memes rather than only one such as liking Jesus, or only wearing a cross, there is an assortment of other memes that go with identifying as a Christian. For any given memeplex structure, there would often be a “keystone” or central meme such as money or “capital” being the keystone of the “capitalism” memeplex as it has many memes dependent on it, but is at least hopefully not the foundation stone of a persons whole paradigm. Different groups of memeplexes are built upon a persons foundational memes and as I suggested you should think about what your ideal principles are, because it might be based on something shallow. If you do not know what your core principles are then chances are it has something to do with ignorance. Your foundational memes are those which you base your identity on and so determine what kinds of memeplexes you can build up. While archetypes are common to all and may all be in your foundation, how you use them will be determined by how you build your foundation.

Close to my home is a cathedral and on the corner is a Masonic plaque on a big stone block and it says “Jesus Christ himself being the chief cornerstone” as the cornerstone is the primary meme or part of our foundation, it is the most load bearing thing in your whole paradigm, though as I will go in to later it may not be a meme at all. Now this Jesus example is certainly true for Christians and their belief in him seems to shape almost all their values, assuming that is they are “good” Christians. Most people use the more common and predominant memes for their paradigm foundations and from this foundation they acquire new memes which then make up their belief systems. Religion or science often does play the key role in peoples belief structures, other times it is capitalism or the pursuit of a sexy identity that can get a person laid. While some people may make Jesus their cornerstone, a paradigm is made up of many memeplexes and Christianity may not be so central to many Christians, even if they think it is, they may have built up memes around their cornerstone so that they mistake them for being the cornerstone. As morality and values are memes this means memes determine a persons core values and so actions and perspectives, so although it is easiest to change things on the roof of the reality construct, or places which are not load bearing, if we change our cornerstone or to a lesser degree a keystone, then the whole construct can come crashing down. If a person has memes such as “you shalt have no other god before me” then these commandments or operating systems will largely influence how a person chooses or rejects any new memes they come into contact with, the sum total of a persons memes and foundational memes being what I call their “paradigm.”

Some Masons may have realized the true significance of that plaque which does not mean Jesus Christ the person, but instead the “God Consciousness” of the “Logos” or whatever you want to call it, that is the linguistic faculties which are the source of the memes themselves. Unfortunately most people have something very mundane and superficial as their chief cornerstone, even people who call themselves Christians often value wealth, their own prejudice or wilful ignorance, their jobs, their priests interpretation of the bible or their country more than Jesus, and so they really base their lives around these things. Since we are all divine and I believe we ultimately have the same cornerstone we could say people base their lives on the memes that surround the ever present and true chief cornerstone and which block out any perception of it, especially if as a religion the memes are designed to appear as a cornerstone, it is still there buried away, out of sight, walled up under the ego's defences. There are other very fundamental and important foundation pieces but if your structure does not rest upon a cornerstone of the philosophers stone, then all structures are bound to crumble eventually, no matter how beautiful they may seem, this is just basic engineering, you need to have a stable foundation to build a structure. Probably everyone at one time or another has had their whole world torn down around them where more or less everything they believed turned out to be crap and nothing would be the same. Most people have some sort of structure remaining after things like a midlife crisis or being betrayed by your love ones, but there are events that can change everything, this is the feeling of having your soul crushed beneath the wreckage of your beliefs.

Psychedelics can act as a kind of memetic dynamite that dislodges paradigm systems and everything can come crumbling down and dealing with this can leave people totally incapable of knowing how to function, or how to pick up the pieces of their life. Seeing how ineffectual their past memes were for building a structure and discovering their real chief cornerstone can leave a person in a state where they don't know how to identify themselves, let alone relate to other people. At times having no other structure at all but their cornerstone, (at least during the peak experience of gnosis) if such people do not find the proper memes or mystical context that allow them to relate to the world after the experience, the memes which are useful for building off this block directly and keeping it an intrinsic part of the plan, then these people can become so depressed and so unable to function that they might even kill themselves. It is rare that some part of their structure is not still standing after the dynamite has been blown to expose the cornerstone, but that depends on how firm a foundation their paradigms were built on and so it is imperative that the person start building from that cornerstone or at least the foundation of their core principles intentionally keeping it in mind within the plans of the structure. This is of course much easier to deal with if you have spiritual intentions from the start and have done your research before you start using entheogens to get to the root of your mind.

With the death and rebirth experience that is possible through psychedelics or entheogens, a person is plunged head first into what the Alchemists called the “negredo” stage, or the blackening, the burning away of all memes or beliefs and actions which are not conducive to a structure built upon the philosophers stone. This is also called “putrefaction” in Alchemy and as the imagery implies, it is often not a very fun part of the process, learning all the erroneous crap that you had believed, all the memes you accepted which were based in ignorance and seeing them rot away into filth and muck which you realize you are then covered in. When this is not done, and when people build off in random directions from unstable foundations within the shifting sands, perhaps trying to build the highest structure in some vain attempt to create the most impressive ego, they can come to all kinds of horrid conclusions about life and how to treat people, all kinds of insanity can be justified with these chains of reasoning.

Psychedelic psychological programming is a very real thing and we can if we know what we are doing gain access to the chief cornerstone and surgically remove unsafe and unstable portions of the larger structure. We can remodel our mind and build something that keeps in line with our true values. Since psychedelics and Occult/Shamanic techniques have this ability they are seen as dangerous to the state paradigm and they are dangerous in that anyone who has the symbolic tools to properly construct their paradigm and to get access to the chief cornerstone will dismantle the state structure and stop supporting the kinds of things that allow it to manifest here on Earth. I completely believe that people who have real access to spiritual awareness will create a paradigm that is friendly to Anarchism, though they may not use that word or meme, it is actually the only social structure that can be based on a truthful cornerstone. Anarchism will give the best foundation to a solid sustainable and healthy Earth and so those who seek out such tools are considered “dangerous” to society. This isn't to say Anarchists should go on a spiritual crusade or that they get to act like they are better than everyone, you can be a political materialist Anarchist without the spiritual foundation, but what is most important to keep in mind is that just because the masses are not aware, does not mean they are any less than us. Elitism, even if it is based on other peoples constructs is a very non Anarchist thing to do, which is why a spiritually aware person does not fall into the religious trap of imposing beliefs. I am hesitant to link Anarchism too much with spirituality here as some could miss the point and see it as a justification of a call to arms against those who build differently, we aren't trying to kill anyone or look down on anyone, just to get them building consciously and safely from their own chief cornerstone.

Those Occultists who do not build Anarchy into their paradigm ignore their unity with others and so through hierarchy deny their spiritual cornerstone, they do this through their denial of their responsibility to the other living things around them and which are unified with them, something which can lead them to build in directions we might label “black magick.” If people can build from a foundation of Anarchy and hopefully the cornerstone of divine awareness then there are many many different memes for people to decide for themselves which to build for themselves. This will allow a huge diversity of structures but at the same time they will be unified by the true safety of Anarchy, there will not be anymore structures collapsing into on another and taking each other down, preying on each other like vampires.

Memetic ecosystems and evolution often encourage virulence and violent memes, these are the most robust mental prisons, with strong emotional feeding apparatus's, these are the memes of ideologues, those who use them have lost all sight of their cornerstone but in fact believe themselves infallible. Because we have such a variety of memes and people who have shoddy architecture skills, all kinds of different structures which hide the true foundation, we often see each other and are disgusted or at the very least have complete misunderstanding of each other. What is self evident truth to some is completely absurd to others. This is because we have built our whole lives around certain foundation points and we may not even be aware what we base our lives around, or how much things like capitalism, sycophancy, conformity or whatever is actually shaping our lives. So when someone criticizes some higher portion of our structure, such as a particular memeplex and then debate ensues about who is right, generally neither person can see the underlying factors or context to which everything is shaped from. All they can see is a meme here and a meme there and they do not understand how that meme was chosen or why and most people do not know themselves well enough to give very good reasons for how their structure was built. For the most part construction was done haphazardly and unconsciously with whatever memes happen to come along that was popular among the people who were around the person. This is especially true since most people have never even heard of memes and so without the meme of memetics they are more or less completely unaware of how they formed their beliefs.

Through cultural indoctrination, such as through school and the media children are surrounded by predatory memes which will destroy their ability to think critically or anything close to objectively about the world they live in. They are conned into taking in certain memes which seem innocent enough by themselves, but will then later open the way for vast memeplexes to form in the paradigm that are often not what they would want if they were given a wider range of choice from the start, or able to think about it outside the cultural bias they have been raised into. The state memes are among the most virulent, especially when combined with religion and these memes essentially hijack and control a persons mind so that they come to accept the dominant culture which they find themselves in. Without direct experience of a new contrary reality, any memes which are not in line with those mainstream foundation memes will almost always be dismissed or even hated whether or not there is factual validity for the emotional response. Once the foundation has been laid in childhood, any really challenging new memes will cause so much emotional disturbance through the required paradigm remodelling that they are quickly rejected. For example few people want to be an Anarchist despite the facts about government tyranny since truly living an Anarchist life requires a rejection of mainstream memes and much of the short term emotional ego gratification that comes with consumerism, which helps to quickly cement the memetic blocks into a firm value system based around attaining personal wealth and power. This is hammered into kids at a young age to want things they don't have, that through work mommy and daddy can get really nice presents for you at Christmas and if you want to be able to get toys when you are older you have to accept the school memes so that you too can work and help the government spread "freedom" across the world. Through these means they coerce us to enter in to the "society of the spectacle" looking at the world through a narrow view which is based around entertainment and escapism or "bread and circus's."

Once a person starts basing their emotional gratification around the idea of consumption then it can be very hard to get them to look away from the spectacle which is so comforting. Providing them with Anarchist factoids will often only make them want to escape more, to avoid the intellectual pursuits they find boring and horrifying. Through entheogens they will often see the memes for what they are, whether or not it is emotionally gratifying, at a strong enough dose they can like me even see the cornerstone. It is right after these experiences that a person will be more open to Anarchist and Occult memes since they will be looking for anything that can help them to understand that overwhelming experience and so I think it is through an alliance of entheogens, the Occult and Anarchism that a new and sane society can be created.

When you get two very different people together who each don't really know their own minds or structures or what is really underlying in their foundations, then they can get into all kinds of arguments and both will think they are totally justified in doing horrible things to the other. Instead of getting to the root of the problem, or getting to the bottom of things, that is the foundation of that particular wing of their structures, they get caught up discussing how wrong it is to have this or that meme. They get embroiled in all kinds of personal attacks and logical fallacies because they do not care about the truth, they do not care about being objective and are unable to because they do not even know what they base their opinions on, instead they care about sustaining and building up their ego structure. (not to mention they were probably never taught the memes of logic in school) These kinds of people only look at the top, or more superficial levels of the issue because neither understands what beliefs they had formed long ago which led them to come to their conclusions. Since discussion is pretty well always in terms of language memes or "words," then without a firm grasp of the principles of grammar, logic, and rhetoric and how they work together, (which they are generally not taught in school) people will often get horribly tangled in their own thoughts and words, often relying on assumptions they shouldn't and definitions they don't really understand. The memeplex of language then, if not thoroughly understood can open up a person to be manipulated by those who do know and since language is so close to a persons foundation, it can be used to make a person accept all manner of terrible memes which then grow into memeplexes and all kinds of erroneous and hazardous beliefs and practices. One example being the common attitude that words are not memes but the realities they symbolize.

Pretty much everyone has some beliefs that are so deeply rooted that they stopped questioning its validity and do not even consider those foundational beliefs because they are to these people things that go without saying, they are taken for granted as true, but not everyone sees it that way. It is this tendency towards becoming a ideologue reactionary that holds back real progress in humanity and keeps us from facing uncomfortable truths about ourselves. So it is that a Christian fundamentalist can find all kinds of flaws in the beliefs of the Muslim fundamentalist, point out violence and narrow mindedness, intolerance etc and it never occurs to them that their religion is guilty of the same things. Likewise the Muslim fundamentalist is often doing the same thing and so both have facts with which to base their prejudice on, but both are severely bias and unaware of the true context, that fundamentalism and hierarchy are inherently violent and flawed. If Christians seem more "modern" today it is not because their religion is any more peace loving or any less authoritarian, but because of science and the rebels and activists who have dragged western civilization kicking and screaming out of the dark ages caused by the Christian religion. The whole debate of who started the fighting is irrelevant, my point is that since both kinds of people take certain things for granted, that they are in their own minds each absolutely right in their religious beliefs. They can move from there to eventually form the belief that its OK to kill people who don't share their beliefs and the validity of their religion never comes into question.

Another example of this would be creationists who demand that Genesis be taught in school, they wholeheartedly believe that evolution is wrong and some even think that it is a tool of the devil and so they do not see that by forcing kids to learn creationist theories they are being oppressive. In fact since they are building off such a shaky foundation they think they are saving souls from eternal hellfire and so are justified in doing whatever it takes to avoid that, they mean well but because they cant see any other way of building their structures, they cant accept that they don't know whats best for everyone. Never mind the fact that they seem to try to make it seem like its not so much a Christian thing, they just want the concept of Intelligent design in there, I don't suppose they would look too kindly on teachers telling the kids some people believe in the Greek, Norse or Egyptian creation stories, they assume that it must be the Genesis creation story that is taught. Christians would be quick to demand Pagan myths be taken out of school once kids started learning about Osiris and Dionysus and how completely unoriginal the meme of Jesus is, or that Genesis is no more believable than Pagan mythology.

Fundamentalists have such a narrow perspective of how other people see the world, and question their own views so little that they actually believe they are being oppressed when the government or someone else steps in and stops them from forcing their memes on others. This is because they feel their memes are being threatened and this brings up all kinds of emotional insecurities that their own structures may begin to falter, that the kids will believe scientists more than the priests. Or that perhaps since deep down they probably know it is a shaky belief structure, given an alternative view point their children will have the sense to see their religion is not right about everything, and once that line of questioning is opened up all kinds of alternative “Satanic” memes can get in. This meme of Satan and hell is among the most powerful ever devised to create authoritarian ideologue behaviour and keep the Christian memes from mutating, or evolving to ones not based on official church or biblical dogma. Since anything non Christian is by definition Satanic, for a Christian to let secularism, or any alternative have any importance in society is Satanic oppression and a tolerance of pure evil.

It doesn't matter if most of the kids don't want to learn Genesis, (even though its pretty hard to avoid hearing the story) the fact that Christianity is not forced on all children is seen as oppressive because schools dare to present a scientific alternative, they dare to expose kids to the fact most people in the world think differently than the fundamentalist Christian paradigm. When two opposing meme structures like this are faced against each other, both sides more often than not will not even consider the factors the led up to each side believing what they do. For example the Christians will not understand the theory of evolution and most scientists (and Christians) will not understand the spiritual traditions like the epic of Gilgamesh which created Genesis. Both sides will then not even really consider the later beliefs that come out of it and so each side sees a narrow view of the situation, which looks preposterous and which is mutually emotionally disturbing and it is this disturbance, this uneasy feeling that others do not see what seems obvious to you which leads to flawed debates and avoidance of the real issue. It is as if two physicists would argue about the answers to each others equations without actually looking at the formula used to come to that conclusion, so obviously this does not make for a reliable means of attaining the truth. Though its true in some cases even when it is followed to its root or formula it is actually preposterous, but then once you see how arbitrary most beliefs are in the memetic model, culture in general, scientific or not often seems pretty preposterous. It can take a long time to get to the foundation issues of certain questions, such as ontology and in many cases, if not all if you go to the foundation we are left with questions no one has the answer too and so each view point is ultimately a limited explanation of the unlimited, which is even more unsettling to people who want to cling to their beliefs. It is even harder for people to admit no one knows the answers to some questions like the origin of life, then it is to admit your opponent in the debate is right.

It is important to teach the flaws in evolution, even though it is a pretty well proven theory, showing the scientific and non faith based flaws of evolution is part of a good understanding for a scientific theory. It must be the responsibility of the parents and priests to teach their kids religion if the kids are willing, and they should all have enough trust in their religion that the truth will be made clear to the kids. If the kids are not willing to learn about the religion then that is forced indoctrination which is at least as bad as what happens at public schools, though ultimately worse, however both examples represent a kind of cultural violence which attempts to blind kids to the world and much of the information in it. If kids do not have some say in what they learn then humanity will eliminate all the potential for fresh perspectives on culture and we will always be stuck with the problems of the past. Teaching evolution to Christian kids may seem oppressive to their parents but that is because they do not recognize the subjective nature of their foundations and also because they don't seem to understand that school is (supposedly) about teaching kids what we know for sure and that any particular religion is not something that all people know for sure.

Science is the most reliable facts we yet know, Abrahamic religion is fundamentally faith based (as oppose to Occultism and entheogenic Shamanism which is experientially based) and should remain so and be seen for what it is and accepted or rejected according to the free will that the divine gave us and entrusted us with. It is indoctrination or the attempt to force infection of particular memes which cause oppression and science is the attempt to separate culture and memetic bias from fact and so long as it is not information tainted by capitalist or government agendas, it is generally not indoctrination but education. No doubt indoctrination is a large part of the education system and obviously the education system needs to be put in an Anarchist form which is aware of the power of memes and safe guards against indoctrination from people with private and hierarchical interests. However while teaching evolution to Christian kids may be confusing to them, teaching religion in schools is a clear violation of the separation of church and state and incredibly inappropriate to be taught to non Christian kids. The question of how to best educate kids is a big one and far beyond this book, but suffice to say we need to give kids tools so that they can consciously build their own paradigms which are in line with the best scientific knowledge available. If people want to be ignorant that should be their choice, they will probably come across the idea of evolution at some point in life, just as most come across the story of Genesis. However one cannot claim to be scientific if they reject science and if you do that then you cannot claim to have any serious love of objectivity or physical evidence. Religious indoctrination of kids is a real problem, but it is hardly Anarchist to say parents cannot teach their kids a religion, even if it is a warped system of mind control like Christianity, if the kid is willing it would be wrong to interfere. So in brief the answer is to create Anarchist forms of education like Montessori or any number of methods which people have developed that promote more community and a wider mixing of memes in general. Then people can be exposed to ideas outside their fundamentalist families and given the opportunity to make up their own mind's.

Since each person does not know all the other memes derived from research and experience that another person has used to build up their structure, if they disagree then they only see an unsafe prison that this person has built up around them. They may even have the good intentions of trying set the other person free but they do not realize that their structure is no less a prison, and no less artificially constructed. This is the cause of all kinds of misunderstandings and the lack of truly “constructive” criticism, two people could go on and on indefinitely, each proving their case logically, each argument being refuted forever because neither person has knowledge of the context in which the assertions are made. With each argument made the debater thinks perhaps now at last they will see and understand my point of view, only to have the other person come back at them with a counter argument which to them proves that the argument is false.

It is hard to say how much of a difference there is between facts and memes, most people are horrible about formal debate, caring more about winning the argument than getting to the truth, which they had decided upon before the debate even began. Even if a fact is a fact, a persons memetic paradigm will largely determine which facts are recognized from reality, that is what information is recognized from the experiment or sensory inputs, but also what context and implications will be perceived about the supposed facts. All words, all abstractions are memetic and so while an experiment might reveal a repeatable result, any articulation of the results is memetic, all possible ways of explaining the results are themselves memes and this can have much bigger implications then scientists would like to think. If you believe or have awareness that the physical world is an illusion then scientific facts about that illusion are often not really that impressive, because outside of some basic understanding in quantum physics, science lacks any context which goes beyond the physical. Even then an overall comprehension of multiple forms of science and how it all fits together is lacking in any single scientists paradigm.

The physical facts can be seen as memetically based (such as abstractions in a universal mind devoid of matter) but are at least based on observations about nature and so are more fundamental to the nature of reality and so provides a different context. If the physical world comes from the thought forms of the universal mind, then reality is memetic, but some memes which science finds seem to be closer to the foundations of the paradigm of the universal mind and so could be considered relatively factual. The assumptions, the axioms of science will determine what the scientist looks for and understands, what they can relate to, what they believe to already be true and in this interpretation an inherently limited viewpoint of that which is unlimited is created. The fact is that the word "fact" is a meme which itself will be defined differently by different people, if you define it as what science shows to be true than there are facts in the world, but that is because the process of science is creating a cultural framework to set out theories which meet its criteria. (If a meme is defined as a repeated human behaviour then a repeatable experiment is by definition a meme.) While teaching people facts about the illusionary physical world is not threatening to the underlying facts, imposing atheism is as bad as imposing religion, so is imposing the meme that scientists are infallible in their objectivity and that the institutions of science are not mired in the corruption of hierarchy, politics and capitalism. The meme that if science hasn't proven it yet then it is not "real" is itself very damaging, especially if you are trying to help scientists experiment on things they have no context for, it is not a whole lot different then saying that which isn't backed up by a literal interpretation of the bible isn't true, both are finite in their scope and so cannot contain all truth.

It is very difficult due to time constraints (generally) for most people to abandon long held assumptions which they have become so emotionally accustomed to, assumptions which are opinions rather than factual and so pretty well all facts brought up in an argument are coloured by the memetic context of the individuals belief system and personal values. A person's memetic paradigm fundamentally provides a view point which ignores the relationships of the facts to other points of view or memetic contexts, if it did not do this then those contrary memetic contexts would be accepted into the paradigm. Logic attempts to deal only with facts, but the way an argument is made, or which argument is chosen with such facts are influenced by a persons memes, which will then limit awareness of the other ways the facts could be interpreted, or how an argument's validity is determined. The word "fact" is itself a meme and so it is subjective what a fact is or isn't, a subjectivity which will be coloured by a persons paradigm and will determine a lot of what a person considers to be subjective or objective. A person's memetic bias will also largely determine the kind of research and interests a person has and so not only can this cause "confirmation bias," it will also determine the kinds of facts they can bring up in a debate. If the two people have different enough sources of information, they may even both be strictly factual, but not believe each other because they do not trust each others sources or know how the facts are reconciled into a unifying truth. A scientists may have facts, but know nothing of epistemology and so could have those "facts" challenged by a philosopher, or perhaps a neurologist.

Science does attempt to get around this problem and it succeeds in many areas but it is still prone to memetic bias, especially when funding comes from governments and corporations. There is also the scientific assumption (which is a meme) that everything that exists can be measured, or that certain measures of physics are unchanging, or that if science hasn't come up with an experiment or a way to measure it yet then it must not exist. There are more problems with the assumptions of science's objectivity but I will go into that later, the main thing to remember is that just because you have facts, doesn't mean you are looking at them in an objective way. That your memes are distorting your perception of reality so that you do not comprehend the truth, you only comprehend a subjective paradigm that has placed facts in a model which defines them in a relative manner to each other. Since no one can know all facts the paradigm is always flawed and so we must learn to both better understand how we make our paradigms, but also how we can be aware without abstractions.

This spinning of wheels in the mud, of debating facts which are each put into a highly limited worldview (no matter who you are) can go on until one person gets tired of trying make the other understand and decides it's useless. Sometimes these people then resort to violence, other times to silence, but it should be understood that seeing that the debate is a waste of time since the foundational context is unknown, does not mean that the other person is in fact correct, only more stubborn, or to put it another way, just because you like to argue more does not make you right. Likewise if a lesser debater be humiliated through their inability to articulate or put forth proper arguments it does not mean that they are wrong about the issue, only that the other is a better debater. Being a good debater does not entitle you to be a philosopher king as far as I am concerned, as someone can be very clever and good at debating and yet still wrong or even knowingly fallacious, it is definitely possible to be a great debater and still wrong and we see this all the time in lawyers and politicians. If the experience that is beyond abstraction is true and real, as it seems to be to those who experience it, far more real than this world of forms, then no words can really provide a person with truth. This is bad news for both religion and science, but I do think scientists will eventually be able to clearly show this very principle, that their abstractions are ultimately always flawed and then they will start to develop ways of entering into the mystical awareness and come full circle to the closest abstractions of such awareness possible, the poetry of mythology.

When it comes to big cultural disagreements the ignorance of self and its personal design or lack of coherent planning or programming is most often the result of some kind of denial. People don't want to have to do the work of changing their structures as going back through time over their chain of reasoning can take a lot of introspection and planning and so they continue to build unsafe structures using shoddy memes that are quick to crumble under pressure. "Cognitive dissonance" is having two contradictory beliefs without reconciling them, for the purposes of metaphor we could say it is like trying to have two memes attempting to occupy the same space. This creates instability in their supporting walls and with too much of a load bearing down on each. Whatever is built on top, has little to no real support within the total structure and so everything becomes unstable and the structure is liable to fail. While we may have an inherent drive to overcome the uneasy feeling of cognitive dissonance, for many people it is preferable to the uncomfortable feeling of knocking down walls and releasing all of the emotional energy used to hold it up. This is the ability of denial to destroy the effect of logic and waste healthy emotional energy which acts as mortar to hold together all kinds of memetic bricks, rational or not. So long as we do not have a true cornerstone, or even know what our cornerstone or foundations are, we will have an unstable foundation and so have cognitive dissonance and this will cause all kinds of neurosis and ignorant actions because we lack the whole context for everything we believe. This is in many ways even worse and more common when people do not understand the context of others, because it makes people justified in imposing their will on others or making snap judgements about others.

A good example of this is when extremely religious people are questioned about their literal interpretations and the contradictions in their beliefs that inevitably arise. Some people believe in the literal bible or for Hare Krishna's the literal Bhagavad Gita which in the English texts are both questionable translations, seeing as how it's suppose to be the literal word of god, if "he" did write books it would probably have a lot of layers of meaning and depth which would be dependent on the specific language, so clearly a good translation is very important. Despite this denial as to the overwhelming contradictions even between the religious practice and the literal text itself, these facts are often completely ignored by people who claim to be devotees of that text. When asked why they believe something they may say because it says so in the book, and when questioned how they know the book is true they may say because it is the word of god and god is always right, and when they are asked how they know that it is the word of god they often say because it says so in the book!

This kind of circular logic, much like trying to define a word using the word itself seems for most of them to be totally unseen. No matter how hard you try and bring their attention to it they will just ignore it, they often wont even make the connection that their belief is an act of faith but that its apparent truth and it should be evident to anyone. In some cases these ideologues may think others are quite ridiculous because they do not understand what is so blatantly true to them. I am fine with people believing whatever they want, it is not for me to tell them how to make their structures, but when they oppress me because they think they know better than me and want so save me, then I have a big problem. While Christians are a great example of this cognitive dissonance there are many many more and indeed atheists and everyone else including me are far from immune. The denial goes unnoticed because it is emotionally uncomfortable to face these things, but also because there is a general lack of introspection and a lack of understanding about the difference between opinion and fact, theory and truth, argument and assertion as well as the unconscious and unknown forces which lead us to the conclusions that we arrive at. A poor lack of planning and unsafe building practices which lie off of stable foundations leads to crumbling and inefficient structures, giving bad Feng Shui if you will, poor flow of the spirit through the structure and heavy use of mortar to support memes which have no real benefit to anyone.

Logic is how language is attached to the mind, it is how we justify the acceptance of a meme into our paradigm and the process by which we choose where to place it into our paradigms so that we can explain our memes to others and ourselves with the least amount of cognitive dissonance possible. These bricks are then put into place and held together through an emotional investment or attachment, which is the mortar or the trust in our ability to determine the validity of a meme, or information. This “in-formation” is the process of forming within yourself the astral structures of awareness which become your consciousness, this most obviously takes form as language, or is recognized through language as a thought. Language boasts that it will help to create whatever kind of structure that may be beautiful to that persons aesthetics, with the look of the structure to that time largely determining which things should be added according to our personal aesthetic taste. (usually we like things to match) If we have a broad foundation we may branch out in little minarets or towers that is our variety of interests, but for the most part, in most people the paradigm is blocks or memes which are related to each other with few divergences from the mainstream, or the bourgeois paradigm. If these people even see that their neighbours do not match them, it does not matter if they are really part of their life, they can get very very upset.

Art itself is a very important means of memetic transmission which is sometimes hard to see in a logical way, but it is connected in this and in fact can be some of the most powerful means of spreading memes because art tends to be more emotionally based than science and the more rational attempts to get people to see things your way. Since art is subjective it produces memes that do not need to fit in as rigid a structure as science and so can be incorporated into more of a variety of memetic structures, especially since art can produce so much emotional mortar for people. Anyone can give logical reasons for a positive emotional response to something if they try hard enough, but art creates memes that have within them perhaps less rocks or facts than a purely rational block. Since it is made up of more mortar, when properly installed can form a stronger emotional connection and so infuse itself more deeply, in a more unified seamless manner than rational memes. This is especially true for religious art such as holy books which seem to more often than not to form the base of peoples beliefs, but perhaps has few physical grains of truth in them. The gates of these paradigms instead rely on ornate sculptures of symbolic information which evokes a precious feeling in their owner, in some cases acting like gargoyles guarding the entrance to the paradigm and warding off unwanted memes. This is not to say artistic or religious memes are necessarily less true or valuable than the scientific memes, but that that they require personal interpretation and contextual awareness of its creation, that care must be taken to select memes which will not throw off the aesthetics if scientific blocks come around.

We are exposed to different memes according to our experiences, and our current memes determine the values which we base our choices on, like what we should experience. These choices make up our values and when we place new memes on top of others and connect them by the same emotional mortar we form the next logical conclusion to our paradigm structure or train of thought. So not only are our choices altered by our memes, but our ability to take in information which we use to make those choices. In this way our minds are highly influenced if not outright controlled by those who are able to set up the environment to expose people to experiences and memes that suit their interests. No one can totally control all memes that are created, or keep unexpected experiences and exposures from happening, but when certain foundations are laid, even unexpected experiences and new radical memes will most often be screened out completely or viewed in a light that does not usually make the person want to accept them. When corporations control the media so extensively as on Earth then there is a very limited amount of memes hitting the mainstream and because of this society has a very narrow view of itself and a very narrow point of view to determine its choices from. In this way people are led to police themselves, to dismiss anything that is not within the mainstream, or does not have the approval of the authorities on reality.

There will always be some level of free will especially for those who are determined to question all memes they are exposed to, especially the ones they were exposed to from childhood, but this requires a strong position in the paradigm for the memes of ruthless truth and introspection. This is the ability to bring down walls no matter how emotionally comforting they are, the more deeply ingrained these memes are, the greater their ability to work, but they can only act on memes built on top of them, or after them, so it is crucial that they be laid in the foundations. If we can make these memes a part of our foundation then we will be able to avoid much self-deception and external manipulation and discern from our experiences the best information and so realize the best choices available. Most people think they have done this, made truth a part of their foundations, but the truth is they do not even know what their foundations are. This is because they are too busy looking for memes that will create happy emotional responses or mortar so that they can make a superficial paradigm that conforms to mainstream aesthetics of entertainment and wealth. This is perhaps science's greatest strength, in that it recognizes the need for updating paradigms according to new information, that it has developed methods to at least try and eliminate emotional bias and so has created a paradigm which is the most reliable. (Though scientists still have emotions, especially when it comes to things like getting tenure, or building a career based off their reputation with peers.)

Some of the most dangerous memes are the ones that we don't notice because they are so common that we do not think to question them. As your memes change through your life your total context will change and you may see new aspects to things you have seen or heard before, see new layers of meaning to books we read, stories or movies, some memes can produce amazing new layers of insight into the world around us. To me Occult memes provide some of the most edifying since they can provide the basic key stones and foundation stones, or memes of different memetic categories which can be used to create a holistic paradigm that is consistent and organized, which creates a context that is universally applicable to recognizing all forms of information, artistic, spiritual or scientific. The transcendent spiritual experience or gnosis is an experience for which no meme is possible, from this we can get a reference as to a totally different kind of value than one which is meme based. If we can achieve gnosis then we will have a better understanding of what memes are and how they control us but also allow us to build without cognitive dissonance. By becoming more aware of what memes are (in all ways that we can) and how culture works, we can make more informed decisions about what is really valuable and so have better judgement as to what memes we accept, and how we interact with them. If Anarchists are to overcome the emotional bias of the masses memetic defences we must develop the meme of memetic engineering and memetic awareness, the memes of personal memetic control and for this the Occult is invaluable.

Memos are the burying or layering of truth and experience in illusion and abstraction, the longer they exist, the more they are elaborated and the deeper the truth becomes buried. This can get to the point where people do not even try to see the truth that underlies the abstraction but take it at face value, the elaborations get so dense and so thick that it can take a whole lot of effort to find any real truth that will of been long forgotten. The abstractions may continue on but due to the comfort of literal shallow thinking it does not even occur to many people that there is a truth underneath the symbols, that it was just created out of ignorance, or deception. This is not helped by the increasingly materialist modern perspective which discourages personal interpretation and so the modern memos work to distract from anything which makes people think in a way that makes them take personal responsibility for their views. The truth is always there but it will never really be understood through adding abstractions.

Take for example the myth of Theseus and the labyrinth of the minotaur, the labyrinth could be interpreted as our paradigm, especially our subconscious assumptions and beliefs, the very process of forming logical structures to explain the world. The minotaur would be our territorial pride, our egoistic bull headed tendency to being an ideologue, it kills all who come into its labyrinth and feeds on them. It is a creature who feeds on humans, seven boys and seven girls, (remember the seven planets) which are the streams of information that come from the outside world, the real world and in its devouring of them it destroys them and the truth they represent, but also in its feeding nourishes and strengthens itself. Theseus is the information which destroys this ego ideologue and he does so only with the help of Ariadne, the feminine principle. She gives him the means to find his way back out of the labyrinth but after fleeing Crete and landing on the isle of Naxos he ultimately rejects her and abandons her. Perhaps this is because he is irreconcilable, who can say? Luckily Dionysus the god of ecstasy chooses Ariadne to be his wife, that is the feminine principle is led to true formless awareness free of the world. So it is the memos we wrap our truths in are largely a matter of aesthetics, imagination, creativity represented by Dionysus and this is great so long as you remember beauty is in the eye of the beholder, that there is more then the image underneath and that it is a dogmatist blind to other kinds of beauty who demands everything look the same.

We often think when arguing with others that we have a superseding logic, each person may believe this because from their personal context the other person is not recognizing facts which make their line of thinking obsolete. The deeper a memo is on your paradigm, the more weight bears down on it, the more emotional mortar is empowering the position of that brick. Perhaps the other persons logic is erroneous, but it is because they do not have the more fundamental context from the more deeply rooted memos which allow the construction of a paradigm without cognitive dissonance. All too often when people (sometimes very smart people) do not understand something they condemn it as idiocy, perhaps it sounds like incoherent psychobabble because they do not have the correct context through the proper underlying foundations of experience to their paradigms. The idea that these people don't have the knowledge needed to comprehend it without investigation of the matter is an affront to their vanity and so it never even enters their mind. They fail to keep in mind the words of Einstein who said "If at first an idea does not sound absurd, then there is no hope for it." The next time you have an argument with someone try to keep all this in mind and don't get angry because someone doesn't understand how to structure their beliefs, or what is their underlying motivations and beliefs, chances are to a point you don't either.

The best way to deal with someone who is trying tell you that you are stupid and wrong, or that you need to follow Jesus or something is to ask them lots of questions as in the Socratic method, that is if you wouldn't just rather tell them to fuck off and mind their own business. By asking them questions you can expose the inconsistencies in their beliefs in such a way that is not an attack, but that you are genuinely trying to understand their point of view and get to the bottom of things. Now although they may not get as offended with you as if you just said "you are stupid you are wrong here, here and here" they may still get upset when it is brought before them how little their beliefs actually make sense. This is because if they come to really understand their flaws then its kind of like demolishing a portion of their structure, the mortar cracks and emotional energy is released, even if it is a belief based purely on rational arguments, the longer it is held by someone and the more subsequent beliefs are based upon it, the more emotional damage it will do to the unprepared.

To deal with this it's important to create a meme that is deeply embedded in yourself that it is good to search out and eliminate counterproductive or unsafe and baseless beliefs within yourself. If you can manage to do this then eventually each release of emotional energy will become a beautiful and wonderful thing, as it means that you are getting less cognitive dissonance and better Feng Shui and emotional efficiency and so you are on the way to total integrity within your structure. Old mortar will be used in the construction of more useful structures. This meme is coupled with the meme of memetic engineering which allows us to streamline our structures and create new potentially useful memes that suit our ends, the ends being people who are freed from their personal prisons.

The Socratic method can be used on yourself or with a good friend who knows what the goal is, which is to get to the bottom of your beliefs. If you follow a line of questioning long enough starting even with something very simple, which you take for granted, you can learn a lot about yourself and what it is you actually believe. When you start to question the things you take for granted you can peel away brick by brick until you have access to your foundations. If you can get to know your foundations you can gain access to the master context which allows you to have truly superseding logic and a structure that is emotionally vibrant and healthy, whats more you will actually be equipped to know the truth. From this practice you will also learn more flexibility in changing your meme paradigm around, the more you mortar the meme that it is good to update your paradigm, the less emotional trauma will come from disillusionment with old outdated beliefs.

Although most people try in some meagre way to have integrity or consistent beliefs or meme structures, there is no doubt a whole lot of cognitive dissonance. From Christians supporting war mongers, to people who consider themselves to oppose slavery but who shop at Walmart, to police brutalizing people in the name of public safety. This is not helped by the media which purposely get us into cognitive dissonance so that we are more confused, and filled with subconscious guilt and anxiety which we will seek to fix with consumer goods. This confusion is encouraged so that people will be anxious to believe the new corporate spokesmen they call the president, will make everything better without changing anything fundamental. There is also the obvious point that the government and its policies as well as that of the corporations are fundamentally hypocritical and insane and so any attempt at selling such ideas to people is bound to be riddled with cognitive dissonance.

This happens because people all too often take information at face value, taking things literally helps ego gratification so that while people avoid any information that will be inconsistent with their beliefs, if they are incapable of subjective personal interpretation they won't know how to look at both sides of an issue. Then an authority figure can get them to accept contradictions which can be activated to trigger the stress created by cognitive dissonance, getting people to go into denial about one side of the contradiction in order to suit the needs of the authorities, then later the other side according to the situation. For example telling people Jesus is love when you pass around the collection plate, then telling people Muslims are Satanic and we need to go to war. In this way they can hold onto long held cherished beliefs that are false, but allow them to justify destroying and killing everything in the name of love. A belief should not be loved or hated, but understood as true or false, or more accurately somewhere in between. A good media example of this, or in certain religions is that people are often such a blind followers they believe when they were told they aren't a blind follower. They were told their media sources are genuine and authoritative, unbiased and true and so rather than taking the time to question this, most believe it and in fact will ignore anything that says otherwise, dismissing it before investigating it for themselves. After all its so much more convenient to watch the news then do the research for yourself, after work it is time to "veg out" and stop thinking, this is all part of the cult of stupidity which is such a valued tradition in capitalist culture.

With the memes of consumerism, the media actually uses the concept of individualism to get us to more or less conform to the same thing! For instance we are told that capitalism is the best system for individual rights, we have all these different little products and fashions which allow us to customize our own personal expression, nobody has to be the same as anyone else, and yet what we get is a culture obsessed with status so that anyone who doesn't have the right fashion or right car or whatever memes is an outsider. Through this marketing technique people are made to feel they are expressing their individuality and their rights as a "free" person when they are in fact buying something that perhaps millions of others have and that they only bought so that they could fit in and be like everyone else. Everyone is sold individualism and so it is all the same because as we are told "you are special, you deserve this product" and so we never question whether or not we really want the product or what consequences there are for supporting such corporations. Consumerism has gotten people to accept the meme that social status based on memes is important and so people will do all kinds of things to associate themselves with the memes that can give them that status.

Anyone who is different is poor or a freak or both, seen as sub human and is in one way or another made to suffer for it. In this way it creates a cycle that we are trying to become individuals by being like everyone else, but because we fall into trends and group standards we end up just conforming, then people try to outdo others by getting something perhaps slightly new or different which quickly becomes the new trend. We spend so much time following trends trying to appear as an individual we have no time for introspection and so do not know who we actually are. To attempt to break out of this, is if you are a trendy person to risk complete alienation and so any divergence or true individualism is associated with pain. Since people have been taught they need the fancy car to get laid, and women need the right fashion and make up, people fear a lack of sexual and romantic gratification and so people slip back into conforming to consumer culture even if deep down they hate it. We also see this kind of cycle in a lot in romantic relationships with people falling for the same kind of abusive personality over and over again. Perhaps they hate themselves and so find someone who will treat them badly, then they get sick of them only to be alone, perhaps they hate themselves for falling for such bad people and for being alone in general. Since they can't love themselves they feel the need to be with someone but their subconscious self hatred gets them to go for someone who is pretty much the same as before!

This happens to people who do not know what their foundations are and so they keep building structures which are filled with cognitive dissonance, only to have them crumble and the person try again to build off from the same dissonant point in the wrong direction. This is because we refuse to change fundamentally and often we cannot recognize the underlying context of why these same things keep happening, why bad politicians keep getting in, or why wars keep happening. These are the self feeding neurotic complexes of humanity and they have now grown to the point they may kill us all, at the very least they keep most of us from living the life we want. Humanity is going to have these feed back loops of neurosis until we take control of the them, the first step is becoming aware of them, then we can help to spread awareness and eventually look to reconcile them, if it is ever going to happen on a mass scale I do believe it will happen relatively soon. (so long as YOU get involved)

Through customs and culture, memes become the source of prejudices like racism and sexism, because race has nothing to do with the value of a person, the only explanation I can think of for racism besides stupidity, is that racists don't like other peoples customs or mannerisms. Through gross generalization and because they identify with their own memes so much, racists think memes are actually a physical component determined by skin colour, as if memes are in our genes. They come to the conclusion that all people of whatever minority race must be alike simply because they may share some culture, a culture to which the racists are bias and putting hateful stereotypes on because they have little to no personal experience about them. This is generally the result of being raised in an environment with very little memetic variety and so if all you know about black people is from your family members who are part of the Klan, then if you ever leave your white bread town your context will warp pretty much any information you receive to fit your belief structure. Since racists associate people with the memes they assume all people of a race must share, they will have a distorted view of every person of a different race they come across. They will hate other culture's memes simply because contrary realities to their prejudice bring up unusually strong feelings of cognitive dissonance of which they are in denial and so they feel it is a threat to their own culture, which to them is inherently superior. So in their minds they are justified in doing all kinds of horrible things to protect themselves or purify the world in some moronic way.

The meme of race war for global supremacy has infected many people and it is definitely a factor in the wars of the world, having direct manifestation and evolutionary advantages for itself. After all if a meme can infect someone so completely that they will kill others with different memes then the racist or religious memes will take out their competition and ensure their own survival. (or trigger the death of everyone) This is true in some degree of every prejudice I can think of, it is all a conflict between memes. With sexism it is just the idea that women are weak or whatever due to being biologically prone to memes associated with the stereotype, or because the person has been infected by the meme that men are inherently superior. This gets even worse when the victims of prejudice start to believe that meme of their inferiority and so they create that reality and when nearly everyone is bigoted in the environment it becomes a self fulfilling prophecy. There is no group of people who doesn't have some memes that we could do without, but we have to keep in mind it is the meme that is bad and not totally the person and certainly not the race or gender or sexual orientation or genetics. When you realize how much people are controlled by memes hopefully you will remember it the next time someone pisses you off, so that you can try to present contrary information to their memetic programming. With enough repetitions of contrary experience to a memetic belief, anyone can learn to recognize their cognitive dissonance, or at the very least you will not add emotional reinforcement to their bias.

By getting a good idea of how belief structures are made and maintained we can create memes that will help to let others be free, this has to be done very carefully so as to not impose any specific belief, but instead make people aware of their own inconsistencies and fallacies. One of the major obstacles of Anarchist groups and leftist groups is also it's attraction, it incorporates a variety of people into a whole. While this presents a truer and more egalitarian memetic perspective it can lead to infighting and when you depend on a unanimous consensus being reached it can especially be difficult to get everyone working together. Through understanding of how memes and psychology work, group dynamics can be improved a lot, clearing up a lot of misunderstandings and helping people to be more tolerant of other peoples memes and so be more willing to come to consensus. This of course also has huge implications for spreading the culture of Anarchism in a way that can take into account the bias and limitations of the masses current level of awareness. When people start to stop identifying so much with their memes and start to think in terms of functionality and truth then we will be in a much better context for creating Anarchy and the kind of people who can make it work. The Socratic method can help with this, but this problem is not nearly as much an obstacle for the hierarchical, the oligarchs who have a much more unified vision of what they want, that is whatever the leader says goes. They tend to be more or less very similar people, since their memes reinforce conformity they reach agreements easier. Also because they work in a hierarchical method that doesn't listen to those under them, consensus doesn't matter.

The right wing has often used this short term advantage to sabotage its opponents, creating disinformation or having government infiltrators who sow seeds of discord to fracture any opposition, the old adage divide and conquer works well and they have done this very masterfully. They have managed to split apart those they rule by playing up petty differences like race and religion, pitting us against each other so we lose sight of our common foundations and common goals. The government has admittedly engaged in all kinds of "psy-op" (psychological operations) warfare with the best example being the "cointelpro" operations of the 60's and so by studying these things we can start to use their own tactics against them. The issue of the use of violence or what is politically correct (that which is the ultimate memetic “good”) opens up all kinds of divisions which can be exploited to turn would be allies against each other. Sometimes in a protest undercover cops will try to instigate riots and damage property so that the uniformed police will be able to justify the use of violent force. At the very least the protestors will look bad in the news and so their message will be seen in an unpleasant context and will not reach the masses, instead the protestors will be seen as mindless “thugs” and “Anarchy” will remain being seen from the context of violent Chaos. The government will also infiltrate activist groups and spread gossip and generally try to get people to turn on another, perhaps by suggesting outlandish and over the top extremist goals which are impractical in order to try and split away the less extremist people. This also compromises the values of the group and makes the undercover person look like anything but a cop through exploiting the memetic bias of the activists. Another tactic of the police is to put undercover cops into holding cells and using the memes of protestors they try and get people to confess to crimes, to people they believe are also prisoners. This is a kind of psychological warfare by using memes and there are many forms of it, they are very dirty tactics and unfortunately it may be that we need to do something similar to them.

For activists to fight the memetic culture war we need to develop strategies on how to best spread our ideas and get people informed as to how the system works. We need to get people involved and we need to get people interested in learning more about Anarchist thought, and make people more aware of just how contradictory and stupid the system they have been working for really is. It's pretty obvious once you know the context of geopolitics and history that in the biased mainstream media no real useful information will come out that will lead people to critical thought of what they have been raised to believe. Anyone who challenges mainstream notions are immediately ridiculed and their arguments are taken out of context and twisted to suit the agenda of the corporate/government agenda. We need a form of protest where the “medium is the message” so that even if the media does not say what the protest is about, it will be obvious to all what the message is. With these kinds of memetic tactics it will be much harder for their propaganda to spin it into something negative, it will also hopefully be outrageous enough so that the media has to cover it, and fun enough that it will get people wanting to get involved.

One tactic in memetic warfare is what I would call “memetic ninjutsu,” which is a surgical strike against a very important load bearing meme in the cultural paradigm. In this tactic a meme which is in cognitive dissonance is exposed in a new light which will cause an identity crisis among the group. A new meme is then stealthily introduced that will look as though it came from the group itself, so that once the dissonance is exposed the new meme will create further division and keep the group from reforming. This can also work by discrediting leaders within the group but for it to work in this way you would need to catch the person doing something not culturally sanctioned by the group. If an important enough point can be found within the group's paradigm structure, a well placed ninja attack can bring down the whole house of cards. For this to work infiltration is invaluable as a person's memetic defences are not as high when they believe you are one of them. Like Eris who throws an apple saying “to the fairest” those who stand together against the masses should be pitted against each other so that they are too busy arguing amongst themselves, too busy fighting over their own vanity and egos to form cohesive strategies against Anarchists. This is perhaps easier than it might sound as oligarchs are among the most egotistical and greedy people in the world, they will be quick to turn on each other if it means they will profit in the short term.

What we need to do is to create memes that point out to each other their divisions, their contradictions so that a fissure can be created which will make their structures collapse upon themselves. For example if it were possible to separate the Christian fundamentalists from the rest of the right wing then it would go a long way to splitting their power base. We need “wedge issues” that will get them distracted from their commonalities and instead focusing on their differences. By separating Christian issues from corporate issues the right will be fundamentally divided and they can be further broken up in various ways. Who knows, it may even be possible to get Christians to care about the poor like they are supposed to and so turn against capitalism. The more this is accomplished the less political power the oligarchs will have and the easier it will be to expose just how poorly created their belief structures actually are, so that they can open their little minds to new possibilities. This may sound like sinking to their level but I am not talking about doing anything but exposing to them their own honest flaws, showing them that their own beliefs do not actually help them as much as they think and that there is a better way of doing things.

The tricky part is that for this to be most effective people need to infiltrate the culture so that the wedge issue can be introduced by someone who seems to be their own. While joining various right wing groups is one way, this could also be done by creating what seems to be right wing media, but which is actually Anarchist subversion of capitalist culture. It is vitally important for it to seem like the memes are coming from within the hierarchical culture itself, rather than as some argument placed by Anarchists who will never be taken seriously enough by them to be listened to. We need to find the memes which act as key stones to the different branches of the capitalist and hierarchical belief structure, then take them out causing support to collapse. If possible once the structure collapses replacing the meme with something that shows how incompatible the different branches really are, so that they will lose their common footing. While taking out foundation memes would be great, they are usually too heavily defended and covered in other memes to get at them directly, in this tactic we are merely trying to get them to turn against each other and so must take out the keystones which link the various cultures of hierarchy in to supporting the royal arch of mainstream society at the top. As the top crumbles we can demolish and dismantle the memes of hierarchical society closer and closer to the foundation, but if we simply go right for the foundation stones we will have to fight the weight of all of society pushing down upon us. Putting your trust in faulty foundations means it doesn't matter how high you build your structure, it will be crooked and corrupt and eventually fall to the ground in a heap and so we must exploit these weaknesses. With this tactic an Anarchist is not trying to make people turn to their side, (which is all most activists seem to focus on and is what I mean by attacking the foundations) but expose the inconsistencies and divisions within the dominating paradigm, thus subverting it.

Another tactic in memetic warfare is what I will call “memetic piracy” and this has also in some respects been called “culture jamming.” The idea is to take memes that are already in the culture and twist them, or alter them so that familiar memes, or memes that present themselves as coming from authorities give subversive ideas or expose the idiocy of the authorities and the system. This could be done in a factual way for the best impact but it may also be useful to exploit peoples ignorance by getting them to accept and spread ludicrous memes which they believe to come from “the authorities” and which will keep the state paradigm from functioning properly. One common method of culture jamming is changing advertisements like billboards so that instead of selling a product the advertisement makes the company and product look bad. Anything that is on a billboard will be accepted by those who blindly think that claims made in advertisements have to be true, but it has to look authentic. Anything that takes an already existing meme and turns it into a counter cultural meme, or uses mainstream memes for subversive ends is memetic piracy. If done subtly this can work like a memetic Trojan horse so that by having something that appears to be acceptable to the current paradigm, it can bypass the defence systems of the people who screen out anything that doesn't come from their authorities. (priests, gurus, leaders, TV, supposed “experts” and consultants of a certain field etc)

This can be effective in a few ways, such as spreading disinformation, getting a person to sabotage the system physically in some way, discrediting authorities or by getting people to accept memes which will create and spread cognitive dissonance in the mainstream paradigm. People used to following orders will do all kinds of silly and crazy things without even really questioning it when they think the orders are coming from someone they believe to be an authority, they will even help to destroy those systems which the authority is suppose to represent. Once the meme is accepted within the prison of their paradigm, out comes the aspects which present a challenge to their presuppositions, or cause people to act in a way that they believe is helpful and encouraged by their paradigm but is actually against it. If people can be tricked into doing Anarchist things while they think they are supporting their own memes, then the direct experience within the Trojan horse can get through the defences and free the “princess” (enlightenment) who had been enchanted by material pleasure into leaving her home. The system has used such tactics and people take in the horse's of the system due to their ignorance of what lies within the forms given to them, euphemisms and news speak and a general warping of human decency make it past the defences of our better judgement allowing those we call rulers to run amok and take our access to wisdom. However we can use these same principles to free people as well, giving them access to a new thought, a new idea which can set in motion Anarchist awareness. To put it simply, create memes that twist a culturally acceptable meme, thus appearing as trendy so that it can be spread throughout the mainstream culture. Once incorporated into the belief system the meme can lead them to unexpected and new lines of thought which hopefully creates enough cognitive dissonance that it leads them to question their basic beliefs.

If the pirated meme could do something which leads to a direct experience which will make it harder for the person to be reinfected by “I am today without LSD!” (maybe try and come up with something less obvious) Another example might be running for office as a right wing extremist who makes the right look totally ridiculous, calling for death camps for the homeless or something. Do not be afraid to impersonate people like repair men and business men as this could be used to infiltrate a number of places, or if you don't mind breaking the law you could impersonate police. You can pirate memes for creating all kinds of psy-op shenanigans, you could also pose as a priest and put on a church bake sale or something and then start talking about how god created pot. There are lots and lots of ways that people can learn to sneak past the public's memetic defences by posing as being culturally sanctioned authorities and with that comes a much better ability to influence others then trying to conventionally “educate” them.

The last tactic I have in mind is perhaps the crudest but done correctly could be extremely effective, in fact it is probably the most common tactic which I will call memetic guerrilla warfare. This is presenting wild and completely contrary and extreme memes to the mainstream people, give them a shock that will get them out of their consensus trance if only for a little while. In this method the idea is not to give a long term demonstration or education, but to randomly or sporadically do demonstrations of freakishness or give memes that most likely will be lost on most people or rejected soon, but which can provide them with a new point of view unexpectedly when they are not prepared for it. Create a meme that will shock people and get them thinking outside the box even if its only for a few minutes, we can create little bubbles of Anarchism which are not necessarily meant to be sustained for long but allow us to retreat quickly and attack again later, in different ways when peoples guard is down. This could be as simple as two people in animal costumes (Furries) dry humping on a busy sidewalk or more subversive and complex demonstrations could be enacted which carry a more political message, such as the ritual sacrifice of mickey mouse in front of Disney Land. (Flamboyant gay pride parades are an excellent example.)

You could also go into places of business and disrupt things and spew all kinds of information as quickly as possible before they manage to shut you up. It could be well organized using a large group or you could just start yelling things at people on the street corner. There is also guerrilla art which is putting up various kinds of subversive artwork, poetry, graffiti, “wheat pasting” pictures and fliers, usually in a clandestine manner which leaves the art to spread your meme until it is taken down or painted over. This idea is kind of like a meme as a cold, (unless you can spread memes that will be lethal to the system which would be conventional memetic warfare) it will serve to spread your ideas and could be used to distract the antibodies while other work is being done. It also helps to keep the people aware that there are people who manage to think for themselves, and that they too can have new thoughts and express their own ideas, no matter how silly they are, lowering the bar for “normal” behaviour. Even if the guerrilla meme is quickly overcome, with repeated attacks carried out in a variety of ways, people will start to have lower resistance to more radical kinds of memes. If you can't beat them head on, then work to spread your message in a way they can't pin you down and defeat you. For example you could point out in spray paint how stress causes illness and unsatisfying jobs cause stress which means people are killing themselves with work they hate.

All these things have their place and there is much room for creativity, what's more it is fun, and if you can inspire others of like mind to use these same tactics, then the Anarchist memes and the meme of memetic warriors and memetic resistance will spread exponentially. Denouncing a meme outright is seldom effective, especially if you are an Anarchist, instead we need to make people aware of what mainstream memes really are and what context their foundations lie in. In order to free people from memes, they have to understand what a meme is. If memetics is to sociology what genetics is to biology, then art, philosophy and kinds of magick are like genetic engineering, what the state calls “social engineering” which is capable of creating and changing culture according to a predetermined design. It is the work of the Anarchist to create a culture where people are not made subject to the memes of authoritarians, but freed to make and choose their own memes. To make a world where people can live consciously making their own decisions, so that they can understand their own wills and act through freedom rather than manipulation.

Given the media conditioning received since birth, the resistance of most people to Anarchist memes will generally make any outright attempts to openly spread Anarchism impossible, as they have been taught to reject such ideas without even considering them. Also given the corporate system's dramatic ability to commercialize counter cultures and other subversive memes for their own purposes, they are generally rendered useless as nothing but new forms of profit for the oligarchy. Still, it is possible to use these same kinds of tactics against them, to subtly and patiently fill the meme pool with enough Trojan horse memes (of varying degrees of blatant Anarchism) to a point that seemingly insignificant memes have managed to sociologically transmute the system so that it cannot function, (breeding out the virulent hierarchical memes) a kind of memetic poisoning taken in over time through the beasts need to find ever new forms of nourishing profit. Of course other activist tactics are required, but attacking the establishment from within, and getting it to try and capitalize on cultures that ultimately lead to anti-capitalist actions are some potential forms of resistance. Even if it is profitable for the corporations in the short term, you can use the system to spread your memes that will one day bring them down, and it's clear they will spread even quite questionable memes as soon as they think it's profitable.

Other memes which will not be taken in by the system are even better in many ways, things like food not bombs, free schools, workshops, the spreading of DIY culture, sexual liberation are not in themselves enough to cause Anarchy, but they help to make the bourgeois more tolerant and open to Anarchist memes, they help to normalize Anarchist ideas and help people overcome their authoritarian standards. There are many subtle every day things we can do as well like getting to know your neighbours, or breaking fashion standards or any type of conformity or standards of capitalist elitist values and especially Christian conservative values. (which are the memes which form the foundation of the empire) This all helps lower the memetic resistance to Anarchist culture, and after a certain point Anarchism itself (though perhaps using a different name) will seem credible and desirable to the masses.

Things like gay marriage, feminism, tolerance for queers are ways of dismantling sexual oppression but anything which can promote equality, even if it is not in itself a serious threat to the system can when combined with many other things, help to create the kind of cultural environment where Anarchy can bloom. While it may be tempting, even invigorating to think of how to blow up the system's memetic paradigm in one glorious explosion of Anarchy, such a reality is highly unlikely, instead a much more mundane approach is needed, in conjunction with the more radical tactics, that we must chip away at the machine and take it apart piece by piece. Anarchy can only be achieved by making people want it, and right now due to their culture they think they want oppression and domination, so it is you can blow up all the government buildings you want, people will just rebuild their own oppression until they learn a healthier way of life. The social moors of the state can be released, the memes of hierarchy can be shown to be less enjoyable and true than Anarchist ways, and once enough Trojan Anarchist memes are in, they can weaken the structure of the paradigm walls to let in those who would finish the job.

While the counter culture and the activist culture definitely have links, there is no doubt a lot of room for improvement, “solidarity” must be built with the different meme structures so that more people will get involved in activism and also so that the activist community can get some fresh perspectives. Memes can be created which bring people together against the hierarchies and could be implemented so that activists spread all kinds of Anarchist awareness in new ways to new kinds of people. In this way memes can help to counter the psychological warfare tactics of the government on the people, they have divided us but we can still unite the people and to do this memes must play a very important role. If you are not comfortable with, or willing to engage in activism then perhaps you are better suited to creating new memes, artistic or otherwise that can be used to bridge the gap between various counter cultures and different groups in general. Most people out in the world are still very ignorant of the state of the world which they live in, memes can definitely be used to educate people and in such a way that the many people who don't read books may find more interesting.

There is basically no limit to the kinds of memes that could be created to bring people together and instill within them a sense of Anarchy. It not necessary to be outright that such a meme is actually Anarchist since the word “Anarchy” has been so completely tarnished by media news speak and propaganda. A name is not important so long as Anarchist culture is integrated into the paradigms of as many people as possible, perhaps targeting children who haven't been infected as completely by the domination/hierarchy memes. Making kids books or games which teach Anarchist principles would be a great place to start laying the foundations for a new kind of social awareness. “Social engineering” is a reality of the modern media and political systems, Anarchists must counter these tactics if anything is to ever change. Anarchist memes should be spread all over and in as many ways as possible, not to mention memes that encourage the spread of Anarchist memes. Anarchists may not have the funding of multinational corporations but we do have our own advantages, we are more creative then formulaic advertizing, and we have the truth on our side, not to mention a much happier lifestyle than anything that can be bought in the store. I know some intellectuals out there dismiss “lifestyle Anarchism” but anything that gets people living in a more Anarchist manner is a good thing, especially since traditional debate has proven so futile. It is not so much a few oligarch capitalists who are destroying the world, but the capitalist lifestyle and memes which are the problem, so it is we need to create alternatives. You cannot destroy a meme or culture, you can only make it obsolete by coming up with better alternatives and this is something that will become increasingly important as the information age progresses. If a tactic works and it does not compromise Anarchist values then it should be encouraged, there is no one way that change will occur, it will be the contributions from all kinds of individuals in their own way. If we can spread the culture of Anarchism then people will eventually start to become more interested in political Anarchism and start to live Anarchism to greater degree in everyday life.

If Anarchy is to succeed then it must be created in a way that allows people to have their own memes, even if they are not exactly “politically correct” free expression is a must, it is just a fact of life that people will always have opposing and so offensive memes to someone. If we only focus on building the most incredible paradigms we can, attempting to make some perfect society or perfect ego that will bring us to heaven like some tower of babel, then all we will accomplish is forced conformity and further need for rebellion. So long as we create these hierarchies of memes we will always have hierarchies within ourselves and with that we will have bias and misunderstanding. In a sense no one will speak the same language, we will all be too busy trying to infect others with our own memes and we will be too filled with fear and contempt of other peoples memes to really listen without bias.

Instead of working like Freemasons for some monument to our own egos we should be building from the cornerstone, but in a more or less horizontal manner, a meme is a meme and it is not good or evil, it is how it effects others that matters, but demonizing memes only serves to reinforce them in some people, to drive the need for memetic evolution to compete with the new antagonistic culture. By integrating memes in an Anarchist manner, that is without hierarchy we can cultivate non attachment to them, we can more easily exchange our memes without having the same emotional weight bearing down and making us upset and bias if we need to update them. Horizontal paradigms are the only way to have long term and total integrity, the only way to avoid having the memetic priorities that create ideologue behaviour. If we can get out of the mindset that happiness is determined by having the right memes, then we can stop being controlled by memes, we can start to learn who we really are outside of the memes and abstractions. While knowing your ideals is helpful for manifesting them and for understanding the roots of memetic creation, this should not be confused with putting them into a hierarchy, we should have non attachment. What's more we should understand their subjective and personal definitions and so while there are preferences, they are not to be forced or seen as inherently superior. If we can do that, we can accept life as a work of art which we all contribute to and which has a variety of themes, tones, colours and messages, some more pleasant then others, but all part of human culture. Surely there are memes that make people do horrible things but to put it in terms of morality and good and evil is to impose your own memetic value system on others, instead we need to determine the use of memes according to Anarchist principles, whether or not something directly imposes in an oppressive manner with physical ramifications. Being surrounded by distasteful memes or ones which present a stupid opinion is not a reason to force others to stop expressing themselves how they like, it is only motivation to create new memes yourself.

Depending on the situation, since most bourgeois and ignoramuses think they are good people this usually has to be handled delicately. Knocking down a person's whole paradigm to the foundation is too emotional, they will ignore any attempts, or take it as a personal attack, you have to start from the top of the paradigm (be on the level as an equal) and dismantle to the bottom. Anarchists will not spread their memes by trying to debate everyone into accepting their opinion of what a non offensive person is, or by forcing Anarchy onto anyone since this is impossible. Anarchy will be recognized as the most desirable culture and the most truthful by reaching out to offensive and hierarchical people, allowing them to be who they are and providing them with non judgemental amoral communities filled with examples and opportunities to take on memes that they are comfortable with. The meme of Anarchism is seen by the majority as radical and extremist, so it is repeatedly brushed aside, Anarchists then must work to spread subtle memes which will make Anarchism seem normal, or even the obvious way for a society to run. If we can desensitize people to freedom and non hierarchical ways of being so that Anarchism does not seem so radical, then we can really start to have a new world for everyone.

We all make models of reality, abstract awareness is defined by it and while some who seek a purely abstract view of reality might feel I am hostile to their abstract ways, this is not true. Models of reality are useful aspects of memory that allow a person to try and predict future events that is consistent with past experiences. While a Zen state of unutterable awareness has great potential for intuitive and instinctual awareness, we all have words in our minds at least sometimes, and knowing how to keep track of these abstractions, these models that we create is a useful skill when it comes to interacting with the physical world. When we combine the abstract and non abstract awareness, we realize all models are inherently limited abstractions we project on reality, but these projections are also of creative significance if we are to have total awareness and interact with all aspects of self and reality. Just because no work of art can ever really be "perfect" to everyone all the time, does not mean we should give up on expressing ourselves through it. Humanity can never make an abstraction that is all encompassing, or abstract each aspect of total reality, but this does not mean that we should never try to explain to ourselves what we think about things. If we can gain the non abstract awareness, then we can use it to provide a fuller picture which is consistent with our abstract models. Then we will have a greater idea of context from which to base our paradigms or models on, models which have definite utilitarian and emotional advantages and implications in the physical world. If we try to abstract without this ineffable awareness, no model, no matter how elaborate will ever be totally consistent with all aspects of awareness and so we miss out on many valid insights and information which it can provide us with.

If we can understand our models will always be limited, then hopefully we can cultivate the humility to understand we do not understand everything and so come to tolerate our apparent differences. Luckily we are each united in our potential ability to become fully aware of our non abstract aspects of awareness, aspects which are quite probably always uniform and consistent in the deeper states. Ironically by trying to abstract an objective view of reality we have succeeded only in creating more varieties of subjective limited models, but those who have included the deeper ineffable states, states which have been called “mystical” are pretty well in agreement across the planet and throughout history. This may not always appear so, but this is because in order to communicate about such states we are forced to return to abstract awareness and so the objectivity of this state is lost.

When people lose sight of the fact that the abstractions of these mystical realities are always limited and so flawed, having no experiential knowledge they cling to simplistic literal interpretations which allow them to cling to their abstract awareness. If we all had these mystical experiences such as through entheogens, then we could all create artistic abstractions and not get hung up on the literal interpretations which are beside the point of any great art. The point of art being to enjoy the process of creation and expression, or to convey a message, but not mistake the symbols for the information. If the memes of Anarchism can be bred to propagate itself on a mass scale of appeal then it can ensure that although there is still memes competing for human attention, they will not become memes which encourage domination or totalitarianism. Instead art and individual expressions will be celebrated as at least attempts to provide a new point of view, a new form of activity that can work to strengthen and test the memes that humans have at the time. So long as these memes are not imposed then the varieties of memetic choice will allow people to constantly update their awareness and activities according to their own needs and disregard those they consider obsolete.

Through hierarchical civilization human minds have been bred to become increasingly greedy and self centred, but it is possible to counteract this mental virus by having a robust Anarchist mental immune system. This is done not by creating a sterile environment but by actively engaging and encouraging cultural exposure, exploring all possibilities so that when hierarchical memes are encountered, the immune system will have a kind of vaccine against it. Encouraging the memes of loving a diversity of memes, a diversity of reality models, is the best way of breeding healthy minds which are resistant to any would be elitists who seek to create authoritarian memes. At the same time we must always keep in mind their inherently limited nature in regards to the boundless reality we live in and to do this we must encourage consciousness to be aware of the parts of itself which are beyond the memes and abstractions. Being an artist is wonderful, but it is not as wonderful as the imagination, the consciousness which allows it to exist and so long as people do not understand this, they will always succumb to convenient and deceptive memes of authority.

Chapter 5 – The Threshold

I have now been living in my new apartment for a number of months, it has been really fun but I think its time for me to move out. I get along well enough with my roommate but we are definitely interested in going down some different roads. I have been getting more into Occultism and meditation and although it makes for good parties it is hard to meditate when you are drunk and there are broken bottles and moldy puke on the ground, loud music or bands playing, people passed out or standing all around you. I have a job now, its pretty good as far as jobs go, I am working in a radical book store selling all kinds of political books and DIY shit, lots of good stuff and I am not working for authoritarian people which is a definite bonus. I don't really make anything, in fact it's volunteer run, but in many ways I am my own boss at that place and I get to read lots and meet lots of interesting people. I have also started selling pot and so while I hate capitalism, at least I am not paying taxes and between that and dumpster diving, I can afford to get my own little shitty place to live. I have been looking at the world in a new way lately, I can see people now and why they do what they do, their memes and politics, the more I study about the Occult the more functional I become, the more I understand that first big acid trip and the more I can control my own consciousness. I have learned though that regular practice of meditation and ritual is crucial, I have started off pretty intermittently, but the more I learn and practice the more I want to learn and practice, I know that with time and work I will be able to control my entheogenic trips to a degree that is unimaginable. I have also been able to bring about things into my life in a much more controlled way, I was having synchronicity before, but this is so much more, with more control and awareness at all times. I have used ritual to get all kinds of things and will use it to get the right apartment, but more than material gratification magick has helped me to learn how to bring about the kind of consciousness I want, how to explore the mind and spirit world in ways most people would never believe. It is my will to have a quiet place to practice my rituals, a place I can make in to a temple, at least while I do my practices and while I am against consumerism, manifesting material things like a new apartment will help me on my spiritual path.

While New Age practices are much better than nothing, its pretty clear to me these days just how basic they are, they are a good starting point for some, or at least a philosophical primer but for those who never really push themselves beyond, they close themselves off to real understanding and competency in the spirit world. I see so many synchronicities these days I don't even pay much attention anymore, its not about having coincidences which happen to go with my thoughts, its about paying attention and learning what reality really is, opening up to the rhythms and flow of existence, its not the ego gratification that's important, but understanding the truth. There is nothing new in the New Age and it is essentially highly watered down, simplified and bastardized Occultism with no real depth other than you should try to think positive and be loving. While on one hand such people may have a big heart, I am not interested in self indulgent materialist ambitions as such philosophies are completely full of bull, persistently and stubbornly clinging to the predictable lazy bourgeois mentality. I have met enough New Agers to know that its practices often work to delude them in to thinking they are enlightened because they have learned to screen out any thoughts which threaten their vanity. While plenty of New Agers imagine themselves to be spiritual masters, they often do not even realize what inspired their own philosophies and what is worse, having bought in to the popular stereotype of the Occultist as promulgated by Christian propaganda, they are often even prejudice against the Occult, all because it contradicts their sense of aesthetics and so must be “negative.” I realize now those first positive thinking books I read were exactly what I needed to hear or attract into my life when I felt anything more would be too religious or dogmatic, but now I know that to stop there would be saying to the universe all that is important is my material well being, my own happiness, that I don't really care about learning to take responsibility for my own mind or know the truth in depth. Not to mention the New Age offers little to no real practices for controlling your mind or inducing or controlling spiritual experiences. In it's oversimplification the New Age has left out many things, for example critical thinking, entering in to trance states, meditation, facing your demons, or how to avoid self deception and wishful thinking, which can easily happen if your whole spiritual outlook consists of always thinking positively about what you want.

Through Occult practice I have learned not only how to manifest my intentions much better, but found practices and philosophies which can potentially greatly aid Anarchists and also provide insight into how the world got the way it is and how we can de-condition ourselves from our memetic programming. I wonder what applications the Occult could have for writing? There seems to be many and I bet I could even make this book into something which could use Occult principles for the good of humanity. Magick is great for all spiritual people, though it's definitely not what most people think, it allows a person to DIY with spirituality and rituals as there are no gurus required to make you a magician, it is all up to your own willpower, personal interpretation and ontological outlook. Religious institutions like all hierarchies have hierophants pontificating dogma from on high and while I will try to educate and share my knowledge as to the traditions of practical ritual and ceremony, ultimately wisdom teaches we must each become the creators of our own way. While I bet working in groups can create amazing personal bonds, any real magician has to know how to work as an individual and through learning how to do this they will learn many things applicable to being an Anarchist, likewise learning about Anarchy can teach the magician a great many things, such as their place in the world.

Neptunian Fantasies

His disappointment in humanity is most severe within himself.

Acting out anachronisms, words without action may be better off left unsaid.

Action without reflection is sure to lead to nowhere.

Weather the storm and hold still, anchor down as best you can, you're in for the ride of your life.

Get your bearings and let the storm pass, then it's off to the second star to the right and straight on till morning.

Cradle the fragile absurdity, it needs a lot of nurturing.

Build it up and hold it, spread a smile across this world.

With an increase of acceptance for the pain comes an increase for capacity of pleasure.

Whats the practicality of bliss?

Nowhere going is our knowing of the foundation of our soul.

All pain is the result of a lack of forgiveness for a world that is different from how you want it.

Forgiveness of them for yourself, forgive yourself for all of them.

Hold still and let the blue flame grow,

Do your best and you will never lose even when you fail.

We are all on the same ship and the storm has just begun,

We all must get a long or we will sail forever in search of our paradise in the sun.

If you accept the idea that humans will do what is right if they really know and accept the truth then it is all too clear by looking at the world we live in that either the truth is not known by anyone, or at least only by those who are dismissed and who have a knowledge considered trivial or untrue. We could even go so far as to say that a person who doesn't take the time to try and understand information which they do not currently accept as true will never change their perspective and so never really learn anything new and ironically it is often these people who are the most insistent in making others agree with them. Knowing this we can come to the conclusion that our best bet for gaining understanding of the real world will not come from mainstream sources of authority. That in fact given the direction the world is going, if we cannot make up our minds as to what the truth is, we can make a good bet that we will come to a better understanding by going in the opposite direction of those who destroy the planet and enslave their fellow Earthlings. For these reasons among many Anarchism and Occultism have a lot to offer all those who seek truth instead of comfort, and who wish to see a world governed only by truth and freedom and not by profit and personal agendas.

When a force is in an environment, no matter how subtle that force is, it will eventually effect the evolution of all that is within its effect through the need of all beings to adapt in any way which can help them. The creature may be completely unaware of it yet if the subtle force helps it to adapt better, after many generations the species will evolve to accentuate certain aspects of itself to deal with it more effectively. There are all kinds of subtle feelings, like emotions but also the parts of mind which we cannot really express to others, the parts of mind which we are sometimes aware of but seldom try to think about. There is a fire which drives us, which makes up our will and determines the spirit in which do a thing, the energy which we empower things with and which manifests as our actions, it can always burn us but we can also evolve to harness its power and feed ourselves. Feelings are more powerful than thoughts as they describe concepts with far greater accuracy and while they are more ambiguous, they can also be so much more intense. Depending on how good you become at identifying such feelings you will notice how your awareness shifts from being totally linguistic to the more ephemeral methods of perception. Since we exist in a universal mind we must learn to become aware of the forces which are present in our minds, but which are subtle, which go unnoticed by the verbal mind and in so doing we can adapt to more of reality, in ways which are beyond what is apparently possible.

Through the shared illusion of physicality, language represents the physical parallel of telepathy between "multiple" discarnate minds. Someone reading these words would hopefully get a feel for what I am saying whether they agree or not, they may not even consciously understand, but still have some intuitive sense. This is how music has such a profound effect as the added vocabulary of the instrumental language can add enormous feeling. In order for magick to be most effective we must become aware of these unarticulated vestiges of knowledge, we must unite the unconscious with the conscious. There is much more than we can imagine, as thought forms solidify into physical reality in order to work magick we must sort out our thoughts and the true feelings behind them, so as to avoid lying to ourselves before manifesting an intentional reality. It is true we should try to have positive thoughts, but the positive part is not so much the words but our feelings about the scenario. If we are in a painful situation it must be fully recognized and the feeling of pain changed congruently according to the will. Once you have the right feelings, the right energy you can create the thought forms which symbolize it for the conscious mind, which will then crystallize into physical reality. If deep down you feel you are lying to yourself you can write pages and pages of affirmations and it wont do you any good, the symbols or words are mostly arbitrary except that we each have preferences about which symbols evoke or contain our true feelings. Know thyself and how you feel about things. Re-cognize the feeling, then purify it appropriately, then concentrate and amplify it. If you know you haven't purified the intention energy effectively then don't concentrate on it, or to put it another way don't charge it until you have truly "positive" feelings about it.

If you have problems being sure of how you feel about something, meditate on it and try and see the benefits of the “negative” experience happening, try to understand what you would learn etc this will allow you to be detached so that you can choose what you want without being in a state of lack or fear. (For this purpose and many others Tarot cards can be extremely helpful) This will help to teach you the lesson that the experience you fear would have created for you if it had been manifested, so that by learning the lessons as much as possible before hand, you lessen any need to experience it directly. The key is to lower all resistance to the “negative” happening as the resistance only creates more energy for it to manifest. If for some reason you cannot be purely positive then its because the experience hasn't been polarized as something which will or will not manifest. If you feel the “negative” will happen and it does then if for no other reason it is to teach you a deeper control of yourself and to practice using the creative energy gauge we call feelings.

Creativity through imagination, which is enacted through love and the will is the most powerful force in the universe as no matter what is currently in creation, the imagination can eventually create something more powerful. Imagination is even more powerful then love to me as it is unformed, endless potential, the actual creator of love as it is the means of supplying that which is loved, this is true at least to the highest spiritual point that is, which is the incomprehensible source where love and imagination unite. In truth we create our own feelings on creation, its all arbitrary so to me its best to practice universal love, but then even if you choose to feel bad you choose it for a reason and its the perfect thing for you at that time. Bad feelings should not be repressed or someone to be made to feel that they are wrong for feeling a certain way. It may be painful but part of you still loves pain, (even that part of you is in another body causing it) if nothing else as a means of increasing awareness and personal strength, that is all, that some part still feels the need to experience it. Even if you hate something you love to hate it, and you love to see its opposite or yourself as superior, so in the end there is nothing but love that is possible. All “negativity” is illusion, we are just very tricky creatures.

Ulterior motives and contrary desires leave us confused, but even if you have more than one positive desire completely unrelated to each other, in terms of manifesting it's best to focus on one thing at a time so that you do not dilute your creative potential. There are no limits, but correct focus is crucial otherwise you will be struggling to go in multiple directions at once and end up going nowhere. If you are really unfocused as many people are you may go somewhere you didn't even think of, some combination of trajectories from all the conflicting forces within you, which is one reason why life can seem so random to so many people. The more singularly focused your intention, the faster and more completely you will get your desire. Right now the Earth has people all pushing and pulling and trying to get us sorted out, fighting and moving according to some will or another, but when we learn to work together then we can move the collective mind to unparalleled and undreamed wonders of creation. If we could learn to sort out the manifesting energies of the Earth and work together as one, we will each have universal consciousness, we can then combine all our power in unison and expand all our awareness together and then in this equality experience more bliss than anyone has ever had. On a global scale we are so conflicted we are literally tearing ourselves apart with unfocused contrary wills and this is the direct result of acting selfishly and trying to control everyone, something that is ultimately impossible since by building only yourself up, you must bring others down, and this breeds resentment and rebellion. Instead we need to get people working together as a whole, in a way that is for the benefit of all and this can only really be achieved through Anarchy, which is the societal level of this metaphysical system functioning properly. When you get your own personal sphere of creative will in order, with all your sub personalities and desires unified in their intentions, then you will have found the key to working with the manifesting power, that which has been called throughout history “magick” (spelled with a K to differentiate it from stage magic) and this is as you will see crucial to getting people to live in peace and equality.

Feelings mixed or pure are nothing but different levels of energy which can be manipulated according to will. If you feel this isn't true, its because your fear levels regarding the fact that you don't have control are much too high, thus creating that reality, you may also have a certain love of not taking responsibility for your own reality creating potential. Once you recognize the different energies for what they are, rather than some unnamed fear or intuition they can be dealt with much more easily. Once you feel that you know, or even mostly feel that you know that the desire or creative energy is present, then your feeling on the intention can be amplified and this is achieved through focus on that energy by using various techniques which become a ritual. The more you use the ritual, the more positive your feelings will be about the efficacy of ritual and so you will begin to take on a new level of consciousness which will be better for unifying the feelings and energy. There are many possible ways of directing the will and intent, some are elaborate and at times incredibly complex, others are simple but through the Occult we gain time tested methods which can overcome the conflicts in the mind, which is what is commonly called the practice of Occultism.

This is not to say the old is always better for everyone, or that nothing new is good, but that there are benefits from learning from methods which have evolved for thousands of years, however you should always use whichever way you “feel” is most effective, traditional or not. For some people elaborate rituals are best while others like simple rituals and in groups other factors become involved which make it important to keep everyone together. Rituals may not be exactly crucial as it can be as simple as thinking of the intention once and resting assured that it will happen, however if you are conflicted or want to increase your awareness or leave your body, use entheogens or do a number of other things, then positive thinking alone is very limited. By going through the practice of ritual magick you can hone skills and psychic abilities which allow you take total control of your mind and a beginner can become adept much faster and more completely than trying to do it all with no practice, no method and no real plan. Using affirmations like mantras can be effective if that's what moves you, however working in a comprehensive and consistent manner, learning the methods of doing rituals utilizes deeply embedded programming and beliefs within ourselves which are the result of living in a physical reality. We have programmed ourselves to think we make physical changes by doing physical things, but this is not necessary, we've just made it so in our minds, however we can use that programming in ritual to add physical elements to increase our positive thinking. The rituals themselves have no power we do not give them, but the fact remains rituals are excellent practice for visualization, concentration and becoming more aware of feelings and energy and how to direct them. Rituals do this by providing a frame work for intentions and energies or feelings to be symbolized, created and then directed and finally amplified.

Rituals are invaluable as anchors of focus and concentration supplied with each predetermined step, this is especially true in groups when you want everyone working together at the same time. Since any single person who has mastered magick has unlimited creative potential and energy and is capable of manifesting absolutely anything, it could very well be said groups are also unnecessary, unless you have a lot of doubt, or are battling wills with some other person. That said groups can be great in a number of ways such as with more complex rituals like evocations or communicating with entities, or there is invocations where a medium is temporarily possessed in which case it is very helpful to have someone record what is being said, or to talk with the entity. There are other times also when it is practical to have help, such as with sex magick, or when you leave your body, or are on entheogens and need a “sitter” or if you want to practice telepathy or simply produce a greater effect. Not to mention it's enjoyable to be in spiritual atmospheres with other people and can be great for bonding and creating community and if the people who join you know what they are doing, then it never hurts to have more energy as doubts can be more easily overturned if you have others confirming a positive magickal reality.

You may be able to manifest things with little more than a few positive thoughts, but ritual is still important, by spending more time and putting more effort into explaining to your subconscious that which you wish to do, you can elaborate in much more detail specifically what it is you want to do. Since we are capable of all things, not all things are easily summed up into an affirmation and ritual can aid with this by using a variety of symbolic languages taking a variety of forms. Rituals can be used to tune into specific energies or contact entities which is not very practical otherwise, New Age “channelers” can do this, but since they have little to no practical knowledge they get whatever spirit happens to be around and wants to play games with people, or impersonate someone. These are generally not spirits at all but low level energy vampires that will say whatever it takes to keep you focused on them. Through ritual, once you know what you are doing you can get very specific entities who actually are much more aware than you, all the while shutting out less helpful ones from getting in the way. When you do a ritual you let your subconscious know that what is happening is more important than everyday thoughts, you are putting more energy into making that intent a reality and so the subconscious will put more effort in as well, since it will know which intentions to differentiate from the everyday thoughts. By using the same methods repeatedly you can build up the “positive” energy associated with those methods and in the symbols of the rituals and so because your mind knows it has worked so many times before, you accumulate much more energy than if you are always doing it differently.

You can to some degree program your mind without ritual, but if you tell your subconscious that it is your will for something to happen, such as an initiation, or a vow to dedicate yourself to your spiritual path, or perhaps to consecrate some magickal tool or talisman, the added effort affirms to the universe it is much more important to you than something you don't think is worth consecrating. The very intention of these ritual acts proclaims to the universe and yourself that it is a special holy object, or that you have entered a new phase of growth through initiation, you need no other authority to do this but your own sincere will and as simple as it may sound, it gets the ball rolling on what can be powerful psychological and spiritual changes. In this way doing an initiation ritual makes a big difference and shows more sincerity than if you just casually tell yourself, “oh I want to follow a spiritual path.” If you preform a ritual you show to the universe through action that you really do want to follow a spiritual path and not just read some fluffy feel good self help books, you also give your mind an opportunity to get into trance and meditative states in order to open yourself up to different energies and experiences. Ritual is basically active mediation and so by practising it, you gain much more ability to control your mind than simply by trying to have positive thoughts, you can then use it to explore the mind and activate or strengthen specific predefined aspects according to will. If you do get into using rituals then you will learn the importance and power of how we assign meaning to different things, which ultimately creates our reality and identity.

For example, the consecration of all the items you will regularly use in rituals will clearly make an impression in your subconscious that an item is not a stick, but a wand or “magickal weapon” which has a very specific and utilitarian meaning for manifesting the will. The four most common and basic consecrated items relate to the four traditional magickal elements, fire, water, air and Earth, these are not to be confused as being only the literal physical manifestations but symbolic of aspects of reality and consciousness, each of the ritual items is also one of the four suits of the tarot. Fire is the will and driving force in your being, it is what gives you high spirits and your passions and it is represented in ritual as a wand, it is also represented in the state of matter known as plasma and the astral creature associated with it is the salamander or dragon. Water represents emotions, intuition, imagination and the irrational parts of consciousness, it is represented in ritual as a cup, generally filled with water though it is symbolic of all liquid states of matter, it's astral creature is the undine or mermaid. Air represents the intellect or the linguistic part of the mind, your thoughts and rationality, it is represented by a sword or dagger, its elemental creature is the sylph, or flying fairy, it also represents all gases. Earth has gnomes for its astral creature and a pentacle as its ritual tool, though a crystal could easily do, and in the tarot Earth can be represented by the suit of coins, Earth represents all physical forms and your body, all states of matter, though solids especially. While I did mention a state of matter for each of the other elements, this would technically be the Earthy aspect of each element, so gases would be the Earth of air, liquids the Earth of water.

All things besides the astral creature or “elementals” as they are called have some combination of elements, only the elementals are pure in their elemental energy, so while the casual observer might think the four element system of classifying everything is naive and simplistic, they are ignorant, all elements on the periodic table are represented in the element of Earth. But all things have some aspect which can be related to each element, the explanation I have given is very basic and incomplete, but by trying to think of how to classify things with the qualities found in the four elements you will be able to flesh out for yourself the general nature of each. To avoid imbalance its important that if you are working with the elements, either have all the tools present or wait until you have all four, then through consecration you will activate their potential and start to think positive about their ability to manifest and direct the energies they represent.

By clearly spelling out all the details of your intent you go a long way to getting the subconscious to understand your will, if you get into scrying (such as looking into a crystal ball) let your mind know that your intent for this particular crystal ball is for scrying, or that your chosen knife is to be used as an “athame” etc. Once your subconscious clearly knows what the ritual item means in relation to your intentions for it (as shown through a consecration ritual) it will work a lot better than if you just start using the tools in that way. Once your ritual items are consecrated accordingly they should be treated as sacred and used only for their magickal purposes, to do otherwise is to tell your subconscious that their ritual meaning is not that important to you. The ritual items are by themselves powerless but once you have consecrated them they become charged and powerful by your will, you think positively about their ability, so it is we can learn to associate any symbol we want, with any intention we want. So by manipulation of the consecrated symbol we can create a physical representation of our will to fulfil ritual actions to manipulate energy and consciousness for whatever other intentions we symbolize in the future. Since the subconscious as in dreams largely works in symbols, rituals and metaphorical visualizations speak to it in its own language, which is much more effective than trying to force yourself into writing or saying affirmations that have little to no real magickal or spiritual association for you. As it is more the feelings behind “positive thoughts” which manifest your intention, symbols can be much better at evoking and directing those feelings than words since they can take on all kinds of customized associations, which have no other meaning to your mind, thus they represent a purer energy.

Ritual is a means of exploring and communicating with deeper levels of your mind in a safe and systematic manner, in fact it is these rituals which are ultimately the most interesting and amazing. Learning how to create physical change can be useful in terms of learning about what you really want and as practice, not to mention taking care of your body, but through ritual (especiallyentheogenic rituals) it is possible to control the mind and open awareness to all kinds of realms and states right up to the point of universal awareness. Although it may be hard to begin with, once you start to get the hang of the work, the more you pursue it, the more you will want to pursue it and the more effective it will become. By using different psychological maps like Yggdrasil the Norse world tree, the Kabbalist tree of life, the Hindu or Buddhist cosmologies or any number of other maps, (Pagan pantheons etc) you can explore clearly defined regions of your mind and the non physical realities in a manner that has a specific means of interaction and meaning. Learning the symbol systems is like learning the buttons on your mind's control panel, you can eventually make your own but it helps to get inspiration and draw from the teachings of others.

In my experience, learning how to work with and actually operate your mind is much more effective for manifesting or spiritual growth than basically trying to plead with the mind nicely as New Age practice, or simple prayer has people do. This is especially true in attaining mystical states of awareness, or directing the mind through states created byentheogens. Through rituals we have an effective method of creating thought forms and mental programs which can help us to get what we want in the physical and navigate, as well as utilize the astral and non physical worlds. We can sort out the tangled mess of memes and cognitive dissonance that is most peoples minds, which most often have been built up in no specific way, other than what society has attempted to program into everyone. We can learn with a certain level of mastery and care how to personify things according to intentions and then with rituals set up systematic methods of programming your mind, banishing or invoking these different aspects of yourself which you can get rid of or strengthen. Wasted neurotic energies can be transmuted into more useful ones, so that they are more efficient and manifest what is really desired and useful, rather than being used for whatever happens to enter our mind unconsciously. The dealing with of doubt, apathy and laziness are perhaps the first things that must be sorted out so that your mind can become more focused on more important things. The more you use your symbol system, the more meaningful it will be to your subconscious and to you, the more powerful it will become, the more you will be confident you can create the world you want, the more you can help those in need. Ideally you should be performing some basic ritual and meditation everyday, even more than most things, the more effort you put into this practice, the more you will get out of it, frustration and apathy are common in the beginning, but do it passionately and you will increase your passions.

For all these reasons and more rituals are incredibly valuable but it should always be understood that it is the individual that has the power not the ritual, we create our own limitations and overcoming them is the hardest part, but from these lessons I know it's better to say they are easily overcome, with the right awareness. The full importance and significance of ritual cannot be explained, it must be experienced, the changes and benefits to regular ritual and meditative work may not yield immediate results, but with continued and determined practice you will learn a mastery of your mind that was previously unimaginable and will in many ways remain undefinable. Not only will you gain added depth to the layers of information you perceive at all times, but you will learn to create specific mindsets within yourself that will allow you to manipulate and control your consciousness in a conscious way, instead of being at the mercy of what are for most people, unconscious forces. The fact that these forces are unconscious to people who do not practice make it impossible to convey the full depth of ritual and its relevance to reality, physical, metaphysical and psychological. A whole new perspective will form from the increased ability for cognition, observation, visualization and concentration and along with lucid dreaming and "the art of memory" you will gain skills that are of value to all people, spiritual or not. If you are an atheist you may just start to change your mind from the experiences that come from sincere practice at manifesting the truth, (without any presumptions) and you may just gain a new context that allows you to understand what all the fuss is about with religion. (This is especially true with wise use of entheogens) If you proceed to develop and integrate this new context, this new perspective of ritual, you will change in ways you could not of expected, for if you are succeeding in your practice you will use it to see all things in a totally new way.

If you can create a death rebirth experience like I had on LSD, if you have a glimpse of what lies beyond rationality and the ego you will be changed in ways that defy description. Like all change this can be painful, and with dedication this can be an unending change, but with the gnosis of the Shamanic initiation, when you learn to see the spirit world, you will be able to work rituals in ways that are ripe and pregnant with meaning. Although there is no harm in repeating this experience consciously and carefully, with one good experience at least you will afterwards also get much more benefit from smaller doses. Once you can handle total oneness, you will of learned a greater mastery of working with the plant (or chemical) spirit and once you master ritual you master your perceptions.

To avoid confusion I will give a very basic explanation of different kinds of "magick," but this is a huge subject of which there are many sources of information for anyone who cares to look. The classic definition in Occult literature being from the main Occult figure of the 20th century, that notorious and enigmatic madman Aleister Crowley. "Magick is the art and science of creating change in conformity with the will." Say what you will about Crowley's morality or sanity, he undeniably had a way with words and was very learned on the subject of the Occult, even if he was an ego maniac he knew the intellectual stuff and understanding his work will help to understand all those who were influenced by him, just make sure you question everything he says. (As Crowley himself will tell you)

By the above definition it should be noted that every successful action is an act of magick and that no ritual or spiritual understanding is required for these simple acts, if it is your will to lift up your hand and you do so, it is an act of magick. This is among others reasons because physicality is an illusion, as I explained in chapter two, we exist in a group mind, all physical events begin on the astral as energy, all human actions begin as an idea and then in a sense congeal in to space time. Learning how to use energy to achieve the will then is helpful for all acts of will and as all energy in a sense emanates from the one and is united in oneness, all acts are divine, even those we consider “evil.” It should also be noted that this implies even if a ritual is done, there is nothing less magickal about helping the intention in a mundane, physical, logical way, indeed it can often be disastrous to “wait for a miracle.” Just because when properly expressed the will does not necessarily require your physical help, doesn't mean you should make things as hard as possible for the universe, or that you should “tempt fate.”

Now that we know what magick is lets look at the most common types of magick. I suppose the first thing to do is clear up confusions about “black magick” and “white magick.” There are numerous definition of these, generally speaking though this is definitely something that has to be defined individually by each person, but the following guidelines show how Anarchism is implied by Occult philosophy. The definitions are basically as follows, black magick is any act of magick which goes against any other person's will, or that harms someone. When considering Crowley's definition it is quite apparent that this kind of magick happens quite often and is practised by all of us at some point. This generally means that when an act of magick is cast on someone specifically to effect them personally without their express permission it is black magick. On the most basic level it could be defined as any act which is not Anarchist, clearly by this definition any government, any hierarchy demands the use of black magick and our current society and education system is nothing but the most advanced and coercive form of black magick. “White magick” was called “theurgy” in the past and is basically any act that brings someone who is willing to greater spiritual awareness, specifically yourself but willing groups are fine. In terms of less mundane magick this may be communication with spiritual entities, use of divinatory tools to come a greater understanding of the self, astral projection or as far as I am concerned the proper use of entheogens. Yoga meaning to yolk or bring to union with divine would be a prime example of white magick.

Strictly speaking healing someone may not be considered white magick by this definition, especially without permission. Though it is certainly arguable that healing and learning to heal will increase ones spiritual understanding, or at least the other persons, after all if they are dead or bed ridden it can be hard to do your spiritual practices! However sometimes people get sick for a reason and so you could actually be impeding spiritual growth, I make no claims of being a healer but the general rule of thumb is to heal only those who ask for it.

There is a third term for magick not as well known by the layperson known as “grey magick” which is magick intended to bring about objects or events to the life of the practitioner, or someone who has asked the practitioner to help them. This relatively unknown term for magick is ironically what most people imagine when they hear the word magic, it means getting things in your physical life the way you want it. There is certainly nothing wrong with making things in your life better, asceticism is not required in the Occult, but I personally do believe its a mistake to only focus on the grey, if you have no interest in raising your awareness in some way, then you are bound to cause problems for yourself, bound to set an intention for your magickal growth that leads to all kinds of egotism and self deception. Doing a ritual to bring money into your life is not a bad thing, if you are using it so that you spend less time working and more time doing yoga then it is white magick, if you use the money to hire a hit man then it would be black magick, so really this is a pretty subjective kind of magick. Grey magick is neither good or evil, it just helps you live your life better so you can focus on more important things as well as get your priorities straitened out. Making someone fall in love with you, even if you truly love them is still technically black magick, it is much better to do a spell to find your true love, a person who is better for you and willing, or you can make yourself in to the kind of person who can be loved. Ironically, despite his reputation as a horrible person, Crowley's definition of black magick was essentially anything but white magick, he was pretty cut and dry about it, as far as I know there was no grey for him in that way. To paraphrase him, any act of magick which is not for attaining conversation with one's "Holy Guardian Angel" is an act of black magick, though you could do "grey magick" to aid in this goal.

I highly recommend anyone doing any act of ritual magick to do some kind of divination before hand such as with the runes, tarot or I Ching to get a better understanding of certain unforeseen consequences and intentions, you might just find out getting what you think you want is not what will make you happy. Ritual magick is like computer programming in that you will get exactly what you express in a literal word for word way, ("garbage in, garbage out") the unconscious which is the bridge to the universal mind does not understand nuances or figures of speech, nor does it understand negative statements like "doesn't" or "can't." When selecting how to put your intention, keep in mind the universe needs intentions in a strait forward manner with hopefully as much specific detail as possible. This does not mean it is necessary to have a two hundred page poem as a spell, but knowing the details that you want to assign the symbol of focus is important. The acquisition of wealth and physical pleasures can serve it's purposes, but it should be understood there are more important things than personal ego gratification and I strongly suggest you stay within Anarchist principles.

Now that we have a basic understanding of the spectrum of magick I'll give a very basic explanation of some the different forms of magickal practice. Aleister Crowley was primarily a practitioner of what is called "high magick" or "ceremonial magick" and this is generally derived from Islamic and Judeo-Christian Schools of thought, especially Qabbalistic and Gnostic symbolism, though Pagan gods and Goddesses such as in the Hermetic tradition are easily and often used. Ceremonial magick is often concerned with use of spirits, divinities, angels, demons etc getting them to do the magicians will. Banishing rituals, evocation and invocation are commonly used in ceremonial magick, it is generally the most complicated systems and has the least improvisation, following a predetermined ceremony, but it has many other applications. Ceremonial magick uses traditional symbol systems which are often rooted in religious ideas and so can be very dramatic and to some tastes even pompous, certainly many argue it is needlessly complicated but it all depends on the individual and the intentions, different people prefer to get into trances or meditative states in different ways.

Although it is generally a mish mash of western and middle eastern religions, one should not be scared off by the Christian or Jewish symbolism, even though there is some symbolism and entities from these religions, you do not have to be in those religions to work with them and you can customize the systems according to your taste and still use it effectively with other symbolism. There is no doubt that there is much to learn from these systems and in fact since the various theocracies destroyed all above ground Pagan religions, pretty much all of modern western magick systems were at least in some way influenced by them. As they are the most complete magickal systems they are a gold mine of ideas for those who want to use their own symbolism. They can easily be modified to contact all manner of Pagan divinities, or even Satan if that is what you really want. By studying magick you are not looking for a religion but a means of entering and working with the spirit world and for this purpose anyone would do well to study ceremonial magick. In many cases we could say that ceremonial magick is one of the most common forms of white magick in that it often calls upon divine entities to increase awareness, or is commonly used for things other than worldly manifestation, though it definitely can be used for either black or grey intentions.

Some examples of traditional western high magick are Qabbalistic, Goetic and Enochian systems, these are most often learned through the group called the Golden Dawn or with Aleister Crowley's Occult school of Thelema, but a variety of other schools of thought exist as well. There are many grimoires which can also be included under the heading of ceremonial magick and in fact if the word "grimoire" is being used it is generally referring to ceremonial magick. There are definitely ceremonies in the Pagan religions, Witchcraft, Druidism and Asatru as well as Voodoo and many others, even Buddhism or Hinduism could be said to have some ceremonial magick in them, but in terms of key words for research, “ceremonial magick” generally refers to the magick of the Abrahamic and Hermetic traditions.

Ironically despite the negative associations of magick within Judaism, Christianity and Islam, these cultures have provided some of the most elaborate and detailed Occult systems in the world. This is because depending on your spiritual outlook a spell and ritual can be just a fancy prayer, either to something external or to your inner divinity, but it is a prayer done with total faith in its success, so that “magick” is really just praying in the most effective manner according to previous experimental knowledge. The only real difference is that when such prayers succeed they are euphemistically called “miracles” but when someone of a different religion does it, it is magick. I would go so far as to say the demonization of magick is actually a spell cast by the followers of Abrahamic religion to delegitimize the authenticity of other traditions and to engage in magickal warfare against those other faiths, it is a way of making Abrahamic magick look better than other forms, as well as making people afraid and ignorant of their own power, thus forcing them to rely on a priest class. As our thoughts manifest reality, by getting people to believe only their religion's magick is good, it keeps those followers from empowering the magick of other religions and so concentrates their energy to conduct spiritual warfare against the rest. Likewise as Christians try to convert people through things like threats of hellfire, this idea that non Christian religions practice black magick allows Christians to spread fear and doubt in the minds of those they would convert, thus weakening that religions ability to perform miracles.

Next there is what is called “low magic,” “sympathetic magick” or “natural magick,” but although it is called “low” it should not be thought of as any less effective or in any way inferior to “high” magick. Its approach to expressing intent is to use physical representations or props to symbolize the different factors of the situation which are then manipulated to bring about the desired effect. The classic example is the Voodoo doll, but there are many others and this kind of magick is more prevalent in the Pagan schools, Witchcraft or the practices of Indigenous peoples. One method is to create what is called a “pusanga” by the South American Shamans, this is a tincture or oil based herbal potion contained within a bottle that is carried around with person or used in ritual depending on the intention. Plants in one way or another are often used in natural magick as different plants are thought have different uses, both medicinally and magickally. Sometimes herbal baths are used, especially in terms of healing in some way, psychologically, physically or spiritually. The Q'ero Shamans of Peru use what they call a “despacho,” in which they will wrap items like various foods and natural items representing various variables in a giant leaf as offerings to the spirits of nature like Mother Earth. You may not have giant leaves where you live but it's the idea that's important. Other means of natural magick include “candle magick” where each colour has a candle and a specific energy or meaning, while other forms of natural magick might involve burning incense or herbs, or using different kinds of trees, crystals, stones, metals or food, perhaps giving an offering to the Gods/Goddesses, spirits or Faeries. Statues of appropriate Divinities, idols or fetishes can be used in this manner as the representation of whatever energy you want to tap in to.

This method is usually approached in a much less systematized and predetermined way than ceremonial magick and the practitioner is free to come up with whatever ritual intuitively feels right for them. If magick is to be done on someone then to have some of their hair or finger nails or anything that comes from them is highly useful, this is the idea of sympathetic magick, that pieces of something contains a link or energy from. The idea being that they have a sympathetic or resonant energy with each other so that through manipulation of one, the other is changed as well according to intention. (not unlike entanglement theory in quantum physics) The more basic idea can be understood that any two things that are related in some way or share qualities, usually visibly looking alike, or sharing some basic symbolic character, like a plant resembling some part of the body, can be used to effect that which it is like because they share the same kind of energy. This is known as the “doctrine of signatures” and another example could be using various parts of animals which have symbolic or energetic meaning to you, like a bird feather or the antlers of a deer. (I don't necessarily mean sacrificing them, but having respect and not letting any part of an animal you kill go to waste, or finding them in the woods is a good omen.) Other forms might be using someones picture, or even tying knots in rope in a ritualistic way, but all methods are wide open to the individual and limited only by the imagination. One way to think of it is that you are setting up a predetermined symbolic language for your subconscious using objects, when you manipulate those symbols, your subconscious can better understand your will. This is also important for your ego, which will not have the same doubts as it might with affirmations, since it does not feel like you are trying to convince yourself of something, more that you are doing something that will make your will happen.

The term "high magick" is based on the class system of the medieval times, with those literate and educated people living in cities, which were built high up on the land and higher up on the hierarchy, utilizing script and symbol, astrology and what were at the time expensive tools. The common people of the lower class lived low in the farms where the water would go and practised "low magick" or folk magick, not really having the means to do ceremonial magick. Since the Christian conversion was much more gradual than most people realize, many Pagan traditions lingered on in revolt against the theocracy. Heretics in a theocracy are by definition rebels against the state and so many disaffected peasants would of been attracted to things like "Witchcraft," which in some cases would of actually been peasants sabotaging the rule of their feudal masters, both magickally and physically. The word "Pagan" originally meant a person who lived in the country, actually often a pejorative term more like hillbilly or bumpkin, since Christians primarily lived in cities and the more urban environments making up the merchant class and aristocracy, the Pagans were the enslaved peasants. "Witches" or heretics then were often people who wished to remain wild and free, who were against the establishment and who refused to follow the theocracy which had been imposed on them by force. (For example lighting people on fire to terrorize the peasants into submission)

As I have said, ceremonial magick is itself primarily Abrahamic and as such those most learned in it's lore were those who had the books and time to study them, that is the rich. Ironically the grimoire often reputed to be the most evil was said to have been written by Pope Honorius III, which he used to summon up the devil and other aristocrats in hells monarchy. (kinda takes the fun out of Satanism) This is but one example of the aristocratic and church based forms of the magick, others include "The Enchiridion" of Pope Leo III and the "Grand Grimoire" said to have been translated from the Hebrew by a Dominican Jesuit named Plaingiere. While modern mainstream historians contest much of these claims of authorship, they have their own bias and undoubtedly there was no shortage of aristocrats and church men studying ceremonial magick. At the very least the attempt to connect the grimoires with these authors shows the real authors see themselves as belonging to the same traditions, IE Christianity and especially Catholicism. With other examples including the Abbot Johannes Trithemius and the Jesuit Athanasius Kircher and basically every other author of ceremonial magick grimoires, not to mention various guilds like Freemasonry using a wide variety of complicated ritual systems, it is clear that high magick is related to the upper class and aristocrats. Low magick was for the lower class and if it wasn't Christianized, it was taking your life in to your hands, but then even if you Christianized it, anyone could accuse you of being a Witch because the Christian mob ruled through fear. The theocracy (which includes aristocrats under the divine right of kings) had the monopoly on magick and while outside the church it was still quite heretical, the aristocrats could more easily get away with such things. So we can see a clear divide between the more abstract literate and mathematical forms of magick and those of which relied more on herbalism and Shamanic wisdom to accomplish the more practical goals of the serfs.

Although this high magick is generally associated with rulers and tyrants, today most people can read and so at least in terms of inspiration, it still provides many important ideas for Pagans and all those who want to learn about magick. Writing and education was also only practised by the upper classes and yet these are definitely useful things (otherwise you couldn't read this!) so we should not dismiss ceremonial magick simply because it was often the more aristocratic people practising it. Christians burned Europe's Shamans and with them died their oral traditions and so the sad fact is that ceremonial magick makes up the vast majority of historically based Occultism. You may hate Judaism but Qabalah is the most complete system we have as Jews managed to preserve the ancient wisdom of many cultures from being destroyed by Christianity. Though they made it their own they actually preserved the ancient pre-Christian Pagan ceremonial magick of which it is ultimately based and so luckily we can make very effective modern reconstructions using ideas from ceremonial magick. Middle eastern magick as in the Sufi tradition is perhaps even better as Islam was in many ways more tolerant and preserved knowledge, even some knowledge it found heretical.

Depending on whether you are more feelings based or intellectually based, right or left brained, you can decide which way, high or low is best for you. I do think it would be a mistake however to underestimate the simplicity of natural magick when properly executed and it can be a very powerful thing to work with the energies found in nature. If the intention is pure and real, the form of expression is arbitrary, ideally I take the position that balance is best, but this may differ given the make up of the psyche of each individual. High magick in the medieval Christian and Jewish sense, to me seems to have largely been created by people who wanted to have the creative power to be outside themselves. There are definitely benefits to working with "external" powers but to do this properly it is very important to recognize the divine within you, to avoid falling into "worship" that is based on your lack of self esteem or awareness, and to avoid becoming dependent on other beings for all acts of magick when you are quite capable of doing it yourself. No doubt some medieval magicians were "god fearing" but I am sure others of a more heretical type had a much more Pagan, pantheistic view of things.

I believe all religions were started by what are essentially magicians and as so often happens, metaphors become taken literally, the knowledge that humans are united with the divine becomes lost and the entities of the religion become solely exterior entities, rather than magical forces which are present in all things. Still, believing in purely literal and separate entities in magick works, because even if you are mistaken as to the nature of the spirits, they will work so long as you have faith in them and feed them your energy, this can make it easier in some ways than low magick since many have problems having faith in their own ability. Pagans using natural magick do not generally have the same problem as Christians, since they are often pantheists and they have pantheons which show the subjective nature of the one divine force, so they do not feel sinful about claiming their spiritual powers. Both systems have their pros and cons, both methods also often incorporate astrology or at least the phases of the moon.

A third method which is perhaps the most difficult (at least for some) is the Shamanic use of trance states. This could by some be considered natural magick in that it is Pagan and definitely nature oriented and although a Shaman may use natural magick often, it seems to me when a Shaman enters a trance and voyages out of the body this is a bit different. There is no real traditional term for Shamanic trance magick besides maybe astral magick, or kinds of white magick, but I am separating it myself to explain something a bit transcendent to the others and so you will understand how scholars use the terms. Shamanic voyaging is done usually to heal, which is done either by clearing out someones energy body or by dealing with spirits who are causing the problem, through soul retrieval etc. Other traditional functions of the Shaman includes finding lost items, acting as a psychopomp or hunting game which is also done out of the body. Shamanic voyaging is perhaps the best method of doing white magick as it sends you directly to the spirit world. However without using large amounts of entheogens it can be hard for people to leave their body, and even with entheogens it is often more than a lot of people want to handle. The use of entheogens is worth separating in that it will generally change the nature of the ritual to a large degree, depending on the substance memorizing long incantations and spells is going to be hard, but open ended and intuitive ritual can be used to direct the nature of the trip in a very big way, allowing for very intentional and predetermined entheogenic experiences, which eliminate the loss of focus and maximize the potential for the growth and control of awareness.

Although Shamans may try to attract prosperity for their tribe like with a rain dance, they generally come from relatively non materialistic cultures and so much of the same standards are not so easy to differentiate, even with black magick, in many cultures it is well known, if you know how to heal, you know how to make others sick. The reason why I am separating Shamanism is that it is largely totally non physical, mostly taking place in a whole different realm of reality. While the others utilize energies on the astral and all traditions have astral travel, it is not nearly as prevalent as in Shamanism. Another key difference is that there is no orthodox Shaman magick, there is no set method, while there are mentor/apprentice relationships between humans, each Shaman usually learns from the spirits they contact, to gain their own style and methods of magick.

Pagan religions of Europe are definitely Shamanic in their own right, but clearly we have lost much of our knowledge of those methods, so it is if you research the Pagan and natural magick it is more scholarly, systematic and religious then what you would read about a Native of the amazon jungles practising and with less emphasis on trance states and psychic abilities. Though it should always be kept in mind there is definitely nothing to stop you combining aspects of all the methods I have mentioned and finding what works best for you, what you find most appealing and effective. No one way is best, all three methods in some ways overlap and have similarities to which those interested must find what they are suited to. These three approaches generally have some kind of religious context though in recent times many practitioners have a more psychological perspective, or at least have no problem using various gods and spirits from various religions. (this is called being "eclectic") Pagans and Shamans have definite ceremonial practices and work with spirits, especially those found in nature. Pagans and ceremonial magicians definitely go into trance states just like any Shaman. There is no doubt Shamans and Magicians definitely utilize props, in the case of the Qabbalah there are books filled with correspondences of how things are connected, though often this is more abstract and systematic then what I described as natural magick. So it is all of these are connected and anyone who wishes to learn magick should become aware of all three to create their own system. With study we can see from all the cultures of the world the underlying principles of how humans direct their magickal will and interact with the spirit world and it is clear that despite superficial cultural differences there is much agreement, but this is hardly surprising since all religions, all spiritual traditions even the Jewish and Christian are rooted in Shamanism.

Living in the information age, a world where books can be attained regarding the practices of mystical traditions from around the world has made it clear to some, that we should be experimenting to find the most important factors for magick to function and this has led to the rise of what is called "Chaos Magic." This school of Occultism ascribes to the idea that we decide what reality is and that it is our beliefs that have the power, not the things we believe in. It has tried to find the common elements of these systems reducing them to their most fundamental principles in order to find what works. It does not have values of good and evil or rigid views on anything except for individual determination of reality. In many ways it is the most scientific of magick philosophies but through its total reductionism may lack some of the aspects of spiritual growth that are in other philosophies, this is of course all dependent on the individual "Chaote" since each person is left to find what works for them and some of them find no value in thinking of it in spiritual terms. In fact you could be an atheist and work Chaos magick, if you are an atheist for whatever reason you could substitute the word Chaos for each time I have used the word divine or something like that. Although I am not really an atheist I quite like this because it is all inclusive, "ontological Anarchy." The basic idea behind Chaos magick is that all possibilities can happen within Chaos, which is the underlying order of all things, through the will and belief we can choose whatever reality we want. It is not a philosophy based on supposed absolute truth, it probably shouldn't even be called a philosophy, but it is something which attempts to help the individual create their own language for understanding the creative force. It is completely DIY magick, often drawing on totally original spirits, gods and rituals or drawing on things from culture that are not normally associated with the Occult. For these reasons it resonates strongly with me as it illustrates ideas I've had before I ever heard of Chaos magick, that all possibilities must exist and it is up to us to choose what we want. For those who like to mix and match traditions or totally start from scratch it will provide you with a lot of insight, for Chaos magick practicality is key, as well as opening up the mind to be comfortable believing in all traditions.

Within all the different kinds of magick it is generally helpful to be in some kind of trance state, in Chaos magick they call this going into gnosis, this is a pretty relative term as with all terms in Chaos magick and there are varying degrees of this. There are many ways that people can reach these trance states, perhaps gnosis isn't quite the proper term in the traditional Gnostic sense, but if you read about Chaos magick that is what they will call it, it is differentiated from spiritual gnosis in that it is "knowing" that your will shall be accomplished, though this very well could be because you have spiritual gnosis as well, it is not necessarily attached to Gnosticism. Chaos gnosis can be achieved through diverse means, from pain, anger, laughter, sex, or strong emotion in general, spinning in a circle, specific body positions, hyper ventilation, meditations, mantras,entheogens or drugs, dancing, drumming etc. The list goes on and on, you can also combine different methods by say, moshing high on acid, thus combining dancing, pain, an entheogen, you could also do this while turning in a circle around an altar. However the middle of a public mosh pit is perhaps not the best place to do a complex ritual, luckily you can make rituals very simple, or maybe you just have a kick ass coven or working group that can get to work once gnosis is achieved, setting up the ritual and maybe even a musical spell to go with the moshing.

People often debate about what is the best way to achieve trance states, some groups like Christians go so far as to call pretty much anything but prayer Satanic, even though doing a hail Mary is technically a mantra. I personally think its a matter of taste and that you should combine methods whenever applicable. I don't think entheogens will necessarily take you to the same places as a Zen master goes, but combining visualizations and meditations with psychedelics seem to exponentially amplify their effectiveness for me and many others. I am not a Zen master so I cannot really say, but I do know entheogens have given me the most powerful experiences of my life by far, though I do think it would be a big mistake to rely on them alone and not learn ritual and meditative techniques to make the most of it.

Getting into a powerful state of gnosis can be done without any techniques, its as simple as knowing, and through the stillness of mind of samadhi which simply has to be allowed to happen, there is no effort involved, but with it you can achieve whatever you want. However for most people the idea of achieving stillness and realizing oneness is pretty hard, the above techniques and others I have not mentioned are methods of bypassing the ego or conscious mind to give access to deeper levels of the mind/soul. Aspects of the rituals are non linguistic and so the fears of the ego can be superseded through direct communication with the unconscious. Since the ego operates in mundane physicality it is not very important for travelling to the subtler realms and interacting with the etheric forces. By getting into a trance state, hopefully in a state of oneness you are by far better able to carry out your intentions metaphysically, once this is achieved you can continue with the rest of the ritual which is about fulfilling the intentions.

Its important to recognize that Chaos in "Chaos magick" is not quite what most people would think, as for most people it has connotations of destruction and even evil, there is no good or evil in Chaos, not even really destruction, there is only the one underlying unknowable incomprehensible thing beyond all recognizable order. Really this is just a new spin on some very old ideas like "the All" of Hermeticism, or the "Pleroma" in Gnosticism and in fact it is from the Hellenistic Pagans that we get the word Chaos, as it is the primordial thing from which everything else came, that which existed before the gods and gave birth to the first gods. In the Norse religion this is called Ginnungagap the yawning void or in the Mesopotamian traditions it is known as the goddess Tiamat, or Domnu in the Celtic religion and it is a theme found in many more traditions from the Hindu goddess Danu and the “void” of Buddhism, (nothingness is not exactly nothing in Buddhism but is referred to as such because it is beyond abstraction) to the mysticism of the Egyptians and their version of the primordial waters, Nu or Nun, but even in Kabbalah as Ain Soph. The gods can be said to be those who order Chaos and create the universe, this is another theme found in many religions and though Chaos magick does not associate itself with any specific religion, or as a religion, it clearly draws on the past for inspiration, but it is all dependent on what the individual wants to believe. This concept of that which is beyond conception is the original and most important principle in pretty well all religions, it is so sacred it is hardly spoken of because this is ultimately impossible and while there are generally no Pagan shrines to it, this is because it is the divinity within the priest or magician, that which underlies all of reality and so it needs nothing and asks for nothing.

There are some potential problems with Chaos magick as with all philosophies, but if you find it is right for you, its important to keep in mind you still need to learn to grow as a person, whatever that means to you. Since there is no ultimate goal for Chaos magick other than to learn how to manipulate reality, you can become an arrogant, self absorbed, immature prick, this happens with some Chaos Magicians who may never focus on anything but sensual gratification, but then this is a possibility whenever people are involved in something and all Occult paths have the potential of being used by people with egotistical intentions. To be worked in a healthy manner I would argue Chaos Magicians (as all people) need to learn the value of service to others, humility, and of using ritual techniques to face and overcome their personal imperfections, to face their demons, and avoid falling into the New Age trap of materialist ambitions which feed the system they usually hate. Unfortunately this is not always a big emphasis for a lot of Chaotes I have talked to. There definitely is a feeling of anti authoritarianism, and taking responsibility for yourself, and of all Occult philosophies Chaos magick is in many ways the most Anarchist. Chaos magick accepts no authorities on life, it accepts no right or wrong way to be in the moral sense, and it promotes the idea we are all equally right about everything in our perspectives, some Chaotes even make a hobby out of destroying vain and limited notions of order.

There are many great people totally opposed to hierarchies, but that said, some people of the more nihilist gothy bent are definitely stuck in a self centred, self pity, victim mentality where they can only seem to think of using magick to get revenge on some ex lover or asshole, or of using it to get wealth or sex in some form. Some people just want a philosophical justification for total selfishness and spite, they are so hurt by the authoritarian people of this world they confuse their own authoritarian behaviour as being rebellious and fall in to hypocrisy. So someone stole your wallet or cheated on you? Get over it princess, try living in the Congo or as a woman in Saudi Arabia, there are more important things to deal with right now than the people who bullied you in high school. No there may not be punishment for being selfish, but you do yourself harm by ignoring selfishness in general, something that you might care about more when it happens in your town, things like people spreading chemical waste in the drinking water or executing anyone who speaks out against the government. Instead of wasting your energy trying to boost your ego with black magick or getting revenge, or even having every materialist whim of your ego accomplished, in the long run it is much better to manifest being happy in any situation, to manifest your true will and a more functional and developed self awareness. Its an easy trap to fall in and tell yourself you are just going against petty ideas of religious morality, to demand the right to do black magick, but this idea is generally ignoring important aspects of Chaos. These people ignore their unity with all others in Chaos and focus on the aggrandizement of their ego and ego is the artificial order we impose on ourselves as an identity, which means to serve the ego alone and ignore personal responsibility in a world you are inextricably linked to, is to limit the Chaos you bring into your life. If all you ever think about is yourself then you are not much better than a corrupt religious figure, even if you have no followers.

One obvious antidote to this is creating a sense of responsibility for the communal reality as well, for having compassion for those who have been screwed over by the system and to learn that being happy without every desire being granted is more desirable than getting every thing you want. Activism is one means of becoming a healthier person, as well as creating a better world, but also I think its important for people to focus on personal growth more than material pleasure. This isn't to say you can't grow through material pleasure but that you shouldn't limit yourself and you should have your priorities well thought out. This is important not because it is a moral requirement for enlightenment or to get into heaven, but because it is a functional requirement for a sustainable and sane society, not to mention a Chaote society. Anarchism and the personal responsibility and integrity that it demands is the only way to get rid of the artificial order and values we impose on ourselves. I am totally open to people defining their own kind of personal growth and even enjoying themselves with base desires, but if all you can think of to use magick for is to get laid and get money, then you are a pathetic, narcissistic, selfish, and unimaginative person and I am willing to bet you are not a very happy person either. Such Chaotes or practitioners of the "left hand path" may continue if they will, as the mistakes they make will inevitably lead them to their true will and that will make them realize what is really important is universal freedom.

If you never learned the value of thinking of others then you haven't ever really learned anything. The process of learning to manipulate reality is very helpful but in and of itself is not a reality or philosophy that is necessarily the most enjoyable or the healthiest. This can only come with the systematic rooting out of all factors in the mind which impede growth and if you think you are a perfect person then overcoming vanity is where you should start. The philosophy which can help people learn to best understand their role and responsibility in the world, both personal and communal is the world view of Anarchism, for if you can really function as an Anarchist you will never be led astray by the pitfalls of the Occult. The Occult does not automatically teach a person to have mental health if they are determined to ignore lots of the teachings, but with an Anarchist mentality a person will avoid self deception and self destruction through temptation to seek power over others, rather than focusing on increasing awareness and everyone's ability to achieve their will.

Another pitfall of the Occult in general may be for some that they become so arrogant they may come to feel they are superior to others, either atheists or people of various other beliefs, who really see their beliefs as existing independently. This can happen with religious or dogmatic magicians, or with those few Chaotes who have a superficial understanding of the beliefs they mock, but also in a sense a shallow understanding of their own philosophies beliefs, because according to Chaos magick (and general Occult theory) when you believe something you make that reality, and so although religious people or atheists may be narrow minded, their views are still just as true as anyone else! Forgetting we are all prone to this kind of thing, that while Chaos is true, so is everyone's limited views of it, is a serious pitfall of being self centred, all beliefs are equally valid within the mind of a Chaote and so no one is better than anyone else.

It is strange that Chaos magick could ever have an authoritarian attitude behind it, but some claiming to be Chaos magicians or self absorbed Goths of the "left hand path" or Satanic variety certainly can come off as arrogant and authoritarian, this is not to say any Occultist cannot make the same mistakes, but for those who have no intentions besides the sensual, it can become a big problem. If you think you make your own reality you might start to think you are infallible and seeing ignorance everywhere, that you know the true reality and everyone else is stupid and whats worst of all you might start to think that you do not need to work on yourself because of all this. You do not have to have spiritual intentions in the same way I do, but uncovering self deception and looking to explore your true self are crucial to avoid creating an unhappy situation for yourself. This is not to say all Chaotes are like this, or even most, but it should be kept in mind with this philosophy as authoritarian attitudes can have a way of creeping in to the personality. These tendencies can sometimes show themselves in any who practice magick in general, ceremonial magicians can become authoritarian about the orthodoxy of their traditions and conceited because they are so complicated, Pagans have their own pitfalls as does anyone who does not have the right intentions. Its important to keep your feet on the ground, whatever mystical beliefs you have, just because you learned how to control reality and connect with the divine, just because you study more and are more dedicated to spiritual growth than most people, does not make you any “better” than them and you should abandon all hope that it ever will make you “better” since that is not the intention. A healthy dose of humility is important if you want to be an Anarchist, or an Occultist, most people may be complete fools and tools filled with ignorance, but they are still one with you, they are part of you and vice versa and so keep in mind that to hate them is to hate yourself. While magick can set us free, it can only do this if it is the magicians will to be free and so Anarchism is key to the occultist, likewise an Anarchist cannot be free without knowing their true will and cannot change the world in accordance with the will without practising magick and so the two are inextricably linked. More than this since none are free until all are free and since we are one and your intentions for others reflect back on your intentions for yourself, then to be free a magician must also intend for others to be free as well.

When learning any magick it's important not get worked up by omens or what you think some divine force might be telling you to do, especially traditional omens or signs of bad luck like a black cat, as this shows ignorance in how things manifest. We make our own luck, those old superstitions are more like arbitrary culturally defined messages from the divine, however we are not bound by superstitions once we understand the language of the universe, the “green language” or the “language of birds.” Superstitious people who see their fears come to fruition are really just the victims of casting a spell on themselves, they do not have the context for magick and so if believe they are cursed they become so. This is not to say that cultivation of intuition and heeding the flow that the universe takes you is not extremely important, but that we need to understand where these superstitions come from. Superstitious rituals in themselves have no power other than what we give them and so superstition occurs when a person believes the magick comes from a ritual, rather than themselves. There is a Buddhist moral that goes something to the effect that we must learn to steer our ships on the ocean rather than drift aimlessly, this is quite so, but at the same time getting into the Tao, or using the currents of the air and water is very helpful for getting where we want to go, so long as we are the ones who navigate. When you see such an omen of bad luck it is really a predetermined message that the divine can use as a warning for you, but it is not a fixed reality and so through magick we can avoid such fates, but generally it is best to rid yourself of these kinds of fears altogether, to trust that whatever does happen should happen.

Although we need to be extremely careful with superstitions, quite often there is some reason or another why ancient beliefs have persisted to this day, though it may not be recognizable to most modern minds. Superstition must be scrutinized, but it is quite possible to get careless from arrogance in regards to our ability to manifest things and all too often wishful thinking creeps into the mind's of people. This is especially true when first learning to manifest reality, after all you can do anything right? Well this may be so, but just because you can do it doesn't mean it is really in line with your true will, or that you even know what it is that you want. Just because you want something to happen magickally doesn't mean there isn't a deeper desire manifesting that precludes the other desire. These hidden motivations and desires can go unseen, especially when they are not pleasant for the ego. Wishful thinking is thinking that distracts your mind from what is happening and keeps it focused on what you think you want to happen, so that you manifest something as being a desire rather than manifesting something happening. Wishful thinking also can distract us from signs that perhaps there is something better to want or that there will be unforeseen consequences, or that you are lying to yourself thinking that by blind desire we will somehow get what we want, rather than by knowing it will happen, or taking proper actions to make it happen.

If danger is about, it is possible the universe will warn you and with practice you will learn to heed this intuition, someone who thinks they only have to think positive to avoid danger and so ignores such warnings is missing the point that they manifested the warning, that other beings can manifest things against their will, so the universe gave them the opportunity to avoid the danger, but through hubris and arrogance they have thwarted their magickal intentions. Magick isn't about being stubborn and holding on to a desire desperately trying to convince yourself it will happen, either you know it will happen or it won't, there is no hope required. Then there is the fact that we can become so absorbed in making something happen magickally that we lose sight of the real consequences of it happening, sometimes it's best that we don't get what our egos desire, or even sometimes our egos will be happier due to unforeseen circumstances later on. People can definitely become too superstitious but keep an eye out for messages from the universe, it's pretty easy to keep wanting and trying for something even though the universe warns you against it and you will either waste your time trying for it, or you will have gotten it and it will turn out badly. This has happened to me a number of times, I think I want something, the universe warns me against it repeatedly and I ignore it and manifest it anyways, to my own detriment. To sum it all up again, just because you can do anything doesn't mean you should take things for granted, and doesn't mean you are infallible, it doesn't mean you really know what you want, and it doesn't mean you should tempt fate. Nothing is worse than a divine being acting in the world without humility.

To learn metaphysical magick first it really helps to believe it exists, and to do this it is helpful to have a firm philosophical foundation from which to analyze and contextualize your beliefs, this personal philosophy will be based on direct experience that is conducted in as scientific a manner as possible. For each minor magical act, each synchronicity and each insight into metaphysics you must reinforce the idea that magick is real and that you are capable of and succeeding in working it properly, even for acts which do not seem metaphysical at all, give the credit to magick, using that word to attribute all successful acts worth noting. Do not lie to yourself, but do emphasize your success to yourself rather than your failures, realize that your mistakes are opportunities to learn a lesson for greater success and as time goes by you really will only have success. Two great obstacles in becoming aware of magick are arrogance and pride, they breed presumptions, bias attitudes, ulterior motives, self-deception and impurity of intention. Do not seek power in the world but instead seek truth and the ability to use that truth to spread awareness, joy and freedom throughout the world. Divine intentions are required for divine awareness and the powers that are created by it and the degree to which you can align yourself to the right intentions will determine the level to which you succeed, the degree to which you resonate with divinity.

The physical world is in trouble and it is awareness of the source and reality of all things that can help to get humanity in a place where we will not consent to being ruled by tyrants and it is for this reason an awareness of Anarchism is very helpful, as it supplies a very good intention for setting out on the magickal path. We may not succeed in making heaven on Earth but that does not mean we should be satisfied making our world into a hell. Beyond the pleasures of worldly pursuits the real benefit of magick is the opening of awareness to the metaphysical realities and the awareness of your true being and its place within the cosmos, know that you are divine and that you are capable of being that true self and exercising its true will.

One problem with magick is that it can be all too tempting to tell yourself you are striving for pure enlightenment, but get distracted in power games or even worse thinking you are enlightened and do not need to try and keep growing, these are the kinds of games your ego will play to keep you ignorant. Beware the tendency to lose sight of becoming aware of what is beyond the physical, and instead become inclined to rule it, to tell yourself you want to know the truth, but the truth is you want to be fooled so you can utilize the side effects of your journeying to enlightenment. Now perhaps you do not believe there is anything better than being physical, but for those who seek transcendence it can be awfully hard to really work up the courage to leave behind everything physical, to leave everything that you have loved your whole life or lives. Even if there is nothing beyond this one material life, then it is still important to understand the best things in this material world are not material, such as love, truth, freedom, that at the very least the best things are free. You may be able to manifest all kinds of sex and money and physical pleasure, but this won't bring lasting happiness until you have learned the whole in your heart is not meant to be plugged with possessions and so in this way Anarchist ideas as to what is best in life, is generally identical to spiritual ideas.

Whether or not transcendence of this world is your goal as it is ultimately mine, I have no doubt mental health comes from having altruism firmly rooted in your intentions at all times. At the same time just because this world may not be the highest doesn't mean you should abandon everyone here to live in a world that could have been improved through your direct action and help, escapism is the cause of the problem not the solution. The truth is we want to be physical and material otherwise we wouldn't be right now, sometimes its not very obvious why, but learning that is part of the process of knowing thyself, and learning why you would want to be physical (especially if you are in a rotten environment) is the first step in learning how to grow beyond it. You cannot have your cake and eat it too, any more then you can have your god consciousness and your material nature, do not seek to repress that material nature but learn why it is not what you really want. We all have the world, though most of us sell our souls for much less, attachment to desire is the cause of suffering, but you cannot get over it by desiring to repress desires or by pretending they don't exist.

In all things no one can tell you the truth, even if the words are true, it is always up to you to recognize it and in that recognition you take the responsibility of exploring it for yourself, by yourself, through your own cognitive abilities and so you can never rely on others for truth. If you do not explore the truth for yourself, it will do you no good and be as lies, it cannot be attained through information consumption, but only through personal cultivation and work. No matter how many truthful sources of information you have, you cannot separate your own need to question all sources, for it is in the questioning and not the absorption of information that true understanding comes. Much of the benefits of Occultism comes from thinking about how you would personally design your own magick system, with a firm foundation of traditional methods you can customize something better for yourself, but even if you wish to stay traditional, you will gain enormous new insight by coming at it from a perspective of thinking about how you would personally make a magickal system. You gain deeper understanding of why the ritual is the way it is, rather than only what the ritual is and so you gain a deeper understanding of how to operate it and access all its functions. Also it works in a way similar to the Socratic method, rather than memorization and regurgitation it exorcizes the consciousness and brain, the creative and analytical processes on a deeper level. A ritual perfectly executed does no good if you don't have understanding of it.

Memorization as opposed to understanding creates a mindset and reality where you are subject to authoritarian delusions of always being a passive consumer, of being incompetent of figuring it out on your own. Such people never fully take responsibility for their own awareness but feel obliged to obey authorities and always remain incapable, rather than being divine and created with everything needed to find the truth. Learning from a position of personal creativity, matched with humility raises you to your true place of equality with the masters, thus instilling a greater level of spiritual and Anarchist consciousness. There is a massive difference from knowing the truth, the intellectual facts and living the truth day to day as an experience and this is something that can only be achieved when you stop looking for the perfect leaders or authorities and start looking within to make yourself aware. This changes the focus or intention of your spiritual work from learning a specific tradition, to learning the truth, and it is intention that manifests through ritual to create the reality you want, so having the right intentions is key to growing spiritually. Seek not to learn how to be Christian, Pagan, or a ceremonial magician, but to learn the truth and in that process incidentally many wonderful side effects will occur, such as finding out you know more than you ever dreamed and realizing first hand what the value of worldly power really is.. nothing.

Chaos magick is a good attempt to understand the how of magick as it keeps the emphasis on finding what works, or what the truth is without adhering to dogma or superstitions, there is however a danger of oversimplification since there are important benefits to doing more than the minimum in ritual (especially for attainment of mental and spiritual understanding) but that level is something that needs to be found out by each individual. If all you care about is changing the material world with magick, or if you want to experiment to figure out what works the best, then it makes sense to do the minimum in ritual, however if you are trying to grow your consciousness then so long as you know what works for you, the more effort you put into it, the better off you will be and so consistent practice of more complex and elaborate rituals become important. The more I study the Occult, the more it becomes clear that there are very valid reasons for many things which do not make sense at first, that although you can have success with a minimalist approach, it doesn't mean you are as successful as you could be, or that there aren't good reasons for many seemingly trivial things.

As for actual practices, one simple ritual tool in Chaos magick is to make what is called a “sigil,” with Ceremonial magick elaborate sigils were created but they were called talismans or amulets, other traditions and religions have their own names as well such as “yantra” and they come in a variety of forms. These sigils are very useful in magick, and although traditionally they have been called talismans it should be understood they do not have to be on pieces of metal to be effective. A sigil is simply a symbol or glyph, or a combination of symbols created by a magician to represent an intent which is then charged with energy or willpower. This symbol more easily slips into the subconscious than say an affirmation and so is expressed to the manifesting powers more directly. Also since the sigil is static, the purity of the intent is harder to pollute with negative thoughts, this also helps for intentions which you may want to use repeatedly through life as the more the sigil is charged, the more effective it becomes. Since it is the mind that manifests reality and the mind is not only made of thoughts, learning to use ritual methods which activate a variety of other faculties helps to put more of the mind's energy in to manifestation and for this the sigil is one of the most useful methods. With outright affirmations or other commonplace expressions of the will there is a lot of baggage that can go with it, for example if you want to fall in love then saying the word “love” can bring up all the painful associations with that along with the desire. By using a symbol which has less or none of a unconscious connotations or residual feelings from past experiences, a pure feeling and intention is more easily created which the conscious mind can feel positive about. Ideally you should try and forget the sigil after it has been charged, you do not need to keep charging it, once you have gnosis that your ritual worked, then questioning it attaches energy of doubt.

There are many possible ways you can create a sigil, but one of the best methods comes from Austin Osman Spare, who was a pioneer in what would later become known as Chaos magick. His method is simply to write out a short, carefully phrased intention such as “it is my will to --” then take all those letters and cross out any that are doubles, the letters which are repeats, some people also cross out vowels but this is not crucial. Then you build a simple symbol combining all the remaining letters, overlapping them when possible according to aesthetic taste, by using symmetry you can make a symbol that is easier to visualize. You can then stylize if you wish to make it more aesthetic and unique, you can also incorporate appropriate magickal symbols such as those found in astrological, Qabbalistic, or Pagan traditions or really any symbols you like. Runes are very useful in this respect as each rune has a specific magickal meaning, but so do most of the most ancient alphabets. Ultimately it doesn't matter what the symbol looks like as long as you associate it with a very specific intent. Using classical symbols are good for this as they will already be associated with their own predetermined meanings in your mind, much more so than the regular alphabet. I have no problems using just the regular alphabet and often do so, but use whatever you prefer, adding extra symbolism helps to make the symbol more specific and more visually unique and also works to further make it “magickal” in your mind.

What may be the best for you is a completely unique and individual symbol system you yourself create, the important thing is that the symbol is meaningful to you. You can make up a whole new alphabet called an “alphabet of desire” which you use only for ritual purposes. It will have no other connotations for you other than what you give it and so can be energetically pure and custom designed for your personal needs, potentially making it very powerful and meaningful to you. You can also have a whole dictionary of specific symbols which are traditional or created by you, with no phonetic meaning, but which is symbolic of your will, having meaning which you might use repeatedly in different sigils. Having a large selection of symbols to choose from both traditional and new can be helpful, especially in terms of creating original sigils which will not be confused with others you make, at the same time I strongly recommend you consistently use the same basic methods of construction for your sigils, using the same alphabets or symbol systems so as to build up gnosis that those symbols and rituals have magickal power. Of course with practice you will evolve your own methods, but you want to get your mind to associate certain symbols and acts as magickal rather than ordinary, the more comfortable you are with them the more magick they will become. Sigils are an invaluable and basic tool of the magician in the search to find the truth and through the practice of their use, a person with the right intentions can come to learn, experience and accomplish many great things.

Sigils can be used for all kinds of things, changing the physical world, but also the state of consciousness for the magician. A sigil can be implemented in a regularly used ritual before bed to induce lucid dreaming, it could also be used to induce astral projection, or to represent a specific ritual state of mind, like for divination, or for contacting specific entities or gods. Other uses of sigils might be to ritually help improve learning or memory, or to strengthen or weaken any aspect of the mind, this may take practice and effort but is something that is very possible. The different sigils of the planets can be used in rituals to generate specific energies as well as states of minds, or to call on various spirits and most of the intellectual Occult work is really learning the meaning of symbols which you can use to gain new levels of control over your consciousness. If you want to commune with nature, you can make a sigil for that, if you want to try and telepathically bond with someone, you can make a sigil for that, if you want to control your entheogenic experiences you can definitely make a sigil for that. Depression and apathy, or shyness or anger are problems that can be dealt with in this way if you are willing to put in the effort, remember that magick is not just about changing the world, it includes acts of will in regards to your awareness and in fact this is its primary value.

Once the sigil representation of the intent is made, it should be charged in a manner which takes the same consistent ritual approach so that you can build up your gnosis in the ritual process. A ritual itself can be thought of as a kind of sigil, as well as anything else you assign a specific intent to, in the case of a ritual it is a sigil that is enacted with your body, or with props that are their own kind of sigil. In many rituals you visualize symbols like the pentagram (one point up) with your mind, and so the ritual is like a sigil formula which equates to the manifestation of your various intentions, the result of which is the empowering of the newly created sigil. As you can manifest anything, you can manifest an increase in awareness and so in the case of daily meditations and rites, the sigil, or the rituals intent is to grow spiritually, and so by focus on those rituals you manifest yourself to higher awareness, you show the universe your intention to raise awareness and you manifest it in your consciousness.

This can take any form you can imagine, but whichever means of manifestation is employed it is best to forget about it as soon as it is done, to avoid attachment to results but instead focus on the will itself. Continuing to think about the results after the ritual can imply you don't really feel its going to happen, if you are not careful it can then change the polarity you have set in your mind. It is also best to always manifest something happening, rather than something not happening as it will shift focus and energy more productively, otherwise you might confuse your subconscious into manifesting exactly what you don't want. (Anarchists should especially keep this in mind) Traditionally it is believed that when the moon is waxing, it is the best time to make something come into existence peaking at the full moon, and when the moon is waning (shrinking) it is best to manifest somethings ceasing to be, or banishing it. All these symbol languages may seem superstitious to those who have no context for them, but they are effective means of communicating intent to the higher divine or unconscious.

When coming up with a phrase for your intention or communication in general I believe it becomes stronger the more concise it is, this is another reason why having one symbol or sigil is more effective then writing out affirmations, all the energy and consciousness is concentrated on one thing, rather then a series of symbols like in an affirmation. While concentration of the magickal energies is crucial, it is still a good idea to have the sigil clearly defined in your mind, its OK to have long details to the intent, so long as you have it associated to a short phrase of intent. This intent should be concise but specific as possible, if you wish you can write out clear definitions to which the words of the phrase of intent pertain to. Clearly and specifically define everything in it so that there are no surprises when you manifest it. The explanation will be associated with the phrase and the phrase with the sigil. You can also take the phrase and use it as a mantra, this may work better for you if you take the letters of the intention and mix them up to create a gibberish mantra phrase which is to be used in the ritual, chanting out the mantra while visualizing the sigil made of the same letters.

How you charge your sigil is up to you, there are limitless possible techniques and many ancient visualization/meditation rituals such as the "middle pillar" and "chakra" meditations are easily adapted for this purpose, there are also more nature oriented Pagan and Shamanic symbolism and practices, not to mention it is definitely possible to have no religious symbolism at all if that is what you want. You should not be tricked into thinking just because it is ancient it is best, what is most important is to use what you have the most faith in, or what feels best to you. Keeping this in mind you should also realize that it can be a bad idea to blindly or halfheartedly mess around with ancient systems you do not understand, specifically in terms of evocations and invocations. It should also be kept in mind ancient magickal techniques are set up in complex ways that are not obvious to the beginner and apparently may make no sense, for this reason lots of study may be required for certain magickal traditions, but you will find that seemingly unimportant aspects really are meaningful later on. After a sigil is charged traditionally it is burned, but you could also set it under a quartz crystal, maybe with copper (or some other metal specific to a planet) around it. If you do this it is important to turn the sigil off once the intention has been accomplished, give thanks to the universe and discharge it, maybe burn it once it has succeeded or flush it down the toilet, you can do a simple ritual to reabsorb the energy you put into it to make sure your sigil doesn't keep working after you want it to.

Once you have your sigil, you use ritual to get in a trance state of gnosis, to know that the sigil will be successful without any doubt, simply casually being positive about it will not teach you the control of consciousness needed to accomplish lots of things that can be accomplished through gnosis. Probably not surprising I thinkentheogens are the best means of achieving gnosis, but always used in conjunction with meditations and visualizations. When in a state of oneness, or gnosis, magick seems natural and even sometimes very unavoidable, for if we are one with the universe or in a divine state of awareness we have the powers of a divinity. Salvia leaf (not extract) or Marijuana is great for more casual sigil casting such as daily practices or anything that is not extremely important, stronger extracts can be used with sigils that require deeper states of gnosis. Although you can get into trance states withoutentheogens, as through a variety of Shamanic methods, it can be a lot harder to stay in that state of gnosis for prolonged periods of time, especially in the more complex rituals where you are moving around, or reciting a long spell, but withentheogens you will be a trance state even if you don't want to be.

When doing a sigil ritual (or any ritual) the first thing I will do is my banishing rituals, of which there are many varieties depending on what spiritual or magickal tradition you are interested in, with research you can custom design your own, or you can solely rely on traditional means. Creating your own can be the most effective as it can be changed over time to suit you personally, however I think it is a good idea for beginners to at least try some traditional methods in the beginning to get a general idea of what its all about, you will learn many more things from doing the rituals then you will from just reading about them. Banishing rituals are designed to create energetically neutral areas free from the interference of metaphysical entities, or within western ceremonial magick elemental and astrological energies. The banishing rituals are I am sure unnecessary with a strong will, but I find they help me to get into a magickal meditative mindset, other purposes of the banishing is to consecrate the ritual area, to confine the generated energy to the circle, and to let your mind know that mundane and worldly thoughts should not be coming up at this time. This becomes much more important then it might seem at first, one of the main things you are banishing is your worldly concerns, your preoccupation with ego life and the limited notions of non divine self.

After banishing I create the sigil, having previously decided upon its form I focus my intent on it as I make it. Then I will do the “middle pillar” and kundalini chakra meditations as well as some other meditations to charge up energy, using my entheogens to get in a state of gnosis. After I have done all those rituals I smoke Salvia or pot and exhale onto the sigil, visualizing all the accumulated energy into it. Holding it in my hands I close my eyes and spell out my intent using all the letters and symbols from the sigil in the order that I drew them and recreate the construction of the sigil in my mind. Throughout rituals and especially while toking I highly recommend “Pranayama” or Yogic breathing practices like the “four fold breath.” These practices when combined with “diaphragmatic breathing” in many ways seem to be designed to get the most out of your tokes and induce deeper altered states. To do this is simple enough, simply breathe in to a count of four (or a symbolic number) then hold for a count a four, then exhale to a count of four and have empty lungs to a count of four. “Diaphragmatic breathing” is when you are inhaling you take in your stomach, sucking it up in to your diaphragm, (hold it there when holding your breath) then while exhaling you push out your stomach muscles. (holding it out with an empty breath as well) I will visualize as bright as possible the sigil in my mind in an appropriate colour over the physical sigil reciting the mantra of intention as I exhale smoke and visualize the smoke as energy going in to the physical sigil until I feel that it is adequately charged. Then I stick the sigil on a crystal and do open eye visualizations around the physical sigil, charging it with coloured energy, through my hands Illuminating the ink on the paper while still saying the mantra. Then I might do some smudging with a specific incense, or anoint a herbal oil using traditional magickal herbs. After that I masturbate and while I am cumming I stare at the sigil, sometimes simultaneously cumming onto the sigil, then I burn the sigil and the operation is over.

This orgasm aspect to ritual can be done with couples very effectively, perhaps using magickal herbal massage oils, (traced on the body as the sigil or spread all over) slowly building energy throughout the sex, always looking at the sigil during orgasms. Through various methods with practice the magicians can hold off orgasm till the very end, when it erupts all at once, the combined energy of what would be multiple separate orgasms for other people. When orgasm hits, the mind enters a state of thoughtless gnosis which is full of energy being released, this has a long tradition in both the east and west and those interested should look up Tantric sex or “sex magick”.

In a lot of ways any symbol used to focus the will to fulfil an intention is a sigil, they can change a book like this into a means to do anything, may be like raising awareness. There are other ways to create what are called “hyper sigils” this can be done in the form of a painting, a comic book can be used for great detail and even music, really all forms of art are ideal for being adapted to magick, even writing a novel, in a lot of ways this is artistic natural magick with lots of detail. A hyper sigil is just a sigil that is not in standard visual glyph symbolism, it is an extended work of art that lays out in detail the intention behind it, for example as a story rather than symbolizing it all in one static form. Making a hyper sigil is as easy as ritualistically creating a piece of art, perhaps charging the picture, or in the case of music designating certain tones for certain intentions or energies like within Qabalah, perhaps using certain instruments for each element or planet and singing out the spell, the limits are yours to determine.

There are also a variety of creative ways in which you can charge sigils depending on which way you are making them, you could make a sigil using origami techniques doing specific visualizations for each fold, or you could incorporate standard sigils into the folds in order to program a very complex intention. A person could create a candle in the shape of a sigil to use with more traditional candle magick techniques, they could also put the candle inside a lantern with slits in the shape of the desired sigil so that light beams come out to create the image of the sigil. One could stick a sigil on a card and put it on a bike in the spokes, or where it was visible, or both, so that as you pumped away on your bike you charged your sigil. One technique I like to use is to put a sigil onto a rolling paper and then roll some Salvia leaf or pot and smoke it, I use food colouring but if you looked into it you could probably find a healthier ink. You can even make your own inks that could each be used for different magickal applications, using different natural sources for different energies, there are already traditional recipes for things like this and which is kind of like the natural magick versions of talismans. You could make baked goods in the shape of sigils or put on icing in the right colour and in the sigil, maybe making some magick herbal brownies to bring about a desired state of mind and then of course eating them.

Sigils could be made into stickers or drawn in the streets as graffiti with chalk, paint or markers so that each person who saw it on the street would charge it and of course this is especially useful for sigils that you wish to affect society with. Another method might be to make your own stamps, or get some stamps of the letters and then use them to overlap the different letters in different colours and make a sigil that way. Tattoos are yet another classic means of sigilization and probably one of the most powerful, at least in terms of sigils to be used for personal reasons, though of course you really have to be careful about what sigils would be worth having on you forever. Its within the paradigm of many that pain energy can be utilized to charge sigils, really any form of energy can be used and any symbolic representation that is meaningful to you. A really cool but impractical method of charging a sigil would be a firework that was in the shape of the symbol you wanted. It is not the symbols that have the power but the energy we give them, but some symbols are more emotionally evocative than others, more personally meaningful or are particularly useful for inducing trance states.

While you should do further research, ceremonial magicians often use two similar and related methods of makings sigils, one method involving “magick squares” or “kameas,” the other being the Hermetic “rose cross” glyph. Both methods plot out their sigils according to how they are spelled with the Hebrew alphabet, though Greek or other alphabets are definitely used for the magick squares as well. While today they are simply thought of as mathematical curiosities, kameas or magick squares correspond to the 7 planets and are composed of numbers put on to a square grid pattern so that each row and column and diagonal row have the same sum. As with something like Roman numerals, in Greek or Hebrew each letter is also a number, so that if you want to make a sigil for a written intention, all you have to do is draw a line connecting the numbers on the magick square according to the letters you use for that intention. I think it is best that you make your own alphabet, so I will not provide the numerical values for the Greek and Hebrew alphabets here, but the information is easily found online, along with the astrological meanings of the planets. In this way you connect the letters/numbers making a sigil for any word, such as the word used to sum up the intention, or the mantra that will be used in ritual and so this can be useful when implementing other Qabbalistic methods. One of these methods is called “gematria” in the Jewish tradition, or “isopsephy” for Greeks and this works so that as each word has a sum, if two words have the same sum, they are symbolically linked and this is used for mystical interpretation, but can also add symbolic meaning to sigils. You will notice on the following magick squares that as with the square of Saturn, there are only 9 numbers and that if you look up the numerical values of letters, not all the letters will fit on the magick squares. So, you have to use what is called “Aiq Bekar” which allows you to create numerical equivalents between the various letters, which are organized in to 9 groups of 3 letters/numbers so that 1, 10, 100 are all grouped just as 2, 20, 200 are grouped etc, all the way up to 9, 90, 900. So, if a letter has a value of 90 and you want to make a sigil on say the Mars square, you would treat the 9 on the square as if it were 90 and then connect it to the next letter. You do this same process for any other numbers which are too big to fit on the square you are using, but you never take zero's out unless it is absolutely necessary. The first letter/number of the sigil starts with a loop, then goes on in a strait line to the next letter/number, all the other lines connecting the letters will be strait and you end the sigil with a dash crossing the line like a T. If you must use the same number on a square twice, you put two small bumps like rounded W on the line to signify this. While you can alter a sigil for aesthetic purposes, this simple method allows you to trace out the sigils in the air when doing a ritual and so if you make an alphabet, give it numerical values.

3D sigils utilizing sacred geometry could be created, or graphed out and then constructed by attaching sticks together creating a kind of sigil sculpture. Different people are drawn to different representations and you should find what is best for you rather than sticking slavishly to practices you might hate, but which are traditional. A simple method might be to rub wood together with a bow and stick in order to build a fire, as you spin the wood you are charging energy, perhaps while staring at a sigil, using the significant plants and wood, when you finally get a fire going you burn the sigil in the fire, knowing that the once the fire burns your sigil, your intention will be carried out. No magickal ritual will work if you don't believe in it, anything can become a ritual with the right kind of eyes and focus, there really is no limit to magickal expression available to those with imagination.

From an Alchemical perspective if you were to set up the proper equipment you could use different metals each with their own meanings to form different alloys, which would then be used to form talismans for whatever purpose you wish. As you would pump the bellows to feed the fire and stoke it with perhaps specific kinds of wood, you would be feeding the metal with the proper energy for your operation. All the different kinds of lab equipment could and generally have been assigned symbolic meaning so that as each step in the Alchemical experiment is being carried out, a work of magick, or a portion of the ritual is being performed, either on the psyche of the Alchemist or to produce some physical result. The end of the ritual is symbolized perhaps by some tincture or potion, or any number of things, in regards to enlightenment it would be the creation of the philosophers stone. From the metal talisman you could add still further symbolism by using molds and in the same way you could create wax talismans. Mineral Alchemy can potentially be costly and dangerous, but for those interested there is also "spagyric Alchemy" which works with herbs and plants, it can definitely teach a person many useful skills which can come in handy for various Occult practices, Witchcraft etc. Spagyrics can teach you how to extract entheogens, or make your own incense, oils and potions and can definitely add some nice layers to a ritual, especially if they are made and at the same time consecrated in a ritualistic way.

As you progress through magick it may be that you wish to magickally express more complex intentions, or intentions that you wish to have throughout your life, or are at least intentions that are more than just a one time thing. While this can be done with a sigil it is often useful to create what is called in Chaos magick a "servitor," which is a technique that it definitely did not come up with but given Chaos magick's DIY nature, it has been well explored through this school of magick. A servitor is a magickal entity that you create which is in some views is essentially an astral machine with some degree of artificial intelligence, you could also say you give it a piece of your own soul, or that you create the astral form for a preexisting astral entity to inhabit and interact with you. The servitor is often represented by a sigil or some statue or whatever else you want, it could be any object which you feel the entity could inhabit in what is called a "fetish," it could also possibly have no physical representation but a purely astral form that you see through visualization. It is a kind of spirit helper which you create yourself, in Qabalah it could be considered a "golem" or in Alchemy a "homunculus," it might also be called an "artificial elemental", or in Shamanism a "spirit helper." For future research you may wish to look into "telesmatic images" as found within the Golden Dawn tradition of magick, which uses Qabbalistic techniques combining various Hebrew letters to form the image into a humanoid sigil with specific letters becoming specific body parts.

While the word "servitor" is important to remember for future reference in other Occult literature, this name implies a strict master, servant relationship between the magician and spirit and although it is possible for someone to create astral slaves for themselves, it is not very good for those with Anarchist intentions, nor is it a traditional viewpoint, or a very functional viewpoint. Respect and symbiosis are much more effective than tyrannical demands, so you must feed your spirit helpers love and energy, think of them as children or friends. Remember, all is one, so being mean or overbearing to these helpers is pretty ignorant. If you treat a servitor bad enough it may decide to turn on you, or rebel against you, this is a sure sign that you have been a moron, as with pretty well everything in the Occult, keep in line with Anarchist principles and you will be OK, make an offering to the spirit of some energy and if you created it right, you will find it more than willing to help. Keeping all of this in mind, since I am trying to emphasize the Anarchist side of the Occult, I will use the term “familiar” spirit, which is the word used in Witchcraft and Pagan magick to refer to either naturally made or ritually created spirits or servitors that help the magician perform various kinds of magick.

In many ways a familiar is in effect a very complex sigil which takes on a life of its own, it is even perhaps eventually capable of getting its own energy, depending on how you program it, constantly growing and becoming more powerful. I personally consider the line between sigil and familiar to be drawn when you start incorporating decision making abilities to your sigils, when you start to program an identity into it. Because it has a consciousness of its own it is capable of complex applications and in a sense it is possible to give it a will of its own, it is crucially important how you program it so that it does not become parasitic or starts doing all kinds of things you don't want it too, but you can create it so that its will is the same as your will, so that it is naturally inclined to fulfil the purpose you have in mind for it. This has the advantage of being able to give it multiple intentions and have your will carried out in variety of ways, repeatedly and turned on and off as you need or called on in times when you cannot do a lengthy ritual, allowing you to explain your intentions and interact with an entity with all the powers you have assigned it. By creating a familiar you are having positive thoughts about its ability to do tasks which you have programmed it to do and so you manifest a spirit helper for yourself.

Creating a familiar should of course not be undertaken until you are well practised with sigils and ritual work, you might be an Anarchist but if you do not create your familiar carefully it may try to control you, or to suck you dry of energy, or it may have bad programming and do all kinds of unintended things. A familiar is a personification of your intent, where as a sigil is just a symbol of your intent, the familiar could take all kinds of beastly or alien forms, but it is to be thought of as an entity rather than just a symbol. General rule of thumb is to be in as deep a state of gnosis as you were when you created it as you are when you reabsorb it or terminate it. By creating this program within the collective mind that is in most cases your helper spirit, you can carry out some intentions that would not be nearly as practical if it was a sigil and you can also minimize the ritual to send out your intention, you also do not need to carry around a sigil with you.

The process for making a familiar can be simple or complicated, drawing a picture can help, or having the statue or fetish, take out a piece of paper and start listing its attributes, create an identity, personality traits, talents and skills, but most importantly clearly lay out your intentions for it. Once you have done that think of a key phrase to call upon your familiar, give it a name and use it in an evocation spell, that is say something like “I call upon you -name- to appear and work your magick.” You should also create a phrase to thank it and send it on its way when you are done, otherwise it will constantly be hanging around listening to your mental chatter. Once you have it all laid out and you are sure that it is done safely, that it will not turn parasitic on you, and that the programming is precise with no double meanings that will confuse the familiar, then you can start to ritually create it. The details of the ritual will probably be similar to your sigil ritual, starting with a banishing then charging energy, then putting the energy into the familiars sigil or fetish, using the name like a mantra and stating your intention to give it life. I am purposely being ambiguous on ritual details because anyone who is not willing to do extra research, anyone with no ritual experience should not be making familiars, so master using sigils first and do some further reading. These beings can be approached in a number of ways depending on who it is, it can be elaborate rituals which take much time and energy, or calling them can simply be thinking their name.

When a familiar grows to a certain strength and complexity, to the point that it is interacting with more than one person, it is called in Chaos magick an “egregore” which would be like a cults guardian spirit, a tribes totem animal, or any spirit created by a small group. So basically it is a familiar which is the amalgamation of more than one person's intention and perception. This can progress further and go to the point where an egregore gets to a certain strength and it could be thought of as a "god form," these are the spirits created by huge numbers of people such as within religions, governments or multinational corporations, entities like Uncle Sam, Yahweh or Santa Claus etc. Though of course many people think of the gods in various ways independent of our belief in them, at the very least they have imagined to be in certain forms and in a very real sense they are or become that way. The cross is a sigil but it is representative of a god form and there are many examples of how a symbol is useful for communing with egregores etc. This is not to say some gods or spirits reveal themselves without any conscious creation of those who perceive them, especially if someone is on entheogens, or just trying to open themselves up to what already exists, but that religions shape the astral forms of the gods and so how we perceive them, though others may be totally our creation. In some ways of looking at it however, these divinities could be exactly what they appear to be, or they may be emanations of the highest unifying divine force, the familiar god forms created by Chaos itself, (which is basically what most mythologies state) and so I'll leave that to your discretion. It should be kept in mind that god forms if they are human creations are generally not created to be so helpful as familiars, they are generally created as being more powerful than humans and so are often much less personal, much less customized to the magicians needs and generally take no shit, but this is not to say they necessarily put themselves above anyone, especially if they were created as loving beings.

Seeing what religions can become it is pretty obvious you need to be very careful how you or a group of people create an entity, the more people involved in the creation, the more powerful the entity, the more complex its nature and the harder to anticipate its nature and actions. Depending on how they are constructed, some egregores or even familiars can get really selfish and manipulative, exploiting anyone they can. Sometimes these entities have been imagined to be quite cruel like with the old testament god Yahweh, the god form who does not tolerate anyone to work with any other god forms. Many of the Pagan gods and goddesses may have their foibles but none that I know of are nearly as tyrannical as Yahweh. A good example of a god form that needs to be dealt with is Uncle Sam, dealing with him will be very tricky for magickal activists but by creating our own egregores and god forms we can use magick to change things for the better. Eventually nobody will need to use these techniques at all, as we will all of progressed to complete divine awareness, until then they are still incredibly valuable techniques. With some careful planning it is possible to use created entities or complex sigils safely and effectively, the key to this is to have sincere Anarchist intentions at all times and so then, will all of your creations.

By the time an entity becomes a god form or even an egregore they can become somewhat more self aware than familiars and have more of their own will, since they have a variety of sources from which to draw energy, they can afford to be more picky about who they help out. If you do not create your entity with Anarchist or altruistic inclinations you might be drafted into service to what once was your familiar. As with certain religions it can be easy to slip into the idea that the god form has all the power, and that perhaps you even need to start sacrificing to it to make things happen and while it may work out for awhile, you want symbiotic rather than predatory or parasitic behaviour. Because so many people have imagined the various gods to be outside of our control, it is most likely that they will not gladly be your personal servant and wish to be treated as a different order of intelligence or awareness, really in many ways they are a higher form of awareness, being able to draw off the experience of everyone who works with them, being able to exist in the spirit world all the time. While this does not mean you have to be their servant, at the same time you don't employ a rocket scientist to tie your shoe and you don't bug the gods with your petty bullshit. Certainly these entities deserve to be treated with respect, they are not dependent on you as an individual and they are not your slave, that said most of them are very willing to help out humanity if approached in a respectful manner and in my experience working with them, they are filled with love and have nothing authoritarian about them. These god forms are like reservoirs of many peoples energies and as you wouldn't expect a city of people to do nothing but help you out with your every whim, or take your own arrogance lightly, you shouldn't expect a god form to either. This might be troubling for an Anarchist, as there is a tendency to view god forms as higher than humans, but if you realize that they are connected to a huge group of people and you are just one person it is not wrong to give them the basic respect any entity deserves and that any contradictions to Anarchism are solved when we remember we are one with all of these entities and everything else.

God forms should in many ways be treated as alien intelligences with their own agendas and wills, though for the most part they are very benevolent, it is rare for them to be authoritarian, (unless maybe you imagine them to be) they just don't usually take crap from humans, and why should they? This is of course understandable of any entity and should be kept in mind with even familiars created specifically to do your will. I think it must always be kept in mind that you yourself have the power to do whatever it is you want without any external forces, this is crucial to not being a slave, working with spirits is helpful in a number of ways but will lead to all kinds of limitations and unpleasantness if you do not understand your own powers. Although they may be created by you, it must also always be kept in mind to treat familiars, egregores and god forms with respect and not like your bitch slave. Simply enter into an Anarchist agreement to which you as creator supply it with the energy it needs to live and it will agree happily to do your will, especially if you create it as something that derives pleasure from helping you.

One means of creating a very complicated sigil or familiar which allows for certain eventualities that may come up is a kind of programming, or algorithm much like a computer. In order to do this you would create a central sigil representing the familiar or main intention and then create a diagram of branches off of it for different contingencies that may occur. So the idea is that given the way things are at the time of the ritual, the sigil or familiar will act in its standard way, but if "X" condition is met then it will change its actions to "Z," if a different condition which we will call "A" is met then it will go with "B" effect. Each of these variables should probably have their own unique and simple sigils which could be standardized to use with all your instructions for all familiars. It is possible to create with enough foresight a very detailed programming system for your familiars, this is perhaps generally unnecessary however as you could make the familiar capable of checking and understanding your will if it is not sure what to do, but it can still be useful for complex situations or familiars with very specific actions. All you need to do is set up a symbolic tree or circuit that shows the energy you charge to the master sigil where to go, it can be much like a electrical diagram or is basically a sigil flow chart with different switches allowing it to branch, if such and such condition is met then energy will act in your specified way, the trick is to have a well defined algorithm which hopefully will also incorporate unforeseen possibilities by making you aware of the unknown variables. It is then possible to give your familiar a set of instructions from which it will act out your will in a more effective means. This is essentially creating a program to ensure quality control within your will so that your rituals and life will run more smoothly and more in line with your will, the better you can define your will and be sure that it will happen, the better the universe can manifest it for you.

All these spirits, familiars, sigils energies, god forms etc take place on the astral realm, with its various levels from the more mental, to the more spiritual. As before, this is not in my view a hierarchy with godhead at the top, and matter at the bottom, but a spectrum that is fractal and holographic. When you work with a sigil, it is not so much the physical form you are charging but the astral form, which then manifests in to the physical and the same is basically true of familiars, though no physical form is required for these, or for god forms. Ritual then is our means of charging these astral forms, and our ability to interact on an astral level (at least in the mental realm) is in many ways directly related to our ability to work magick. Entheogens open us up to these astral realms whether we will it or not, but through astral projection, or even just visualization we can also access these realms. Through these sigil astral forms, or familiar spirit astral forms that we create through thought forms, we can shape anything we want if we are willing to put in the time and energy.

We can even choose to customize 3D spaces, or areas for our astral bodies to inhabit so that we can more fully interact on the astral, any landscape or room, or building that can be imagined can be created on the astral in what is known as an “astral temple” and once you have developed your ritual abilities such as visualization, you may do all of your rituals in your imagination, that is in the astral. You may have a dingy apartment, or even be homeless, but so long as you can focus, you can create the most beautiful temples you can imagine for you to carry out your ritual work. In the past people even created imaginary houses, or “memory palaces” which could be used as mnemonic devices in order to greatly increase their memory and allegorically sort out all their knowledge. While not always used for magickal purposes “the art of memory” is definitely a valuable potential tool which anyone would do well to learn. Whenever you leave your body, whenever you dream, you are in the astral, and through creating astral temples you are able to accustom yourself to the astral realms, to practice skills that will help you anywhere in the astral, from entheogenic realms, to dreams, to ritual temples. These temples can be represented in sigils, and be decorated according to symbolic ritual motifs that allow you to customize your temple, without having to buy or make a bunch of physical props, all the while strengthening all aspects of your magickal faculties.

By creating magickal alphabets, or set programming variables which are personally created unique symbols, you can create a familiar or astral machine to do anything imaginable, it is creating a symbolic framework that will be useful for focusing the will into highly complex functions. By having set categories representing the basic attributes of the created life form, things such as function, character, life span etc and defining each category with a circuit made from your alphabet, you could create a kind of astral entity in much the same way as you would a character for a role playing game. With a specific circuitry design you could program the circuit with a specific language from your alphabet to have a clear map of the entities consciousness created to the specific inclinations of your will. Using methods of compressing information, intentions and correspondences such as an acronym or numerological meanings, or any other methods (notarikon, but also temurah and gematria) you can simplify the programing to be represented in an abbreviated form that sums it all up into one sigil with many layers of meaning.

Some ideas for programming symbols you may wish to use are things that will define limits to intelligence, its awareness, how aware of you it is, is it omnipotent? omnipresent? What decision making abilities does it have? Sources it can use for energy, magical abilities, what is the set sigil for determining its life time? An alphabetic sigil can be anthropomorphized to create the look of the familiar, but this is not crucial, so what does it look like? What is its temperament? Its character? Its subset of abilities and specialities? If it has very complex symbolism is there an activation symbol that is more convenient? Remember, specific activation rituals may be used to call upon or dismiss your familiar, in other words to turn them on and off and these are useful so that they do not become accidentally active or inactive or so they do not intrude on your day to day consciousness. With the Qabbalistic golems, a kind of statue would be created that had an open mouth that could receive or eat written instructions of the will, the magickal energies would then go to work and fulfil the request, much like a genie or “djinn,” the Arabic breed of familiar. Although you should keep your familiars always open to new programming from yourself, it is best to plan them out well before hand, the more you stick to one definition, one set of programming, the more they will specialize and strengthen that area of themselves.

There are no authorities in magick or Anarchism, do not worship anyone including yourself, but love the gods, love yourself, love your familiars. Among other things I love life, truth and wisdom or Zoa, Aletheia and Sophia, but why personify concepts? Well first off the ancient Greeks were the first to know these entities, whatever they are so you would probably have to ask them, still with an understanding of magick we can see there are benefits to having a face for a concept. Personifications can be used as astral vehicles for the metaphysical energies of the universal mind, through giving a face to something our brains react quantifiably different to them due to our evolutionary need to recognize fellow beings. Even if these beings exist only in our subconscious, by giving your subconscious a face, it can begin to communicate with you and you can learn much more than you might think. Since our brains react differently to a face than they do to say a chair or a symbol, personifications can be seen in what our minds interpret as a causal link to have some level of intelligence and so it gives us a better reference to the energies and concepts they represent, especially how they relate to the group mind. We create the vehicle for them to make themselves known to us and they inhabit the astral thought forms like our souls within our own bodies, but instead of being in the world here, the personifications live within the astral plane or various parts of the group mind. They are in a sense independent of us, in that they simply take the form we expect, rather than us creating them, they can also be helpful in magick because they will not be bound up in causal and self-doubting mindsets as much as us, nor stuck to a limited physical perception as much as most of us are.

Putting faces on certain concepts is sometimes extremely helpful for acquiring those traits and learning the lessons involved or working with the energies in general. How much could we learn from working with Zoa, Aletheia and Sophia? Why work with so many divinities when there is one source for all, one underlying divine thing? Well to me, I doubt that there would be all the different religions if that divine force wanted us to have “one true religion,” through polytheism we come to the conclusion that all images are limited, all images have something to offer, we can flesh out so to speak all the different aspects of the divine and work with specific parts that we need, we also learn to be more tolerant of other peoples perspectives than if we believe ours is the only one true god. Humans seem to have a natural tendency to put things into symbols, it is almost inevitable and so with the one divine force it is bound to happen in a religion in some basic way, even if it is only through a name, but this can be enough to destroy all the ineffable meaning from the mind, so by having many divinities we realize each symbol is limited. We also get with the different pantheons different maps of the mind which can be used in mythology to convey metaphysical realities, as well as ritual benefits depending on our specific needs. If we are lacking in wisdom, confidence, food, or whatever, there are beings out there who can help us and who specialize in certain metaphysical energies, which can be accessed and charged according to need.

While some Anarchists may at first look at mythology as having nothing but stereotypes or very limited roles for genders and people, if you dig deeper you will find that with the deities in India alone you will get pretty well every kind of personality, or aspect of personality. Archetypes by their nature are generalized categories, but there are so many deities as to fit pretty well any taste, what's more by clearly defining these archetypes we can potentially learn to stop associating people with them in prejudice and unconscious ways by default. That is by knowing a variety of deities you see not all men or women are the same and there are many many sub types, that by studying a cultures deities you will understand the foundations of much of their memetic environment and so have a much greater context for the culture today. (Even if that culture no longer believes in those deities.)

These are not masters or rulers unless we lose the context for how they exist and of course with all things they are inextricably connected to us, to get in an Anarchist rage about despotic divinities is foolish when you realize they are our own reflection, separate yet connected. Those divinities which show non Anarchist tendencies represent aspects of all minds which are non Anarchist when we are unconscious of them, or it is merely an apt metaphor for how a particular aspect of the mind interacts with other aspects. For example Zeus has his sexist behaviour, but he represents the mind itself and especially the ego, and so it is natural and accurate to depict him as having a lot of offspring with many different mothers, sometimes not in the most consensual manner. Finally the ancients didn't have the same illusions about deities that are so common in Abrahamic traditions, they didn't believe their gods were purely “good” and didn't expect them to be, because they didn't really think in such dualist terms or later on at least understood that it is a human concept. Since the gods are the natural forces it was understood that nature is not here just for our pleasure, that nature can even hurt us, that humans did not have dominion over the Earth and so some gods were respected more than loved, because even if a deity is not purely “good,” it is stupid to go against nature.

While Qabbalah has traditionally often been interpreted in terms of hierarchy, it is certainly not mandatory, while its central scheme the tree of life is superficially seen this way, it is no more a hierarchy than a rainbow or musical scale, all its parts are emanations, the unfolding causality of the one. Yes there certainly is a lot of hierarchical and patriarchal symbolism to be found in Judaism and this is reflected in much of Occult symbolism, and yet these are symbols and metaphors and so while we may dislike the choice of aesthetics, it does not mean the message behind the metaphor is incorrect. The choice of aesthetics then is largely superficial and arbitrary and due to the common social customs of the time and so with oneness as its foundation, these abstractions are made moot since all the angels and “god names” are within you, not over you. While the Qabbalah is often made into a hierarchical system it is ultimately cyclical and non linear and non hierarchical systems are definitely out there and creatable. Another alternative is to take existing paradigms and make them Anarchist, for example the tree of life glyph can be superficially interpreted as a Judaic Hierarchy, but you can take the tree and turn it on its side to create a spectrum instead of a hierarchy without really losing any information, you can also understand that the hierarchy is metaphorical and also endlessly cyclical and all of it is found within all levels, because it is essentially fractal. Even if you do not want to be a Qabbalist there is much that can be learned about consciousness through its study, it has more in common with Buddhism and Hinduism than it does with literalist Judaism and so has many great ideas for creating your own system no matter what your ontological outlook may be.

Jewish Kabbalah is merely the only detailed literature of Qabbalism to survive the Christian persecution of the Pagan mystery traditions and so while not as ideal as studying pure Hermetic magick, thanks to Christianity we are in many ways shit out of luck. (spelled with “K” Kabbalah refers to Jewish religion, spelled with a Q it is non religious or Hermetic and spelled with a “C” it generally refers to Christian Cabala.) While Qabbalah may not be perfect for those with an Anarchist or Pagan outlook the fact remains that those wishing to get ideas about creating their own individual practices will find in it many great insights about the mechanics of ritual, psychology, mysticism and magick. So I say to these people, a magician is not bound by rules of orthodoxy and so can take from it what they want and discard the rest or change it to suit their views, be a heretic. Do not let a distaste for old testament rhetoric and symbolism blind you from the profound and essentially Anarchist meaning behind it, I encourage wide research and individual taste, not slavish adherence to any dogma. Any philosophy which purports universal oneness, such as Qabbalah or Hinduism, or any other is in reality essentially Anarchist when understood fully, since all things are made equal and united as one essential thing, hierarchy is ultimately an illusion, it is a convenient denial of this reality by authorities (sometimes even supposed masters of these philosophies) to think that anything can or should be made higher than anything else.

Considering how much Jewish people took from other cultures in the creation of their religious thought, the concept of one objective deity does not make much sense even by old testament standards. The Qabbalah is largely a common language between Greek Gnosticism, middle eastern and Egyptian Occultism and it is in a way just like ancient Chaos magick, except that over thousands of years they created a very elaborate, comprehensive and consistent system of magick to work with, incorporating traditional symbols from their personal mythologies and many other traditions. Qabbalah is comparative Occultism as opposed to comparative religion. When it comes to magick ritual, Chaos magicians seem to focus more on building a connection to the highest unifying thing, whatever you want to call it, being much more ambiguous in that they use less symbols to map the Chaos. Chaotes believe in stripping ritual of anything that seems excessive or what may be to some cumbersome or extraneous and in this way they are paradoxically almost like fundamentalist magicians, focusing on the fundamental power of the universe and acquiring gnosis of it. There is a definite scientific attitude to many Chaos magicians, often with reductionist ambitions of studying magick, always keeping the questions of why and how it works in mind, this can have advantages, it can also have disadvantages if you are too stuck in that one mindset. As an ontology however Chaos magick is generally superb at keeping a magician from trapping themselves in a box, Chaotes understand that magick and reality can take any form they wish and that all forms are valid and equal so long as you believe it. Though I do find elaboration and traditional symbolism useful, everyone has what is right for them, too much obsession with abstraction can dilute and distract the gnosis to impractical levels, while too little abstraction makes it harder to express your will.

While I haven't really come across any, I suppose there may be some dogmatic ceremonial magicians or traditionalist people, perhaps some Pagans or Jews who practice Kabbalah or some other tradition they take as dogma, that take symbols or rituals to have literal and unique power inherent within, rather than as tools for focusing the power within yourself. However I do believe that at the heart of all traditional philosophies was someone with a Chaote or Gnostic attitude and with Shamanic experience who decided to create a symbol system that worked for people and usually had a story to go along with it. That said, those prevalent and well tread paths, those symbol systems which have been fed by many people for thousands of years have much energy in the collective unconscious which has been strengthened by all that practice and so it might be very well true some god forms and symbols have accumulated more power than a fresh sigil, but the fact remains those without access to their own power will have little to no ability to work with these energies. When people seek to draw energy from these symbols without understanding the unity of all things, placing their energy solely in external things, they may get their prayers answered but they weaken their own abilities by affirming their separation from the magick. This is what literalist religion really is, personally I think the gods and goddesses of old do exist in a way outside of our own personal power, but that we must believe in them to work with them properly. We still have magick, we still exist in a consensus reality and so we can screen out realities or entities by not believing in them, so there is no way that we can avoid being an intrinsic part of the magickal process and so we must learn to do our part. I believe all things that can be imagined are real in some way or another and many things which humans have never imagined as well. Do these magickal symbols have power in themselves or are they filled with our power? In a very real and literal way the symbols and divinities do have a power of their own, but nothing is ever outside of our influence as well because there is no division, everything is one. Many people calling themselves Qabbalists or Pagans and other things may not see it that way, but in fact I would argue their own philosophies in every instance that I know of ultimately state this to be true, whether or not they have recognized it yet. That we are in the god/desses imagination just as much as they are in ours, that we are all one and the same as well as separate just as everything else in your life.

I wouldn't quite call myself a Chaote because I don't think it quite encapsulates all that I believe, (that may be hard for some Chaotes to imagine) I am a Chaote and not a Chaote and everything else as well as nothing, technically we are all Chaotes, most of us just don't know it, but I am an Occultist, a magician an animist panentheist and a lover of wisdom and it is to Paganism that I feel especially drawn. I find that the word "Pagan" does the best job of describing my views because within that wide umbrella of philosophies is the roots of all philosophic thought, including Chaos magick and everything else from Qabbalah to Gnosticism even right back to Shamanism. Am I a devotee of Chaos? You damn well bet I am, I am just not into newness for the sake of newness, it seems too trendy to me, especially the ideas of using pop cultural icons in rituals. I say fuck pop culture, pop culture is the problem, it is the spells cast on us by the corporations, TV these days is more destructive than even Yahweh and we even find televangelists using it to spread his most poisonous lies. Modern Chaos philosophy does provide great insight for anyone wanting to take from a wide variety of traditions, it even has historic associations with punk rock, I just think its a mistake of some few Chaotes to think all that matters in magick is manifesting physical pleasure and ignoring expanding personal awareness, as that is the ideology of the bourgeois capitalist consumption. It is the Pagan Shamans who were the founders of all religion and were the first Chaotes, those who made religions are like children playing with some highly technical tools as if they are action figures, making stories for them and imagining they know their meaning. As I try to see things in non linear or monist ways there is no separation in my mind from Shamanism to Chaos magick or any philosophy that was created in between, all consciousness flows from the same source and so all abstractions, philosophies and religions as well as all gods and spirits are part of the same thing.

The Greeks and many other Pagan societies had no orthodoxy as we know it, they had little to no dogma that was universally applied, perhaps other than the idea each individual needs to forge their own relationships with the gods. There was no centralized authority nor even authoritative texts or stories, there were only popular and traditional stories about the gods, which would be interpreted individually and come in a variety of forms. There were various philosophies but they were not only open to debate, they were the very origins of logic and debate, of having no attachment to anything but the truth and trying to work it out as much as possible. The priests and priestess's would not tell you how to worship, (for the Norse there was Shaman like figures but not really a priest class) they would only help you if you wanted it, or facilitated mass ceremonies and festivals. Clearly they wouldn't let you mess up the temples or do something to ruin the spiritual experiences of others, but each person was free to "worship" in their own way. The closest thing to an idea of heresy in some of these Pagan societies was speaking out against state religion (which was something else entirely) or going around telling other people their way was wrong, that you knew better than everyone else. Not only this but these Pagans freely admitted the validity of foreign peoples religions and gods, maybe they thought the gods were tied to the land like the Norse, or maybe they just believed their own gods appeared to other people in different forms, there are many ways of looking at this.

A religion is like a blueprint for a temple, its practices like carpentry tools, you can follow the tradition and make the same temple as Buddha or Mohammed etc, or you can study widely and really learn how to use a variety of tools so that eventually you can make up your own unique temple. Each way has its pros and cons, if you make your own you will make mistakes, but you will have a deeper understanding of how it all works, you will not get caught up in authoritarian mindsets about temple aesthetics and choice of symbolism. You will be able to create a temple that probably suits you better than anything else. No temple which is completed is better than any other, they are simply the symbol systems which are most conducive to evoking the states of mind which provide spiritual awareness.

Since we are capable of all things, it can be a bit difficult to wrap your mind around that reality and create mechanisms of harnessing that potential, one place to start is to ask how do we know what is worth doing and what is the best way of doing it? If we can do anything then we can create a means of understanding how to navigate that mindset. Magical systems and rituals are these attempted mechanisms which employ what are essentially tools of the imagination. These tools are how we sculpt and shape the prima materia or metaphysical energy, they are also tools to help navigate the endless abyss of the mind. Things like familiars or sigils are good ways of mapping out and working with the imagination, when combined with ritual symbolism a whole new world is opened up which allows the mind to be manipulated. These tools are the creative engines we can use to make our own psychological cosmology, but we must be careful not to fall in the old religious trap of dogmatism and literalism. When this happens the familiars and symbols become the masters and we forget what they really mean, or what they are really for. Luckily we are not bound by rules, I will use this fact to use my tools in order to fashion increasingly more effective tools. I will use these new tools for spiritual, mental, physical growth so that I will be able to create yet better tools and in this way explore the potentials of consciousness.

Much like the physical technology which has allowed for an explosion of population, the extension of life and the shaping of culture we must ask, do we create the gods? Or do they create us? I cant help but be reminded of the Freemasons who build such elaborate structures and walls, I suspect they may of walled themselves in a golden cage however, and some have definitely lost all sight of those outside. As I said before, building a tower of babel is not in our best interests, but instead we must learn to keep our creations in line with untouched nature here on the ground. Complexity does not equal truth, nor does it necessarily make things more functional, in many ways having one tool that can do many things is better than many tools each with only one use, but it is important to test your limits and imagine ways to do things you couldn't do before. Ultimately the power of grey and black magick is just exercising our desire, ultimately attachment to desire is the cause of suffering and so we must look to white magick if we are ever to be truly satisfied. Bliss is found within, not with acquisition of material things. We can however use these tools of the imagination for much more than just material gain, we can use it to come to a fuller understanding of the divine and so live in a more congruent way with it and this the true purpose of magick, not worldly power. Some of the first tools that are perhaps the best to start with are tools which take stock of what is in your mind, then create a tool to help you create better tools, or a tool to help you better control your mind, to overcome doubt and apathy in the process. First overcome the doubt that you can overcome your doubt, then overcome all the other doubts and fears until you are left with a mind that knows itself inside out, if you can really do that, then you can do anything.

With all the confusion as to what reality is there are a few classical magickal proverbs which are able to shed light on a variety of insights regarding existence, these are basic and widely known in the Occult community and should be understood if you wish to understand much of what Occult wisdom has to say. The problem or perhaps the joke of many of the proverbs I will mention is that if you don't already understand or have a feel for the concept they illustrate, you are most likely not able to properly interpret them, or at least are more likely to take them at face value. The implications of this are that a large amount of people have been offended by what they interpret, or in terms of religion when someone dares to interpret it differently. Gnosis becomes a kind of key to many esoteric proverbs which otherwise make little to no sense, however these proverbs are attempts to put to words aspects of revelations acquired through gnosis and so there really isn't a more clear way to communicate these ideas in such a short form. Even with vast elaborations, without the personal experience of gnosis a person will not completely have the proper context, and so its no wonder many atheists or others will think such mystical insights are nonsense. I will try my best to extrapolate and interpret my own opinions on these, but still as with all magical knowledge there is a huge difference between hearing it and experiencing it yourself, it is also important to point out my explanations definitely do not provide all the insight that is possible from careful consideration of the words.

When it comes to magickal revelations some times it's just too tempting to be cryptically poetic instead of explaining in excruciating detail the meanings of some idea, sometimes it's easy to rationalize that those who aren't willing to stop and think about what is being said, aren't worthy of understanding the message. In my own writing I have a variety of degrees of poetic encryption but in general I think there are too many people who need things put bluntly. Given the current state of the world there is no time for riddles, still sometimes this is really quite unavoidable, especially when you are in a state of entheogenic gnosis, it's more like taking down dictation then writing a report.

The first proverb I mention is the oldest, most straightforward and is deceptively simple, I find it unlikely anyone could be offended by it, but it is the exception to the ones I mention here. I say it is deceptively simple because it ultimately is the proverb from which arguably the most western Occult philosophy is rooted. The Hermeticists had a saying of which we are generally familiar with, at least in part that is, "as above so below" but the full proverb has at the end "to accomplish the miracles of the one thing." This axiom illustrates reality clearly, how all things are in fact one thing and that all separateness is illusion. When taken most literally it reminds me of a dream I had where I started digging and clawing through my bed and then the carpet and floor only to find a miniature room and within a miniature me inside the whole. Some how the dream switched perspectives and I was digging into my arm only to find the same thing. I don't remember looking up but I suppose I would of seen a giant form of myself. This concept explains astrology but also why magick is real, because of the fractal nature of reality, if we change our mind we change everything else. The universe is your body and the whole universe is also contained within every atom of your body, each division in infinity is itself infinite and whole, it is the “one thing” and by understanding this we can accomplish miracles. If you want to try and be offended by this then I just may be able to help you, just imagine me being inside your genitals and brain, licking, peeing, and shitting and generally living outside the standards of humanity, as I will now do.

This section would not be complete without a mention from the great grand pompous pervert of a Beast himself Aleister Crowley. “Do what thou wilt shall be the whole of the law” is his proverb and is often misunderstood to mean do whatever you want and there will be no consequences, but Crowley loved to play word games and (mind games) with people who accepted statements at face value and most of all with people who didn't question authority, even people who think of him as the authority. While the Anarchist implications of this statement are all too obvious, (intentional or not) one layer of interpretation of this proverb is that he is referencing the “aeon of Horus” in which humanity will be awakened to magickal realities. While we are already in the aeon of Horus it is a gradual change, this is made clear by the fact that he says “shall be” as in the future tenses, when this happens our will, will be able to manifest things in a previously unparalleled way. To me it has much more to do with metaphysical laws than legal ones, even if you take this proverb in a hedonistic context as some may argue Crowley himself did, you have to understand Crowley's concept of the “true will” of which I have mentioned before and which is the duty of each of us to find. This refers to our higher selves will and not the will of our egos, it is our reason for incarnating in to this world, though sometimes our higher self will need to teach our egos what true value is by showing how worthless base desires turn out to be. If you consider that we are all one then there really is no laws but the ones you have made, though it may be in another body, then do as thou wilt really really is the whole of the law. One can imagine that in this new “aeon of Horus” if oneness is totally realized, there wouldn't be a whole lot of need for legal laws or governments.

It is funny to me to note how angry this proverb can make certain dogmatic people, but they see no problem with being told “do what I tell you” from some supposed authority. These are often people who also don't understand the concept of Anarchy and so can be quite upset about words of which they haven't bothered to learn the meaning of. If you are upset by someone telling you to do what you will, it is probably because you harbour secret desires you despise and so you essentially hate yourself and if that is how you feel, then you will do what you will and hate yourself so much you ruin your life being afraid to do what you want.

Its pretty clear Crowley did not have much regard for governments or the churches laws, but exactly how Anarchist he was is another question. His horrible treatment of women, his attitudes towards race and generally acting like some kind of messianic guru with authoritarian inclinations show he had in some very important ways a serious lack of Anarchist awareness, but then maybe that is just what he wants us to think. As he is purposely contradictory and confusing and any serious discussion of the matter requires a book in itself, for the most part I am not going to get into judging such a complex and tricky person, it should be remembered that even “bad” people have good ideas and Crowley's ideas are certainly worth considering and questioning. Crowley did say “intolerance is evidence of impotence” and in many ways promoted a radically egalitarian philosophy, though he was all too happy to treat people badly if they wanted someone to rule them. I have no problem with getting ideas from people I disagree with about most things because I do not put anyone up on a pedestal, I do not look to individuals who seem to be true for ideas or to tell me how to live, I look at individual ideas to try and find what seems to be true and figure out for myself an appropriate way to live. No one should not be considered in what they say because they are an asshole, that would be authoritarian, all ideas have truth in them which can be learned from, even if it is only true that those ideas are wrong and stupid. Crowley at the very least is a great example of how the ego can delude people, even in the Occult, he was right to abolish shame within himself, but he did not properly abolish it's opposite pride and so he was still controlled by external forces. However this proverb is not even originally from Crowley, he simply expanded it and put it within a more non fiction context, it originally comes from François Rabelais and his story “Gargantua and Pantagruel.” The important thing to realize here is not who said it, but that the statement goes beyond the laws of institution, to those which are metaphysical, that once people are aware enough, the laws of the mind and the government will be abolished.

Crowley also had another proverb commonly said after the first which is not quite as inflammatory, but is also often misunderstood. “Love is the law, love under will” which I take the main layer of this to mean, that we manifest reality through basically two drives, the first is what we love, which is our desire to focus on something, this being because there is ultimately nothing but love possible, even if it is a love of thinking badly about something. (We may also love the sadistic feeling of causing pain, destruction or self righteousness to things we hate.) It is ironic that people who don't know much about Crowley and quote so many things he has said out of context in order to make him look bad, seem to ignore that here he is saying that love is the most fundamental thing in existence. This hardly seems like the thinking of an evil “Satanist,” but certainly good thinking for a trickster who likes to provoke thought by playing jokes on shallow people. The other drive is the will, which is the means of shifting our focus or feelings regarding something. First we analyze through introspection how we feel about something, what we love, what we have “positive thinking” about, then using will we move our love and transmute any doubt or contrary feelings so as to focus on what we want to occur, we will ourselves to have gnosis that our love will then be manifested. The will is crucial in keeping us from loving contradicting or unsuitable things and spreading our focus too thinly, it is the will of concentration and of single minded effort. In a way it is a very hedonistic concept as it identifies love as the fundamental component of the universe.

If you are offended by that then you probably love some things that aren't that useful. Obviously though, for the most part the people who were offended by Crowley's proverbs, just hated him for one reason or another, (and there are some pretty good reasons) and so they look for ways to attack him whether or not they really understand him. Knowing from personal experience how reputations can get out of hand with gossip and the media, (world gossip) I am unwilling to really judge someone as complex as Crowley without knowing him personally and extensively, but whoever he was, those words have great Occult significance. To be fair however, being a queer Occultist junky who was prescribed heroin for his asthma and was raised by fundamentalist Christians in Victorian England would back anyone in to a corner and so we might forgive some of his controversies.

This last axiom is from a man who was the leader of a mystical “Muslim” order called the Hashishans of which the word assassin is derived. They were a group who were quasi militaristic and smoked copious amounts of hashish, it is said this man Hassan I Sabbah influenced the Knights Templar and other European mystical orders during the crusades, as they fought on both sides, whichever suited them at the time. They managed to survive the crusades being surrounded by fanatics on both sides and do so while creating an interesting non dogmatic philosophy. His most famous saying is “Nothing is true, Everything is permitted.” On first glance this seems to give permission for all kinds of atrocities and acts in the name of nihilism, but this is not really the case, there is a much deeper meaning. This axiom is the closest thing to a credo the Chaos magick philosophy could have, but I don't like the idea of saying Chaos magick has a credo. What it attempts to convey is the idea that “nothing is true” meaning that any fact is ultimately false and dependent solely on belief, its a subjective abstraction on Chaos. When this is fully realized “everything is permitted,” meaning that the gates of magical potential are opened and one becomes capable of all things or creating reality according to will. It makes no effort to sway a persons morality in anyway, nor does it encourage action of any kind apart perhaps of realization. This articulates very well the fundamental theorem of ontological Anarchist metaphysics that we make our own reality, that we alone are responsible for the world, not some external deity. This concept illustrates a prime reason for just how important it is to “know thyself” for if you don't even know what you believe, then you won't have much of a grasp on reality, and so will be ultimately powerless. Once you realize this concept you realize “those who know do not speak, those who speak do not now.” Obviously I know nothing.

Many people do know that magick works, at least unconsciously but I wonder how many people really know exactly how magick works. I do not claim to have firm scientific proof or explanations for magick, but science does show there are things that happen outside of statistical probability. Experiments show that prayers help heal sick people who do not know they are being prayed for, but also random number generators can be manipulated metaphysically to change which numbers appear, not only before they are turned on, but working retroactively after the numbers are already generated! Traditionally magick has generally been thought to have been workable with aids of various kinds of spirits or gods and although using that format in ceremonies and having faith in it will work very well, I don't think it adequately describes the hows and whys of magick, especially considering it is possible to use magick without the aid of any entities but yourself. I do think it is true that spirits and gods and goddesses exist, how independent they are from us is something I cannot say, they may be really old and highly evolved souls, they may be a kind of gestalt mind of many souls, or may be the divine entities they are traditionally viewed as, but I think its important to realize that magick is not dependent on such entities and that the vast majority of how we perceive these beings are from the artificially created manifestations of the collective or individual mind.

It seems to me and many other people interested in these things, that there must be a plane of existence which is beyond time and space which is pure potential, that our subconscious's are capable of going into this realm in some way and experiencing the reality which is desired through will, gnosis, and love. Then for most people the subconscious cuts out the memory of the creation and the conscious mind experiences the reality in ignorance and this is because that ignorance is part of the desired experience. Much in the same way it might not be as fun for the ego to watch a movie when you know exactly what is going to happen, but also you cannot learn your lessons as well if you cheat and look at the answers. As I see it there are a number of possible ways in which the creation happens, perhaps all of the different theories happen simultaneously, as part of a yet deeper reality. When our mind's subconscious goes into the realm of pure potential, which could be thought of as pure energy or Chaos, our minds are ultimately at one with this energy and it is capable of consolidating it in any physical form it wants, much like controlling a body. In fact I do think the universe is the physical body of the divine which we are all one with, not to say it is limited to the physical, just as you are not only your body. We do not realize this because most people cannot consciously control the universal body yet, just like they don't think they can control their hearts or wiggle their ears, that is because most people haven't mastered all the things that are part of their being beyond the physical. By unifying your consciousness with your subconscious, you become one with the universe, and so controlling the universe magickally becomes like flexing a muscle, you just have to access and control the right part of your mind to do so.

One common misunderstanding of polytheistic Pagan religions is that they had no concept of monotheism, but it is very clear that they did, as I have mentioned already in the form of Chaos, or some kind of void, but this is a common theme in many more religions then I have mentioned. Ancient Pagans were in fact so aware of that underlying unity of nature that they knew better then to try and symbolize it or abstract it, since any expression would limit and thus negate it. No single conception was good enough and to try would be to unleash a symbol that demands everyone conforms to a lie, they may have some vague notion or name for it, but as with Chaos it was not a big part of the exoteric religious practices. Some of the masses may have taken their religions very literally, but it is clear to me and many others just how prevalent the idea of one force with many faces really is, the Druids had no name for it but may have referred to it as the serpents egg, while some Native American's called it the Great Spirit, but it is most easily recognized by remembering Pagans were pantheistic and panentheistic. I believe all the most ancient religions were originally like this, it is just that we generally do not recognize the unity on the conceptual level of the polytheistic gods, over time we have forgotten the meaning behind the masks out of convenience and fundamentalist disinformation and hierarchical manipulation. It is ironically the superficial view of monotheism that blinds people (even atheists) to the real unity and nature of the divine in all things and all religions. Ancients realized it was much more effective to take a henotheistic approach and map the various aspects of this one force, seeing it is better to make plurality and variety a key feature of the underlying divine unity, as that is how it appears in nature. "Henotheism" has a few forms, but for the purposes of this book it means that all gods are aspects of the one force or supreme deity, each god form in this world or any other is essentially united, since that one force appears in all apparently separate things.

All things that have or will ever be created already exist within "Chaos" or "The All" or the "God/desshead" and this is because it is beyond time. Nothing can really be created or destroyed, for if there was anything less or more to these concepts they wouldn't be what they are, totality, you cannot add to totality, nor can you take away from it and in this way there is nothing that can be created. We can work with things based on belief like in Chaos magick but we are not creating things, we are simply selecting from Chaos what we wish to experience by the mechanism of our gnosis and will, because of this we could never have created the gods and goddesses, they have existed in the All for all time and beyond just like everything else. All we are doing with magick is using ritual to direct awareness to the aspect of contradictory totality which we desire, from that we create the illusion of it being separate from everything else so that we may focus on it and experience it. This could be likened to anamnesis in that we do not actually experience anything at all, time is simply us remembering an experience that existed in the realm of eternity, of divine awareness. This may seem hard to imagine but it is like how all your memories are within your head all the time but only come up when you recall them, the All is the sum total of all memories, which never actually happened, except in a way which all things happened at once, time is the experience of these things in a linear progression of recollection. In this view of reality, magick is the methods of recalling memories that are according to our will so that we can relive them in a way that is isolated from all other possibilities. Nothing is ever created or destroyed at the fundamental level of reality known as Chaos, the Pleroma, the All or any of a plethora of other names and this is true of the gods, our own sigils, familiars and everything else in existence.

We do not experience reality, we experience our consciousness of reality and so I believe in the Gods and Goddesses because they are at the very least, the modes of perception and aspects of that consciousness, and so in a very real sense they create all that is. Since we only ever experience our consciousness and not reality, to have a map of consciousness that allows us to understand which aspects are used when we perceive things and what the true nature of these aspects is, then we can have a fundamental knowledge about all things in "reality." This allows us to understand all things to a more complete degree, especially how we react to things or go about exercising our will, knowing reality is in your mind is much more practical if you know the variables that make up your mind and this is illustrated in many Occult and Pagan cosmologies. To believe in Hermes is to believe in the intellect and the logical linguistic mind and so if you know how to use symbols you know Hermes, so if you do not believe in Hermes and you think such belief is stupid you must have little intelligence. The more we work with our consciousness as a process with different parts, the better we can make the process work and understand where we and others will go wrong. We will also understand our true self and be much more functional throughout life and so from this perspective, the gods and spirits really are the source of all magick. By breaking up the various aspects of consciousness we can also specialize, or work on specific parts that are not balanced or functioning at full capacity, we can also modify and customize our consciousness so that we can in a very real sense upgrade our software. Once you name the various parts of your mind, then you can work with the individual parts and once you can do that, then you can improve the various parts so that the unconscious mind becomes conscious.

We are all united with Chaos and so we have this power as well, through the same mechanisms that the various divinities control reality, we embody aspects of all of the divinities and so we can do all things, they simply are the pure aspects of what they are divinities of, and so are perhaps better in their specialized field than any human, but are in ways more limited than any human. As reality is the universal mind, and the gods are personifications of consciousness, it is the gods who create reality, but it is within our minds that this takes place. It could also be said that the divinities help us in our workings whether we call on them or not, because they are intrinsic parts of reality and are fundamentally unified with us like everything else. Are the gods and goddesses real? Of course they are, it is the concept of “real” that is not real, though so is the concept of “not real” and once you understand that, then many questions that people ask are pretty irrelevant. All divisions are illusionary including the division between the illusion and non illusion, even the view that you are in ignorance is ignorant, if you want gnosis, all you have to do is remember the truth.

As we never experience reality, only our consciousness, then to learn to control our consciousness and to be conscious of our consciousness allows us to control “reality” in a very real sense, but also to understand why reality is the way it is. As you progress in the mastery of your own mind, you will realize that before you started you did not even really know what control of your mind was, you just thought you did, because that is what your ego wanted you to think. Through Occult practice you will have a much better means of determining the validity of memes and your own mindset, so that you will not be fooled or led astray by those who hoard knowledge to use against you, or seek to impose their will on you through lies and fear. Know that just because Hermes is an aspect of your mind, it does not mean there is no Hermes outside of your individuated consciousness, that Hermes (or similar gods) is the source of linguistic knowledge for all life forms to whatever degree that they work to bring him into their life. He is the intellect of the universal mind from which you are a part, and in it you are a personification yourself and so you should not see yourself as higher than the gods but treat them with respect as wise teachers. If reality is the divine mind, and the gods and goddesses are the various aspects of the mind, then working with the various divinities can change not only your personal mind, but the whole of perceived reality. This does not mean slavery to the gods, but loving the gods as they love you, and most importantly striving to unify yourself with them and learn their lessons. Know that you are one with them and so they do not expect you to be their slave, but in working with them ritually and honouring them, you show that you value them and that it is your intention for them to be a stronger part of your life and for them to help you.

The higher your consciousness the easier it is to work magick, this is like climbing up a mountain, the higher up you go, the less it takes to start an avalanche through the snowball effect. By this I mean that you send the manifestation to the bottom of the mountain which is the physical plane, so that the higher up the mountain you are when you trigger the avalanche, the more snow will be there to effect the bottom of the mountain. At the bottom of the mountain you can resort to making snowmen or igloos, which is metaphorical of direct physical action, but at the top of the mountain you can move lots of energy effecting all that is below and requiring just a small nudge to set things in motion. This is why it is crucial to get a feel for the Tao, getting in the flow of things is even more important than a magical ritual, the ritual is simply a means of manipulating the Tao through symbols, as once you are in the Tao you are in gnosis. The higher up the mountain, or the more in the Tao you are, the less you will need to do ritually to create huge effects in the world below, but with a more elaborate ritual you can more accurately and specifically direct the forces you work with.

Creating artificial order as in the various Occult cosmologies is a limited abstraction on Chaos, but when used for white magick can provide us with tools that do aid in the process of deconstructing the egos vain order. Occult paradigms are a kind of ladder or framework that can be used to expand awareness in a way that wouldn't normally be possible, all the while you are learning how to direct the mind and quiet it to be in a state with no thoughts, no abstractions and this is done until you reach total enlightenment. As we live in endless potential, what religions and Occult belief structures do is set up a kind of map of functioning within that potential, we often don't realize this and so believe ourselves to be limited, but that is just because we live in a paradigm of limitation. Magick is in part the attempt to maximize function and open up to as much potential as possible while still maintaining control for the ongoing process of raising awareness, which I argue inherently means spreading Anarchism as the way to make the world at large more magickal.

This ideas seem to mesh well with modern science in some ways and it can be all too tempting to create a theory on how Quantum physics may cause magick to work, no one can say how this branch of physics works, but if we combine what is known with Occult theory we come across some interesting ideas. The theory, of “Schrodinger's cat” is that any phenomenon that remains unobserved is in a state of quantum flux in which it is expressing all possible outcomes of the event simultaneously. When it becomes observed by us it gets locked into one of the potential outcomes depending on its “quantum probability,” the theory for magick is that it is possible to change the quantum probability and so create the outcome that we want manifesting in the physical world of particles. This is like the Zen koan of a tree falling in the woods, if no one is around to hear it, does it make a sound? According to this analogy we cannot even tell if it really falls until we check it out, let alone determine if it makes a sound. Magick then does not create things, it changes probability, the probability determining the most likely potential experiences within endless Chaos. The Quantum probability would in this case be determined by our expectations and beliefs, perhaps coupled with an ability to harmonically resonate the strings of “string theory” an incredible theory that has more in common with Hermeticism then it does with the Newtonian clockwork view of the universe.

As magick is causing change in accordance with the will and perception of reality is dependent on consciousness, magick creates reality from moment to moment in that we choose what our consciousness focuses on within reality. This is true for all of life because a person can kill themselves or learn to shut out all of the outside world completely through meditation or certain drugs, at least until they starve to death. So by choosing to focus on the outside world we are performing a magickal act to create that perception of reality and since we almost never experience reality itself but our consciousness of reality, magick creates all that we call reality. Heisenberg's “uncertainty principle” suggests that all particles are waves when they are not observed, each particle is simultaneously a wave and a particle, but the wilful act of directing consciousness to observe apparently creates the particles and so this act of will, this magick literally creates physical reality from moment to moment by turning quantum waves into seemingly solid matter that our minds perceive as particles. It may very well turn out particles are just consciousness's way of putting waves into a recognizable form for us to interact with, a kind of physical symbol which the mind and will can work with. The true reality is energy waves interacting, but our minds symbolize this as particles interacting in a coherent linear view of space time. In this way, by using ritual and learning control of consciousness we can control what reality we create for ourselves, so long as quantum probability still exists magick can work on it. Ritual allows us to work with the wave forms of particles without being directly conscious of them and so we don't turn them into particles until the time of manifestation, a sigil allows us to focus on the wave, but not the particles the wave will become since it is only in resonance with those particles. By resonating with these waves in various ritual ways we can then change the probability of how they manifest together in particle form, thus creating change in conformity with the will, using essentially the same principle for mechanical physical changes and metaphysical changes. If we enter a state of zen or oneness with the universe, it is because we have no thoughts and so we are focusing on no waves in particular and so no particles are created for our consciousness and we become pure energy, though someone observing us would still create the particles of our body, they cannot really observe our minds.

Scientists focus on repeatable measurable phenomena and religious people focus on their dogma and their idea of the divine, but a magician needs to try and be aware of and understand all things. In order to work magick through all of reality they need to be aware of the holistic totality they are manifesting and so must work to try and find truth wherever it is, not just within a narrow view but all possible views. I will do everyone a favour and not pretend to have a scientific explanation for magick, but it is important to try and think scientifically when possible and considering all perspectives is useful for making your magick more effective. Claiming one of your theories is proven scientifically when it is not is just as bad as a skeptic claiming it is definitely wrong because no one has figured out a way to prove it yet, the truth is no one knows and although thinking scientifically is great, keep a clear distinction about what is hypothesis and what is science. At the same time just because science has not yet created a device capable of measuring some force, does not stop it from existing, for example if people talked about radio waves that can transmit sound over huge distances, they would have been thought of as some kind of Witch or wizard. Perhaps there are some forces which by their very nature of being outside of space time will always be unmeasurable to physical devices, perhaps the only tool we need is the brain or soul. Whatever the reason for it working, I have no doubt that magick does work as I see it everyday and have used it to bring about so many things it is beyond reasonable skepticism to assume that it has all always been coincidence. In the end it doesn't really matter exactly how it works, everything is one thing and there isn't anything mysterious about a single thing having the "different parts" of itself interacting.

Entheogens play an important role in all these theories as they can not only send you consciously into the astral, or give you an experience of a worlds beyond anything you thought you knew, but its also much easier to control the universal body in the state of oneness which they can create. Entheogens have traditionally played a role in magical traditions around the world, despite peoples ignorance of history it is actually considered the norm for them to be associated. In old Anglo-Saxon the word lyblæca means wizard or sorcerer, but the root lybb means drug, poison or charm, while the Greek word for sorcery or Witchcraft is actually "pharmakeia" which also means drug, or drug maker, then of course there is also the term "medicine man" and so the two concepts are synonymous in many ways. In order to have a lucid dream first you have to realize you are dreaming, and then you are able to control the dream and entheogens seem to make life into a kind of waking lucid dream. Entheogens have the potential to take you to other dimensions, they can help you see and work with spirits and gods and they can amplify brain activity and so electrical impulses and presumably whatever other metaphysical energies are also in play can also be amplified. This is not to say that magick cannot be done without them, but then again perhaps it is DMT being released in the brain (or some other endogenous chemical with special energetic properties) that makes the magickal trance state possible, or propels consciousness out of the body.

According to many modern Witchcraft traditions, many plants psychoactive or not basically have some inherent energetic use that can be utilized for magickal purposes. For example incense or potions or oils, it seems likely to me combinations of these non psychoactive plants have some kind of synergistic effect with certain entheogens which have become forgotten due to things like the inquisition, but I am also not ruling out a more metaphysical synergy as well. Since all matter is energy, all plants are energy as well and it could be some of them, entheogenic or not as well as other natural substances have special energetic properties currently unknown to science, properties which help create astral resonances that are magickally beneficial. Each molecule is like frozen energy and perhaps its possible certain combinations of wave forms of particles (molecules) could have wave form properties that cause them to interact with other wave forms when combined in ritual ways, much like a kind of wave form chemistry or Alchemy, the particles may be inactive together, but the wave forms have some undiscovered reaction. That plants can have symbolic meaning that is useful in ritual is undeniable and whatever the truth behind metaphysical energy, even an atheist with the right intentions, wanting to use ritual for purely psychological reasons may find working with even non psychoactive herbs extremely effective as props for initiating trance states.

At the very least entheogens are inter-dimensional vehicles, which to most sounds strange but since some of the dimensions are non physical, a physical vehicle there like a space ship wouldn't work, it would have to be a vehicle that operates in a non space time manner of which we have no recognizable 3D equivalent, but which gives the consciousness access to new perceptions. Certain chemicals can take you to formless realms so it must be that such a vehicle would not have a conventional form in this dimension. Since everything is mental representations, the symbol for something that takes you to other dimensions could very well take the form of say.. a mushroom.. or a seed. If the universe is a dream then anything that increases the imagination would help to dream better, especially if it shows you you're dreaming. It is interesting to note that my conventional dreams have become much more realistic and vivid since I began taking psychedelics. Despite modern prejudice and the simplistic and naive assumptions about ancient peoples, it is pretty clear that entheogens have been used around the world to gain access to the spirit world, that dismissing this fact closes the door on the most consistently effective means humanity has for becoming aware of these dimensions. Judging the validity of such perceptions, having never had them is incredibly bias and when compared with the so called "advanced" religions of today, we can say there is much more reason and personal experiences for an ancient person on mushrooms to believe what they do, then members of the Abrahamic tradition to believe a literalist version of what they do.

There is really no end to the possibilities of why magick works and really it is somewhat pointless to try and explain, as I have said before the important thing is knowing that it does work. All theories could theoretically be linked in some way and we must realize that all things are connected and unified, the more we realize that, the more obvious it is that magick is possible. Despite our inability to be definite as to the why, theorizing does give some advantages for experimentation, as to the question of how, by having our theories and always being ready to update them with new information we allow a belief system to sink in, something which is crucial to getting into a useful magickal mindset. We are able to program our mind to believe it and so for whatever reason it becomes real, and I mean real in a quantifiable and repeatable way so long as conditions are right, the problem is people casting doubt on the experiment, the intentions and expectations of all people involved in the experiment effect the results and so these kinds of experiments do not adhere to modern scientific assumptions about reality. Even with all these problems there are some models of magick, which are thousands of years old, which right or wrong do provide useful insights and at the very least metaphors which do lead to useful practices. From ceremonial magick, to Witchcraft and Shamanism, there is also the musical theories of Pythagoras, astrology, Alchemy and runes, all systems provide insight, yet once you have a mystical experience you see the common reality behind them. We need to stop thinking only about how materialist causes can be proven and instead focus on raising awareness beyond the material. From that position our consciousness will be able to see how metaphors (which may be literally true too) can be used to better allow us to grab hold of the infinite using finite symbolism. If we can do that, then the above will be seem like that which is below, and that which is below will be seen as that which is above, to accomplish the miracles of the one thing.

Haunted

Subtle stalking spirits speak silently saying symbols.

The crust of humanity rot on the streets, the dirtiest of the gutter who often have the cleanest conscience's.

I'm addicted to reality, I wrap it around me like a warm blanket that makes me feel safe.

Creation seems hard when you don't let it flow,

I write plainly in words that are trivial to some, insightful to others but these words are working.

A young wizard walks in a zig zag along a crooked path, he knows what this world holds for him.

Glamour and red lights and cold bloody nights, they hold not even a passing fancy.

The rebel who keeps his compassion but does not ache with the bleeding hearts.

Abandoning the dramatic, the seduction of dreaming,

All those who sleep during the day and wake up for a few hours when they go to bed at night.

Invoke the transforming flame of Shiva to burn away the stagnant putrefaction.

Melt away their ego with the mischief of a trickster who has been let in on the secret.

Weave your magick for us all and let it carry us to another world on a hyper spacial carpet ride.

Revelations is a reckoning, a realization and a new beginning.

Let the winds guide you any way they blow,

Feel it all around you, breaking lose and sucking in.

Scuzzy saints left unknown, the garbage of society must be cleaned from their towers filled with gold.

Wrathful vengeance is too sloppy, let the recompensing be most total.

The whole in the sky is calling you to join your experience with the experience,

It wont ever say goodbye, it befriends those who seek their destined free will.

It is coming for all

Chapter 6 - Roses

Most people are pretty unconscious of the role that words play in the world, just how powerful are words? Well humans wouldn't have pretty much anything they have in the world now without them, no institutions can exist without words, no person can belong to a complicated culture without words and without words it would be pretty hard to get to know someone. Looking around at people I can see how they have imprisoned themselves with language, they are trapped in their own personal self talk to the point where they are riddled with self doubts, wishing people would say those magick words to them, "I love you." Through bad logic and rhetoric politicians have managed to trick people into believing all kinds of absurd things, such as freedom means obeying leaders and laws you want nothing to do with. Through the use of jargon, special words can be used to discourage people from learning things they would be capable of understanding and which would do them a lot of good, but which people in power do not want the public to know. In a persons social life few things are as important as what they say, not only this but the words a person uses will also determine how they define themselves and from there, they will define their reality. This isn't to say a persons actions aren't possibly more important, but that in day to day life speaking is most of the actions people take with other people. If the universe is essentially mental, a group mind/dream then symbol systems, or language is the building blocks, or at least the way of identifying the memetic building blocks, which themselves are often linguistic in nature. Kindness is determined by context, your understanding of context by your level of awareness and awareness is potentially increased by your willingness to examine your relationships to figure out how to become more kind and compassionate. So then, since so much of our relationships are based on language, any hope of Anarchism must include greatly improving peoples communication skills.

I have moved into my new apartment now and I can see that language in fact determines what is mine and what is not, through consensus, through writing contracts and coming to agreements I can say that no one can come into my apartment. I have gotten into making moonshine or as the fancy would say, "distilling spirits" and while the law uses words to say this is illegal, it's really helped me to afford living on my own, it has even helped me to understand the language of Alchemy better, not to mention I can drink as much as I want, though more and more I find that drinking is not what I want. I wish there were some words that I could say to make some special woman understand me, but I realize now just how bad I have been at my self talk when I try to be romantic, just how bad I am at talking to women, to Helen. I have been seeing her around down town a lot more over the past month, I guess she was starting to warm up to me a bit, though I still can't talk to her about anything spiritual, I have been finding myself more and more attracted to her, even falling in love with her, at the very least she seemed like she was the kind of girl I dreamed about before I became spiritual.

The other night Helen and I got drunk on some absinthe I made, I brought her back to my place and we had sex, I guess I was naive but I thought she liked me a lot more, I tried to make her my girlfriend but she wouldn't have it, she is non monogamous. She is so outside my understanding, so addictive, she pulls me in and makes it hard to be away from her, but she is so illusive, she won't let me hold on to her. Maybe I have been so desperate to get a grip on reality I have been clinging to her, I don't know, its easy to see how I could make her my whole world and nothing else would matter. She admitted to me she is a junky, I have never really fallen for a junky before and it can't be good, she is on some kind of death trip and doesn't really want to live much. It makes me so mad at the world, she even admitted she works as a hooker, she can't afford her junk habit from panhandling and her parents have more or less disowned her, or at least won't let her live at home. She does still talk with her mom sometimes, but she is a street kid through and through. I will try to be there for her but its pretty obvious she doesn't care much about me or at least is too addicted to care much about anyone. I guess she was just drunk and bored or something, the thought of her sleeping with disgusting old men makes me want to burn down this city. Aaagh fuck, she is so perfect for me in so many ways, she even likes to burn things! After she explained herself a bit it was pretty clear to me its never going to work out, we are both lost in our own worlds and it would take some serious magick for her to love me, but I can't force anyone to love me with magick, it wouldn't be Anarchist. I will try to be there for her if she wants me, but then I don't know how much she really wants me around. Besides, you can't get someone to clean up if they don't want to clean up, forcing the situation just pushes them away, makes them alienated and so they want to escape even more, I just wish she would stop whoring herself. I still love her and I like to think some part of her at least likes me, I wrote a poem about my feelings for her, she laughed when I read it for her, but then I guess I know why now, though I don't know what that laughter says about me, my dreams of our future together are turning to a nightmare.

Without the right words no one will love me, or anyone else, but if I say the right words it does not mean they necessarily love me, only my words. Clearly action comes into this as well, talk is cheap, but action without words or communication of some kind will never really be understood, or at least full appreciation of a person cannot exist without knowing their mind and that is something that requires language. As a writer I am very concerned with words, the words in this book will determine who the hell wants to read it and while writing about words may not seem important, they are of vital importance if you want to understand why things are the way they are. The thoughts a person thinks are what determines their reality and the world they create, the most important words you may ever hear are "learn what language and thoughts are." I wonder what words there are that could make me feel loved, make it clear of my love for someone else, unfortunately not too many people feel that talking about language is lovely, but this idea is generally based on the words they have been told, that learning and exploring the mind is not worth while. Perhaps love is the union of consciousness with experience of what it enjoys, romanced through language so that consciousness can explore that experience and in that union of opposites, like two lovers having sex, a conception of a new form is created, life itself. One thing is clear, all of human civilization is run through language, the system is utterly dependent on it and to overcome oppression, we must figure out how they have used language against us.

In the days of the inquisition saying the wrong words would get you burnt at the stake, these days they just put you in an asylum, then they tell everyone and you yourself its for your own good, that until you accept their language and start talking like them you cannot get out. Without language there is no ego, no "I am" but there is awareness, trying to talk about this awareness can be difficult, but even if it is not totally possible, the attempt can provide a lot of insight into the nature of consciousness. I just wish I had someone like Helen to talk about it with, despite her problems she is wise, much wiser than she realizes, but I cant think of the right words to steer the conversation that way. Talking someone into being interested in such things is difficult, changing someones feelings with words can be hard, especially when it demands bringing up uncomfortable issues. People construct carefully laid out language blocks to keep their minds away from exploring beyond the ego, exploring the true cause of their pain or ignorance, some even believe that the English language was created to pin consciousness down to a more manageable level or even enslave people's minds.

Paradox's and contradictions are everywhere, as soon as you say what something is, you say it is not other things. I feel the uselessness of everything most of all nihilism. I'm not sure why I feel compelled to write, its not like anyone really cares to read, or even still put action into their lives. I don't mean my words or the words of other useless people, but if someone put their own words into practice, that's all that matters. I guess I need to get on with my life and live it rather than write about it. Socrates said "the unexamined life is not worth living" I quite agree, but if all you do is examine things you never have much of a life to examine either. This writing is kind of an escape for me I guess, it seems to be bubbling up from my subconscious, sent by who knows what. I'm certain that I'm not certain about anything anymore, except one thing, that there are experiences which exist which by human standards are divine, though I'm not sure about the definite form, I don't think there is one..

Chaos, be patient with my Chaos, you will find order in there if you look hard enough.

Rocks in the Gutter

So she would go, to live in Earth, to destroy our love for the night of truth,
Together as always apart, important imperfections interrupt collaborations of interconnection, Tell me how to get the love flow of reposed conjecture back to realities of mingled reparations of ruthless truth.

Unconsoled recompense of rectifying reason, I knew it wasn't happening, and so it stopped, paid a price for my selflessness by causing an arrogant action sprouted from the concern of my inability to give others what they deserve,

Doing whats in the best interests of others and so causing the pain of not playing to their egos, perhaps sometimes doing more damage then speaking a welcome lie.

At last alone together for all treachery of ungovernable unconcern for each other, total honesty, but still with total love, a collected expression of destroying that which is older than a moment.

With out, an action, an outcropped disaster makes itself my home, together forever in eternity, life is the things you do before you're born to the real world, in the time before you started to think you lived.

Remember the minds excuse for ostracized extravagance at the expense of original ornaments of unformed blemished blossoms, going to a redeeming practical treatise of incredible ease that proves its worth through the expert experience needed to work the ability of not trying too hard.

The romance of revolution, the courtship of truth,

I will take my beloved and be faithful long beyond my youth.

Two ragged sidewalk lovers clutching each other in the night,

On a mission to find adventure, playing outside the light.

Two lonely souls with only pieces of each others hearts to own,

With a sign that says change, it's not the acquisition of wealth they have sown.

Under neon street night lights they watch and wait for the dawn,

Living on a love that lasts long after everything else is gone.

A classy kind of romance where we hot box a gas station bathroom then fuck till we're bleeding, leaving a couple of shits in the sink and gizz graffiti covered walls for the manager to find in the morning.

We'll scream with a pleasure on street corners that makes the whores feel unsated,

A weirdness consumes us to surprise all manner of normy and diffuse their arrogant posture from their assumed semblance of sanity.

A star shattering ferocity for the perfection of gallivanting our way to the emancipation of all people.

Drawing things everywhere, skipping on sidewalks and dancing in traffic, hitching wherever with a sign that says adventure , biting each others legs and pan handling as feral beasts,

Waking up to a gourmet garbage breakfast we will enter the nights crooked side streets with a smile and a dream of growing young together.

Delving the mystery with a fierce courage unbound to depths of unlimited glory unknown, unspoken but felt overwhelming to the majesty of our souls desire.

The perfection of art and freedom, Anarchy and bliss, together hand in hand and genital in genital, eyes piercing eyes and finger in each others noses, we will live for all that moves us, all that is true, and all that we can do, till the sun sets upon our love and our bodies fill one grave.

How can one explain using words how limited language is when it comes to the limitless? How else would you expect linguistic truth in its truest form to come other than paradoxically? Sometimes people are so distracted by words that they miss the message entirely, when it comes to speaking of the divine it is always circumlocution and indirect analogies. A word is like a sword and it is thrust inside the consciousness, with letter symbols at the point reaching out spreading as broad as the meaning, it is as long as its metaphorical depth, with most people only acknowledging the part of the sword which has been forced in, they lose all sight of the driving force behind it. This tendency to ignore possible meanings can happen even more often in terms of different combinations of words which may cause fear, but with any word or set of words you can look so much broader and deeper than most people do. Looking deeply enough into a word you can see absolutely everything is connected in every possible way to create the total human world view, all of ego consciousness is dependent on words and so it shapes everything most people view about the world and how they go about interacting with it. If everything exists within a universal mind, then it is through language that physical reality, the ego of the divine takes its form, and it is through mastery of language that we can learn the magick to make this reality what we want, or transcend it all together.

If we each create our own reality, then each persons reality and so all beliefs are in a sense relatively true, this idea coupled with the idea that everything is interconnected and essentially fractal or holographic means that theoretically, from whatever religion or collection of myths we want to examine, all truth can be found within it, if we know how to look and care enough to dig deep or put things in the proper context. It is always increasingly apparent to me as I grow in awareness, the myths created when new religions are formed are made just to mask, or really to symbolize the true mystical meaning behind them for all the people with superficial disconnected viewpoints. Some people want simple materialist lives without having to get to know their mystical awareness, these are the people who are locked into and imprisoned by the purely literal interpretations of the metaphors in their religion. This may seem elitist, but is understood when you realize these ignorant people tend to kill or at least be intolerant of what they presume to be heresy and directly against their own myths, whether it is atheism or Christianity. Some people are attracted to faiths with simple answers and that is their right, but there are demonstrable disadvantages to being shallow. In some cases the priests obviously sought to control the masses, but the truth is, even with priests who have good intentions, personal subjective interpretation of the symbols is crucial to creating understanding relative to that persons individual reality. Much of the truth cannot be explained, it can only be found through the personal effort of each student of the mysteries, each person's needs are their own and so each individual must learn to grow in their own way independently and so this mystical approach is the only way to accept the equality of our inherent subjectivity.

One can imagine that because the experience of ecstasy is so beyond words for a Shaman, the only way that comes close to communicating the experience and the revelations, especially with people who have never had such an experience, is through the creation of heavily layered allegorical myths. Even if they literally have visions of entities, all reality is allegorical and mystical visions especially are truly beyond words and simple logical explanations, this is true of a prophet or a person on entheogens, or even a group of people who discover a new mystical practice. Really there is no choice but to cloak divine revelations in symbolism, if it is a true spiritual experience it provides information in a variety of forms, most of it being beyond words.

This probably would be elitist if it were not for the fact that anyone with the proper dedication, sincere intentions and research can have a mystical experience, especially through entheogens and so personal choice is the only reason not to have a mystical experience. Due to the world we live in however, most people are not motivated by such things, or do not believe in such things, since all they hear about is metaphors which they do not know how to interpret, or are taught by those who have hijacked the metaphors teaching that they are not worthy of divine experiences. It takes courage and a willingness to face the darkest places in your mind and although anyone can do it, little to no one ever even tries. Taking metaphors at face value is much easier than becoming enlightened, the ones who are worthy of enlightenment, are the ones who care enough to put in the honest effort to truly know thyself, it is not a values based judgement but a practical one.

With all statements in language there will be a certain level of ambiguity, with people inevitably coming at it from different contexts, if enough people come across the statement then misunderstandings are also inevitable. As words are attempts to encapsulate meaning, or the expression of a perception of an experience or awareness, there is always a transcendent aspect to all language that is outside the ability of the words to convey. The words always refer to something else but are not that thing itself, the whole of the experience can never be put into words and if we try then we confuse it with reference and comparison.

You might say “ $1+1$ always = 2 and this is objective truth,” but these numbers are themselves abstractions which have very imprecise definitions based on human minds, definitions which are themselves explained with limited human language. As hypothetical abstractions it may be correct in a tautological Platonic ideal kind of way, but it is like saying $X=X$ and $X+X=Z$ and since I define these variables and there is no material example, even though I can't define them, if you disagree with me you are wrong. When applied to the physical world, quantum physics shows one separate object is not so easy to define, as we cannot really define the location of the border of where the atoms of the object stop and the atoms of other objects or the air surrounding it begin. (when we consider various things going through objects like X rays etc, it is even harder to isolate and define one single object.) If we cannot define where an object is and where it ends we cannot define the object and if we cannot define that we have no “1” to add to anything else. In the end we only know what “1” is defined as due to its reference to the concept of multiplicity, or more than 1 and when we experience mystical union with all things, it is clear that while abstractions have their uses, even mathematics is in some ways subjective. This whole question then is again shown to be built on the premise of “I am” in that self=1 Not self=1 and when we add them together we get “2” but this distinction, is as I hope this book will show you is ultimately an illusion, even if that is an idea which is always dependent on your interpretation.

This is made even more complicated when it comes to logic, which is the attempt to have a concrete and definite truth attached to these perceptions which is understandable to everyone, however in an endless reality there is always more variables to any statement that can be made and so logic can be used to prove or disprove anything. At the very least if your imagination or knowledge of the subject is big enough, the debate could go on forever, eventually all debates can be put in terms of the oldest philosophical questions which remain unsolved and which will continue to remain unsolved because human language is not capable of expressing the answers. With the inherent limitations of logic and language it is clear that just because you can brow beat someone into submission, it does not mean you are “right.” The only true knowledge is gnosis, the direct experience of the highest transcendental perception possible, and that is forever beyond words, everything else but this gnosis is just abstraction, and ultimately for those without gnosis, it is just a distraction.

Its amazing to me how I can think I am the originator and sole creator of an idea but find that many other like minded people have thought of the same things. This is partly because the divine is the creator and we are all the mouth pieces, though sometimes we have trouble communicating with our higher self because we send so many mixed messages, who can claim to be the originator of an idea when we are all one being? Someone can ask what is the meaning of life? And as I discovered on LSD, the answer is to ask meaningless questions. All philosophers are professional bums. There are some things better left unsaid, such as love or “god,” all thoughts and words are redundant and can only retract from their meanings. My bible is a blank book with not one word because no one can tell you who or what the divine is except yourself and it wont use words either. In trying not to be judgemental I've judged my need to judge as bad. There only is what there is neither, good or bad or any other label we can attach. We seem to have a natural tendency to label things in an attempt to understand things, these labels hold more meaning to most people, then the actual thing that is labelled. As if by magick, these symbols could ever hope to contain all possible manifestations of the idea they attempt to represent, magick is powerful but when done unconsciously it can imprison us in attachment to our desire. I will myself label this need to label things gerspemkindiggel and as absurd as it sounds, it is a disease of human thought.

“God” doesn’t noticeably exist in the hearts of atheists and that to them is as real as anything can be, anything can be real and I guess that’s why everything can seem so unreal. With the power to create anything, what is “real” is really pretty arbitrary, it can be real one moment, then gone the next, or even replaced by a totally contrary reality and so what is “real” is really a term of temporary convenience for any divine being. What we define as “real” has as many different meanings as there are different people, no one can give a definition which can contain it all and each person has at least some individual perspective, even if they cannot really put it into words or see how it is different from others. Science and organized religion would be most comical in their attempts at defining “real” if they didn’t result in so much pain and destruction and really this is probably the main driving force behind history.

To define something as indefinable opens the doorway to all kinds of alternative thinking which provides all kinds of insights. Strange feelings lead to strange and previously unimaginable thoughts, this is not only how entheogens work, but also life. Through experiences we have feelings which lead to thoughts which lead to new experiences. We humans gravitate into cycles of experience and interpretation where we feel more comfortable, this as well as gerspemkindiggel makes things appear more real, so through the comfort of our labelled paradigms we make a cozy little box and try to keep anything we think is contradictory outside of it. Its ironic that in attempting to find whats “real” these things only mask what is truly real.. Pure creation.. Pure love.. It sounds cliché, that is judging things, putting them under the convenient labels which we use so often that we add the label of cliché to them, to judge them to make us feel smart and superior, that ego fulfilment of knowing how to sort everything and protect the ego and at the same time boost it up. Once you decided a memetic category can be dismissed, any time new contrary information is brought up you can just pigeon hole a person, stick that label on them and banish them, oh that person is just a punk, just a Christian, just a scientist, just a nigger and I don't need to listen because I have thoroughly debunked that kind of person. Prioritizing, not wasting your time on irrelevant things is something that is bound to come up, but the parameters you put on trivializing information and people determine your limitations as a human and the types of bias you will be prone to. Recognizing this process of labelling and really exploring it is a sign post on the path to enlightenment, or insanity wherever I happen to be headed, but if you keep reading I will take you there and we can label it anything we want.

We are all already enlightened and omnipotent we’ve just trapped ourselves within the judgement that we’re not, the safe and convenient imposition of specificity on the boundless. Eternity is an awfully long time, beyond time itself in fact. To admit that there are limits to things is to admit there are things outside these boundaries, even if its only nothingness and so there is always something to compare beyond what we understand to exist. Through the universe of all that exists, these seemingly separated and limited things are found to be part of one thing encompassing all that exists or can exist, so it is these boundaries are all illusionary and there is only a seamless oneness to everything. It is so obvious to me now, I wonder how I ever could of possibly missed it. In this superficial world of labelled values, philosophy has little value, but for those with the right intentions it can be used to sort out the mess somewhat. Is it not then in the deepest sense that these superficialities of modern society apparently have their deepest value in not being thoroughly analyzed at all, which is why I suppose they have more or less lost value to me, but then maybe their true value lies in the process of exposing them as illusions. Why should I bother to write things down when we all know these things already? Since we all already know them they seem meaningless and so we stop paying attention, and in that wilful ignorance they take hold of people, the obvious goes without saying, and in that quietude it works on us unnoticed. I am a master of the obvious, my powers of deduction are human and limited only by human thoughts, we are all lost in abstractions, especially the abstractions that abstracting is helpful and that we are powerless.

People can't seem to find anything they deem worthy of caring about except their own sense of self pity, they just dress it up symbolically in all their worldly desires, all their ambitions to delude themselves in a fake society of hierarchical values. I'd be a liar if I said I've never done this myself. Truth is everywhere as is beauty, especially truth that is apparently ugly. Everyone is what they are and if they lie about who they are, they are being truthful in that they are being their true self, which is a liar or a fake. This world is full of people who find it more fulfilling to pretend to be something they're not, rather than working to be someone they are happy being real as. What is my definition of good? The closest I would attempt to say is that which is truthful, though the truth is often disturbing it is because we realize we are living in a world of lies.. fragmentation.... labels... all thoughts are ramblings, no matter how coherent and ramblings are just coherence that is not recognized. Surely there is something better than conforming to manufactured memes and convenient social tactics. What is to be my role on this Earth? Someone who tries to get people to stop playing roles? Can we ever stop playing roles and still be human? I find this eternal drama pretty ridiculous, especially when I consider how dramatic I am most of the time. I am an extremist in every sense, even when I'm being mundane I'm mundane to the extreme! Our observations and definitions do nothing but limit us, even in my observation about that idea. We are progressing to nowhere, but hold on awhile I am going somewhere with this nonsense.

Perfection must be realized not acquired, everything is an analogy for itself, all things contain all knowledge for everything else, the miracle is that we don't see it. With omniscience we'd be unable to function within this world and so we limit ourselves, to prevent ourselves from being drooling masses paralysed by epiphany. But we've forgotten our omniscience is accessible which leads to all kinds of fear and mistakes based in ignorance, especially ignorance about the reality that we can stop being ignorant. Eternal happiness is gained only when we realize there is no such thing, but neither is there eternal pain, for it is through juxtaposition that we define reality. Like the vesica pisces, the yin and yang, anti matter and matter the great balance is what produces perception and the illusion of change. Twin polarities make up the pillars of knowledge of the one thing, contrast is the means of communication, but when done to find union, learning widely with a mutable mind, what charm comes with that is the play thing of the eternal child and while it is not duplicitous to say all words are half truths because logic is consistently inconsistent, it is true that restlessness can come with clever versatility and so a joy of tricks. We'll find it when we stop looking, which is why its so intrinsically frustrating and satisfying. Something of true value to us is something we can't have. We are all children of the divine and so we act childishly.

I'm twenty now but I feel older than everyone I know. I think a truly mature person knows its good to be a child at heart. I feel awkward around people because I know I think so differently and have such different values, I need to try and live more in the moment. I don't know why its so hard for me to do that, especially considering its impossible to do otherwise, especially if you realize the illusion of time, I guess I am just getting bored with sarcasm and teenage witticisms.. not! We are not our thoughts, we are the entity who thinks them, at least I think so. Our thoughts become our reality and we are left in between them trying to ensure that we have the "right" thoughts. I think about where thoughts come from, where does our ability to feel and perceive originate, it has neither a time nor a place. All real truth would be so ambiguous as to be unseen, as it is everywhere, it is lost in the white noise of the great white light that contains all shades. Just where we least expected to find it, within ourselves.

If a new mystical spiritual movement creates some myth to explain allegorically their true revelations, it may still be considered heretical, but without the keys of practice and mystical context, at least it isn't empowering to the average person, or as perception shaking an idea as the one that says we are all divine. In this way, people can learn from the myths what they are willing and able to perceive from it, the problem comes when some people want to think they have the right to impose the literal meaning or their personal interpretation on anyone who disagrees. Its not as satisfying to some egos to think that everyone is right in their own way and that no one is more enlightened then anyone else, people want to be sure their interpretations are correct and so they look for authorities to tell them what they want to hear, and so they miss the point entirely and never really explore what they as an individual believe. “You mean I wont be the only enlightened soul on the Earth? But that means I am no better then people I want to hate!” Well you will be the only enlightened person if you know everything is one, but having extensions of yourself suck up to you is not as fun. Myths play a vital role in communicating and explaining the mystical experience, but the desire to force a literal interpretation, or that one interpretation is more true than others, is a poison of the mind and of society which can only be cured by the experience of the transcendent, the ecstasy of the Shaman which will show just how true other myths are and what their unifying meaning really is.

As the ultimate form of the divine is formless or at least by definition beyond all definition and comprehension, then anyone who claims to speak for the divine or have the words of the divine has shown themselves to be completely full of shit. Knowledge of the divine will be beyond the abilities of human articulation, the closest approximation perhaps being glossolalia, which is definitely not unique to Christians “speaking in tongues.” All too often spiritual seekers want to be told some kind of universal truth that will make their lives happy forever, they want contentment without having to change deep down and take personal responsibility and they believe they will then know (after hearing these magick words) that they are right and everyone else is wrong, or at least confused. So they go on their merry way and all they have to do is keep listening to their gurus or just keep reading the book which is the infallible words of “god,” but they don't want to live the truth, they want to be told the truth and in this lack of personal responsibility they give up their ability for a genuine spiritual life in favour of a second hand one.

Even if there is a truly infallible, literal holy book in which to believe in, if it explained everything, who is to say we would be capable of understanding it? The book may be infallible but humans are not and so any explanation, any awareness by humans of it, is not free from the possibility of being flawed. So it is you cannot rely on humans to tell you what to believe about such a book, nor could you really trust yourself, but what you can do is work on your awareness in general so that you might have a better potential of understanding it. Without that understanding you are not really in any position to determine if someone else is actually capable of understanding the book and so should practice humility. Any genuine spiritual life is personal to you in that, you as an individual have forged that spirituality, so there is always a subjective independent aspect, and while learning from others can be rewarding, there is no substitute for learning how to tell what you really believe, not what others believe.

Even if the truth could be spoken it would be up to you to figure out what it means, at least what it means to you and how to apply it to your life. Even if you read explanations on that gospel truth, or how to apply it, you would as an individual have to interpret those explanations. No matter how many explanations of explanations from supposed authorities you learn, you always have to interpret it for it to actually mean anything to you, or to be able to apply it to your life in a given situation, otherwise you are just memorizing what you think are facts. Once you realize this, it becomes clear the more you can learn to interpret the truth for yourself, the more you can build up your cognitive ability, that finding authoritative truth is useless until you can make yourself capable of understanding or recognizing it. This understanding will only occur by cultivating your own hermeneutic abilities about reality. Eventually you will realize you never really needed anyone to tell you the truth, you were always capable of figuring it out for yourself anyways, you were just being lazy and wanted someone to explain everything to you without you having to grow as an individual. Ironically the truth is the more you make others responsible for your understanding of the truth, the less you become capable of understanding the truth.

This is all even more clear if you are a spiritual person because it is absurd to think that you would be put in circumstances by the divine, in which you were not given the potential to figure things out. That a person would be plunged in to a world where despite all their efforts to cultivate a mind and soul capable of understanding, one which searches indiscriminately for wisdom in the world that they would not find at least some form of truth available within themselves. Learning from others is often imperative, but depending on others for truth destroys your ability to truly learn. So it is finding the truth is an act of will and intention and when a person truly and purely acts on it, when they take responsibility by ruthlessly shedding themselves of convenient lies like a snake sheds its skin in order to grow, the truth will manifest in an appropriate and understandable form. If you set your intention to learn the truth and you work to go wherever that leads you without bias, then you will find the truth, but if you set your intention to learn about a specific religion then you will only manifest learning what humans think about that religion. The intention for truth is ultimately destroyed when a person depends on others to provide the truth for them, instead manifesting whatever they can understand from what the authority thinks is best, but the “authority” if they present themselves as such shows they do not understand the truth either and so will only aid in the cultivation of further confusion, the further dissemination of bias elaborations on human explanations.

Religious people often look down on those who are spiritual or atheist, often seeing them as arrogant, full of hubris, or consumed by their vanity, but in truth it is vanity and hubris to think you or any religious group is capable of discerning which is the the true religion, or to even think there is one true religion. It is vanity to think you are incapable of being fooled by priests and the written word, that you have all the information needed to determine ultimate dogmatic truth, it is hubris that you can tell your religion is better than others, especially when you probably know very little of other people's views. This vanity is the result of thinking that you are capable of telling who are authorities on “god,” that others can be trusted and should be encouraged to glorify and improve your awareness with their idea of truth, or what is even more vain, that you are an authority on “god” because you know about a religion, and it is this vanity which leads to enslavement of all religious people.

The limitations of language are much more constricting then we might realize, we may use it in all our thoughts and each thing we say but are we really saying anything? The more I have thought about this the more I realize the answer is no. Adjectives are qualities of nouns, they are always relative in that each adjective exists as one side of a duality, because of this all nouns exist somewhere on a spectrum of adjectives which have no exact end or beginning and no exact middle either, its always some relative attribute which can never be fully specific. Is something Red or black? Well colour has an endlessly definable spectrum of shades so there is no clear division from one colour to the next, only approximations. Is something male or female? When attributing gender to inorganic things this is highly subjective, but even with humans due to the fact that we all have male and female parts as embryos, not to mention male and female aspects to our minds and bodies. (the clitoris is an unformed penis) So over all this isn't something that is clearly definable either, especially if you take trans gendered folks into account, or the idea that we are not our bodies but spirits.

Are things being or non being? For “the All” that is infinite reality to exist, all possible things must have being, and all things are possible, likewise that which cancels out each thing must exist as well, this is matter and anti-matter in a sense, but goes beyond this. No doubt “being” is a very interesting word and can be used in different ways, but when we realize we can't truly define the word “real” we realize we cannot really define “being” either. If a word has no definition then it has no real meaning and it can be said that it does not match the definition of “word,” so what is definition? Definition is a noun, but it is dependent on something being, but how can something be? Being can exist in consciousness, the imagination, or the astral, or as delusion, (and any number of other ways) and so we come to the conclusion that there is no definite definition for being. This is made even more bewildering with the idea that everything possible must exist within an infinite reality, so being does not even have the usual definition by contrast in terms of what actually exists in reality. Contemplation on the definition of being, and beingness can bring about many realizations, but I think (as many mystical traditions) the end result is that it is part of a spectrum with non being, but this non being is something that cannot be spoken of or conceptualized in any way.

Nouns themselves are all perhaps an illusionary idea, due to the quantum nature of reality, physical objects, persons, places or things do not exist within reality but are in fact collapsed wave functions, or vibrating strings in some string theory, or energy within the theory of relativity. Perhaps strings are the only things in existence (that we know of and so can try to define) but nobody really understands strings and even if they did, they would probably be dependent on adjectives or other nouns that are relative and indefinite in order to explain them. What is energy even? If $e=mc^2$ then it is essentially everything physical and more, it is the ability to do work, and since it cannot be destroyed it is always changing, it is the prima materia of Chaos, it is that which cannot maintain permanency in any form. "Work" itself is a vague term which takes a universe of different forms and so energy is then without limitations and so beyond any really specific definition. From the Quantum view, there are no "tables" or chairs" but energy "tabling" or "chairing" all of existence becomes a verb, becomes an act of being, something undefinable, except in a relative way to other things which are temporarily perceptible to our consciousness. Certainly the definition of a chair would seem inadequate to someone who is blind and without the ability to feel things on their body. All nouns are then labels we put on sensory inputs which we collectively agree upon, a bowl can be turned upside down and used as a chair, or the floor can easily be turned into a bed, what we name things is dependent on our relative context for their use, the verb we are acting out, and the main verb is once again being. For the parts of us that are not being in the physical, all physical things are non existent, all that is, is the being itself and it is only aware of itself through other things, the words and abstractions of "I am" that take form through the senses and thoughts.

Hopefully my linguistic capabilities are up to explaining this as clearly as possible, though explaining the inadequacy of words is clearly not possible, through reference and comparison people still manage to get some idea of each others tacit awareness. Even verbs become pretty well impossible to truly define when we realize that there are multiple ways of doing things, standing may seem like standing, but it is it standing on one leg, standing on the head, standing with a finger in your nose? Slouching? Standing as a being? Standing with legs bent or strait? There are different kinds of chairs and so different kinds of chairing, there is different kinds of flying or swimming, which does not mean that things do not sometimes smack into the ground or drown and so the quality of our ability to perform the verb can even change what verb we are actually doing. Verbs are even harder to take seriously when we remember that there are no nouns, there is no one and no thing which does anything but be energy, something which is beyond the scope of language to describe. Pronouns in this way do not exist either, they also do not exist if we understand the unity of the universe, I am me and you are you, but we aren't two, all people are unified within the realm of reality that encompasses all things and so the point of division is at its core level undefinable.

Most words have more than one meaning as well, they are officially defined using other relative words with multiple meanings, however it seems to me we define words more often by what they are not, than by what they are. Using words that are defined by what they are not, to define other words leads us to chase our tails in an endless circle, which is made even more ambiguous when we start to string these words together in sentences, which further adds to the subjective need to interpret by context. So with such things as nouns, verbs, adjectives and pronouns being by their own definition relative and ultimately not "truly" existing in any specific way, we can see that it is ultimately impossible to make logical statements about anything, especially about the meaning of words!

Through context and comparison we get by and understand each other, we intuit what the other person means and try to use reason and memory to come to a conclusion about what the hell is trying to be conveyed to us. This intuition is the link from the word to the context which is made up of an undefinable mish mash of concepts and "things" (whatever "things" means) which allows us to articulate some vague feeling of ours that precedes thought. Through the use of our memory to determine what a word means and what the context was, (it is technically always changing due to time existing as energy, which cannot remain static but only appear so) we go through a state of anamnesis which uses intuition as a vehicle to select symbols which the conscious mind can recollect as having a predetermined meaning. This predetermination is necessarily endlessly varied when viewed from a holistic perspective that makes it plain to see, all words are interdependent on each other, especially when we talk about divine or human things. This interdependence is like a net around pure meaning, which is synonymous with pure being and the totality of all possibilities and all meanings.

When people speak (or at any time really) they do not usually think of the definition of each word as they think it, they think of what they associate with that word given the context, this selection of words is due to anamnesis and so in this way all statements are us remembering the affirmation of some slight (infinitesimal) and vague and seemingly separate distorted perspective of that which is pure meaning. To use language in the normal sense is a kind of true schizophrenia (split mind) in that we are almost obsessively ripping things apart, as if we are some maniac who wants to split or rip things open in order to find out where they are unified, but the unity of a thing is found irrevocably by keeping things together instead of splitting "it" and so to truly define something we must avoid using words. This something which is beyond definition is so because it is beyond remembering in the sense of anamnesis, at least in its entirety, though it is not beyond experiencing in the one present moment of eternity. (time is a word and so has no definition by my definition of the word definition) If a word cannot be remembered then we are in a state of tacit awareness, the feeling of a word being on the tip of the tongue, if we do remember it linguistically then it is not in its totality, but the fragmented distortion which the conscious mind uses to grab hold of concepts. This feeling of tacit awareness is the doorway to another kind of awareness, one which is beyond words, but is still full of meaning and awareness, it can be accessed through entheogens, or by various forms of meditation, but it potentially allows us to experience the unity of all things without the dissection of the ego. Think about that, the next time you have a thought.

The intellect is that which abstracts, or to put it another way it extracts the essential nature of a thing to form a concept, logic is the relation of different abstractions to each other to come to a conclusion free from contradiction. Memory holds the abstractions of the intellect which are then brought up and compared to various imagined possible explanations and through the intellect the essence of each imagined possibility is examined to determine its essence, then through logic it is compared to the original abstractions and when the essence is found to be the same in both, then a conclusion has been reached that the imagined abstraction is true in relation to original premise. Since imagination plays a key role in creating possible explanations and imagination is itself an irrational part of consciousness, then to attempt to be purely rational would only lead to the ability to examine facts, but never really draw any new conclusions. Logic is not really the faculty of mind which creates explanations, it is the faculty which removes contradiction from the explanations as much as possible and from there it can be put in to a persons paradigm.

As Einstein said "imagination is more important then knowledge." That is with a strong enough imagination you can find the answer to any problem with little to no knowledge, without imagination no amount of traditional knowledge (which is always remembered anyway through anamnesis) would allow you to deduce or create anything, there could only be observation. Without imagination, knowledge would lose its meaning as it exists simply to give some basic reference through memory as to the desirable direction in which to take the imagination. As far as I am concerned we all reside within a group imagination, the dream time, it is from the imagination that all language was created and it is to the imagination that all language is directed. Without mastery and proper recognition of imagination we get a world like we currently live in, where the pursuit of knowledge has taken us away from the direct experience of the universe, especially the divine and most natural aspects of it. This direct experience is the gnosis which is true knowledge, not of an intellectual nature but the experience of the formless divine imagination itself, the underlying context from which all language is united and understood, and so it is the knowledge of which no words can ever fully do justice.

That which is chosen to be imagined as a possible logical answer to a question or train of thought is in my experience determined through the intuition searching the imagination. Since the imagination is beyond conceivable limit it is beyond total abstraction of the intellect and in a sense it contains all that we are capable of ever imagining simultaneously, it is like wet cement in that it is a substance that can take any shape according to whichever container or mold (types or forms of essence) it is put into. The intellect determines the nature and essence of a thing, it does not create things which is the function of imagination or creativity, imagination is itself beyond the intellects conception and so it must be through intuition that we determine the most likely possibilities from what we can imagine, the kinds of forms we are looking for. The intuition determines, or we could say creates the mold, and the imagination as a kind of substance hardens to form a possibility, this possibility is then inspected by the intellect like an art critic determining the aesthetics of a sculpture, in this judgement the intellect recognizes the abstraction or determines what kind of concept the sculpture actually is specifically. Since interpretation of words cannot help but be in part subjective, it is in that sense judging it according to aesthetics, personal taste as to what it represents. Logic or rationality would then be judging the sculpture according to a predetermined criteria which is held in the memory, comparing the sculpture or imagined possibility to the original information, or another similar sculpture which has previously been accepted as true, or aesthetic, in order to determine if the essence or aesthetics match. (the comparison creating a ratio, for the purposes of ratio-nality)

With deductive reasoning, all the information for a conclusion is present in the premise, but the conclusion itself, linguistically at least takes on a new form, it uses the exact forms, or even material from older sculptures or abstractions, to make a new combination of the accepted information and so creativity is still necessary. With inductive reasoning the conclusion is not created from the same materials as the original premise and so is even more of a creation of the imagination, it is the creation of an entirely new premise which is an educated guess judging from known information. No matter how we try we cannot get away from the fact that all abstractions are a product of creativity and creativity or imagination is irrational, and so to try and ignore this in an attempt to be objective is in fact highly irrational and a subjective bias of those who want to single out one aspect of the process and put it above all the others. Rationalists would like to think they are more objective than merely judging aesthetics, but this is because they lack the imagination to think non literally about their logical statements and so do not recognize the subjectivity of words, nouns, verbs, etc as I explained earlier and so even small nuances in the words can change the aesthetics which a discerning eye will notice in the process of logic.

Once the congruence of the essence or “aesthetics” of two or more sculptures is determined and accepted as true, this then creates the emotional response which is often blamed for being the “irrational” mind which makes people do stupid things. This emotional response is then ironically and irrationally used to justify the assertion that all irrational faculties such as intuition and imagination are never reliable. This emotional response is actually the result of rationality and as some people have a talent for going into denial about things that are emotionally disturbing, it is potentially a problem. However this denial is because they can intuitively see where a line of thinking is going, and so they stop pursuing it when they start to feel uncomfortable, which is what happens when any thoughts go against their memetic paradigm. People will avoid many questions if they feel insecure about their own beliefs, yet have an emotional attachment to them and so will do all kinds of irrational things, call it a matter of faith, or use any number of logical fallacies to justify their attachments, but just because this can happen does not mean the irrational aspects of consciousness have no place in cognition. The real cause of most of peoples erroneous beliefs is more a lack of reliable information, or they simply lack good aesthetic judgement, that is most people have not been taught how to be conscious of logical fallacies and have in fact been indoctrinated in to using them. Combined with a lack of awareness and an innate distrust of the intuitive and imaginative faculties you get irrational ideologue behaviour and a great deal of ignorance because each step of the process needed to come to a true conclusion is defunct in most people, largely thanks to an education system and media geared towards mind control.

There is no doubt that people who have little emotional awareness or strength can twist logic to suit their needs, but to blame all irrational aspects of consciousness is itself an emotional reaction of people trying to be purely rational because they themselves often lack imagination and can't deal with their own irrational sides, therefore their pride makes them think no one can. A person cannot shut out their emotions totally and to do so would in fact be irrational, an idea based on the fear that they cannot function with them and so the highest forms of rationalism are not found by denying the emotions, but by learning how to utilize them and be comfortable with them in any situation. The intuition that precedes logic quite possibly gets some of its criteria for its searches according to previous emotional states which leads to a kind of treadmill or feedback loop of awareness. Intuition searches the imagination, leading to the intellect, leading to logic, leading to an emotional response which leads back to the intuition, accuracy then is dependent on emotional awareness of ulterior motives, but also mastery of intuition and a big imagination. Being unconscious of any of the steps will lead to problems, in fact if a false belief can be put in to the foundations of a paradigm, then as that line of reasoning develops, they will be exponentially misled as the cycle of awareness develops in them. Even if it were some how more functional to be purely rational, the fact remains it is impossible for a human to function in such a way, emotions and intuition are intrinsic parts of healthy human consciousness, maximizing cognition then is not a matter of eliminating irrational aspects of consciousness, but facing them, mastering them and integrating them as they were evolved to function.

Logic and linguistic skills while very important in determining the validity of possibilities and communicating with others are made impotent without the other faculties, especially when you are not in dialogue with others. This process of cognition happens so fast that we do not realize it, especially since the intuitive and imaginative steps of the process do not involve words or thoughts, but it is happening all the same if you pay close attention. Inspiration, artistic or rational is based on the intuition searching the imagination and without inspiration we lose our ability to create anything new at all. The imaginative and intuitive aspects of this process are made much more obvious after ingesting entheogens, and due to their potential to increase imagination and intuition, with people who can articulate their awareness, entheogens can aid in a person coming to realizations that would normally be unavailable to them.

To put it in a more spiritual way we could also say intuition is the faculty of mind which searches the entire subconscious and all of memory to find similar essences which are not necessarily based on previous knowledge in the consciousness, but is known by the collective unconscious from which all things are formed. Intuition would be the ability to relate or "remember" through anamnesis different essences without the use of abstractions or language, (which would be intellectual memory) the ability to select molds to put cement in. So before the ego is aware of it, (since the ego is abstractions you identify with) the recognition is in a more ambiguous form like selecting which mix of wet cement to use, which is taken from the ocean of imagination that is the collective unconscious, or the reservoir of liquid cement which contains all essences of all abstractions. In this way it is not by logic and intellect alone that we acquire information, but through intuition and imagination which comes up with the possibilities. From these possibilities the conclusion is selected at the last stages of cognition by the intellects definitions of the possibilities, which are then evaluated through comparison by the logical faculties. If this sounds confusing it is because I am trying to rationalize the process from which intellectual discernment stems, trying to articulate articulation necessarily takes some redundancy and extrapolation. That which supersedes rationality and which rationality requires to function is key to understanding rationality and so such an explanation is essentially forever outside the normal forms of logic and so requires metaphor and poetic license, but most important each individual must try to become aware of their own mind through their own practice beyond the realm of rational arguments. Art therefore is a higher function of mind as it is something which is only discerned by the intuition and imagination, but is essentially the kind of essence that is beyond the abilities of the intellect to abstract in totality.

Logic is simply intuition incorporating known information in a more overtly conscious way in order to cognitively discern truth, it is the explanation we give ourselves and others for our ineffable intuitive processes, we just attempt to make it fit together with other things we know. It is constructed linearly in terms of cause and effect and then set up as reference to other points of logic, which then try to give further structure to the formless intuition with the intention of providing a more reliable means of establishing the validity of that intuition, as well as making that intuition make sense to others in terms of language. Pure intuition instead primarily uses unconsciously known information as it's means of cognition, in a way that is non linear and largely unspeakable and so unexplainable and unverifiable, at least until the event happens. Perhaps this sounds like fluffy bunny New Age crap, and surely some people get an ego boost putting down pure rationality, but some of the most important scientific discoveries were achieved intuitively. Einstein knew this when he said "The only real valuable thing is intuition" and he also pointed out the sickness of our futile attempts at pure rationality when he said, "the intuitive mind is a sacred gift and the rational mind is a faithful servant. We have created a society that honours the servant and has forgotten the gift." These quotes are well known, but they have more or less been totally ignored by society, especially the education system, and this is because the authorities want people to believe that intuition and rationality can never be reconciled, because in this mental schism we are made dependent on them, rather than taking responsibility for our own awareness. (Which is why Einstein didn't do so well at school) There is no duality between logic and intuition but rather a spectrum, as with all dualities, the dualist distinction is really just the logical faculties attempts to single out definitions through juxtaposition and interdependent reference, but if we can get in touch with deeper levels of intuition we can see past these limitations and know all things through anamnesis.

To explain all this in yet another limited rational way, logic could be said to be defined intuition or feeling that is referential to other points of information, with the intention of defining or isolating truth from the holistic perception or feeling. These logical definitions, which rely on language are potentially endlessly definable and yet will remain a finite statement held by its intention to be definite and specific. It is always possible to have a clearer definition, or have "higher" definition just like a computer monitor, or high fidelity, that is a definition with more points of reference, or more pixels in order to create a clearer representation of some reality. Logic then is like looking at the world as pixels, segments, but there is never a high enough resolution to get the total picture, although it may appear so, you cannot use logic to square a circle. You cannot make true curves with pixels and so much of our world is curves, in fact all of the natural world has curves, there are no perfect geometric angles and planes and we are too busy trying to draw with pixels to even notice the whole of the image. Intuition is the holistic big picture view, though it can lack the specificity and organized structure of logic, it does provide the means which the total information can be seen, it provides us with the means of drawing the curves and seeing how it all fits together.

This ability to endlessly define the ineffable but always be non inclusive of the total reality is the limit and the actual mechanism of logic. The definition becomes self defeating because it must through language be limited to words which are incapable of encapsulating all that is in existence. For this reason certain debates among people limited to the intellect can go on forever without ever reaching a satisfying or definite and total conclusion and it is this very same inherent limitation and self negation of logic which provides it with it's whole means of achieving its intended purpose, to define the whole of the truth.

To most people the idea of intuition having any predominance over reason seems dangerously backwards, but one only has to look at humans and it its obvious what we have been doing is dangerously backwards. All dichotomies are really one variable, the concept of cause and effect can be more accurately understood when we see that the effect of the last cause, is really the cause of the next effect and so a continuum of events is formed that is fundamentally unified and made seamless through the perception of continuous time. However this process we imagine as separate events is really just an elaboration of the first cause, or the “unmoved mover,” and the real secret is that there is no original cause for eternity since eternity and its spacial equivalent (since relativity theory shows the unity of time and space) in limitless space is by definition beyond time, the first cause is beyond causality, it is noesis, it is intuitive, it is not a cause at all because time is our dissection of it and it is beyond linear dialectics, a singularity which contains the whole and therefore cannot really be spoken of, only experienced.

In the name of reason we have committed untold atrocities, we have become so deluded due to thinking in terms of dualist causality as to try and stop the symptoms of our problems, rather than the cause of the problem itself. The result is the rich locking up the poor for stealing and other crimes, as well as dictatorships and a depleted and poisoned environment and almost all our current problems. Reason and rationality alone, unbalanced without the intuitive big picture and non linguistic awareness or the imagination to come up with more possibilities results in warped and psychopathic tendencies, illustrated perhaps most clearly throughout the history of communist governments, but is definitely a problem around the world .

Instead of finding a way to cure infections or better yet learning how to better prevent infections, we are satisfied with constantly chopping off parts of ourselves, or creating medicine that masks the symptoms and in the same way we use egoism as a means of making ourselves content, when the desire for ego fulfilment is itself a symptom of that discontent. The truth is we all know intuitively what it is we have to do, but we have convinced each other so completely into doing the opposite because in the short term it seems easier. We can be talked into all kinds of things when we have had rhetoric used against us, rhetoric that comes from all the people around us and usually tries to convince us to go against our instincts. As I said emotions can make us go in to denial, but going in to denial of our emotions only make things worse, makes us unconsciously go in to denial of the limitations of logic as it provides the emotional comforts of technology and acceptance within our patriarchal society and so creates the illusion of being objective, when we are really being emotionally immature. It is not strength to repress or go in to denial of emotions and is in fact emotional immaturity, as true strength is facing uncomfortable emotions and not being deluded by them, yet remaining a feeling and caring person. Our society is increasingly losing patience with itself and human discontent with hierarchical civilization will only increase until we either reach a kind of critical mass and everything flips, or the world is destroyed.

I have shown as clearly as I can through language that reason and intuition are not strictly separate concepts, reason has sprung from intuition as it is the cultivated fruit of our imagination, our ability to create. Reason is an attempt to create an all encompassing wall on universal creation but by the very act of setting a limit, it ceases to be universal, however it is expressible. Reason is the scope on which we look at the world and with variable setting, how much we wish to perceive, or the degree to which we dissect information. Intuition is the setting of that scope with no limits, a holistic and undivided knowing which may be vague as it is generally ineffable, but is a perception of the whole rather than its parts. This scope from intuition to logic is the aperture of information flow which links the conscious with the subconscious and our means of directing our awareness to different levels of abstraction and understanding. All things are true including their opposites and all things are already known by all, if, we just learn how to remember them, but under the guise of reason or for some people intuition, at its deepest core, when turned to create a direct experience of the divine is gnosis, awareness knowing itself.

We may be at times mistaken, but until we realize it, if nowhere else in our minds and endless parallel dimensions that “mistake” is reality. This idea is frightening to most, that we should let go of reason in the slightest, but considering all things its not only a reasonable goal, but since pure reason is impossible as humans, it's irrational to think we evolved irrational consciousness without good reason and so it can play a valuable role within cognition when used properly. Oh now you say rationality is the only hope we have of ever becoming civilized, but to you I say humans are not purely rational beings and it is irrational of you to think you could be, or that this is even desirable, it is a bias based in fear, a fear of emotions and a limitation of your intellect and the ego reinforcement you get from it. The pursuit of pure rationalism is the logic that says we would all be happier without emotions, forgetting the obvious that happiness is itself an emotion. I am not even really saying we should be less rational, more that we must be made aware of how to properly use imagination and intuition and how to confront and deal with our emotions so that we can fully use the whole process of cognition and this is not something that is taught in schools, on TV or in literalist Abrahamic traditions. To have any thoughts or perceptions in which things systematically interrelate without contradiction, is to have a kind of reason and so it is quite a trick with our modern minds to ever be purely irrational. (besides in certain psychedelic or meditative states which is perhaps why some have trouble "losing control") Even if you have an irrational fear of irrationality, you can assuage that fear through reason, but you cannot overcome it until you practice and experience some degree of irrationality. Thinking you can be purely rational is a mistake that is often made by people who do think they are beyond petty emotions and totally objective, these are generally people who at their core are emotionally insecure, they do not know how to relate to people emotionally, they do not know how to cope with them and so repress them and of course they find plenty of rational reasons why this is good for them. While they may be relatively cool headed in emotional situations, their lack of emotional understanding often creates premises, or the starting points of their reasoning which are ultimately erroneous because they do not know what truly makes them happy, nor why empathy is important and so they have no basis for their reason to be directed to appropriate goals.

Whether or not you even believe in metaphysics, you should keep in mind that we do not evolve things that are of no benefit, clearly altered states, dreams, the placebo effect, imagination and intuition have been evolved for a reason, they are adaptations with real purposes and applications. If humans actually understand the realities which the Occult speaks of is a question that is open to debate, but that nature would of created these things which are so central to our consciousness as a mistake is laughable. If these forces of consciousness have a purpose, then learning to control them and utilize them is an evolutionary advantage and a means of fulfilling our true potential. Ritual then is the techniques which have been evolved over thousands of years through memes to direct our awareness and these forces so that they can be used for the benefit of humanity and by extension all of nature.

Only by exploring these repressed subjective aspects of consciousness can we ever hope to learn to master them, otherwise we will always fear and be at the mercy of these parts of our self which we do not understand. Scientists may be very smart people, but how many of them do unwise and highly irrational things like work for governments or corporations to destroy the planet and enslave or outright exterminate through weapons designed to wipe out humanity? How many of them cannot think outside of a narrow box? How many of them have good people skills and are capable of building a community? One of the most terrifying illogical statements you hear coming from scientists is that they are not responsible for the technology they create, that although they are working for militaries who plan on using their weapons they are some how free of guilt, because politicians make the decisions, not them. This a clear example of how going in to denial of emotions (guilt) creates irrational behaviour, for example if someone made a bomb for a terrorist group this person could be tried and punished according to law for aiding and abetting the terrorists, if not being one of the key members of the group, yet somehow when governments do it, even when breaking international law it is somehow justifiable. These scientists are so lost in abstraction, so removed from taking responsibility for themselves they do not see the flaws in their own logic. (scientists also often avoid taking their share of responsibility for destroying the environment) Capitalists, politicians and scientists often pride themselves on being realists, on being so rational that they can make the hard choices and get the job done, free of naive notions of sympathy or sentimentality, but it is this patriarchal mindset which is the cause of our problems, but they are so good at rationalizing it to themselves, they believe they are doing good.

Whether or not you classify something or not and assign it value doesn't stop it from being what it is, in fact by it being unsullied by the degradation of limits, its quintessence is more easily understood, as the barrier or wall is not the same as the confined area it attempts to enclose. All the land flows into all the other land no matter how many walls we erect above it, the walls just makes it harder to get around, even if they make us feel safe from "outsiders." This lack of awareness, of what is happening outside our gilded cages is the price of our so called constructs, which supposedly keep us safe, but which are actually the manifestations of our fears. We think they are the solution to our fear, but they are really the cause of it (or at least what maintains them through insistence of perceiving dualist causality) because these walls keep us from seeing beyond them, of ever feeling comfortable in the real world. All there is, is other frightened people hiding behind their own walls, they may give their fears different names, but it's all really based in the same things. To tear down all these concrete walls would leave us in a totally open world, with an ever growing wall of nothing but pure awareness ever expanding into the fathomless cosmos. This is our eventual destiny no matter how many walls we build in the meantime, all memetic structures all artifices are eventually unstable and crumble due to natural forces of entropy.

If you do not ever have any expressions or outlets for your irrational drives they will seep into other areas of life and diverge unconsciously into various expressions that are uncontrolled and often very unhealthy. These irrational urges will take form in ways that will impair and sabotage your ability to think rationally at all, for example if you repress all irrationality you may start to come to the irrational and bias conclusion that you have succeeded in creating a mindset that you are totally rational, and that you are in fact objective. If a person were to eliminate all irrational process's from their mind then they would be incapable of emotions like love or happiness and so the effects which have been defined as pleasurable or good and are supposed to be the goals of rationality are destroyed by the very process purporting to create them. This psychosis can develop into the supposed rationalization of all kinds of bizarre and absurd and often destructive neurosis and misconceptions, which are used to justify what eventually become truly unhealthy urges, supplied by transmuted or direct energies from whatever irrational drives you have enslaved yourself to, through the ignorance or denial of their existence.

Basically any kind of prejudice is based on a lack of emotional awareness, someone believes they have a rational reason for their bias but the truth is they are emotionally incompetent and totally ignorant of the real causes for their delusions. They get a bad feeling when thinking about people they are prejudiced about, then they rationalize that feeling in some hair brained manner which has no logic behind it, but because they never learn to deal with their emotions they find endless proofs to justify those feelings which begin to seem to be totally rational. These people generally grew up in a bias environment that is comfortable or familiar, or maybe they were wronged by some individual and its emotionally convenient to blame all people like them, but clearly the evidence for such bias is incredibly limited.

This kind of thing happens all the time with people who do not know how to deal with and integrate emotions, and it happens in all kinds of areas in life other than sociological prejudice, so long as people ignore those bias feelings their logic can never really be accurate. One example of this is homophobia, in a homophobic culture a person who doesn't know how to deal with and embrace their fear, or their own secret homosexuality will make a seemingly logical belief that it's in their own best interests to hate queer people. If you do not have the courage to be who you are, then its logical to try and pretend to be something else and to try and eliminate anyone who reminds you who you really are, especially if you want to appear as the opposite to other people you want to impress. Some of the other expressions of repressing natural irrational aspects of consciousness is the escapism of modern consumer culture from all that we evolved to find beneficial, (nature) the clinging to science as a new religion that will solve all problems through technology, the obesity epidemic which people seek to cure through temporary diets and on and on. (ascetic religions can create all kinds of similar neurosis) Since we have no emotional intelligence we use faulty logic to try to cure the symptoms without looking at the real causes and I don't think I really need to go in to much detail to show this world is pathologically neurotic.

Really knowing yourself, how you feel and what you want, getting in touch with your individual creativity has little to no value in our patriarchal culture of domination. People who understand their emotions, have empathy and know their true motivations and are comfortable being different, so they are people which impede hierarchical culture and so then those in power will do all they can to create a culture which ignores them. All potential for growth is seen in terms of materialist ambitions and so few people have the ability to deal with their problems or even other people in a sane way. As we can see with the question of a sustainable society or Anarchism in general, even if you make a rational argument for solving the root of a problem, it will be most often be ignored because people do not have the emotional strength or wisdom to actually carry out the change. So instead we look for easier answers that will allow us to continue making the same mistakes and ignore our personal responsibility for our actions and minds.

In order to be objective, as any good scientific rationalist tries to be, we must first come to the understanding that we must take stock of all possible information in regards to what we are trying to hypothesize about. In order to do this we must acknowledge the existence (whether credible or not) of subjective information in whatever fields of research involve humans, and since scientists are humans this ultimately gives all of science at least to some degree a level of agnosticism, as well as irrationality. To ignore the existence of irrational factors in the human world is incredibly irrational, especially if you are seeking truth. This is not to say that most research shouldn't be done in as rational and scientific a manner as possible, but that to be truly scientific we must come to grips with the reality of a situation as a totality, this is after all the supposed purpose of science. What has been ignored is that totality must include human consciousness, if for no other reason then because a human consciousness is always interpreting any information received. This means some of the information is received through irrational and subjective faculties and there is no way to get around it.

To deny this limitation of science is itself, an irrational faith based belief that science is infallible and beyond human error, which is a belief created due to an emotional attachment to the romantic notions of scientific aspirations, the most idealist of all being some kind of technological utopia. Objectively we must be holistic, and in order to be holistic we must realize we have subjective aspects to our minds, to blindly believe otherwise is to delude yourself with ideals of purely mechanical and simplistic view of reality. Objectively, the subjective will always play a role in the mental faculties and all that they create and so no matter how much value attempting to be objective has, (which itself is a subjective distinction) we must incorporate the subjective as a universal constant. Without an understanding of the irrational, science cannot understand humanity or any form of consciousness and so its credibility as an authority to understand anything is called into question, if science will ignore such large portions of the human experience then it surely cannot be fit to understand the totality of the universe. The subjective is indivisible from totality and so although it may not have any existence outside of human consciousness, (and animals) it is consciousness which is the creator and means of science.

Some people, both religious and atheist think that if the universe and humanity can be explained logically and scientifically, this somehow disproves the existence of the divine. To me this is some of the best proof for the divine, that if there was no "god/ess" then chances are much more of the nature of the universe would be totally incomprehensible, chances are we would not be capable of understanding much. I think the divine made it understandable, even if our language is inherently limited in how to express it, the idea that a divine force would create us with intellect and scientific potential and not want us to use it makes no sense at all, whether or not science is limited, its existence does not signify the absence of divine forces . Though science may largely explain the universe, it will never fully explain the divine, the irrational aspects of reality which can only be felt, the fact of the matter is whenever humans are involved there will always be a degree of subjectivity. So long as there is a concept of objectivity, there will be something that needs to be defined in reference to it and so the only way to get total understanding is to try and unite the two perspectives and look at reality as having both aspects .

Showing through science that there is a certain kind of order which nature uses does not mean there is no intelligence behind it, if anything it suggests intelligence in some form, to say that rationality disproves the divine is to ignore the actual origins of rationality itself, which was a primary means of understanding the divine in the classical Greek world. One can read quite clearly the Greeks reasoning that if the universe was created by divine forces, then there might be some order to that creation that we can learn from and hence rationalism was developed to find that order. While I do not exactly agree in the universality of verbalized order, obviously we have learned a few things from seeking it out. I believe everything to some degree can be explained rationally, but as I have pointed out language is severely limited in its ability to express the full degree of consciousness and reality, even everyday things like love and hate or even sense stimulus like colour or smell. More than this an infinite reality would demand infinite explanation, something beyond the ability of humanity to articulate, this does not mean an explanation cannot be found for each aspect of reality, but that it will always be incomplete. Objectively even the most hard headed materialist must admit that in an infinite reality (which science itself says exists) any finite set of facts will create a finite paradigm, which can potentially have a completely different context and interpretation when even just one new fact is learned, ad infinitum when other new facts are learned.

This means that any paradigm we create no matter how factual, is always open to new and completely different perspectives, what's more the discovery of a new fact can show that what we considered in the past to be irrefutable evidence for past facts is actually completely misunderstood. What was once thought to be a mechanism of causality, always has the potential to later be shown as a correlation with the discovery of a new deeper underlying fact which shows an aspect of reality that was previously unknown. Hence much to its credit science updates itself, but bias as to the probability of the facts we have acquired always being interpreted correctly, leads me to much skepticism about our present scientific paradigm. After all scientists thought in the 1800's that they were on the verge of figuring everything out only to find out they were wrong, so why should I believe the scientists of today when they make similar claims?

Logic is the proper ordering of information, free of contradiction in to a symbolic form, usually verbal language, but what premises and theories you come up with are completely determined by the amount and quality of information you begin with. If all the information you are presented with says that Jesus is your lord and saviour, capitalism is great, consumerism is the road to happiness and that we are damn lucky and actually the best people in the world because we live in what has been called a "democracy," then all kinds of insane things can be put in logical language. If the information you have at the start is faulty you can deconstruct it and rationalize it all you want, it can have perfect consistency but still be totally untrue. As an unenlightened and inherently limited individual in an infinite universe you can never have enough information to be totally rational, you will not even know when you have acquired enough information to be able to come close to forming an accurate conclusion. So while logic is useful for ordering what you think you know, ordering your paradigm, it is limited when it comes to totally comprehensive conclusions. In the end, anything can be rationalized if start with the right premises, or you have the right portions of limited knowledge, so it is we need a whole lot of humility when it comes to thinking we are even close to being rational. I see science as a tool for understanding that which is physical at least, but even still the the pool of information is always limited and built on assumptions, some of which are hundreds or even thousands of years old. When it comes to non quantifiable things, it becomes even trickier and to deny there is anything currently in reality which is beyond our ability to measure, is obviously the faith of an ideologue of scientism who doesn't know much science.

Despite what many atheists like to tell themselves, science is a consensus based on all the available experimental information and expertise of scientists, things are not set in stone but agreed upon, even the theory of gravity is still just a theory and with quantum physics its a theory which gets more puzzling all the time. Science is yet to come up with an understanding or proper definition for matter, gravity and so time and space, it has yet to determine any cause for the universe or life to come in to being and limited itself to explaining how it has formed and so the case for atheism is on very shaky ground. Science is not static or infallible and theories like evolution or gravity are not even technically claimed to be definitely true, but are working models that can be used to explain and predict things within material existence. It is another commonly held fallacy there are no spiritual philosophies which update their own models as new information comes in, when in the beginning pretty well all of them do, some like Hermeticism, Buddhism and Shamanism continuously do so. Atheism is generally rooted in mistaking science's demonstration of causality, as a cause to believe there are no divinities, perhaps thinking in terms of probability they ignore the infinite nature of reality, but also since you cannot prove negative existence, they don't use any evidence at all in their factoring the probabilities. Atheism is generally an assumption based on the discrepancies of a literal interpretation of a few mainstream religions, but with little to no understanding of their mystical philosophical foundations. This idea that "god" wouldn't make a reality with causality and which is scientifically understandable is actually contrary to most of ancient human philosophy and originally even Christian philosophy, the kinds of philosophy from which science itself is rooted and was created to validate. There is nothing logical about saying that logic and causality are necessarily exclusive from divinity, it is simply the result of a bias preconception jumping to conclusions. Causality to various degrees is found in pretty well all religions, some just believe that their divinities are somehow able to do things we don't understand, and so are only seemingly outside of normal causality.

For all the unexplained things in human awareness, there is probably nothing with as much anecdotal evidence as there are for spiritual experiences of some sort, so if we are to play the odds, the anecdotal evidence of over 6 billion people is probably a good chance something or another is actually happening. Atheists do not usually take this anecdotal evidence seriously, but this is not because they are necessarily any more logical than anyone else, its because these people have a faith that all phenomena do not exist until science proves or disproves it. They admit science does not yet know everything, but they have faith it can figure everything out and that it will prove them right one day, so they have faith in scientism and the causality of their fixed and limited paradigms. This is true even though science itself, in the case of Gödel's incompleteness theorem, proves that mathematics and so science can never explain everything, it is a mathematical theorem which actually shows there is an inherent limitation to mathematics ability to describe reality. Belief in spirituality may indeed be a coping mechanism for some people, but it is true of many people trying to find answers to questions there is currently no definite answer to, that they will find solace in believing in answers, even if there is no evidence for those answers, and this includes the atheist faith.

Since science is always agnostic and cannot be used to disprove the existence of a divine force, clearly atheism is a faith that is just as capable of cognitive dissonance, twisting of facts and wishful thinking as any religion out there. The real irony is many atheists are not really up on the latest physics and believe the big bang created the universe and that the singularity which exploded into the big bang came out of nowhere, exists for no reason and exploded for some unknown reason. So to think that this pretty well out dated science is not a huge act of faith is as self deceptive as any religious dogma. The simple fact is people do come up with models to explain reality, whether religions or scientific theories these models are always necessarily incomplete, the problem comes when the models, the metaphors become literalized and people lose the context of what they mean and instead start bickering over who has the best metaphors. All models should be open to updating, all models should be understood as temporary and finite, not things to have faith in, but abstractions which give us techniques to function better and become more self aware. Faith then is in the models which one uses to explain things, not in the reality itself and this is something which positivists are very much prone to, the same as any religious person.

Science and especially positivism has its own myths, as I said before in the late 1800s they thought it wouldn't be long till science explained everything, then Einstein came around and changed everything and now quantum physics is changing things in ways that make scientists very uncomfortable and very confused, so it is the myths of science need to be updated. But it is absurd to claim that everyone who is spiritual excludes causality from their myths, or that they simply ignore what doesn't fit in to their own preconceptions, everyone does that, even scientists, many spiritual people however are aware of this fact and incorporate that inevitability as part of their models. All religions are human abstractions, how else could we communicate them? That is not to say all mystical experiences can completely be put in terms of abstractions. Gnosticism, Hermeticism and Buddhism are specifically designed by humans to try and get around preconceptions and the limitations of abstractions, Hermeticism using among other things an experimental method. Really at their core pretty well all religions from a mystical perspective are aware of these limitations and are really just explaining psychological processes that can lead to, or which go on in a mystical experience, but they don't make any sense if you don't study the symbolism and can only think in literal left brain terms. When it comes to entheogens (though maybe all mystical experiences) brain chemistry may have some causal relation to such a mystical experience, but that does not keep it from being mystical, or really to me it makes it even more mystical. Science is just now starting to realize the limitations of its ability to abstract its theories and I believe will more and more rely on overtly mythological type language for its public explanations.

Depending on your ability to see patterns, once a system reaches a certain level of complexity it appears to be chaotic, so with something as complex as the universe it is not hard for a narrow viewpoint to create atheism. The universe is so complex that to some it appears random and meaningless and that our creation is some accident, and that life is nothing more than a series of chemical reactions posing as consciousness. Inanimate atoms interacting meaninglessly creating the illusion of life, but this idea is just a side effect of an extremely focused perspective, in a sense it is true but this is much too simplistic an explanation for all of existence. Someone can be extremely intelligent but still lack imagination and not see or accept all possibilities, if there were to be any free will in regards to spirituality, we must have an atheist choice and by and large most atheists are as good willed as any religious people. So the fact that the universe can appear to be meaningless, that it allows for atheism is actually some part of the proof that the divine exists.

If the divine was to come into the world and started telling everyone what to do and force people to believe in it like some dictator, then it would be proof it is not a divine being at all, but a vain creature in need of an ego boost. In many cases atheists are better behaved than religious people, especially when you consider that they are moral, simply to be moral and not for some afterlife reward. The idea that humanity would degenerate into violence and tyranny without religion says more about the true motivations of religious people, then it does about humanity in general, especially when you consider the obscene levels of violence and tyranny caused by religions. If there are atheists out there who are terrible people, there are all kinds of possible reasons why but they are more likely like that because of religious people making them bitter and hateful which leads them towards nihilism, as opposed to the idea they are "bad" because they do not believe in someone constantly judging them.

As I pointed out before, science makes models about how reality works, which it can use to consistently predict future occurrences, this is based on known causes which have or will in the future have known effects, like an apple falling to the ground after it loses its connection to the tree. However just because a model explains one or more phenomena does not mean that there is not a more comprehensive model which explains all those phenomena and more, but which provides a context that is completely different than the more basic model. Just because a model can work to predict something consistently does not mean it is the true cause of the effect, only that it is consistently congruent with the true cause and so it can be impossible to tell if something is just a correlation or a cause. Within an infinite universe there must always be more comprehensive models which are more deeply rooted explanations, which are more true yet harder to prove. For example the geocentric hypothesis that was so popular was a model that explained much of how our solar system worked, but with the realization of new information, anomalies which couldn't be explained made it clear that a new model had to be created. A geocentric model of the solar system, or the flat Earth hypothesis do explain facets of reality, within a limited awareness of the universe, these models can be used to predict and explain things very convincingly to ignorant people and yet they are not true, and have been disproved with the acknowledgement of new information. While the Hermeticist Giordano Bruno figured it out on his own because he didn't keep his mind in a box, through science with better telescopes we even learned that the stars were other suns which have their own planets. One of science's main strengths is that as it learns new things, new technology can be created and with the invention of new technology, it becomes possible to make new measurements and so come up with better models to learn new things, thus creating a cycle of growing awareness much like an Alchemical rectification. However we should not fool ourselves in to thinking our current level of technology allows us to be infallible just because we are on the cutting edge, after all the present time is always on the cutting edge and the past paradigms always look ridiculous in hindsight. Our measurements are only as good as our measuring devices and these are all built by us and so only as good as our minds, which are only as good as our measurements.

Given the massive incompatibilities of astrophysics and quantum physics it is massive arrogance and a lack of imagination that says our current models could not also be shown to have vastly different realities behind what appears to be a valid explanation for current scientific theories. For this reason we cannot assume that the latest models are ever at the end of scientific progress and given the endless nature of existence through parallel universes and other dimensions, its more than likely the scientific models will never be totally complete or accurate, since there will always be new information to consider, which will then change the context of interpretation for information already gathered. This does not mean science should stop, but that we should not try to make it into something that can bring us to an end, as its actual value is as a process and not an end. Science, like Buddhism points to the answer of all questions like a finger pointing to the moon, the problem is most people, especially scientific people, confuse the finger for the moon. The main difference between science and Buddhism is that science does not realize that even if it somehow manages to grow its arm out to the moon and actually touch it, the hand is still not the moon, another difference is that Buddhism also knows it doesn't take a rocket scientist to figure out how to see the moon.

There are many things which science has yet to explain, most notably consciousness itself, and when science gets a universal model comprehensive enough, it will start to come to all kinds of conclusions which seem absurd to what people believe today and in that time we will all seem absurd to the future people. Science can be great at looking at small aspects of reality and figuring out much of how these things work, but because of specialization and its lack of interdisciplinary studies it is largely lacking when it comes to looking at the big picture and how everything is connected together. Once science in general figures this out and works in a much more interdisciplinary method, I very much believe that it will come to many of the same conclusions as mystics and magicians pondering infinity realized thousands of years ago, but with a scientific understanding of the fine details of the small picture as well as the big picture and so humanity will have a more complete understanding.

Reason can with the right selection of information be used to create a false context that can be twisted to prove anything, as well as the opposite and in an endless universe we are always picking and choosing what information we use. That we only use experimentally verifiable information is useful for some things, but still limited if we don't know which experiments to do or are incapable of doing the ones we really want. We are all looking for raw uncontaminated infallible truths, though perhaps some of us don't even know it, we are the victims of our own perceptions and so our perceived needs. Cold reason in pursuit of objectivity eventually produces entropy, a sardonic self justifying circular logic infecting ideologues with vain notions of their own profit and potentially the justification for all kinds of atrocities. Often the idea takes hold in those seeking simple explanations that these models are more important than the actual reality they attempt to describe and with this loss of context, communism, capitalism and Christianity and every other ideology can all be seen to have plenty of logical debate to seemingly justify their beliefs. They believe they want an order based on what our egos think we want, rather than what we truly want, what is truly beneficial for us, but each ego is itself just a model of our assumptions about our identity in relation to the outside world and so is no better off at determining the validity of something.

In science it is generally considered that if the scientist influences the experiment then it is void, that in order to have objective observations we must be separate from the experiment. Despite the fact that this is well known to science, we still seem to think that what our brains report to be tangible is objective reality, most people haven't considered the thought the brain could be delusional about its objectivity, that consciousness of the outside world could be a flawed facsimile or even an artificial representation of something much deeper outside our five senses. People don't consider this because they rely on stimulus processed by their own brain or other brains to determine what's real. We know our brains are real because the people we perceive in the world by using our brains tell us this is so and we perceive them as having smart brains that know what a brain is, because they have used their brains to learn what a brain is and used that brain to transmit that information to us. Yet somehow it never occurs to us bias might creep in or that the brain might have a conflict of interests in this matter.

To think physical reality is objective because science and other people we perceive tell us so is like saying the bible is true because it says it is true, it is a logical fallacy that is dependent on the very thing that is in question and this is simply not acceptable to true science. Our brains determine what's real simply because the vast majority of us agree that it does and it seems to control all that we know. We think that our brains see reality because they tell us they do, of course no objective observation can be made of the brain's perceptions as even when using sophisticated tools we are still relying on the brain to create and observe the results of those tools. If there were forces beyond the brain's ability to perceive, they could possibly manipulate all observations ever made, perhaps to the degree they could make you think you are the one choosing your thoughts. People find it unthinkable that the brain could have its own motives for making you believe that it is you, and that its perceptions are objective truth, the idea is so contrary to modern western culture that if it is true in any way, it means we have to rethink everything, and so it's much more convenient to dismiss such ideas. Unless there was some way in which to test the brain or the perception of it without any direct or indirect use of the brain, we could never really be sure about anything. Science says that the brain more or less accurately interprets some portion of stimulus, (though even it says we have big problems) but then the scientific method is also a product of the brain.

This leaves science in much the same position as any religion, that being a matter of faith. However it is generally the most convincing world view the brain has come up with, (one which essentially glorifies the brain more than anything else, perhaps there is some bias?) after all we have all these toys from it, it provides us with the most functional working models for manipulating physical reality, exoteric forms of religions generally only provide working models for psychological and spiritual realities, if that. If the brain and mind are in a sense separate, (but still united) in that the brain and physicality are all perceptions of the mind, then perhaps as a mind becomes more complex it requires more complex delusions to keep it delusional. We cannot be sure of anything the brain interprets as long as we use the brain and all of its perceptions to determine whether or not the brain is a valid perceiver. When one considers the possibilities of memory loss and all the other ways the brain can be fooled, it becomes even harder to trust anything we call reality. It seems most people intuitively know this and so focus more on making the perceptions more comfortable, rather than spending time trying to determine the truth, but because of this they will never really be comfortable, they will only rearrange the figments of their mind into more artificial constructs. Though how can one hope to perceive without the brain? This is again made more complicated if you question whether you should rely solely on reason, or intuitive faculties and whether or not the brain and the rest of physical reality actually exist.

I am not saying the brain is definitely not responsible for mind, but that agnosticism is the only scientific view, you can rely on the fact that you can't rely on facts. Using self-referencing paradigms to validate that same paradigm is not good science. Again this is made even more obfuscated by the fact that my brain is apparently what gave me these ideas. I believe we are not truly our bodies or physical, but I do not have any evidence outside my own personal experience which most believe is dependent on my brain and so really it's all a matter of faith. Personal experience however, is all anyone ever had to prove anything, it's just some times we agree about what appears to be outside of us, or we have the personal experience that believing scientists or other authorities is a functional way to be. This is again made more complicated by the fact that all experience of there being other people to agree with is a product of the brain, so perhaps the only truth is learning to control what we perceive. I think the idea of duality between mind and physical reality is illusionary, if you fuck up your brain you will fuck up your mind, but that is because they are two sides of the same coin, the mind simply wants a tangible symbol system for its "body" to be able to manipulate things in a mechanical manner, because it is currently in a mechanical perspective and its perspective forms consciousness through what we call time and space. So while science is good at defining things within a closed system, reality is not a closed system, it's open ended and so long as it is presented as an objective and understood phenomena it really isn't. Those with power who fund most research will not hesitate to use the credibility of science for their own purposes, anything which can be used to provide substantiation for authority will be co-opted just as surely as religion is the opiate of the masses.

Racist eugenics, like those of the Nazis, British and US government was at one time considered a science and according to white "science," black people were said to be the result of a human having sex with an ape and so it was OK to enslave them because Genesis says we have dominion over animals. (Ironically science now shows if you are not black you are in part a neanderthal and so black people are the only pure humans. When a Tiger and Lion mate we get a Liger, which is bigger than both species and so we might wonder if giant hybrids were produced?) While the bible is clearly not scientific, given the information scientists had at the time this seemed perfectly reasonable, or at least passed as a justification good enough for white people to do what they wanted to do. There is no doubt black people, (and really all non white people) even if they were thought to be a breed of human were seen as an inferior race which was later reinforced by theories of evolution, ideas which are still held by racist people to this very day. Given their scientific understanding the Nazis thought it was desperately important to breed humans for the purposes of helping evolution along. So clearly governments and the power establishment are not above using bad science to justify alternative agendas in the name of morality and justice according to their faulty science. The same can be true of the war on drugs and the lack of environmental accountability on the behalf of industry and anyone who does not believe me should watch the old "documentary" "reefer madness" as an example of the shit that can be peddled as science. If that's not enough oil companies have used "scientists" to put out disinformation about global warming, other companies cover up the dangers of genetically modified organisms and yet more companies hired doctors to say tobacco is healthy! Then there is the intellectual frauds in the academic world of theology and religious studies which omit key passages in texts they find distasteful, references to sex and drugs, not to mention a patriarchal and Euro-centric racism and Christian bias in interpreting ancient texts and determining the legitimacy of their claims.

If there are power bases willing to abuse the name of science for such purposes then it is naive to think that the oligarchs do not prevent information coming to light which does not adhere to the reality paradigm that they wish to create in order to justify their actions. In fact this would be vital to “national security” but is further controlled by industry and government by not giving grants to scientists researching things which are counter to their political agendas. If research will disprove the authorities' ideas, if it is contrary to power interests then it will not get funding, or in the case of psychedelics and marijuana, research will be outlawed outright, just the same as the church outlawed autopsies for anatomy research or gave Galileo a hard time about speaking the truth. The myth that science is free to research anything is propaganda used to substantiate the claims of authorities to their infallibility, when in reality corporate and government profit and personal career ambitions determine much of the truth that is turned into gospel scientific dogma. Science may be true, but this does not mean that selective research cannot create the illusion of a different reality by excluding all potential discoveries which could for example prove the effectiveness of Anarchist sociology, or which creates technology that makes people too free. It is ridiculous to assume that such people would educate the minds of their citizens in a way which does not increase their ability to be better tools for the state, mind control is crucial to nationalism and to competition with other countries or slave owners, they just call it education and entertainment. What's more these people have probably twisted science to make people think that civilizations such as ours are better than the environments and kinds of social systems that we evolved over millions of years as social animals, those which we have through natural selection designed ourselves to fit in. So while we can say science is great, since governments and corporations provide by the far the biggest sources of funding for scientific research, we often cannot say what we are receiving is really science, or just narrow red herrings of a much bigger picture which always seem to reaffirm state politics.

Through this pursuit of science in the name of “progress” humans have devastated the natural world, in some ways quality of life has definitely improved, but it has been at the expense of all other forms of life on this planet. Yes we can build planes and cars now, but we also build coal burning plants and all kinds of chemical waste in the process of building our civilization's infrastructure, so just because we know how to do something technologically does not mean we should be doing it. Due to rising rates of “mental illness” it is questionable just how much science really does make us happier, clearly there is a balance that is needed, intellect without social accountability is a dangerous thing. This is compounded when any mentality which is not conducive to technocratic plutocracy is labelled “mental illness” so that it is not societies fault for anything, it is the masses psychology which must be changed because any “sane” person knows consumerism and being a cog in the system is the best humanity can hope for. While I am not advocating primitivism, the idea that endless economic growth and development can occur on a finite planet is not scientific or even sane, it is delusional wish fulfilment of masochistic ambitions. Sustainability is a must and this means totally changing our attitude towards nature and property, science (more then some weird author) must be on the fore front determining just what is really sustainable, but this can never happen with science geared towards profit. Having big screen plasma TVs and all the rest of it can be nice but its pretty pointless if the cost is the destruction of that which sustains life, having a comfortable life is not progress if it means no one can live in the future. Development for the sake of development is not rational, seeing humanity as better then other creatures isn't either, nor is exterminating the joys of the natural world, or the kinds of consciousness which allow us to be happy without so many frivolities. If a scientist is not an environmentalist they are no scientist at all, for if humanity destroys or changes the ecosystem to the degree that we do, then we contaminate all kinds of experiments and research we would do to study nature and so ruin forever our chances for understanding the world we find ourselves in.

To be clear I think we need balance, putting things in a hierarchy of intuition being superior to logic is itself a rational kind of abstraction, New Agers who fall in to the trap of abandoning reason are no more functional or healthy than someone trying to be purely rational. The truth is all parts of the mind have a purpose with strengths and weakness's in a given situation, and all are interconnected and defined by each other and really just different aspects of the same thing. We have evolved, or were created with all of the faculties of our minds for all kinds of reasons, to ignore or repress some is irrational, but also based on emotional immaturity and fear, they each have their uses, they each have their weaknesses. Even the fact that all things are one and those distinctions are meaningless, is in itself a reasoned thought, even if I first became aware of it through intuition and entheogenic experience. Reason is not our enemy anymore then intuition, they are merely the source and then classification of our thoughts.

For all my bashing of logic and rationality, (does it evoke an emotion in people devoted to rationalism?) it should be understood I really do appreciate it, in fact for most of my life I thought it was the most important faculty of the mind. Science has great potential to make the world a better place (if it is not profit driven) and there is no doubt that it can go a long way to helping us to understand various aspects of reality. The scientific method and the pursuit of objective truth (even if it is ultimately impossible) should be first and foremost how we go about experimenting to find new information. There is no doubt in an untrained mind wishful thinking can mask itself as intuition, there is no doubt that superstition grips many people and clouds their minds, there is no doubt that a purely atheist world view can be beautiful and awe inspiring simply through the investigation of nature. All this is fine and dandy, but what must be understood is that pure reason is incredibly dangerous, just as it would be to ignore all reasonable arguments, to abandon feeling and imagination, creativity and intuitive processes completely is to abandon our humanity, to become robotic and to be trapped in a box that can only analyze data that is already known and which has no love for other life forms.

From such a mindset all kinds of things could and have been rationalized, what we need is balance and integration, what good is logic if we never feel good? For most people the vast majority of my ideas and beliefs are irrational or downright stupid, I personally do not think a purely materialist view of reality is very logical, especially considering basic things like gamma waves and magnetism, neutrinos and photons, not to mention all the subatomic particles which make no sense to science. skepticism is great, and science should remain this way, at the same time it should stop brushing phenomenon under the carpet and being in denial about them simply because they don't make sense with what we already think we know, or because we haven't bothered to do the experiments which could prove or disprove them. I am actually calling for more science not less, more investigation of phenomena, more research for how to improve the standard of living, rather than making money, weapons, or consumer products maybe we should focus science on figuring out what makes us truly happy? In an Anarchist society much more people could be scientists and we would all be much better off for it. Evidence that doesn't fit in with current theories should not be dismissed, something that happens all too often, the more anomalous something is the more it is a sign that it should be explored and experimented on and when it comes to consciousness and psychology they are way behind the ancient mystical philosophies, even in terms of materialist viewpoints of the world. Knowing brain physiology is helpful in this field, but in many ways the ancient world was better equipped for understanding the unconscious mind, and the more subjective and intuitive parts of reality, precisely because they knew not to take everything so literally and they weren't distracted by so many abstractions and toys.

All beliefs that are truly scientific should probably be believed over irrational superstitions, at least until scientists discover some new working model that turns everything on its head. However I think everyone who claims to have universal truth needs to have humility, even Einstein was pretty clueless to today's standards of physics, rest assured things will change even more in the future. It is not that we should incorporate our purely subjective and intuitive irrational beliefs into all our rationality, but that we should be aware of all information and know which faculties they stem from, and be aware of the limitations of our objectivity. When we use all means of acquiring information, when we learn how to use our imaginations and intuitions better, we will have more information that is useful and true for science to verify. Science is preferable for the most materialist non human things, but there is always information that can be gained through other means that is still true and real and as I have pointed out, there is a reason why phenomena like psychic awareness persist to be believed in and experienced to this day, that is they exist! (science even shows this statistically)

All scientific work demands imagination and intuition, if nothing else then for the creativity required to design experiments and come up with a hypothesis, and so science has much to gain from learning how to use the irrational parts of the mind properly. What lies outside the limits of present rational research is often only truly apprehended through a subjective experience, indeed in an endless reality, there are an endless supply of valid and true subjective realities that are otherwise unexplainable, but which must be taken into account within any understanding of our reality as a whole. For these reasons we must beware of presumptions about the triviality of any information we receive, this does not mean we should believe anything, but that we should acknowledge the existence of all possibilities, even those which come from subjective sources.

After a long conversation with an older friend of mine one night I got some good advice: “The first question you should ask is, is this the right question to ask, is it worth while asking?” While I personally think nothing is trivial, this seems to be a very good idea to me, after all if you are not asking the right questions how will you ever get any good answers? It doesn't matter how rational or factual you are, if you are asking the wrong questions you will never get anywhere meaningful. It would be tempting to go into a long discussion of this idea, but I think that this is something that everyone should find out for themselves, before they ask any question and go on a line of thinking they should ask themselves if it is really the right question, almost always you will probably find it is not. This as he said “creates the tone” for the mindset one should have for going about figuring things out. You will probably find with this method that there is if you can remember to do it, a lot less chatter in your mind, a lot less wasted energy on things. It seems almost like Zen to me because I realized just how futile all my questions were, it seemed to still my mind, but according to this man “its a lot more practical then Zen.” Think about this concept on your own, all the while practicing the concept itself, what is the right question to ask about this concept? Is there any right questions? This is perhaps not a question worth going into. Practice this and see where it takes you.

I myself am a skeptic in many ways, ironically I am maybe even more conservative and skeptical then scientists in that much of what I believe predates science and ideas of governments by perhaps hundreds of thousands of years, I am just skeptical that technology and accumulations of facts is the only measure of awareness or truth. This is not to say I don't believe what science has proven, I simply do not throw out ideas because science has not yet gotten around to proving or disproving them completely. I am skeptical of science's claim that nothing is real until science has proven it, I am also skeptical of the purely materialist viewpoint which quantum physics also largely discounts and I am skeptical that science will ever be capable of understanding reality totally by using the methods they do. If science proves outright some of my beliefs to be wrong, in experiments that seem to be valid, then I will change them, however through my own experience I doubt that will ever happen because science has made an assumption that everything must be measurable according to materialist means, when there are so many things such as consciousness itself which show this is not true.

All too often people who look into such things find the experiences of the “fluff bunnies” hilarious and rightly so, there are many many delusional and purely irrational people who believe whatever slight intuition they have, who don't use critical thought to see if their intuitions are really true or not, and so never really develop the faculty in any real way. To use your intuition you should try to seize upon the first impression you get, free of critical thought, but once you have it, you then test it, and explore it rationally. Some people claiming to go by intuition have little to no training or practical research in matters of either science or Occultism and believe that to question their own spiritual experiences is to show a lack of faith or not have “positive thinking” but this is not the mindset that I am trying to advocate.

Since most people today do not realize that logic and science have spiritual roots, and was developed to aid the intuition and discern the objective from the subjective, they do not have a genuine spiritual life, or a genuine intellectual life. Some people believe they are much more enlightened than they are, or that they can talk to angels or trees or aliens or whatever, but they are really projecting their own subconscious desires in the name of positive thinking. Now don't get me wrong, I do believe we can talk to trees and that there are all kinds of spirits, (which could technically be called aliens as well) but I also believe that most people experience these things in a way that is based mostly on their own prejudices, and wishful thinking. Some people who get hooked into the power of positive thinking mentality seem to think that is all they need to do, and they will be basically infallible so long as they stay positive about those mistakes in their thoughts, that any questioning of their intuitions or experiences is just fear that should be pushed aside.

This is a mentality that can in religious people often become more dangerous than the other extreme of scientific rationalism, (except when scientists make things like nuclear weapons but its usually religious politicians who get to control them) just because you are a divine being doesn't mean you are beyond mistakes or beyond fooling yourself, after all we are all divine and most people fool themselves into believing otherwise. Do not be so naive and arrogant as to think that just because you know you should think positive, that everything you think is correct or that you have overcome your ego. Since spiritual realities are even more subjective than the mundane reality, we must in fact be extra cautious in how we interpret spiritual experiences and ideas if we are to come to any kind of even remotely true conclusion that is useful in this group dream we find ourselves in. The best tool spiritual people have for exploring spiritual realities is the scientific method, backed up with research on the subject and spiritual techniques they are experimenting with, its not enough to take the word of channelled spirits, even if it really is your dead grandma. Ultimately everything is a figment of the imagination and so we cannot let ourselves believe that a magickal universe can be taken at face value any more than a materialist one. The ego is always tricking us, especially when it comes to how much we have overcome our egos, so it is through balance of all forces, rational and irrational that we must find truth if we are to get a look at the whole picture.

While we may each individually create our own realities, as we are all one, there is a communal reality which is often much more confusing and contradictory than intuitions in to your own personal nature, and so logic does have a place in sorting out contradictions in different peoples individual realities, logic in this way is how the various individual realities relate to each other. The world is often irreconcilably illogical to humanity in the present and in some very core aspects, but wishful thinking does not change this, in your own little world you may be able to talk to trees, and you may truly be talking to trees, but it does not change the fact that most people are creating a contrary reality, and that being aware of how your own personal reality relates to the group reality and really trying to understand that group reality is crucial to really understanding your own individual reality. Even if there is no objective reality, your subjective opinions are no more founded than other peoples, even if you are very positive about your beliefs, materialist, atheist, rationalist opinions, flawed as they may be in some respects, are ultimately just as true as your own understanding. Recognizing and understanding both the group reality and your own and how they are one, are the only real way of understanding one of these separately, not to mention avoiding becoming authoritarian in either extreme, or falsely believing yourself infallible.

People seeking to develop intuition in a New Age way often do believe what they want to be true, rather than investigating fully to see how it is true and this is a real problem, especially when it comes to politics and economics. Having positive thoughts about the potentials of your life is important, having positive thoughts that your rituals will manifest is crucial, but just because we make our own realities does not mean we should ignore information existing in the exterior group world, ignoring anything contrary to what we believe intuitively is just as hazardous as only believing what authorities tell you. Just because we do not want certain realities to exist does not mean they cease in the group world when you ignore them, while you may not want to empower certain realities, ignoring the fact that others are creating their reality will only cause you problems, and make you unsuited to dealing with or understanding the world of other people. Checking up and really trying to understand the details of your mistakes with intuition, or realities that are contrary to what you are manifesting is key to progressing the skill past all the things you are in denial about, or are otherwise unaware of. You may make your own reality, but that does not mean there are not ways to better understand that, or that the order you make can be made more consistent with your true will and with less cognitive dissonance. As the outer world is the reflection of your mind, you can learn things about your interior mind through study and experimentation of the outer world and vice versa, which is then rationally analyzed and this is actually the basis of Alchemy.

Logic has value in that it provides a means of communication which has a definite structure that can be related to others, in ways that is only surpassed by art and presumably unarticulated telepathy. In order to learn anything, first you must learn how to learn and for this studying formal logic is imperative. Whatever the truth, knowing the trivium or having a “liberal education” which is grammar, logic and rhetoric taught as one process of cognition is extremely useful to avoid being taken in by the manipulations and mistakes of others. I am still learning but when combined with etymology a whole new world opens up and the Occult meaning of everyday reality becomes clear. While words are limited they are useful, and you are bound to communicate with others and so you should learn how to do that as best as you can. Most of the worlds problems are caused by misunderstandings through communication and so make sure you know how to communicate clearly. By being able to spot fallacies you can save yourself some time researching things which are not well thought out, or which come from liars and people trying to manipulate you. Studying formal logic is still useful because the wider your ability to interpret the subjective, the more objective you will become and while nothing is trivial, some things are more useful to your true will than others. We as humans do not have the time to study everything, so some level of discrimination is unavoidable and for this logic can play a role, just make sure you don't fall in to the trap of thinking you should discriminate against all irrationality because it is the root of all things.

This need for checking the facts is especially true when trying to figure out the history of the world, or the nature of reality, or whether a voice in your head is really trust worthy. (ask it to tell you facts about the group world, which you did not know, which are useful in the group world, which are verifiable) Whenever you step out of manifesting your own personal reality into the group reality, you must be aware of other peoples manifesting influences, otherwise you are just lying to yourself and telling yourself your subjective individual reality is the only true reality. Even though there are very painful things in this world, they will not go away simply by focusing on something you think is more pleasant. Since others are actively manifesting it, denying that they are manifesting it, will not stop them from manifesting it, you are only manifesting your own individual escapism. Painful realities are not created by people being aware of them, but by actively believing in them as permanent or desirable realities, (caused by ignorance of potentials for change) or by ignoring people who are actively empowering them. You do not manifest a reality you don't want by focusing on how to change it, you manifest these unpleasant realities by not addressing the causes which made people manifest them in the first place, or by manifesting the idea that painful karma is the only way the world can grow in awareness.

Focusing on change manifests change, especially if you physically act to encourage that change and in order for the change to be complete in other peoples realities, we must understand all the ways the reality must be changed. This means understanding what we don't want fully, so that we know what we need to really manifest in a detailed and complete way in order to get rid of it all. If we are to master intuition, we must understand all the ways it is currently flawed within us, once we are aware of the flaws, we can start to manifest them changing and in part this is done through critical thinking and logic. If we only ever focus on the end goal, then the painful realities which currently exist of which we are ignorant, will never really change because we cannot think positively about the change at the root cause of the problem. You must name something to work magick on it, and logic is a very important way to dissect things so that you can articulate them, which you will then understand enough to know what changes need to be made in order to keep the problem from manifesting again.

No matter how far you have advanced spiritually as a person, you should always be skeptical, “the more I learn, the more I know nothing.” I thank science for what it has given us, it has brought us out of the dark ages and being ruled by the church, but this does not change the fact that science is limited in its ability to discern reality and that it is and probably always will be basically agnostic. This does not mean you cannot investigate that which science or rationality denies, but on the contrary use those tools to better understand what is mysterious and unknown in the spiritual worlds. (“The Method of Science, the Aim of Religion”) Science is not about dismissing what seems unlikely or that which is not explainable from what we know, but diving in and exploring these things to get to the truth of the matter, we do need more science, but a science which understands that humans are irrational and that this irrationality has a rational purpose, to make us aware of ineffable realities.

As inspirational irrational intuition can cause spontaneous information recognition, if you can make a random chaotic expression into art, each person can come out of the experience with new information that was to some degree useful or profound. This works just like an ink blot test but we would probably want something that does not look like it was so randomly created, even if it really was, we want something that appears ordered so that people will try to find that order. Some will hate such art, some will not, but if you can conceive them, there is always some kind of chaotic meaning that people will read into it, all too few will admit they cannot see something if others claim to. With the control of art we have the control of expression, and the control of peoples irrational processes, and so there is control of peoples emotions and then finally their logic.

This is all due to so called authorities who get to tell everyone what a piece of chaotic art means, when it has no specific meaning at all, that it has to mean so and so but in its Chaos, or even just irrational creation, it is truly full of meaning. We could even apply the “cut up” technique of writing to art memes in general and so create what I will call a “meme collage.” This would work by writing out on a bunch of little pieces of paper of as many memes belonging to as many mediums of art as possible, such as styles of each respective medium but also music notes, colors, words, objects, dance moves and aspects of sculpture etc. Then you pull out the pieces of paper from a hat or whatever, you can then combine them in novel ways which incorporate a variety of different kinds art to make something new. (Like “cut ups” you can try combining them in the order you pulled them from the hat or according to your preference.) In terms of mystical symbolism the whole point in many cases may just be to create a psychological mirror in which we can view ourselves and these symbols too can be added to the collage to add some extra meaning, even turning it in to a kind of sigil or form of divination. (Try utilizing a variety of senses)

Life does not have meaning, it is itself meaning, or to put it another way, good art, like life is meaningless, the whole point is there is no point, if there was a point to life then there would only be one way to be happy, there would only be the one thing you could get out of it. If there was a point or purpose to life there would be an end to existence when that purpose was fulfilled, what is more we would be forced to conform to that purpose and so we would have no free will and so for these unfortunate robots, life would ironically have no meaning. Because there is no point anyone can assign whatever meaning they want to a piece of art or life, so it is that all things have beauty, meaning and value and what is better is that it is a value that is left to the individual to decide upon. All things have already been created in infinite reality and so reality is the ultimate chaos art from which we can derive whatever meaning we want, which is as a process itself, a work of art. It goes to follow that all things can cause pleasure instead of just the one type of pleasure associated with some universal meaning of life and so I say again, the whole point is there is no point, and that's the way it should be. It isn't nihilism, it's a condition needed for unlimited creativity, the formless imagination itself which has no point because this would be a limitation.

Could it not be reasoned that we are not our thoughts or emotions but rather the observer of these things? But this of course depends on how you define yourself through your thoughts. How can we objectively say we control our thoughts and that we aren't just over identifying with the thought that we choose our thoughts? What if something is choosing our thoughts in order to lead us to the conclusions it wants? Why then has it given me that thought? Where are these thoughts that I am writing coming from? Thoughts that question the thoughts themselves, just because we think the words "I choose my thoughts" does not mean we chose that thought. This idea views thoughts almost like entities vying for our attention like memes, but then the words which provide the forms of thoughts are undoubtedly memes and memes evolve to capture human attention. I think therefore my thoughts are, and they seem to say that makes me exist as well, but then maybe they are trying to keep my attention, trying to keep me empowering their astral forms to help make this world of matter.

What makes one person achieve epiphany and another stuck with mundane thoughts? Perhaps the application of the will and yet I am not convinced we are our will either, but in part the result of what our will has made us, which depending on how well we are molded by it, determines the next course of action for the will. Perhaps we all have the same will, it is just that with different environments and different reactions to this will, some of us accept molding better than others and so we experience different things and make different choices, but all of these are attempting to eventually lead us to the same place. As I learn to quiet my mind of thoughts I gain deeper insight into these things, consciousness can be a spectrum from intuition to emotional reaction of logic, but there is still more primary aspects of consciousness which go unnoticed. At any rate to think thoughts are controlled by the will is still a self referencing theorem and so biased and without certainty. I am not sure but everything increasingly appears to be becoming more uncertain and as I become more fluid with my perceptions, everything also becomes more miraculous, more functional, more strange.

Space and matter is time made tangible, time is the perception of the linear progression of change, such as new thoughts and the experience they represent. We must stop believing a politically correct culture could ever save us, for it is the pursuit of this impossible idea of an objective universal ideal that has enslaved and entranced us into pursuing governments, religions and economics which promise such things. We have sought it in response to being overwhelmed by the personal abandonment of non linear formlessness, the totality of real contentment and the ceasing of all creation. Through this overwhelming bliss we sought to change, to not be in a state of bliss, and so the first change occurred and we enter into time, but the only change worth pursuing is being able to stand unlimited bliss which is devoid of change. This bliss must be experienced in order to become accommodated to it back in time space, where of course we will then experience a new level of awareness as to how this world is limited.

It should never be forgotten that nothing I have ever written is true, some things I wrote only because they were interesting to ponder, others for my vanity. If we are all one, there is no such thing as plagiarism, so feel free to destroy my work, but somewhere in the world leave a copy unaltered if you will. Even if we weren't one I don't believe in property so it doesn't matter, luckily others have already said a lot of things that I have, sometimes I was inspired, sometimes it seems we were both inspired by the same things and came to the same conclusions, as I have pointed out it is really hard to tell where ideas come from. Still I can take previously known ideas and put them together in new contexts which provide new meaning and this is how humanity always creates. If you don't agree with me, well then I guess I don't, the one blasphemy I never stated was that I should be taken seriously. This whole book is a play on words with both the protagonist and antagonist being the phrase "I am that I am not".

Write with style man, rhythm and flow, got to keep up appearance's, everyone wants a show. Entertainment and enjoyment for me is making things seem hollow and boring. Hah, dissolve dissolve, boil away. Got to have some meaning, got to have some value, the only sin being presumed objectivity, but sinning is always fun. Holding on to your marbles by discovering more and more the pleasures of losing them. See the sights and take the ride, like awkward statisticians look for their proffered truth. Dive into dissolution, drink the diet Pepsi of doom, a world of life through death. The acrid taste of juxtaposed transpirings to tear the soul through its own choice of nourishment. Are you popular and famous? Do you want to be? Just say no to asking anyone to do anything hard. Dominate in the name of Love and destroy those you can convince others to hate. Bring forth the alienation, which role shall we play? The person who honestly doesn't believe they play a role is a powerful character. Are you watching life? Or living Life? Are either vice very moral? Or are they lazy suicide deceptions for the obese of mind?

Learning intellectual facts can help raise your awareness, but even if these facts are true, unless your mind works properly you will not really understand them, or how to even really apply them, you will only memorize them and be able to compare them to other facts. While collecting "facts" can be useful, if all possibilities are true including their opposites, then what we call "facts" are really quite limited to at best this limited vision of reality that science has set up for itself. It is much more helpful to learn how to perfect your own mind rather than learn what bias narrow minded authorities tell you, science provides facts that are true enough and which are helpful, but it can't get at truth that is not limited. Combined with propaganda that is designed to impede your consciousness rather than expand it, facts can be misconstrued and put into false contexts which allow for the manipulation of the intellect by seeding the memory with false or out of context information.

Through Occult practice which includes logic, with proper use of entheogens you will have a much better means of spotting the bullshit from the truth, you will also have a much wider context from which to discern the aesthetics of any concept, you will be more conscious of the whole process and learn to master each stage of cognition. Teaching someone how to think for themselves is much more effective at spreading Anarchism than giving someone some good logical arguments about why the system isn't working, or even why Anarchism is best. Anarchist facts only makes you an authority on Anarchism, rather than a creator of Anarchism and it can only make someone a student of Anarchism, rather than an actual Anarchist.

The irrationality of pursuing pure reason is essentially based in the repression of the "feminine" in general and is probably the leading cause of all of societies psychological problems, by overly focusing on rationality, no one knows how to deal with the emotions they repress and so they fester. For a person to express their emotions is even seen as the cause of bad emotions due to rejection from the elitist culture or from the mainstream value system, people think there is something wrong with them if they are not happy with what they are told makes everyone else happy. Desires for emotional and sexual gratification are substituted by consumerism and so the individual's attempts to be rational are undermined by their total lack of emotional intelligence, which feeds depression through repression of instinctual drives, imagination, intuition, individualism and total ignorance of a large part of their own consciousness. All this hierarchy and greed is due to the "logical" conclusion that conformity is the way to succeed, but since real happiness cannot be gained through the egotism of a hierarchical culture which ignores so much of consciousness, the individual will attempt to be happy through rational domination of others. Through denying the true personality for one that is functional in the system, people destroy their chances for deep happiness for what they have had presented to them as the logical thing to make them happy. The problem of course is that succeeding in conforming to an artificial abstraction that demands the destruction of life and emotions is not really success at all and will only make things worse.

It is this intuitive faculty which sets humans apart from computers and allows us to create new information and imagine and invent new solutions to old problems for which there is no new information and so mastering the imagination and the intuition is required to be able to master the entirety of the rational mind. If you can act as your spirit you will overcome the ego that keeps the mind focused on petty things and gain access to the collective unconscious and so be able to intuitively “know” and even often show logically, many things you would not be able to figure out if you were only conscious of the more superficial aspects of the mind in the intellect. This pre-linguistic awareness is in part what is called “tacit knowledge” and although official definitions of this knowledge is more limited than intuition and imagination, it clearly illustrates the limits of language to teach people things, to spread ideas. Riding a bike or many physical and artistic skills cannot be learned through explanation alone, nor can learning your first language, or most importantly loving other people and getting along in a social manner.

Many things we learn require experience and contextual information which must be picked up by the subconscious for the logos to make the ego aware of it, those who rule this world know this, and they have hijacked the education system in order to prevent education of certain tacit realities which allow people to be more free. Through destroying oral traditions,entheogenic practises and Occult societies which had hands on learning to go with the instructions, the Christians have done much to make us all ignorant of the real meaning behind mystical texts and Occult philosophy, they also destroyed much of the tacit social awareness that allows us to be more equal. Through controlling the media and literature with careful rhetoric, the context of unconscious tacit reality is mischaracterized and dismissed, specifically because it shows the flaws, the cracks and loopholes in the rationalization of authoritarian values. People are easily tricked if they only rely on words, especially words from people they think are valid authorities, but since tacit knowledge is based on experience it is harder to make lies, either its a functional knowledge or it is not, there is not nearly so much room for deception.

Without the right context, without gnosis it doesn't matter how good your intentions are, if you do not understand yourself and have a dysfunctional view of reality due to preconceptions and misinformation, then you can end up seriously believing the only way set people free is to lead them. Even if you truly have the right understanding, the right context of reality, you cannot really explain it to other people who don't also have it, because they lack the right context, the same awareness of the root causes of things. People trying to interpret mysticism will misunderstand any explanation that can be put into symbolism, and in their attempts to do what they believe to be good, they generally wreak havoc on the planet and everyone around them, all the while thinking they are helping things in general. For this reason please, I beg you, do not take me seriously or any one else's symbols, just try to figure out what you think, not what others think.

Through the destruction of mystical and entheogenic culture, among many other things the tacit awareness of humanities unity and equality is also destroyed, as well as our unity with nature itself, an awareness which is not cultivated by logic alone. Once all the teachers of this tacit awareness were killed or forced underground, by controlling the publishing and education system and what was legal in the written word, it was all too easy for authorities to change the history books and create a culture dependent on them for knowledge. This power was used to convince us it is in our best interest to compete in capitalism, to turn against each other and be at war with nature, that we should ignore our fundamental unity and become divided for some idea of individual happiness through the selfish exploitation of everything else. Much of reality always remains unspoken and as all of society demands irrational aspects, logic and science alone is incapable of determining the needs of people so inextricably dependent on tacit knowledge.

Those with poor language skills and poor intuitive faculties will not be aware of how reality works, especially human reality, through taking things at face value and poor logic they will be easily manipulated and mislead to believe in the abstraction that everything is literal. Present human reality is the result of the forces of high poetry and myth, the inspiration of the imagination mixed with the forces of entropy and degradation on those creations. This is done so leaders can co-opt that art and hijack humanities pre-logical cognition or tacit knowledge, to create the artifices that become our own personal prison. Modern science and so much of western civilization is a culture based on bastardized Alchemy, we simply focus on the more material and solar aspects than the originators. Through clever language skills, focusing on the quantitative more than the qualitative and increasing the capitalist specialization of jobs, propaganda has been used to undermine people's ability to understand tacit knowledge and tacit awareness and so has made people dependent on literal authoritarian instructions to function in this society. These "puffer" Alchemists (those who took Alchemy in a purely materialist sense) can literalize and materialize the metaphors, but they are the blind in a world of dust and shadow, cursed with the pursuit of profane pleasures, the gold of the world, which buries the wealth of awareness like wisdom trapped in matter. They have attempted to separate themselves from nature in their attempts for gold, by their literalization they missed the point entirely and this empire of empiricism that we find ourselves in is the result of this ignorance. While Alchemy does certainly have a materialist side through natural philosophy, natural magick and experimentation, or even literally trying to change lead in to gold, only those who did the interior work on the mind and realized their unity with nature would be successful, while those with capitalist ambitions were complete failures. While science is now realizing it's mistake, it's hubris in it's attempts for universal objectivity, the only question is, can we fix the damage before its to late?

So it is Anarchists must also become aware of what lies behind theory and debate and engage in direct action and develop a more balanced intuitive approach for a tacit experience of Anarchy. In fact I believe some of the best ways for spreading Anarchy is not through words at all, but showing other people directly what Anarchy is experientially, not just propaganda through the deed, but general Anarchist interactions with all people in as many aspects of life as possible. Example is much better at making it obvious to people what Anarchy is without having to explain it to them, so that they can come to Anarchy in more of DIY fashion, through a tacit experience which can bypass much of a persons paradigm prejudice. Having experienced the essential nature of Anarchy, a person's tacit awareness will be able to put things in an Anarchist context, which you can then explain to them without them dismissing the experience as if you just started trying to reason people in to it. The word "Anarchy" is so loaded with negative connotations these days that even attempting to talk about it will get you laughed at, or at best ignored by the majority of people. Though conventional propaganda is still a must, being able to surprise people afterwards that they too have participated in functional Anarchy, is in many cases much better than just giving them ideas.

How can I explain to you what Anarchism is? I cannot, it is something you must find on your own, in your own way, for me to tell you how to be an Anarchist would be a contradiction, you have to learn to be your own Anarchist. It is helpful to talk to people and to learn that you are not infallible, to spread the word, to give people ideas, writing books, detailing the horrors of hierarchy are all important tactics, but telling people they should be Anarchists, is like attempting to rationalize free will to people who want to do as they are told, then telling them to heed your words and think for themselves. Given that people in general largely act the way they do because they are emotionally immature, in denial and out of touch with the irrational functions of their consciousness, Anarchism requires people master their irrationality if it is to ever succeed in a stable community. Badgering people with factoids about how pretty well everything they support is murderous and tyrannical is only going to make these unconsciously irrational people afraid of Anarchism, make them want to deny it, for it means facing the depressing mess of contradictions and depravity that is the capitalist mind. Only by appealing to people on both the rational and the irrational aspects of consciousness can Anarchists hope to get them aware enough that they will understand the necessity of Anarchy in creating a functional world. This is most effectively done in a way that is emotionally gratifying for all those involved, so that the fear and denial associated with owning up to the horrors of capitalist lifestyles can be overcome through bypassing the ideologue opposition in as many ways as possible, and this will create a direct experience of Anarchy. If rational speech alone were enough then Anarchism would of been widespread long ago, it is not, and will not be in the future so long as words are all Anarchists can muster.

Logic is useless if trying to find your way out of a paper bag. You think you have to turn around but what if you had no body? Its because of logic you didn't realize you were never in the bag to begin with or that you are perfectly happy in the bag. As we are constantly inside /outside the bag and at the same time one with the bag. We are it and it is us. In the great oneness of all, all differences are pointless.... and maybe that's the point. Reason is a subjective attempt to make a finite definition on infinity which is of course ultimately useless compared to true infinity, but then that's a limited distinction.

All matter is energy, there for all things are one, interconnected, when you look around you, don't see objects, see energy condensed, pulsating, vibrating, to some degree flowing from one "object" to another, if you can start to feel this as well you are on the right track, keep practising, try with plants and animals, rocks, crystals, then try with man made objects. All energy patterns naturally work together in the perfect harmony of ebbs and flows, whether we realize it or not, in fact the perception that such energy does not exist is because it works so well, it's so omnipresent and stable we screen it out, the tacit awareness is lost in translation. Once you realize this, you can "go with the flow." You may change with psychedelics but realize everyone else will be the same once you come down.

LSD it seems can be used to make hallucinogenic extensions of abstract thought understandable to the conscious mind in visual and other sensory terms. Symbolizing the symbolism of everything. Interchangeable thoughts and colours of inspiration. Meaning interwoven effortlessly with beauty spiralling beyond the appreciation of mundane imagination. The soul encompassing perplexification of linguistic decadence. We are in fact a decadent redundant race. I fail to understand how all of humanity from every person conceivable basically wants the same things. To love, and be loved, but can't seem to figure it out.. My guess is we're stupid and childish, that we tend to take the easy way, throwing a tantrum when we don't get our way. To be serious all the time is a very silly thing, and to never give any thought to seriousness is undoubtedly silly. Dichotomies are not two opposite forces but are both intrinsically one variable of a a previously unknown detached view point. Everything must be loved for its own sake whatever that is, because everything happens for a reason. Otherwise I'm just a monkey which after millions of years of evolution is sitting in a basement after ingesting a compound of different elements to come to a completely coincidental existence of profundity and meaninglessness. I do believe in evolution but there is only so far our bodies can take us before we realize we are pure mind, that all evolution is really of the consciousness relating to itself in a myriad of different ways throughout time. I wholeheartedly believe, all of human development rests on the further exploration of these vistas. The future is liquid and unformed and so could never be confined by the past no matter how horrible.

Heresy

Iridescent Cauliflowers manufactured by the sun, are created in turn according to relevance.

Like a fool who is laughed at with secretly mutual feelings,

Relevance has a cornucopia of faces no human seeing them all.

Universally spaced Chaos is the womb of the verisimilitude of order, Conversely within the synchronic syntax of order we see Chaos as the order of infinite dynamics of which no verbiage is possible.

Only when meaning is defined in disproportionate aspects of importance is a misconstrued interpretation acquired.

Within the fallacy of organization structures is the attention of “the masses,” and they have diffused their energy on distracting themselves from the alienating truth.

The challenge before us is to look into the void and be alone as our universal self and gain omnipotence.

How much we wish to see is a question we all must ask repeatedly.

As changing and unfolding as a fountain is liquid lucidity, flowing and sparkling as light goes through each drop of life.

Nothing can be bought or owned least of all piece of mind, a falling shard broken off into an abyss, No end in site as acceleration augments.

Before each thought is a feeling unpolluted by definition or articulation.

A feeling of pure knowing greater in meaning than any word can contain.

To be aware that it is our subtle feelings that create our thoughts and not the opposite is to start on the road of gaining control of yourself and so your destiny.

Love must be for everything since its all part of yourself just an ideogram.

The mind projects the world before the eyes perceive the land..

Existence defies convention, everything is intermingled.

A jagged collision of selves splicing all objects, how much can I see and still live as a human?

The synthesis of eccentricity institutionalizes into reclusivity.

Quintessential amplification is the result of cyclical complexification.

Chapter 7 – Difficult Problems

Well, I have now been working at the store for some time now, living in my own place, really starting to feel like I have some footing in the world, even if I don't make much money or have much of an education. While working at the store is definitely better than most jobs, I feel like I've been softening into some kind of ridiculous hippie. I don't like to use labels but trying to get involved in activism has brought me into groups with a lot of people who have a hippie mentality. This isn't all bad, they aren't normal hippies, anyone who fits exclusively into one social group or category is most likely a conformist no matter what the group, but still I feel a culture clash, a pushing for me to conform to the group social values according to their construct of “love” or “political correctness.” This hatred of love is stupid, but I feel so is the opposite extreme, a simplistic way to put it would be that I work with people who think being loving is making everyone like them and that they are too loving to be around anyone who is different from them. I think largely because of this many people, like a lot of punks that I have been meeting think that activism is hopeless. Then again I don't think punk is about being hateful, just not taking crap or denying your hate when you do feel it, its about being as real as possible and that includes both the love and hate. I have felt more love in a room of punks than in a room of hippies because the punks weren't anal about always being nice and allowed everyone to just be their real and rude obnoxious selves. Come to think of it I am probably more hateful than I have ever been before, I am just more controlled in how I express it, I am also allowing myself to feel some love too now, but the love I feel from the activist community is generally much too diplomatic and formal. I need confidence and love for myself but when does it become arrogance and narcissism? Balance can be confusing. Everything is funny, strange, brutal, heavenly, crazy. Its surprisingly hard to stay knowledgeable about the truth, but that is a test all souls must face eventually or forever be blinded by illusion.

I have no desire to work in the PC agenda and this often puts me at odds with hippies in the activist community so obsessed with sanitizing everything to fit their artificial standards of utopian ideals, of what a world looks like where no one is offended by anything. Helping people effected by bigotry and prejudice is crucial, but there is something about a group of all white people talking about fighting racism that just doesn't seem right. Activists in my area are often suspicious of anyone different from them, as if their ideas of what loving is should be universally self evident to every person on the planet. Cliques form and petty bickering keep us divided, the desire for a purely Anarchist group, or group which is a particular type of Anarchism makes it so there is not enough solidarity to form large scale networks. I see way too much debating and not enough action or solidarity, that instead of pursuing direct action people are jockeying for social status and to show they are more Anarchist than everyone else, or that someone else is not a “real Anarchist.” There is often such an all or nothing absolutist attitude, that any petty flaw in a perspective can be used as a means of debating indefinitely to postpone any real activism and alienate anyone who is not perfect. This puritanical Anarchist fundamentalism, especially the idea that only the classical Anarchist thinkers represent Anarchy is of course absurd and hypocritical, especially since so many different branches of Anarchism exist today and there never really was any uniformity.

One co-worker asked me what I do with my spare time, I wondered how much I should tell them, sometimes I find myself unconscious on the bathroom floor, pants around my ankles an explosion of liquidy shit out my ass and I wish I could leave my body.. trying to remember the night before brings up images of screaming at strangers, trying to jump on my friends, drawing obscene things on people and myself with magic markers, wondering what various exotic animals taste like... that kind of thing. I have a refined kind of crazy I suppose, honed after years of practice, not just Chaos, not a Jesus complex, some kind of amalgamation of all things really. After a hard night of drinking whiskey bare knuckle boxing and listening to Irish rebel songs with my friends there is nothing quite like the obliteration of a good black out. A rampant catastrophe of walking spontaneity, its working with people, but using methods which constantly challenge any assumptions of goodness, learning to love the worst through an embrace of total experimentation. I have scars on my forehead from head butting things and some others which are a mystery to me. There's an odd comforting feeling in getting into a fist fight with your closest friends and everyone being fine with it, so what if I have some chipped teeth, I will always have that to remember them by. I like the kind of punk rock that makes you feel like you need to take a shower afterwards, of course I almost never shower and pretty much am just a really dirty person. I wonder if one day I will get tired of forgetting the night before, of waking up in the morning to discover a scab on my dick and wondering if I got some kind of horrid blow job from that ghastly cougar the other night. As in high school I have made plenty of friends when I was drunk, when I party it is easy to gain social status, to become "popular" in a scene, but then what good are friends you can't remember, or fun times you can't remember, after awhile it can get pretty lonely having such a foggy social life. Still looking at my coworker blankly, I decided it was probably for the best that I didn't really remember.

A look of madness in the eyes before a howl and smashing of public property, there are some advantages to growing up in a small town when there is no one out at night. As I grew up we used to play a game of walking down the street, some of us would go through peoples yards smashing whatever was there as we went along, others on the street or driveways jumping on cars pissing on them, the usual, if it snows you can leave people disgusting messages for them to find later. Sure it seems juvenile to most, even moronic, as with anything to do that is slightly in the vain of illegalism, but being surrounded by decadence, by an alienating corrupt society built on slavery, a bit of vandalism seems down right angelic in comparison. A crime a day keeps the cop in your head away, vandalize and spray whenever you have something to say, with a paint can to play, graffiti art is here to stay. These days I try to pick my battles more carefully, especially if I am doing it in the name of illegalism, but growing up in a small town, feeling alienated, angry and with no hope for a better future, any form of rebellion would do, if it was senseless and random it was all the better to fight obscene notions of order that others were always trying to push on me. Churches were my favourite place to graffiti, I am surprised more people don't act like black metal Satanists and burn them down, but to each their own I suppose.

I think its important to be disgusting in this culture, people are too complacent and comfortable. I think its much better to find your limits and go past them. Does this imply a rock bottom? I'm not sure if I have one in the traditional sense, my friends thought I had hit rock bottom but they didn't know that I brought a jack hammer along. I abhor pride and there fore shame, but I do suppose there are things I would prefer not to do, but I doubt I would do these things even when I was drunk or fucked up. Where will this life take me? I do like the idea of picking my nose in public places , especially on the bus where people are in an enclosed area with me. If my past is any kind of guide then my future will be strange and unpredictable, more or less happy but a gamut of emotional endurance and bizarre happenings. I expect I will be another loser with big potential, but I certainly don't measure success in the conventional way. Still optimism is important, especially when the word "success" loses most of its meaning.

It is certainly very tempting to devote myself wholly to being a disgusting human being, in a world as horrid as this, anything gross has a kind of beauty about it. Poverty, prideless vulgarity, the salt of the Earth, drunks and junkies keep an honest representation of the human animal. If you aren't dirty there's a good chance you have blood on your hands in one way or another. There's no community like that of the unemployed. Mysteries in the music and white trash mysticism, a just outlaw stands as an outsider to all. Late night poetry when all good people should be asleep. Give me "grit," give me life, give me the wisdom of those who are happiest with the owning the least. The doomed and pathetic, the sick and the old, this is where you will find those who have seen through the game. Untold stories of all those who the bourgeois pass by, real life that no one will see, snuffed out all to soon and mourned by all too few the wretched move on, not needing condolences. A hideous cry to raining skies above, heaven does shed tears for all the unknown casualties, but those tears fall upon the lost and weary with no home and little shelter making them all the wetter and colder, knowing that the heavens sorrow just makes it that much harder. It takes strength to go on in the gutter alone, the camaraderie of individuals who will not depend on each other, except to know that they will share all, some sober or free to use casually, in others it's an addicts honest love of up front selfish generosity. Hated by the highest are those who are crushed underfoot.

When you reflect to the ignorant bourgeois their own faces, they have such little knowledge of who they are and what they do, they probably wont even recognize themselves, but all the same they will probably be disgusted as they in some ways hate themselves. This self hatred is why they are ignorant about who they are, they want to ignore the parts of themselves they don't like, but this ignorance is also the cause of the things which makes them self loathing and so they are stuck in a cycle of escapist fantasy, always putting the blame on other people, rather than their own lack of self awareness. Any reminder of these parts to themselves is met with stern and merciless legal action, all the more for those who refuse to acknowledge the corrupt authorities and become liars like the pigs, those who refuse to pretend they have submitted and feel guilt or have been "rehabilitated."

It has been made clear to me that the mainstream activist community is simply not up to the real issues that face humanity, but have instead created an insular culture with its own social values and so hierarchies which they hold as the ideal, truly, a "scene" is not a means of spreading revolution, only a subculture. Ideals which they expect that through "education" or brow beating, everyone will see that they should conform to this ideal which supposedly does not offend anyone. Some few in their wilful ambition seem to come to the situation like they are some valorous hero marching in triumphantly on a chariot in a parade, with their honour and glory to be held in awe of onlookers of all those who are not as well read as them, they wear their rational arrogance like armour. This kind of thing often pisses off a lot of people, especially people just starting out as activists, offending them and alienating would be supporters from the Anarchist cause. This is the camp I find myself in, but I am still willing to try and help, even if many in the group are people I do not particularly want to spend social time with, I am not there to make friends or impress people.

This is not to say they are all bad people, or even that the less enjoyable people are all bad, quite the contrary, more that they are trying so hard to be good, they never have time to understand that goodness comes in a much wider variety of forms than they realize. I cannot judge such a large group that is filled with individuals, but when this group works within a more or less contained and limited network with which it is only comfortable dealing with, it sets up a culture that is alienated and alienating. Still it is clear to me as I learn more about the state of the world and the mechanisms of politics that such activists have their work cut out for them and given how much work some of them do it's no wonder they are a bit touchy. I think we need to reexamine our methods given the general tyranny facing the world, holding up signs outside government buildings is not likely to change anything fundamental. I find it difficult to enter into conversations with activists who are not willing to consider anything but a slightly mutated reiteration of what they already believe, who are not willing to do anything but the kind of tactics which have been failing Anarchists for decades. All this has left me quite apathetic with and alienated from activism and makes me wonder what tactics I can pursue which will actually be successful and allow me to be more myself. For awhile I have felt myself slipping into hippiness, but it's clear to me now that I am a punk for more reasons than I was originally aware of and while I don't expect others to be like me, I cannot be anything but me and I definitely do not see any good reason to change into some artificial construct which so many activists expect me to be.

Humanity

Multiplying cellular hierarchies of destruction, are producing hate filled automaton's corruption.
A praxis of parasites supplanted justice of greed's insurrection,
The most masterful manipulator is the victor of all elections.
Eating at the heart and core of all denizens are deranged delusions, Masks, shells, prisons fill the Earth conceived by mass confusion.
Looking out for number one is an outrage to be overcome,
All of progress is never ending, its just a method of greed defending.
A growing gap of capitalist determined social value rejects,
Is leaving "expendable" exponential damage by people of ill respect.
Psychopathic suits killing in the millions in the name of love,
A total mirror image of the shadow is the their demonic dove.
Scientific religion of reasonable minions distractions,
Is fuelled by fanatical slaves of organized contraptions.
Matched by this desecration is the control of all religion,
We are told what to believe because heresy results from our decision.
We cannot forget to filter our perceptions to whatever others request,
According to all the lies of what a predetermined environment detests,
Individual thought must be eradicated forever from our minds.
But equal portions of uniqueness is something all of us finds,
Shameful paranoia is most disturbing when its true.
A serial killer child molester could go free despite the victim's you.
The righteous seek salvation of the ultimate truth's revelation,
That we've been planned for a reason of unimaginable computation.

For those with some doubts as to the urgency of our situation, those who may believe functional Anarchy sounds great, but that it will never happen, or not for a long time, I say to you we are all Anarchists whether we like it or not. No one can control our thoughts or actions, at least not completely and to put off a genuine society of equality is to consent to the ongoing atrocities created by hierarchy and so the longer we wait to act, the harder it is to make change. Even with the existence of rules and laws we are the ones who have to choose to follow them and give them power, these rules do not physically control us, we are not robots following unbreakable programs, they only have power because we believe they do, because we program ourselves to believe they can command us. It doesn't matter what ideology you label yourself with, you are the one who chooses it, which is an act of Anarchy by default. Even if you give people orders and they follow them because they are fooled into believing you have authority, they are ultimately doing it by choice. Now someone could hold a gun to your head and order you to do something you really don't want to do, you would either choose to die or do what you're told, but no one can take away your ability to choose completely, even if they can influence your priorities. Even if you choose death we are all immortal and no one can ever really kill us, so what the government is, is a bunch of black magicians tricking us into believing we are not in Anarchy, by using authoritarian measures to control the environment in order to create ignorance of the true reality. This world has always been in Anarchy, but the illusion of authority and society has been created in an attempt to control our thoughts and choices as much as possible.

This has worked surprisingly well, protest groups and people of that sort demand power for the people but what they fail to realize is that people are power, its just that we all play this make believe game of changing our opponents priorities in order to change their decisions. This of course has very real consequences like giving the government much more credit and authority then it really has. The very idea that we need to limit ourselves to negotiating with those in power, that we need to only work within the system gives that system more power, this is done by us consenting to the idea they are people who have the authority to make us play by their own rules and that this is a functional means of ending that power. Using legal methods of change is important, but we should not limit ourselves to it, nor should we shrink away from infiltration of various political and economic systems, but trying to appease the ruling class, or to rely on asking them nicely to stop their extermination of all life is pretty ludicrous. Politicians have no power but what we give them and the same is true of money. People control all the power in the world, not money or anything else.

The governments of the world are much more corrupt than any of us really know and due too compartmentalization, they are more corrupt than even they realize. The CIA, NSA, FBI and even the police have participated in so many crimes it boggles the mind how much it goes on without any real interference from anyone. The CIA especially is corrupt in that they are responsible for huge amounts of trafficking cocaine and heroin world wide, but specifically for the U.S. They are responsible for putting the heroin dealers back in business in Afghanistan thus making it the biggest producer in the world, as well as doing business with the Colombian government which is controlled by drug dealers, if not made up of full time drug lords. (CIA = Cocaine Into America) During Vietnam it was later found out that people in the army were smuggling in heroin from the “golden triangle” in South East Asia by using the coffins of dead soldiers, profits were used to bribe hundreds of various officials and police back in America where the drugs were sold in minority ghettos. There is no lack of evidence, there are a variety of examples when some mistake has happened and the government gets caught red handed smuggling dope, just look at Iran Contra.

Some naive people might ask why they would do this and the answer is simple enough; if you want to have a source of income that is untraceable to the higher government then there is no better way than selling drugs. Through such means you the CIA can support their clandestine operations that they want to keep unknown to the congress and everyone else. Seeing as how African American and Hispanic communities were targeted for sales, it was pretty clear that although the drug dealing wasn't done for purely racist motives, if they were going to poison people, it would be minorities and the poor. While the CIA needed a source of hidden funding, this practice has grown so wide spread it is now one of the lynch pins of the American economy, without which stocks and banks used to launder the money would plummet. The drug laws and DEA exist to take out the competition and keep prices high as well as spread fear through creating a need for drug dealers to turn violent. While legalizing drugs would create tax revenue, the government makes more money overall when drugs are made illegal because it creates artificial scarcity. History shows us that with prohibition abuse of drugs rises, this was clearly shown when alcohol was prohibited, but in countries like Portugal and Spain which have decriminalized heroin and cocaine, the addiction rates go down, not to mention crime. All the prohibition propaganda has been shown to be false again and again and yet people believe it because they have been raised hearing it. “Anti-drug” education currently sounds more like a commercial talking about how amazing drugs are, saying things like if you try it once you will be addicted, if nothing else helping to create a placebo effect. Due to its seemingly counter cultural and rebellious aspects when drug use is made illegal, it is a fact that those drugs keep many potential revolutionaries occupied with drug addiction. With prohibition the prison industrial complex does more business, guns can be marketed to people as a means of protection, but also to the drug dealers themselves for perpetrating gang wars, all the while the increase in law enforcement budgets creates more of a police state which can be used all around to clamp down on people, especially minorities.

So we can see this “realpolitik” of the government really is quite indistinguishable from the mafia in many ways, with police running the protection racket, military the hit squad, wall street running the fixed casino and lottery, banks launder, the IRS runs extortion, congress and the central banks run the whore house selling favours to any with enough money, the CIA traffics guns and drugs, while the DEA and others take out the competition, often scapegoating non white civilians in the process. The main difference between the mafia and the government is that the government has managed to trick people in to consenting on a much larger scale, people even celebrate it's use of violence to maintain total domination of the streets and this is all done by masquerading under the term “legitimate.” (Likewise there is a certain romanticism associated with the Cosa Nostra)

All kinds of admitted crimes go unnoticed by the people in the name of the American empire, even those which are against the American people, such as the how the father of George Bush Sr. that royal asshole named Prescott Bush did business directly with Hitler, supplying Nazi Germany with nearly half of their armoured steel and explosives. This went on illegally right into World War Two until some time after America entered the war and eventually the company was shut down for breaking the law. Not only him, but all kinds of American industrialists like Henry Ford and people from Wall St helped to fund and arm Germany, but then even European aristocrats were in on it. These are the kind of people we have chosen to run our lives for us, which the “moral majority” look to for their values. George Bush Sr. was the head of the CIA and helped to put Saddam Hussein into power in the 80s, he also helped to run Iran Contra scandal, but even when these people are more or less caught red handed, they manage to get away with it. There is no doubt in my mind that the administration of George Bush Jr was knowingly negligent if not directly responsible for 911, either through working with their good friends the Bin Laden family, or through some black ops utilizing Al Qaeda. That is Al Qaeda was founded by the CIA and as of writing this is probably still run by them, a controlled opposition bogey man that can be used to whip up anti terrorist hysteria and subvert true Middle Eastern democracy. Any research into the matter at all will bring up many questions which the administration has purposely failed to answer, which do not make sense and which point to the fact that a variety of intelligence agencies warned of this exact 911 scenario. There are no shortage of researchers in to this topic which is largely beyond the scope of this book, but perhaps damning of all is that the wars in the middle East were planned in the 90s before 911 even took place. This was done by a Neo-Conservative think tank called the “Project for the New American Century” which had people like Dick Cheney and Donald Rumsfeld in it, and which laid out detailed plans to ensure American hegemony across the planet.

Of course even if the official story is true, America was directly responsible for the twin towers coming down by their long history of oppressing the middle east and subverting democracy, propping up dictatorships like those found in Saudi Arabia, Iraq and Afghanistan and otherwise doing all they can to set up their empire. We are given propaganda that Muslims hate democracy but it has been the American government who puts such fundamentalists in power. They do this because true democracies would not give away the oil cheap enough and religious extremism is anathema to the people in these countries creating any real sovereignty or credibility on the world stage, not to mention, if Muslims were democratic, Israel might actually be held accountable for it's war crimes. “Terrorists” or people fighting back is the only sane thing to be when faced with such oppression, the fact that Muslim people have been so peaceful for so long is a testament to just how untrue the propaganda about them is. History shows that even when they are totally justified, most of them hold back in violence because they are not what the western media makes them out to be. The people of the west look down upon Muslims for clinging to their god, yet for over a century we have taken everything else from them, we say “theirs is a religion of violence” and so we must bomb all kinds of innocent people. What hypocrisy that these ideas often come from Christian and Jewish fundamentalists who have religions just as violent and oppressive, the only difference being we have science and education to mitigate the insanity of the puritans and their descendents. Moderate Muslims or those in the Middle East who are secular or of different religions are caught between Western puppet governments on one hand (who are themselves often fundamentalists) and on the other the fundamentalist rebels using religion to unite the people against a common enemy. Historically speaking Islam has been more tolerant and open minded than either Christianity or Judaism and it was only through the rediscovery of Pagan philosophies preserved by Muslims that we managed to crawl out of the dark ages. There are plenty of militant Christians in America who would love to have their brand of Christianity as the theocracy, even more Christians unconsciously try to create a theocracy and all these tools make up the primary source of recruits in the crusade against the Muslims. The WTO buildings were some of the clearest symbols of the neo-colonial empire, one of the main centres of economic control and one of the headquarters for capitalist oppression and so if we understand this, then they are surely understandable targets for the oppressed. Apart from western invasions and the establishment of Israel, most of the problems in the middle east have been caused by the Sykes-Picot agreement. This was where Britain and France divided up the middle east after WWI, ignoring local politics, demographics and the Sunni/Shiite disputes and more or less arbitrarily drawing borders on the map. This was done purposely to divide and conquer the people of the middle east so that the invented nations would be made weak through internal conflicts and border wars with neighbours. As Muslims are all too aware of this, they are rightfully pissed off and doing their best to defend their land from those who would plunder it for oil and other commodities.

These “false flag” attacks use fear to control the masses by creating a problem and then offering a solution to it, all the while using a scape goat to take the pressure off the real problems. September 11 was but one example of this, as I said before Saddam Hussein was put in power by the American government, but he was also given the chemical weapons which were the justification for the invasion. (Which never did materialize during the second invasion) Before this for the first gulf war Saddam was given the go ahead by Washington to invade Kuwait and then blamed for it, the American government also faked satellite photos showing a military build up on the border of Saudi Arabia to trick the Saudi king in to asking for help. If this wasn't enough the daughter of the Kuwaiti ambassador was caught pretending to be a nurse who worked in a hospital and “witnessed” Iraqis killing babies by taking them out of incubators. (Then of course in 2003 the second Iraq invasion was justified by “faulty” intelligence about WMDs) The gulf of Tonkin for Vietnam, Pearl harbour for WWII, the sinking of the Lusitania for WWI and before that the sinking of the Maine for the Spanish American war are all incredibly suspicious reasons to go to war. So we see in some cases the American government would provoke and allow the enemy to attack in order to justify war, if not actually sabotaging their own ships in order to rally the troops by blaming other nations.

Both the democrats and republicans do it but they usually push through different kinds of things for the ultimate agenda, of course they are really just two faces of the same party. These two parties are ultimately run by international corporations, banks and the military industrial complex which have spread their tentacles across the world. The United States has from its beginning done terrible things, but it has progressively turned into an outright empire bent on enslaving third world countries and overthrowing democracies, in fact too much has been done for me to go in to fully here.

There is quite possibly more corruption in the world today than at any other time, “the Nazis didn't lose the war, they just crossed the ocean.” With the acquisition of Nazi scientists and professionals like those who ran the SS in what was called “operation paperclip” this is no casual statement, it is the very origins of how the CIA was created, modelling itself directly on consultation from SS officials and keeping them on as agents, especially those which were behind the iron curtain. This was done largely to one of the CIA's founders, Alan Dulles and the war crimes and conspiracies of this man and his brother, John Foster Dulles can and have filled books of easily verifiable information. The reason the U.S. is the #1 super power in the world now is because they are the most ruthless society on the face of the Earth. They have been merciless in their mercantile neo-colonialism, right from the beginning when they went to Africa and kidnapped innocent people to use as slaves and started the genocide of the Natives using germ warfare and out right military massacres. The government has sold its own people to the highest bidder and any crime can be paid for if you have enough money.

The Americans have been part of the world drug trade since the 1800's as seen along with Britain selling opium to China, but also across the world as opium was at one time the biggest trade of a single commodity in the world. This led to the "opium wars" when China tried to assert its sovereignty and create prohibition, Britain of course demanded "free trade." While the marketing tactics have improved, this hypocrisy and type of economics continues to this day, as it is such a boost to the economy of a capitalist country they felt they couldn't afford not to sell drugs, after all anything was justified in competing with the communists. I do believe people should be free to use whatever drugs they want, but as I explained the drug laws do more harm than the drugs and so going to war to sell drugs, creating a culture that is ignorant of how to properly use drugs, or having a government selling them covertly and illegally so that they can make more money is completely intolerable.

The truth is most people have been made in to nihilists and are just going along for the ride, the real scary thing is most of them don't even know themselves well enough to realize they are nihilists, or what the word "nihilism" even really means. Few people care enough to really do anything to stop those with power, most sheep find it hard to act out revolution over so powerful a shepherd. The only way we can overthrow these malicious institutions is to make people aware of just how corrupt the system is and that something must be done to stop their sadistic expansionism, that there are viable alternatives despite what the tyrants say. Everyone is so scared of terrorists no one will question the boldest acts of so called "patriotism." People have been manipulated so successfully that they will go to war with any who show the slightest resistance to the whims of the US. The petroleum crisis will only get worse as the developing world becomes mechanized and the price of oil will cost many more poor souls dying in vain for a cause that is a lie. Freedom is the banner which they use to enslave us, they make us fear that we could lose freedom and so we become willing to give it up voluntarily. One thing is for sure, horrible things are happening in the world and they are only going to get worse and so we must stop them if we as humans are to have any real life.

Anarchy to me is a state of mind within us all. Anarchy put simply is to have no rulers, no one in command, in this way there are no rules that are not agreed upon by those involved and so long as you do not impose on others and live by your own ethics, no structure of government can form. Most people who live in "free" countries live their lives in a world where they eat their dinners and meals, they work or go to school and so for the most part it is arrogance and a self-absorbed attitude to actually complain about how crappy their life is in the economic sense. These people seem to be completely uncaring that their fellow humans are starving to death while they scrape leftovers into the garbage, all the while feeling sorry for themselves that they have to buy a used car instead of a new one. So called "responsible government" is no better than the sheep that follow them, it takes more than a government to make up a society and so once again I must bring up that we all contribute to the delusions and horrors of refusing to accept we live in an Anarchist world and so act accordingly.

Government will always be intolerable because power will always corrupt. Control of others is the reason money was created, a control that would be institutionalized as governments and priest class's, so perhaps they are the real root of all evil. Politicians set the laws and while some laws like those against murder and theft etc sound good, they are really designed to keep us enslaved to the oligarchs and create the illusion of order and service to the greater community. The wording of the law has more or less been set up so that they can get away with anything when their actions are brought into legal question, but if the person cannot afford the right lawyer they can punish someone they don't like who committed the exact same crime.

The monetary system is the source of greed and the governments power over us, it is their control mechanism that has only served to give their slaves their own choice in how the budget for their necessities is spent. With the American government, they did not give the Africans any choice into what clothes they wore or what food they ate, or where they specifically worked. Now lower class people basically do the same crappy jobs, but they think they are free because now they have choices about a few things, as long as its within the same basic range of expense. Now the slaves don't have to be whipped because they have been tricked into thinking they are free, if they do not work they will be homeless or outcasts, this is the same no matter what colour you are. Although our leaders may not call themselves kings and queens we are still very much just serfs who are allowed to move around, and so as long as there is government we will continue to be slaves.

Anarchy is life and life is the most beautiful and horrible thing all rolled into one. Life can be a wonderful thing but is anyone truly happy? Only through doing what you want and following your own ethics can you be happy, I don't mean hedonism but being allowed to live in the way that is truly most satisfying. Doing what you want means having the freedom to say and go and do and believe what you want, it means acting as and being treated as an equal to all others. Anarchism is people working together, in what could technically be called organization among people as long as it is a "mutually beneficial and non coercive agreement." Anarchy doesn't mean living off the work of others as some might claim, because this is in fact the prime aspirations of capitalism and of hierarchy, it is instead the purest form of people working together for their common aims, and doing so not because they are forced, but because everyone involved knows it's in their own interest to work together.

When considering the reasons for the state of the world and why government should be abolished it is important to consider what the job of the government is, is it true that governments are incompetent? Is everyone in the government a complete moron? I do not believe this is the case, if that were so, then if we had good leaders then the world would be a better place. Now as we can see the system is inherently flawed and corrupt, I have come to the conclusion that most of the government is not incompetent at all, in fact they are very good at their jobs generally, it's just that the government's job is not help make sure everyone gets what they need and to keep the innocent safe, or to make sure social services function properly. The job of the government is to secure power for itself and ensure that it will always be needed, to provide protection to the powerful and ensure that those who are victimized by the system do not successfully rise up against it. This has created a society that must perpetually be afraid and in need of saving from some eminent threat. This has created a society that needs to enslave others in order to try and sustain itself, however this kind of society cannot go on forever and most likely is in its death throws right now. Without the need for common people to be protected by criminals, communists, terrorists and minorities etc, then why would we need our so called protectors? Somehow people haven't realized that its not in the best interest of a parasite to willingly acknowledge that its a parasite to those it preys on. This gullibility has fooled most people into thinking that when a government is doing something to further its own agenda of control, that it is really just incompetent or that it was bad luck or some crap like that.

Yes the government is highly inefficient and there are many imbeciles in places within it, but this seeming inefficiency is actually a means of perpetuation, if the government achieved its goals then we wouldn't need it. If our "democracy" provided an efficient tool for social change to people wanting to enter social service or who would work with the government in some way, then society would quickly become more egalitarian and there is nothing worse for a system dependent on hierarchies than egalitarianism. It is not in the best interest of the welfare office to eliminate unemployment, nor is it in the best interest of a capitalist economy to get rid of unemployment, without some desperate people out of work, without the threat of impoverishment then companies would have to treat their workers better, they would have to compete with each other for workers which would mean giving out better pay and benefits. It is not in the best interest of the police to eliminate all crime, nor the prison industrial complex which is fast becoming one of the biggest private industries in the USA and which is totally dependent on locking people up. What would militaries actually do if people weren't nationalistic, if they weren't committed to the idea that "war is peace." There is a big difference between wisdom and intelligence, our government may be many things but it is not stupid, they know exactly what they are doing and they have done their real job very well considering how obvious it should be to most people that things could be much better. Even if you are not an Anarchist it is doubtful you are fully satisfied with the government and yet people buy into the idea that systems created to maintain inequality are the source of their freedom. It could easily be argued that the governments main goal is to keep people unconscious to any real truth, the only reason we are educated in the west is to become more useful slaves.

Police are one of the easiest examples of this concept to illustrate, since their job is not so much to keep crime from happening, as it is to protect those with property and power. This does mean keeping up the illusion of serving the people and so some lower class people will be helped, but this is just to cover up the lie that the police cannot protect you nor control us, so they pretend to serve all and that the slaves are free. If the goal of the government was to eliminate crime then it would work at stopping the causes of crime, things like poverty, discrimination, insane drug laws and unhealthy attitudes towards consumption, rather they have chosen threat and intimidation, terrorizing citizens into obedience. Government is fundamentally a terrorist mafia organization bent on controlling as much as possible, the threat of imprisonment, the threat of police brutality and violence for those who resist the established order is the very definition of terrorism. If the police blatantly ignored anyone who wasn't rich then social order would dissolve and eventually the government would have a revolution of their hands, so it is important that the slaves believe they are being protected. It is not in the government's best interest to have outside gangs or mafia types getting rich off their slaves, that would be competition for the government and so would be a threat to their credibility. A good percentage of cops will even believe that their job is to serve and protect all law abiding people, but their budget is spent locking up pot heads and petty thieves when white collar criminals walk free with impunity after stealing the savings of millions and war criminals get reelected and gut the constitution. All too often the murder of a minority will be more or less ignored while the robbery of a millionaire or some small portion of their money would be top priority. Although they may convince themselves that they have noble intentions, the majority of cops that I have met have been sadistic power trippers who get off controlling others, not to mention those who are outright corrupt or racist. By convincing us that they have a right to rule over us and determine our worth as people, the "enforcers of law" have cast a very effective spell but this is because the law was not created for justice, but for breaking and domesticating workers.

The reason that common people of the west exist in relative wealth to the rest of the world is so that western countries can act as a home base for the operations of the global oligarchs. In order to conquer the world a strong home military foundation is needed and the slaves you have around you need to believe they are free so that there are no rebellions, so that they are willing to fight any which you can trick them into believing threaten that supposed freedom and this is what we call "fortress America." You can even talk your slaves into believing they are freeing other peoples by toppling local governments in order to set up sweat shops and plunder their resources, after all that is the American dream. By creating a "bourgeois" "middle class" a whole group of people is conscripted in to the plot as what are essentially a bunch of Uncle Toms who serve to create the illusion of freedom and rally support for the autocracy if and when a crack down on dissidents is needed. So while some may disagree with my use of the word "slaves" they fail to understand that some slaves are treated much better than others, however all but the ruling class are still essentially slaves, it is just that some are trusted enough to live or work in the house, or the "fortress" of the slave masters and so are given extra "privileges." (Keep in mind in the Roman empire, even educated people like teachers were often slaves) We are dealing with people who did not think twice about committing the biggest genocide in world history on Natives within North and South America, we are talking about people who can and have justified any action, any atrocity you can think of in the name of their "progress." Make no mistake this "fortress" is also a prison, democrats and republicans are just playing good cop, bad cop with the people they control, they will say anything to make you comply with their protocols and complete your hard labour in the cultural prison. There are many many indisputable books on the acts of so called “free” western cultures from the beginnings of colonization to the present, cultures which have imperialistically conquered the world and left destruction of the natural world and misery within the peoples of those lands.

America like the other western cultures is not in the business of freeing people, but then how can you make a business out of real freedom? They say they are in to “nation building” but what kind of nation is it really? Whenever the oligarchs of the west have their way they always want a brutal puppet government who's sole duty is to fill the pockets of foreigners at the expense of their own people. If a “democracy” is put in place it is only to create a bigger economy, this is pretty obvious to the peoples of those countries and yet the American people are so arrogant they believe they lead the “free world” by which they mean, the American economic empire. From blood diamonds in Africa, to stuffing kids down coal mines there is no limit to the oppression that goes on in the name of freedom, but free enterprise is not freedom, it is only a propagandists justification to rob people of freedom and to instill upon them a perpetual need to work for their own death.

The western peasants are taken care of only so that rebellion does not break out close to the rich people while the rest of the world is pillaged, in the name of the cross and capitalism we are all turned into martyrs, crucifying for and being crucified by the very system we work for. Patriotism breeds xenophobia and the idea that your country is the best, especially when you know little to nothing about the rest of the world, which leads to people who will die gladly for a cause they don't understand. This nationalist attitude not only makes soldiers but also helps to keep people from taking any interest in other countries and so remain ignorant of the plight of people who they will more or less see as inferior, even if it is only culturally inferior rather than racially inferior. Just tell America some country doesn't love baseball, hotdogs and freedom and you got all the pretext you need to justify a war, people will kill and die to make sure that hotdogs will be fed to every Muslim baby because freedom means force feeding processed pork eyeballs and entrails in exchange for oil. All generals know an army marches on its stomach, an army and population from which the army comes from must be fed and believe they have something worth fighting for. If people start to wonder why their country is so much richer than the “third world” they just have to be told its because they are the hottest shit in the history of the world, a country where you are free to be told how much better you are than everyone else. Nationalism and racist jingoism will keep people from understanding where their wealth really comes from and will also help to ensure volunteers if one of the slave countries rebels, after all it doesn't matter if the game is rigged, we all have to play, that's what “freedom” in this system is all about.

If the oligarchs can keep people to limiting their travel to resorts or other tourist sites they can also help to keep people ignorant of other cultures, as well as the environmental devastation and natural exploitation that will be blamed on the third worlders themselves. If they can keep these countries out of sight of the home base peasants, then it will be out of their minds, especially with a controlled media that will divert attention to consumer mentalities and other forms of manipulative propaganda. Keeping the home base happy is also important in order to have a strong enough economy to allow military weapons to be created in the USA, as well as to have an education to allow research for new technologies, but at the same time as many scientists as possible must work for corporations so that the research is limited to “profitable” ends. Education can also be made obscenely expensive to discourage the poor or the average from becoming educated in anything that may help them to create change or otherwise understand the current political situation. Anyone who does go to school will either be well off enough that they are likely to already be indoctrinated (or will become so through controlled education systems) or they will be so burdened with debt and so enthralled with consumption that they must work for the system. The third world slave population is then further divided and conquered, set against each other through the sale of small arms to warlords and dictators in order ferment war and further bring these countries into debt.

America is not rich because its people are harder working than other countries, they are rich because they have concentrated the wealth they plundered from their third world puppet states. The west does not deserve what it has, it is not justified in its freedom to collect and then throw out tons of food each day while others starve, these ideas are part of the global delusions about the capitalist system and it is these comforting lies which are fast leading to our total destruction. These are just some of the tactics used by the ruling class to tighten their strangle hold on the people of the world, they are old tactics, but they work so well that no one even questions how they really work anymore.

By building infrastructure like sweatshops and industrial parks in third world countries, ruling corporations get cheap labour and by the mechanisms of the IMF and World Bank, they get it paid for by the country they are exploiting, those banks also get a profit through predatory interest rates. If a country starts to get too well off or if the workers unionize and start to demand better conditions, then the corporations can just move to the next country and get them in debt. The first countries economy will then plummet and then they will be enticed to take out more loans and build more infrastructure and privatize more resources and social services, so that they can impoverish their people enough that they will be competitive on the global market for workers. This is done so that when the other countries are no longer profitable they can leave them and go back to the first, and the second and third countries etc will face the same economic problems. All this creates a kind of farming cycle for slavery, when countries default on their loan payments their resources will be exploited and their social programs eliminated to pay off the debt of building their peoples economic prisons. If a country's ruler actually cares about their people and refuses to sell them in to indentured servitude they are first bribed, if that fails, their life is threatened, if that fails an attempt is made on their life to assassinate them, if that fails the CIA or others go in to start a "revolution" and install a puppet dictator. There are many examples of this, from Iran to Guatemala, even the Australian and French governments have been the targets of CIA coupes for being to left wing and it is all admitted and clearly documented in a variety of books.

Globalization is a euphemism for neocolonialism. Euphemisms and "news speak" is of course one of the oligarchs favourite tactics, all too few people are willing to denounce a "patriot act" or in the case of congress even read it before voting for it. Examined superficially who would oppose "developing" the third world. The insidious vampires of the WTO and IMF create the guise of "foreign aid" to set up infrastructure for multinational corporations to take advantage of people, simultaneously putting the country into a debt that it can never recover from due to high interest rates. If a struggling country has a cash crop economy, lets say bananas in Jamaica, then we give Jamaicans free bananas, or whatever is being grown is given as "charity" in order to flood the market and bankrupt those kinds of business's within the country, then the corporate vultures come in and buy up all the assets of that industry, in this case they buy up all the banana farms from desperate land owners. IMF loan conditions ensure that any laws that keep their people or resources from being exploited are removed and that public resources become privatized. In this way multinational corporations can become more powerful then governments, they become "banana republics" that is, countries owned and controlled by corporate interests, in reality no different then fascism, its just that we use the words "free market."

The WTO further ensures western corporations wipe out any competition to get that much closer to a monopoly by also putting pressure on countries to privatize industry and get rid of trade tariffs or any other kind of protection for their people. The very nature of capitalism creates an inevitable tendency towards monopoly, in fact if a corporation is not growing, it is dying, this creates a crucial demand for compounding exploitation of people and resources. It is a system completely dependent on exploitation, its closest rival communism is a farcical system dependent on subservient slaves, in many ways similar to ours, our rulers just have the good sense to hide their tyranny a little better. This has been going on for a long time now, corporations are nothing new, nor are they unique to Americans, the Hudson bay company, the West and East India trading companies are some of the original fascists and they are designed for one purpose, to acquire and control as much wealth and power as possible. Ever since humans confused freedom with the ability to use economics to steal from others legally, we became a doomed race, a race that would destroy everything, even that which provides us with the ability to live. Greed leads us so to the dream of being one of the big shots one day, that we might know what its like to be happy, rather than one of the losers of this game, but when everything dies, nobody wins.

Once you become politically aware and realize what kind of an agenda they really have, then seeing the news is a very different thing, in regards to how they wish to spin things it is often blatantly the opposite, but looking at it, you can tell why they phrase things the way they do, putting in half truths here and there, and generally putting things in a different context which suits their interests. Many people believe they have freedom of expression, many people believe they can see through the lies, but when all the media outside the internet is controlled by five or so multinational corporations, all of which have various conflicts of interest (such as general electric being one of the biggest arms dealers in the world) then the level of journalism is not to be trusted at all. These corporations rely on the ignorance of the masses to blindly accept the news casters authority, journalists who have literally been trained in the art of of gravitas, or appearing credible and manipulating the story to suit their own bias. This is not to say most news casters don't believe what they say, but that they were chosen because they believe what they say and because they have no knowledge of an accurate context.

With the war on terror the system spreads more terror, with the war on drugs they want to cut out the competition so the CIA can sell more drugs, the war on poverty is the war on the poor and on the middle classes bank accounts. The war on crime is the war on those who compete with the government mafia to screw over the workers, or the war on the people who try and appropriate that which is rightfully theirs from capitalist hoarders bent on creating artificial scarcity. There is a common fallacy in the news referring to battlegrounds, or war zones as “Anarchy,” when it is in fact the direct result of highly organized militaries and governments coming into clash, yes unexpected things result but it stems from hierarchical organizations trying to impose their will on others, which is the exact opposite of Anarchism. Through the manipulation of the media today the average person does not even realize Anarchism is a political philosophy and one with many schools of thought that are clearly defined and in great detail for anyone who cares to learn.

People don't realize that Anarchism is about egalitarianism and mutual understanding and so Anarchists are that much easier to demonize, why would anyone want to read a book on Anarchy if the only way they know the word is in association with violence and stupidity. Its quite possible that for Anarchism to have appeal to the working class again, it will have to change its name and present itself as something new to the masses, peoples minds have been so conditioned that in order to decondition them, in some ways we have to learn “public relations” tactics to teach them to reject public relations, or at least learn the enemies methods so that we can properly counter them. This is frustrating to say the least and it is a sure sign that Anarchists are not doing an adequate job of educating people, despite having all the information and evidence on their side.

Another trick of the media is of course to outright lie, or present flawed and spurious logic, a good example of this is when they want to institute some draconian measure like the patriot act, they will say something ridiculous like “if you are innocent you have nothing to fear.” This totally ignores the possibility that the government is not trust worthy, it also insinuates that the only people the government goes after deserve it, which given how many innocent people are in prison is absolute bullshit. People can be held without trial, or even without charges so whether or not a person is innocent or guilty never even really comes up, and yet no one is supposed to worry about this, and what's really scary is how little people actually do worry when the government demands more power. As the government in the media will never really be criticized outside of spurious partisan politics like too much social spending for the poor, anyone who questions the divine right of the state to do what it wants must therefore be a criminal or terrorist. This blatant propaganda which should be obvious to everyone is surprisingly effective and one of their primary means of establishing power, when you are raised in an environment of authoritarian memes, then its so common most do not even notice it, let alone question it. The media clearly will ignore the real issue and instead attack the person who questions them, this kind of statement basically says the government is legitimate, because a small percentage of people voted for it, (as most Americans don't vote) even when it does horrible things, it makes the law therefore anyone who disagrees, all people who hate this government and anything it does are evil. The argument of the media that the people have the power in this government is never really questioned, even though given the economic system, the lack of diversity in people running, and the mechanisms of the government which destroy accountability mean that any government, no matter how wonderful the leader, is completely hostile to freedom and the people.

Another example of this is calling anyone who objects to war unpatriotic, or that they "aren't supporting the troops" because they desire peace instead of an unjust war. There is no real objective news, because if there was then that information would be such a shock to the average person, that it would cause all kinds of disruption and really, if people had the real information then there would be a revolution. People don't get such information on TV and assume that it is correct because TV says its always correct and while aspects of the news are definitely true in a skewed way, people do not seek out any other sources of information. Anyone who was informed and dedicated enough to tell the truth on the news would not be hired in the first place, because the news is run for profit, as entertainment and the truth is not profitable to corrupt corporations or the sponsors of the media. This all seems so obvious and yet it works on the vast majority of people at least to some degree, the lies are so pervasive, so overwhelming I am sure that I don't even realize all of the lies and manipulations that are put on there. Lies which are systematically created through scientific studies in psychology in order to "market" the kind of world that is pro fascist.

Judging from all the other kinds of psychological warfare employed by various governments I would not be surprised one bit to find out that they have intentionally tried to create the potential for bad trips to happen whenever people take psychedelics. By putting out scary memes and urban legends about psychedelics, memes specifically designed to put subconscious associations of psychedelics with bad trips, they do their best to create minds which will fear the experience, or will not take them at all for fear of going "insane." Given the research done by psychiatrists and especially the CIA in their brainwashing experiments, it is clear the government knows what psychedelics do to a fair degree, well enough at least to know that it doesn't create the kind of citizens they want, and so to stop the spread of their use, propaganda is employed to associate the psychedelic experience with terrifying lies and exaggerations. Given the psychological nature of psychedelics, the amplification of awareness of associations, the empowering of memetic influence that can happen, putting out such suggestions is the cause of many bad trips, or at least the culture these authorities have created is so backwards that when the truth really is seen, it is frightening in how alien it is. The famous story of someone jumping out of a window on acid thinking he could fly, was proven to be a lie created by the CIA, told to cover up that they had drugged this man, then pushed him out the window, but this doesn't stop the story from continuing to be used to scare people, or give acid trippers bad ideas. The media has done an excellent job of controlling the awareness of drugs to misinform people and otherwise manipulate them into accepting laws which are totally contrary to what science and even many ex drug law enforcers think is best.

One of the main problems we face is peoples lack of enthusiasm towards speaking up for themselves, for others and their beliefs, we need to infiltrate the media, make our own media, make people more aware of the problems, we need to act as well, but our actions will fall on deaf ears if no one knows what we did or why we did it. We live in a complacent society, it is more then just the English who live in "quiet desperation." The media has used all kinds of social engineering and propaganda techniques in order to control you and everyone else, this is hardly news, but it runs much deeper then people realize and without doing the work of going to other sources of information, no one can see through it all. The government's "authority" rests solely on the confidence of the people who believe that they actually have authority. By acting as if they are always triumphant or victorious, or always in the right, or always working for the good of all they have successfully managed to convince people that teaming up with them will put them on the winning side, when it is these same politicians who create the conflict and the need for sides in the first place. Those in the police force and the military are just the biggest tools who bought into this supposed justified authority, the citizens then believe politicians have power because of all the government employees who do various things, and so everyone follows the herd into believing laws and hierarchy is an immutable reality, common sense and totally obvious. This is something that must be changed, you don't have to take the whole world's load on your shoulder, but saying nothing is as good as consent, breaking the spell of gravitas, or the illusion of authority is the first step to making people take responsibility for themselves. Make your views known to others, do not force them on others, but make others aware of them, this is the very least we can do, if we cannot overcome the shyness, or the fear of confronting people with the problems of the world, then things will never change.

Taking action on the government is important, there must be real progress acted out in physical ways and not just spiritually. Personally, I am a big fan of pranksterism, ideally it should be something that could be seen by many people to make the government look foolish, but if you find one day you have a cold, why not sneeze or wipe some snot on the door handles of your city hall or legislature buildings? That's not quite as effective a means of germ warfare as say giving Natives small pox, but it is much more fun. You could try mailing your shit to some institution you hate, or you could just throw it at the building, fuck letter writing campaigns, people should mail their turds on mass. (bullshit which you state to be returning to them has nice symbolic value as well) You don't have to do grand public displays of rebellion for them to be worth while and fun, and some of the grand displays would certainly be best done anonymously, but the point is doing anything is better than nothing. Pretty much anything that can help to make people more aware, or shake them out of their daily routine is a good thing, we need a variety of tactics but I am a big fan of culture jamming in general. I definitely support things like subversive graffiti, changing advertisements so that they mean the opposite of what was intended by the sponsors, or anything which gets people seeing things from a new perspective.

Fighting injustice is harder than anything I know of, I have not come close to my ambitions, I see inspiration from brave souls, but all too often they are torn up with little to show for it, other than they have clean hearts, they have gone beyond theory and right into direct action. The goal should not be to be a martyr, but we should be prepared for such an eventuality. Change is the means of progress, which can be painful and hard, but is the way of all life, struggle against those who are stuck in their ways, struggle by being active, via energy directed at complacency, for this is the road to real freedom. The revolution is now, it always was, how much we wish to fight and by what means is up to us, but in an interconnected world there is no way to abstain from this war of ideologies. Those who do nothing, help those who destroy, those who choose to stop the insanity, do so at their own risk.

I will try to act in ways that are the most tactically sound, once my arrogance leaves me, once I have the courage to be totally selfless. Speaking is always easier than acting and I have a big mouth, I assume the opportunity for me to strike will happen right when I love life most. Then if I am killed I will start all over again, I just hope I can do something worth while, something lasting. I am caught on a fine line between some notion of not carrying the world on my shoulders and not being able to be happy with myself if I do nothing. I will try to do what I can, but with the way things are going in the world it looks like any direct action will brand me a terrorist and get me locked up in a secret prison never to be heard from again. How far will the oligarchs go to enslave us? As far as we let them.

There is no one in control really, there are oligarchs, conspiracies and plenty of people trying, but no one person or even group of people controls the whole world, there will always be defiance, always be Anarchy even in a totalitarian police state, it is only people who want to surrender their personal responsibility for their own life who think otherwise. I may not convince you Anarchy is for the world, but I can damn well guarantee you will never convince me it's in my best interests to be a tool, a puppet, or a slave.

I feel the best course of action is to try and wake people up but who am I to say such things? Being so young and having done relatively little for the activist community, I cannot be humble enough, as I know full well my own inexperience, yet I know enough to say that one key tactic must be to encourage the regular non activist people to speak out against the state. Even when such people have zero experience, even if they are not exactly Anarchist opinions, we need to encourage dissent in general and get people talking about something other than TV. No doubt the government will lie and use terror tactics to great effect, the only way to fight terror is to face your fears, experience what you were so afraid of, you may go through extreme hardships of all kinds, but in your sacrifice hopefully you will inspire others to do the same.

This will be done by fighting for human rights and the environment, or anything that makes the establishment more Anarchist in nature. Of course the government cannot be reformed enough to be good, and in an Anarchist society there would be no need to fight for higher wages etc as there would be no wages at all, but each battle won helps to empower the masses and demand more for their lives and society. Each battle won makes a truly egalitarian and Anarchist society seem more plausible, and the seeming lack of credibility in the eyes of the average person is one of Anarchism's greatest obstacles in winning support.

As oil runs out and the economy suffers, the failure of the capitalist system will become increasingly obvious to westerners, even those who have no idea how crappy things really are for most of the world. Eventually people will understand that we have made a horrible mistake, what is more these people may even come to understand that they are collectively the main reason things are so crappy. When they begin to suffer as most of the world does, then they will be much more motivated to find solutions, this is no doubt one of the worst ways humanity could learn its history lessons, but as destructive as it will be, it may be the only thing that saves us as a species. (that is if we don't destroy the planet in the mean time) I have had a relatively easy life being a lower class westerner, by my own peoples standards I am pretty poor but I know that I am a down right spoiled bourgeoisie because I have the luxury of eating out of the garbage. I can live better at the bottom here than many people working much harder in poorer countries.

One of the most important things to make people aware of is that contrary to comfortable widespread opinions, developing countries are not poor because of a lack of resources or willing workers, or originally even because of organizational deficiencies. No, these countries are poor because we as westerners have plundered and enslaved their people and imposed puppet regimes all in the name of "development." This is not conspiracy theory this is economics and clearly documented history. We are fed the racist idea that third worlders aren't rich because they aren't as smart or hard working as white people, rather than the fact they simply weren't traditionally as mercilessly blood thirsty and greedy as westerners. Once westerners realize the horrors they themselves have placed on the world, hopefully they will mend their ways, in the mean time basically anything that can steer them in that direction or stop them from continuing is a good thing. But as this kind of knowledge is either ignored or unknown to most westerners, it is no wonder that the troops can be rallied to fight "terrorists" who are fighting to prevent the next puppet from gaining western backed control of their land. For those who do know the truth I ask, how then can we blame the people of the middle east for attacking the puppet masters, rather than the figure heads we install to keep them under control?

Presently in western society those who do not contribute to the capitalist system and so the destruction of all life are generally despised, some even considering the homeless varieties to be sub human. These "wretched" people who are poor and homeless for a variety of reasons often haven't done anything to be hated other than having dared to be seen, or perhaps asking for spare change, but when you live in a world of lies, anyone who reminds you what honesty looks like is offensive. Now some would argue being a beggar is parasitic, but when you are draining an evil society its really not so clear cut, at any rate there are certainly worse things to be, not to mention the homeless who do not pan handle. If homeless people are parasites they are like fleas on the back of a a deranged monster killing whatever it can and not even getting along with its own kind and I don't really see any shame in that. After a life time of work you hate and more less wasting your life, it would no doubt be annoying to see someone who possibly made smarter life choices but is in fact eating out of the garbage. The jealous ego which demands everyone pay attention to it is unwilling to take responsibility, it fights back by creating irrational fear and hatred to justify its own bad decisions of the past. This is the mentality that "I have to suffer, why should they get to avoid it?" It never occurs to them they chose to suffer and this is no doubt greatly amplified if you believe in this capitalist society, but still haven't figured out why you are so miserable in it.

Personally I feel safer around homeless alcoholics and addicts then I do around the average young suburban model worker, never mind the police. The average bourgeois could easily be called a predator, being at least usually socially dishonest with themselves and others, as well as generally only being motivated by self interest and a plethora of neurosis. These people see it as their right to grab as much merchandise and use as much resources as possible without any thought for the environment or other people in the world, in fact the unbarred aspiration towards materialism is often considered perhaps the highest good and even morality. We must ask ourselves does a predator who destroys the entire environment have a right to look down upon what they perceive to be a parasite? Even if you create a lot of jobs through your work, most jobs only create more devastation, more enslavement, more taxes for the government and more profit for the bank that holds your money. What is wrong or shameful with being a scavenger when making a living picking up cans to recycle is good for the environment and exploits no one? This is precisely the morality that has created the modern world, believe whatever our capitalist overlords tell us, so long as we get those two weeks vacation each year.

The wretched are caught in the precarious position of being despised for being too honest to sell their soul for an hourly wage. Instead they have decided to pick up cans or sit with their hearts on the sidewalk which is then stepped on by most people who walk by. It is possible to find some socially responsible work, but for the most part it is few and far between and by contributing to the economy and buying needless things, we may very well be causing more harm than good. Due to this reality the "wretched," by which I mean people who extricate themselves from the system, may have good intentions but are unable to work, others are so emotionally crippled by society they turn to drugs like alcohol. Everyone has a choice and there are people on the streets who have done bad things, but perhaps we should question what is so bad in our society that anyone would choose to be that way?

Children are forced to drink Coca Cola in some places because the water is no longer clean due to industrial waste, every day multiple species go extinct due to among other things deforestation, yet we are told this is the best way things could be. Is there any doubt why we are told that this system is the best by those who use it to exploit us? For some reason most people don't seem to see a conflict of interest, or a flaw in the logic of trusting such people. Soon they will want to make vitamins illegal and vitamin C can't be called a cure for scurvy because vitamins aren't defined as medicine. We live in an insane world where more often than not the worst of us lead. There seems to be no limit to the depths that governments will stoop to because it's very function is to dig us deeper into a pit of misery and depravity. I don't know what it will take to break the mass psychosis, perhaps the wide spread famine that is coming will do it, but by that time the governments will have technology that will make revolution much more difficult then anything people have ever had to face throughout history. The next 20-50 years will be the most critical time our species has ever had and will decide most of our fate from that time on.

Whether or not we will ever succeed in creating global Anarchism is hard to say, but as long as people have free will there will always be a desire for it somewhere in the heart of humanity. Whether or not anyone else agrees with Anarchist ideas, or even if it is not practical for the world, it is right for me and although I believe it is right for you, luckily my views show that not everyone has to be the same. The question becomes how do you really want to live your life? What is more important, consumer slavery, or freedom? What excuses do you have for not living your dreams? How long will you accept these excuses? Freedom is paradoxically a big responsibility, one which is apparently too daunting for a lot of people, but then people have lost sight of what freedom really means.

So it is that we give up our lives willingly, the oligarchs have used the concept of using our own wills against us so that we create a sick world in their favour. This is done magically and mundanely, they have created a mirror world where destruction, oppression and greed are all highly valued on almost all levels of society. We are trapped by the idea that fixing the problem should be avoided because in the short term it will be a more unpleasant than the problem currently is, though the problem is always getting worse and harder to change. We would rather have cow pastures for big macs and wood for disposable coffee cups than have rainforests, everything is expendable for the instant gratification of our disposable culture, do we believe we have a disposable world? It seems only when the mess is in our face with nowhere else to mess up will we clean it up, to me I think we should make sure we have something worth cleaning up for right now.

I grew up right by the heroin and discount beer capital of the country. Once out of high school I moved to the Satanist capital of north America, I am also couple of hours away from what has been at times the murder capital of North America. So it is now more apparent why I chose this area of the world to incarnate. Forget the hawks and doves I am a crow and there are far too many hungry vultures feasting on the corpses of sheep. The real war is memetic, for control of the cultural mind, the enemy is perhaps the oldest meme remembered, the meme of destroying other memes than your own. The contradiction becomes apparent, how do we stop the meme of destroying memes without destroying it and so become the devil we mean to fight? The only way is to outgrow it, the only way to do that is to make others aware of what it really is. Something starts out as an idea either true or not but then becomes the reality. Get enough people to buy into something and you can do anything, build the pyramids or destroy their own means of life support in the name of making it appear more comfortable. Forest's are being burned to make way for beef but don't worry, we wont make you think by putting that in the commercial.

TV is one big infomercial not just for consumer products but consumer society. We are the delusional fool on the hypnotists stage making asses of ourselves for the amusements of those we do not even perceive. This is beyond Machiavelli, Neo Conservatism, or Neo Liberalism this is the self perpetuating self referencing disconnected cancer as old as our records. The far right, especially the evangelical Christians have declared open culture war, we must make it total war and destroy their most cherished notions of self, spirit, and society, we will do this through art and education and unlike them, we will make people want to join us, rather than try and force them to join us. Polarization is building, things are getting better but the rate at which the destruction is growing is also growing and it has a long head start on activists.

Without the ability to create our own realities we are literally powerless, this fear of responsibility is the source of our drudgery and misery. You can help, you can spread a love of action, you can give an example of adventurous life, you can help make others free by showing them your freedom. Teach simple magick to others and show them to not wait to make their lives worth living, if they are ready they will do the rest. Even if you always fail if you still live free you will never lose. We need more art that transforms everyone into the artists they all truly are. The Earth is dying but it created us for a reason, but right now we are infantile and selfish, we have lost sight of the supposed logic behind wanting to be logical.

Our reasoning of global suicide has become an addiction and we pursue it with a zealotry more wide spread than any other habit, and no one is willing to own up to this addiction. The way they control people is tricking them into thinking they always controlled them, we must break that spell. Unless people wake up now a physical war will be coming that will be more horrible than all previous wars put together. Maybe we need a new tactic other than handing out paper fliers about deforestation. Whatever you do, don't fear death but love your life. The cultural war is now whether you like it or not, reticence means your death, inaction means your death, your only hope, to spread sanity in whatever way you can. Expand the cultural psychological and magickal vocabulary. Break out of your shell, do not brood in your shy moody romanticism or get crabby from a slight to your sensitivity, feel your emotions, your compassion and rise up with the strength of a devoted mother defending her young, for you must defend all children of the future. Be still in your mindfulness and then act. How deep can you see? Don't stop learning or growing, don't stop doing what you think is best, just do something, even if it seems like nothing. How many lists of atrocities do people need before they act? You can swim through my echolalia.

A two party system is fifty percent tyranny at best, how any one could think that a choice between two people is real democracy is bewildering to me, not that countries with many different parties are all that democratic, but to think that you are free because you are given the choice of two different flavors of shit is ridiculous. How is what should be blatant simple common sense be so absent from the common people? Ignorance runs rampant in the cities paved with blood. Naive people work their jobs and believe that those with power, who control the vast majority of the wealth would not employ dishonest means of ensuring their oligarchy survives.

So how will the revolution come? A chorus of people standing together each singing their own tune in unison, a melody so beautiful it draws in more and more until all people sing together in a massive crescendo that we are free!? Well I am not going to say one way or the other, but at this stage of things, expression is key, all those who yearn to act but fear to do so must know that they are not alone, their will be no solos in this chorus, though we may each sing different words. No matter how hopeless it may seem, it must always be known that there are always those who remain with hope, who will act, and who will never succumb to the lies and injustice that permeate our culture. Inspiration to disband all nations will come from the art and actions of those who believe we can achieve amazing things. One thing I can say for certain, a message of change will never be spread if only the choir ever hear the song, but I am not a big fan of preaching, at least that's what I tell myself.

All too often people ask the question "what can I do? I am only one person" "How can I get involved?" This shows just how ignorant people are in that there is far from a shortage of ways in which people can make the world a better place. People should pick which cause or causes they feel most passionately about, environmentalism, feminism, worker's or human rights etc and learn what they can. Then they should learn to get in touch with people who are already working in these fields because despite what they may think, they are not "just one person," they are one person who could be part of a group around the world dedicated to making the things better. There is all kinds of activist and volunteer work to be done and if there are no groups in your area then what you can do is START ONE! It doesn't have to be anything too complicated and if you arrange it in an Anarchist fashion then you will not be solely responsible for things once others join you, everyone will share the work, all it takes is initiative and dedication. Unfortunately what most people want to hear is that what can be done is outside of their ability so they can justify doing nothing like they would really want to. (This is a big problem in the conspiracy theorist culture)

Even if you do not become a full time activist you can help to make others more aware, you can create art of some kind, you can talk to people, you can learn more and you can do any number of small things. Planting guerrilla gardens or at the very least trying to reduce your environmental impact is very important, but you could start growing hemp or go around like Johnny Appleseed planting great plants everywhere you go. We all have to get off the grid and stop supporting the system that is killing and enslaving everything and so anything you can do to promote that helps. Anything is better then doing nothing. You could be nice to the homeless and make them feel human, you could spark a conversation with a stranger on the bus, you could live your life to the fullest and encourage others to do so, you could stop feeling apathetic, you could think of new ways for people to get active. You could start a radical publishing company, you could otherwise make art to spread propaganda and you could organize a co-op to build up Anarchist infrastructure. While quitting your job and dumpster diving and otherwise getting off the grid will not bring about any kind of mass Anarchism, it is a great place to start for the individual and from there a person can learn to contribute in the way they are most willing and effective.

What the revolution could really use is people that start thinking for themselves and who learn how to make things better in their own way, so, what you can do is stop depending on others to tell you what to do. What you can do is learn how to become an organizer of activism yourself, learn to take responsibility for things and learn to give up aspects of your life that do not really do anyone any good. Unfortunately there is no sure fire direct way of making everything better, there is only a lot of little things which will take a whole lot of work from a whole lot of people, but although most are not doing much it is important to not get discouraged or go to the majority simply because that lifestyle is easier or seems to be in triumph.

Whatever tactic an Anarchist chooses in spreading the word and freeing minds, one thing is certain, they have their work cut out for them, but one thing that is important, that they do not wait for some grand social movement or revolution. If you cannot be part of a massive world wide uprising right now (even though millions are struggling for freedom right now) then work on smaller things in your community, there is no single objective point that can be accomplished through one obvious tactic. Do what you can when you can, if all that is is picking up cans and volunteering at the homeless shelter once in awhile, then that is far better than doing nothing and griping that there is no grand movement, you will meet like minded people as you go along and will be able to form new strategies. The revolution will not be led by a few leaders or a situation where all we have to do is just wait for orders, no it will be a revolution composed entirely of individuals who work together, in the mean time doing whatever they can at a local level to start freeing people and getting them to work together. Although people have been lied to and mislead their whole lives, this is not to say people are unable to understand the truth, or even that anyone is better than anyone else, we simply have to get past their fears and guilt, their neurosis that keep them in servitude to those who have domesticated them like livestock.

The tendency for cults of personality is no doubt one of the greatest threats to Anarchism, when we look to authorities to rule us, no matter how charismatic, good hearted or skilled we shut off our own growth and sensibilities in surrender to them. Look not to authors for how to think, but to all people for information which you can use to make up your own mind. This isn't to say we shouldn't take advice from people or find mutually agreeable circumstances, but that no personality is worth the side effects inherent in looking up to someone and this is especially true of religious figures. When we depend on leaders, even artistic, cultural or philosophical, we stifle ourselves and do not develop our own abilities. If someone has a cult of personality and then presents themselves in the media, many people will often surrender their rationality and ignore things they know to be true because of some loyalty to this person, or simply because they have more confidence in the person than themselves. They are also often too lazy to look the subject up themselves from a third party and so for instance, all Occultists become Satanists and all Anarchists become seen as stupid and violent terrorists. Many of us think we are skeptical but we are not, even those who are relatively skeptical are often bias and complacent to their skeptic authorities, so the more I learn the more I realize how little anyone knows.

Political theories often fail in that they do not inspire the people to live up to their ideals in everyday life, this is most important in Anarchism, everyday Anarchism is crucial not only to sustaining a proper society, but for getting people aware enough to be in a proper society. I am not a communal or individualist Anarchist in the strictest sense of the term, nor am I a "lifestyle Anarchist," people should be allowed to be individuals or part of a commune as they wish. What's important right now is that those who would be Anarchists do not wait for society to reshape itself, but live in that mode of being right now. Show people how happiness is not only possible outside of consumer ideals, but also much easier to attain in many ways. Someone could know all the political theories of the classic Anarchist thinkers, but if they have not figured out how to be happy and free in everyday life they know nothing about Anarchism, not that their isn't much to be upset about, but happiness is the resistance to these painful realities.

If you lose your sense of humour you are dead, adventure is everywhere and each person must seize it. Being of service to others is important, but showing others how to be free is at least as important as fighting for freedom through intellectual means, it is the practice rather than the theory and actions speak louder than words. For example I once beat both Baron Münchhausen and Don Quixote in a sword fight simultaneously, I find adventure easy to find in the world. It is the Patriarch for the Will of the Flag, who cannot do anything original, tries hard and presents himself as an innovator through clever use of misdirection, but is perhaps only good at managing efficiency within a system, such charlatans are devoid of creativity, they seek life in vain but it eludes them for they are cowards and bullies, hypocrites and scoundrels.

There are many reasons why democracy doesn't work and why people's dream politician will never save them, it is a fact that hierarchy negates equality and competition eventually leads to a winner and this winner gets to control the economy. The inevitable consequences of trying to do "good business" when we have a competition of corporations is a memetic breeding of ruthlessness and ever more aggressive tactics of domination. A government must have secrets from its people so that it can ensure its own survival, it is not in the government's interest to have people well off enough that they can do without it, or the economic system, or that it's people know how they are being screwed over. Politicians must run their campaigns like a business, getting investors to fund them, they are after all making a bid to become the CEO of the country. A country is a business, these days it's much more international than it used to be, but the fact remains the same, each state government is a subsidiary of the global financial system, money is how everything is accomplished in our world and those who have it have the power. It is the law for corporate executives to maximize profits, just as capitalist citizens demand wealth at the expense of the environment and other countries, competition means losers and few are willing to give up being the winners. A CEO board meeting, or a government meeting is essentially indistinguishable from a conspiracy, it is a meeting behind closed doors to try and gain as much power as possible for those involved in the competition of might making right.

If a government were to be even half honest it would be destroyed by its own people, it would set the third world free and so fail to provide the standard of living demanded by the brainwashed bourgeois, who are so delusional they probably wouldn't believe the truth if they heard it. Manufactured goods would become too expensive for most people if the slaves of western peoples were paid a fair amount for their labour and since manufacturing has been so completely outsourced, it would dramatically lower the standard of living here. Capitalism ensures that governments must be imperialistic, expansive and merciless to provide voters with what they want and in America any thought of the environment or the poor is deemed a communist plot. There would be riots in the streets if governments were honest because people have no idea how much is dependent on the illusionary lies that selfish and ignorant people believe in. It is after all a much nicer reality to believe that there are plenty of resources for everyone if only those "lazy" third worlders would do the work. People still do not seem to get the message, because they are overwhelmed by a unified media message that has vested interests in the status quo. This "mythopoetic leadership" culture of capitalist lies is so prevalent, so deeply ingrained into peoples consciousness it doesn't matter that there is endless evidence that governments don't work, so long as the west has a strong military and a happy base of slaves to maintain and fight in that military, then the oligarchs are free to do whatever they want. I am not one of those Anarchists who believes humanity is inherently "good" as I do not believe in "good" or "evil" but I do believe we have a natural tendency to symbiotic Anarchism, tens of thousands of years of tribal living and Peter Kropotkin's book "Mutual Aid: A Factor Of Evolution" show this is the case quite definitely. However, humans also naturally adapt to their environment and tend to take on the memes they are raised with and since the bourgeois people of today are so filled with authoritarian memes it is going to be a real trick to break them out of it. Because open global dictatorship is a very real possibility in the future, Anarchists must insure that no matter how corrupt things get we can covertly subvert society through spreading our memes.

It is not in the emotionally safe zone for common westerners to learn about what is really going on and how much they are personally responsible for the problems of the world. It is much easier to shrug it off and say “well all things are made in sweatshops so I will go and buy things at Walmart” or “that's just how the system works, there's nothing I can do so I might as well not even try.” This “morality” of consumerism is basically saying “everyone else is doing horrible things and I don't feel like spending my life trying to help others when it means I won't get to think only of myself, my neighbours get to do bad things and why should they have all the fun?” This is pretty much saying, “it's too late we are all fucked and evil rules the world, I might as well try to outdo everyone else in my materialism because that is the best way to make friends and get laid!” The myth of capitalism claims that one day these “developing” countries will be OK, that sweatshops are just the price of this transition, but when countries owe more than they can possibly pay off to the world bank, then they only fall deeper in to debt as interest adds up, the only profits of production go to foreign corporate overlords more powerful than many countries. The simple fact is there isn't enough resources for everyone to be “developed” and attempting it is suicide, the result of con job by psychopaths. These people have somehow managed to turn enslavement, murder, ecological genocide and the mass dumbing down of society into a good thing. The nihilism of the west is the subconscious guilt for the banalization of life and pursuit of greed at the cost of what it means to be human, the only solution most people seem to see is to do more and more of what is causing the problem in the first place.

Countries are corporations and even if you believe in the idea of people working only for themselves as the only fair economic system, through capitalism we invariably go to a plutocracy. Capitalism and especially indentured servitude robs the masses of any real ability to “pull themselves up by their bootstraps,” in reality the economics of this idea are about as effective as if you were trying pulling yourself up in this way literally by your bootstraps, it simply doesn't work. How such idiocy has been taken in as effective or even sane and rational is beyond me, the theories of capitalism have shown over and over that they do not spread equality. Though capitalism may create goods and services, it does not create happiness, sustainability, community, or social justice, in fact these are its prime enemies, all of which are contrary to the principles of competition and the need for endless consumption. More products are created, but only because there constantly needs to be more customers for endless growth, but there also needs to be new people to be exploited, and an endless amount of resources to draw from and so this religion of greed is sadistic domination incarnate. Wealth in capitalism can only be acquired at the expense of others, we live in a finite world, those who have wealth get it from exploiting others, there are no good billionaires, a good person would not hoard so much money. Money talks and those who have it, have the governing power, which is by definition inherently against the idea of democracy. The very state of being in power leads to delusions of grandeur, how can anyone who rules over people not eventually start to see themselves as better or at least more justified to rule than others? How can any boss really have respect for those who it is their duty to dominate?

History repeats itself to those who do not learn its lessons, in this way we can see that the “conservative” “realist” who demands that everything must stay the same because that is the way it has been for some historic period, are the people who are content to keep repeating old mistakes because they are familiar. The idea that Anarchism is a pipe dream because “it will never happen” is the kind of thought that shows that they have failed the lessons of history, not just because it ignores the successful Anarchist communities throughout history, but because it ignores the fact that history shows that change is inevitable, that our current world is the result of repeating old mistakes. No matter how long we tell ourselves this civilization is the best it will ever get, it will never really fulfil our needs as humans because it is contrary to our true selves. This doesn't mean all change is beneficial, all too many revolutions have gone sour, but this is because of the reactionary “realist” impulse within each human involved, the one that says “our new regime is justified in compromising its principles, we are justified in becoming dictators, it's a scary world out there and only we can lead our people." It's the "realist" who believes in the tradition, that since its old with a long track record of eventually failing, it's more real than the new and untested and this is the kind of person that thinks leaders are better than everyone else and have the right to all kinds of things the masses don't.

All of us have idealist and realist impulses in us, the idealist is always the one that pushes for improvement, the "realist" which is always fear based is the one which is responsible for entropy and neither are necessarily based on the actual environment. Idealist impulses may have started the revolutions that failed, but it was the "realist," right here and now, traditional attitude that has compromised the social movements throughout history. Change will always come, those who call themselves "realists" are often actually people with no grasp of reality, they are simply clinging to their own vested interests and mistaking that transient situation for reality, but that reality is an illusion, it is wishful thinking of a few reactionaries who want to force the world to fit into a tiny box with them where they are comfortable. As Anarchy is ongoing and constant as free will, it is the real reality, we just have to make sure reactionary impulses posing as realism don't change it to a new form of crap. Anarchism is the only view point which sees reality, the realism that change is inevitable, that impermanence is constant, that we choose what we do and what we make this world, that so long as it is done in an Anarchist way, the reactionary impulse will only effect those who want it.

Anarchism shows humans are capable of adapting and becoming all kinds of people, that we are not naturally sadistic and greedy, that there have been successful altruism based societies and that for over a hundred thousand years a basic form of Anarchism was realism, was tradition and was the only realistic way of living as a human being. Anarchism allows the most flexibility in dealing with these changes and also offers the greatest level of change to society, any plan that does not allow for the dynamic of change and unexpected events will always eventually crumble. The "realists" are in fact the delusional ones who think that things will never change, they are the ones who say an Anarchist is naive for thinking people could work together, when it is they who are naive for thinking that any ruler could be trusted or that any society can exist for long when it demands infighting, competition and exalts personal greed above all else.

If we are to ever learn the lessons of history then we must overcome the idea that things will never change and are the best they can get, if all people always believed this, we would still be in the dark ages being ruled by overt monarchies and the Catholic church. For all the problems of the modern world there have been some improvements, things do change and will always change, we can always do better, we should not be swept away with utopian ideals in that there will always be problems with humanity, but we still need to strive to much better things then what we have. I am not talking about economic or technological progress, I am talking about real progress, humanity living together peacefully, pluralistically, compassionately and in harmony with nature. It is possible to create a happy world and it is a damn fearful idiot who thinks otherwise, who thinks making the world worse is the only course of action because they don't even want to consider other options. What is there to fear that does not already exist for humanity from the pursuit of "realist" "progress," those who say otherwise are either cowards or have something to gain from keeping things as they are, you may not be an Anarchist, but any fool can see there is lots of room for improvement in the world.

This label of "realist" is really just an authoritarian ploy to separate the top of the hierarchy from the bottom, to dismiss anything counter to the authorities delusional view on "reality," it is a word that means some people know the one true reality and everyone else is wrong. The greatest misuse of strategy, the greatest example of a warped attempt to fulfil a goal is the idea of hierarchies and governments, the relying on these authorities to tell you that you cannot be trusted to know how to live without them. Whether or not you are convinced Anarchism can work on a global or "national" scale, if you seriously believe that you are so infantile, so stupid or so naive that you believe "authorities" when they say they are justified in telling you what to do with your life, then for all intents and purposes they are presently right. If you are in such desperate need of an authority to tell you what to think, then listen to the “authorities” who have truly lived life to the fullest and they will tell you that you must learn to rely on yourself, to know yourself, to think for yourself and question all authority. I do not mean to set myself up as such an authority, but all my life experience has shown me that personal growth is crucial to a worthwhile life and that growth is to a large part dependent on personal responsibility, which is to say you are the only person capable of determining what is right for you, to believe otherwise is to kill some part of yourself and your life.

Who are the authorities? Surely it is more than likely a good idea to pay attention to what your doctor says, or if a fireman wants to lead you out of a burning building, as Bakunin would say you can trust a shoemaker to know about making shoes and these are all fine people to take advice from in their respective fields, but who could really tell other people how to live? With the examples I gave the people have some experience and technical knowledge which you do not, but if you are relying on others to tell you how to live, it is saying you are not alive and know nothing of life. Certainly people as morally bankrupt as politicians are not fit to give advice to anyone, certainly some philosophers have some good insights on the subject, after all that is what they spend their lives trying to figure out, but no philosopher, no spiritual teacher and certainly no politician could possibly know you better than yourself, not even your parents could be said to know you better than yourself. Although your parents may have some good insights into life, there is inevitably some things, at some point in life where everyone needs to separate from them. While some politicians may have good intentions or even some good ideas, the idea that anyone should be given any more credence than a friend giving advice, that someone can be trusted to represent the peoples interests is complete lunacy and results from a lack of personal responsibility. Humans are much too complex for any group of people to rule over and say what is best for all, there are always exceptions to rules, yet with authoritarian systems people may have their lives ruined because they are forced by police to conform, not to mention the sheer audacity and megalomania inherent in government.

There are currently dangerous people in the world, that is true, these people seem to think they have the authority to murder other people in the streets and take from them whatever they want. This is also an authority that must be abolished, but in practice the gangster on the street is the same as the gangster in the government building, the key difference is the government is much more effective at terrorizing others. To compromise on this is to open the flood gates of would be authorities telling you it is in your best interest to be a slave and to not question them, that it is in your best interest that you send your children off to war to fight people who only want the same things as you, peace. Everyone's point of view is valid in some way, even if it is based on incorrect facts, but to say that government leaders and managers of corporations are worthy of their present lifestyles is sickening, no level of education or even work entitles anyone to being a millionaire let alone a billionaire. Even if a doctor were able to work constantly without breaks for years at a time, as noble and amazing and helpful as that would be, it would be sickeningly wrong to allow that person millions of dollars within the current economic reality, since the hoarding of wealth by the few means great lack for others. If a doctor who worked that much is not entitled to it, then a corporate CEO who happened to be clever and conniving enough to sell people some product is certainly not worthy of the money they make. This is made even more clear when you realize the managers of industry do not even produce anything themselves, their sole purpose is to act as a middle man to separate people from their money. Yet these people whom it would be generous to describe as greedy ruthless pain mongering parasitic con artists, are actually looked upon by society as role models and pillars of the community, as people to which we should basically all strive to become.

The single most important engine of western civilization is the technology created by the war industry, fuelled by borrowed currency from international bankers driving the economy of a million spin off products and creating the underlying form of our societies psyche as shown within the media. We have modelled our whole lives around carefully contrived roles designed to eliminate all genuine spontaneity, adventurousness and general thought. Passion has been replaced by hollow images of freedom which keep us forever searching how to go faster as we careen off a cliff. We are told what to think and what to do before we can even talk and are prescribed whole lives to live. Consumption of products is a religion, the only hope of most people for a happy life, yet here we are in a world of alienated depressed souls seeking community, but being ostracized if we do not seek that which destroys community.

Those who live in their own way are sometimes admired for their honesty but all too often they are corrupted and if not demonized as deviants, those who never capitulate and who make a big noise are often killed or at best ignored. The truth is most people do not currently care about the truth, otherwise they wouldn't let so many of the real people be assassinated or imprisoned, denial is too comfortable, especially when the truth has been shut up. Why does anyone need TV or movies or even the written word to know who to be? Has all individual rationality been stunted in the name of being comfortable? What is worse is people often honestly believe themselves to be themselves, to be individuals when they simply have been raised to think that and to be distracted from any in depth introspection. No person can tell you what you don't want to hear, so where do your values lie? Express, Express! But say what you really mean and really know what you stand for, we must spread a love of the search for truth if we are to ever get anyone to listen to what the truth of Anarchy is.

Listen and learn with an open mind, but know that there's always more sides to the story. The more ruthless you are in your search for truth, the more you see the truth and the more repugnant illusion seems, for as long as horrible truth is ignored and denied, the longer it takes to be rectified. As the Gnostics understood, there is no such thing as "sin" as religious people today understand it, only ignorant actions and we have acted as an immature race for too long, repeating our mistakes in wilful ignorance. We have surrendered our lives for the idle promise of distant perfection that will never be satisfied beyond the moment, we know more about celebrities than we know about ourselves and we have forsaken the ability to define ourselves outside the narrow categories created for us. I say "us" because we are all responsible, we are all human, we are all united, even with those who would try to rule us. We are one and this apparent separateness is just our collective way of sorting out who this divine unity is and unfortunately growing our self awareness means facing painful realities.

We think we are ourselves but we aren't, we are a hodge podge amalgamation of stolen ideas from which ever culture we gravitate to. The choice to choose which subculture memes to attach to ourselves is controlled by those supplying the overall flow, they ensure any serious revolutionary potential is either made into a commodity until its deemed worthless, or it is ridiculed as outrageous lies and blasphemy. It is possible to think for yourself and some people do it, most people do it at least a little in some part of their life, but for those who are not vigilant in their minds it is easy to be led down many dead ends, all the while telling yourself it's you who is making the choices. Without gaining information from outside the mainstream how can anyone have an overall view of things that would allow them to make the right decisions? It is hard to be on the losing side so most who glimpse the truth go back to the mainstream, anyone can see that everyone is clueless, otherwise everything wouldn't be so messed up.

For some reason people believe you can trust a government to run an election that will put it out of business, the changing of figure heads supposedly means great change in policy, but government and business are one and the same. The threat of losing an election which can be rigged, is no safeguard at all when all the parties are run by the same people, there is no real choice. Since military and police force has repeatedly been used by the authorities to terrorize the people into submission to private interests, even at it's best capitalism is more fundamental to western society than democracy. Those who run the economy run the government, and those who have the most money are not accountable to the public, so the real authorities are those who control the money. It seems common sense to me that politicians if they exist at all (which they shouldn't) should be tried for treason if they lie or break promises and they should also live among those in the lowest standard of living within the state, of course due to the nature of the system this would mean that all politicians should be tried for treason.

Through the creation of the illusion of democracy the people's free will has been harnessed into abolishing Anarchy, we have traded Anarchy for the illusion of representation and so consented to tyranny. They promised us freedom as if it was something that could be given from one person to another, rather than realized within each individual and in this misconception they have tricked us into surrendering all of our own power. This herd mentality of waiting for others to lead you has been carefully studied by the authorities, and really all they are authorities on, is how to manipulate the masses, their job is not to ensure equality or freedom, but to control and maintain the status quo, that is their sole function. Meanwhile the "captains of industry" are authorities at amassing wealth for themselves at the expense of everyone else. In this way a "legitimate" form of robbery and extortion has been institutionalized and implemented across the world, but the real insidious genius of this, was to convince the people that this despotism was for their own good. Humanities only hope is to rid itself of these illusions, if we do not, we will either destroy ourselves, or make a world not worth living in. Those who wait for revolution never see this and so never free themselves, those who live in accordance with this have already won the revolution for control of themselves, all that remains is the spreading of awareness that others can choose the same. So what do you want to do?

Incremental Insanity

We are here.

Where food goes to the garbage instead of to those who starve,
Where that dumpster is locked to keep out those outside the system.

Where it can be against the law to eat this garbage,

We live where a scavenger who harms no one, who reduces waste and filth is looked down upon,
Where those who plunder, destroy and enslave are revered as most "successful"

We forgot logic exists to maximize positive emotion,

We have overridden what makes us most human in the name of "progress"

When the rational products do not satisfy our needs and in fact serve to further isolate us,

We take it as a sign we need more stuff.

Growing cycles of confusion escalating to madness.

We seek out endless economic growth in the name of some unknown utopia and so the wealth will always be at the top,

There will never be redistribution as long as there is growth and so the whole of the system depends on what is keeping it from its supposed goal.

The more imposed order there is, the more disruption there becomes, the result of some kind of ironic sadomasochistic megalomania.

The oligarchs follow the method of Problem, Reaction, Solution,

Quietly causing a problem, we react, and they present us with a solution, to which we eagerly consent.

The answer is always that we lose more freedom, which makes it that much easier for them to do it next time.

Freedom isn't free in a plutocracy, but it is something we give up for nothing.

Here, to be an activist without much money, you must be willing to sacrifice freedom or even your life in order to win some of the smallest battles and so most are kept complacent.

The masses think they'll wait till its "really" important, or when it effects them directly,

But domination is achieved so gradually most never make a stand,

If you can hold your ground you will see how much they really bluff, at least now while they still have to pretend to be responsible.

When it comes to make real change you will see, we are not free,

No revolution can ferment when they use incremental insanity.

Chapter 8 - Wonderful

I have been working with the plant allies more often now, Hawaiian Baby Woodrose seeds filled with LSA have a strong spirit, it has shown me many things about myself. To use entheogens we must have the courage and patience to face our fears willingly and with strength, to put our head in the mouth of a lion and through detachment accept whatever might happen so that we can learn self control. We must find the universal spirit of all things and tame the lion inside us which is red with anger, if we take the plant spirits help we can generate this “theos” within and then we can dive even into the pits of hell like a spiritual sun, breathing in the sulphur and accepting all adversity all while knowing complete peace and unity. Then you can make the power of a lion your own, by learning to radiate loyalty, generosity and warmth your creative passion can overcome the dramatic arrogance and pride of any authoritarian or selfish tendencies. Working with these plant spirits has given me a whole new view of the world and given me a lot more hope for humanity, with the right intentions and used in the right way they can potentially help all of us to become better people. From such practices I feel myself growing more capable of handling the truth, of making my way in the world without succumbing to manipulations, assumptions and bias, old subtle hang ups and methods of self sabotage have been overcome and I owe it to the plant spirits.

I had my birthday and I am now 21 years old, its a weird thought to me, its made me reevaluate where I am in life and where I am going as I orbit round the sun once more. Although I feel alienated from humanity, in many ways the plant spirits have taught me that I should try and reach out to people and connect with them, the problem comes when that means talking to people about things that do not promote ego-maniacal materialist escapism, which is of course the big trend right now. Still these plants have given me hope that they can show people another world, a world which is much more amazing then the latest video games, music and movies and it is clear to me that I am in the process of being birthed into this new world.

Entheogens have helped me to see the natural world in a whole new light, to connect with all of nature in a way that is indescribable and amazing and this is coming from someone who always felt an enormous appreciation for nature. Through understanding my connection to all of life I have learned that exploitation of others or the natural world is harming myself in a very real way, I could know this intellectually, but psychedelics provide an experiential awareness of this lesson and it is something that can help to make people wake up to the reality of what we humans are doing to this planet. Society can become healthier, if it is willing to take its medicine, which definitely doesn't always taste good or sit well, but which can heal us if we are willing to follow the healers directions. Anyone can have mind blowing awe inspiring explorations into the unknown through the use of entheogens, you too can see new worlds, all it takes is the courage and strength to take responsibility for this world. Once you see the clear light, the inner light of all things, humanities creations are drab and crude to the extreme, evolution isn't about domination of one species over others, but equilibrium within the ecosystem, symbiosis of all species for group advancement of all life, those who break the sacred balance, destroy themselves, as well as destroy their food and habitat.

Freaks of Nature

I talk to the spirits of the Earth and they hear my name,
Together our tears flow as rivers and we howl as the wind,
In each others arms we dance like a storm and beam a warmth that only the fires of the sun can project.
The hunt of the night through the trees of dark, meet at a point to form a gate to the other world,
A whole in a mound, to the inner land unseen,
The good folk will always oppose the destruction of humanity.
There is life in the spray of the sea and in the heart of stone.
When you eat the food from land of the fey,
A magical view of the world beyond will continue to stay
But do not touch the ground, or you will grow so old.
Speaking of humans we do not understand,
We build cities full of buildings but still we do not know our home.
Each day that they continue our honour becomes more scarce,
Each day that we continue our greed and cowardice grow strong
Every day cold blooded killers loving those who they are like with as much compassion and tenderness as anyone.
To be denied that which is true within us is to lose everything and be convinced that living in sommambulism is for the good.
Watering the ground of our mother with my tears, the battle for existence continues, those who fight for life, to raise consciousness and to cultivate wild truth, and those who fight for nothing but death.
The Terran family of species works as an Alchemical process to distill awareness to a purity currently unknown.
Remember your ancestors, those who honoured the forces that let us thrive, who lived with the spirits of the Earth and looked to their future descendents as children they owed the world to.
Now is the time to make them proud, remember our connection to all things, we belong to this world and not the reverse.
Doom brings a promise to us all if we continue to invite it into our lives, to deny nature is to deny that which makes us human, makes us alive.
Druids and Vitki, Shamans and medicine men, the battle for the soul of the world will continue whether or not it is fashionable to acknowledge it.

One thing that must be made clear, the use of entheogens is not something that is going to be enjoyable or even useful for everyone, however with the proper intentions and preparations it does pose an extremely effective means of understanding the mind and the spiritual realms for those who have that inclination. The conscious mind or ego, is in my experience the part of the mind which we knowingly control, what entheogens can do is to show us parts of our mind or soul which we did not even consciously know existed or at least never put words to and this is because whatever parts of the mind the ego does not control, it blocks out for various reasons such as fear. So, from this we can see that to fully explore the mind we must go where our egos fear, where they have little to no control, this can result in some incredibly uncomfortable experiences, but experiences which if integrated through hard work and further self exploration of a more conventional type, can provide the greatest insights into the nature of self and reality in general. One of the main reasons the world is so messed up, is because people are in denial about their true selves and do not wish to really learn who they are. If you are shown who you are in a way that is out of your control, then no doubt you can become incredibly upset, even worse is that you will have to come back to normal reality and you will not be fooled by other peoples denial so easily.

Entheogens can temporarily take over control of your mind in many ways and strong doses require you submit your will and learn to go with the flow of the experience, this is not easy for many people to do and for anyone who is interested in experiencing an entheogenic state, you must be prepared for this eventuality. The plant spirit or chemical takes over and you will be shown things you may not like, in fact the more you are in denial of something, the more it will put in your face, in many ways it seems the purpose of psychedelics is to present those who take it with the truth of themselves and all too often (especially in materialist cultures) the truth hurts. Once you have learned to go with the flow and learned to seek out the truth of your being, things become much easier. Once you become proficient with some ritual and meditative techniques it does very much become possible to channel the flow of the trip through a highly customized set and setting to the point that eventually, it is possible to enter any kind of reality you want. This however, will take hard work, dedication, perseverance and brutal honesty. In the Occult there is the notion as with scrying that it is not hard to have visions, the trick is to get the visions which match your intention, such as a specific spirit, or a vision pertaining to a question for divination. Ritual allows us to have a certain level of control and yet be open to the flow, open to the Tao and direct it, any fool can take mushrooms and see things, but it is a Shaman who can accomplish their will with the entheogen.

Ritual is an active meditation utilizing the various symbols for the different senses and body positions for the purposes of spiritual progress or fulfilment of a predetermined intention. Ritual is key in having a controlled experience and opening yourself up to the plant spirit, the specific ritual symbolism is not as important as its personal meaning to you, so as to provide the framework for manipulating consciousness, making the most of your time and fulfilling predetermined intentions. In terms of directing an entheogenic trip they work in a way to hypnotize yourself and those participating in to thinking positively about your intentions, or having the kind of experience that is desired, entheogens put people into a highly suggestible state and this can be done much easier than one might first believe, as well as with much greater effect than might first be presumed.

Now just because you are hypnotizing yourself does not mean it is not a valid experience, in fact you will learn your ego is just what you have hypnotized yourself into identifying as, and the regular world as that which society has hypnotized you into seeing. Just because it is similar to hypnotism is not to take away from its validity as the "hallucinations," if they can be called that at all, are in fact a reflection of your own mind and so exist in reality as part of your identity. So then hallucinations and self directed hypnotism can have incredible applications for psychological work, as well as spiritual work and metaphysics. Entheogens open you up to various levels of the astral realm, and while these are in part reflections of your own psyche, so is all of reality, high or not, there is much that will still be foreign and completely alien to anything you thought was a part of you.

Like most things, the more you practice the more you will get out of it, the more you use the same symbols, the more meaningful they will become for you, and the more comfortable your mind will become in using them. If you can visibly see your mind before you, then with visualization and concentration you can learn to manipulate your mind in a way that is almost mechanical. You can also learn to acquire new information from the collective mind or go to specific realms beyond the Earth and learn from and speak with all kinds of various spirits, the possibilities are literally endless. If we can do anything we believe in, then we must learn what are the most functional beliefs to have, the first one is perhaps to learn to believe we can do anything, secondly we must believe we can learn what is best to believe in. What comes third is believing in the power of ritual to focus our intentions in order to believe in various desires coming true, if you can get that far with practice, then you will be well on your way to discovering your hidden self and the subtle truths of existence.

Unfortunately with all the information out there on entheogens there is surprisingly little information of how to go about entheogenic rituals, even less that is within a framework that is put in terms which are significant to "modern" western people. Of course we should study traditional techniques of the people who have been using these plants, often for thousands of years for they are the best sources of information, but the fact remains there are few good books on the subject and most people do not have access to authentic Shaman teachers. I think there would be a lot of benefit from the creation of a comprehensive western style of Shamanism, one which can get past the cultural bias of white people dismissing or misinterpreting Indigenous practices as mere superstition or at best turning it into a New Age product. We need something that is tailored to the particular needs of technological urban and scientific people, put in terms which can address that culture using it's kind of language so that we can heal it of its particular problems and teach it respect for nature. I say this because we are for the most part very different in mindset to Indigenous entheogen users and we live in very different places and it is unrealistic to think a white washed version of Native traditions is as good as the real thing. What's more, many Indigenous Shamans still living a traditional life do not have access to all of the entheogens that are available to westerners, (such as LSD) there is also the fact that Native Americans are not the only people to use entheogens. Indigenous Shamans tend to only have the entheogens that traditionally grew in their area, so at the very least we must incorporate practices from many traditions if we are to use a variety of different kinds of entheogens.

Many beliefs of Native peoples will not have cultural meaning to many westerners, so I believe we need our own tradition and not just a half baked and bastardized cultural appropriation. You cannot fully understand Native spiritual ideas without living like one, preferably being raised as one and so we should be honest with ourselves that we are creating our own new tradition which is applicable to who we are. Consciously creating a new tradition will make it more effective and applicable to more westerners, not to mention more authentic than a contrived work of scholarship. I do not believe culture belongs to any specific race, we are all humans, especially when it comes to working with plants, no one people can monopolize a spiritual practice, but at the same time cultural sensitivity is important. Native Americans have been so robbed, so completely wronged by European peoples that pretending that we understand their spiritual views from reading a few books by other white people, (or even Natives themselves) is to severely reduce their world view to simplistic watered down and hokey, hippie dippy western romanticism. Even though many whites (such as myself) have sincere respect for Native traditions, and I personally think we have much to learn from them, I think it's important that we rely on them to teach us, not white scholars looking through their own cultural lens's. Its also important to get out of the mindset that there is only one way to be a Shaman, or close to nature, that anyone has the one true set of rituals, when Shamans generally don't even have such a concept of orthodoxy among themselves. We need to stop putting Shamanism in terms of dogma and instead think of it as practices which build an individual personal relationship with nature and the cosmos, something that takes as many forms as there is people.

While there is amazing potential I do believe there is an over romanticizing of Shamanism and entheogens within the New Age and hippie communities. Many people do not really understand how varied and even useless the massive umbrella term "Shamanism" really is, this ambiguous term could in many ways even apply to some Christian Cabalist ceremonial magicians and so I should clarify that in the context of this book, I generally mean nature based mystics of tribal communities who use entheogens and generally heal people. (Though they are not always healers) What is important to understand is that very different cultures have very different ideas about their wise people, healers and visionaries and that using such a blanket term can be seen as insulting by some of these cultures as well as very inaccurate, naive and simplistic. For this I apologize sincerely but I am limited in my vocabulary as there is no good word for what I mean, I could say Curandero or Medicine Man, but this is gender specific and in many cases inappropriate and so I hope that it is enough that I show that the word "Shaman" is incredibly vague and a disservice to the complexity of Indigenous spirituality. Native American religions have especially been misrepresented as being homogenous when the truth is various tribes could have spiritual beliefs as different as Christianity is from Hinduism. The word itself is from Tungus tribes of Siberia, but some have argued the etymology of "Shaman" is from the language of Pali, from the word "schamana," a term used in reference to a Buddhist monk (so the “man” part of the word is not a gender specification) but it is also derived from the verb “scha-” meaning "to know," making a Shaman someone who knows, or a Gnostic!

When I say the word “Shaman” it could refer to Africans, or some Asian ethnic groups, Native Americans or really any tribal culture, which is as I alluded very much applicable to European Pagans and many other peoples. Shamanism's association with Native Americans is very much the result of simplistic and racist attitudes in anthropologists who like to think of non institutionalized religions as “primitive,” especially the non Abrahamic religions. The fact that ancient Jews, Gnostics and Sufis all at least at one time likely used entheogens makes the term Shaman even less meaningful and while not as bad as calling them Witch doctors, by looking at these terms it is pretty obvious that anthropologists can be far from unbiased in their descriptions. Cultural appropriation and a lack of understanding, or even genuine intent to thoroughly research these practices, people, and the cultures that produce them lead to very ignorant assumptions and narrow viewpoints that blind us to some very obvious conclusions. For example that Europe has its own “Shamanic” traditions such as Druidism and Seidr and Vitki personages within the Norse religions, not to mention Greek, Roman and eastern European traditions. To me perhaps the most basic definition of a Shaman would be “someone who works with and experiences the spiritual world consciously and with understanding,” and because this is such an ambiguous term it's very susceptible to stereotyping and projected fantasies and cultural bias.

As I said, culture belongs to no race, we are all human, but there is no doubt it is painful for some to see their cherished and beautiful traditions bastardized, misinterpreted and turned into a product. The ignorant romanticism or downright con games of "plastic Shamans" is the ego's attempt to co opt honesty and genuine spiritual awareness and turn it in to a product that can reinforce the dominant system and this is something to be avoided for sure. If you are claiming to represent a tradition, especially for money, you damn well better be trained and accepted by that culture, learning from various traditions is one thing, claiming titles that don't apply to you is another. This is one more reason why I consider myself a Pagan, I can learn from a variety of traditions without misrepresenting myself or claiming to be something that I am not. Although people should beware the New Age Shamans, or gurus in general, it does not mean non Indigenous people cannot learn from these ancient and wonderful traditions, after all the Earth is everyone's mother. That said, if you are going to present yourself as an expert practitioner of a tradition, you should have the blessing of that cultures community. (I am not an expert on anything at all, so hopefully I will be forgiven for my ignorance) Be careful about how you represent yourself and remember that as someone who was not raised and accepted by that culture, or initiated by its practitioners you cannot claim to be a holy person, or healer of that culture. (anymore then you can claim to be a doctor because you like to study medicine, even if you really are good at healing people)

To me it is also racism when a well meaning white wannabe Shaman puts Indigenous traditions on a pedestal, when more often than not their ideas come from movies and badly researched and fictionalized books like those of Carlos Castaneda. There is no doubt a tendency of making all Natives to be "noble savages" or stoic warriors with no sense of humour and without all the same passions and potential faults and blessings as anyone else. Similar bias views are often held by New Age practitioners of “Orientalism” or bastardized eastern mysticism and is one reason I would never refer to myself as “enlightened,” as the concept has accumulated so much cultural baggage as to be quite misleading, I must still use it in this book for lack of a better word. At the same time there is a certain amount of racism in these white people towards their own people, no doubt the original Shamanic traditions of Europe have been subject to hundreds of years of propaganda, disinformation and downright memetic extermination, (the same as Indigenous peoples but over a longer time frame) leading many white people to doubt there even is a meaningful European tradition that ever had any glimpse of wisdom. Fuelled by white guilt many people of European descent will totally discount their own heritage before learning anything about it and instead try to twist another peoples traditions in order to suit their own purposes. Luckily since kernels of Pagan memes remain within European culture, we can learn from a tradition every bit as wonderful as any other nature based or mystical tradition found anywhere in the world, the tenets of Paganism, Buddhism, Hinduism, Native spirituality are hardly unique because truth is truth wherever it is in the world. Although Europe was among the first to be colonized by the current system, it does not change the fact that it once had incredibly rich and complex mystical traditions that were Indigenous to its people, which were wiped out ultimately in the same way that Christians have attempted to do in the new world.

I am all for mixing it up, taking from various sources, but for fucks sake don't make your spirituality in to a fashion statement and don't kid yourself about your inherent lack of understanding about cultures you were not raised in. Since your ego is based on the culture you were raised in, your cultures mysticism probably has some of the best tools for dealing with the problems of your ego and gaining a deeper self awareness as it evolved the memes to combat the cultural virus's of that region. You might find yourself attracted to the traditions of other cultures, after all learning about other cultures is always wonderful and having a wide range of perspectives is absolutely crucial, but if you are ignorant of your own cultures mysticism, you will probably be surprised just how much it has to offer, how much it has contributed to your memetic foundations and how much it makes up your subconscious, which then makes it more effective for certain things.

When it comes to working with specific plants no doubt the Natives who have used them continuously for thousands of years know best, but when it comes to a spiritual framework to place them in, when it comes to symbol systems which can be used in ritual, I think people of European descent would do well to look to their own traditions, to find their own connection to nature, which will allow them to find out how their own ancestors worked with these kinds of plants. As a person's psyche is largely determined by its memes and a cultures memes are bred from the same stock, ancient Pagan forms of European Shamanism that existed before Christianity do have valuable insights that are appropriate to our general psyche, even though Christianity has done its best to eradicate it, traces remain and can regrow or blossom again if we let it. To do this is easier then many might think, as I have pointed out Europe at one time definitely used various entheogens and so I not only feel we are capable of using new world entheogens, I think a rediscovery of our Shamanic past is crucial to correcting the errors instilled in us by Roman colonization. It would be useful for those who are motivated to draw from classical Pagan sources and while this will take some study, I do believe these traditions, as well as Witchcraft will provide a spiritual system that is more in line with the memetic ecosystem of western civilization, using terminology and ideas that are more akin to our natural inclinations. These religions and a few others are the memetic roots of European society before Romanization and they are some of the last glimpses of sanity before Christianity took hold. Some traditions, like Witchcraft and Gnostic Paganism developed specific memes to deal with the Abrahamic virus of patriarchy and hierarchy and so have a certain benefit to those most infected by it.

At the same time with modern technological society we would be foolish to not take into consideration the present day environment in which we find ourselves, after all set and setting is key to creating a proper trip and unless you have been raised as a primitivist hermit mountain dweller all your life, these are factors that are going to come into your trip. Going to nature where you will not be bothered by unwanted people is definitely important with these experiences, however this is not always practical for people who live in cities.

Even with the mystical traditions already in place in the west, because the Christians destroyed the oral traditions and knowledge of how to use entheogens, I believe we need a new kind of mystical and magickal path that has entheogens as central to the make up of the ritual structures. While forms of ceremonial magick and Pagan magick are easily modified for using entheogens and definitely worth studying and practising according to taste, I do believe we need to try and figure out what works with them apart from any particular form of symbolism, creating a tradition in which each person creates their own personal tradition. Chaos magicians often employ "chemognosis" but to my knowledge there is little in the way of specific ideas in how to employ these plants as the central focus of the ritual structure. In my experience magick ritual when properly created and executed is ideal for creating set and setting, the skills learned in the Occult practices like visualization and concentration, the control of will and invocation are all ways of directing the mindset, and when coupled with what can in some cases be elaborate ritual settings, will allow someone to custom design the kind of experience they want, as well as maximize spiritual growth and the fulfilment of their intentions.

One thing that is lacking within western traditions outside of the Pagan is an emphasis on connecting with plant spirits, and even within contemporary Pagan traditions and in the case of Witchcraft which goes into great detail of the magickal uses of plants, (wort cunning)entheogens are often largely ignored or at best quickly mentioned and then the author moves on. This is for a variety of reasons from fears of the government, fears of being ridiculed or otherwise persecuted, to a deeply imbedded Christian culture found within even some Pagan authors which distrusts and demonizes or at least fears entheogens as “drugs,” even when they are clearly part of European and world tradition. Although there is an ancient European based entheogenic Shamanism it is for the most part lost to antiquity, burned up with all those wise people who dared to believe in non Christian things. The most obvious example being the case of Witches “flying ointment,” something which there are very good reasons for not endorsing experimenting with, as it contains highly dangerous plants like belladonna and henbane etc. That said, I do think that we can take lessons from our own historical Pagan religions and use Shamanic practices of non Europeans to fill in the gaps, and just like Wicca, Pagan practice can be combined with techniques from ceremonial magick to create an eclectic modern day Shamanism utilizing entheogenic plants from around the world. While again I must stress cultural sensitivity to Indigenous peoples, many safe entheogens which I mentioned in Chapter three are part of European history and many Indigenous Shamans who use entheogens say they learn their methods not from human teachers, but from the plants themselves, so there is in many cases no orthodox spiritual tradition to appropriate, other than ingesting the plant itself.

While I cannot speak for Indigenous peoples I think its pretty clear given the sickness of modern day society, denying people of European descent a medicine like Peyote because of the past sins of our culture is a dangerous, even suicidal idea. While alone it may not be enough to cure white people of their insanity, entheogens are our best chance of healing much of the sickness caused by our separation from nature and so people should be healed. If some people of European descent want to do this within their own cultural framework, since the don't have access to Indigenous culture or traditional Shamanic training, in many cases this would work better for them. What I would like to see is Indigenous peoples from around the world, coming together with European Pagans and everyone learning from each other, trading techniques and ideas. What a beautiful thing it would be for wise people and cunning folk from around the world to meet, to do in their own way, their own research, to even open schools and form their own theories. Together we might even find a way to break the curse of modern industrial materialism, or at least come up with methods for minimizing the psychotic behaviour it promotes. While this is not likely to happen any time soon, and it may not even be desired by many Indigenous people, so it is books and the plant teachers themselves will have to do for those who wish to heal and be healed. (psychological and spiritual healing at least) Racial traditions should not be an obstacle to those who wish to pursue their spiritual path, especially if they live in a deranged society bent on destroying all life on this planet.

Prohibitionist critics of entheogens point out some few bad examples of the potential risks of their use and demand no one be allowed to use them, but in reality what few examples their are, are the result of a lack of cultural awareness as to their proper use. Disinformation and a lack of research, both scientific and spiritual by western civilization has meant we are playing with things we do not understand. This is something which can never change if they remain illegal and no one is ever allowed to learn how to use them properly, or create the right sacred environments.

I do think that there is much to be gained from treating entheogens, especially the plant and fungus based ones as having very real and distinct spirits which can communicate with us. I have not really found this to be true for LSD, but for other entheogens the level of work that can be done is greatly increased by working with the plant as if it had a living spirit and this is true even if you don't believe it really does. By simply calling on the plant spirit and asking it questions you will get an answer, then its up to you to figure out what it means. How much you want to put this on your own personal subconscious is up to you, but you should always treat the spirits with respect. Of course you should take any voices you hear telling you to do questionable things with a strong dose of skepticism, the goal is not to have some omniscient being tell you everything you have to do in your life, but to have a being help you explore your mind and who you are and what you really want. The spirit, among other things aids in coming up with ideas to help make the world a better place, to aid in the creative processes for art, or aid in the manifestation of some result you desire such as healing yourself, mentally or physically.

Personally I do believe these plants have spirits, as I believe all things within nature have a spirit, even rocks and streams, the ocean, the winds, all can in a very real sense be said to have a certain life of their own, we are all fundamentally energy, so why is it so weird to think of plants having a spirit if humans do? Even while I was an atheist, the first time I tried mushrooms, which was a mere two and half grams I did have a little flash of vision of a mushroom spirit, it looked like what I can only describe as the inside of a mushroom, though it resembled a brain and it seemed to be trying to make contact with me and talk to me. As I explained, I dismissed this as me being high and given that I was with friends, I was too busy talking with them to really explore the idea and interact with the spirit, however this happened a few times later on subsequent trips. Because I was ignoring them they eventually stopped coming to me so overtly and it was not until I had my mystical awakening on LSD that I started to learn that psychedelics have a long history of producing visions of spirits. Some people may have trouble with notions of animism but we could say that the spirit of a rock for example, or its deva or faerie is at least a personification of its quintessential nature, and since the essential nature of reality is metaphysical, then the rock or plants "spirit" is just the individuated essence of the total energetic reality. In reality these ideas were the norm for most of human existence all around the planet and the current Abrahamic or atheist view of a dead universe is the anomaly, a view which is arguably trying to actually destroy all life on this planet. (Though there are even traditions in the Abrahamic religions of angels compelling each plant to grow etc)

Plenty of people have done psychedelics but not found any plant spirits, this is generally because they have not invited the spirit to present itself, they have not shown it is their will to interact with the spirit. Since the plants are cool and essentially Anarchist, unless the person is abusing the entheogen they generally don't bother people who don't invite them and at most subtly try to introduce themselves as they did with me. It can be as easy as calling out to them in your mind or it can be an elaborate ritual or anything in between, but if you want to do spiritual work with entheogens it is very important to be upfront and express your intentions and ask the spirits for help. If you are not experienced in ritual work, you can even ask the plant spirits to teach you magick, teach you how to heal, in fact as I said, this is how many Shamans learn, though they will be much better able to help you learn if you are willing to do Occult research on your own, giving you ideas as to how to improve and customize the rituals you are already doing. The main reason that people might not notice the spiritual effects of entheogens is because they are simply too distracted, most people take them and go dancing, or watch a movie, or focus on music or walk around aimlessly and while this can still provide a person with some valuable insights, it is basically recreational. Key to the entheogenic experience is going within, it is hard to leave your body when you are dancing, so the less external stimulus the more internal stimulus you will have, the more you can create a sensory deprivation tank like environment, the deeper in to the trip you can go. (Though depending on the intention, more external ritual environments are important too.)

Once you are experienced with psychedelics and using them in a ritualistic way, you may wish to designate or “consecrate” certainentheogens to specific magickal operations or types of rituals. You may not find any that are specifically good for any one kind of magickal operation more than another, but by having a specificentheogen for each kind of operation you could create a psychological anchor to a unique state of mind. So by going in to a particularentheogenic state for a specific reason and only that reason you let your mind know what is going on, what's more theentheogen will start to mould itself to that intention the more you work with it in that context. The great thing aboutentheogens is that even if you lose your place in the ritual you are not out of the trance state, so instead of getting mad at yourself just try to get back to where you were.

I have found that for me certainentheogens are better for certain kinds of rituals, for example I find LSA is great for tarot divination, it is much the same as LSD and can be good in various doses for various forms of ritual work, though you may want some caffeine in you as it can have sedative effects. For me I find mushrooms more dissociative and impairing, however they are better for visionary work, path working, leaving your body, spirit communication. Cactus containing mescaline, such as San Pedro, Peruvian torch or Peyote is surprisingly legal in many countries and can with patience be grown in your home, it is potentially a very useful general purposeentheogenic experience. There are really many psychedelics out there and each person can be very different, you will find that you should work in a way that's best for you and not what someone else says. If you can get over the burning nose, insufflated DMT fumarate can be quite useful, it can be used for shorter experiences as it only lasts a couple hours or so, which can make it useful for more regular use. Allentheogens require patience, practice and dedication as well as learning to flow with the experience.

In my experience I have found that Salvia especially needs to be treated with a lot of respect and love, it is something you have to build a relationship with. When I first got some, the person who sold it to me told me gave some great advice that I have found more and more true as time goes on, he said “Salvia is like a women, you have to romance her, you cannot just jump into bed with her, you have to get to know her.” This is done even better by talking to her, when I first tried Salvia in a tincture I even heard the words in my head “the level to which I can help you is determined by how much you treat me as a being.” Having respect for her and working slowly to build a relationship which is progressively more intense is extremely important with Salvia, to simply jump in with some high extract is kind of like trying to rape a girl who controls your reality, you should not be surprised if you get slapped HARD and have a horrible trip. This is not to say its impossible to have a good trip on extract right from the beginning, but I do believe it could definitely be sign of lack of respect.

Low Salvia doses such as when taken in the sublingual form of chewing leaves or extracts or to a lesser degree using tinctures, or even smoking leaf or 5X extract can be of enormous value to meditation work and can be used quite frequently. This is true even if your ultimate goal is to pierce the veil and have an out of body experience as by learning a variety of ritual methods at these lower doses they will be invaluable at the higher doses. Also by first ritually taking some Salvia in a sublingual way and then in that state smoking the extract, (once you know your doses) I have found it's a much gentler experience that lasts longer and gives you more control then if you just go in from a base line sober mindset. Sublingual Salvia extract should be held in your mouth for twenty five minutes under the tongue or you can chew it but do not swallow it until that time is up, as it is destroyed in the stomach and would be wasted. Salvia is great for a number of ritual activities, such as scrying (looking into a crystal ball or magick mirror etc) or any rituals or meditations where you will be sitting still quietly with your eyes closed, such as path working or astral projection. In my experience the higher dose alcohol extracts, or Salvia oil works better than chewing the leaves since there are only so many leaves you can fit in your mouth, allowing you to take bigger doses but also avoid mouthfuls of leaves. (which aren't too bad tasting as far asentheogens go) Alcohol extracts are also better than commercial tinctures since the alcohol can burn your mouth and make it hard to hold for such a long time, the tinctures are also generally quite expensive.

Marijuana is probably best to use as a general purpose entheogen for all kinds of rituals and meditations, this is because its something most people can use quite frequently without having some of the problems you would get from dropping acid everyday. (if nothing else building up tolerance) This is especially true with daily rites or meditations, just because you don't need to manifest anything, you should still try to do a regular meditation practice everyday to manifest greater awareness and ritual ability. Marijuana is not so overwhelming as other entheogens (unless you eat a bunch of it) and can be useful for practising visualization and putting yourself in a trance state without being overloaded with unwanted visions. Marijuana is great for everyday use, it is the first entheogen I recommend people try, but I cannot stress enough that when first learning how to do rituals you should be sober, at any rate you should know exactly what kind of ritual you are doing before hand and how to do it. You do not have to smoke pot if you don't want to, but once you are able to do the work without any entheogens, I found that if I am feeling mentally lazy or slacking, smoking a bit of pot puts me in the perfect state of mind to do my daily rites or other rituals. For me this works so much so that I rarely like to smoke pot in a social context anymore, this is especially true if you only smoke once a day or every few days. If you already have a high pot tolerance and are used to smoking multiple times a day you may want to quit completely for three weeks or so to drop your tolerance down completely, perhaps while you are first memorizing your daily meditations. For many pot heads this could be asking a lot and saving the first smoke of the day for rituals may suffice, but dedicating weed to ritual meditation may just make you look forward to your meditations so much you spend 1-2 or more hours a day doing them. Pot has also traditionally been used as an aphrodisiac and so has applications for sex magick, but when eaten, especially by a person with a low tolerance it can be incredibly powerful at stronger doses and so should not be underestimated for its spiritual potential.

Strong doses are only necessary for the most important rituals, or for intense spiritual experiences, all entheogens have their purposes but you may find that sticking with one that you find agrees with your nature is better than trying to work with a variety of plants. Once you are comfortable working in depth with one plant, then you will find it easier to learn with others, rather than trying to learn them all at once. If you are in doubt about what kind of ritual uses a particular plant has then try to make contact with the plant's spirit and ask it directly what it can be used for and how to go about it. Once you are familiar with some basic ritual methods, as I said the plant spirit will teach you how to elaborate and improve your rituals, the more symbolism and methods you learn in your regular state of mind, the more the plant can elaborate what you know.

There are many great things you can use magick techniques for besides getting something physical to happen, in fact the best things you can use magick for is for increasing awareness. I want to make it clear you do not need to get high to be spiritual or do meditative practices, but they will definitely always have a place in my practice as they are incredibly useful and they do seem to take people to some pretty unique places. Many strait edge spiritual people find themselves suffering from a lack of divinity in their lives, perhaps even having doubt about spiritual realities, or the idea that it has to wait till you die, while entheogenic spiritual people can often be overwhelmed by the amount of divinity and spiritual experiences in their lives. What is clear is that using entheogens does help some people in their spirituality and they have been used in such ways by almost all cultures around the world and the more you treat them as sacraments, the more you will get out of them.

Sigils can be extremely useful for tripping out in a directed way, especially once you have some experience in the ritualism of it and have successfully manifested things into your life. You could create a sigil for each entheogen plant spirit, but this is probably best done while on the substance and then asking for a sigil from the spirit, this sigil can then later be used to contact the spirit, to some degree even when you haven't even taken any substances. You can also combine the spirit sigil with different symbols to form a new sigil of your intention, for example to help on specific aspects of your mind, or to heal a person, help with insecurity, excessive anger issues or whatever problems you have. Try creating a sigil to know yourself, or the person you are with, try a sigil to help boost creativity or to solve a specific problem, philosophical or otherwise, try making a sigil to spread awareness and happiness throughout the world. If you want to be more specific in your intentions, you may also want to associate each entheogen with a customized familiar or a particular deity you like, since entheogens take you to different frequencies of the astral you can encounter the plant spirit, but also a variety of other spirits, or your own familiars if you program them in that way. However, it is still a good idea to try and make contact with the plant spirit as it is always present to some degree, and is not limited by your programming and so is capable of things you may not imagine creating a familiar for.

You do not have to have a sigil to make contact with a plant spirit, but it can be helpful to have a ritual, simply sitting quietly or lying down with your eyes closed and trying to talk to it in your mind will suffice, but putting more effort in to it, puts more energy in to it and so deepens the experience. Asking for a name is probably a good idea, or if you are with people you may wish to do group experiments where everyone talks with the spirits, or one person records what is said, one person acts as medium, another doing the banishing or what have you. Even if its just your own limited subconscious talking back, you would be surprised how much you can learn, so for this reason it can be very helpful to have a list of questions to ask ready before you get high, perhaps have a sound recorder or someone to write down answers. You should keep in mind this plant spirit is not your mommy and not something that will take away your personal responsibility, you are still the one who has to grow and learn how to think. If things get too intense then you should not hesitate to ask the spirit to tone it down a bit for you, though you should trust that it wants to do what is best for you and this means that eventually, you will have to go outside of your comfort zones.

When you are experienced, with the right plant ally you may find that you can ritually create whatever kind of world you want, so that you are in a sense lucid dreaming and can make a whole new reality according to will. I have had some amazing success in this regard as with ritual entheogenic use, it is possible to enter in to a kind of directed astral projection to an artificially created astral temple of any place you want to go to. This provides experiences that are invaluable for understanding the nature of reality, the only thing holding you back is yourself, and those limits can always be pushed back.

Using natural magick, props and things which have previously been consecrated and which you can use in a simple way can be very effective and is more in line with how many Native Americans using entheogens direct their rituals. Shamans might have on their altars a variety of consecrated power objects which can be used to evoke and direct various energies or call on various spirits, often using a mantra or chant to activate the power object. Natural magick can be handy as the power objects don't go away if you stop visualizing them, but this does not mean that concentration and visualization are not crucial skills to be learned in the ritual use of entheogens.

Here are some tips which I have found to be helpful, first I should also mention that it is generally best to take entheogens on an empty stomach, especially with those which can cause nausea, if you have an empty stomach it will pass into your intestines sooner, and reduce the time which you are nauseous. Also having an empty stomach is just easier on the stomach and provides a stronger trip undiluted by food. Of course you should also make sure you do not need to drive anywhere, or deal with people, that you will have a nice quiet area all to yourself and not be distracted. You should always know your dealer, know the purity of your substances and know the quantity of your doses, this kind of thing should go without saying, but there are careless people out there who do not treat these plants with the respect they deserve. In the beginning especially with high doses it may be a good idea to have a sober "sitter," that is someone to be there in case of bad trips or emergencies, though it may be they should stay in the other room unless needed so they will not disturb the ritual set and setting. (except for smoking Salvia extract which always requires a sitter, even for experienced users) Before I go further into practical details with rituals, I also want to highly encourage people to do their homework and research specific entheogens before you do them. Get an idea of what to expect and how long you will have and the general character of the plant, those who aren't willing to put in a lot of effort into preparing should not even bother trying.

So to explain a little further, first and foremost is the old rules of set and setting, which is on the surface basic common sense, but it is the basic factors which determine pretty well everything in the trip. Set is what your mood and mindset is going into a trip, your personality, temperament, your intentions, thoughts of the past, emotions in the present all will have huge implications as to what your trip will be like. I find my mind on enteogens is usually largely just a greatly amplified and increased version of where I was at when I ingested them and was in the stages of coming up. So a good way to have a good spiritual trip is to be in a spiritual, philosophical or artistic mood, or at least with a strong desire to be in such a mood which is often enough. This means its probably not best to take them when you are really depressed or angry, feeling sorry for yourself and doing silly things like cutting yourself over your lost love or some such thing, whatever weird states you people are in. Through invocation of various sigils that you create before hand, or invocations of spirits or god forms, or planetary energies or elemental energies you can use ritual to induce specific altered states, either while coming up on enteogens (if you have further intentions to do other things later) or after you have come up. (so that you can explore that state of mind)

So for example if you wished to do some form of art you might invoke Venus, or for writing Mercury, or if you wished to do some scrying you might invoke the Moon. If you want to work on your emotions you could invoke the element of water, then perhaps a planet that represents the quality you wish to strengthen within yourself, perhaps more Mars energy to bring out the fighter in you, or Venus to bring out the lover in you. Each variable, (element, planet, or zodiac sign) each god or goddess you work with can be used in an endless variety of intentions, but each one can also be used to create a distinct state of mind, which will set the tone for the trip you have. Through sigils you can create your own personal states of mind, but knowing something about traditional maps of the mind found in the Occult will be invaluable in getting an idea of possibilities. Mantras alone or combined with other ritual techniques are among the easiest to learn and some of the most powerful. Through traditional systems you can find mantras or “god names” for each of the planets, or simply use the names of divinities as mantras, or make up your own, the mantra works as the focus of your mind set and is often used by people without enteogens, but with them, a beginner or advanced student will have a powerful tool for directing consciousness or the mind set.

“Setting” is where you are and who you are with and what is happening, it is also what aesthetics and objects are present. So to have a spiritual trip it is handy not to be with low life rapists in a strip bar snorting coke or something like that, I find either a familiar residence or in a private natural area is best. If you trip out in a dingy, dirty crack shack, do not be surprised if the trip starts to make you feel like a dingy dirty crack head, creating a sacred space (as through ritual banishing or other means) is really quite useful in creating the right atmosphere and setting for tripping in a spiritual way. Walking around downtown can be fun on psychedelics but its not really that great for having a spiritual time, especially if you are trying to leave your body. Be with people you know well and have no underlying hidden conflicts with, they should also have the same intentions as you which you discussed before hand. If you are experienced and depending on the ally you are working with, being alone can be great for more personal meditations, but you can also each do your own individual mediation and then discuss once you come down.

Ritual props, symbolic colours, incense, sounds, certain ritual clothes, can all be useful in aligning the setting with your intentions, candles can be used but make sure there is no risk of starting a fire, especially if you are taking a heavy dose and moving around. By props I mean things like the four elemental tools or “magical weapons” that is your wand, cup, dagger, and pentacle for the four elements, but also perhaps a magick circle drawn on the ground with various symbols in it, or even the colours of your clothes. Anything physical with symbolic meaning to you can be used to change the setting in a way that can change the trip, statues of gods or goddesses, pictures you find meaningful, the time of day or night can all influence things, or if you are into astrology the day itself.

Anything that adds sensory data is part of the setting and having a temple area which is banished and consecrated is highly recommended, eliminating non sacred items from the setting can help to keep you from being reminded of the mundane non magical world. Any area you use as a temple is preferably only ever used as a temple, though this is no doubt inconvenient for people with no room to dedicate for this purpose, since all of nature is sacred making a temple outside is always good. Still, whatever you can do to create a setting that is meaningful and in accordance with your ritual intentions will go a long way to aiding you in that ritual. Setting is potentially more important than your original sober mindset, as with the right setting, your mindset, unless it is really messed up will change accordingly, especially when combined with the ritual techniques I mentioned.

There are further props specific to the planets and zodiac signs, or gods and goddesses all of which can be used to customize the temple according to the ritual intentions for that day. Through ceremonial magick and Witchcraft you will find correspondences of the various variables I have mentioned for each type of sensory stimulus, incense for smell, tones, for sound, colour as on candles and things for vision, herbal decoctions or essential oils for taste, and specific ritual positions (sexual or not) for the body. If you really know your correspondences you can program your mind to recognize why certain incense smells are meaningful, smell is the sense that gets deepest into our minds and sticks in our memories the best, but all the senses can be adjusted to create the proper setting. When all these are combined appropriately you will have a very detailed way of controlling your setting to create the right mind set that you want and drive the trip in the right direction.

The subconscious likes regularity and repetition when learning skills and ritual plays into this desire, so that we can condition our mind into the meditative states and this also applies to having consistent symbolic representations with props. By having specific props and symbols associated with specific meanings like certain astrological planets, or many other kinds of meanings, when the mind is in such a setting it knows what kind of energies and things are expected of it. These props set the mood in a very real way, especially when combined withentheogens they can greatly add to the power of a ritual. The idea is to train your mind through repetition to be triggered through symbols into creating altered states, or otherwise directing the will when in a trance state, once you know that rituals can do this through direct experience, then learning new rituals, using new symbols becomes much easier.

Onentheogens all kinds of rituals and meditations, especially visualization is greatly enhanced, it also seems like some rituals were really just made specifically for tripping out to, that meditation is a tool for navigating the trip. Magick for me is much more powerful when done in aentheogenic state, but for complex rituals which require a lot of memory and focus you probably don't want to be so high you can't still function. While learning how to go with the flow is crucial when starting to useentheogens, that is getting your ego out of the way, a magician or a Shaman also knows how to retain control while not in their ego. Depending on theentheogen and dose, you might find yourself overwhelmed by all kinds of visions and totally distracted from focusing on one thing in particular, this requires less of a forced willing to visualize something and more of a receptive gnosis that the visions will come which are in line with your will for that part of the ritual. Some rituals are very complex however and depending on your dose and how familiar you are with the ritual it may be too much. This is one reason why meditation and ritual only when onentheogens is not a good idea, you need to practice everyday to really call yourself a magician and for this reason, you will have to learn how to do so in a sober mindset, especially in the beginning when you are memorizing how to do it. Given the ADD culture we find ourselves in, most of us are not good at concentrating in general let alone on anentheogen, so daily practice is crucial, it may be no more then 20-30 minutes of practices but it will not only become very valuable in itself, it will also provide imperative practice when you start to take heavyentheogenic trips ritually. Once you are done your daily practices, or for anyentheogenic ritual once you have pretty well come down, you should also write down or record the results of your experiment in a "magickal diary" which acts as a note book of data, as this will be invaluable later on in your development.

Again, I am not telling you to go out and buy a bunch of ritual gear, these symbolic props are only really useful once you have a firm understanding of the variables they represent. You must learn to call upon the energies by yourself in a sober state before attempting anything more complicated. If you do not have some basic mastery of the variables, of say fire before you get a wand, using nothing but your mind and body to invoke it successfully, then you will not be able to successfully consecrate your ritual props and so they will not be very useful to you. The wand itself has no power but as a symbol to the mind who knows its meaning, but the manipulation of the mind can literally work magick. That said you should work within your means and not worry about having to buy a ton of things for you to do a ritual, it can also be much more meaningful to your mind if you make the props yourself, putting your time and more importantly your energy in to the prop. You should take perhaps at least a year of practice with the variables and with banishing so that you will be well prepared for the consecration of your ritual items. (do not use one elemental tool until you can use all of them, so as to avoid imbalance) Then once the ritual items are consecrated they will be very useful to you in entheogenic rituals, without consecration they will just be like any other knife or cup or incense etc.

Start simple, if you are going to spend most of your trip meditating with your eyes closed (which is generally a good idea for using entheogens to raise your awareness) then crystals and wands etc will probably not be that useful. People think of rituals as being difficult and they can be, but they can be simple as well, I like to use the word “work” because it is serious and I really want to encourage people to challenge themselves, but you should not be intimidated as even a little effort, if you “know” it will work can make a huge difference. Because of their text based nature and long scripts to be memorized, some ceremonial magick such as Enochian magick may not be very practical with many entheogens, even if you have the book open, if you are ecstatic enough you won't be able to read. While confusing for a beginner I don't want to scare anyone away from learning ceremonial magick, if you don't mind learning it in a sober mindset, it is not nearly so complicated. Ceremonial magick can add all kinds of useful layers to natural magick ritual in which you seek to control the set and setting, or otherwise tune your mind in to the energies which will bring the trip to where you want to go.

For those just starting, who are timid or unsure about doing rituals, simply learn or make up meanings for the different colours to represent energies which you will use in ritual. These can be found in yoga chakra systems, or as the colours of astrological planets or lots of other traditions. Then learn or make up some mantras which represent various intentions or states of mind which you can use to chant while in an entheogenic state. By visualizing yourself filled with colour and chanting a mantra, with some determination and sincerity you will create amazing results if you are in an entheogenic state. Just visualize a ball of energy coloured according to intention, see it grow in brightness and intensity forming in your hands, all the while chanting a mantra of magical words formed from rearranged letters of your written intention, you can then direct this bright colour into a sigil or whatever you want.

Try not to waste your time while on entheogens, they can be used for some very serious work that can aid your growth in all kinds of ways, but also even more important they can help to inspire ways in which you can help the world. In a group you may want to try group projects, perhaps experiment with telepathy and telekinesis, having everyone working together on the same things, don't be disappointed if it doesn't work, but don't be afraid to try if the mood is right. Watching movies and playing video games is about as big a waste as you can get on psychedelics, sure it can be fun for awhile but once you realize what you could be doing and accomplishing on them, you may get mad at all the time you wasted. Try thinking of ways to open peoples minds and make the world a better place.

The majority of these tips are for guided and specific spiritual goals, if you and your friends are just trying to enjoy yourself and have a fun time these may not be the best ideas, if you have a schedule make sure everyone agrees to it before hand and participates in making it. It is a good idea to have a list of activities made out before hand because if you have a lot to do it can be easy to forget something, or get distracted. Creating a schedule is helpful because if you wait till you are high to decide what you want to do, it can be extremely difficult (at least for me) because I often get to a state where everything seems as good as anything else, even just staring at the wall thinking. Since life itself is a spiritual experience and everything is made of spirit, it is possible to have a spiritual experience doing anything, however it's very helpful to have a list of activities to do, or a schedule to make sure you stick to fulfilling predetermined intentions. Trying to keep everyone on a schedule they don't want is pointless and can be really annoying to other people just trying to flow with their trip, if you cannot find people with the same intentions as you, then schedules are best done when you are tripping by yourself. You may not feel like doing what you planned once you are high and probably shouldn't force it too much, or worry about specific time frames, however you may just feel regret that you just sat there staring at the wall listening to music or watching a movie when the goal was to do something more practical. Schedules help to remind you of what your intentions were when you were in a state that had an ego, they also help to keep you focused on things which the mind wants to experience and work on.

Recreational trips can be fine and I have done plenty of them myself, but for many people after enough times of this it seems to go to bad trips. Perhaps bad trips happen because people subconsciously know they are abusing something sacred, perhaps just because they are finding it harder and harder to ignore their problems and follow through on their escapism, or maybe it's the plant spirit letting them know they won't be abused anymore. Recreational trips are good for beginners to keep things light and enjoyable, but they are the training wheels so to speak for the real work to come. Once you learn to connect spiritually in those states, as fun as the recreational trips can be, a good directed trip can be overwhelmingly beautiful and fulfilling and what is more, the magick rituals can manifest great changes in your life. Magick is your means of finding your major fortune in life, not merely money, but a general positive approach to the possibilities of this world, the light which feeds the trees to bring fruit, powerful success in difficulties which comes effortlessly.

Having different aphorisms to contemplate can also be extremely elucidating, I recommend the Tao Te Ching, the Emerald tablets of Thoth, the Corpus Hermeticum, the Dhama Pada, the Ashtavakra Gita or some Gnostic Texts and if you can handle it the Hindu Upanishads. As I said, reading can be hard if you are high enough, but you can get some audiobook versions or someone to read for you. There are many great texts out there and you should look for a tradition that moves you, any type of mythology can literally come alive before your eyes if done in the right set and setting. Creating all kinds of art can be very rewarding, I obviously like to write, I find it helps to get the thoughts flowing as well as remember things when I come down, each time I get high I am amazed at how much I forgot, even just in terms of what it's like, the key is respect, sincerity, and dedication.

Here are some of the operations that you might undertake ritually: enchantment (manifesting), evocation, invocation, divination, scrying, astral work, path working, yoga or union with the divine, sexual Tantric practices, psychological programming, psychonautic (entheogenic) exploration, lucid dreaming and art and creative pursuits. Remember, all you are doing with ritual is creating a consistent set of symbols and manipulating them in a symbolic fashion so that your mind understands your intention in a non verbal manner which it is accustomed to. This is done so that you can direct your emotions more easily and while this sounds simple, do not underestimate how effective it can really be. Even if you can't do a full ritual while high, knowing the symbols and how to direct the energies even in a very basic way will be invaluable for all kinds of things, even in a very improvised circumstance. If you have no Occult experience you may be a bit confused by the following description, but it will make more sense once you have done some rituals.

Depending on what traditions and symbolism you are interested in, you can make a ritual made up of four basic stages, 1: Preparing everything, such as doing the banishing or consecrating the space and then the entheogens or the various things or people involved, then setting up any props you might be using. 2: Calling upon various energies or tuning the ritual area and the mind according to the intention. 3: Directing those energies in some way to fulfil the will, or otherwise executing your will in a particular operation. 4: the closing ceremony, or giving thanks and saying goodbye to the spirits and energies involved, depending on the energies evoked, often people like to banish again.

These are guidelines but for a general rule of thumb, you should banish/consecrate theentheogens during the preparatory part, you can then state your intentions, praying to spirit of theentheogen with it in your hands and then dose, you can also then draw out your sigil. (though you should have rough copy ready before hand or at least know exactly what it will look like) Make sure you bring everything you will need in to the circle with you, once you have banished try your best not to break the circle unless you really have to. Then begin stage 2 and call up the elements or planetary energies etc while you are coming up, this will be different according to whatentheogen it is or how long the ritual will be as differententheogens take longer than others to come in to effect. As it can take 60-90 minutes to come up you may have to extend the stage 2 tuning phase of the ritual by repeating the mantras of the energies or sigil and charging more and more energy. Depending on how you call up the energies you may be comfortable doing the tuning phase in anentheogenic state or if it is a fast actingentheogen such as DMT snuff, you may wish to wait till you are almost at stage 3 to dose. Doing some of the more complex rituals is perhaps not that practical with certainentheogens, but may be doable with others, or in the case of smoking DMT or Salvia extract, which are mostly over after only five minutes, key parts of the ritual in stage 3 will have specific times in which it would be appropriate for these but not others.

For mostentheogens, the key is to time your rituals so that you will be coming up during stage 2 and peaking for stage 3 so that once you are at a suitable state of chemognosis you can go further in to the ritual and direct the energies according to intention. For example stage 3 might be directing the energy in to the sigil, invoking an entity or calling on the entity or conversing with it, leaving your body, healing someone (which requires the ethics, knowledge and training of a Doctor or Shaman) doing the divination or looking in to the crystal ball or whatever else you might be doing. This allows you to use the more complicated ceremonial forms of magick in the beginning two stages of magick, then perhaps using a moreentheogenically friendly form of natural magick in the third. Depending on what you have available and how good you are at focusing, for snuff or pot you can also take a little dose for stage 2, then take more for stage 3, or use pot or a little snuff for stage 2 while you are still coming up on mushrooms, or whatever long actingentheogen you took for stage three. This must all be done according to circumstance but a banishing is always best done before you come up as its purpose is generally to banish negativity and worldly awareness before you enter in to the spirit world, or to banish the possibilities of a bad trip and all irrelevant things from your mind, it also never hurts to ritually purify or consecrate yourentheogens.

If your goal is to explore theentheogenic realms and grow spiritually, by doing rituals which put you in the right mindset you can control where the trip goes before it even really starts. If your goal is to change the outside world in some way then you want to do that part of the ritual in the state of chemognosis, that is in theentheogenic state, ideally at its peak, but according to your level of control, the more you practice concentration, the deeper the state you can enter and still retain control. An invocation/evocation of an entity could be done by calling the energies in to the circle as stage 2 in order to create the environment for the spirit while you are still coming up, but doing the invocation or evocation while you are deep in the state, which can either be complex or as simple as saying the entities name as a mantra and proclaiming your intention for it to manifest.

Using simple spagyric methods you can make an extremely simple Salvia extract using high percentage alcohol (like Everclear or moonshine about 90% or higher, or if that's not available 99% isopropanol) to make an extract which you use orally. All you have to do is soak the leaf in the alcohol for a few days to a week, the general rule of thumb is to use enough alcohol to submerge all the herbs, maybe adding a little more for good measure. Soak the herbs shaking the container every day, it should be stored in something you know will not dissolve in alcohol. (some varieties of plastic do dissolve so use glass if possible) After soaking you strain the leaf and evaporate the alcohol, perhaps in a glass baking dish on a hot plate, or using a slow cooker or distiller, this should be done in a well ventilated area with no fire hazards like lit cigarettes. Make sure that all the alcohol is evaporated, especially if you are using isopropanol you do not want to ingest it. Salvia wears off quickly and so sublingually dosed extracts are more active and produce better results since it allows for the Salvinorin A to enter the bloodstream more quickly, so be careful how you dose yourself, as little as a quarter of teaspoon may be enough, it can be very intense and last 2-3 hours. (For some reason this method worked better than orally taking professional extracts which were supposedly stronger.) This same method can be used for basic extractions of many different plants to make an essential oil, like pot oil that you can smoke, even a crude mescaline extract from cactus is possible, or if you like you can get some charcoal and burn non entheogenic oils as incense.

For those interested in herbalism, as I mentioned briefly before, the Alchemists were adepts of herbalism as well, they called it spagyric Alchemy, and there are some great books on this subject. Again the whole process of the lab work is turned into a ritual so that say for example, you are not only extracting the THC from the pot to make oil, you are infusing it with a specific kind of energy to produce a specific altered state later on in various other rituals. So then according to spagyric Alchemy, when a chemical is dissolved in a solvent, in its liquid form it is thought to be more receptive to energy charging than when in a solid form, once the solvent is evaporated, the spirit, or sulphur, or what we would call the essential oil is left to congeal and form a solid, but now it is infused with the Alchemists energy as well. It is a common theme in ayahuasca Shamanism as well as spagyric Alchemy that the energy of the person who makes the potion contributes to its effectiveness, by always handling the entheogens in a conscious and spiritual way you will add to their effectiveness as a sacrament. The planetary energies of the day of the week or other astrological influences could be incorporated to the extraction process, charging coloured energy in a magick circle in to the alcohol solution according to your intention for that batch, starting the soak and evaporating on specific days are useful ways to layer in symbolic associations to the extract. There is also a variety of other magickal herbs which can be added to create various potions and tinctures, or additional essential oils and while you must be careful about ingesting and mixing herbs you are not familiar with, for those willing to learn it can add a synergistic effect to the extract, in an energetic and symbolic manner if not chemically.

So through my spagyric studies I have come up with the following procedure utilizing the traditional formula for the philosophers stone, but in this case we will be creating what has been called the “vegetal stone.” The formula for the philosophers stone comes from the Hermetic text called “The Emerald Tablet of Thoth” and goes “Calcination, Dissolution, Separation, Conjunction, Fermentation, Distillation and Coagulation.” This is reflected in the heavens in the order of the seven “planets” which were known at the time, the order found on the tree of life from Saturn to the Moon. So then the formula can be adapted to symbolically match the general extraction process I outlined above:

- Step 1: Calcination – Saturday, Banish and smudge the sacrament, grind with pestle and mortar or in coffee grinder. (calcination means to reduce something to ash or burn it to its most fundamental form and so here you are energetically reducing the herb to its most neutral and fundamental “salt” form)
- Step 2: Dissolution – Thursday - Soak sacrament in alcohol until a Tuesday of your choice, perhaps for one week plus. (You can do the first two steps in one day, then soak and end that days work)
- Step 3: Separation – Tuesday, Filter out sacrament herb matter and keep the alcohol solution.
- Step 4: Conjunction – Sunday, Add planetary tinctures to solution and evoke the appropriate energies for your intention in to the solution.
- Step 5: Fermentation – Friday, Let solution sit from this day to the intentions appropriate day according to the appropriate planet, or perhaps according to lunar cycle. (can do these last three steps in one day)
- Step 6: Distillation – Wednesday – Distill the solution or evaporate the alcohol and empower the core essence of the herbal sigil.
- Step 7: Congelation – Monday, Let distilled essential oil congeal into the right shape, perhaps using cookie cutter molds, evaporate last of the alcohol and you have a spagyric talisman. (can do last two steps in one day)

You can also put a sigil on to each potion bottle according to your intention, having a potion for each type of energy you work with is a good idea as it can be mixed with other potions to make energetic compounds. You can even use the potion and bottle as a body for a familiar spirit or “djinn” or genie to live in which you activate by opening the bottle, or invoke by drinking, you could even use the potion like a magick mirror putting it in to a cauldron or ritual bowl or cup to skry out visions of the spirit during an evocation. With the stronger entheogenic potions you could charge them with the energies that will help you to astral project to a specific realm or astral temple, maybe even using a “magick carpet” to lie on for when you fly out of your body.

With lots of research (look online) and some basic equipment and ingredients it is not very hard at all to extract DMT, mescaline, LSA, THC, Salvinorin A or many other entheogens using safe, non toxic and all natural chemicals. Some chemicals like DMT are harder than others but are chemically safe even if you do screw up, using pickling lime as a base and for a solvent a food grade version of a chemical made from orange peels named “D Limonene.” Not only is this practical in acquiring entheogens from often legal and cheap sources, but the whole process of making the entheogens is turned into a very consciously controlled ritual act, turning the entheogen itself into a kind of sigil. For those who do not want to take entheogens, or those who wish to take a potion each day, by studying magickal herbalism or “wort cunning” you will be introduced to a variety of herbs which can be used to create tinctures or potions that only work on an energetic, rather than chemical level.

If you have the means and ability there is a lot that can be learned and many benefits from growing your own entheogens. For example when you take your sacraments you will have the plant that it came from right in front of you, this will make communication with the plant spirit much more interesting. You could create a unique sigil and name for each plant, which unless you have a very specific intention should probably be done after ingesting the plant. You could also charge a crystal and put that in the soil so that the plants roots will grow around it as it gets older so that it takes in that intention. If you find you really like one kind of ally in particular you could take my idea of assigning each entheogen a kind of magickal operation and apply it to different plants of the same species. You would specialize with say Salvia, but each Salvia plant could be used for a specific ritual purpose, or specializing in some specific segment of the mind, like a plant for each of the four elements or each astrological variable. If you really have long term goals in mind planting may be done at the appropriate time of zodiacal year or when the planets are in the appropriate place according to intention. Harvesting should be done at a meaningful time, done at least some what ceremoniously, asking the plant spirit for permission and offering it love and thanks. With all this you will create a much stronger energetic bond and mental anchor with your sacraments and plants then if you just bought off some dealer, there is also the added bonus that you will know exactly what you are getting. For these purposes, San Pedro or Peruvian Torch can be excellent as they are legal sources of mescaline, which also grow much faster than peyote and can be even stronger, another of my favourite plant allies is Hawaiian Baby Woodrose, but this is a bit harder to grow depending on where you live, mushrooms are not so legal but with research and practice are definitely growable or found outdoors.

Of course it is crucial that a person knows exactly what they are dealing with before they ingest any entheogen, if you do not care enough to do some research before hand then you lack the necessary dedication and work ethic for this path. If you want to use Hawaiian Baby Woodrose seeds make sure you lightly burn each seed to get rid of the little hairs on them which can make people nauseous, crush them up and put them in some lemon juice and let it steep for about 15 minutes, the citric acid will help extract the spirit. You can then mix this solution with peppermint tea as it is supposed to help convert LSA into a more psychedelic chemical LSH. (I haven't tried it, but it is possible to do an alcohol extraction with LSA) Lemon juice is also good for cactus and helps with the taste (if you like sour things) where as hot chocolate with real chocolate is my favourite way to ingest mushrooms, which should be ground in to a powder. Although I have not personally tried this method, Salvia Divinorum, or Reed Canary grass can be used with a wheat grass juicer to create extremely useful extracts without having to use any harmful chemicals. Research into entheogens is critical, do your own homework, there are many legal plants which can be grown, though besides draconian laws there is no reason why you should not use and grow the illegal plants as well.

All these ideas are just the beginning of a potentially unlimited variety of practices and applications for the spiritual use of entheogens. Much more than just a tool of personal growth, these plants and chemicals have the ability to create new ideas and new insights for what it means to be human and how we can live in a happier and saner way. To do this we need to humble ourselves and learn some respect for nature, we need a detailed and comprehensive entheogenic practice which incorporates the wisdom of the world in to a set of practices which are comprehensible and applicable to the average person. To do this we need to work together with Indigenous peoples and scientists, as well as people schooled in the various other mystical and magickal traditions of the world to create something new, something which can better tackle the challenges we are presently facing. Hopefully when we have recovered the lost wisdom of the past we can recreate a new and updated method of initiation into the spiritual mysteries through the creation of modern mystery schools and as was done in those mysteries, this initiation must be open to all who wish it. When we have a modern Shamanic practice which makes sense to the alienated and technologically obsessed people, or at least when it is well on its way, humanity will have a means of providing some other reference or context to space time material reality as we know it, if we can accomplish that then we will have a very important means of getting some bearings on where we really want to go as a species.

Through entheogens we have a means of seeing physical reality from the outside and so we can get a much better perspective on what it means to be inside it. Entheogens are not a guarantee to enlightenment but they are I believe the best tools most people have for getting some glimpse of what that even means, that is if they are willing to put in the effort. This will provide us with new insight in to what it means to be human and what it is we really should be doing with our lives. When the properly educated masses know how to enter the spirit world, they will no longer be satisfied with consumer goods, or authoritarian religions, they will demand liberation and truth and it will provide a very important basis for establishing a real global community intent on equality and justice.

Here are some correspondences for those working with astrological symbolism, though of course you should feel free to change them as you desire, for a certain entheogen may have very different meaning to you, or may not be available where you live. The first thing listed is the class of drugs, the first entheogen listed is the planets primary, the second is its back up, though you can also use cacti for planets of a solar nature and psilocybin mushrooms for those with a lunar nature. I have listed some entheogens which are dangerous or not so spiritually useful, but are still traditional, you should be extremely careful if you plan on mixing these sacraments and of course study them in depth before you ever use them, if they are worth using for your spirituality, they are worth studying and using appropriately.

Some people seem to think all we need to do is dose everyone with acid and we will get a utopia, but history shows us this isn't true. Psychedelics amplify or make manifest the mind that is already within a person, and so without a sincere effort to become a better person, to live in truth and to face your demons, eventually all you will accomplish by taking psychedelics is freaking yourself out and quite possibly making your demons stronger. Perhaps you may even have a glimpse of the true divine, but without sincere effort to integrate that experience you will have that vision appropriated by your personal demons and you may make up some ridiculous religion that twists others minds into some hierarchical dogmatic psychosis with you.

Psychedelics are potentially the most useful tool we have for understanding ourselves and the spiritual realms, but they are potentially dangerous without proper intention and usage or at least are not so likely to have any significant or long term benefits. I have met plenty of addicts who have done a lot of psychedelics in their time and while they generally stopped taking them after they became escapist addicts, they are certainly not enlightened. Addicts of narcotics tend to stop taking psychedelics because they are so good at treating addiction and making people face reality, however we cannot depend on this alone to make everyone in to an enlightened Anarchist. For example there are some scholars who believe Abraham and especially Moses were taking entheogens like Amanita muscaria mushrooms and that the old testament (and new) was full of mushrooms cryptically symbolized as manna and many other things. While this may represent prototype religions that were Shamanic and quite different as in a Kabbalistic or Gnostic bent, if it is true it just goes to show just because you take entheogens doesn't mean your ego wont try and impose distortions on it to create an egomaniac of a god and it certainly doesn't mean it cant be appropriated by authoritarian believers who haven't had such experiences. Zoroastrianism and Mithraism aren't always pillars of equality or open mindedness either, yet there is evidence they used entheogens and so while they too were likely corrupted over time, we must be careful not to surrender our skepticism or own responsibility as humans for our own free will in the name of religion. (skepticism is a key method of showing your intention to manifest more truth)

If a spirit you encounter on entheogens tells you to go around cutting people's penis's to make it look like a mushroom and to sacrifice your son, even if it is just a "test" you should question it, it's a sign you are having a bad trip and talking to a projection of your own fear. In most Shamanic traditions it is explicitly clear that you can meet a variety of spirits and not all of those you encounter on entheogens are necessarily benevolent, not all of them speak the truth and so you should not give up your free will or skepticism. This is in fact one of the main reasons why ritualism is so useful, it allows a Shaman to not be fooled by lying spirits and to engage the mind in a way that helps to avoid delusions and fear based ego projections. Without integration of the lessons learned from a trip, the ego can grow back, it may of been diminished or wiped out temporarily, but without humility, doing hard work and integration it can come back stronger and bigger than ever, only this time it could have one hell of a messiah complex.

Wherever there are Shamanic cultures there is almost always the threat of "sorcerers" by which I mean Shamans or magicians or even sometimes otherwise regular Natives who use their spiritual knowledge to harm. This is because if you know how to cure you also know how to curse and despite the fluffy New Age idea that all Shamans are enlightened healers, or that all people who live in the forest or have access to the spirit world are beings of pure love, even a brief look in to the anthropology of many Shamanic cultures makes it quite clear there are plenty of people willing to curse others. In fact cursing or magickally causing someone to become sick can be done quite casually, even unconsciously by saying the wrong thing, putting out aggressive energies or any number of situations that come up in day to day living with other people. The fear of "magick darts" that make others sick is all to real to Natives in many areas of South America and has quite an elaborate culture in those who use ayahuasca. A "Shaman" (for lack of a better term) in some cases may be just as likely to make others sick as to heal whether or not they use entheogens, at the very least "Shamans" are often blamed if someone gets sick, perhaps one tribe's Shaman settles a feud by magickally killing people in another tribe. The idea that some people use magick to make others sick is basically a global phenomena and this is found mostly in "Shamanic" cultures, in fact it is generally Shamans or what are sometimes translated as "sorcerers" that are thought to be the cause of all sickness and provide the necessity for healers in the first place. It may be hard to imagine how someone could be spiritually aware enough to use magick, yet do such things, but this is often due to cultural prejudice and a disconnection from the natural realities of having to kill to survive. People are very good at justifying all kinds of things and psychedelics have undeniably led some cultures down the road of human sacrifice and other authoritarian activities.

Entheogens can make a person aware of the spirit world whether or not they fit the hippie value system and the entheogenic or even the Occult experience is far too complex to be put in terms of black and white. While this sounds like fiction, it is undeniable your culture will effect how you interpret such experiences and what are justifiable acts of magick, which is one reason why I believe an Anarchist perspective is so central to all things spiritual. The worst thing you can do is fear a black magician, demonizing magick in general only encourages ignorance of magick which makes it easier to become a victim, but you should not kid yourself in to thinking that the act of taking psychedelics by themselves will make you a good person or an enlightened person. Psychedelics will often only make you more of what you are and what you will yourself to become, that is why you must have sincere intentions to grow and follow truth wherever it takes you. With such intentions you can confront your demons and become an aware person who has worked hard to learn how they can spread freedom and truth in the world. It takes a lot introspection, self questioning and integrating the lessons you learn if you want to avoid the ego traps and delusions, its not enough to just sit back and get high all the time, which is why having a magickal practice with a firm understanding of various mystical philosophy is so helpful for entheogens. If you have this seed of good intentions (your intentions arguably play the most important role) and nurture it honestly with hard work, it will grow and become amplified and overtake the ignorance that has been put in you by cultural conditioning.

Hippies are naive about how effective psychedelics will be in making people better because generally they are gentle hearted to start with. Although they may not put as much effort into confronting their demons, hippies aren't usually as big of slaves to them as the average bourgeois or otherwise authoritarian narrow minded elitist personality, who wouldn't even get in to practical entheogen use in the first place. While entheogens can make huge overnight changes and I am even an example of this, if you only have recreational intentions, after one slightly bad trip people generally move on to other drugs. If you have a general approach to life in which you seek out truth and want to grow your awareness, you may not have spiritual intentions but like me have a spiritual experience. However, entheogens do not violate your free will so much and if you are determined to be egotistical and cling to your paradigm, to go in to denial you probably won't have the dedication to use entheogens enough for them to help you and will probably block out memories of spiritual realities. People tend to distort their perspective on others based on who they are, so that others seem more like them then they really are, in this way atrocities caused by government and corporate individuals are not believed because regular people themselves could never do those acts and assume no one else ever could either. In this same way hippies sometimes think all we need to do is legalize drugs and everything will turn into a utopia, this delusion is the result of not facing the demons of naivete and ignorance towards other people, only associating with other hippies, as well as laziness towards personal, sociological and historical research.

To think all Shamanic cultures are utopian and spiritually aware is kinda racist, at least in terms of "positive racism" it is reducing the role of a "Shaman" to a simplistic caricature of the "noble savage," wilful ignorance creeps into all minds that do not actively and continuously seek to stamp it out, whether or not you live in the forest. While we have to be very careful about the propaganda and racist bias of Christian conquistadors, as well as the colonial archeologists and anthropologists, (even good people with good intentions have cultural bias) there is no black and white and no authorities on how all should live. With their war based human sacrifices I think its pretty clear that the Aztecs were not a utopian Anarchist society, yet they undoubtedly partook of entheogens. Even spiritual or Occult training is no guarantee that you will become a good person, take for example the Freemasons or any number of other groups who have no conspiracies attached to them, mind expansion is only helpful if you have first purified yourself through honest intentions and sincere and in depth personal exploration, otherwise you might just expand the same old crap that always was there. The myth of a purely good group of people existing is just as false as the myth of purely evil people, culture and memes can never determine the worth of a person, only the context from which these things are interpreted, what is important is intention to truth and the highest embodiment of truth that I know if is spiritual Anarchism. Not all Christians are “bad” and some groups have been incredibly Anarchist and altruistic, but not all Anarchists are “good” either, at least not totally and some who call themselves Anarchist can be incredibly puritanical, fundamentalist and elitist. The reality is that the idea of there being a culture that will make its people infallible and universally good is itself a form of elitism which is counterproductive to truth and is often the cause of humanities problems. Whether or not you take entheogens and experience that which is beyond culture, the experience cannot make you a good person, it can only show you where you are going wrong, but it leaves it to you to correct your own mistakes as an individual.

Before you multiply your gold you must first transmute all of your lead. If you are blind you may have the best intentions in the world, it does not mean you will be a good brain surgeon, no matter how much you really want to take out your friends tumour. Will psychedelics make you good? This are moot question when we come to realize there is no such thing as good and evil, but awareness and ignorance. You may know how to be a really good cop and have great intentions, but its useless if you don't know the system you protect is doing enormous harm and the criminals that you are locking up often have good intentions themselves. You can take all the entheogens in the world but if you do not care about the world around you, if you are ignorant of how other people are being treated due to politics, then you are turning your back on extensions of yourself. A loving New Age hippie who takes lots of entheogens but indirectly kills people through the economic system they support is not really much better than your average bourgeois person. An “enlightened guru” who does not know and act in accordance with the idea that we are all equal does not know much, especially if they claim we are all one, spiritual masters on isolated mountains in perfect bliss help no one but themselves. The illusion of there being a spiritual authority may in the beginning help mindless followers who wont take personal responsibility, but only if that authority is used to show their followers that each individual is the only authority for that individual. While some devotees seemingly must be tricked in to taking responsibility, anyone who does not teach how to lead and teach yourself, ultimately does not have knowledge worth teaching.

Various forms of Shamanism and the Occult are not religions, especially not in the way that we have been taught to think of religions, a Shaman or a magician is not a priest, these are people with practices and methods, rather than dogmas and faiths. (there are always exceptions and blends but religion is quite different then mysticism or the Occult) These methods can provide people with access to metaphysical and divine realms, providing direct experiences which can then be systematically and even scientifically experimented upon and in this they pose a huge threat to the mainstream paradigms fostered by religions and governments, or anyone with an ontological axe to grind. At the same time, given the environment which users of entheogens find themselves in once they come down, it is quite possible to be sucked in to the systems paradigm once more, to not follow through and apply the lessons learned on the trips, and in some cases can actually make the individual worse, with an inflated ego that thinks it's better then all those who have never had such experiences. Psychedelic use without ritual and spiritual work is shallow, and spirituality without Anarchism is narcissistic and selfish. Spirituality with hard work and entheogens is Illuminating, and Anarchism with sincere spirituality provides a metaphysical, psychological and creative tactical advantage to the great work of human progress. For these reasons we cannot rely solely on psychedelics which we deem as good and we cannot hate all people within the system, both these inclinations are the result of people who know that ignorance should be overcome, but are ignorant about how to do it. It is not some universal ideal of goodness, or pure LSD, or the best Occult or political book or guru you should be seeking, but truth and awareness itself and that is a journey that will take you many places, but in the end it will always lead back to just humble little you.

I have been working with Salvia a lot lately and it is interesting as an entheogen in that when you smoke the extract you do not really have epiphanies as with things like mushrooms or LSD, instead you have an incredibly weird experience which you are left to try and figure out, but through careful examination of these experiences you can learn many curious things about how reality works. The lessons that it can teach can be profound but can really take a lot of work to figure out what hell just happened to you. I remember the time I first tried Salvia Divinorum, it was a couple years ago and I was visiting my friend and we had bought ourselves some leaf and some 10X extract. We were both confident with psychedelics but we both knew this was going to be something much more than either of us could imagine. For example, my friend was the first one to really experience Salvia as he “broke through” he said he had seen a guy laughing at him from behind a cotton candy machine with a gnome like, pointed cone hat on his head. Everything had pretty much turned into a hallucination for him and he definitely looked confused, he said that “reality had been cut up into slices that he could see the insides of everything.” He momentarily forgot that he was high but I managed to remind him and calm him down and he was more or less OK.

When it was my turn, I inhaled and lied down on a futon, for me the closest I can describe it was as if space time reality were liquid paint on a canvas of physical dimensions and this canvas came undone at the roof and began to be rolled up. I could see outside of the house through the walls and sense or see my friend's mom upstairs in the kitchen. The whole room, or all of the space time reality painting began to be rolled up like a scroll and eventually my legs and lower body started to get rolled up. I became liquid elastic with everything else as we bent, until I had the sensation of flying around in circles as I was gradually being rolled up with the painting smaller and smaller. Finally I was being rolled up inside my own mouth flying around my teeth and then tongue around a vortex which was in the centre, what lay inside I could not say. Then all of a sudden everything was pretty much normal, though I had a lot of trouble putting my experience into words, I tried to explain to my friend but I didn't even know how to explain it to myself so I just mumbled funny noises of exasperation and astonishment, bah! Hah! Ooowaah! Gah! Jah! And so on as the last of trip faded away.

I cannot be sure where in the linear time scheme this was, but I think simultaneously to this rolling up trip, I had the experience of being halfway in and half out of the futon and seeing it from the inside. I could see the inner stuffing and the buttons from the inside and although there was no light in the futon or in the outside room where we had been smoking, (since we had been correctly advised that Salvia is best in silent darkness) I could see everything as if it was an extremely bright room, brighter than as if it were the middle of the day. This was all extremely disorienting and I didn't know what was happening at the time, but my friend tells me I had tried to stand up and walk around the room, though he managed to convince me to sit down. I don't really remember this except that I didn't want to go back inside the futon since that was too weird, the only thing I can think of is that I forgot that part because I left a linear perception of time and ended the trip where I had begun it.

Besides maybe smoking some plain leaf that was enough for the night, or even much longer, the rest of the time we just tried to understand what the hell happened to us. From this you might have some idea of the importance of having someone in a sober mindset to watch you. I could of easily tripped on things I could not see because I was hallucinating, or even ran out of the room on to the street thinking I was somewhere else. For me I would think about that trip for a long time, and each time I took Salvia, even in smaller doses it seemed as if I understood that the first trip more. Depending on the setting, it was as if it was consistently the same trip, except that each time I could explain a little bit more, understand what it all meant a little bit more, even continue it from where I left off. It seems very much to me now that the spirit of Salvia was revealing itself to me and teaching me about reality, though at the time of my first Salvia experience I was still pretty limited in my spiritual understanding and did not fully realize it, I am sure she has been there from the beginning.

Now if you were to take those trip reports by themselves, if you have not taken Salvia yourself it may be hard to understand the spiritual significance of such an experience. It is true I did not ritual or meditation that first time, but if nothing else the sheer amazing weirdness of Salvia and what the mind is capable of experiencing under it, opens up all kinds of undreamt of possibilities to the imagination as to what reality might just be. You will also have to understand that Salvia is far beyond the limits of language to explain and that without experiencing Salvia for yourself, you will have little understanding of what it is like. (even if you have done many other entheogens) For instance as I took Salvia more and learned more about mysticism and its correlations to entheogens I became better at understanding what might be happening. While the following trip report and interpretation may be hard to understand, it is even harder to explain, but many elements of it are things which many Salvia users such as myself seem to report experiencing, all of us independent of each other. I am forced to use metaphors and my own bias projections, but keep it in mind as something to consider as you learn and experience more.

It seems like we are all in an experience machine which systematically experiences every possible reality and time line, like a zipper travelling along a dissected fractal lattice of possibility and capable of combining the two sides of opposite possibilities to various degrees according to will. When we go to sleep or when we die, or when we take Salvia we are capable of choosing a myriad of possible universes presumably according to the principles of quantum probability from which we are always capable of leaving to enter in to parallel realities. It is as if we are like two gears, each with an ever increasing plethora of different spiralling "sensation packets," each accessed from a timeless position where possibilities are always being explored according to the will of each consciousness, for there own grace or their own torment. Each gear spins as the wheels of time and as two polarities coming together like a Jacob's ladder, or pieces of flint to form the spark of perception which is created when they meet, rubbing up against each other to contain a spark and in a sense work as its vehicle. These sparks of light are the fragments of the divine which are capable of going through any possibility, for any time period, as there true home is discarnate and within the lattice of reality itself, they are only limited by their knowledge of their place within the multiverse.

Through proper dedication and awareness anyone is capable of learning to do whatever they want, however they must experience the results whether or not they are what was expected. When we go to sleep we are capable of creating, or manifesting the next day more completely through our consciousness by learning the time line through entering a realm outside time. There is a place where "time" is made up of "sensation packets" that stream together to create consciousness. Imagine in empty space a series of 2D images which are not touching each other, but are in a linear procession, each 2D picture frame represents a unit of all of the stimulus for the five senses of a consciousness in that moment of time space. While each picture is 2D, it is experienced as a moment in regular 3D space time so that through time we experience the series of frames as a continuous perception. Each end of the stream (forward and backwards) spirals far off in to the empty void outside the range of sight, but in an ever increasing radius of circumferences, the sum total of all these pictures being a time line for one consciousness in one parallel dimension, or one set of decisions made by the consciousness. So, when we experience regular time, we are really just travelling through each of the 2D sensation packets, as if we were moving through film frames to create the illusion of a 3D movie, only all the senses are involved and not just vision and so you have the perspective of being in your body, looking your through your eyes as if they were a camera lens. Each 2D frame is then like a unit of consciousness, one which includes all sensory perceptions of that moment, so it is indistinguishable from a unit of time at it's most irreducible form for that consciousness.

In my experience psychedelics in general can dissolve the illusion of time and when you take enough you can see what exists in between the picture frames, or what is beyond the picture frames which is all the eye normally sees. I experienced this to the greatest degree by far on Salvia Divinorum but have had similar trips on other entheogens, seeing the 2D frames, though not beyond them as Salvia can do. Salvia seems to be able to stop time all together, to even allow a person to see other possible time lines. On Salvia I could see the different picture frames slow down to the point that they were being taken in by my eyes, then I saw what lay beyond and in between the frames as I described above.

While I certainly don't understand it, and quantum physicists don't understand it, the more I hear descriptions of it, the more these experiences make me think of the 11 dimensions thought to exist, as well as the membranes of "brane theory." This is even more interesting since I didn't know about these theories when I had my first Salvia experiences, but quantum physics tells us for each decision, or possibility for each situation or person, there is a branching out in to a different time line, what we will call a parallel dimension. In this explanation, I saw a different series of picture frames, so when you travel along the time line you are currently on, you are following the set of decisions and possibilities which are most probable for you to experience. Each of these spirals is like a tentacle in a larger spiral lattice, woven and intertwined with other time lines like rope or thread in a tapestry made by the fates, each person or entity has its own time lines, and possible times lines which it can decide to traverse. These spirals are so huge, they mostly appear as linear and strait, or flat just like surface of the Earth, yet are curved when you see them from far away enough. When you consider how your time line interacts with others, you can try and imagine it as each picture itself being the centre of another endless armed interlocking spiral web which exists in a different axis, so that in a sense you are always in the centre no matter where in the time line you are.

From the time we were just an egg and sperm in two separate places to the time we die, our existence is travelling along a conglomeration of this series of picture frames, which when combined or smooshed together as our total perception can be visualized as a snake. In the same way that our bodies are proportioned according to the golden ratio, the foetal position seems to be our most fractal and self similar posture, as it develops it grows along the extra dimensions as well and in a way that unites and brings together whatever picture frames we experienced. We could say that if we squished all the picture frames in the linear order together like sliced bread they become one solid object or fractal progression, or growth to a larger scale, one that represents our perception of time going by, but is in this realm, us zooming in to the image of a fractal. The colours of the fractal are the endless varieties of possible time lines woven together in spirals, but seen at a distance they look unified. They can be sorted out in a kind of colour coding system that depicts the nature of the potential time lines, so that a consciousness can know something in order choose which time line to enter.

As we zoom in to the fractal the parallel frames and the frames we see in the distance appear to grow larger or smaller, size is very relative here and difficult to describe as you seem to stay the same size, but can make everything else appear to change sizes as you move closer to them or will yourself to view them. This sliced snake which we experience as being unified is always present behind us in our memories, but we always perceive ourselves on the first slice or the cutting edge, we are in our perception of the present moment, the head of the snake, even though the future lies in front of us and is connected to us as a possible path. As we make different decisions and possibilities work themselves out, it is like this snake eats a new frame, then adds it to its body becoming longer and this is what appears as time. I should make it clear however that the snake does not alter or change any of the frames it incorporates in to itself, all time lines are always intact, if we imagine this realm with no snakes, no consciousness experiencing time we have unchanging eternity composed of all possibilities, all time lines. The snake is “the moving image of eternity,” it is consciousness deciding which potentials from infinity to experience, or remember from eternity by manifesting the experience in itself in terms of normal life, incorporating it in to a series of memories which make up the snakes body as it travels through various time lines. Eventually our bodies die and the whole snake can be thought of as one train of thought, or one train of anamnesis in the universal mind, the sum total of all snakes, all picture frames being the all, or universal mind itself. Each life is from this perspective, from egg to death one solid entity always existing, the egg being the smallest tip of the tail, death being the fully grown head, if you believe in reincarnation, then we have the Ouroboros eating its tail, going from one life to another, one train of thought to another.

On Salvia you can even experience time lines in other worlds, meet various entities, physical and non physical, visit in your lifetime all kinds of places totally alien to Earth. If it is a hallucination, it is a hallucination which can make consciousness experience things that physics, quantum or otherwise cannot yet explain, or is at least beyond my understanding of what physics knows. Besides the Salvia goddess herself, or my own familiars I have not really encountered many entities, but Salvia is so overwhelming it's hard to do very often, though chewing some extract and smoking some 5x definitely makes it much easier to navigate than strong extract. From my experiences and others it is not hard to see why Salvia is called Salvia Divinorum, in Latin this means “diviner's sage” and a diviner is someone who sees in to the future, such as the Native Shamans have been doing for thousands of years.

The future is not fixed though, and my experience reflects this, not only can you see what will happen if you continue on your present path, or time line, but you can see what will happen if you choose to do something differently and go down another time line. On Salvia you can see what will happen at each choice down the road as you go from parallel dimension to parallel dimension, so that you can find your way in the multiverse of all possibilities to get to the outcome you really want. I could see what needed to be done to manifest something according to will, I could even see how much I would like it if i succeeded in my act of will, then maybe choose something better and have that path plotted out for me, to show me what was necessary to accomplish that, but it was always based on what is possible given the window of opportunity of my life time. The less probable a reality is, the further away it is in the multiverse from your snake, but in life you are constantly moving forward, you cannot stop time except on entheogens and so depending on what event it is, it will have a certain window of opportunity in which something is possible. This works so that you have to get to the parallel dimension where the possibility exists before the snake moves forward in time to where the window of opportunity closes, some things can occur even after we die, sometimes the window closes on that day. The less probable it is, the more parallel dimensions of possibilities we have to cross to get there, but there are also less possible paths we can take to get there. Given a big enough widow of opportunity we can get to some very improbable time lines, but generally the smaller the window of opportunity, the less room for error we have for traversing the multiverse. This means if we fuck up one choice or one part of the causality to get to that time line, we might not be able to get to where we are going as there is no more path.

Experience is the subjective indent on the fountain of inexpressible existence. People believe that we are lucky to exist and in a certain way we are, but it is not really surprising or unlikely since existence must eventually come to fruition from the inevitability factor of an eternity of limitlessness. Of course we must be lucky because if we weren't we wouldn't exist, but of course there is no way we could not exist for all time, for as long as time exists in a limitless reality, everything must exist within it. Inevitably in eternity means all events occur, which has been called Chaos, but from that Chaos inevitably something that at least appears to be order, must appear at least briefly, but since we are working on infinite scales there is basically no way it could not be happening all the time in an infinite amount of places. So it is the world must exist, "the All" would not be "All" without the appearance of order within its unfathomable Chaos. So when we understand time as the realm which sorts out all possibilities, all realities or aspects of Chaos, life is the representation of a causal linear progression so that consciousness can recognize it, (through the faculties of the various gods) making time travel the real way to explore the universe. To reconcile the dichotomy of everything and nothing we must see what they have in common, they are perceptions on how an individual views experience within a strategically large variety of degrees and ranges. Within totality they are both combined as the all seeing eye of imagination, consciousness then sorts out from that totality the egos own projections of reality. So you must decide to see that you are able to decide to see, to know that gnosis is possible, but only by understanding that within totality.

What you focus on is what you are, so focus on finding something worth focusing on until you are sure you know how to maximize your potential for life. Look to your value system, determine your true will and plot a course to your highest passion, the truth of your own being. Those who do not know themselves, can never see how they create their own reality, this leads to us seeing less and less meaning in the world, or to us only seeing it within an authoritarian viewpoint, sometimes so much so that we are overcome and the world can seem as a void to which there is no satisfaction, the world of the nihilist. There is so much sadness as to overcome anyone with eyes, but there is always the possibility of real justice and equality when we learn to take control of our own mind and life. The present is the cutting edge of the past into an unforeseeable future but through magick, and the help of divination, it is a future which can be chosen. We can never see all the possibilities as this would take an eternity and the sum total of all possibilities understood in a non linear way is what eternity actually is, but while unseen variables to a materialist can be troubling, will and gnosis can overcome anything.

We are like sparks of light, or Chaos star spiders traversing a limitless web of possibilities in the realm of eternal Chaos, the more we understand our unity with all things, all times, all possibility, the better we are able to get to the time lines or strands that are in accord with our will, until by this magick we achieve our true will. As each consciousness develops over lifetimes it experiences a variety of time lines and views of reality, when it goes in to materialist fear based realities it loses its ability to consciously direct magick. Likewise the more it understands its unity with all things, the more it realizes its ability to choose which possible time lines to go down, or to put it another way the more it can consciously use magick. The transmigration of the soul then is to that most unlikely of places, the time line in which we totally realize our divinity. We experience this as the development of consciousness in its ability to understand its place within a unified reality and to determine where in the web it can be enlightened, or exercise its true will. As I said before, each lifetime is a meditation, or train of thought on the nature of universal awareness, all paths "inevitably" lead back to an understanding of the unity of Chaos in eternity and like the breaths of Brahman which create the universes, this Chaos is again divided to further explore all the other possible paths back to unity. This process of consciousness falling in to ignorance of reality, only to be reunited in oneness when the train of thought reaches its inevitable conclusion, is all part of a larger Alchemical process of the universal mind to take arbitrary abstractions in all its inevitable permutations which we call perceptions and transmute them to come to a greater and greater self awareness of eternal Chaos. It would seem that all the information, all the abstractions are always present, but it is not till they have been experienced or remembered by the universal mind that they are recognized as a means of self awareness through this process of time. So, the universal mind exists simultaneously in a state of all knowing Chaos, but also the seemingly divided recollections of its individuated sparks which perceive themselves in linear time, which is the focusing of perception to one possibility or time line at a time, thus necessitating a limited state of awareness.

That such a reality exists is beyond the imagination of most, but what is even stranger is that I am apparently not the only one to experience it, as I have found it at least strongly resembles descriptions of other people's Salvia experiences. It is a commonly held belief that the brain creates consciousness, certainly if you effect your brain you effect your consciousness, the brain which creates our perception of a supposed objective reality is composed of chemicals, so it is not unlikely that there are chemicals which can increase our ability to perceive unexplored parts of reality. How accurate my interpretation of my Salvia trips is, is questionable, I do not claim to fully understand the experiences, even if I am right, fully understanding the experience would mean fully understanding Chaos. One thing is obvious, entheogens are incredibly useful for exploring the possibilities of consciousness, even if they are totally psychological abstractions in a subjective realm of the unconscious, they pose an opportunity to better understand the human mind and with any increase in self awareness, lies the potential for a more harmonious and functional society. While I have seen aspects of this from the beginning, I have gotten the most out of it through ritual work where I have used Salvia to divine the future and while you don't have to believe in divination, you should believe me when I say such practices have aided my self awareness.

The world is suffering due to an enormous lack of self awareness on the part the majority of humanity and while the solution is not as simple as giving everyone a dose, anyone with the right intentions and practice can increase their self awareness to the point where they are capable of achieving their true will. With this comes not only an awareness of the necessity for Anarchy, but being capable of functioning in a world of Anarchists. While my ideas, or entheogens are not crucial to being a functional Anarchist, having a great deal of self awareness is crucial and I believe that entheogens and Shamanic and mystical practices are the best means humanity has for growing our awareness of consciousness. Whether atheist or of any religion, there are practices you can find which are appropriate to this end, yet remaining within your idea of what is ontologically possible. If we can learn to act as explorers of the possible rather than as authorities of truth, we can come together and we can unite in a spirit of adventure and experimentation that will lead us to a future which is currently unimaginably wonderful.

One Time Killing

And who would read me, who would want to know, who would see the point in listening to one who advocates the spread of "insanity".

Who would see.

Who would want to, who could stand it.

Listening in the dark, bathed in a brilliant twilight that recognizes the unforgettable tension of undressed desire, a scraping search of the impossible to be inside the one who is in all.

All out, in control of the unbalanced forces that throw the being into Chaos, searchin for a school of wisdom that says I don't have to be, because it doesn't work to do or not, I have to always go, outside of everything that's outside myself.

Lost in translations to the choir of the determined few dreamers who wont listen to anything which is not part of their expansive endless world.

No gurus, no help, no advice for you, just lost in bliss, just lost in something that is gone forever, that never left or never was.

Weird asylum of the sane that says it is true to be young, to be, to exist, to know not what it is that is known, a constant torture of fury that sends me to an adamantine calm.

Tangled separation of insecure fashion resistance, to the oblivious conclusion of the procrastinating masses sitting in a bath of universal solvent.

Sylphs dance and the wind blows away my heavy heart into the star chased sky running down the moon, there is a storm coming and I feel more comfort in knowing I will be put out of my warm cocoon.

If they don't tell you what you want to hear they aren't worth listening to are they?

Nope its a declaration of risen torment, a blended con-fusion of upset wonders concerned only with saving the world in a selfish way, no one here worth saying much, worth going through, worth finding value.

Heavy beats in the streets, its good to be the king, but do I need to wear the crown of thorns?

I always like guillotine revolutionary mentalities when it comes to those who would control.

Lose control, there is always control, no control I see no order or undone disorder, disappointment or despair, neither-neither.

Its OK, just listen to me and Ill solve all your problems, just like everyone else but you.

There is no one who can help you because you are the only one.

You don't listen to me because I am you, because I tell you this I am dangerous to your beliefs, because of this I will be ignored, it cant be true, it terrifies me when they say anyone who says something scary isn't worth listening to.

I listen to them.

Delicious mania take me home.

This is all a joke you cant listen to someone who is declared by convention to be of unfit perceptions, at last a final solution, ignore anything that contradicts what it is that is most cozy, stay cozy in your little cell, my asshole is so cozy, I will keep my head there, I will live inside where it is warm, even though I am still inside myself, I am the divine asshole and I am full of shit.

Always inside my views, no one to look through, no other eyes, just narcissistic obscenities.

We live in a slaughter house of resurrecting murderers who never lose their innocence no matter how many times we kill each other, look at meee! I am hanging from a meat hook!

Who wants to drink my blood?

I will be quiet when I listen to others, I will be quiet when people will listen,

Give dangerous ideas to watch the world burn, we all have to learn from our mistakes some time and might as well get it over with.

No one hears you, they just watch the lips to see when its their turn to talk.

Chatter chatter chatter no one hears a thing with all those thoughts flying lose.

A picture of the imagination which looks like fluid construction, the improv concealment of the creation through the modalities of art articulated by the pine cone inside our brain.

Its gonna get better, just don't worry, just don't worry,

Listen to all and you will hear what you really think,

Everyone is a teacher, the language of the universe works by speaking only to those who care to listen, build your vocabulary with the conscious mind, using words that are non verbal symbols so that the unconscious may hear them.

Use the symbols to build a chariot or vehicle for your body of light to ride through the astral world of the eternal now, empower it with your mind then ride it with your soul.

My teacher is all around, it is to those who will care enough to speak, if you cannot decide for yourself what is real, then no one can tell you anything.

Don't turn into a flower, don't forget the lesson of narcissus lost in a reflection, don't forget I am nothing special but that does not mean my words are not as important as anyone else's, especially if they put you off.

If you want me to shut up and go just say nothing and we can pretend like you didn't reject me but we just gradually lost touch, fading away like two old friends who slowly stopped talking, remembering each other fondly because the break was done through well meaning lies, all the while knowing it was over long ago, but then its not as fun to lie to yourself if I tell you how you are in denial.

You will find the centre of the web without me.

Chapter 9 – Thus, The Open Door

This weird life continues and it keeps getting weirder, I learn more but as I learn I realize the ignorance of our culture more and more and that most people don't see where culture ends and they begin. Most people aren't really living, at least relatively speaking they are just imitating living people, playing a game, make believe, a group hypnosis trance dance for the deaf. Being a freak is one thing, the alienation of not having much in common with most people, but having the experience on a day to day level that you are the only being in reality is quite another. I am one with universe, but a lot of the time it feels like that means I am the only one in the universe that exists. Synchronicity happens so often it feels like I am unconsciously controlling other people and I definitely do not want to control other people, but it feels like I am manifesting everything by myself. I can see through peoples egos, they seem like poorly written characters on a TV sitcom, no doubt people are so infected by TV memes they have largely become an amalgam of TV characters, but more than this, they seem like characters within my dreams, and I know I am dreaming.

I wonder if I am alone in the universe sometimes, that I as a divine being created everyone just to keep me company, that I have been alone in eternity and that immortality has made me senile and this world is my escapism from that reality. This makes me feel like I must be pretty self centred, or even elitist, but it's scary as well, its not something that makes me feel superior at all. This makes socializing and romance pretty hard, talking to other people in many ways seems like I am perpetuating that escapism and delusion, not to mention how weird or crazy I come across to other people, especially if I talk about these kinds of things. I wonder if there is a woman out there that feels the same as I do, some kind of divine counterpart for me, who knows? Right now I would settle for someone who would even care enough to listen or could at least distract me for awhile.

I slept with Helen again, the sex was great but sleeping next to her afterwords when I tried to think of how to talk to her about this stuff, I realized how alone I am. I think maybe I feel more lonely when I am with a girl, than when I am by myself, since at least when I am alone I can dream of something better. The next day we got in a big fight, she has been making a lot of money lately and has been really fucked up, I have hardly seen her, but I found her whacked out on the street and had given her a place to crash and she stayed a few days. I haven't seen her since the fight four weeks ago and I am not sure if I want to see her again. I told her I want to be with her, but she needs to clean up and she didn't want to do that, she admitted she cares about me but she can't get clean and I think she wants to die. I cannot help but love her, but watching her slowly kill herself is almost worse than her rejecting me outright, no matter how I try to build a life with her, to show her there are things that are so much better than heroin and speed, I am at a loss as to just how I can end her addiction. If we are all one I don't know what the one sees through her, she is a mystery, she is alone just like me, in her heart she is untouched and pure, in my heart I am alone until I face my fear of eternal loneliness. Is Helen my divine counterpart? Well maybe, but its clear that when you are an angry loner being with someone just like you does not necessarily make for a good couple, that if I don't understand me she won't even have a clue, that if I don't really want to be alive, she won't want to be a part of my life either.

I have no desire for most of the world or thoughts of dominating anyone, but doing magick in this state of mind is quite easy, I can manifest many things to a degree that has never happened before. I have to be careful of my mindset, not to get too scared about this, but at the same time I wonder why I should manifest anything and not just let the universe dissolve in to the fiery spirit which lights the way for the unseen world that lies beyond what we call the senses. I feel like Merlin gone mad and so I plan on going out to the wilderness on a camping trip to have some time to think. I need to find my place in the world, I need to figure out how I can use magick for the good of all without imposing my will on others. I need to figure myself out, to get some idea about what reality is, away from the artificial systems of humanity and all the hierarchies and ego games. If I am one with the world then the world's problems are my own problems, a reflection of my mental illness and I need to sort them out so that I can help to manifest peace and Anarchy. I must still have hierarchical and non Anarchist tendencies within myself, at the very least its in the other people who I am one with, so I have to figure out how to help them... help us. The idea of spending eternity alone like some kind of hermit god seeking wisdom in the dark is no doubt, really fucking lonely, I am not sure what I can do about it, I am not even sure how I could love romantically being in such a mindset. I realize now I have to learn how to be happy alone before I can be happy with anyone, that like it or not I have begun my spiritual transformation and as so many Occult texts warn, once you start the process there is no stopping, that it is better to never begin, then to try and stop halfway through.

All I can try to do is focus on Anarchism, how to get everyone on a level ground with each other, how to increase awareness and freedom for all people. I definitely haven't overcome my ego or attained some kind of Buddhist enlightenment yet, but I do feel like I am growing my awareness, I can only hope I get somewhere happy. Much of the time I am happy, most of my sadness does not come from events that happen to me, but the horrors that go on in the world, however this alienation that I feel is no doubt incredibly depressing and I even think of suicide sometimes. Maybe if I kill myself I can prove my total faith in the divine and so transcend, maybe the only way out of this world is by an act of wilfully leaving it fearlessly. At least if I kill myself I will reincarnate and be in blissful ignorance again, but then I know there is no getting out of this world that way, I would likely be just as unhappy in the next life as this one. Who knows this whole thing could of happened before, I find out I am divine, freak out and commit suicide, each time I reincarnate and try and face it again. If I am one with everything, if I kill myself will I destroy the whole universe? Would I only get bored and lonely with an empty void and have to create everything again? These lofty ideas which fill my intellect, sharp or dull as it may be, can lift me up into the air and on to the heavens, but like a double edged sword can send me crashing to the ground and while sometimes I may wish to spill my guts in some kind of seppuku, it is clear trying to communicate the invisible forces which blow my mind is not pointless, even if it is just venting and that I should hold on to the breath of life. My life seems to be the divine trying to sort out its consciousness in a tangible way, this time I realize by being so unhappy and dying, I will manifest some kind of depressing reality for myself in the next world or next life, so I can't even escape by suicide and I might as well try to learn to be happy as I am. Outside of Anarchist pursuits acting in the material world definitely seems unimportant, I don't have attachment to most of this world, but then maybe most of my attachment is focused on the idea of replacing the government with Anarchism. None of the spiritual people I meet seem to be able to really help me or even understand what I am going through, they are still having their mind blown by basic New Age concepts, but why should I be surprised that we all have to face our fears of solipsism alone.

Temporal Pastures

Walking down the street I gaze at the trees planted along the sidewalk, they seem to be filled with an inner love for me, perhaps some of the truest love I have ever perceived.

I found myself lying in a bed next to her, I stand up and her arms reach out as if to ask me not to go, as if she is someone who wanted me.

I knew she wasn't real and just a figment of my head, what is a solipsist who is in love with being alone suppose to do?

I am not gay, I know that now, there is no doubt, I find it even harder to be around males these days, I love women, but I love being alone, or at least I want to love being alone.

I think sometimes I am sitting in a corner mumbling to myself, shaking my head,

I lie down again and stroke her hair as she lies next to me,

I imagine I am in a padded cell trying to avoid the reality I am in,

With each romantic encounter with a girl I can feel my heart die just little bit, and then more,

Lying next to her I realize I feel almost nothing anymore, she is beautiful, I can get hard, I can give it to her, I know it means nothing.

I realize now I was never rejected, I was always the one too messed up to think they were worth acting human for.

I think about dumpster diving, I want to go, as above so below,

Perhaps I can search through the trash of my life for some hidden treasure, some morsel of nourishment that I will later shit out of me, maybe even a holy grail filled with spirits for me to drink deeply.

I am too weird I tell myself, its a dream she couldn't love me, I want to find a portal in the bottom of a dumpster, a doorway that will take me to my home in the other world,

Street elementals of the city, electric light fairies dot the sky and we do a little dance punctuated with that goblin laugh, the other world is calling.

No, a part of me says she is true, she is real, the cell is the divergence, its so much easier to be crazy then to have to go outside, live outside, think about the outside in your inside, imagine the outside with your insides, they say don't live the inside in your outside.

I am one of the psychedelic refugees living in the back alleys of the labyrinth in the universal mind,

One of the failed seekers who have found the centre of the enigma, one of the winners of the human race, a loser to most of those who see me.

Its time for some graffiti, I will leave my mark as we all eventually do, I was here, if this place ever existed.

I bite my lip, there is always dried skin for me to peel off with my teeth,

I know now I always wanted to be alone,

I know now I cant remember why I wanted someone.

Is there any unselfish romance? Is a mutually selfish romance worth having if it is by all other standards healthy?

If I truly loved a girl, the only good thing to do would be to save her from me, save her from my madness, my beautiful holy madness, my ecstasy, my torment, my nothing, my joy, my dreaming her in the first place.

Even soul mates break up and if I love her I will set her free, set her away to not be exposed to something that will destroy everyone that has ever been.

To go with me means to lose everything with a smile.

I forgot what love means, but I remember now I never knew,

Here in her arms I witness before me, the death of my heart, and the birth of my soul.

Will there ever be, or can there ever be an end to fractured existence? If anything is possible then the answer is yes, but then eventually it goes to follow that it must return to the current dualistic existence. What is it? Even with that idea “it” goes in cycles, or at least my progression of thought seems to, not repeating, progressing but reminiscent to be sure, more like a spiral. If there was a beginning then you would think there must be an end and if there never was a beginning then you would think that there never has been any existence at all, only nothingness. Is a return to nothingness the ultimate goal? Is nothingness achievable for an eternity? Again if anything is possible, but I suppose that's up for the divine to decide even if all the divine is, is us. Then again they say “nothing is impossible” so perhaps this means nothingness is impossible, if it “nothingness” isn't included in “anything.” I can't really tell the difference between nothing and everything anymore, oneness and separation, linear time and non linear, its all the same in the end, its all Chaos.

I find the idea of solipsism lonely and somewhat nihilistic but I suppose if I am the only one alive I better learn how to come to grips with it so I can stop reincarnating into different bodies and hopefully find something more fulfilling. Oh what irony to think that of all the things “god” could be doing it chooses to exist in this world, kinda makes things seem a bit more special if it thinks this is worth all the effort. Existence is full of irony like this, some kind of cosmic humour I'm only beginning to understand, but I guess in a never ending process, a process that has never started and that I have already completed, I'd relatively always be at the beginning of my understanding. The rules of reality are always changing to fit the beliefs of the individual perceiving it. The better we learn to flow with these changes the better off we are. Though sometimes these changes can seem disturbing they are always for the best. Everything happens for a reason and the divine doesn't make mistakes, except in the mind of the human ego which has no comprehension of such things.

When we see other people we most often just see a reflection of ourselves, when we hate someone, we often hate those qualities within ourselves, when we lie to someone we lie to ourselves. Its always important to understand when dealing with others that we are not perfect judges of character, in fact we are most likely pretty bad judges of character, people are so complex it is on the verge of impossible to fully understand another, especially considering most do not really understand themselves. This is even more true if you consider we are all part of the same underlying force, so really we should never be quick to judge another, for you are most likely only judging yourself.

How can a solipsist who's main goal is to leave all physicality ever fall in love? Luckily I am not quite a solipsist, at least not all the time, I know that I exist in other peoples minds just like they do in mine, I probably wouldn't mind sticking around in the physical so much if it wasn't so lonely all the time, if I could just find some understanding. Like I said anything is possible but the pain comes when unrealistic expectations are placed on the other person, hoping somehow someone could make you live “happily ever after.” Once complacency happens it takes away the focal tension point from which the enjoyment was derived. The main obstacle to lasting happiness is depending on that lasting happiness. Everyone wants someone better than themselves it seems, I always thought I wanted an equal, but then how could my equal fulfil a fairy tale ending? Its unfair of me to expect that from someone, especially when I seem to be so unable to give it to anyone, but then if you question the value of accepting the idea of separate entities from yourself, it becomes much easier to justify isolationism, for the hope of learning to cope with true reality.

The truth is I cannot really imagine any kind of romantic love that wouldn't be dependent on roles and conditions, nor could I really imagine how I could give that kind of love to anyone in a romantic situation. Does this mean its impossible? Or am I in fact here to try and comprehend the idea so it could be created and experienced with the divine feminine? The union of immortal love untouched by fluctuation and stumbling blocks providing bliss for all time.

I guess these questions can be answered with the summation of this one, is it more beneficial to learn to be happy alone for eternity, or to experience true romance for all eternity? The only evidence I have suggests that the latter is most likely impossible, however presuming to know anything based on any past experience sets you up for more limitations than any conceived constant variables ever could. So it occurs to me that if equals to ourselves are truly the best possible romantic match, then “happily ever after” with another could only really be achieved when we learn to be happy ever after alone. This is bad news for all those hoping to be rescued, but then I guess the only thing people need to be rescued from is themselves.

If by chance someone great really tried and succeeded at “rescuing” someone emotionally, the rescued person would really only be tricked into happiness and wouldn't really have it. Not only this they would be forever depending on another. Even if the rescuer were selfless and truly altruistic this would not be a healthy relationship for either person. Eventually the rescuer would begin to suffer for it and unless the rescued were totally selfish they would see their partners pain and be troubled by it, then they would cease to be happy ever after. If by some rare chance the purely selfish and purely altruistic person did get together, the altruistic person would eventually see that it is in the best interests of the selfish person that they become a better person. That the only way this could happen is to show the selfish person they can't treat others so badly and so the relationship must end. This drama which I just described is no doubt (but in less black and white situations) the cause of many if not all romantic problems. This is a great example of cosmic irony as you can't have something if you make happiness dependent on it.

Unfortunately for me I find it hard to value love if it is dependent on me not needing it or usually even wanting it. It seems to be able to be achieved initially, then I get addicted to it and so it goes. Avoiding love tends to bring it to me, so I will just try not to think about it, at least until I am a better person, it's all maddeningly Taoist or magnetic. This view of love of course does not include the fact that even if a relationship or person is not “perfect” by ego standards, that it can still have great potential value. Nobody on Earth is perfect and so really the search for a perfect love is just the faint memory of the search for perfect spiritual love, not that romance doesn't have its place in that. I suppose true love means loving the persons faults and all. I generally am an extremist or nothing and extreme romance is not easily accomplished. Though I continually see my ability to manifest increasing, I know when the time is right, if it can be right, I will find her as I know she would be looking for me. An equal co creator with harmonious intentions complimentary to my own.

The hard part is dealing with this idea, is it a solipsist universe? How does one cope with being “God/dess”? Are we alone for all time? Realize you and I are Samael, the blind idiot god who sees nothing but itself and falsely believes it is all there is. I believe in the end there is always more, there are entities perhaps at all possible levels of experience, if not you would be in such a state you wouldn't mind being alone, so do not fear for that is the ego trying to fool you into its cloud of illusion.

Universal Drifter

Floating on the ocean of eternity, waiting for the past to leave me, eating a dream inside my head, thoughts are screaming everything which is said.

But I know there's a place to go, where frosty colours of mercurial design, form a living liquid painting exploding out my eyes.

In my mind and in my life there is only one artist.

Despite the most stubborn of rocky blocks, the waters of imagination can flow around anything.

Unprecedented errors become incorporated into the whole of a masterpiece, without which would be sorely incomplete.

To smash all rocks you gotta be even harder, learn to be the Tao and you can always flow much farther.
If not wanting to play a role makes me strange, then call me a lunatic.

If not valuing the electronic appliance chains of my prison makes me a lazy bum, then brother can you spare a dime?

Watch the ebb and flow of life, and see the miracles unfold.

Waves escalating to concrescence and melting back into a blissful frothy sea.

I live the only way I know how, searching for what makes me free, but does eating out of garbage cans ever bring world peace?

I watch the demons and their death machines, viewing life from various screens,

Their whole life is nothing but deceptive memes.

I have forgotten how to act and now I am working behind the scenes.

Some how I trust my own eyes enough to know no THING could ever give me happiness.

Endorphin addicted lovers justify their needs as crucial, willing to create an image to avoid withdrawal, but all I need is that which is truthful.

How long would it be before you plainly see, through my mask of attempted sanity.

How could anyone fall in love with me, with someone with no identity?

The illusive mutual deception, that you are not another created version of me.

When the universe is your house, there is nowhere that feels like home,

No one knows better the hardness of physicality than Icarus.

I miss myself but here I am in the flesh, all around me not always getting along with each other.

Multiple personalities in a plethora of bodies and forms.

The tumbleweed can never grow roots, they are always stopped by electricity absorbing boots.

You could talk with the trees if you cared enough to listen, or maybe you'd be too scared of what they'd say?

I stared through your clear head and it looks as if I'm not there.

I say goodbye to the world as I exit my vehicle.

We all fear change because we doubt things could get better, so I created a playground schoolyard,

But when you finally know everything there is to know,

You could only enjoy remembering as the only way to grow.

Desire is but a figment of logical conditioning, we are all just nourishment junkies.

We all seek a feeling of some kind, even if its spiritual sublimity,

In an insane world could a knower of the truth appear as anything but crazy?

We are taught what they want us to think is real, but we can only learn by ourselves.

So we think the adversary will protect us, until our lessons are learned, but it's just fears method to stall, so on broken glass I painfully crawl, drooling with a grin to the end of the rainbow.

These colours of the spectrum are all places simultaneous, your pot of gold is everywhere only thought to be extraneous.

Even through the use of tact, we are doomed to exact,

Revenge on ourselves for manipulating, while we should have been concentrating,

Saying what we think and living the blunt unpolished truth,

Having an open and honest opinion is more important than feeling uncouth.

Adversity builds character, progressing awareness to the next level of your love and strength capacity.

The creative inertia builds exponentially for the materialization of any thought till there is only sagacity.

Pleasure and pain become all the same, when you treat life as one big game,

And all you can do is sit there and stare, everyone's worries are a misdirected care.

From whence we came so we shall go, to the heavens "above" whatever you may know.

Just smile back, even if you only see these as phrases.

They're all there waiting, they all want you to see and love, not the blasphemous human imitation called romance, love of truth and love of life, love of growth and love your fear, philos forever or coldness descends, the universe is one unless you pretend.

Multiplied infinity is always the same number,

Realize this and you will wake from your slumber.

This is an ode to you my love, which is my search of the only truth,

Thoughts are the crests of waves on the river of experience and imagination, and time is the current,

A focus on the continuously flowing, watery lucid aether.

As it flows the current produces friction against anything enveloped inside it, thus creating senses.

Feeling of the experience is the only true measure of what the scenario means to you.

To think of something is to only touch the surface membrane of experience.

But only by plunging into feeling do we truly understand the implications.

All rivers flow to the ocean beyond, where amalgamated currents unknown sway to and fro.

There is no such thing as nothing, except itself, the observer is nothing there is only the subject.

Once the observer has been seen it becomes the subject and nothing melts through the clasp of identification.

If divinity is omniscient then it sees the whole of us and our future actions, designing its plans accordingly.

So we can best do its will by using our free will, this is the true beauty of "submission to god".

A perfect utopia of Anarchy is created by living true to our will, yet harming none as they are ourselves, nor impinging their free will.

Perfect love is pure hedonism, you could even say the most loving is the most healthily selfish.

If for no other reason be good to others for you will be your own objective judge, who's punishments could not be more severe.

The more lies are created the more split is your appearance, fracturing your soul, the enemy of truth which is the essence of integrity, having one whole personality.

With pure creativity discrimination is impossible and quality becomes arbitrary.

I cross the cosmos alone, learning archaic secrets long forgotten for the pleasure of relearning them.

I can create anything but contentment.

It's as simple as not desiring anything, and when I realize my perfect happiness,

I will cease to exist, and all that ever was will be, always just a part of me.

Its hard to find true love when you question all reality,

As searching for the truth you seem to lack all certainty.

Optimist nihilism, always happy never counting on anything.

There's a fungal silence which is deafening, then you hear these common place aliens whisper without your ears,

Eventually, we all see the eternal fractal flower, the sacred geometry of the universe underlying all things is perfect symmetry, the unfolding rose on a cross of desire.

All the colours and shapes of synchronal overlapping creating homogeneous variety.

Those who use fear to control are those who are most afraid,

Those filled with hate have the greatest capacity for growth in love, its just denied.

Turn your back on no one, though they may try to stab you in the front, and watching everyone turn from you will cause tremendous pain, until you are so calloused you don't think its possible to feel again.. but you always do.

If you stare at the sun for too long, it will be the last thing you ever see.

Give the slaves their own house and TV, and they will return to work thinking they're free.

Your prison cell needs junk for your identity, go to the temple of decadence mart, it has the lowest fee.

The heart of the universe cannot stop pumping,

So do what you can to dance to the vibrations of the beat.

In between the pulses, singing sacred names
Dance to the tragedy of its awesome splendour,
As you live closer to the truth, you will see yourself in all yet be known by none.
Till one day you will seriously ponder whether anyone else is real, or just a truth of a failed sensory conception
That we could all be robots programmed to think we have organic bodies, the possibilities which could explain are endless, but what explains every facet could easily be misjudgement.
Relative logic always dependent on some other tenuous theory, like a house of cards permeated by the air, the real structure supports no manual constructions.
To attempt to convince someone who doesn't know is fruitless, there is no expressing how knowledge transcends thought.
As our thoughts have a background and foreground, there is always things at one time we do not conceive.
To think of moving ones arm requires no words articulated in the mind, and so we must master the feeling of the body in reference of some kind.
The pure grandeur of eternal growth.
You can build any framework for yourself, and name it what you will, but as you inevitably expand, you will destroy the strongest of structures, left with fluid form to congeal anew.
Attempting in vain the perfect framework, cycle with the pulses that rise and fall..
From realization of our rulers prison, inside their holographic phantasmagoric theatre projected from the mass of minds, we must know that we can escape, for we have created the bars and guards.
Ancient gods once the friends of humanity, had their images stolen and meaning became substituted by vampiric institutions using deception to ensure their survival.
But we are their creators with the energy of our attention, and they the creators of our experience, the methods of our transmutation.
Transcendence of our reality comes with the knowledge that it is our minds creation, we are one with the gods and the prison, it cannot hold us for it is us and we it and everything outside.
All things are possible with enough self knowledge, with mastery of our demons through an iron clad will, we can end their control and stop our corruption.
Such is the nature of evolution.
Though stagnation may seem desirable it is ultimately impossible.
Only when we transform into light will time be forever still and the nature of immortality realized, to go in to the event horizon, to the singularity of a black hole.
Where the unformed potential of Chaos left to be defined waits for our return,
In this place where time and space do not exist, only here can we truly rest.
Where the ability to go and do whatever you want without the encumbrances of bodily limitations is ever present.
Bleak cries and starry eyes, leaves me marching to a home that comes, walking on and all around, trying to make my feet leave the ground.
Clueless as to what position to view the all surrounding mirror, looking closer I cant see myself and everything becomes clearer.
I am older than time and beyond all measure, a visitor form the sky, living but I don't try.
Breaking into a multitude of unique fragments, I am only one small piece reflecting light.
Shimmering star dust flows into spiralling clouds of an unending number of dimensions, each a multiverse unto itself,
Left for me to explore, forever. ..

Most people in their forgetfulness basically believe all reality is limited to the five senses, which is of course what lets us exist in a tangible universe, but there is much more to what makes us conscious, especially in terms of our self awareness. Consciousness is knowing that we exist, it is the fabric of our universe, and the universe is the manifestation of imagination. In my experience and according to ancient philosophies around the world, essentially it boils down to the idea that “god” or the universal mind or imagination has split itself into different persona's and made characters for every possible story. The boundlessness of the universe is simply the boundlessness of it's/our imagination. The All, since it must contain all things “made” us in its image in the sense that we are part of its imagination, but we were never really “created” since the All always contains all things at all times. We are likened unto it in the same way people in our dreams are made in our image and our dreams remain in our subconscious after we experience them, the difference being the All is experiencing all things simultaneously. All this reality is, is allusion to the processes of the mind and so taking the symbolism of the divines mental processes at face value, as the only true reality is illusion. You are the personification of some aspect of the divines will, if you were not then you would not exist for the divine does not create things it does not will to exist, but as you are not separate from it, from Chaos or the All it is your will as well. This divine consciousness and fulfilling of new experiences from the imagination would be one of the many true meanings of life.

If I were an immortal being in an empty void of reality, if I were to experience complete nothingness around me for all eternity I would get more then a little bored and probably would not be enjoying my existence, we might even say the divine is afraid of the dark, afraid of loneliness in the void. (when I was in a more ego oriented state of mind this is pretty much a stage of what happened on my first acid trip) If I was omniscient one way to manage such an overwhelming amount of information would be to create a symbolic representation that interacts with itself in a consistent manner with the faculties of the mind. Different segments could function by having a limited portion of omnipotence and awareness and could be regulated by the level of inclusion, or the level at which that segment desires to increase its portion or knowledge of the total mind. Since all reality is, is knowledge of existence, we in this universe are really just part of “god” in one single mind, in essence bodiless and without form, Chaos or you could even say void so as to avoid projecting any abstraction. Each of our minds have different sides to it, different parts to it, depending on things like mood, past experiences and current environment and so we can become very different people, to the point that sometimes it seems like we all have a bit of split personalities.

The reason the divine would want to do this is kind of like how our eyes work, with only one eye we see without depth perception which is a less accurate way to view the world, with two eyes, each eye works together using the other as a reference point to better define the bodies position to something else. With all the different viewpoints available to Chaos through each created thing, (not just humans are created in the divine imagination but all things) there are potentially limitless ways for this mind to examine itself, to become aware of awareness. By having different segments look at different segments in different combinations it provides a limitless source of reference points and so the omniscience that must come to something defined as divine. Are we the observer? Or the observed? We learn by identifying as both at different times, we are the whole feedback loop and everything else.

We are living in a consensus reality of living incarnate souls who choose to make that reality anyway we want collectively, though there has always been different divisions of shared and personal reality. No bodies beliefs are ever exactly the same, but we can shape our views to coexist with each other more effectively and this is in many ways the developing self awareness of the divine mind. The world is the inner reflection of each of our minds, what we see of the world is actually ourselves and the judgements we make are the reflection of our egos. When others look at us they do not see us so much, but themselves and all our egos in ignorance of our oneness, hence the warning “judge not lest ye be judged.” Self hatred and unwillingness to become aware have caused some pretty evident problems, the world right now is unfortunately a kind of competition ground for ideas on how things are, pure thought taken form. With the right thought you can acquire any form of matter imaginable, this thought may be a rational idea on how to acquire things mechanically or it can be much more metaphysical, ultimately the distinction is an illusion, the only limiting factors are awareness, desire and knowledge of what you truly expect.

The world is constantly adapting itself and changing itself to fit your view, if you don't believe this, then the world will take that form. People who scoff at such ideas don't do what is required to test this theory and then often think they have seen plenty of proof that it is wrong, when really they are proving the idea correct and not even realizing it. This ignorance of how deeply we project our consciousness on to reality is carefully cultivated by materialist culture, followed up by the belief that materialism is freedom from such subjective realities, when in fact it is the attempt to impose a single and fixed subjective reality which will allow them to deny their responsibility.

Every thought bares imprint on the fabric of reality based on the energy absorbed. Think of your mind as a universe unto itself, you see, hear, believe, think and do whatever you want, if you think about it this is how people live their lives. Nothing is real unless we want it to be, a materialist objectivist wants reality to be their way and so it is for them, this is not seen by most people because they don't want it to be. If they start to know it they usually forget it, then forget that they forgot so they can ignore it completely. Most are not willing to take responsibility for such things or spend time even considering it in depth when in their reality, there are so much more important things to pay attention to on TV. Unfortunately self awareness, even the secular kind is not a high priority for most and the price of comfort that comes with conforming to the consensus materialist anti-magick reality is your divine creative abilities. So it is most haven't real-ized it, or more likely they haven't even really imagined such a thing, if you can't imagine it then you cant really desire to real-ize it. If someone wants to believe in "god" they do and if they don't they don't, some people are brought up with the notion that some form of the divine is real, but that form can only exist to us if we want it to, a belief in any particular "god" alone is wishful thinking, just as atheism is wishful thinking. The reality is Chaos beyond human abstraction and culture and that is is something which demands too much attention in a world of consumer distractions.

This may seem like arrogance to some, hubris is the word, but careful consideration of these ideas shows that it really can be an overwhelming and even terrifying thought, it is a lot of responsibility knowing you are divine and the urge to deny it out of hand is generally due to the intuitive fear that it is correct. To literalist Christians and Jews this is the height of blasphemy, but to them I quote Jesus who in turn was referencing psalm 82 of the old testament, "is it not written in your law, I said, ye are gods?" This is even scarier once you realize you probably have to change everything about your life to live in line with this truth, in many ways it appears things are more complicated the more aware of your divinity you are, acting in selfish and ignorant ways is not so easy to justify and you are forced to reevaluate everything you thought you knew. It is hubris to say you are the only one who is divine, but it takes time and effort and a whole lot of perseverance to raise your awareness and the closer to identifying with universal oneness you are, in many ways the more you will carry the weight of the world, after all you are the whole world and you haven't been taking care of yourself. The damage that is piling up exponentially due to our neglect makes it even more terrifying to do what is necessary, this fear drives us to be even more neglectful and procrastinate further about any ideas in regard to fixing the damage caused by humanities neglect and ignorant actions. Because of fear we are like addicts of ignorance and it seems to me, perhaps one of the most fundamental desires of humanity or at least the ego, is to not have to take responsibility for creating our own reality. Since this denies the reality that the ego is all their is, the side effects of this desire are everywhere to be seen and it has left us in quite a sorry state.

In my universe there is no good or evil, right or wrong, happy or sad as all these are a point of view, a way of seeing something. This is not nihilism, its "anihilism," everything is left for us to define for ourselves, so is everything meaningless? Only if you want it to be, I try to keep my universe ever expanding and as big as possible. People try to find happiness in many different ways such as drugs and if you have ever tried drugs, its easy to go down that road like so many others and find happiness, at least for a little while. Others are addicted to consumerism or sex based in deceit, or even ego gratification through religious authoritarianism, but all these are methods of treating the symptoms of unhappiness and ignoring the cause. The more you depend on external sources of happiness, the more you will want to depend on them, until your universe starts to get smaller and focus on nothing but that illusive temporary happiness, this does not mean you have to abandon pleasures of the flesh, but that you cannot depend on them, you cannot be attached to them. Most people have a variety of addictions, some specialize and want to indulge until their universe becomes so small that drugs or whatever it is become everything and of course by then its to late, they cannot imagine life or happiness without the addiction. Once you think the only thing that could ever make you happy is drugs or consumer products, you may find yourself sucking dick for crack money, or whoring yourself at a different job you hate. Most people realize before this that crack isn't the answer, but many many people are product junkies and through economic and environmental concerns this is an addiction that effects the whole world, where as a crackhead just hurts themselves. Good and bad, happy and sad do not have to be defined by external events when you truly know how your mind operates and what it is you really want, what is actually true. If you think about it you could live on another world and the life you are living is just a dream and when you die is when you wake up. Anything is possible if you believe it, when you believe something you see, hear, think and act differently and things will fall in place in ways you never could of imagined before.

A reality is created by how many people believe in it. In the world today, people believe in democracy or some form of government, but this is simply because its been part of our reality for so long, its hard to imagine otherwise and for some strange reason everyone keeps insisting we stick with it, even though it obviously isn't working. (though I suppose if you have two SUVs a big house and you don't see the impact your system has on the rest of the world, its easier to be in denial) The more people believe, the more real that reality is. The only reason we have a world where we can hear, see, feel etc is because we all believe we can. What is the difference between a cult and a religion? How many people believe in it. A "crazy" person simply sees the world differently than anyone else. Nothing is there and everything is there. "All things in moderation" but this includes moderation itself, Buddhist non attachment to any particular paradigm is a great example of this mindset. Most of all we must be moderate in ideologies and eliminate outright the need to force ideologies on others, the paradox being that when spoken or written this is itself an ideology.

All is mutable and temporary except for the deepest core of consciousness, this consciousness is of course present in all things that exist as everything depends on consciousness to be "realized" from the all. We can change what is perceived by our consciousness (in fact we can learn a great deal about our consciousness by analyzing the desires that create the choice of perceptions) but the only way for consciousness to end would be for everything to end, this could happen in between each moment, each flash of awareness from "sensory packets" where there is nothing to perceive, but although this happens in between each moment, the universe simply starts again not noticing the nothingness. At least not until we learn to transcend the nothing/everything paradigm, which in some ways is like the Salvia trips I have been having, though reality is not limited to that either as it is unlimited, but then reality is so unlimited it is not limited to being unlimited and so we can experience it in a form which is limited to human consciousness.

The more I think about and explore reality, the more it seems that if the divine does in fact exist, its operates fundamentally on the principle of Anarchy since any perfect reality of which the divine must exist in, would require no law, no limitations, free will given to all its creations. What other means of control could be given in a reality definable in an endless amount of conceptions? When all things are possible and all things are united in boundlessness, it is not as literalist Abrahamic interpretations believe, that is a kind of theological monarchy which operates the universe, but total Anarchism. The divine does not force us to believe in or worship it, it leaves us to choose, to define and create our own heaven or reality, each as unique and different as each life form. In fact it is this very uniqueness of each individual (including atheists) which allows it to create new references for its own self awareness. The Anarchy of heaven is found within.

As we are all one with the divine then why would it want to limit itself? This would not even be possible except in a way that it itself chooses to be limited, the only way I can think that such a thing could be done is through ignorance caused by fear. "Hell" is nothing more than the absence of awareness of one's life, pure ignorance caused by pure fear. Though there are atheists who are quite happy in their ignorance, they are where they need to be with their level of understanding, compared to many religious people they are much less ignorant in key aspects of awareness which a genuine spiritual practice should be strengthening. These happy atheists are not ignorant of certain enjoyable realities that are courageous in their own way, which although divine are not necessarily apparently so, in this way everyone is always maximizing their enjoyment based on their understanding. I was quite happy for most of my life as an atheist but as that is a limited conception, it is a limited mindset to maximize happiness. There is no limit to pleasure and atheists and finite thinkers could be much happier as they realize life is boundless and that we are all immortal, forever expanding consciousness and capable of experiencing ever increasing bliss. Our capacity for joy is determined by the size of our consciousness, as you become more conscious of more things, you inherently become more aware and so as you become more aware, the potential for increase in perceived sensations and emotions becomes available, in the psychedelic state this can go in to ecstasy or terror.

Consciousness is ultimately only limited by our imagination which is limited by our fears, which are always rooted in ignorance of the big picture. Since we are capable of experiencing all things at will, it seems almost absurd to think that we would be afraid to imagine certain realities, but so it is, and we limit ourselves in denial to avoid taking responsibility for an expanded consciousness. We do this out of fear of not being able to control what will be perceived by the amplified sensation receptacle. Fear is the direct result of not knowing the divine, once you really know that, then you won't even fear fear itself. The goal of life is thus to increase awareness of life and the divine and realize fear is futile, we will always be protected and be right where we need to be, but this can be harder for some than others, for this also some times means embracing pain and even death openly. No matter what happens in someone's life, no matter how horrible, it will eventually end and although the positive aspect of the event may be hard to see, perhaps overshadowed by the worst pain imaginable, it is always there.. ALWAYS, however you may have to leave this world to appreciate it. We are the masters of our own fate and any attempt to blame others for your own pain is a delusion in that we as people chose to believe whether or not an event is "positive" or "negative."

Each affirmation and all intentional actions are an act of will, an act of love for that specific reality, so from an Orphic perspective we could say Eros brings the reality in to being or isolates it from undivided Chaos and so it is the true meaning of the mystical idea that all is love. Hatred is a love of the opposite reality of what is hated, it is a love of feeling offended and the urge to destroy something, sadness is a love of self pity for your situation and so it goes for all things. This is fine so long as you are doing it consciously, so long as you can still the mind and have the context of what exists outside of consensus reality, but those who create unconsciously get tied up in their own machinations. No villain ever thinks themselves to be "bad," even the most malicious and sinister believe that their actions have mainly "positive" results in some way, even if it's just for selfish reasons they wouldn't do it otherwise. Ultimately it is impossible to intend to do "evil" as any intention you have is defined as something you want to make happen and so to you at least it is always "good." It's all arbitrary, all one can do is try to make themselves happy no matter what other people think, so long as their actions don't encroach on someone else's happiness as this invites retaliation and so impedes their ability to be happy. Reality from this perspective is the Alchemical work of bringing everyone to a state where they are aware enough to stop affirming realities that dominate other people and so exist in Anarchy.

Being conscious of your feelings and thoughts towards a concept, and whether or not you know of the concepts existence will be the decisive variables in how much power that concept or thing has over your life. Even if you were a complete materialist atheist its very reasonable to say “negative” or “positive” thoughts control whether or not ones reality is “negative” or “positive” since we are the ones defining these abstractions. Unexpected things, or things we are ignorant about can enter in to our reality, obviously we are not infallible just because we manifest our realities, there is such a thing as unintended consequences, we live in Chaos after all. We are attempting to grow in consciousness and so novel unplanned events do occur, this is especially true since most people are not master magicians consciously trying to manifest all aspects of reality in a conscious state of oneness, everyone I know of is ignorant about something. We expect unexpected things to happen and so we manifest them, we manifest a reality where we are ignorant and so we are and many events happen to confirm this. Cognitive dissonance can manifest unexpected things, but also since most people accept consensus reality, at least to some degree we are also open to the manifestations of others, so you can be shot and killed even if you don't know what a gun is. Getting to the point where you could walk through walls and have bullets you don't even know about go through you would be quite the feat, (obviously you shouldn't tempt fate by testing reality in such a way) its all too easy to fool yourself into thinking you have overcome certain realities that you haven't. Another determining factor to explain the occurrence of “bad” things happening in your life as you may yourself have sub consciously, or even before your incarnation, programmed certain events to happen at certain times in your life, or certain things to end your life, destinies which would most likely be very hard to escape from. Perhaps the whole reason you incarnated was to become paralysed and learn the lessons of living as such, ridding yourself of all fear, since overcoming all views of pain means experiencing all fears, all pains.

Some ancient Gnostic sects believed that each divine spark separated from “the Fullness” of the All so that it might experience all things, that each soul must experience a variety of things pleasant and unpleasant regardless of their legality. In another light you could even say that each soul manifests incarnation through a desire to experience the flesh, its pleasures and its pains so that it can be forever content in the unchanging All, which as the sum of all souls is the summation of all experience. For this reason all experiences, all desires which do not increase ignorance (those which are Anarchist) should not be repressed. Because of all this, it can no doubt be very difficult for the divine to enrich your life and show you the benefits of its existence when you refuse to accept that it exists, or aren't willing for whatever reason to accept certain realities about it. Since all things are found in all parts, to deny one part can most often act to deny it all.

Once on mushrooms I had a vision that there is a net of prisms with light going through them, the white light in turn splits into all its colours through refraction. Each consciousness is a prism and the net is strung with colours of the light spectrum, the main colours that are projected are determined by the values, or we might say the dominant chakra or astrological energies of the prism. As one of the prisms goes up the other prisms are pulled by the light beams, however a prism can also go down, but wherever each prism is, the reflected light is caught by all the other prisms. As a prism goes up or down in happiness or love it affects the other prisms, its elevation is how much love it has for the colours around it, you could say its elevations also determine the tone of the colours which are projected. This energetic empathy or resonance is especially true of the people in your presence or close to your heart, by your level of love, so that you hold up or drag down each other prism as one interconnected being. Some people are less flexible or more resistant to the fickle emotions of others, but the pull or stress of the other prisms is still present. The colours, or energies, or mood of a person is in a very real sense just personal aesthetics, those we surround ourselves with willingly tend to be of similar aesthetics, unless two people hate each other and perhaps get in a tug of war. This is one way of viewing consensus reality and so through it we learn we are all responsible for the energies we put out there and becoming conscious of these concepts helps to make all creation happier. Although I had this vision myself on mushrooms, I later learned that in Buddhism there is a very similar idea and representation called the “net of Indra,” though in this version I have elaborated the metaphor to include colours and instead of prisms they speak of “jewels”.

Everyone seems to literally be in a state of mass hypnosis, at least to some degree and this includes me. The more I think I am seeing the world as it truly is, the more I realize how controlled the mind has been, and how little I know for sure. Leaders are the hypnotists which have bought into a particular reality construct for different groups, off course many of the leaders are hypnotized by someone from their youth or even themselves without even realizing it. Cults are groups which have set up a kind of sub reality, or sub culture based in a consensus network led by the Guru which has been separated from the larger whole. This is the basis of power for all religions and ideologies, a religion is a spell cast upon your soul to make it experience a view of reality. The cult leader manipulates the energy of the group acting as a conductor and creating a circuit in order to generate more power and so make an isolated bubble of reality. Some hypnotists can mean well and in some ways seem to do good, at least to those in their reality, but most do not and become as parasites, both financially and spiritually. At the very least by keeping people from understanding their own power to create reality, these hypnotists do damage by spreading blissful ignorance.

People have been conditioned to feel inadequate about making up their own minds, about making their own realities and so seek out answers from other people, but in so doing only find some new limited reality to be a part of. The world is controlled by making people expect to see things and so they do, if many people believe in a reality then it is attractive to someone who is unsure what to believe in and so they will most likely go with the majority around them. We have been hypnotized into believing we aren't hypnotized that such things cannot even happen without our knowing and so without noticing we agree, we are also hypnotized in to thinking there is something special about hypnotists and that it is a hard thing to learn or do. We trust that the way we've been brought up is the truthful way because it is the only truth we have ever known and that truth can cause fear and make it look like there is no point in figuring things out for ourselves.

According to scientists around 50% of what our brains perceive as stimulus is actually edited in by the brain based on what it expects to see. In order to save in processing power and deal with limited reliable sensory stimulus, the brain calculates according to memories of how reality was in the past, the most probable tangible experiences occurring in the present, which are thrown together seamlessly to make a perception that appears to work. This means at times more than half of our perceptions are based on conjecture and memory, which can be easily tampered with if controlled from the beginning. It is also of course quite possible that the remaining 50% that is perception based on actual stimulus is severely bias and impaired in a number of other ways, especially when people are actively trying to deceive you.

Since we learned about it in the past, our scientific knowledge for the sources of such stimulus and how it is produced and functions is always reliant on memory. Just how stimulus is produced in the physical could in many ways be based on the bias of believing our senses are accurate. For example it could be that what we call “stimulus” of the five senses, is actually our subconscious telepathic communication with the rest of the universe, information about how we should all manifest the perception of physical reality. So for the sense of sound, what I normally understand to be vibrating air is really an interpretation, an imagined symbolic manifestation of a message sent in some unconscious reality from which we have previously consented to communicate through, in order to function in the consensus physical reality. So in this example sound is being manifested as vibrating air, but in the case of two people talking, is really telepathic communication being represented in a tangible and scientifically verifiable way. Other non human sounds are actually communication with the universe, which we falsely consider non sentient due to our memories of believing otherwise. These sounds communicate some intention of various energies (rocks cracking together or whatever the source of sound is) so that we might interact with the true reality of discarnate communication in the universal mind, but through the physical medium of sensory based consensus reality.

No this all sounds quite improbable to most people, people claiming to be skeptics love to dismiss ideas without really learning about them. Often sighting Occam's razor that the simplest explanation is usually the best and while this and probabilities are important to keep in mind, there are many things which science says is true, yet if you were confronted with the theory with little to no context or evidence would never believe. (the theory of relativity for example) What we define as the simplest explanation is determined by what we already take for granted as true, the more important and paradigm changing a theory, the more complicated it is likely to be, though it may make the whole of the paradigm much simpler, it will often still be dismissed before investigation. Hence the old scientific saying, "paradigms change one funeral at a time." Believing that "god" created the universe in six days is a lot simpler than learning physics, it doesn't mean it's true. Since so many things science considers to be true would seem improbable at first, we can say in all probability that our ability to accurately determine the probability of a reality is quite low. In science once a discovery has been accepted by the "consensus" of the scientific community and that culture, it seems obvious to all the scientists and almost self evident, the more further discoveries are built up from it, the more they take it for granted, so it is what seemed improbable before the discoveries becomes more probable and in light of the new discoveries it is often seen as simpler as well.

When we remember how our brain naturally screens out things which do not fit its bias, then we must be very skeptical indeed about our faculty for determining what we should dismiss as untrue. This does not mean we should accept things on faith, but that science has done a pretty pitiful job of even trying to explain many phenomena purely on the grounds it seems unlikely from the view of its own paradigm. This exemplifies the real problem, that how you calculate probability will largely be influenced by the paradigm (the limited number of factors) you are aware of at the beginning, so it is we see what we want to see. Again, prioritizing is important, but given that especially in capitalist societies, funding for scientific research is determined by what is most probably profitable for the government and corporations, confirmation bias is ever present. Even if we truly understood 99% of reality, that remaining 1% could change the context of how we perceive everything else and so it is wishful thinking to think we know anything, until we know everything, hence the need for humility.

The implications of this are staggering and if some one suddenly saw the world the way it really is, it could be a real shock which the subconscious would want to block out to retain some semblance of consensus based "sanity." This is in many ways old news to the Occult community and it is clear to me that very knowledgeable people or even perhaps the constructs themselves use this information to enslave us all into believing the version of reality they want us to.

We must hypnotize ourselves into believing we can sense and live in the true world without being hypnotized at all, and then at a signal like a snapping finger we will all wake up, or at least gradually so. Getting the masses to wake up will not be easy when they have been programmed right from the beginning. Psychedelics seem to help this but can cause damage by being way too overwhelming if used improperly by those who are too arrogant or ignorant to properly prepare themselves. People can “go into their own little world” and stop there, never questioning their own infallibility and so without critical thinking and a dedication to continually updating their paradigm, can come to some very strange conclusions and delusions of grandeur, but together we can find something closer to paradise.

By accepting your information from others (or yourself) without much question, rather than through your own research, reasoning and experience you can be led to accept the consensus trance, no matter how absurd it is. Never underestimate the power of naive people to believe information that comes from what they believe to be authorities. The theory that science is forever the best possible means of discerning reality that can ever exist is highly unscientific and I am a skeptic. Just because it has certain advantages unique to it so far does not mean it is beyond improvement, or that just because science cannot currently find an experiment or tool to measure it, it doesn't exist. This is not to say faith is better, but that we should not have blind faith in science either, especially since people can falsely present themselves as scientific when they are not. Most often information is accepted just because the people around you share a common opinion, do not think that you are immune to it, it is most likely an evolutionary drive found within all of us to learn from the example of others how to adapt to the world we live in. Total skepticism has a limit to evolutionary advantage in the wild, a balance is needed when it comes to questioning absolutely everything around us without direct knowledge, in the case of being eaten by sabre tooth tigers faith in the opinion that being eaten is to be avoided comes in handy. However when it comes to our modern day societies which are fundamentally based around lies, we face a very different challenges and a very big dose of skepticism is healthy.

Most people can see that the world is messed up, we can only come to the conclusion that most of humanity must be ignorant of some important information that will allow us to function in a healthy manner. People in the system are like people having a bad psychedelic trip, getting upset with them will not help to calm them down, they are convinced of some delusion and scared and severely confused. Bureaucrats, politicians, and all people who participate within the communal paradigm are hypnotized or possessed by the system to various degrees. When dealing with them it is often that you have to relate to them within their box of understanding because they won't understand what you have to say since they won't want to listen to anything outside of their box, it is like a lie to them or they just screen it out without considering it. One could imagine a stage performance of a hypnotist who gives a person in a trance state the command that they will respond to key words in specific ways, so for example the hypnotist might say “every time you hear the word chicken you will act like a chicken.” It is this kind of conditioning, albeit much subtler and more omnipresent, which has been injected into the minds of most people to various degrees and it is our resistance to this conditioning which brings life to us.

In the Occult there are traditional means of manipulating people, of creating illusions to distort the perceptions of others, these can have a variety of uses from disguise, or even invisibility (by making people not notice you) and it is quite possible this type of magick might play a role in tales of magicians and Shamans shape shifting in to animals. However there are definitely political uses for those who wish to control others, for instance the word “prestige” comes from such a type of magick used to create illusions in general. From the current day meaning we can infer that it is the magick elites use to convince others they are elite and worthy of leading. Prestige is the illusion that someone has power over you and is better than you or more qualified to run your life than you, that they have a higher rank and authority than you about who you are and what you want and how you should live. When you buy in to this illusion you become that incapable person, you base your identity around being inferior never learning or developing your true potential. If you are raised to believe that the only people you can believe are the authorities, then you will never realize you are the only one who can be an authority on what you really want and who you really are.

This is complimented by another kind of magick used to produce illusions from which we get the word “glamour,” that in a political context we could define as the magick the media and society uses to distract us and to sell soft power through cultural status, it is the illusion that consumer products and fashion are valuable things capable of creating lasting happiness and social status as an individual. Glamour is how desire is sold to us to keep us trying to keep up with the neighbours, to keep us believing the goals of the system our own and are valuable, it is the goals those with prestige try to keep us distracted with so that they can further consolidate their power. In the media, especially on TV, glamour is used by setting up unspoken assumptions and preconceptions such as through various characters and their traits, people learn from TV characters what they accept as social interaction and appropriate behaviour. For example little to no characters will ever really question the system, the good guys always win and characters will seek to dominate each other and otherwise present the state culture as the unquestioned norm. Other examples are the rampant and generally accepted sexism and bigotry which people often unconsciously begin to base their individual world views around. Characters are based on collages of stereotypes according to formulas, the unconventional are ridiculed and the beautiful and generally “preppy” characters are held up as unquestionable norms, with most humour revolving around putting other people down and creating social hierarchies. Newscasters and pretty well everyone else on TV work on assumptions about the validity of hierarchical and corporate memes and so the frame of all discussions is limited to this type of reality and since most people have no critical thinking skills or other sources of information, their brain relies on these memories to calculate the probabilities when interpreting incoming stimulus.

The more you participate in the mainstream consensus reality and accept it as a valid reality, the more you will be sucked in to a culture designed to make you submit to ignorance and authority, designed to make you unconscious of your real self and the real world. This is not to say we should be ignorant or in denial of what illusions people hold, but in fact we must understand them fully if we are to free people from them, by knowing the systems magick you can find ways to monkey wrench them in new and unexpected ways. Knowing the key words needed for those people who are hypnotized can get them to do all kinds of things because they have been so well conditioned to be slaves, however telling them they are a slave is not a good way to snap someone out of a trance. Telling someone they have been hypnotized when they have been hypnotized to think they are not hypnotized obviously doesn't work. In order to free people you have to know the key words to unlock them from the spell and to keep them from trying to put their unconscious spells on you. We have to learn how to “snap our fingers” or act to help to wake people up, but we have to anticipate the fact that any truth that exists, is going to be quite out of the ordinary and beyond the bounds of what most people take for granted, that is, granted by the magickal genie known as capitalism.

If we look at American culture today we see a civilization obsessed with militarism, so focused on giving up rights for securities and building up armies for defending themselves and expanding their empire that it never occurs to them, that most of their way of life isn't worth defending. So it is in capitalist societies that we become so preoccupied with economic conflict, either defence or offence, that we forget what the rest of life is really about. We become so obsessed with making money to supposedly make our lives better we hardly have time to spend the money on anything but material goods, nor have any real knowledge about what is really valuable in life. We spend so much time trying to get what society says is valuable in order to improve our status, that we never really think about what we really want. We spend so much time jockeying for position on the social and professional ladder within our various artificial hierarchies, that we mistake this for a real social life.

Over and over again I see how our preoccupation with the means to our motive is sometimes the biggest obstacle to us actually achieving our goals. Another example of this is our greed, because we have insisted on trying to control everything we have lost sight of the fact that we all already owned everything if we would only share with each other, so it is we have lost almost everything. Anarchism in our culture is often thought as childish, yet it is the idea that we should share, that we should be equals and get along. In contrast the system is based on the idea that we can't share, that certain things are mine and you are a poopy pants and I am going to throw a tantrum if you try and get me to share, that I should even use violence to shut up those who ask me to play nice.

This paradox takes on new depth when we examine our over reliance and tunnel vision regarding the use of words. The truth is all words are symbolic allegories to what they actually represent. The thing with which I am writing this is not the word "pen" and as obvious as this may seem, this distinction is often not seen, especially in casual conversation, written words are even literally composed of a series of symbols. This concept is no better exemplified then in religions, especially in the word "god." So it is that words keep us from directly experiencing the essence of our "thoughts," even though they can be very useful for conveying them, the method has distracted us from the goal itself. This is reflected within consensus reality in that our obsession with finding the most popular means in the consensus, is often what keep us from our ends, or even thinking about what ends we really want. Through consensus reality we have been presented with a variety of methods, of means of achieving our will that do not really work, (like the idea that hard work in the system will make you rich, the American dream etc) which distract from our true wills and the practical development of our own techniques at achieving it.

Social interactions are arguably the most important action the majority of people undertake, at least as far as the majorities value system is concerned. Through interaction with one another we have created our civilizations, which we assure each other is very impressive, but all of it constructed from the foundation of social interaction. We are often oblivious as to how we are really communicating within the full scope of things. Subconscious processes are consistently running and analyzing everything about another persons mannerisms, tone, body language, pheromones etc, likewise it is also putting these nuances into our own expressions. I believe to some degree we even telepathically communicate this way, certainly we communicate much more information than we often realize in non verbal manners. To the detriment of the masses our culture has done little to teach and explore how group mentalities and realities are created and exactly what their effects are. Within a group of people through what we call "atmosphere," very dramatic things can happen to someone charged differently who later comes into the group.

Conforming is allowing others the means to use your will and creative processes for whatever goal the group wants. I am sure I don't need to cite examples how people do things that are really not helpful to them or anyone, all for the chance to be part of the group. Charismatic people have a knack for this whether for good or ill, why with the right words and so the right ideas a person could rule the world, at least that is the theory of megalomaniacs. There is a difference between charisma and having great ideas but still they are both dependent on the power of words. This is largely an unconscious process, even people who fancy themselves individuals are not immune from subtle forms of conforming to their likewise freaky friends. It is of course extremely important to be aware of how others are effecting your creative processes, to choose your company carefully. The media and popular culture seem to have no greater goal then to distract you from your own creative potential. So it is that the majority of people even if they are good hearted can gradually suck you into more powerless states of being. In fact the reason you may put your guard down and allow this is specifically because they are good hearted and we have been conditioned to be so in order to make us more compliant and pacifist. Critical thought is therefore vital to make sure you are well defended against less useful and healthy meme paradigms which will seek to override your own.

This is made more difficult by the fact that most of western culture will be as far from accepting most of the beliefs in this book as possible. Trying to explain the magick of reality in a serious way would prove pretty useless and even disastrous to most people if not handled in a very careful and gradual way. The answer is to be as aware as possible about dynamics within the group and how they are attempting to lure you and what it really means to accept their idea of truth. Create as positive as possible an atmosphere as you can (however you define that) but don't feel that you have to "save" anyone. Those drives are better acted out as acts of charity and activism to those who truly want help, this is as close to proselytism and "conversion" as I get. If you have to pretend your something you are not to be in a group then its a sign you are not in the right group and in the long run your real self, even if it is considered ugly by others will be more happy being real, than it will be denying parts of itself.

Pear pressure is like ego reinforcement if you are willing to consent to the consensus, it is a kind of energy exchange from all people who wish to be a part of it, the less you consent to the consensus, the less ego reinforcement you get in your bargain. By consenting, it could be seen in a extremist sort of way as selling your soul for the promise of immortality within hell. However it is important to recognize that there are other souls and that they too must be taught the alternatives, this can be done by having the courage to provide examples of alternative lifestyles. In fact any kind of reality is possible if we wish to stay physical, we all consent to what we think is the best agreement as to how reality should be, but there are always it seems, currents and ripples within the ocean of souls. Personally I find it it much more pleasant outside the mainstream.

We feed our self image and crystallize it depending on how well defined and elaborate we wish to see ourselves, if we make the mistake of Narcissus then we will die staring at our reflection, so it's important when trying to get to know ourselves to remember we are part of a whole that involves other people. People who are seen as insane or eccentric are often just people who have consented to a more personal reality, this is reflected in their self image as strange people who obviously feel alienated. If these people are seeing and hearing things outside of the consensus reality, but have little to no knowledge of magickal philosophy, the idea that such things are crazy is a reality that is only reinforced by people treating them this way, few things could be more maddening then everyone treating you as an insane person. At the same time just because you don't care how you look to others doesn't mean you shouldn't wipe your ass after a shit.

Juxtaposed tastes or agreements contribute to your values based acquired tastes, from social pressure we drift and swirl in whirlpools of reality's, each one bringing people of mutual agreement together. From inspiration and the language of the universe we make decisions based on sub conscious communication. In regards to your self image if you do not see your body or avatar as being capable of something or being with certain people, then you will not be with them. You have to be able to be like in some way the people you want to be around, in at least the sub conscious part of the group mind that decides how to imagine the experiences of the avatars. Like a realization, inspiration can be like dams crumbling to streams of awareness to fill new avenues and reservoirs of knowledge and which new forms and patterns begin to be experienced. From revelations whole new worlds are created, revelation occurs when we step outside the consensus and look from a totally new perspective. The more we examine what our own personal viewpoint is, the better we create a self image that is more to our own true will and so we can better determine which reality is really in our best interests and how we can better create realities with other people. When people follow your line of thinking they are exploring your own personal viewpoint from which they will decide how that coincides with their own viewpoint, this is the meshing of minds through memetic exchange.

So through this consensus reality we come to the question, just how much are we interacting without realizing it? It seems likely and I have had some experiences to make me believe that we are all basically discarnate minds subconsciously communicating with each other through telepathy. We are like sparks floating in an empty void who dream a group dream, just as your mind creates the landscape of your dreams without you being aware. We all subconsciously create physical reality and are constantly working together to come up with a consensus about what the dream really is and where it should go.

Those who do not agree with the idea that we are not in a consensus reality have reached the consensus that we should ignore the deeper layers of reality that have to do with such things. By the power of free will we determine the level of awareness and personal control we wish to have over our own lives within the group dream, and most of us choose by our fear to ignore the level of reality in which we are all metaphysical, that which is outside the dream. When we learn to change the belief that we can't change reality according to our beliefs to more empowering beliefs, then we become accordingly more empowered. Some people riddled with fear seek to control the dream through ignorant means by interacting with it as if it were not a dream, by identifying themselves as someone who reacts to the outside world, rather than as someone who creates it. These people may in their fear also seek to control other people whom they fear will try and control them, or hurt them in some way, or keep them from having the kind of dream they want. This fear and ignorance is the source of all hierarchies and the cause of the nightmare we are increasingly finding ourselves in, as the fear which makes a person want to be a leader spreads to those they rule or inevitably victimize. Through awareness and the courage to face our fears we can learn to direct the dream in more pleasant ways, or we may even eventually decide to wake up and this will be the emergence of total Anarchy.

If we understand that the universe is the symbolic representation of the collective mind then it goes to follow that through the manipulation of the symbols we can adjust our minds accordingly, so where most people go wrong is taking these symbols literally instead of trying to understand their meaning. When working magick, for the manipulation of symbols in ritual to be effective, it really helps if the ritual is done consciously, the symbols must mean something to you and you will have much better luck if you understand why manipulation of symbols creates changes in physical reality. The magick symbol is essentially a representation of an energy, it is a container of energies that is comprehensible and controllable to the mind in a more concrete way than just as some vague or perhaps even largely unconscious tacit feeling. This encapsulating of essential meaning through abstraction allows the conscious mind to apprehend it, so that the abstracted essence which creates change (magick or divinities) can interact with the essence you wish to change, (subject of intention) by combining these with abstraction of the kind of change you want (intention or sigil) and this is played out through the symbolism of rituals. Once we can pin something down with a symbol we can learn to control it, learn what it is and what it is not, we can also learn how it relates to other things, but we must always be aware that a symbol is not the thing it represents, it is actually just the conscious mind's means of manipulating what is represented.

One layer of ancient mythology and religion, especially the polytheistic kinds is to sort out this collective unconscious using the gods and goddesses, or angels and demons as the map of metaphysical and psychological variables. These divinities are intelligent but they should not be mistaken as physically being limited to these symbols, though they may appear in these forms astrally they exist wherever there is something with a similar essence. They work to help us access energies and modes of consciousness and also organize physical reality from a deeper level, guiding paradigms and in some cases perhaps herding the ignorant cattle of humanity into different territories of consciousness, but this is always consensual with the wilful ignorance of the people. Some divinities are obviously better than others for different people at different points in their development, what is important is to have your own feelings and intentions clearly defined in regards to working with the symbols and to be clear what it is you consent to. Like all forces of nature just because we are ignorant of them does not mean they do not exist, though they may not manifest consciously, or even physically they are always there. Because of this, if you do not learn to work with and control them, then they can control or at least adversely effect you much like a fire out of control, but this does not make them evil, just unbalanced or uncontrolled forces within your own mind.

These different divinities in a sense have different regions of the universal mind which we would all do well to explore, this process is very well laid out in the Qabalah and other mystical traditions, and can be done in two main ways, through evocation/invocation and path working/astral projection. Through the Qabalah the symbols are arranged in an interconnected pattern that adheres to principles of “male” and “female” energies in a well thought out fashion, and while not arbitrary, it is more the power the individual gives it that is important, rather than something innate within the symbols themselves. If there is a logical connection between the symbol and the symbolized it will be helpful for memory if nothing else, in terms of glyphs or sigils it is certainly not crucial, you can get very chaotic if you want, but putting things in a consistent interconnected system is helpful for more complex symbolic languages and a more specific level of control. This is true within all symbols though it is generally accepted among Occult circles that symbols which have been used a lot, or for a long time are easier and more effective than new symbols, however if some symbol has other connotations to you then what is traditional, (such as its a silly thing from antiquity with no meaning) then it is perhaps not the best one for you. What is most important is that the symbol has meaning to you, the Qabalah is excellent in that it is so well thought out, tried and tested with consistent meaning throughout that it allows a person to work with a variety of cultures symbolic languages and is very useful if you are looking to interpret mythology, however Chaos magick shows the symbol can be anything and still work fine. You may find like me the Qabalah and other traditional systems are great for getting ideas, learning how systems can be made, but that you want the complete personalization of Chaos magick, which means using imagination in coordination with your traditional knowledge, to make something new, something which can be manifested once you know how.

The “logos,” or the part of the mind which creates language and symbol is like a net, and you are a fisher(wo)man casting into the ocean of imagination and feeling to grab hold of concepts and then bringing them up. As there is a background and a foreground to thought, magick works through the manipulation of the feeling felt about the words that are used in the intention before articulation and expression. The ocean is the feeling and the net is our ability to separate from the feeling, the right energy for the intention we are trying to accomplish.

When manifesting things without any ritual, the symbol, in this case an affirmation or thought, may be something with a strong emotional charge that is against what is desired for manifestation, it is also not incorporating the other senses like smell, or movement, or touch and is usually not even vocalized by many New Agers. It definitely can work with people who have enough faith in it, but you could also fill a swimming pool with an eye dropper, it doesn't mean its the best way to go about it. As all forms in nature are linguistic, there are many ways to symbolize your intention rather than using only words, ways as in the Qabalah which incorporate all kinds of different symbols which are much more emotionally evocative and also more specific for working with energies.

Visualizing is often used by New Agers but generally in a very basic and relatively ineffective way. By having consistent symbolism we can program our mind to recognize manifesting intent much more intentionally than only trying to have positive thoughts all the time. Once a ritual is over we can also try to forget about what we want, which works much better than trying to send out a positive thought here or there since this implies doubt that the previous “positive thoughts” were successful. When we are in a trance state of gnosis we are also much better able to manipulate much more energy than in normal waking states, then there is the power of evocation and invocation which is of all kinds of practical use for spiritual growth, as well as manifesting things. All too often the only spiritual practice New Agers have is trying to think positive thoughts, thinking that anything more is some kind of negativity, where as in reality they are thinking negatively about how to improve.

Words and symbols are the anchor to which these undefined feelings are connected and can be pulled from the memory to be brought to our attention, so by defining something, we in a sense remember it, we re-mind ourselves, we make it graspable to the conscious mind. This is done by the faculty of the logos which provides the mechanism in which the conscious mind becomes more conscious by utilizing the definition of different aspects of awareness. In Qabalah these are the energies of the divine going from a process of total oneness, eternity down to the physical world, it describes symbolically how energy goes from the divine to the world, and some of the last stages show how the process of articulation is involved. Through “Tiphereth” we have the imagination, though for an enlightened person this is not so much the personal individual imagination where we create new things, but that of the collective unconscious where all things already exist, the feeling of tacit oceanic awareness and the means of accessing the store house of all information in the multiverse.

This Qabbalistic interpretation could get pretty complex and much of it is beyond the scope of this book, but for anyone who is not totally enlightened, Tiphereth is the more common notion of the imagination, but it still unconsciously gets some information from this store house of information which I spoke of. The store house is higher up on the tree and called “Chesed,” it is what has been called the “akashic records” or all information in all times, in all of the multiverse and so exists outside of physical consciousness and is quite far removed from everyday awareness. After Chesed on the tree comes “Geburah,” which corresponds to free will in the sense of the “true will” and archetypal justice, this is rather complicated, but your free will is ultimately derived from what you define as being perfectly just, so if your definitions are flawed you will thus not truly have free will but only some approximation. Geburah acts to limit the contrary and overwhelming information of Chesed and the multiverse in order to give some basic discrimination and selection according to what your mind's imagination can conceive of in Tiphereth and what is applicable to your part of the multiverse. Everything above Tiphereth is non physical and so Tiphereth imagines things with forms and generally things which can fit in physical reality, however the higher parts of the tree are not limited to this and so they say an enlightened person is someone who has mastered Tiphereth and integrated it with the higher realms and forms of awareness.

For the purposes of my analogy, in my writings I will simplify the more traditional Kabbalism and say that Tiphereth is still the ocean of imagination, but the limits of this ocean are determined by the individuals understanding of the higher aspects of the tree and non physical reality. In this way an enlightened mind has the boundaries of this ocean throughout the whole of the tree, which is why Tiphereth is in the centre of the tree. So while Geburah provides all people with some degree of access to the store house of Chesed and this is ultimately what allows intuition to go beyond and individuals intellectual memory, some people have a will to develop this more than others, so that those who live their true will have mastered Tiphereth. Given that most people have little to no understanding of such things, their oceans are relatively small, though artists and those who have the will can grow their oceans, or grow their imagination andentheogens can certainly help with this. So then below Tiphereth on the tree of life map is “Netzach” which is the intuitive faculties that allow you to know where to cast your net in the ocean of imagination according to desire, that which searches out the “fish” or idea essence in the ocean. The energy or essence takes shape as a word in “Hod” the intellect (the net) which is cast in to the ocean to get ideas until we go through to “Yesod” (the fishing boat) the astral world of emotions in which we react to the awareness caused by the abstraction. Yesod then is the place from which some people throw back the fish if they are too emotionally weak to handle it. On the tree Yesod is located directly below Tiphereth (rather than next in order of manifestation) and so in a sense is similar and can be likened to the visual imagination, but this requires more explanation than I can do here. While Tiphereth can imagine things that do not have visual forms, if we accept the fish than Yesod is where we visualize things and emotionally empower the forms, which for most people alters the forms to various degrees so that it can fit into their paradigms, or like a thought form sigil it congeals astrally to make physical effects in “Malkuth” the physical world of regular Earth.

So in this way, all that manifests physically is a process of anamnesis, it is also a process of consciousness articulating sensory experience in terms of symbolism to create a cohesive experience for the memory of that particular aspect of eternity in the singularity. In order to learn something, like the true spiritual reality, or what your consciousness truly is, it helps to create symbols which will aid the process of anamnesis for the subject you want to learn about, these symbols can be used to symbolize all new information under that category, but also for setting the intention for the type of information you wish to remember or receive. For this to be really effective, the symbol must really represent something you want to learn so that your unconscious knows what to remind you of or what information to manifest. There will always be levels which are beyond articulation, but this is still a very useful faculty and technique to develop, especially in terms of magick and the physical or defined world.

In the west we have the myth of Orpheus, who went to Hades in order to bring his dead wife back to the land of the living. To me this myth is allegorically talking about this process and how enlightenment is achieved, Orpheus was told that he could take his wife Eurydice out of Hades, (symbol of the unconscious) but that he must walk out without looking back at his wife, for if he did she would turn to salt. This is a multi layered story, but to me one layer is about how enlightenment must follow you, it cannot be grasped until it is brought out of the subconscious. To attain your one true love, you cannot force it, it is not an act of the ego, the conscious mind, but like Zen must be attained in a kind of selfless and effortless way, free of doubt and the desire for self gratification or possessing something precious. When the truth is disturbing this also requires the emotional maturity to withstand putting additional thought forms on the truth as in Yesod, so then you allow it to manifest as it truly is, rather than what is emotionally gratifying. This is similar to the poetic idea that love is like a butterfly and you must let it land on your open hand and if you try to grasp it, you will crush it. As we are constantly unconsciously performing magick and giving forms to essence's according to our will, formless divine chaos cannot fully manifest free of our egos distortions or influence. To attempt to see a realization before it is done taking its proper place in the world is to turn its beauty to salt, to give it a form, so that if we try to define the realization before it comes to the worldly perception of its own accord, then we limit infinity through our efforts and so destroy its true form. It crystallizes to salt before the process is completed and so if we are like Orpheus and do not wait until it has taken form outside of Hades, then we lose our love, that is to say our enlightenment is lost, turned to a distorted incomplete form and we are left in a depressing state.

In my experience with meditation, specifically with entheogens, I have found that the longer I can keep myself from thinking, the more profound a realization I will have when I do eventually form a thought. By this I would expect that those with perfect control would be capable of incredible bliss states of enlightenment and profound wisdom, this then seems to fit some of the goals of eastern traditions. Another way of thinking about it could be that the longer we wait to have a thought, the more energy is stored up, the more energy or feeling that is encapsulated or turned to salt (form or words) the more meaningful it will be, until enough energy is built up to come fully out of the subconscious. This then is leading Eurydice out of Hades, or the energy down the tree without blocking it or distorting it with the ego, thus through such means we gain the love of our lives, wisdom. If we can hold off thinking, we have more time for intuition to search the imagination and get a bigger fish and if we do this for long enough we can manifest awareness of the whole ocean. So we must have faith about our enlightenment, that it is following us out of the subconscious, we must not worry about it and trust that so long as we can keep from trying to pin down the Tao, keep from trying to constrain the ineffable, that eventually it will take form in this world for us as our true love for all things in existence.

Clearly the mastery of intuition is a crucial aspect of magick and so ultimately life itself. We know mastery is accomplished when we can access the collective "akashic" unconscious, with this intuitive form of receiving gnosis being a skill that is learned by stilling the mind, and seizing on the first impression to arise from the tacit awareness. The entheogenic experience, which was of course well known to the Greeks, often seems to be among other things one way of increasing anamnesis, which takes the form of the ideas inspired by the experience, or through the enhanced intuitive abilities of someone in such a state. If you take enough entheogens you will for certain periods of "time" or beyond time, be aware in a non linguistic state, even as I was in my first acid trip, a state where all information and time existed in a singularity. With practice, even with pot, you will remember the skill of intuition intuitively, as it will to some degree overwhelm your rational processes with information gained through anamnesis. That isn't to say every weird idea you have on entheogens is definitely right, (at least in this parallel dimension) in the beginning especially you must be careful and critical, but that it can potentially aid anamnesis, or at least open you up to new possibilities, especially in regards to who you are as an individual. There is much you know, that you don't know you know and much of my writing has been acquired in this way, I am not sure where it comes from, but it feels like its almost from the future, and yet I am remembering it, its a strange feeling sometimes not unlike deja vu.

Language is a tool to help the memory recollect specific experiences that are felt before they are articulated, as well as direct the will and perception, so it goes to follow we must practice the art of articulation if we are to become more conscious of certain things and work with them in a more practical way. So it was that religions were created to explain to others mystical experiences, a means of setting out all the forces that is communicable to others, at least to some degree. Problems start to happen when people working in those symbol systems haven't achieved the mystical states and so can only really understand little more than a literal translation of the metaphysical formulas and metaphors. Even when you create your own set of symbols it can be easy to get locked into them, to take the symbols superficially, to get lost in the consistency of the articulation, to pay more attention to the symbol than what is symbolized, to not make a point of consciously feeling the feeling every time you are aware of the symbol. When people get lost in metaphors they are made into slaves of the memetic prison, they can start to kill or hurt others who don't agree with them and all the other bullshit that happens with religion and language.

The language of the mind is known by most in the idea of dream interpretation, however this is a personal language so it helps if you define it for yourself, make yourself aware that you're sub conscious is always trying to give you information even in waking states. Many books have been written as dream dictionaries, but these are generally garbage unless you want to adapt your mind to its symbol system. What will probably be much more effective for you is the creation of your own dream dictionary and although I do believe in a collective unconscious, the context for even archetypes is your own personality and so always requires your own interpretations. Learning the symbol systems of the Occult and teaching them to your subconscious ritually will further help your dialogue with the universe, giving you ideas about vocabulary so that your subconscious will know how to specifically speak to you.

It is undeniably possible to learn how to control our dreams in a lucid dream, but we must also do this with the dream of life and then you must realize that you are amnesiac, so that you can start to work on remembering your true self. Through the skills of concentration, visualization, the faculty of abstraction and anamnesis, we can remember the eternal moment from which all time springs forth, from which all physical time symbolism comes, time is the dissection of this eternity and physical reality is the self awareness or reflection of this eternity. We can dream unconsciously, or we can become lucid, we can even wake up, but the dream will go on forever unless we learn how to control it and ultimately go beyond it, and ritual meditation and entheogens are the best ways I know of to accomplish this.

Realizing there even is an ineffable is one of the first steps of freeing ourselves from the literalization of metaphors which form the walls of our memetic prison of abstraction. We filter out things which do not fit into our paradigm and this is why most people do not have mystical perception all of the time, they are not recognizing the symbols coming into form from the feeling or actual stimulus, they also screen out all that they have been taught to ignore. We need to learn to adjust the information filters which stop us from re-cognizing things that are not part of our paradigm and so gain access to the real experience, which is always free of dualism or other interpretations. Of course we must also be careful about taking in information from those who are in their own prison of some sort, but even if they are enlightened we must realize that all information which is symbolized loses meaning when translation from person to person occurs, just like we inevitably lose some electricity when we run it through a conductor. Whether something is inside or outside the normal paradigm it is not an indicator that it is based on valid research, or that the person is not above making honest or calculated mistakes, just like we are all not above making mistakes in discerning if it is valid information. Somewhere inside us all is an anal retentive personality, that which discriminates, is methodical, meticulous, analytical and perfectionist, which may want to help others, but may end up meddling in the affairs of others in an attempt to protect the shy sensibilities of a virgin soul from all Earthly uncleanness counter to our views. Going outside of our filters is scary for this reason among others, such as we have been taught to put a scary label on this kind of awareness, we have also been taught to talk to ourselves as if we are not in control, but it is this very self talk that is the control. Scary as it may be, at the same time if we have searched everywhere we are comfortable and still have not found transcendental truth, then it must be that the truth lies where we fear to look, which is why so many people are ignorant.

True knowledge will come when you face and explore all things you fear, these fears are often just the natural forces, or forces of our mind which we haven't yet articulated and explored, once we face them and define them they cease to be as scary and in fact are often some of the most beautiful parts of us. When we work within a very limited understanding of our non verbal mind, we grapple all the more fiercely to our little informed perceptions and so the harder it is for us to venture out, we are trapped within neurotic complexes which are ultimately illusionary because we have no context from other corresponding and influencing forces. We have no reference to things in our language except within the language itself and so although our paradigm may seem to explain all things, it is really just a self perpetuating feed back loop of denial which cyclically reinforces itself so that we invest more time and emotions into it and become all the more terrified of things which claim to be outside. This is institutionalized psychological xenophobia of our mental prison constructs and the longer you have operated in a rigid paradigm, the worse it gets.

This complex that we take for granted as true creates assumptions about any contrary stimulus that does come in, so much that we will "not believe our eyes," repress experiences or dismiss them before we have even investigated them. This serves to limit our consciousness by premature conclusions closing us off to possibilities, so while critical discernment is needed when evaluating information, especially what you tell yourself, it should always be understood that just because you have always believed something, or believed it for longer than other things, does not mean that it is any more valid than something new.

With each new idea we have, we should first take it relatively and by itself thoroughly investigating it, rather than examining it from previously held beliefs and assumptions with their own agendas. If we fail to do this, we will fall into all kinds of idol worship and so give many things much more validity and value then they really have, or dismiss other things based on our own bias. Learn to be conscious of how and why you accept things into your personal belief system and understand that just because someone is smart, does not make them an authority on reality, if you have masters, be they symbolic or human you will never be free and you will never have control of yourself and so never experience the transcendent. Simply telling yourself you will be objective when discerning truth is not enough, it is not an objective statement itself, you must learn methods to root out assumptions and bias, to explore in depth what a thing is before passing judgement on it, then finally comparing it to what you already think you know, but always experiencing that the truth is really beyond words.

Many seem to think for the most part they want a world in which "god" will provide them with instant gratification of every whim they have, but the fact is they already have it. You may doubt this but hear me out, the reality is that people truly want to become people with a higher awareness, who are capable of handling such a reality and to become a person who can use such power effectively and wisely. If we are all divine and can create any kind of physical reality we wish, if we are lucid dreamers in an eternal sleep, the question of what is worth spending your time doing becomes increasingly important as immortality lingers on. Dealing with eternity can get boring after a few billion years, sex is great, but who says having bodies is the best? And who can fall in love with someone you know is an abstraction? Maybe the seemingly scary truth is that people want to think of themselves as powerless so that their fears don't manifest anymore than they already do, that they want to experience atheism or powerlessness as a change of pace, as a means of contrast to define divine awareness. People wish to dream of adventures and if there is no danger, no sense of possibility of you failing, then it doesn't seem like much of an adventure, it would be more just some elaborate hedonism. So to keep things interesting, to learn lessons that can come from the perspective of a limited being and to learn how to function as a lucid dreamer and get some sense of what is worth dreaming about, some dreams like those of the people in the world we live in, were created in order to provide that kind of a reality.

An eternity of getting everything your ego thinks it wants leads only to dissatisfaction and so awareness starts to want to go beyond the ego to find the true nature of reality beyond the temporary creations, to get a real sense of the possibilities and the broad underlying nature of reality and what it means to be divine. The best things in life are not consumer products, as punks know adversity, a frugal life, challenge and those most primal urges are better than the sophisticated pretensions of the ego. Not only this, but if you are capable of instantly creating any reality with your mind, then without perfect control of your mind, you are likely to create things unintentionally, even a whole world in which everything is terribly wrong and fucked up, monsters appearing and endless hells of uncontrolled projections of divine power. An uncontrolled mind which can create anything will create fear in the creator, but these very same fearful realities are just a disguise that everything is not exactly how they were created to be, that once you get past the fear, you can see the unpleasant creations to be motivations and lessons on how and why to take control of your mind. So by learning visualization and concentration or the skills required for magick, learning to take control of your dreams, we as divine beings can take control of our minds and learn to create realities consciously and in accordance with our will, to overcome our fears and transcend to more functional realities. Maybe people want to create a world in which they are unhappy with egotistical materialism so that they will be motivated to look for more meaningful things, this can of course take many life times, but I think the truth is we want to dream a dream that forces us to become courageous and aware.

Time is the perception of change created by the assumptions of consciousness in its explanations for its growing awareness. It is the externalized projection of our universal minds unfolding self awareness, this life is the training for death and the unfiltered creative mind manifesting reality which we are plunged in to after we stop telling ourselves stories about this world. Your life is a dream where you pick up where you left off each time you "wake up," all your memories carefully limited to those in the story you tell yourself your life has been about. That is each morning when you wake up, you enter time by continuing to make the story of your life, through what you call "time." While you may read through a book linearly, one line at a time in consecutive order, the whole of the book is present at all times. What you call the future only exists in your imagination, and what you call your past only exists in your memories, and for most people they never spend much time in the moment, but the present is all that has ever existed, it is only that presently we are having a changing perception which is representing itself in a causal linear fashion. Perception is like reading the lines in a book, but this is really an illusion of convenience and once your awareness reaches a certain level, you will realize you knew everything all along, you were just remembering it in terms of a story, a mnemonic device encoded as what appears to be sensory input. You already know everything, you just wanted someone else, who seems to be separate from you to say what you know so it seemed more important, more real, so you didn't have to feel like you were responsible, like you were the only one who knew.

If life is like a book it is perhaps most like a choose your own adventure story book game, where we decide what the character does. We can change the page to a variety of other pages for the character to do different things, we decide where the story goes, but all possibilities are in the book at all times. We can in a sense cheat at the game through magick, looking ahead in the book to see what will happen if we make a certain choice, intuitively knowing what to do to manifest according to probability the kind of story we want. The harder something is to manifest the longer the story we have to tell to get to that place in the multiverse, but that manifestation already exists and for most people, it is very improbable that they are the divine author of their lives. You are in the dimension where this book is exactly what you need to hear to become enlightened, if you want to be, but you could also move to the dimension where you choose to ignore it or disbelieve it for any number of reasons, such as to justify not being enlightened.

Like the Aboriginal people of Australia who use songs to figure out how to get to a destination, they know they have walked far enough when the song ends. The dream time is the real reality, that which exists beyond linear time, encompassing all possible time lines, all beginnings and all endings of all stories and songs. Linear time is just an abstraction, like a perfect line or a perfect square is an abstraction, but it is an abstraction that can be used to explain certain realities, to theoretically figure out things so that we might plan for the future of how to use causality in our story to arrive at a manifestation, however this causal model is just a working theory within a hypothetical construct. The magick of science, technology and linear perception of using it and creating it is just a powerful story, or song, or spell we tell ourselves to travel to the universe in which a manifestation we intend is a highly probable. Time is the linear order we put to our memories as we remember them through anamnesis, it is non linear infinite chaos put in an order that creates the sense of progression that allows us to raise our awareness and learn to achieve our will.

Through ignorance of their divinity and of their ability to create reality, people rationalize their fears in various ways, demonize those who create them and cling to any limited abstractions or personal creations they think can free them from their fears. However no creation can stop you from being the creator, stop your need to control what you create and so dualistic desperation for the veneration of certain concepts becomes paramount, most notably in religions with messiahs that promise to make everything better one day. Also since few people tackle these ideas head on, since few seek out their fears in order to master them, to make this your purpose in life is to go without the safety of the cradle known as “consensus reality,” the group dream of escapism, the pursuit of dreams which keep people ignorant. However just because we are not aware of this order, this underlying objectivity that all reality is a subjective creation, does not mean we are free from it, that is what makes it so universal, it is not dualist or separate. This idea is just another abstraction, the objective reality is what is transcendent of any abstraction and contains all abstractions and because of this it must be arrived at intuitively and through experience.

Since reality is manifested by the individual according to consensus, we must examine how we go about providing our consensus and how this manifests in our awareness. We consent to ideas, to information which can manifest as a part of our paradigm, or as our magickal intentions for the world and since information takes form through all the various kinds of language, learning to express yourself in a way that is in line with consensus reality is crucial to creating the reality you really want. Since reality is congealed language, once you know you are dreaming language becomes the key to controlling it, to stating your intentions for what you consent to manifest. Not only this, but by consenting to the idea that reality is alive, unified and consensus based you can learn to consent to having reality communicate directly with you, to teach you how to manifest and become more aware. Really you can manifest information about anything you want to learn, but the first thing you should probably learn is which beliefs you should have to maximize your ability to function. In order to consent to communicating with the universe you simply set up some kind of predetermined language for which the universe can speak. The universe is always trying to communicate with us, though we often aren't paying attention, or do not have a very set language in which to converse. The universe is always trying to get us to consent to a magickal world view and it is willing to take on any form which we will accept. In this way each memetic paradigm is a language, we each find what we are looking for as the universe is trying to speak to us on our own terms, even when our terms mean we do not recognize the possibility of a sentient unified reality.

Creating a set predetermined language may sound difficult, but really the universe can and does communicate in an endless amount of ways, the universe will talk to us about anything we want to know if we can provide a suitable medium for communication. One common method is the tarot deck and I find it hard to believe anyone who is well versed in the tarot would believe that divination lies in some magical property of cards, which are generally mass produced in a variety of forms in factories. Instead the tarot, like all forms of divination and magick work by setting up a predetermined agreed upon symbolic language, in the case of divination the universe's "words" are spoken through "chance." An Omen is an omen because it was a predetermined that such a symbolic and unusual event would be created by the universe if it wished to convey the message which the seers (or whoever) had previously designated to the event. Portents of bad luck like a black cat or breaking a mirror were probably not originally seen as the cause of bad luck as they are today, but as an omen of bad luck. If you happen to like black cats you could use their occurrence in your life as a sign of good luck, that's what I do, then you get yourself a black cat and have a great life.

Although there is great value in using traditional "languages" and cosmologies as they have had much time to evolve and build in vocabulary, they are ultimately unnecessary as the power does not lie within the language itself. (Though Hebrew, Greek and some other magickal traditions will tell you different, this is because they have been designed to use language in a specific ritual way.) This is shown by the fact that anyone can create any new kind of language from which things will be shown to them. Whether the magician looks to the wrinkles of a sheep's intestine or meteor showers there are names for all kinds of divination through natural events, such as hydromancy and pyromancy, aeromancy and geomancy etc, we are only limited by our imaginations. The power always lies in the fact that it was arranged before hand, all events are the universe speaking to itself, even if it doesn't always listen. If you were dedicated enough to create the language you could create your own method of divination, all you need to do is find some form in which the divine can show itself to you like say, divination through the shape of clouds or through the forms of trees.

In my opinion this communication with the universe is at least in part what has been called in Alchemy the "green language" or "language of the birds" as birds too have been used for divination, but this communication with nature can take many forms according to what we consent to. (In Tantra this is called the "twilight language") The green language can include anything which presents itself randomly, any experience or object that does something unexpected can be used for predicting future events or gaining general information about a situation, a practice known as "apantomancy." In today's more technological societies we might say this is really the Alchemical language of the universe, getting information through synchronicity in general, through union with reality, using chaos to create a self similar microcosm according to the moment the divination was performed.

Of course some discernment and intuition is pivotal in trying to determine the future, especially when you are first learning how to divine, languages are not learned all at once and you must build up your manifesting abilities, your ability to consent to a specific reality wholeheartedly through repeated experiments. I am not suggesting you decide its OK to murder a bunch of people because you flipped a coin, but the Chinese do use coins in their I Ching system of divination and its supposed to be very accurate. For me however, I almost only use divination to get information about the present and to better understand the undertaking of a magickal ritual. After all, I believe we create our own futures and that it is never really written in stone.

Perhaps in some ways if a person doesn't really understand what is going on it can lead to delusions of grandeur like when someone thinks the TV is talking to them, or when some people think a song was written just for them. This can be really cool when it happens but it is a practice, not an end in itself, keep in mind the universe didn't create those TV shows or songs just for you, even if it was using those mediums to send you a message. When this happens but you don't really have the knowledge of mysticism to understand it, it can lead to delusions of grandeur as if you are the messiah, but if you think that you alone are "god" you are fooling yourself because you are not even you. These are however good examples of why you should not make yourself a slave to assumed messages from "god" or anyone else for that matter, keep it Anarchist and use it to gain information, not to get orders, the universe can speak to you, but you must always make your own decisions and follow your own will. If you don't talk to the universe consciously and just do whatever an omen tells you, you can misinterpret things and so communication is more for growing your awareness through manifesting opportunities to learn, rather than having some infallible being directing every moment of your life.

To do divination most successfully a balance is required between a knowledge of the divination language and the intuition to interpret it, some people rely on their intuition alone, but if you know how to manifest things according to will, then you can trust the universe will manifest the right omens. These omens require some intellectual knowledge to interpret correctly, that is to say, as for example with the tarot, when doing a divination many New Agers tend to rely solely on their intuition, the ones I have met often even throw away the book of meanings for the cards, almost with contempt for the Occult traditions that made them. They imagine that such intellectual knowledge might distract them from their intuition, but this is because they have little faith in their intuition, or their ability to manifest the correct cards for the question. However to do the best divinations, in my experience it is best to lay out the cards in the spread, then go with your intuition and your first impressions, then I go back to the start and look at the cards using my knowledge of their basic traditional meanings, then I look them all over again interpreting the more subtle Qabbalistic and astrological symbolism etc, finally I look at how the various cards are combined and the groups and positions of the cards in the spread as they relate to each other.

The tarot and other symbolic divination systems act as focal point which provides inspiration for the intuition to reveal the true feelings and will in regards to a subject. This is done by the arbitrary triggering of articulation through chance recognition of symbols, but interpreted through parts of consciousness which are beyond time and space through the unconscious. Since the future is never set in stone this is especially useful when getting information about the present. It is useful in magick in that it is a good indication of our true will towards something and our level of faith in the magickal act to be performed, or what hidden connotations and meanings lie behind our statement of intent, our spell or sigil and so how successful the ritual will be.

Perhaps intuition is our natural means of discerning the quantum probability of something manifesting in the future. That is to say, by using intuition we are possibly able to tell which event is most likely to take form from the quantum probability which determines how physical reality plays out. By using the will in conjunction with emotion and symbols, we are able to work magick to change this quantum probability, but through intuition we get the feeling of whether or not we are putting out the right energy, to tip the scales of probability in our favor.

Many people who feel they are unable to guide themselves on their spiritual journey often resort to gurus or spiritual teachers and while some people are genuinely trying to help others grow spiritually, there are often a number of problems with this. For starters this goes by the assumption that you were not created with all that you need to become spiritually aware by yourself, but there is also the very real risk of dogma and hierarchy that comes with so many spiritual groups. One way around this is to learn the green language so the universe can teach you what you need to know. If you can attune yourself to the divine in everyday life, then you need no single teacher, the universe itself will be your guru. Though you can never take away your individual responsibility to learn, or ask the right questions, everyday people will provide you with spiritual insight if you know how to look, they may not have those intentions, but all kinds of synchronicities will happen which will provide you with the lessons you need to grow. I have been continuously amazed how information, or books, or random people will come into my life at just the right moment and present me with information that is exactly what I needed to figure something out, its as if I am the universe teaching myself.

All magickal systems and cosmologies work much in the same way, by setting in our mind that “X” actions, thoughts or words will produce desired effects, we create a better method of conveying our intentions to the omnipresent creative force, which is all too eager to fill the request when asked in a clear enough way. The mind can only communicate through symbolism, though there is intuition, even it needs symbolism to be interpreted very definitively, or to transmit the information to another consciousness. By learning how to think in more ambiguous symbolic terms rather than verbal terms, we build up skills for using different parts of our mind, as by practising the ability to use symbolic awareness it will allow you to see much much more meaning in everyday life and in your dreams, it will also help you to access more tacit forms of knowledge. For example the sympathetic methods of natural magick are extremely effective and simple languages which are easy to use, but each religious and magickal tradition has its own language for interacting with Chaos.

Originally pretty much all of the first alphabets were created as a focus for the mind, for the purposes of magick, the origins of the alphabet are shrouded in mystery but are undoubtedly the result of long used proto-writing. All the oldest alphabets that I know of have magickal uses, from Egypt, to China and India, the Mayans, Aztecs, Greeks, Celtic Ogham, the Norse runes and the Hebrew alphabet, even cuneiform to some degree. Before this there was much older proto-writing systems which had ceremonial meaning and date back to the neolithic period and so it is clear writing was always seen in a magickal light and those who were literate had a very special place in society. (While book keeping and accounting is the subject of some of the oldest cuneiform texts we have, this was originally done by priests in a theocracy and as we will see, was not strictly secular, but is not really the first writing anyway.) This is why Nisaba, Odin, Oghma, Thoth, Hermes and others are simultaneously the divinities of writing, as well as magick and divination. This is perhaps most famously the case of Odin, as in his myths the runes are his creation, specifically made for the purposes of magick. Proto-writing made use of symbols, ideograms more like Chinese writing or hieroglyphs, but this can be far more technical than we might imagine at first, and in a largely illiterate world, right up until a couple of centuries ago, emblems and “heraldry” would most commonly be used by the people to communicate using visual symbolism. Egyptian hieroglyphics were used strictly for religious and magickal purposes, while demotic was more for the commoners, the etymology of the word “hieroglyphic” is literally the glyphs of the hierophants or priests. Though propaganda probably did play a role, there is no doubt heavy mystical meaning underlying Egyptian texts which we have largely lost the context for, and the temples which were lined with these sigil letters had a variety of functions which largely remain unknown.

Since magick works through language, connotations, innuendos, multiple entendres and word play are very important to understand when wording any magickal intention or interpreting texts. Another interesting etymological side note is that the original meaning of “grimoire,” which is a magicians book of “spell”s is derived from the word “grammar.” In the case of the Enochian system, a whole verbal language was created (or transmitted) to go along with the magickal alphabet which intends to communicate with the “angels.” As I alluded earlier, Hebrew was originally only spoken for ritual purposes according to Kabbalistic principles, with the commoners speaking Aramaic. The Greeks had “voces magicae” which was a ritual language for reciting spells created according to strange undiscovered formulas to make what are today incoherent mantras.

In the case of Qabalah we can liken it to a filing system for the universe, in which everything can be put in to terms of 10 “sephiroth” or archetypal categories, (sephirah is singular) so that you will know how to classify things in order to express your intention. Qabalah is much more than this, but I can't do justice to such a huge topic here, suffice to say the sephiroth are made up of the 7 "planets" + 1 for the zodiac + 1 for the monad or god/desshead + 1 for Earth. Once you are able to recognize how every day objects are categorized in the Qabalah or other symbol systems, you can get a new understanding of how they interact with each other and how the universe is constantly communicating with you. Not only is the Hebrew language designed to be a magickal language, it is based on written formulas with each of the Hebrew letters having a variety of meanings including but not limited to the numerological, astrological and even the major arcana of the tarot cards and so this idea of a ritual language is very old and widespread.

As consciousness determines everything we perceive about the universe, and consciousness focus's so much on words, in a very real way the whole universe is made of words, but in every conceivable language, verbal or not that you can come up with, it is just that most of us don't listen, or are too busy with our own self talk to notice. If different magickal systems are languages, then Chaos magick can be likened to linguistics, in that it tries to understand the syntax and underlying meaning and uses a variety of sources for it s vocabulary. In this way the world is really made of language, those who know this can then use their linguistic capabilities to work with reality to shape it. A poet or bard, or spellcrafter can be likened to an (al)chemist combining different fundamental building blocks to create new compounds and forms from which to work with. In this same way an etymologist is sort of like a particle physicist, tracing the roots of the most fundamental building block in order to determine how reality itself is constructed. It doesn't matter what language you speak, but I think its important to have a comprehensive vocabulary, you cannot always tell the meaning of a word from the context, so get into the habit of looking up words you don't know.

Verbal language is the ego's means of focusing its superficial attention on something, words largely structure our beliefs and our beliefs are what determine our reality. This should make it obvious that we must closely watch our use of language, remember each thought is a prayer, or a message to your subconscious, so don't say or think things that aren't in accordance with your true will. This doesn't mean you lie to yourself, but that you phrase things in a way that grow your consciousness. When I was first learning to do this I felt overwhelmed by always having to pay attention to my thoughts, now that I think about it that is a strange thing to say, that we aren't all always paying attention to our thoughts. I used to think about how hard it was to learn this skill, which of coarse manifested this into my life, however after focusing on my growing ability and that it was becoming easier I soon became much better. Most have been raised to make a habit of doubting anything magickal, of doubting their ability to control their mind, and of being prone to various kinds of fears and muddled thinking, these are the linguistic constructs you have to root out and face in order to streamline your manifesting ability, the first step is to say to yourself that you can do it.

Using intentions to grow your awareness you can program your mind to optimize utilitarian potential and really create any mindset and reality you want. There are no limits except what you place on yourself, something which you do through language, but it is possible to deceive yourself and call it positive thinking. Covering up bad feelings under happy words shows you aren't getting to the root of the problem, so make it an imperative to know thyself and eliminate any constructs which are not useful. If you decide to get rid of the gravity construct so you can fly, make sure to take off from the ground rather than jumping off a building. Remember some belief structures are more deeply rooted than others, some can be very hard to remove and some should probably not be removed.

We waste all kinds of energies manifesting aspects of our paradigm which do not really serve us and so through the process of magick we can learn to conserve and direct our energies much more efficiently. Eliminating these destructive thought forms and beliefs from our lives, is the process called putrefaction or the negredo in Alchemy and it can be extremely difficult as you experience pretty well all the things your ego used to value become worthless and then you eliminate them from your life. Just because you know magick doesn't mean your life will be pain free, especially if you ever send out the intention to let the universe make you grow, you may just find yourself outside your gilded cage and this can be quite upsetting if you are attached to your present lifestyle. Though this process of putrefaction is unpleasant, it will eventually get better and ritual, or Alchemy are languages that you can use to facilitate this process. They are the languages you use to change your paradigm and so change what you consent to manifest in consensus reality and with that you learn to make your life what you really want it to be. These are all just some of the powerful potentials of language, something which we all must master to reach our full potential.

Being in a consensus reality it can be hard to define what I mean by "I," everyone is united, but does that mean everyone is alone? Humanity seems to be looking for someone, something to tell it what it is, to tell each individual who they are. Generally this means identifying through ideologies and memes, but these are not really a person's self, they are just the psychological clothes they wear to hide their naked true self of which they are generally ashamed. You know who you are by how you have interacted with other people, how you respond and how they respond to you, but this is really a self referential system since everyone is dependent on everyone else. Lost in ignorance we talk amongst ourselves creating many theories, but basing all our theories on each other, never getting an outside perspective, this is of course why people look to aliens and religions to tell them who they are, but in the end, all of reality is one. Don't you know you are someone who doesn't know who they are? Oh what a flame in the black virgin void that leads the way to wisdom, maybe if I stare at it long enough I will go blind, cloaked in the shrouds of the abyss. I feel like Diogenes holding a lantern in the middle of the day, looking around town for one honest person. Yes we are alone together, searching for ourselves we are right here, but here is everywhere and we want to focus only on our bodies. We want a nice simple box to live in where everything is neatly defined and maddeningly obscure, forever thwarting our attempts at contentment so that we will strive to get out and in to reality. The problem is nothing is out there, but if you can be happy in an empty void for eternity, you can be happy in any experience.

Outside In

Watch the people walking on the street,
Talking about this and that while wrapped in sunlight,
Never seeing the individual beams as they are completely surrounded.

Do you think what you think is real, is the only real?

What if you saw something more real than anything you had experienced before?

The point isn't whether or not the old view or even the transcendental experience was real, but how could anything seem real again?

A democratically elected reality or maybe your imagination is capable of thinking of something that although illusory, is capable of unravelling everything the intellect has come to believe.

What if your imagination is so powerful as to create the delusion your imagination is all powerful?

What if you imagined a world where you could live where you wouldn't have to know you are its creator?

What if your ability to determine if your cognition is working properly has been impaired because cognition is impaired.

Maybe it was something you ate?

Logic is a closed system and the problems of life are open ended

Self referencing realities are like trying to define a word using the word itself.

Delusions are everywhere but all I know is how I feel about what my senses tell me.

What if beings beyond your perceptions were controlling things to make you think you are in control?

Insanity is thinking you know the truth when no one else knows, then having to deal with how you are treated, but then no one really knows the truth they just agreed to agree.

Which is a thought that could drive anyone mad, if only people cared to think.

Maybe the truth is so bizarre only the deluded can stay "sane," those who think dangerous thoughts are deemed mad, but are in fact breaking away from the group delusion.

Perhaps the world is a figment of a person in a padded cell with doctors and loved ones desperately trying to get through to no avail.

Perhaps this is a declaration of insanity, that he is not getting the message.

That if my delusions aren't real then the world outside the figments might as well be delusions too.

These are the demons we all have to face for how long can we talk to figments?

All so that we may not be alone in our prison.

You might say that can't be true, its too scary to be real, but then you admit you believe only what is comforting.

If the universal mind is all of us it has one serious case of multiple personality disorder.

Look inside you, you are the one that decides whats real, whether or not you take into account other peoples views.

You are the one who made the light and the sensation of having a body with eyes in which to perceive it and everything else.

The whole universe is inside your brain and the experience of having a brain is part of the universe.

You are not your body or even your thoughts, you don't even exist, but neither do "I."

If life is a delusion you may as well make it a happy one.

If you're not careful realizing everyone is an extension of you will isolate you.

Or you can try and nominate a new reality where it doesn't matter if you are eternally alone.

Chapter 10 – To Be

Looking out into the world, seeing the people who act as puppets for memes, corporations and capitalist culture, being inundated by the hierarchical thinking of alpha males who want to dominate and establish their own mutated version of culture, it is clear that humanity understands little. Then there is Helen with her barbell 0 gauge piercings, reflecting the glorious image of her beautiful face, her head looking down to me which as I rose revealed a mystery as she stood above, stunned by such light I saw her untouched and weird wisdom, the part of her which is always free from desire. But then that was just a dream, a memory half forgotten when we were together and I saw in her all that was pure and right, all that she could be and the happiness we could have together. If only I could be strong enough to reach her, strong enough to help her in this world. The attraction of most lovers is based on your ability to validate their ego, is it the people we love? Or their choice of memes? Or do we just love being loved? People and their priorities, they say we have to have a moral and just world, according to traditional principles of value, never mind the fact that “civilized” humans have always been corrupt and have a long and proud tradition of stamping out other cultures they define as “uncivilized.” We even pride ourselves on destroying societies not based on exploitation and theft, thinking we are just in our tyrannical brutality and imposition of our artificial values. We do not care where we come from, where we are going or who we really are, not when we have to focus on competing with everyone around us. It is amazing that domination of the militarily weak and the looting of all natural resources could ever convincingly be called just. I wonder how we can reenter the state of consciousness produced by the nature loving Anarchic Pagan traditions? Days of Dionysian festivals and orgies, oh ya give me that old time religion! What madness other than hierarchy could create the kingdom of lies we find ourselves in.

A person in this society can't look weak, those not interested in domination are to be crushed underfoot, they are “evil” for believing in the natural love of humanity, for believing that we can live in peace and should be tolerant of those who are different, those who want to make a better world. There are some Christians who believe demons control the world, the bible even says it is Satan who rules us and while some may hate the present government, most have not learned government is the inevitable product of hierarchy. It never really occurs to most Christians that it is white Christianity and its culture which have the most control over the world and so if there is a Satan, by their own bible he must run Christianity. Disenfranchised and unhappy with the system, many people believe all problems are caused by society not being right wing conservative enough, that everyone would be rich if there was a true “free market.” These hideous souls who think that civil rights and feminism are the work of some Satanic plot to end their theocracy, they just don't see the irony, the hypocrisy of screaming out for the freedom to oppress everyone else, to practice their religion of forced conversion and imposition of its principles on everyone. America they say was founded as a Christian nation, never mind the Natives or everyone else who came thinking something about freedom of religion, I say if it is a Christian nation then all the more reason we should rebel against it.

One kind of meme that is never afraid to assert itself, to claim itself a victim, to justify whatever means necessary in the name of its ends are the memes of hierarchy, the memes of controlling others in the name of freedom. This is the mentality that states if people do what they want, if they don't accept hierarchical programming then they are enemies to all humanity, if the authorities are racist the other people may not even be human and so anything is justifiable against them. Those “evil” people who want everyone to be equal, who want to take away peoples freedom to be part of the tradition of oligarchical control and exploitation of the masses, these people are deemed murderous and tyrannical agents of Satan, after all they disagree with the authorities who the masses have come to believe more or less unquestioningly.

If the divine has an ego, it is the government, if we are all one then it is the reflection of our own egos, especially if you believe in elections, but then self deception is the forte of the ego, it can't let the conscious mind think there is any other way than it, any other reality than it. If each government is a personality or ego, then the collective mind has multiple personality disorder, so then each citizen of those governments is the unconscious mind in a world that is going insane. The oligarchs and international bankers then are working to bring about a one world order, a one world ego that will kill all the rest if need be. It's one thing to hate the government, but who really understands why such people do what they do? After all they were only following cultural customs, group social values, they played by the rules how can anyone be mad at them? It doesn't matter if the rules say the oligarchs can make the rules in their favour so they can oppress everyone, why the only alternative would be Anarchy! The people agreed to let the government be their representatives and since the people only dream of being the fuckers, rather than the fucked, they want representatives which encourage the people's ability to set up hierarchies which fuck over those below them.

Currently, in their limited awareness, most people don't want equality, they want competition, the free market, the freedom to let those who are most manipulative and conniving work their way up the hierarchy. These people in their ignorance want a culture which strips them of their rights so as to preserve their freedom, their freedom to abandon personal responsibility to their representatives. Any deviation from established mechanisms of control, any attempt to try and control your own life will result in what they think is a total loss of freedom, but is only the loss of the freedom to avoid thinking about what it is you really want and the freedom to avoid individual autonomy.

Within my personal relationships even if it is a largely passive aggressive or unconscious influence, there are far too many people interested in finding out who is the bigger authority on life, of which kind of culture is best, of who knows the best way to be happy, to be aware, to be popular and exert influence over other people. Most people want to be happy but don't want to have to give up any of their bad habits, they want a good world but still want the big screen TV and SUV, they want freedom, but think nothing of shopping at Walmart or investing in companies bent on exploiting the third world. We live in the wheel of fortune culture, with soulless vampires running the show, telling us what we should want, waiting for that easy break, that luck which will give us everything we want so we can live happily ever after. Of course it all looks so much better when displayed by a vacuous bimbo, the wheel goes round and some few win, but as it turns it brings down the rest of the planet.

From the Occult, a person can get a whole new context on their games, what was hidden knowledge in plain sight, the consent to slavery through the promise that we stick to the rules of their rigged game, all just so we can have a chance to win the so called fabulous prizes. This wheel of fortune is also the wheel of time, the wheel of reincarnation and we crucify ourselves to it through our desires just as surely as the stars and planets move across the night sky. So many people seem unconscious, they don't know why they do what they do, they don't notice their own hypocrisy and would be quite mad if you pointed it out, quick to point the finger at you for something else, rather than really examine their own lives and so I try to make myself more aware of where my own faults lie. Who doesn't want to change the world? People who want the world to change by collective decision. You can't make people free by telling them what to do, only by giving them tools so they can see for themselves how they aren't free. Magick and all practices which encourage self awareness and introspection, critical thinking and Anarchism can be used to help people come to their own conclusions about hierarchy and authoritarian behaviour.

I may be in a semi state of solipsism right now, but looking around at other people it seems they or the me in them is controlled by unconscious influences, that they are programmed. People do not understand they are not their memes but instead identify with them so much, they act out automatic behaviour with little to no awareness of what else they could be. This no doubt could be construed as elitism on my part and perhaps on some levels it is, but since I am them, I am no better than them and in fact I am aware that my individuated ego is prone to such self deceptions, the only difference is I try harder to fix this problem. If reality is my dream, then the characters in it use memes to improvise a basic script for themselves so as to create the story for their lives, the closest thing to being real are artistic types who create their own memes to live by, because if you aren't making your own memes, you are literally mimicking others.

One of the main problems I see in the world is that people have no context for what humanity could and should be like and so the everyday tyranny that they experience does not seem like tyranny at all, it is simply an everyday fact of life which seems normal. Doing horrible things to each other is a normal part of life, lying in social and professional situations is pretty well taken for granted. It is hard for society to get better when it doesn't even realize it has a problem, when it is so easily led to become obsessed with the superficial and vain. How can a person even be said to have free will if they do not understand the forces which motivate them? Or what the implications of their actions really are? Most people are too tired from work to educate themselves in any way besides watching mainstream news or perhaps reading a newspaper, too busy to properly raise their kids who often spend more time with state teachers, than they do with their parents. Who could be surprised when such kids rebel against parents who abandon them to be educated by a government who only wants to train slaves? If you are born into a carefully contrived reality such as our modern day society, then you will take for granted the justification for most of that reality, it will be second nature to you and as we become more technological, to most it is becoming more real than our original organic nature.

When a person is raised to obey and believe authorities then how can they even know their own mind? Most of what they will know is what they have been told they are or at least what authorities say they should be, which will make most people repress any deviant urges from the culture in which they are raised. If the culture is one bent on exploiting everything possible this mindset will be seen as normal, natural and even healthy. It will take a good deal of introspection and non mainstream sources of information for an individual to develop an awareness which stops making assumptions day to day, that those kinds of actions are anything but healthy. These assumptions and ignorant world views lead these memes to evolve, making the next generation even more ignorant so that they can be exploited according to the demands of the authoritarian culture, sending all of us into a downward spiral of hierarchical mentalities. These memes create individuals which have less and less independent thought and which will seek to stamp out any other view of reality which presents an alternative, even if that alternative is clearly more functional and humanitarian.

Anarchism can provide alternatives to this pathological behaviour but from what I see far too much of political action revolves around materialist mechanistic factors of economics and power structures, never really getting to the underlying psychological factors which led to this situation. This mistake is understandable as modern society has long forgotten what it truly means to be free and so it has lost the context for what is actually a functional mindset. Instead our egos prefer to attempt to base everything in a purely abstract rationalism, rather than day to day experience, much of which involves emotional factors and so is much more complicated than simple linear logic. If a person is raised in a society like ours where the media is largely controlled, where the education system seeks to mold them into a slave, then they will not have the facts required to make logical decisions. So many Anarchists try to rationally inform others with historically very little success, but one answer is that activists need to work on helping those aspects of consciousness which know something is wrong, but which is contrary to what the average worker or bourgeois person rationally believes.

The success of rationality is determined by the amount of information used in deliberation, if large portions of information are ignored because of ignorance of irrational bias and psychological issues, (like the egos pain in realizing it is bias) then it does not matter how much rationalizing goes on, the persons views will not change, in fact the rationalizing is just part of pretence, part of the denial. If a person doesn't even realize they don't like the system they live in, they will not look into the alternatives of the system and they will not listen to anyone who tries to "educate" them as many activists attempt to do. Liking or disliking something is not a matter of rationality, though rationality is used to justify such feelings, it is usually done after the fact of an emotional response to something. So long as keeping with the mainstream seems more emotionally fulfilling than standing against it, all the facts in the world will not change the fact that little to no one conditioned by a culture of convenience will go outside their comfort zones.

Shared Hallucinations

Watching a bird fly by and feeling the wind brush against your skin, Engaging in an argument for the pleasure of the win.
Delusions of the mind fool even the brightest galactic spiral,
Social constructions spread and mutate with a nature that is viral.
Just because you are loved doesn't make you a person of quality,
How many tyrants were adored for their charismatic polity?
The Earth is below you and the stars are in a sky of open dark blue potential,
A herd sticks together most when afraid followed by a stampede that is sequential,
Leading to the manipulation of the whole, for standing together they would be unbeatable, Questioning everything such as why ask questions, is the means of making this disease treatable.
Though telling people not to tell people what to do is pointless and inane,
So is looking to everyone else for a place to lay the worlds blame.
We've been infected by our subservience and our lack of will to help,
So if no one listens to the gentle soul, who when beaten only lets out a whelp,
Compassion will be replaced by nihilism and all truth will be destroyed.
We are taught our 5 senses are all that is truly employed.
That to experience anything else is just a product of an untrustworthy opinion.
Those in control certainly know that narrowing the view is the only way to sustain their dominion.
Since its all really a personal creation, they create a group illusion that seems static,
Then alienate anyone who feels there are better things, than the false security of being dogmatic.
We are here within a pliable stability, as a course in how to control your dreams,
To learn how to create reality that's healthy, till novelty is bursting at the seams.
And those who try and stop you are the reflection of your fears,
The world around you is just the image of your minds sensory mirror.
Watch what you send out and know the experience of liberty is eventual,
Its simply total and complete and waiting till it's consensual.
Gravity and time are in their own way sublime,
They are words capable of anything no matter how absurd.
We are heading for tremendous things, even if our corpses just turn to compost,
Our short sightedness in ideas of mortality, make us forget the body is the souls host.
So proper goals and motivation are displaced,
Leading to the worlds enthusiastic disgrace.
Elitism is the system of trying to out scam everyone that's below,
But I am no better then them, even if I truly know.

Certain souls who may think they know what they are doing but don't, are incarnating to enslave the rest of us and keep us controlled and dominated by their own will instead of our own. They hide the truth from us to keep us from the discovery of our divine nature and our divine right to live our lives as we want. From this perspective murderous revolution doesn't really get rid of the evil in the world because it reincarnates again and since the ignorance of these souls hasn't been dealt with, they carry that on with them in to their next life. It could be argued that if a successful revolution was carried out in the world, a proper environment could be established to properly educate such destructive souls, but who can really say? Perhaps they would just rebel against you, perhaps its possible for them to reincarnate in the past and change our future making your revolution fail or hijacking it to make it worse? Perhaps we are in the middle of a non linear war through time, various souls incarnating at key historic dates to change the world either for Anarchy, or tyranny. Each soul must be educated and violence used only in terms of self defence, but one way or another, there is a metaphysical war going on for control of consensus reality. If an "evil" person were to be killed the negative energy would be carried into the future where it will be redefined still waiting to be dealt with and is perhaps even more polarized against a conducive egalitarian society. We will never really be able to kill away our problems, we have to learn how to deal with and transmute those megalomaniacal souls so that we can live harmoniously in an Anarchist society. Each soul has equal potential for realization and power as we in fact share the same collective soul.

The time of paradise was before the invention of good and evil, a delusion that has created the fall into physical reality, this reality is a metaphor of our collective thoughts and most of us are clueless. This is however the most ancient and universally known knowledge of existence because it actually predates physical existence. We must save our mind or we'll be trapped in this "hell" for eternity! Since we are all fundamentally one thing, there is a natural tendency for all the fragments of the universal mind, in our case "humans" to group together and be social and this manifests into our existence as civilization and social conformity to societies views. However this is because of the collective unconscious's natural gravitation towards solidarity or unity.

We are so busy fighting each other to ensure that our intentions are fulfilled that we forgot how much we generally share the same objectives and that no matter your spiritual or political beliefs, we are all human. This has gotten the mass consciousness into patterns of destruction and the cause of all fears in the known physical universe. Among other things, this takes the form of heavy energy like knives, and guns and nuclear bombs. I see it everywhere in social interaction, with people who think of nothing more than their reputation and social standing. I really am starting to doubt whether there can ever be a thing that I can permanently call me. Now that I think of it I realize that I am constantly changing and always will, that I have changed more than most people my age as no doubt everyone thinks differently than me. There is a small number who may have something in common with me, but no one exactly like me. The only people who are anything even remotely the same as me, are so incredibly different that it only causes me to think that no one could really be like me at all.

In my attempt to rid myself of fear I have been reckless in regards to romance at least. In forgetting how different I am and taking so little care of the consensus view of me, I forgot how little it is of myself that I am able to share with others, and really how little they share with me. In attempting to face my fear, perhaps I go too far in wanting them to face their own fear in all its forms, every time we learn something new we do in a sense go out of our minds. If our minds are infinite then we all decide where our fear stops us, where what we learn starts to become too strange and the unknown is too perilous to venture out into. Generally I believe this is rooted in the fear of alienation from those who make up the majority of the world, though for most it is superficially seen as the fear that such pursuits are a waste of time and pointless. I must find a way to live in this world which is what facing your fears is all about. Still it is incredibly discouraging because there is no one I can talk to about it and be who I really want to be. I'm sure all people feel like that sometimes, but the superficiality which surrounds me is sickening, people do not really seem to want to know each other, just have experiences with each other. I found it much easier to make friends when all I wanted to do was drink, fight and get high and though I do still have those urges, there is a lot more to my personality now, I had to become nice to be unloved.

With most, if you live completely altruistically you won't receive anything but a lack of altruism and this is the cause of so many problems in the world. It seems we are drawn into hierarchies because of our almost universal inclinations to have someone greater than ourselves in our lives, but also to have someone we view as lower than ourselves. This is of course due to the petty desires of the ego, the fear of being alienated as an individual capable of standing up to society and its hierarchical culture leads us to support the culture which makes us afraid, which makes free souls alienated. People look for concrete foundations which are universally and eternally applicable, but making your well being dependent on dogmas is always disappointing, nothing is good in all cases yet at the same time nothing is bad in all cases, there is only a consensus of opinions. Maybe the closest thing to a dogma that is true, is that all dogmas are limited in some way or another. Since we tend to force our own dogma where it doesn't belong, conflict arises and dogma is imposed.

How will humanity ever solve its problems and wake up from the mass hypnosis of hysteric ignorance? I don't know, but it will probably be around the same time we all recognize we belong to the same species and so deserve equality. That way of thinking often seems to be lost more and more as history rolls on and repeats itself, or perhaps we are just becoming more dehumanized as a human species together. In a technocratic capitalist, ego maniacal world of social Darwinism, the concepts of altruism, freedom and equality are not conducive to "success."

What's worse is that these concepts have often been artificially cultivated in the younger generations so that rebellion is bought and sold as a commodity. The companies must have it down to a formula by now of how to market revolution without anything being achieved except another turning of gears in their machine. We are sold the image of who we are and that to deviate from the stereotype is to lose the protection of the herd, not to mention the anonymity of not having to face your true self by not thinking for yourself. From an early age we are programmed into thinking that it's best not to think, and the most malevolent part is we are seldom even aware of it, especially if we never think about such things. One way they do this is by purposely making much of the education system boring and waste a lot of time, not only providing conditioning and training to become a worker, but also placing in the minds of the disaffected, the association of education with all kinds of unpleasantness. Kids who can see through the game then lose a lot of their motivation to educate themselves, even outside of established academia and instead resort to any number of forms of escapism, which of course only strengthens the system.

Beliefs shape reality and help to sculpt culture into forming the realities it believes in. What we have done to each other and this planet is a tumour in the universal mind, it is the result of unconscious manifestation with little to no thought of our true will. We have all been hypnotized by each other's self-perpetuating fear to close ourselves from divine experience, that we are beings of pure energy repeatedly creating different life times. A master of ceremonies is just a hypnotist or conductor of rituals to create a specific mindset and atmosphere, magick is everywhere but "hidden" or occult, except for those who know how to recognize it. A leader is someone who gets people to pool their energies together to create under one will, whenever possible without question or resistance since that will dilute the affirmation. There is a way to hypnotize yourself into seeing only the truth, to hypnotize yourself into immunity from being hypnotized unconsciously by other people and that is what the Occult is all about. However when these methods of individual liberation become appropriated by power structures to control others, they become organized religions.

Presently we create reality through our consciousness, but most people's consciousness paradigm is being controlled by people with highly unhealthy goals. Anarchy within the consensus belief structure can make sure that power is never abused again, Anarchist views towards spirituality and dealing with religion are key factors in spreading Anarchism and like it or not there is probably a greater chance of Jesus coming back, than the world being converted to atheism. If we are to have a free society, we must destroy the idea that there is only one right way of understanding the transcendent mystery that is beyond total understanding, there may only be one divine force but there are limitless ways to perceive it, each being equally valid. If you try to free yourself from ignorance, eventually you will succeed and at the very least you will cease to contribute pain to the world, you will no longer learn things the hard way. When enough people start to take responsibility for their own inner realities, the idea that we need other people to control the outer reality will become even more absurd than it already is. So then, Anarchism is the only true kind of society and it will only come when people understand the true nature of themselves.

From my research in Gnosticism I have come to the conclusion that these urges to dismiss and ignore information contrary to our paradigms, these illusions which we hold on to so as to avoid facing ourselves are in a sense the true rulers of the world, or as the Gnostics called them “archons.” These archons can take a variety of forms and influence us in a variety of ways, but in general we could say they are aspects of the universal mind which promote ignorance and procrastination when it comes to correcting mistakes. A Christian might say the world is evil, ruled by Satan and that it is not their fault as an individual for how the world is, but in Gnosticism archons influence not through causing evil, but by making us believe that what we are doing is appropriate, they do this by setting up cognitive dissonance and the illusions of bias, getting us to divide the oneness in to neat arbitrary abstractions. Anything which you hold up as having a higher priority to living in truth and awareness is an archon, all diversions and urges to escape from the true reality are your prison guards.

Archons can be complex and have a variety of aspects, for example what are usually called “gods” are created when we believe in them, they are “god forms” rather than whatever the reality of the gods actually is. If the gods are real as I believe in some way they are, (even if they are unified with everything else) then they are not fully understood by human minds and our representations of them are limited and distorted abstractions, often causing all kinds of problems and disagreements as the memes spread. Since the gods are divine they are beyond words (the same as your own consciousness) but in the same way that we construct a limited abstract ego to explain ourselves, we create limited abstractions about divinities and especially the divine oneness and these limited abstractions can essentially imprison us in ignorance when we mistake these superficial forms for the whole reality. A person may get to know the gods very personally through the practice of invocation and evocation, but you can know a person your whole life yet not fully understand them and this is even more true of gods and goddesses. At the very least our beliefs create the thought form for a similar kind of astral energy which is in resonance with that form, allowing it to manifest and so for all intents and purposes it is a god or goddess. The psychological aspect of these abstract entities we confuse for divinities does not mean such divinities cannot have “real” implications within the physical world, if the physical is an illusion then these illusionary deities can be as real as the physical. If they have collected enough energy and choose to do so they might even appear to us, this is of course what invocation and evocation is about, but it is also what happens when people have spontaneous visions. God forms are as we humans imagine them to be, the gods do not tell us how to define them since they are everything, nor do they force us to believe in them, they can only work with us according to the principles of consensus reality. So it is if we believe gods to be separate from us, to be tyrannical, to demand human sacrifice, to be the authors of dogmas and commandments then the manifestations of their god forms will corroborate this and because we imagine them to be hierarchical like us, they will rule us as archons.

Since an archon is essentially a thought form we created which we mistake for objective external reality, being one with the divine we create all perceptions and so for most people physical reality is itself an archon, which exists solely because we believe in it. (Maya, Samsara etc) Gods and goddesses are often imagined to be dictators, this may be due to literal interpretations of myths, or due to someone presenting themselves as a priestly authority making themselves a representative of an archon, but the reality is anything truly divine would not create a slave race just to worship it. Since we all manifest reality, if we imagine external gods who are dictators we will manifest them and these manifested forms will in a very real sense feed off our magickal energies and emotions to sustain themselves. All thought forms, from sigils to god forms are charged by will and emotion, the amount of energy or focus a person puts in to manifesting them, the stronger they get and so to feed and grow stronger, archons need people to believe in them. So the existence of archons is dependent on our ignorance of our own divinity and our unity with all things and so if we create them as having a kind of artificial intelligence, with magickal abilities and a tyrannical disposition, they will do what they can to make sure we remain ignorant and manifest a hierarchical reality that encourages belief in them. An archon then, is basically an egregore or artificial spirit helper which has gone rogue and tricks people in to worshipping it, which is one more reason to be very careful if you create your own familiar.

Making moonshine I realized we live like yeast in a fermenting container, perhaps a glass carboy with fermenting wine, living our lives trapped in a small world which is all we know, trapped by an invisible barrier keeping us from the rest of existence. We feed, reproduce and eventually die in our shit, most people living for beings they will never comprehend and a purpose they will never understand, all so that entities might become intoxicated from the distilled energy of our waste. This waste is our "spirits" which these entities feed off of, but as we are ignorant of it and we live in such a small world, they trick us in to creating more waste than we can live with and just as spirituality becomes religion, what was the product of our growth becomes our death. This world then is the cultivation of a troubled mind, fermenting anger like a poisonous wine, drinking the blood of our crucifixion, the rulers grow stronger off their addiction.

Though I do hold the possibility open that highly evolved spirits are working with humans, that certainly not all gods and goddesses are parasitic but that some are symbiotic or even altruistic, these spirits are ultimately one with us and not really separate, at the very least they have been imagined to have Anarchist intentions to us and so do not encourage ignorance. Not all thought forms are parasitic, only ones which are created or accepted unconsciously and which put themselves up in a hierarchy or otherwise encourage ignorance or hateful or fearful emotions. Those who make no effort to raise their self awareness are in many ways at the mercy of their unconscious, there are faculties of mind which you must recon with, whether or not you want to believe in them in a personified form. Archons infect a persons mind as a meme and through this kind of "possession" the people themselves become parasitic, finding a variety of ways to steal other peoples energies and limit their awareness for personal gain, creating hierarchies of parasites and predators. In their search for wealth, governments and organized religions are the enforcers of dogma, dogmas which become laws dissolving our freedoms, they show no loving kindness to those jovial souls who's philosophy teaches freedom, generosity or the growth of awareness, but instead create a morality based on institutions. Some powerful people even become subject to memetic parasites in the form of sycophants and yes men, people riding someones coat tails like little fishes on sharks.

Without a map of consciousness, without knowledge of what is in your mind, it is kind of like driving a car without knowing what the pedals, steering wheel, or dials do. Once you have mapped out your mind, your subconscious has a way of interacting with you, of presenting you with a way to take control of the reigns and stop trying to go by autopilot. All desires to ignore your subconscious, or to put off taking control of your mind strengthens the autopilot, in a sense putting you in the back seat and letting the archons decide where you go. Unnamed forces of the mind are unknown forces and so uncontrolled forces, which will by de facto control you if you do not tell them what to do and so simply being an atheist, or agnostic can potentially make you more of a slave to archons, then if you were a Christian or a strictly literalist polytheist. Once you name these unconscious forces, you can start to tell them what to do instead of them trying to make your mind function by default, or by the whims of your current environment and unconsciously created ego. Until you have thought about this for awhile you may not realize how pervasive they are, or how much they control you, but until then know that archons will stop existing when we stop believing in them and learn control of our minds. This includes learning to stop creating the realities that feed them with the emotional and magickal energies they need, but we can only do that by correcting the mistakes caused by ignorance of our true self.

When you really know you are one with divinity you will be able to create your own reality, you will be able to manifest freely, you will see all archons can only rule you if you let them and so with this gnosis, you will be able to create without being controlled by your creations. So long as humans do not will to take responsibility for their creative potential even the gods cannot force us, for they cannot interact with us in ways that are against our collective will, or at least we will not be conscious of such interactions. Since all humans and all gods, goddesses and archons are united in the source of all, it is foolish ignorance which keeps humans from realizing that we already have everything, if we would just share and work together. Instead we continue through our fear of lack and our acceptance of oppression to create the systems that create that very lack and oppression.

Everything a human does or creates, every effect we have in the material world starts out as an idea, unintended consequences arise but it is an idea that is the precursor to all our actions. Since each idea in the universe can be represented by a symbol, in a very real way everything that exists in physical reality could be understood as a symbol for the idea that preceded it. Each archetype and perception is in fact a symbol in the divine language, so through the study of holy semantics and the syntax of the universe, it can be observed and then manipulated. Once the name of something is learned it can be controlled by means of magick, this can work if you create your own name for it, but generally works better if the thing consents to identify as the name you use. All these symbols which include our own identities as we commonly understand them, are reality constructs, or thought forms, but an archon is an unconscious thought form, so by having a name for this concept, simply by knowing about the existence of archons, we start to regain our power from them. The more we pay attention to our distorted views and accept them as real, especially those mistakes which keep us out of oneness, the more “real” they become and so it is most important to pay homage to divine knowledge, not just some narrow dogmatic view as some religions would have you believe, but all of it as a whole.

As divine beings we create either consciously or unconsciously, the only way to stop creating is to still the mind, those forces which choose how an unconscious mind manifests reality are the archons and they will create a world to suit themselves more than you. Once we begin to open the door of our creative potential we can much more effectively cultivate and nourish our creative awareness. Everything imaginable is possible and many things beyond our current imagination, the only things who can say otherwise are the archons of fear, limitation and doubt. According to some forms of Hinduism we and all the gods and demons are all in a dream of the god Vishnu, all essentially characters of this one being's dream all made in his image, he thinks therefore we are. As everything is one, when we change ourselves enough in the right ways, we change the dream, we change the mind of the one and we change everything, though of course we shouldn't take this myth too literally.

When trying to properly observe things and attain information about for example religions, it is often crucial to have “lateral knowledge” or the proper frame of reference for your paradigm to properly recognize something. The world is filled with all kinds of hidden messages but only for people who know what to look for, who have “eyes to see” since the truth is these things are not hidden at all but in plain sight, it's just we had no reference to identify them with, so we didn't even notice. For example if someone had no concept of drama and theatre and they were to actually see a play they surely wouldn't understand the concept of an actor and would interpret their actions very differently if they knew what was going on, they may even attempt to join in the play trying to talk with the actors or something ridiculous like that. Likewise with life it is harder to understand the deeper meanings of art and general physical reality without certain prerequisite spiritual understandings.

Religious people today do not understand the meanings of the symbols and so they have fallen into the idol worship of a purely literal interpretation. This interpretation becomes a reflection of their egos which as archons bind them in ignorance and twist their good intentions, leading them down the garden path to personal (and real world) hell, creating the kingdom of fear, or black iron prison that pretty much all of us live in today. Earth from this view is a kind of insane asylum and the fundies are the most insane, the most in denial about their divinity, Gnostics are those locked in the cage either trying to escape or help others escape, but the problems of Earth are all caused by this ignorance and denial and the desire it creates to be led by rulers, by archons. There is a cult of ignorance which says that we should learn a religion but never try to understand what it could mean, that we should do as we are instructed by someone, or some book, that taking it literally is the only valid interpretation and to even attempt to fully understand it, or think allegorically is blasphemous. Instead of trying to use religion to improve themselves they use it to try and improve the world, but since faith is all that is needed to them, not knowledge, they will not know how to do this. They refuse to choose to be their own masters and so they unwittingly become someone else's, often someone who claims to take things literally too, but in reality often just knows the right memes to pull the puppet's strings. Only with true awareness of the experiences to which the symbols refer can we shed light on the matter, and to me this is gnosis of that which is referred to as the ten thousand things.

Whenever people think of universally applicable realities which they believe in, they change their consciousness to screen out other possibilities and generally demand that other people adhere to them calling it the "truth." "God" is the symbol for the totally universal reality that underlies all things, and in this singularity, the symbol became unified through monotheism which then became authoritarian deism, "god" then became forgotten as a reality and the symbol took on the position of "god" in the book. This focus on a symbol with unknown meaning is in direct contrast to the reality which is omnipresent and so responsible for effecting all things.

Symbols can be helpful for those seeking gnosis since when this "god" is everywhere we cannot normally know it, or communicate about it, for we have no outside juxtaposed context to differentiate the white noise. The symbols of various religions are the attempts to create symbolic references to understand that which is omnipresent and boundless, unlimited and total, but these symbols can only be understood in the context of direct experience, gnosis, mystical union or Shamanic ecstasy. The symbols give hints to the experience, or can even represent techniques that can be used to acquire the experience, but taken alone without mystical practices or entheogens, the reality behind the symbols remains illusive, though once mystical states can be achieved, the symbols can be used as tools to fulfil the mystics will. (magick) So the idea that we should argue or disagree as to the validity of other's choice of symbolism to represent this view of reality is really to forget the nature of that reality, the experience of the divine and meaning of the symbols themselves. People are attempting to understand through indirect language, and in this amnesia we enshroud ourselves in all manner of illusions and petty self contradictions to justify whatever we want. The ignorant do this all in the name of some vain idea of universal morality, or ontology, or whatever memetic skeleton we project on Chaos, which is itself the only understanding we have, for the context of the universal is found through understanding it has no fixed context as opposed to our own memetic references.

Again we see in a magickal sense, memes could be seen as existing in the astral as thought forms, the more energy we give to it the more real it becomes to us and the more we see it in our reality. How we define something helps to determine how real it is to us, or in some ways how it effects us. We often get so locked into one kind of definition that it becomes incredibly hard to see it from any other way, even when someone tries to explain another point of view to us. Archons could in part be seen as memetic feedback loops, that is patterns of cyclical growth within the mind that keep us trapped in "cognitive dissonance" as well as unpleasant story lines that we play out for ourselves over and over. For example a person holds the meme that social status based on wealth is important, so they pursue wealth, when this fails to make them happy in the long term they do not redefine their values but seek more wealth, which continues in a pattern until all their time is spent seeking wealth and social status. Archons would be the forces which keep us flowing to destructive memes and the cycles that perpetuate them and keep us seeking out and feeding these destructive patterns, keep us doing things which make us unhappy simply because they seem normal. (like the urge to form into hierarchies) History repeats even on an individual level and this is because we are trapped in cycles of the mind which play out subconsciously and often get worse over time, sometimes happening more and more often until we cannot ignore it anymore.

Archons are unconscious self replicating memetic structures on your paradigm, they create new growths of memes, or lower the defences of a person to become infected by certain memes, as well as highjacking a person in order to attack other people's memes. Archons in one sense are memes in which we perceive little to no symbolic meaning, or memes which create cycles of pathological behaviour, neurotic complex's, unwanted emotions, growing the aberrations of the mind to the point they take on a kind of life of their own. (what Jung simplified and called semi autonomous complexes of the collective unconscious) In their worst forms they present themselves as literal truth and the only truth demanding that their host must go on a crusade to infect others. In a sense all memes which are placed in to hierarchical values are archons, some are obviously more authoritarian than others and people might have preferences, but when these become seen as absolute universal values as opposed to other peoples memes, they become archons. Since you cannot have a hierarchy without rulers, the word itself comes from hieros (sacred) and archon, (ruler) so whatever is at the top of your value systems hierarchy is essentially sacred to you and literally your sacred ruler and so any rebellion is in essence heretical. (It also refers to the angelic hierarchy of the archon Yahweh)

Archons diffuse and distract the creative awareness and keep it locked up supporting memes, thought forms and behaviour that are not in accordance with a persons true will. This can be imagined like canals coming off of a river and into irrigation to grow crops which act as food for the archons who only seek to grow stronger. They do this by taking more water from the river, weakening it and perhaps even damming it and preventing it from flowing to the ocean where all rivers try to flow. As agriculture destroys the original nature, archons destroy our true nature by leading or tricking the "water" with illusionary desires, making it in some part forget its true will and become ignorant of its true being and where it was headed. So we must work to concentrate our energies away from being diverted by distractions and false pursuits so that all water flows to the ocean, the source of life and where we become as one with all.

Another way to think of archons is that they are like mirrors which have completely surrounded and entrapped the sparks of light (which is our true self) by causing us to see a distorted view of ourselves and through this they have created a false reality. Everything we perceive is like an extension of ourselves, we think we understand reality, but we are blind, or we only perceive ourselves, however it is not our true selves but a kind of fun house mirror image bent and twisted in any number of ways so that we mistake the reflections for external images. We must learn to look within and smash their mirrors, to see each others as divine instead of projecting our prejudices and with that rejoin the full light that has been cut off from us.

We want to know who we truly are, but most look to the outside world to tell them rather than looking within, so instead by arbitrarily and unconsciously defining the world, or accepting the definitions others give us, we spread and fracture our will into different complexes of energy, focusing on different shards of broken mirrors. When we define something, we are projecting internal meaning from within ourselves on to a limited perception or symbol, usually this is done unconsciously, this breaks the mirror up in to different pieces, which present different distorted portions of ourselves. We think by breaking them in to smaller pieces, having more complex definitions, through their reflection we might see reality and so ourselves better, but we only make it harder, we become dispersed in to various neurosis. We fixate on which ever mirror shards look best to us and reject whichever we don't like, holding back the integrity of the main will, (the image of the spark or secret fire) from acquiring coherent perception. Both the mirror pieces we love and hate are so long as we mistake them as external, are our own little personal demons, the archons.

By harnessing this wasted energy we can accumulate back all aspects of our mind to work harmoniously and so reflect back more consistent, and so relatively truer manifesting abilities. This is in some contexts what is called by Shamans “soul retrieval,” but it is in many ways very applicable to certain western Occult ideas of unifying the mind, allowing for a more holistic and concentrated energy force. By assigning a positive meaning of learning to painful emotions we take that pain and redirect, or transmute it into an energy source for future goals. Like rewiring a circuit, or looking at the mirrors from different angles, instead of emotional energy and metaphysical energy going to feed neurosis, or a cycle of pain manifestation, we can take that energy and affirm in our mind that each time this pain is felt, the energy from it will go towards whatever goal we feel is most applicable. Most of the time we feel it’s applicable to empower things we don't really want, but this is because we have empowered the idea that we do not have a choice and do not know ourselves well enough to know what is really worth wanting. The energy cannot be destroyed it only changes forms, so to start with, use all your energy, all experiences, especially the painful ones as an opportunity to learn who you really are and what you really want. One way to do this is to see pain as motivation towards another goal (like increased self awareness) rather than the goal of creating some victimization scenario that can be played out again and again and as a means of justifying certain unnecessary realities like self pity.

Archons work by trying to make us ignore things which cause us stress or pain, they want us to indulge in escapism and fantasies rather than becoming aware of the causes of our problems, which first requires acknowledging the reality of the situation and the pain it causes. Many New Agers go in to denial about pain and call this positive thinking, where as true positive thinking is knowing you have the strength to deal with and transmute the pain to achieve your long term will, that which they define as positive. Eventually, you can become so good at manifesting you know you can consider painful things without manifesting them further. (another benefit to associating intentions with manifesting through ritual) When you deal with your pain you are not focusing on it, you are focusing on changing the pain in to something useful and correcting the mistakes that lead to it, but in order to do that you must understand it completely and accept it is a reality. If you do not accept something as a reality while having zero resistance, you cannot manifest it changing because you are at least to some degree in denial that it even exists and how can you change something if it doesn't exist? Once you have no attachment to that pain, either existing or changing, then you can go on to manifesting something pleasurable. Painful things happen to people, I am not saying physical life will always be bliss, but this is a good step to help prevent yourself from falling into self sabotaging cycles. Pain can be seen as an opportunity to increase your awareness about reality, it can also be used to increase your ability to deal with pain. Once this energy becomes seen as useful, or “positive” even if it is truly painful it is nothing but another means of directing the will to another creation. This changes internal dialogue or tape loops in your head and allows you to think more clearly. When you think more clearly you can obviously focus more clearly and so it becomes easier to see where you need to transmute some things.

The more soul retrieval and cohesiveness acquired within the will and manifesting energies, the easier it will be to achieve your goals. Pain can be welcomed as a new opportunity to love some repressed aspect of reality and grow your heart and awareness that much more, not that you become masochist, or complacent with the status quo, but that you use all experiences to achieve your true will. Mining the unconscious regions of the mind for more material becomes almost like a game, the game of being a prospector who is gaining experience and becoming richer all the time. Tools can also be made from “iron” to dig around and look for more metals to transmute and put to practical use. The more metals that are acquired and transmuted to gold, the more material you can work with to fashion your personal sculpture with. This sculpture is the work of art that is your life and on it's head is a crown of life set with the ultimate gem of all time, a uniform philosophers stone, so that from this stone, the sculpture becomes totally mutable and is constantly being refined.

For stimulus to be perceived by the brain it must of already happened, there is always some delay from the event to it being registered by the brain, all physical existence is therefore a perception created from memory, a process of anamnesis. Since we need a symbol or words about something to clearly remember it in terms we can think about, in this sense everything that happens is just a symbolic representation of a past feeling. Maybe there are some images but even these are symbolic representations of light waves, so that we are able to perceive it more clearly. Precognition and intuition work by perceiving and understanding the feelings before they are symbolized in our linear constructs of time and logic. As our memetic paradigm largely shapes how we interpret and construct these physical symbols, it seems very likely that our personal unconscious demons or archons are manipulating us by controlling our memories of the recent past which is taking form in our physical symbolic language. By manipulating what and how much we remember, they manipulate our present awareness, our stream of anamnesis, which we call consciousness, which is being controlled by our memetic paradigm which more often than not is controlled by archons. Those values and beliefs which are at the top of the hierarchy screen out things which do not fit with their priorities and so control our consciousness in a very profound way. How often have two or more people experienced the same thing but would describe and interpret them completely differently?

As I mentioned in the last chapter science has shown that about half of what we perceive is not actually based on stimulus but what our brain expects based on past experiences remembered from its memory banks, so however you define an experience will be reflected in the memories and how your brain interprets new experiences. Those distorted or badly defined memories which perpetuate bias and error are very much what we could call archons and because the brain does all this unconsciously it effects us much more than we realize. So it is that the world may seem chaotic or confusing but is in fact highly ordered according to our own language, (which may be disordered without Occult vocabulary) those who work to understand and build upon the language of the mind will be much more functional than those who do not. Through ritual we can learn to take the reigns of this process and even in everyday life have a very magickal or intentional outcome on our own worlds. When we learn this language we can stop being controlled by undefined and unbalanced forces, while those who do not see the point in learning, or who think they are good enough without learning are usually those most in need. There will always be an aspect that is beyond language which it is possible to experience, but with the exception of entheogens (which can be horrifying) we must learn to take control of our minds before we can experience these things.

It has also been shown scientifically that your brain and so your subconscious is aware of what choice you will make in a decision before your conscious mind is aware of the final choice. Up to seven seconds before your conscious mind thinks of what you want to do, your brain knows what conclusion it will come to, so then it seems highly likely to me that it is in these seven seconds that archons effect us. If our decision making is done unconsciously then the brain must rely on memories and value systems, what it deems to be culturally appropriate according to the self constructed notions of identity in relation to the outside world, which are determined by the collection of memes which have been accepted as the ego.

As the brain creates much of our perception not from external stimulus but from assumptions made from our memories, it is clear that our decision making abilities are largely determined by assumptions which may or may not be true. These assumptions are strung together by the subconscious to create a streamline perception which fills in the gaps in awareness for things which are not picked up by the senses. These assumptions based on memories can in our modern world apart from nature be largely based on memes of which we have a particular bias for according to our values, these facts create a problem for free will and open up serious doubts about the validity of our ability to perceive the truth, at the very least an untrained minds ability to perceive correctly. It is in this subconscious process which very often is dependent on memes for cognition and decision making that archons can come in and manipulate our minds. Through creating a memetic context from which to view our memories, our brain will fill in the gaps which have no stimulus with bias information, with these faulty assumptions our subconscious decision making abilities are fed faulty information about the sensory world, which will then effect the outcome of our decisions.

By creating a bias archons can create a feedback loop of assumptions, which create decisions, which will substantiate further bias and delusions by providing actions and so stimulus which is more in line with the original bias assumptions. This feedback loop of memory, perception, action, memory etc is pretty well fractal in nature in that it is always self referencing, self similar, self affirming, circular logic. In this way the archons can more fully colonize our minds and brains, always creating an awareness which allows them to strengthen their position. In order to keep us from realizing what is going on they will seek to narrow our ability to perceive the truth and create a consciousness which suits them. The illusion of free will is maintained by the battles of various archons for supremacy, creating choices which seem to be weighed on both sides, according to how much emotional value we put into our memetic values in any given situation, as well as our ability to predict potential outcomes. This is not to say these archons are necessarily conscious beings in the normal sense, but kinds of memes which have evolved to do this automatically. Though its hard to really say what constitutes "life," even the Gnostics said they are not really alive and have no soul or spark and so are much more like robots with artificial intelligence. So to be clear, by altering our perceptions through are brain's lack of stimulus, our decision making ability is changed, even before our consciousness is aware of what is going on, archons choose actions that will reinforce their power over us by creating further stimulus, through the experience of the actions they choose for us, these become our memories which are used by our brain to fill in the gaps for future perceptions.

When we die I believe our mind leaves the body and this physical existence and enters another reality according to what the mind believes in, whether it be the Christian heaven, hell, reincarnation, or for atheists a kind of nothingness, or any number of other Pagan and Hindu places, we go where we desire to go and where we believe we will go. If we imagine the divine alone in emptiness forever and physical reality as its escapism from that reality, it is trying to find eternal contentment, it is trying to find its own paradise or heaven, but so long as those heavens are based on ignorance of its divinity, they can never be perfect and it can never be truly content forever. If the divine fears it's divinity, which it equates with eternal loneliness, then it creates a world where it is free of that fear through ignorance and this is essentially what physical reality is.

Being immortal and divine we will always exist in some way and so any limited conception of heaven will eventually get boring and this is because they will eventually cease to provide us with opportunities to grow our awareness. After a certain amount of time, when the desire for change occurs I do believe that atheists and others will eventually be given the opportunity to reincarnate and so enter time and space, which is a prerequisite for changing their beliefs so that they may become more conscious of the spiritual realities. The same could also be said for people such as Christians who after a certain period of time will come to realize heaven just isn't paradise unless they become a better person, while someone in hell would realize they can become better and not deserve to be in hell. Though I find it very hard to believe anyone spends much time in a fire and brimstone place being tortured for very long, if at all. If they truly feel they deserve punishment they will probably find it in their next incarnation, at any rate all people judge themselves, it's just that when you are no longer blinded by the ego, you can be a harsher judge than anyone.

Those heavens for people who have not realized the big picture are the result of the archons astral temples which are continually created by people with limited understanding of what heaven could really be, not to mention the implications of immortality and the union with all that is divine. These places can be pleasant or unpleasant according to what you imagine, but you should be very careful about your attitude towards the afterlife and think "truth," not heaven. In fact I do not really see any difference between consensus reality and "heaven," if heaven is paradise then it is unique to each person, it is their creation, how we define it in a group language is a matter of consensus. Most people simply do not know their true will, or what kind of heaven is worth manifesting and so will themselves to experience a reality where they can figure that out, which is the function of Earth, it is the training room where souls learn how to be in paradise for eternity. The divine in us wanted to be ignorant of its divinity and so as part of this, it chose to manifest seemingly external divinities which have in many cases become those illusions which provide us with unpleasant realities and which are the archons, the realities and things we create (personified ignorance) because we do not know what the truth is, who or what we are, or what we truly want. This is called the wheel of reincarnation, which is spun by the archons, it is where the soul cycles through physical existence, where it is capable of learning to overcome its archons. On this wheel we experience the highs and lows of life just like poor Helen and her smack addiction, all the while our fortune's change like the seasons to allow the divine to maintain distraction from non local eternity in whichever astral temple or form of heaven it has created. So, only by finding contentment here and now on Earth can we ever hope to find contentment and gnosis of our true will in the metaphysical realms, something which can only really be possible if we strive for Anarchy.

How we fell into this illusion is hard to say for sure, it is tempting to say that "God/ess" was lonely in a void and so created the physical universe and the illusion of separation in all of us. While I do see this reality much like a school, I as an individual do not claim to know everything, especially the motivations of the divine, some how I think it is beyond feeling lonely and that it may be just a side effect of self awareness, the division of unity being the mirror through which we see ourselves. How and why the divine is both one and many is perhaps the greatest mystery in existence, maybe the divine doesn't even know and time is the process of it figuring itself out. Perhaps we are the inevitability of endless congealing Chaos or plasma, the prima materia, condensed energy formed from some natural law of entropy, but through the fires of wilful intention we return to a level that all things come from and are unified within. One condition of omniscience is that the divine must know what it is like to be ignorant and so here we are, but it will also know what it is like to overcome that ignorance. To rejoin the universal union we must make our outer lives like our inner mind, we must keep it real, punk rock, in order to fit into the universal fractal, we must make our own consciousness self similar, getting rid of cognitive dissonance and hypocrisy, the self serving ego that tells white lies and tries to manipulate others. We must live what we truly believe, and act our true wills in order to align ourselves with the true purpose of the universe, the unfolding of universal self awareness.

There are many creation myths (including the big bang) which agree with my mystical beliefs as I believe very much that there is an underlying unifying truth in all religions, but one of my favourite myths that I know, which perhaps best articulates my ideas is the Gnostic creation story. I believe that the illusion of separation is sustained by the archons who were accidentally created by the Goddess Sophia, that they have managed to trick us into fear and surrendering our powers and status and so sustain them. They are the personifications of all our false beliefs and the selfish emotions they create. While there are elements to some schools of Gnosticism which I do not ascribe to, it is to me among the most psychedelic and rational religions, with some of the most detailed maps. I didn't so much learn about it and have faith in it, I learned about it and found in many ways it explained my own previous mystical experiences better than anything.

The more aware I become, the more it does seem like we are separated in this illusion because we are too terrified and more importantly too ignorant to leave it, whether physicality is a "spectacle," a school, a prison, or a ruined paradise, in the end these are all just metaphorical models, in the end the goal is always the same, grow your awareness. Still, exactly what motivations the divine had for indirectly coming to this state of existence are beyond me at this time, or if I knew I probably shouldn't say. I suppose really its because the divine is just as incompetent and ignorant as the sum total of all of us, but then maybe the divine wants a challenge, wants to be a hero? Finding yourself in a vacuum, omnipotent and omniscient does not mean you have the strength of character to use that power correctly, or that the creation of time isn't necessary to develop it. Many would be horrified to think of the divine as a child, but as it is us, we all obviously have a lot to learn and this comes from the endless unfolding of existence enacted by all of us, which at least the divine is experiencing as if it were ignorant. According to the Egyptians we are the tears of the divine child Nefertum, this indicates our unity with him and we might say we are being raised by his parents Nuit and Nun and that we are suckling the nourishment of a young god which is time, so that we may grow in to Ra, our fully aware self. I do think its all just part of the journey, the great transmigration of the soul, the thing is the road is endless. At any rate if I knew the reasons for everything I probably shouldn't tell anyone.

As “archon” literally means “ruler” in Greek, when I say archons rule the world this is obviously true, but on a deeper level I do believe probably all political and institutional religious leaders are in a very real sense possessed by metaphysical psychological entities which feed on peoples belief in them and the emotional responses created by that belief. Any person who wishes to control others is possessed by archons, since hierarchy is a product of ignorance and all ignorant acts are the result of archons, you have to be an Anarchist before you can even begin to free yourself from “possession.” Anarchy as I pointed out before comes from the word “anarkhos” or an-arkhos meaning “without rulers,” without archons, so the Gnostic goal of freeing yourself from archons of ignorance is literally to become a fully aware Anarchist. The more authoritarian you are, the more you deny your oneness with other people, the more you encourage a reality which creates ignorance in those you rule and so you cannot be a ruler, without being possessed by archons, at least in a psychological sense.

One way the rulers work is to make you, or anyone afraid, they try to frighten you in to submission with the promise of your self preservation and the avoidance of conflict through appeasement. If you agree and say, get a job supporting the capitalist system, you decide to help them in their endeavours, in so doing you help them to scare other people, if you become useful enough to them you may even directly scare people, but as you become more useful to them you move up in the hierarchy and see the nature of hierarchy more directly. With this greater awareness of experiencing hierarchy the stakes are higher and you become more afraid, more willing to appease your superiors, more capable of abandoning your own will and scaring others through any number of abusive behaviours, since the greater your authority, the greater your need to keep subordinates in line. This creates a cycle of fear, appeasement, “success” in the hierarchy, followed by more fear of the nature of hierarchy and the greater the fear, the more desperate you will be to appease your masters by making others afraid, there by propagating the memes of your rulers. The obvious solution is to face your fears of being at the bottom of the hierarchy and stop appeasing the rulers, but few do this and for most people we can see in their level of income or their capitalist ambitions, how deeply they are in the grip of archon fear. (competition being an act based in fear of cooperation and miserly behaviour being a fear of scarcity)

When we look in to conspiracy theories of black magicians ruling the world, the idea that “demons” are helping them from this perspective starts to make a lot more sense. Some of the most funny being that reptilian aliens are controlling the planet and shape shifting in to politicians, they are sometimes associated with the Sumerian gods the Anunnaki. Now while this idea is rather over the top and I do not claim to know the details of a secret religion of black magick for autocrats, (since the details would obviously only be known to its initiates) there are definitely more than a few signs of Occultist politicians. Those who think all such theories are ridiculous should look in to the initiation ceremonies of certain secret societies and fraternities like skull and bones, Bohemian Grove, the Freemasons, the Catholic Church and congress. For starters it is undeniable that Masons have played a huge role in American politics, both in its founding and much of the history since and so given how corrupt the American government has been since its inception, it has been taken as evidence of Masonic corruption. The members of Skull and Bones, a Yale fraternity have also had inordinate success politically, they worship the Greek goddess Eulogia, who's name literally means “good speaking.” In this context obviously she is a goddess of rhetoric, propaganda, social engineering for politicians, but since many of their members are actually lawyers, we might say she is a goddess for finding legal interpretations and winning debates. Eulogia would presumably help her followers to win court trials and generally use language to get elected to public offices and create prestige and gravitas for themselves. (Politics is the art of saying nothing) Masons and other such groups like the government must come of free will and not be recruited so that they will willingly accept the cult spirits into themselves, they must consent to that reality, so for example the president can be initiated or inaugurated. Now when I say that a presidential inauguration is an Occult ritual there are many who would scoff at such a notion, but the word "inaugurate" is actually etymologically derived from "auger" referring to the augers or soothsayers in the theocracy of ancient Rome. An inauguration is quite literally a consecration ceremony for Roman politicians, which traditionally was done when the "auguries" or omens showed it was auspicious.

Once you begin to recognize the Occult symbolism hidden everywhere in our culture it is pretty hard to deny Occultists don't occupy important positions in supposedly Christian countries, but then once you are symbol literate it is plain to see Christianity isn't what it appears either. Once you realize this it is pretty unthinkable that such Occultists wouldn't be using and most likely be controlled by metaphysical entities, as I said, anyone using magick (which includes mundane physical actions) to control others, is by definition a black magician and is infected by archons. Since most politicians are too stupid to have any in depth Occult knowledge just how ritualistic they are and how consciously they incorporate metaphysics is open to debate, it is quite likely they are so possessed that like most people they act without even knowing what they are really doing. They may be carrying on old traditions, but have likely lost the meaning of those traditions outside the most basic understanding, after all if archons create ignorance and politicians are possessed by them, they are very ignorant of their actions. In the end its pretty irrelevant, due to the psychological and unified nature of reality a "demon" or archon is no different from ones own personal symbolic mental demons and who can doubt that politicians and capitalist plutocrats have an awful lot of personal demons. (Which given their prevalence in certain religions may even often take the astral form of reptilians.)

At first glance Gnosticism paints a pretty depressing picture of reality, trapped in illusion by parasites of our own ignorance, doomed to reincarnate in to a world of pain and oppression it is clearly not a religion for those looking for comfort for their fear of death. It could no doubt be terrifying for a young soul, or even a young god or goddess to be in a situation of uncontrolled manifestation where even the slightest thought instantly becomes a reality. (one more reason why learning concentration is so important) From these fears and desires for contentment, out of the Chaos the archons took form to create order and limit our creative abilities, or channel it into themselves, until the divine takes responsibility for its own awareness and abilities and overthrows its rulers. In a sense the archons are the fears themselves, based in the ignorance of the divine in what it is, or how to best use and control its power, or how to be content being itself and apparently alone. The world was formed according to their order but stems from us, the divine sparks who found it more comforting to play a game of make believe that we have bodies and a physical world to live in.

This physical world then according to the Gnostics is the result of this sort of ignorance, though there are a variety of explanations and interpretations, our imprisonment in physicality is said to be the result a mad and evil, or at least ignorant false god given the title of "demiurge," which could be likened to the ego of the individual, or as the ego of the all. The demiurge is the king of the archons, the ruler of the world, the false god of the blind, the literalist who in their wilful ignorance sees divinity as something separate from themselves, or worse sees their individual self as divine, but nothing else. So long as we will ourselves into the mainstream consensus dream, we will create that limited ignorant reality and our personified beliefs that are part of us and yet created to be separate from us, will organize the Chaos of our infinite potential according to our wills or our prayers, or the astral forms we make which are usually based in subconscious vanity. (Ordo ab Chao or Chaoskampf)

For most of the world's prehistory most of the gods seem to have been in many cases relatively benign or even helpful, allowing a belief system to make magick happen without necessarily having to take on all the responsibilities of godhead ourselves. Then came the archon El, or Yahweh who was an archon that became strong and smart enough to realize it could become stronger by eliminating the competition. Yahweh is a pool of energy fed by belief and bent on acquiring more energy by vampyrizing more and more people, demanding sacrifice of goats and Canaanites (Today called Palestinians) and all the rest who want to choose their own gods. Feeding off human beliefs this god rules through fear and intimidation, those who resist are said to be smitten, he is a god form largely imagined to be tyrannical and jealous, who created people to be "god fearing" and so through him a reality of fear manifests. Reading the old testament it is pretty clear their god is among the most psychopathic gods ever abstracted and since he is supposedly the only god we should worship, Jews would not assimilate fully to the Roman empire. This caused all kinds of problems for the emperors and various rebellions would spring up, some in the name of someone claiming to be the messiah of the Jews, but even in times of peace Jewish memes were abnormally resilient to foreign assimilation.

While some Pagans clearly made their gods in to archons, there was undoubtedly much more magickal practices, mysticism and religious tolerance, there were theocracies of the state, the religion of the "rulers" but these were often separated from the daily religions of the people, which focused on spirituality rather than matters of state. For example the Olympian gods of Rome weren't really forced on anyone, even if the emperor honoured them, there were also no authoritative religious texts or dogmas in the sense of a Pagan "bible." Theocratic religions were pretty much the only religions which demanded conversion and religious law in an authoritarian manner and in Pagan communities and outside of the politicians themselves, these were generally relatively secular in how they operated, resembling modern government bureaucracies with elaborate rituals rather than ontological and philosophical systems for the masses. The state religion required people show loyalty to the state and provide a basic offering to the emperor, but generally it was not actually spiritually meaningful to the lower classes, (since people realized the government was corrupt) only the theocrats themselves would worship in this religion of power as they would not want the commoners themselves to have power.

Even the religion of Abraham which did operate as theocracy over the Jews did not have much of a sense of orthodoxy until relatively recently, some time after the Babylonian captivity. Although there is no firm scholarly consensus as to the exact dating, the writing of the Torah probably took place over many years, with obviously different authors and sources, but Judaism was originally a polytheistic religion that eventually devolved to monaltry. (monaltry is accepting the existence of other gods but worshipping one) Sometimes the Jews would go back to polytheism as with Asherah, a Mesopotamian goddess which archeological show was thought of by Jews as the wife of Yahweh. The old testament itself speaks of Asherah as competition for the god, not to mention Baal or the golden calf, but after being enslaved in Babylon the theocracy brought the hammer down and enforced monotheism, codifying the religion in scripture. It was at this time most of the old testament would of been written, or the final draft of compilations been chosen and the institution of the strict religious laws which make up so much of the Torah. To a large degree it was at this time the history of the Jews was fabricated through the writings and this was done in order to enforce theocratic rule. It is quite possible at this time that characters such as Abraham and Moses were created or at least changed to create the illusion of an older centralized authority, this would be done in order to create theocratic dogma and misconceptions about how monotheistic and unified as a people the Jews really were historically. While it is relatively unknown to modern ears so used to religious propaganda that the various sects of Judaism had such a variety of forms and beliefs, the old testament itself makes numerous references to the politics of the theocracy imposing rule in the name of their tyrant god and the constant need to stamp out heresy.

Monotheism as we understand it today had no place in religion since it was the negation of all other abstractions about the divine. It was an idea that seems to of first appeared (outside the sense mystical universal oneness) through the Egyptian Pharaoh Akhenaten who may very well of provided some inspiration to the religion of “Moses” through his god the “Aten” sun disk. While it is hard to sort out the myth from the history, the most likely scenario according to a few scholars is that if he actually existed at all, Moses was probably Thutmose III or Thut-Moses, with the Jews being known as the Hyksos people. These ideas were espoused by Freud and while he didn't make a very convincing case to scholars, the basic idea has since been taken up by some modern scholars and archaeologists who do make a much better case and flesh it out. Using the Egyptian historian Manetho as a source, the Jewish historian Josephus does say the Hyksos were Jews and while there are different variations of this theory, it is the only credible historical explanation for Exodus that I have found. Some think Moses or his family were other Hyksos people around this time, but basically we can see that the Hyksos/”Jews” were not actually slaves, but mercenaries and craftsmen that actually took over parts of Egypt and were eventually rebelled against and expelled. (Much of it is beyond this book but I strongly suggest further research, I should also add that while there is no evidence of Hebrew slaves, Akhenaten did enslave Egyptian people to make his city out in the desert.) There is no evidence of Hebrew slaves in Egypt but the Hyksos were definitely there, with Thutmose conquering the area of Canaan as the Jews were said to have done. As the king of Egypt and the Hyksos, Thutmose gave the Jews the land which was called Israel in the earliest written example the word known. While the Hyksos were kicked out of Egypt earlier than this, they could have infiltrated again during the reign of Hatshepsut and while sexism alone is usually blamed, it would explain the very suspicious reasons of why all the history of her reign was wiped out. The idea of monotheism proper in the modern sense seems to be the result of a long process of literalization and formalization of some sects of Judaism through the state theocracy of “Moses” to the theocracy that existed in the time of “Jesus,” who were attempting to prevent the assimilation of their flocks to the Romans. From Egypt to Babylon, Judaism had to become more clearly defined and authoritarian in order to keep itself from being overwhelmed by foreign memes and to give power to a centralized government, indeed even still it was very highly influenced by these cultures, culminating in the Roman empire with the Hellenizing of Judaism leading to the creation of Christianity.

In many ways it takes monotheism for the power of archons, or literalized symbols to have the most horrifying impact, once you think you have a symbol for all that is “good” then everything else becomes “bad.” Monotheism outside the mystical context is really the result of archon memes of state religions, they compete to create the most dogmatic and authoritarian religions possible, so as to retain control of the people or promote conversions. This can only go so far with polytheism and the unorganized mystical and Shamanic religions so prevalent in the world before Christianity and so a symbol was needed to unify the empire and that symbol would be Jesus.

Through comparative religious studies it is clear Christianity is the attempt to bring in as many varieties of religious memes as possible so as to create “the one true religion.” This was done before hand in a non dogmatic and authoritarian way through Gnosticism and Hermeticism for their own comparative religious studies, but would later be co-opted by literalists and politicians like Constantine and the Flavian emperors, who saw it's potential for the state to control everyone. My research indicates that the intolerant Jewish religion was so successful at resisting assimilation and creating zealot rebels that the Romans decided to learn from them and create a new theocratic religion which could inspire the same militaristic fervour and at the same time try to bring the Jews on board. So long as Pagan polytheism and its notions of humanism and individual interpretation existed, the state religion and its archons would have to share power, all forms of mysticism which could provide gnosis and avoid the middle men in the clergy had to be eliminated. All memes which pointed to the divinity of humanity and nature had to be stamped out so that people would be dependent on authorities for salvation from a hell the authorities themselves would create. For example, the three magi or wise men from the east in the myth of the nativity of Jesus are Zoroastrian, but much more than this memes were taken from Mithraism, Egyptian and Greek religion, there is even evidence Druidism contributed to the creation of Christianity, not to mention a variety of dualist philosophies coming from the middle east.

Thankfully these days due to increasingly secular scholarship, the Pagan and otherwise non Abrahamic influences of Christianity are well documented, though a lot of work remains and the theocrats destroyed most of the evidence, you do not have to take my word for it, look it up yourself. The word deity itself actually comes from the Latin "deus," which itself comes from the name Zeus and so it was not uncommon for Catholic priests speaking Latin to in the etymological sense address the god Zeus! The word Jupiter itself comes from deus pater, meaning "god the father" and also "heavenly father" which are common terms for the Christian God. Greek Jews like Philo had long been influenced by the philosophers of other cultures and began interpreting their religion in these terms creating the potential for Jewish assimilation by Europe and Roman acceptance of Jewish religion.

Rome had nothing against the teachings of Christianity itself, or Judaism, so long as the followers of these religions payed homage to the emperor, which due to their own theocratic ambitions was in many ways forbidden by the Abrahamic traditions. Christians were never persecuted because they believed something different, the Roman empire was for most of its history quite religiously tolerant, but all of those who were persecuted suffered because they would not take part in the state religion of showing allegiance to the empire, for Christians they refused to see the emperor as being a god on Earth. It is not that "Pagans" persecuted Christians, it wasn't Druids, Greeks, Witches, Egyptians or Norse or anything like that, it was the Roman government and they were oppressing everyone who refused their orders. (Such as the Druids) Theocracies had existed in polytheistic cultures, but remained tolerant of variety, where as in a monotheistic religion there is no room for any other kind of spirituality. Judaism cannot be given all the blame for the spread of monotheism, since it was the Roman government who weaponized the memes of Christianity, but Judaism did provide the most useful symbolism for a tyrannical theocracy. Once it gained power Christianity would go on to conduct the greatest religious persecutions of history, slaughtering untold numbers of Pagans and heretics simply for what they believed, having the wrong thoughts was now a crime punishable by death. The new religion of Christianity would demote the Emperor from being a god, to being gods representative by appointing him the pope, who in turn would perform coronation ceremonies for Catholic kings as through the "divine right of kings." Christianity would also allow him to justify totalitarian control of religions in general, organizing all the archon energy in to one reservoir of theocratic manifestation. The Christian hierarchy of angels shows clearly that the choir of angels called "dominions" are controlling each country as an archon, along with "powers," "principalities" and probably "thrones," the angels of Yahweh are said to be responsible for our governments and so given our history, we might ask what kind of blood thirsty "god" or entities influence us in these ways?

Thus this concept of there only being one true god would be totally appropriated by the Roman and Christian establishment, along with all the most useful memes for a theocracy, in order to create a new state religion which would attempt to bring Judaism and all the various religions to a consensus. (all the while denying the divinity of humanity and the mystical essence of these religions) Constantine would use this to try and keep his empire from crumbling, making Christianity the state religion so that anyone different could be demonized and brutalized, anyone outside of it being "evil" and Satanic. While literalist Christianity predates Constantine and goes back to the Flavian dynasty, (More on them later) the archons now had the status of a state religion and with it a new ontological precedence, manifesting a reality where anyone who believed something different (such as that they were themselves divine) could be murdered and conquered in the name of justice and truth.

The Yahweh meme now forcing itself on the Roman empire would gradually mutate through the centuries with the help of human rulers right in to the middle ages, eventually creating the idea of punishment in eternal damnation, or "hell", so as to frighten any who questioned the rulers in to submission. Astrology would eventually be banned as well, an act which would hide the astrotheological context of Christianity and also help to prevent anyone from understanding the astrological influence of the archons. This fear of damnation would feed the archons with energy, but could also be used as a motivation for converting and conquering new people, turning them in to human cattle, or sheep to be led by shepherds. What better way for an archon to live forever than making its followers believe they will spend eternity in pain if they follow any other “god” or do not believe in him alone? The Jewish religion does not believe in hell, but through the rulers of Europe new memes of control were devised which could be attached to Yahweh to improve his ability to control the masses. Christians often act guilt ridden or thankful because of the “sacrifice” made by Jesus, his death was supposed to free us from the effects of “original sin,” even though Jews never interpreted their own texts in any way like this. The original sin for Jews is the explanation for why the Earth is not in paradise, they have no concept of needing to be saved from anything in particular, other than perhaps their own “sinful” behaviour. So then given there was no hell for Jews or non believers, Jesus wasn't saving anyone from anything, in fact if Christianity is real then through his death humanity is in a much much worse situation, so that now most of humanity would be doomed to eternal damnation in hellfire.

While Christianity did not hold the empire together militarily it did succeed in perpetuating many Roman memes. These memes filled many a tyrants head with dreams of conquering all of Europe and would eventually trigger both the crusades and colonialism in the name of the cross. Thus the Yahweh meme continued to evolve in to ever more tyrannical and totalitarian forms of consensus reality, burning the competition alive and taking over Pagan holy sites and traditions until today Christianity has become the most popular religion on the planet. Only through the renaissance that came through the reintroduction of Alchemy via the Muslims of the crusade era would the Yahweh meme start to be challenged openly, however a puritanical strain of the archon disease would be cultivated to new levels in America, where it has bred to its current virulence as the evangelical movement and the new world order of the American empire.

The Christian faith is itself the product of archons, not just in the sense of their god Yahweh but it, like most religions is as a spell for the ignorant, and while through Gnosticism and Cabala it could be interpreted in mystical terms, most of the original literature detailing this was destroyed by the church. By believing we will go to the heaven of the Christians when we die, we do go there so long as we believe we are good enough to, but we lose out on taking responsibility for being the one divine force, limiting ourselves, not to mention living in fear of “hell” or “Satan” and anyone else the church tells us. The Christians also worship Christ as god, which he is, they just don't realize so is everything and everyone else and so are blinded from all other forms of divinity, including the divine in them. While Kabbalah can be used to find profound meaning in Judaism, Yahweh is generally the god of fundamentalists in the Abrahamic religions, who have no understanding of anything but the literal and physical and he is often referred to by Gnostics as the demiurge or head archon.

This “demiurge” concept shows a startlingly different view of the Judeo-Christian god from what people commonly understand him as today and it was a view that was relatively widespread through the Gnostic schools. Yahweh was directly identified in many traditions as the demiurge, though there were no doubt a variety of views about this. Many Gnostics clearly believed in Yahweh, they just thought he was insane, vain, stupid and a tyrannical false god who blinds us in ignorance in order to imprison all the sparks of divinity in matter for all eternity. While this belief predates Constantine, it does seem to anticipate the Yahweh meme spreading across the planet and ensnaring people in to a new level of spiritual ignorance.

This should not be confused with racism, since some Gnostics were racially Jewish it was clearly intended in terms of anti Judaism, rather than antisemitism. (Gnostics would say Christians and Muslims worship the demiurge as well) In fact some scholars believe Gnosticism was largely founded by Jews rebelling against the theocracy and so against Rome as well, since it was the puppet master behind the theocratic Jewish throne. Ethnic Jews were originally nomadic and tribal and so were potentially much more inclined to Anarchist ways of life, a way of life that was a threat to the centralized authority of the temple. This confusion that many people have between antisemitism and anti Judaism is actually due to one of the main reasons I hate Judaism, that is it is a racist religion, it proposes the idea of a master race of “chosen people” of “god” and that everyone else is blind to the truth. Racism is a fundamental aspect to Judaism and is found throughout their scriptures and so according to many Zionists, anyone who criticizes Judaism or Israel for any reason is a racist. The “god” of the old testament has not only given permission for the Jews to enslave other peoples, but sometimes he even demands they do so. Judaism also encourages sexism, homophobia, authoritarianism and intolerance in general and that's not even getting in to the sick horrors contained in the Talmud. (There is far too much to go in to here, but the Talmud is among the blackest grimoires ever created, full of racist hypocrisy and religious intolerance regarding gentiles, it also says it is permissible to marry three year old girls!) All humans are divine sparks according to Gnostics, bodies are part of the illusion and so racism is clearly the result of archons.

Life in physicality alone and the charging of the authoritarian 3D Reality construct is a false value interpretation of information, sensory or otherwise, wilfully creating a reality based on ignorance and which screens out lots of information and distorts perception, thus making us unable to function in a healthy manner. This literal materialist world, (especially when mixed with literalist interpretations of religions) which is no longer even scientific, was according to the Gnostics created by the demiurge (our egos) and is in a convoluted sense like a long “satanic” ritual, each materialist thought a spell entrapping us in a prison we do not even recognize.

This view of physicality being a prison has often been interpreted as dualism, but I believe in many cases this is the result of the interpreter themselves being a dualist and almost always the scholar has never had a mystical experience and is relying only on logic and the intellect and so is not fully able to comprehend monism or mysticism in general. (They use logic alone to interpret texts which speak of the need to transcend linguistic awareness and so it is no wonder they misunderstand.) No doubt there was a variety of ideas about this, but physicality must be part of the Pleroma, part of the All, or else it would not be all there is, at the very least the Gnostics are quite clear, all portions of matter have the Goddess or world soul Sophia within it and so the essence which is the basis of all matter is not to be hated. Sophia is the cause of matter, not the archons and she is not an evil being, though it may have been a mistake this is hardly evil. No it is not matter that is evil it is the rulers who organize it, the authorities who make their own images in vain and seek to control spirit and use matter as a tool to imprison it in an institutionalized prison of artifices. Those who only have ambitions to pursue materialist consumerism and otherwise choose to ignore the need to grow their awareness, or to seek out the spirit worlds are blinded by their ignorance and so become prone to authoritarian behaviour, thus they seek out positions of power and turn this world in to a prison. (While many Anarchists are atheists and not authoritarian about it, this is because they have worked hard at developing their self awareness, other atheist Anarchists still have authoritarian tendencies and so still have some work to do.)

The question of whether or not we should transcend physicality is in many ways itself an ignorant question, once you know how to leave physical reality, once you really have gnosis you could come and go as you like. (such as through meditation, astral projection and through entheogens) Matter itself is not evil, but if you are stuck in it and deprived of happiness due to materialism, it is because of a limited interpretation of reality and to me if people can come to live in harmony with nature, there is no reason to permanently “transcend.” The Gnostics believed conceptions of “good” and “evil” were human opinions and so would not have made matter “evil” in the sense we normally understand it, though if you are ignorant of what lies beyond or how to get there, your life is bound to have problems. (Valentinians were definitely not dualist) Matter may be something to ultimately be transcended, but Sophia has been scattered everywhere in matter and so it is not totally corrupt, just an illusion which hides the truth. Even the Prophet Mani who founded the “Manichean” religion (a term today that is synonymous with dualism) was very much a lover of nature and was influenced by Buddhism and used the gospel of Thomas which speaks of transcending duality and uniting various opposites. Just as Buddhist texts read out of context and as a dead religion might to a superficial mind be called dualist, it is the same for many Gnostic traditions, but I would argue what they are saying is that an ignorant mind views things in dualist ways, but enlightenment is the realization of monism or non dualism as in the Pleroma. Given that Hermetic texts have also been found in the Gnostic Nag Hammadi library they were clearly open to different interpretations about the subject and were not antagonistic to a monist viewpoint. So then in my view, Gnosticism is the story of how the oneness fell in to duality, then returns to being the oneness and this is the basis of gnosis.

All life was sacred to Gnostics, so organic life in the forests and oceans would definitely be seen as divine, even if cities and the riches of men was seen as evil. As Epiphanius says of Gnostic beliefs, “the same soul is scattered about in animals, beasts, fish, snakes, humans, trees, and products of nature” and we reincarnate into different life forms as part of the transmigration of the soul, hence like the Pythagoreans some had a proclivity for vegetarianism. However the Manichaeans “believe that the herbs and the trees are alive and the life that is in them is endowed with sensibility and able to suffer when hurt. This is why no one can sever or pluck anything without inflicting suffering upon it.” (Science now shows this) The Manichaeans also believed humanity wasn't all its cracked up to be and that reincarnating as some kinds of plants was preferable to being human, that a soul could transcend if it was in a plant that was eaten by a saint. (seems suspiciously reminiscent of entheogens to me, yet it was explicitly more than these plants alone.) Other less ascetic forms of Gnosticism held similar views about animals, that they all have souls and so were worthy of respect and humane treatment, but that eating them helped the animal's soul along in it's transmigration to oneness and gnosis.

The real prison is to me the fear of leaving physical reality and the culture we create in order to justify our ignorance. Once you have gnosis you will know how to leave and enter physical reality at will and so long as we are developing our awareness and can visit the spirit world using entheogens, trying to get to some heaven after we die becomes much less urgent, we can live and be reasonably happy in both worlds and be content simply overcoming our ignorance and exist wherever our true will and gnosis leads us. The goal of the Gnostic is like a Bodhisattva in that they are trying to rescue the sparks of divinity from their imprisonment and since there are so many beings human and otherwise suffering at the hands of the archons, until all are free no one is free, at which point we will all have gnosis and be capable of being physical in a world that is not a prison. Anarkhos. (Some argue the Bodhisattva tradition was the result of Greek influence, while Cynicism possibly influenced Zen.)

While terrifying in many ways Gnosticism is also exhilarating, if we can face our fears and demons we can do anything, if we can get in to the reality where people believe Anarchism works, then it will work. Buddha teaches us that the cause of suffering is attachment to our desires, archons feed off our desires to be ignorant and we are only attached to desires because we are ignorant of what we are, the rulers of this world spread consumerism and unhealthy desires and fears to justify their existence and so gnosis, Anarchy and nirvana are in many ways all aspects of the same thing. Our desire and greed has pit us against each other competing for wealth, it has created “demon” rulers for us that make a world where oppression is justified and hierarchy and corruption glorified. Most people do not want to take responsibility for archons, they are attached to ignorant lifestyles but this desire to put the responsibility on others has created the very hierarchies, organizations and archons that further perpetuate the reality that traps us and makes us unhappy, creating exponential manifestations of ignorance. Archons are our creations so in this way they cannot go against our will, they can only encourage unhealthy and ignorant actions, rulers are only ever empowered by other people's consent, because we collectively created them to do things which we will not take responsibility for. People do not consent to Anarchy because they are too ignorant to believe it is possible, all people are potentially capable of being Anarchist, but are filled with petty desires and ignorant beliefs that fill them with prejudice and authoritarian tendencies. People fear their divinity, they fear Anarchy and each other because we are ignorant and so the archons cannot help but encourage us to imagine them as beings that rule us, they cannot help but try to make us consent to fear and hate for that is the whole reason they exist, and so again I say to you, we are already in Anarchy, we are already enlightened, we just need to realize it and then consent only to that reality.

The archons can never hurt us if we are mindful of what they represent, if we don't invite them into our lives. People "possessed" by archons can hurt others since they have their creative magickal abilities hijacked and whether or not third world people in poverty are manifesting their lives, other people who want to victimize them, or who have been tricked in to supporting the system are also manifesting it. Those who are aware need to help put all people in a position that they can learn for themselves the truth and so act in accordance with truth, which is outside the jurisdiction of the archons and the best way to do this is to spread Anarchism. There is no excuse for turning a blind eye to those in need who are willing to be helped and will try and help themselves. That said it's also not up to any single person to save the world by themselves as some lone authority on what the world needs. We are all one so there is only one person who can save the world and that is you, but it is also everyone else and the fact that those starving people are in fact one with you should be some damn good motivation for even the most selfish person to spread equality. If you do not see the need to help yourself in other bodies, then you do not really know yourself and if you do not know yourself it cannot be said that you know much of anything.

Once we fully overcome these archons, these false or literalized reality constructs, we can attain enlightenment, gnosis of a reality not determined by wilful ignorance or superficial values of hierarchy. Not to say I have completely overcome the archons otherwise I most likely wouldn't be here to write this, but I have seen my world change and continue to change as I consciously seek to dis-spell them. While I am not a utopian, it is obvious we are capable of much better communities and have in the past had much better communities and that striving for the ideal is better than sitting around feeling sorry for yourself, cursing the world because it does not conform to your egos notion of what a perfect world should be. It should not be said that the Earth cannot potentially be pretty fucking awesome, maybe even close to paradise at times for the true divine force is everywhere and in all things and so there is fundamentally nothing but love. However it is the archons which dissect and categorize that love into artificial hierarchies which create a duality and thus "evil." We are each an avatar which through our own ignorance has created the problems of the world, only by learning to create consciously and with knowledge that our creations are relatively limited can we have any hope of transcending our paradigms. Utopia is to be striven for but never arrived at, as the only thing more dangerous than a group of people who believe they live in a "good" "utopia," are the people who believe things are so "bad" that utopia is impossible and there is no point in trying to improve things.

If the ultimate nature of reality is non physical energy then good and evil are just perceptions of the manifestations of things that are illusionary, not to say some archons aren't more painful and destructive than others, but if you want to take a Christian perspective then all the angels (archons) were forced by "god" to serve humanity. It is just that some of the angels have less than healthy functions, some angels serve our desire for ignorance and masochism, the pain caused by their functions is what has been called demonic rebellion against "god" which is actually you, the creator of your own demons. We could think of Satan's rebellion against "god" or you personally as an act of service in that Muslims say he loved god more than any other angel and so refused to bow to humanity, the mystical meaning being that he is refusing to help you, or god in human form go in to denial in this illusionary world and so he is showing "god" in human form (Adam Kadmon) how flawed it really is, even in a sense trying to rescue us. (This is much more in line with the Jewish depiction of Satan) They are in fact serving us by doing bad things to us in that they are giving us a perspective on what is helpful and healthy and worthy of divine manifestation, the pain they cause is the motivation to stop being wilfully ignorant, you are not punished for your "sin" but thinking the "sin" is worth doing is itself the "punishment" or cause of the pain.

This is of crucial importance to Anarchists and Occultists in that the best way to limit awareness and make people more bias, more dependent on archons is to create a world with governments and hierarchy. The best way to overcome archon influence is through the cultivation of Anarchy through experience and stimulus, which can be done in a very direct manner through activism and ritual. I do believe free will is possible, but only when we have rid ourselves of the influence of our personal archons, this takes time and continuous effort, or else it is quite possible the archons will reinfect the mind. When people overcome the influence and bias of the archons then it will be clear that Anarchy is how we should live and it will be clear that magick is an everyday part of reality.

So the human rulers of this world are in a very real sense “possessed” by these archons, but all too many people think they have gotten the cop out of their head, freed themselves of authoritarian behaviour and prejudice, but in perhaps more subtle ways they are more authoritarian than ever. If enlightenment or spiritual awareness exists and Anarchism is truth, then surely anyone who has attained it is essentially an Anarchist, (though they may be silent about politically defining themselves) and so it is any practice which can promote enlightenment or anarkhos, can be useful to Anarchist activism and vice versa. From a more political point of view we could also say that archons are those psychological tendencies and aspects of ego which keep a person from becoming fully Anarchist. The true rulers of this world are your excuses for not rebelling, your fears which keep you in line, your desires to collaborate and consent to the demands of people in a hierarchy, your compromises with inequality and authoritarianism, your petty desires and temptations which you seek to satisfy through capitalism and your prejudice and bias which make you think you are better than others.

If we want to create change in conformity with the will (personal Anarchy) we have to create memes which can create that kind of awareness for us, which can give us our free will and which can make us the decision makers and not the archons. Ritual and entheogens are invaluable tools in creating this awareness, but it must be integrated into everyday life which inevitably means consciously seeking Anarchism, or at least living in accordance with principles of Anarchism. You must show your mind that your own free will is important and to avoid cognitive dissonance it is a good idea to show it that everyone's free will is important. In this way you can create awareness of the true will and create awareness in general to create a world which functions better and is in line with reality to a much greater degree. By leading through example, you create memories for others you interact with in which Anarchism and free will is something valuable, something which can provide an alternative to the bias of the authoritarianism produced by archons.

Only a powerfully contrasting direct experience can get someone past their memetic bias, if you present scientific data to someone who is Christian it does not matter how well it is backed up if it conflicts with their memetic bias. Since they are working from the premise or memetic foundation that the bible is always correct, all their logic will try to maintain consistency with that assumption. So for example, if Genesis is right, the devil must of put those dinosaur bones out there to confuse us! However when a person experiences a powerful contrary reality, then seeing can be believing, which is why education needs to be based less on memorization of facts and more about creating understanding of how to interpret the experience of day to day reality. (the word education etymologically means “to draw out” bringing to mind anamnesis, it also means the training of animals, guess which one applies to modern schools?) This is also why the entheogenic experience can potentially take people out of their memetic assumptions and provide them with a new view of reality which is not so infected by state memes. Shamanic initiation ceremonies are useful because they wipe clean the assumptions a person grows in to as a child, the culture from that point on has a new context from which the individual can take a fresh and more objective look on everything. Entheogens can provide you with a direct experience of just how subjective you and the rest of culture is and so with conscious effort, in the future you will not make so many assumptions. Any Anarchist society must have people who know their own minds and who are capable of clear decision making, a well developed ability to process information is a key factor of consciousness and so a key factor in freedom, without which humans are doomed to follow leaders who can pretend to be aware.

As we are all one, yet simultaneously individual we are all capable of anything, this is true free will and it is Anarchy in its purest form. The divine is so free it has the power to multiply itself into seemingly separate consciousnesses and to even create the illusion of power hierarchies within itself. This is no doubt unhealthy for many reasons with the biggest being that it's a total denial of truth, while some may not agree with my spiritual views of unity, we are all here on one planet, we all effect each other and so are part of one community, whether or not we like each other. In this way, until we come together as a being of one universe, we are denying the true nature of reality, we are all interconnected, we are all responsible not only for our actions, but our inaction and quietude as well. The illusion of these power structures is maintained by deception, the only way to make a group of equals surrender their power is to make them believe somehow that you are already more powerful or more aware than them. Once the notion of superiority is established, fear and self interest kick in, people who see no possibility for freedom will instead try and personally profit from corrupt hierarchies, strengthening their own enslavement rather than banding together against the oligarchs.

Archons have control of world leaders and so at least indirectly they influence or outright control all of us, but the scary thing is these leaders generally believe they are doing good by promoting their hierarchies. These leaders are the biggest slaves of all and they will kill to defend their delusions, that they are the only ones who aren't delusional. Consensual reality is breaking up more rapidly all the time, generally the creative powers are more mutable. We have literally had a spell cast on us and we were the ones who put it on ourselves, it's intention is to keep us blinded from our real intentions of living free and content and honestly and so long as we are led by it, we will be led towards other people's profit. My words mean nothing but at least I know this and I force them on no one, as it should be left to others find their own will, nobody is an authority on how others can sort out their own lives. When all have no dogma to attack with then the world worth pursuing will be self evident. When this happens we will not be guided by our whims but the steady pulse of the heart of the universe.

There are other incarnations which have very real pain, the vast majority of the fragments of the divine are outside the concept of oneness, not to mention in abject poverty. I am not saying the goal of Anarchists is to create a spiritual utopia, but Anarchism is the ideal environment for spiritual growth and it should be the goal and duty of everyone who calls themselves spiritual (really atheists too) to try and ensure everyone's freedom in anyway they can. It should be obvious that to be a spiritual person it is important to try and create an environment where real spirituality can thrive, however I was an Anarchist years before I was spiritual. Since I am one with everything else then there's no one else who can do it for me, which is no doubt a lot of pressure for someone perceiving himself as twenty one years old, or anyone else for that matter. This may all sound like my ego, my hubris, but what good is the ego gratification of say, being a great writer or even the saviour of humanity, if everyone who admired you is you yourself trapped in a false reality?

I can only hope to limit the archons power to stop us from creating a more loving world for all our fragmented selves, which can only be done by helping each other become more comfortable with unity. At this point in my life there seems to be little opportunity to create global change in the world, but even though I may never change the world in a major way, I will still try and help others when I can, and I know I can change the whole world of at least some individuals. "Think global, act local" as they say, do not carry the weight of the world on your shoulders, but make damn sure you do carry your own load and think about where you are carrying it to. This also means working to take the load off others who have been dumped on by the capitalist system to provide for western consumerism. Even if it is as many Gnostics think, that this physical world is always doomed to be controlled by the archons, fighting the systems of the archons to free souls is essentially identical to creating Anarchy, I may not spread global Anarchy, but if I can make even one person in to an Anarchist I will have freed a mind, made their life better and weakened the system that much more. So I will continue writing this book, as limited and flawed as it is, because anyone with true gnosis would want to help others to be free too.

Since we are all connected fragments of the same energy source living in a consensus reality, “transcending” could be thought of as realizing our oneness with the divine more fully. In theory when we die we ascend to a “higher” plane of existence where there are less misconceptions caused by archons, allowing for more instantaneous creation to occur with more dramatic effects. Those beings which exist in those realms would not be considered our masters or any better than us, only more aware of realms beyond the physical, since that is their home. Rather than some elite which controls us, these beings would be more in line with Anarchism than any humans because they would have a greater understanding of oneness and free will, they do not act on us at all unless we ask them to and in fact may not be able to unless we open ourselves up to them. They would also not be the kind of entities that wish to control other people, after all if the bi-products of awareness are altruism, egalitarianism, love and understanding then such entities if they were truly aware would be Anarchists. When complete oneness is realized presumably so is complete control of all reality, though with this oneness there is no longer a need for “control” in the normal sense since there is nothing separate to fear or want. In the same way that trying to own things in a society with no concept of private property is pointless, when you are one with everything, you do not need to act to do anything, for there is nothing which could be added to you, nothing which you would desire.

Various mystical traditions agree, the less aware you are of how you fit into the big picture, the less power you have since you are less aware of your divine nature and so the reality you create is to a larger degree determined by the others in the majority rule consensus reality of the ignorant. We are at our present state of awareness because it is our will to be led by rulers, to be infected by archons, or at least to be ignorant of our divinity and so we are controlled by de facto rulers. So it is all souls which manifest archon reality come together, where as those who have grown beyond the fears and misconceptions go on to ever more Anarchist realms of existence, where magick becomes ever more possible. Even from a materialist perspective, knowledge is power, if you don't know you are responsible for your own power and what is going on in existence, then its pretty hard for you to exercise your free will. This does not make one realm of reality “good” and the other “bad” but makes those with knowledge of the “higher” realms better equipped to do magick, to make actions happen in accordance with will and to live in accordance with truth in general. After all it sure helps to be aware that something is a part of you if you want to have control over it, you would also want others who you recognize as being one with you, to realize their true wills and in this way mysticism affirms the reality of Anarchism as a natural order of things, at least for someone who is aware.

This can be likened to the idea of planes of reality in that as you grow in awareness, you become more etheric and so is the plane you inhabit. In a sense your reality becomes more fluid, more mutable, so that in this way the more aware you are, the more ontological Anarchy is a reality. This does not mean you go around choosing reality for other people, but that you are capable of choosing what you want for yourself, the desire to control others is based in fear and so the world of the archons, meaning those who try to be elite are manifesting a reality which actually limits their awareness, eventually to the point where they themselves are unable to do magick. If you know you are one with all then why would you try and be a tyrant to other parts of yourself? Why would you let other aspects of yourself be a tyrant to you? This is something that just seems totally implausible for beings with higher awareness. The “higher” the awareness, the higher the plane of reality, the more decentralized power structures become, after all what enlightened being needs a leader? Anarchists in a higher dimension would not try to force us in to Anarchy, recognizing that it is our will to have archons they would let us create them, they may try and teach us the truth, but no one can impose Anarchy and even if it were possible we would not understand why archons are an error and so lack the skills or awareness needed to function in such an Anarchist society.

This world then is like a metaphysical school of Anarchy, so at higher planes, highly functional Anarchist societies are free from those fearful megalomaniacs who don't know how to manifest their own free will in a healthy way and who do not have a will to improve in this awareness. Those who aren't at a level of awareness where they are capable of wilfully functioning in a society of Anarchist magicians come here. According to most traditions they come willingly to be with others whom will themselves to rule or be ruled, or those who wish to learn directly the value of Anarchism by living it's opposite. Since the desire to rule others is pathological, the search for personal sadism and masochism must be one of the main focus's of someone on the spiritual path, this may seem obvious but we are all much more self destructive than we realize, otherwise we wouldn't be here. (many a hippie or pacifist is a unconsciously a masochist with much pride about being less sadistic than others) By this idea, when we have grown in awareness enough we will have an Anarchist society, this has basically been what Anarchists have been saying from the beginning, that we need to raise awareness and dispel ignorance. While spiritual knowledge is not necessary to live in an egalitarian society, it can sure help and since the Occult and mysticism provide methods of increasing awareness , they can help to spread Anarchist mindsets. Anarchy will happen, if not in this world, then in some higher plane of awareness, this would be reached by doing what is necessary to overcome your personal archons and finding the courage and drive to help others overcome the rest of the archons out there.

As I said, those in “higher” states of awareness do not rule over us, but in fact want us to join them, but in order to do this we must be willing, the sign of that willingness is our actions here in this world to spread an Anarchist reality. No doubt there are some Anarchists here in this world who feel that they are aware and willing enough to be a part of any Anarchist society, on any plane. In fact they may truly be ready, but then perhaps these Anarchists are here as teachers of Anarchy, or they may suffer from the egotism of thinking their understanding of Anarchism makes them better than others. A high awareness in general (beyond the political and economic) is crucial to being a truly functional Anarchist, life is not confined to political debates and so if you are not aware of all kinds of things, how you effect others and what the nature of your mind is, then you will not completely understand how everyone effects each other. Being able to spread Anarchism requires more than being able to quote political theory and too many Anarchists have merely a theoretical understanding, they may even be excellent activists but lack the ability to get along with most people, or to treat non Anarchists as equals. I have found all too many who call themselves Anarchists are totally unwilling to spend time with anyone with different political beliefs than them, almost as if they plan on spreading Anarchy by avoiding anyone who doesn't already agree with them. This is not to say you have to believe what I or anyone else believes about reality, but that to increase your Anarchist awareness and live in more Anarchistic worlds, you will have to face all your demons, all your illusions, all your hates and all your fears, you must will yourself to awareness, rather than willing blissful ignorance.

Even if our ultimate destination is to transcend this Earthly realm, it is the here and now that is important, if you do not find truth and happiness in this world, you wont in the next either and so we must go in to the present moment as deeply as possible in order to find that happiness. You are here to design the kind of heaven you want, to find what is worth desiring and if it is not this kind of world, then find the mindset and experiences you do want and live them in the present moment, because now is the microcosm of where you will spend eternity. Those in accordance with truth, those with self awareness will find Anarchism because they are all parts of the same things, for how could someone who is truly enlightened consent to or support psychopathic systems? Fearlessly exemplifying the reality you wish to transcend to, you do not abandon others so that you might escape, on the contrary that would only bring you to an escapist's heaven of ignorance, those who know, know that escape is for those living in fear. In many Pagan traditions the greatest honour would be to die in service to your community, even to do battle so that you could be in a state of fearlessness when you die. This may sound overly aggressive to those used to the passive aggressive slave mentality of the Christian religion, but dying to defend your people, to stand up to injustice is a very important part of a spiritual warriors path, as death is not to be feared when you know where you are going. I would not encourage people to die fighting simply to get in to some special heaven, for that is selfish, however there are plenty of causes out there worth dying for. Those who are fearless, those who are willing to sacrifice their lives for the freedom of the community, these souls will find themselves in a different place when they die than those who lived in fear and thought only of themselves.

The less awareness someone has the more authoritarian they will be, or the more they will be fooled by the rulers, awareness becomes fractured, more selfish and egotistical as the direct result of archons. It is these tendencies for ignorance, greed and fear and the people who are enthralled by them, which have created the illusion of a stable hierarchical society (or reality) based on authoritarian rule. These archons have fractured awareness to the point that most do not even try to create a non authoritarian reality, likewise most abstain from consciously manifesting the consensus reality they want and instead let rulers decide everything. From this process of centralizing power and authority, people have to various degrees willingly surrendered their power to religions, governments or sometimes unreliable or limited scientific officials who determine their reality for them. Rulers are people who have managed to fragment a piece of the oneness to create a sub reality which they control, the people who believe in them, believe in the little reality they create and consent to having their energy used for its creation. Various rulers then struggle with each other to bring all the people under their control, but through this conflict, only engender more error, more conflict, polarization and fragmentation among the various ruler's groups. The more hierarchical culture is seen by the consensus as a valuable thing, the more people will want to be rulers themselves and so the more authoritarian realities denying oneness and equality will fracture off and be created like little authoritarian bubbles of delusion.

Anarchism is fundamentally based on notions of consensus, that is each person involved must agree, unless it is previously agreed to, it is not a matter of majority rule, it must be unanimous. People have generally consented to the reality of the majority getting to make the decisions and so have consented to ignore the Anarchist potential of reality in favour of conformity, of taking on the authoritarian realities of others. Some people do not agree with the perceptions of that reality and to whatever degree they disagree, they change their reality, even if it is done unconsciously. This can be likened to an individualist who does not agree with some commune and so goes off on their own, they may live on the outskirts of a settlement and have limited contact, or some people go off completely into the untamed wilderness to explore and live in their own way and according to their nature. You may not consent to everything in this world, but you do primarily consent to be on Earth with people you disagree with and so to various degrees we share this planet.

Consenting to the reality of rule by representation is the surrendering of your power to those you consider authorities, whether it be the Pope or the President, those who consent to the notions of a system, automatically consent to be ruled by anyone who is chosen by that system. If you consent to being a citizen of a republic, it does not matter if you consent to a particular leader by voting, if the republic chooses a leader, you have consented to be ruled by them. The government is a limited reality within the consensus reality that has its own specific rules and views, you may not consent to all the laws or actions of the politicians, but since you have consented to be ruled by them, you have consented to let representatives choose what you consent to in your place. If you do actually vote for someone who is elected, you have simply used the ballot as a sigil within the government consensus reality, in order to choose within that reality, who will represent you. The word "vote" comes from vovere meaning "to promise solemnly, pledge, dedicate, vow," or the Sanskrit root vaghat- "one who offers a sacrifice;" and this is the same root as votive offering, meaning a vote is basically praying for someone to rule you. Freedom lies in overcoming the consensus that people should be ruled at all, that Anarchist consensus cannot be reached, or that individualist notions are inherently invalid.

Within consensus reality you can try and manifest reality in two basic ways. The first is by co-opting the consensus and trying to rise in a hierarchy where you have people surrender their power to you, there by ignoring oneness and so breeding ever more dysfunctional and contradictory realities. Since we are one when a ruler limits the ability of those at the bottom of the hierarchy to consciously determine their personal reality, they are limiting their own ability to do their will and so given the fundamental flaws and limitations of hierarchical society, not even the ruler is truly satisfied. The second means of doing magick is by realizing your oneness with all things and learning to manifest your own reality without imposing on others, there by maintaining consistency with the inherent equality of all beings in the consensus and maximizing everyone's ability to do their own will. Hierarchical realities reinforce the manifestations of the rulers, where as magick reinforces the creation of an Anarchist reality where everyone can simultaneously have their will, a reality where freedom is determined by love and not fear of oppression. This kind of reality is not only more in line with truth, but more functional in creating happiness for everyone, since they would no longer be basing their goals on illusions, even the would be rulers will be happier with this new reality.

So it is awareness of oneness is almost synonymous with Anarchism, the will to be a ruler over others is antagonistic to any will based in truth. Those on "higher" planes of reality do not impose on anyone in the lower planes, since they understand they are joined with those people they realize it is fruitless to limit the awareness of those aspects of themselves which are already to some degree ignorant. Throughout the spectrum of awareness from oneness, to whatever level of fracturing it ends, it is all always one being, the spectrum is only of awareness of that unity, which itself is part of the one thing. Those who are trying to get us to live as equals, which by definition can never happen through leaders, are those who are most aware of the big picture, even if they do not have any spiritual intentions. It is our destiny to commune with the divine chaos, to enter in to the spiritual commune with those Anarchist entities waiting for us in the other realms, for they are our ancestors who long ago became enlightened and left their children to grow as they did.

Those with reactionary and conservative impulses are those who fear change, since growing in awareness is a form of change, they fear anything which will make them more aware that their reality, like all others is an artificial construct. They often believe in a highly narrow view of reality determined by religion and so any attempt to bring them in to a greater awareness, is seen as a threat to their little bubble of reality. Strictly speaking fragmented authoritarian realities are just as real as realities based on oneness and conscious creation, but they lack internal consistency and any ability to relate to other points of view and so lack the ability to provide any kind of sustainable and happy reality. While politicians or those who consider themselves leaders could still control themselves in an Anarchist society, they have defined their reality as something which should be imposed on others and so resist any attempts to bring about equality.

Mystical Anarchists are not better than anyone, they are the ones who wish to free the fragmented awareness from artificially created and false images of authoritarian rule, however their ability to do this is limited by having to maintain internal consistency. Beings which are less authoritarian and more functional as Anarchists see the potential of all beings to be whatever they want, but have often been misled due to the current popularity in the consensus of authoritarianism. While Anarchism is a fundamental principle of reality, people can choose to be ignorant of reality and manifest their own delusions based on hierarchy. There are few people "born" into Anarchist realities and "raised" in an Anarchist culture to be Anarchists, so as humans in this world, (especially Westerners) the full reality of what Anarchism means is hard to imagine and fully realize since we have always been surrounded by the very opposite of what we pursue. While some Anarchists may not believe they have more to learn on the subject, it is very likely that future Anarchists will look at us today as crude, offensive and authoritarian. Just as Bakunin had his mistakes and said some racist things about Jews because he was mad at the Rothschilds and bankers, we too have mistakes we do not see and this includes me. Mystical Anarchists are those beings who want all fragments of awareness to have the same rights and power, to stop people competing for control over those who are not aware and create a unanimous decision that all individuals have equal rights and powers, that being aware of how we as individuals effect the whole is imperative to awareness.

So then, activism based in direct action is essentially a ritual to bring about Anarchist reality and consciousness within the activist and the rest of the world. Through the principles of “sympathetic magick” like attracts like, so to create an Anarchist world or to transcend to an Anarchist realm you yourself must be Anarchist and live that reality, since when you die you will go to a place that suits the person you are. Earth may never be utopia but even if that is true, even if it exists solely as a place for young souls to grow out of fear based authoritarian awareness, by striving for Anarchy here you attune yourself to that specific reality and resonate with it. The idea that this world is fucked and so you will cooperate with the rulers will attune you to authoritarian consumer notions of the archons false heavens, which are to me actually “hell,” or at least you will continue to reincarnate here.

I do believe this world can be Anarchist and by striving to make Anarchy we can bring in Anarchist souls, as well as help to change souls already here by showing them through our actions what the reality of Anarchism looks like and how one can function as a happier person in this world because of it. Unfortunately this mystical perspective alone is not enough, (at least not in the past 6000 years or so) people currently have little to no will to take responsibility for themselves as humans, let alone taking responsibility for being divine and so by encouraging a secular view of social Anarchy, this will result in the growth of all kinds of awareness, social, scientific and all the rest, till eventually people will naturally lead themselves to a more ontological kind of Anarchy. While you may personally benefit from spiritual versions of Anarchism, you should not avoid secular forms of Anarchism and respect atheists choice to be atheist and work with them whenever possible. You can use what insight from spirituality you can to help, but present it in a secular way so that you do not alienate atheists, or people with different spiritual beliefs, though when with non dogmatic spiritual people you should of course not hesitate to show them how Anarchism is central to spirituality.

While it is true that the more aware you are, the more Anarchist you become, the more you are able to live with Anarchist souls in other realities, it should be made clear that not all “spirits” on the astral you can encounter are Anarchist, or very aware of anything. Channelled spirits, or spirits in general are certainly capable of lying, these beings can help you, or lead you astray, if they are not Anarchist they are most likely what are basically a kind of archon or emotional parasites that are not truly alive. (outside of the energy they can steal from ignorant people) They do not have souls in the way others do and they will talk to anyone who will listen in order to take their energy, if taking on the guise of an authority will get them more attention, then they will be all too happy to tell you what to believe, and they will choose something that suits them and not you. They are mostly what people imagine them to be, they do not have power we do not give them, like robots they do not have creativity as we do, they do not have the ability change their forms unless they have been imagined or programmed to have that power. People imagine them to be so powerful however, they are currently capable of keeping the wilfully ignorant trapped in illusion, trapped in a world where they can provoke, or inspire us to provide them with new memes, new metaphysical creations which they can take on for their own benefit and this is how they farm our energy. This is especially true in the naive world of New Age channelers, who know little to nothing of safe or scientific Occult work and will talk to the first entity that presents itself.

When people die they manifest themselves according to their wills and their will is largely determined by their awareness of what is possible and preferential, if they do not will universal oneness they will most likely reincarnate as some individual separated being. If they are not aware they will go to the “lowest” levels of the astral where they have little control to enact their will, where these archons parasites are created. So if you died a cop, or a politician, or a bourgeois worker or anyone else who is overly ignorant you will not become an Anarchist in the astral, you will not be someone with the ability to exist in Anarchy, a reality where you can do what you want and so will go to the appropriate reality. These parasites will present themselves as authorities to deranged people like say Abraham, so as to manipulate humanity in to creating authoritarian structures that can be used to create a reality for the ignorant. Learning is a form of change and so must be done in the physical world of time which is the reason for reincarnation, so when you die unless you know how to exist in that world before hand, you will not learn much more than you knew while you were alive. This then is the reason you have to learn here and now!

Even if you are talking to a dead human soul in the astral waiting to reincarnate, just because someone is dead does not mean they know more than the average person on the street, if they just came from Earth, then chances are they are very confused indeed. The classic example in Occult teachings asks, why would you ask a stranger on the street about the deepest layers of reality? So then asking a random spirit on the astral makes no more sense, though it can be entertaining. There are methods to call specific spirits who speak the truth, but that requires Occult ritual knowledge. Most channelers or people who use Ouija boards are getting the very lowest astral entities there are and these entities are generally little more than thought forms seeking empowerment and are not the ones I mean when I speak of higher dimensional Anarchists. We can call on those who have transcended past illusion in to pure Anarchist realities, they are willing to help if we want their help, though ultimately you must DIY, no one can make you Anarchist, it must be by your choice and your choice alone, but through a kind of camaraderie they can help you to grow your awareness and courage so that you can take on the fears that hold you back.

If you ever start to hear voices, or you are working with evocation, channelling, Ouija boards or something similar, if the entity you are talking to does not say things in accordance with Anarchism then it should not be trusted as knowing much about anything, chances are it is an illusion of your own ego playing games with you, trying to create parasitic imaginary friends or tormentors. Even if an entity acts like an Anarchist they still may be telling you what you “want” to hear and so skepticism is imperative, no spirit is an authority to depend on, especially if it claims to be. Just remember true spiritual beings do not dictate orders to other people, though it is possible they will have some advice for you if you ask for it, if you are an Anarchist you will not accept the ideas of anyone blindly and instead do your own will, considering other points of view, but always making up your own mind.

When you have Anarchist intentions and Occult awareness the gods are beings that should be loved, not seen as authorities or servants, they are helping you to grow, they do not require or even necessarily want us to worship them as our superiors. These beings which when approached correctly reflect our Anarchism since they reflect our minds, so they simply want some of the energy we have, so that they can use it to build their astral forms for us to interact with them. These astral forms are how our minds perceive them in conceptual terms and so to strengthen them, strengthens us as well, so it is they want us to help them help us. For the most part they do not ask to be “worshipped,” certainly not in the way most would think, but the word “worship” does not necessarily imply a slave mentality, it means simply paying homage or devotion, to give the entity love and I would argue it really means more that you should interact and build a relationship rather than grovel and suck up. These sycophantic notions that are so common today and rightfully criticized by atheists are the result of people who have lost their connection to divine beings and so rely on modern notions of worship, they have been instilled with ideas by priests that “god” would never lower itself to engage with the likes of us, unless maybe we donate a whole bunch of money to the church and so worship of “god” has really become service to the church.

Setting up a hierarchy is not inherent in building a connection to divinities, it is only a convenient trap for people who wish to make the divinity do all the work for them by surrendering personal responsibility. When approached with Anarchist intentions all the spirits want is that people pay attention to them and learn from them, but through our energy they also learn or at least grow through us and this is best done, as with all learning with an open and humble mind. Ritual is to the casual atheist observer and the ignorant fundamentalist an act of service to a master, but with a magickal or Anarchist intentionality, it is the method of coming into awareness of the spirit, the practice of strengthening those qualities within the individual and the realization of unity through the creation of a relationship. Without this proper context, we fall into idol worship and become obsessed with the image and what it does to inspire fear or submission, or to make our egos happy, rather than working with them to grow spiritually.

Another way of looking at this is that by putting in the time and effort, these divinities will see that it is our will for them to help us, and because they love us and see how hard we are trying, they will help us, if we do not want them to help us they will not, perhaps even if it means our death. The gods do not violate our free will, they are mostly Anarchists, some have just been imagined as providing a way of scaring others into slavery. The true divinities do not violate our right to be ignorant and ruled by the forces of the unconscious, which we set up for ourselves through our lack of will to change and grow. How humans imagine divinities is extremely important because it will largely determine the nature of how they interact with us, if we fear a vengeful god then that astral form will have to be a vengeful one, if we have imagined that a god is of no help to us, then it will not be. If we imagine a god wants us to be powerless slaves with no magick, or who think magick is evil then we will surrender all of our power to such a god, so clearly some god forms are more helpful than others. We can leave our lives to the whims of a tyrannical “god” but through our imagining of “god” as something that dictatorially controls everything, as something that rules us, we are only really consenting to use our free will, or our magickal energy to create our lives in accordance with that astral form. The choice is always ours, through our will to have personal understanding of the context and the divinity, or to be to some degree ignorant. The image of a tyrannical objective “god” is just the will to abandon free will and so it is the rejection of true reality, for that of simplistic ego gratification, the comfort of abandoning personal responsibility and justifying all actions in the name of your personal deity.

The act of worship with the intent of bringing some god in to you life is really pretty strange when you think of it, if the divine is omnipresent then there is no way for it to not be in your life, to not be in you, the act of trying to bring “god” into your life then shows a kind of lack of faith, a lack of understanding at least. Invocations are still useful in that they bring the awareness to a state of divinity, they get the ego out of the way, the perceptions of disconnection from the divinity, they also infuse the body with supercharged energy of a specific type that can have a variety of practical and spiritual uses, but the divinity is always there, always creating at least some aspect of your awareness, if you know how to recognize it. “Worship” then is not so much asking the divinity to come in to your life, but showing it is your intention to be aware of it and interact with it, or to help you fulfil some other intention which allows you to grow spiritually. I am not against working with individual aspects of Chaos or oneness in the form of various divinities, I am not even against people who believe their gods are individuals with no underlying unity, but we must understand that no god needs our worship, we have nothing to offer them, showing them love is not an obligation or a duty, it is an act of love and those who don't actually feel love are better off being honest and not doing anything.

To me worship is not something you do to be close to the divine, it is what you do when you realize you are divine, it is the celebration of perfect existence. To think you can become enlightened purely through prayer, purely through affection for divinity is self deception, it is idol worship of something you do not understand, it is the ego thinking it knows the nature of a divinity and that it can understand in terms of human culture what divinity is, in this way it is vanity looking at the images and conceptions we have of divinity. Works like prayer, charity and activism or any act of ego are not methods of attaining enlightenment, or grace, or gnosis, but will provide you with skills that you will use when you are enlightened, they are activities which are consistent with an enlightened human.

Your thoughts are symbols which tell the story you tell yourself about your life, about who you are and what is going on, but you are not the story, you are the one experiencing the story. When you think of things they are for you as you define them, when you cease to define them they are as they are, you do not do things to be this true self for all actions are part of the story, so be still and undefined, then you will know thyself. Any action which you perform is an act of the ego, as that is its function, to be the symbol of that which identifies as self and that which does and experiences things, so it is that no action can make a person enlightened, because it is the ego which through its identification as a separate individual, serves to limit awareness from that which is universal. It further follows that all forms of asceticism, and religious law cannot make a person enlightened, nor even any practice, since as soon as you identify as something which does a practice you eliminate your awareness of unity with all things. While some practices can potentially aid the blind by letting them tire themselves of the impulse to act and abstract, only by relaxing the will totally can one be swept up in the universal will or current. Then once this is mastered, with the forces of the Tao carrying you the will can be directed through ritual for magickal purposes, to manipulate the ego or channel the energies of manifestation to provide it with an experience in the illusion of physical reality.

Symbols trick people in to taking them literally, trick people in to mistaking the symbol itself for the meaning that it represents, putting them in a world of illusion through consent to distraction. Truth will only happen when people consent to feeling and experiencing the meaning of symbols rather than worshipping the symbols and identifying as the symbol's servants. All religions essentially tell the same story, the story of you realizing your divinity and how that process unfolds, but instead people filled with fear turn it in to a matter of authority, fighting with other culture's symbol systems, with other people who don't understand what the symbols mean. "The Tao that can be named is not the eternal Tao," the symbol that can define the divine is not the eternal divine. All definitions of Chaos are finite and so negate the orderless nature of Chaos, so it is you cannot trust any symbols, even if they are the words of "god" they are in a human language, put in terms of human egos and so ultimately quite limited compared to the experience of their meaning.

Those who do not know the meaning of sacred symbols interpret them literally and dogmatically, they fall in to idol worship in order to continue ignoring their spiritual quest to raise their awareness. These people can even become obsessed with denying or even destroying anything but a literal interpretation, ironically trying to destroy the divinities they tell themselves they care so much about. This is especially true in the modern day when we consider that many religious symbols from around the world were at least on some levels referring to entheogens and the experiences they create, only now such experiences are deemed heretical and even illegal. Literalists and dogmatists "have taken the keys of Knowledge and hidden them. They themselves have not entered, nor have they allowed to enter those who wish to." I may make a fetish or statue to one of my many gods, but I am not idolatrous for I know its true meaning and I experience it's spiritual reality, but even a Muslim, with no images commits idolatry when they fail to understand the divine is everywhere, even inside them, for as soon as they accept a definition, they have confined their deity to a limited form. In this way the archons are not really gods and not really alive, but exist as our idolatrous and ignorant notions about the gods, or whatever meme we have reified and put up in a hierarchy, then they become stronger and more reified as they pit us against each other in the deities name.

In contrast to the literalist, someone who has the awareness created by the understanding of the symbols is capable of using the symbols without falling in to idol worship, even though someone watching would probably see no difference in how they practice their spirituality, how that person lives outside the temple will be the proof of their knowledge. Symbols are only useful for those who know from experience what they mean as a non abstract reality, they often work to distract those who do not, though through philosophical contemplation of mystical texts, use of rituals and practices a person can be pointed in the right direction, ultimately that step has to be taken by the individual. The only possible exception to this is the use of entheogens, since if you take a strong enough dose the ego is obliterated, "you" lose "control" and the entheogen takes over, you can get gnosis of non abstract reality whether or not "you" want it.

When you consider the idea of the Gnostic demiurge, an entity which is essentially the ultimate rogue parasitic god form gone mad, who's intention is no less than to imprison us in a false reality, clearly we have to be careful about giving power to entities which are not Anarchist in nature, which may even seek to keep us ignorant or deluded so that we feed them energy unknowingly. Ultimately though the demiurge is our own ego, or the ego of all humanity which makes things even more tricky. Whole cultures can be created devoted to god forms which feed off death and pain, each meme working to funnel energy to a god form which seeks nothing more than to perpetuate humanities greed in exchange for blood and the destruction of the natural world.

The archons, both as the literal human rulers of the world and the ones that are in all our minds are the enemies of all kinds of awareness. I seek not to push any specific view, though I have stated my subjective opinions, I want to encourage all people to raise their own awareness in whatever means and directions they feel is most valid to them. This is not to say you should ignore this world of delusions to focus only on growing your spiritual awareness, without an understanding of the world most people live in and the political realities that exist we are not aware of much. To be truly spiritually aware and self aware we must be politically aware as world politics effects ourselves and with that we become aware of the need to try and improve the lives of those who are being dominated by a few tyrants. To me Anarchist awareness and awareness of truth are two sides of the same coin, you cannot develop one without developing some aspect of the other. At its core or root level, all awareness is connected and so by pursuing awareness in any number of ways, we will all eventually come to the same unified reality which is indistinguishable from Anarchy.

There are gurus who teach and learn nothing but oneness, but although they may have great spiritual insights, if they have set themselves up as hierarchical masters to dictate reality to those who follow them, then they are hypocrites and have failed to apply the truth to their lives. They themselves are slaves to archons and prone to all kinds of corruption and delusions of grandeur that are an inherent part of hierarchies. Those gurus who put themselves above others show their fundamental lack of understanding of universal oneness by their belief that it is even possible for them to be better than others, since all people are one. Each person has their own individual archons and so must undo them in their own individual way through the cultivation of free will, if they understood that truly they would not seek to have their body or ego needs put before any other body. Being told what reality is does no good, you must realize it for yourself, we can help each other to learn methods, we can talk and spread ideas, but so long as you make others dependent on you, they will never cultivate true awareness, only awareness of what it is to be dependent. Those who teach as authorities, especially in spiritual matters show themselves to be ignorant, only by teaching others how to learn for themselves and doing so in a way that does not pacify a seeker into consuming and regurgitating "authoritative" information.

Spiritual education is possible, just like Anarchist societies will still have education, but when done by genuine teachers or gurus is not authorities pontificating dogma. This requires a dramatic updating in modern western ideas about what education means, to make education of all kinds Anarchist is imperative in teaching people how to think, and not what to think. Entheogens are the obvious way to cultivate independent spiritual growth, the Socratic method is another way, Sufi teaching stories are yet another way. As I mentioned before there are also other methods set out by political Anarchists who have written about this very problem within conventional education and it is something that must be applied to any spiritual education. "Free schools," "decschooling" or the most Anarchist Montessori style schools are all highly relevant, but these methods actually coincide with how many real gurus teach, it is simply different topics that they teach.

Many spiritual traditions demanded oral traditions precisely because books could be corrupted by dogmatic authorities trying to impose literalism, people who would then twist the meaning of the words like Pharisees to legitimize their theocracy. Not only this, teachings need to be designed according to the desires, needs and problems of each individual, no book or even series of books could be created which are applicable to all people in all situations and so a two way interaction with a teacher is very helpful, especially when decoding the incredibly dense mythological metaphors. In order to get the archons out it would help to have a back and forth between teacher and student and not a one way memorization of some words, it also requires first hand experience and participation by the student. I have never really had a spiritual teacher other than plant spirits and so you should not abandon hope because you cannot learn exactly as ancients did, but the loss of ancient wisdom that came with Christian censorship is one of the greatest tragedies of human history.

Unfortunately this book is not even a good example of this since there are limits to having a two way dialogue with your reader, but it is not intended to be anything definitive, but more a call, an urging for you the reader to do your own further research on subjects you may not have thought about before. I urge you to learn how to learn, and learn what is worth learning, rather than trying to learn what you think is the truth, think about thoughts and grow your own consciousness in your own way. Authoritarian means of "education" are perhaps the greatest tools of mind control the archons have in destroying the ability of consciousness to think properly. People are led to believe they understand things which they do not, they are also taught to think they know how to think when they do not, creating a mind with no context and which readily accepts any information so long as the person presenting it is defined as an expert or authority.

Under the banner of false beliefs every victim of every war has died to feed those who thrive on pain. We are slaves to masters we have never even seen and serfs to men who have sold out their entire species, westerners being so controlled they even believe they are free. Consensus reality in a world of hierarchy is a battleground for ideas, different rulers try to impose consensus but this generally only creates more conflict, only Anarchism can provide global consensus, anything else is making some group in to slaves and no one will consent to being a slave forever. Many conspiracy theories have worked out the Occult means of how people have been controlled as for example by marketing and propaganda, but it is more questionable whether or not one monolithic group has complete control of the entire world. Conspiracies are everywhere, but they are competing with each other, perhaps forming alliances at times, however authoritarians do not like to share power and all hierarchies are built on ruthless ambition, deception and backstabbing. So then no group of elitists can control everything because they all want to control each other as well. If there is a unified force controlling basically the whole world then it seems to me it has to be metaphysical entities, archons. It doesn't make sense to me that this could be aliens as most people think of them because such a race would have no need to keep us around at all, they would just exterminate us by some means and use robots to do what they want with our resources.

If it is non human forces controlling Earth, it is forces that want us alive for some reason and I believe it is to create and feed on fear and pain based energy. From my research this would be the only way this is possible as all these different wars and secret societies obviously have internal conflicts and often fight with each other. Certain wars do not make any sense at all, for example in World War II the Freemasons were sent to the concentration camps just like Jews and Gypsies etc, these kinds of things accomplish nothing for a supposed global secret government. Often no draconian laws are established, some additional debt is acquired for the bankers but it would be next to worthless for them when they already own everything, when they even print the money. The only profit seems to be from a purely sadist perspective, of creatures who feed off of pain. For example how people are daily being tortured to death and not even being asked any questions, not even having the public or families know what happened to them for purposes of intimidation, just pure malicious sadism. No hierarchy can exist without the consent of those it rules, consensus reality manifests the world of the rulers and so anyone who believes in hierarchy is essentially part of the conspiracy. For these and many other reasons it is clear whatever is going on is beyond simple ideas of global government.

Certainly there is a very strong case that there are people in power with Occult knowledge, I have made this argument myself, Occult knowledge certainly is not a guarantee to being an Anarchist, (though being an Anarchist is crucial to true understanding) in fact that is one of the main reasons I write all this in the first place. That said with the majority of Occult conspiracy theories where it is all laid out in a blanket manner of evil and Satanic, what seems more likely is that paranoid Christians who for some reason think the church and the highly edited bible are beyond corruption, are quick to name anyone who isn't Christian as ruling the world under Satan. While some Christians have contributed some valid research in to conspiracies, their simplistic interpretations betray their bias. The fact is that Christianity is itself the best example of how Occult technology is used to control people in an attempt to bring together the consensus reality under hierarchical control. Anarchists often dismiss conspiracy theories and reduce everything to the faults of the system, often in some ways they are naive about the level of corruption that occurs at the higher levels. Conspiracy theorists are often naive about how fundamentally flawed the system is, still believing in capitalism or the notion of hierarchy, that some how if it wasn't for evil Satanists the world would be fine, but in truth both groups have incomplete pictures of reality without each other.

Christians clearly find the idea of non Christians conspiring for power appalling, but since they still believe in hierarchy they think nothing of doing everything they can to gain power over others and impose their own religion. No doubt any hypothetical conspiracy in power would put out misinformation saying things like the secret government is atheist, communist and secretly bent on making everyone Satanic. Of course if you believe anyone who thinks differently than you is Satanic, then no doubt there is a lot of evidence of this. These theories fall apart since we can obviously see that rulers use the Christian religion to gain support and are very much capitalist and bent on monetary greed doing absolutely nothing to promote egalitarianism, we can only come to the conclusion that the Christian religion itself is being used as a tool of control and has been largely corrupted, (especially since Christ's teachings are antithetical to capitalism) and this has been going on since Constantine at least. Personally I do not trust the Roman state, or anyone to edit and codify a religion, especially when its meant to be a state religion that is forced on everyone in the world.

One thing which Christians conspiracy theorists love to bring up that is true, is that Occultists generally tend to be egalitarian and anti-authoritarian, the kind of Christian conspiracy nuts or people who get their information second or third hand from Christian theories, (which is the majority) are also for the most part the kind of people who think Anarchism is all about violence and criminal rule. Anything but free market capitalism and Christian theocracy is to them a Satanic conspiracy, they view themselves the victims of all the problems of the world when their religion contributes more to the systems of oppression than anything else. Any revolution which could set them free, but any which is not their specific brand of Christianity is demonized before they even consider it, because they are so successfully controlled they blame those they enslave for trying to free themselves, it never occurs to them that an Anarchist cannot be a dictator and by definition doesn't want to control anyone. Coming from a purely conservative Christian perspective, it would be easy to lump an Anarchist together with a diabolical megalomaniacal black magician, to them all magick is evil, even though when they pray they are performing a magick ritual.

There are authoritarian Occultists out there, no doubt about it, but whether or not we like it, in a consensus reality we are all magicians, some just try to create more consciously than others. Even from a materialist perspective cultural conditioning pretty well controls how humans shape reality, especially since most people consent to ignore their own minds and do what they are told. It is a big mistake to judge any group of people as a whole, just like it would be the mistake of a bigot to say all Christians are paedophiles, or that all black people are criminals, you cannot say all Occultists are evil, Satanic or trying to control the world through demonic forces. (This is even more absurd as Occultists are individualists and do not follow orders from paedophile priests and so are far more varied in their beliefs than Christians.) For example if you are imposing order on others (black magick) you are not a Chaos magician, you do not believe in Chaos, you believe in your own authoritarian order. The Occult is incredibly varied in philosophy and technique, especially if you put modern Pagans in to that category, in fact individualism with each person practising and believing something at least somewhat different is the norm, even highly technical orders like the Golden Dawn demand individual education and understanding rather than dogma. Its pretty clear there are much more Occultists out there who control no one, than there are Occultists in some secret government. Those in control will do what they can to keep the masses believing superstitions because those people know that an aware people, who know magick, will not be controlled by religions or black magick and will question all authority.

Occult knowledge does not make someone good or bad by default any more than science does, but having access to the spiritual world does help you to see through the conditioning that has been placed on you. If the divine is an Anarchist, and Anarchy is fundamental to the metaphysical workings of reality, then awareness of those realities will not impose on you some kind of morality, it is beyond dualism and good and evil. The masochism of the universal mind expressed through the violence of humans is not evil, it is idiotic and emo, if you have Occult knowledge but are ignorant of the oneness of all things, then you may do harm to others you perceive as separate. (Emos are some of the most archon infected people, it is nothing but a commercialized culture of ignorance and fashionable egotism which seeks to wallow in pain, they even perform blood "sacrifices" to archons by cutting themselves.) If you rely on archons, or god forms which demand blood sacrifice and who's only pleasure is materialist and selfish egotism, then you are not aware of your own magickal ability and have never had the gnosis of what is transcendent, the true goal of all Occult and mystical practices. (Chaotes may not think of it like that, but they do try to be more aware of Chaos.)

God forms created to do black magick will become as archons who will encourage the urges to do black magick so that they can feed, making them stronger and thus better able to encourage the black magician in their ignorance. Eventually the memetic rituals which the black magicians use would be passed on to new people, generally in their attempts to control others, but also since the archons and the nature of hierarchical education create a lifestyle that increases and perpetuates ignorance, their students would not understand the magickal system as well as the system's creators. As the memes of the black magick school evolve and the archons become ever more powerful, the adepts of black magick become ever more ignorant, yet so successful they think they are great people, perhaps they are Christian, or even atheist, working in a secular system but are in reality the pawns of metaphysical rulers. If there are black magician politicians consciously doing rituals to control the people of the world, they may have practical Occult knowledge but they do not have gnosis of the reality of universal oneness, since such knowledge shows authoritarianism and greed to be the height of ignorance. It is no doubt ignorant to try and take over the world and hurt everyone, there is no doubt this is the antithesis of all mystical philosophies, but this is a distinction you will not find in any Christian conspiracy theories that I know of. The Occult is the memetic roots of all human culture, religion and science and so all "good" and "bad" ideas can be blamed on it, including the concept of "good" and "bad," but what we are experiencing is the ramifications of making these memes in to hierarchies, an idea based on the ignorance of their source and our unity.

Even if there is some group of hidden oligarchs who are in to the Occult, this does not make the true reality of this knowledge something evil, or something to be feared, in fact mastering this knowledge is the only means of fighting back. We must learn how they have manipulated people's egos from behind the scenes and face them in their own arena, become conscious of the collective mind and work out our differences. If we do not learn the magickal processes of nature that are always acting on us, then we will be made slaves to them. This is true whether or not there is some human secret society pulling the strings, jumping up and down and calling gravity evil is stupid, we need to learn how to fly using Occult technology. Magick was made evil by religious leaders who want people to be dependent on them, the idea that magick is evil is a spell that has been put on religious dogmatists. The idea to just kill or demonize everyone who practices such things and wait for Jesus to save us is the result of the oligarch's tactic for ensuring that nobody challenges them on a practical magickal level. This is their tactic for keeping the masses held back from realizing their true potential on the level of the collective mind.

Activism must become metaphysical, this is in my opinion crucial to make physical activism effective, since the physical emanates from the metaphysical they are intimately intertwined, you cannot make change without changing peoples minds, anything else is a band-aid. Personally I believe that even if there is a group of humans running things behind the scenes they are not really in control, what is in control is the illusionary aspects of the ego, the metaphysical complexes of the collective mind. The archons are autopoietic parasites that share a resemblance to life forms, but are in fact a psycho-spiritual virus infecting us with self perpetuating mental loops or cycles which feed off our neurosis and fear and grow or snowball in their ability to control our minds and take away our free will. Like vampires they cannot entire your house (paradigm) unless invited, but they are manipulative and masters of illusion, they can be seductive and they are aristocratic and parasitic. By provoking fear and other emotional responses they trick us in to ignoring uncorrected mistakes, ignorance and the loops which are their result. They are the true enemy of humanity and there are none more infected than those who believe themselves rulers of this world. We must overcome the archons, the skeletons in the closet of humanity, the ego of humanity which must be dealt with. Humanity ultimately has two choices, tyranny and death, or Anarchy and life. If we can create an Anarchist society then it will be the beginnings of global consciousness, the more people are all truly Anarchist the better things will be, it will be as enlightenment for the Universal mind.

The real battlefield for Earth is not really fought for by armies at all, but with public relations and misinformation, and it is being fought in the collective mind of humanity. They do require consent to do their business whether psychologically or politically and when rulers are humans they do this through propaganda and any form of manipulation they can, but you should never underestimate the simple power of euphemisms in a society that takes everything at face value. The archons may not ask you if you consent to child slavery and devastation of the environment, but when you consent to things like Nike shoes and fancy electronics, you consent to these atrocities and many more. Some say the secret government commissions movies which are used to present us with the truth, to tell us what they are going to do so that we may consent or not (generally tacitly) and they can test the waters. Others think some movies are “synchromystically” communicating messages to warn us, but most of these people are dingbats, yet at the same time both ideas may be true to some degree. Sometimes this is done subconsciously or intuitively but it is quite often done intentionally in such a way as to get people to surrender or doubt their own power. While it is obvious that the oligarchs use the media as a form of mind control and social engineering, to me a more likely scenario is that TV and movie writers are getting ideas from the more far out conspiracy theories and then the conspiracy theorists think the secret government or universe is sending them messages and they come up with even crazier theories for the writers to steal, creating a cycle of fantastical ideas.

Depending on how cosmic and apocalyptic you want to get about the state of the world it could in many ways be said that there is a spiritual war for the collective mind and although this war was not started by Anarchists and truly mystically aware people, it is here being waged on us whether or not we recognize it ourselves. Fundamentalists often admit it and it is actually from them where many of the terms and ideas come from. Their archon disease is spreading ruthlessly and they will and have destroyed all who stand in their way, their goal is nothing less then the total ideological conversion of humanity to the western style of Christian civilization, or whatever other megalomaniacal group they belong to. (its not hard to see there are many such ideologies) I do not wish to destroy Christians, but I must try to stop Christianity from trying to destroy me and the rest of the world. There are many other cultures which are also at fault, but still there is a culture war for the minds of each person, each portion of the universal mind must decide what it believes, what reality it wants to create, but ultimately nothing can come from our current society other than death and enslavement, oppression and tyranny.

We have all hypnotized each other since we all were born, from the beginning of human history, affirming each other into believing the consensus reality. People are constantly trying to hypnotize each other and direct the group dream, this happens so often it goes on unnoticed, it is even often perpetrated unconsciously. Each statement a person communicates to the awareness of another is a proposition to be hypnotized in some sense or another, hypnotized into accepting the affirmation as a true reality, according to context and personal interpretation. Each declarative statement is a spell we cast, when we are believed in the context we intended our spell has succeeded with that person, that is it was our will to transmit an idea and it was successful and thus magick. A lie then is black magick, so be honest punk rockers you fuckers! All forms of information from reality are potential forms of affirming a kind of awareness, any observation you make to yourself about anything is a spell you cast on yourself to shape your own reality. By attuning yourself to nature, to what is already created by nature, rather than what you personally create, you can learn to enter in to the dream time of nature, the rhythms and awareness that is outside the closed systems of human abstraction. This is done not by making affirmations about nature, but through experiencing the present world, life and all around you for what it is. This is in contrast to what we symbolize in our personal languages about some narrow ill defined aspect of our awareness. If we can learn to control our internal and external dialogue, then we can learn to talk ourselves down from the mess we created by taking abstractions about reality at face value.

The war for dreams has been put upon you by the cult of wilful ignorance, a cult who's temples are everywhere and even promoted as "education" in schools. This cult is dedicated to accepting authorities through affirming the idea that information regarding what is really going on in the world is of no concern outside of mainstream information sources, there by directing the awareness of the masses into accepting establishment world views. When people gain such information they see what the authorities mean, that is it literally becomes a reality for them and for the most part, all of the assumptions and prejudices begin to be seen as common sense. All those who consent to accept only mainstream sources of information there by consent to see things the way the mainstream wants them to see, they do not see a problem with this because the mainstream never told them they should and they have no other context of outside sources. All alternative sources of information that a person stumbles upon, often even when based on real life experiences, will be filtered by so much prejudice and be so out of context that all of reality will be skewed according to their assumptions. Since no one in the bourgeois bubble of mainstream culture questions their assumptions, because they assume to do so is trivial, they never really go in to detail about learning what is actually going on in reality.

Anarchy, or a "state" without domination and hierarchies may seem scary, like when this "state" is achieved through entheogens it is possible to have a "bad trip," but once we learn how to handle ourselves in this new awareness, we will soar to realms of bliss that are currently unimaginable. Right now the collective mind is having a bad trip, it is like the ego of a person gripped with fear trying to control every aspect of the experience, the more control is attempted, the more fear and unpleasantness is generated and the more the ego tries to control things. In order to have a good trip we must relax and let go and most importantly stop trying to control everything and everyone. What gets someone into a "bad trip" is believing they have no power and wanting things to be unnatural, that is they refuse to go with the flow and want to set up their limited illusion of order, but it is the resistance to this natural state without archons and the fear of it that causes the unpleasant experiences and we see the same thing in current state of the world. This physical plane could be seen as the process of humanity becoming Anarchist, I believe this to be more or less analogous to the spiritual progress of the collective mind, the more we become an Anarchist society the more evolved the universal mind. The wars and political games that go on are really just the different aspects of the global mind vying for control of consensus reality, what we need is a healthy consensus, a unanimous consensus of Anarchism, when this happens we will all become more aware than any humans have ever been.

Archons keep us subservient through subtle or not so subtle influencing on TV and by keeping us working in unnecessarily mind numbing jobs so that all individual thought is stamped out by a need for conformity. "They threw mankind into great distraction and into a life of toil, so that their mankind might be occupied by worldly affairs." For the most part, those who are not aware of the big picture, of the global condition of humanity are the blind, these people will follow anyone who directs them and who they believe can see the way, for what choice do they have? Go with the herd or get run down by forces you do not perceive, but there is a third alternative, you can open your eyes and help others to do so, so that everyone can see they are being led to the slaughterhouse or sacrificial altar.

This is the war between those who would make humanity into slaves and those who would set it free, this is done on the long term, throughout many lifetimes because we are all immortal. How do you kill an immortal? Make them unaware of their divine nature and they will die endlessly, reincarnating into worlds where you control the environment and the information they receive, all this so that they will never realize what is really possible and who they are. There is no them and us in the normal sense, we must set all souls free, even those so infected by archons they will seek to destroy us all. If someone perceives another as an authority, someone who knows better than them, then it is only a matter of convincing them to surrender their logic, that they cannot be trusted to make their own decisions, to do what they feel is wrong by telling them its the best way things can be, that it's what is really moral according to some comforting limited image of truth. If you can trick people into thinking anything but what you say is evil and that they are better than everyone else if they do what you say, then you will really have them and you can create a prison world that they do not even perceive. If you can make them think they are free and make them scared of the truth then they will be your slaves. This is more or less the world we live in, how it started in this direction I cannot say for certain, what I do know is that it must be changed if humanity is to ever know peace and truth.

Today Indigenous peoples on reservations are essentially refugees in concentration camps, left over from the North or South American final solution. They are illegal cultures, and there has been a very real attempt to wipe them out and today to at least wipe their cultures out. This is the attempted obliteration of the Shamanic ecstatic experience of divine consciousness, as well as reverence for nature and the model of egalitarian and in many cases nearly Anarchist forms of society that Indigenous peoples used to enjoy. In many ways the Indigenous peoples of North and South America present the greatest threat to western civilization because they present the most contrary form of culture and understanding, for this reason they will never be shown as equals or valid people, at best only as quaint and noble but ignorant savages. In the modern day America, Natives have been trapped between cultures, they have no place in a western society which is so hostile to them culturally, if not directly racist and their own traditional way of life has been more or less been made impossible. Today Native culture is inundated by the stigma of alcoholism and welfare culture, this is just one more tactic which I fully believe was consciously put in place by westerners to make sure that true Native culture does not spread to westerners and that the survivors of the genocide are too emotionally and economically crippled to organize much resistance. (The archons also feed off their pain)

Entheogens can potentially be used to face the archons, but they are not automatically beneficial without proper use. What we need is not some entheogenic mono culture that can be imposed globally, but a tolerance of different ideas, letting each individual take from different societies the beneficial customs and ideas that can transform society for the better. We must try and allow for maximum fluid flexibility and variety of beliefs and cultures among differing people. In this way entheogens can help, but it is foolish to think taking them alone is enough when set and setting and intention are all so crucial. Even if entheogens can show us how to solve our problems, it is still up to us humans to actually follow through. There are many people who have taken enormous amounts of psychedelics and have not benefited from it spiritually, some even become addicts of hard drugs because their intention is to escape from reality, however these people are generally totally unaware of how to use them spiritually or that such an idea even really exists at all.

Human sacrifice is often a meme in western culture that is denigrated and used as a way of making ourselves feel superior and surely there are better ways of going about things, but it is blind arrogance and hypocrisy that condemns Aztec practices, yet was responsible for Witch burnings, and in fact the genocide of the Aztecs themselves. The practices of the Aztecs were a cake walk compared to the practices of western civilization, much of which was done in the name of Christ and as far as I am concerned is no different than human sacrifice. Along with Indigenous peoples, Pagans and the Witches sacrificed to Christ on the fires, there was also the Cathars and other Christian heretics with Gnostic sensibilities. There was even a crusade, called the Albigensian crusade in which the church led an army to wipe out the Cathars and it is from this which we get the phrase “kill them all and let god sort them out.” The Aztecs are different in that westerners are much more proficient at this kind of black magick, westerners have more knowledge of propaganda, as well as more of a materialist greed for gold in mind when it came to choosing their victims. In fact most of the Aztec's victims were prisoners of war, in battles which far fewer people usually died than what was happening in Europe and so it is kind of like saying that no one can execute prisoners in a spiritual way, or pray during the process, something which Christians and many cultures have certainly done. The Spanish would have priests standing by with holy water as they disemboweled pregnant Native women and while the intention may have been to baptize the baby, both mother and child generally died in the process and so it is no better than human sacrifice and definitely its own form of insanity. Other examples of human sacrifice like those of Celtic society were usually criminals, prisoners of war or more often than one might think, volunteers and so once again we see that Christian propaganda has twisted things for their own cultural imperialism and their bigotry has become the unquestioned norm.

It is easy to demonize the Aztec gods or other Pagan gods which have had cults of human sacrifice, (which has more to do with the creation of a priest class and hierarchy than the gods themselves) all the while ignoring all the various ways our civilization kills for its ideals, its archons. Even today human, animal and environmental sacrifice goes on in the name of capitalism, this is done in terms of sweat shops, deforestation, factory farming, fur trade and the robbery and murder which is rife within the third world. To this day Native populations are made to suffer, as well as all third world populations, these people are deemed worthy of sacrifice to our archon G.O.D.S, or Gold, Oil, Drugs and Slavery.

It is easy for people today so disconnected from the source of the meat that makes their meals to condemn the religions of the past for animal sacrifice, yet you can be sure all those animals who died ritualistically lived a much better life than any animal today who goes through the industrialized animal abuse of a factory farm. While the blood or entrails would have been offered to the gods, most animals “sacrificed” were actually eaten in public feasts, held in honour of the gods at festivals which were often really wild parties. So in reality “animal sacrifice” is more like saying grace, or giving thanks than how Christian culture has portrayed it and in fact this image comes from Christian propaganda seeking to demonize other religions. This is true even though Jews certainly performed animal sacrifices, though they did not always eat the goat, for example one goat would be sacrificed to Yahweh, another would be the receptacle for all the sins of the community and it would be sent out to the desert to die and it would be for Satan AKA Azazel. (Azazel is a demon whose name is the Hebrew word for scapegoat) According to most today the Aztecs were evil and stupid because they killed to make sure the sun would rise and the whole world could live, yet our sacrifice's are made to our own personal greed. Aztecs with all their problems were freer and more democratic than Europeans at the time and even arguably America today and so we should take a good long look at ourselves before we condemn or try to “civilize” other people.

Even in atheist science we see sacrifice of humans and undoubtedly of animals, all in the name of experiment, often for useless corporate products in the religion of “progress” through capitalism reaching some abstract and long promised utopia, or heaven on Earth. I have even heard scientists use the word “sacrifice” as a metaphor for such experiments, but animals are so different from humans that such experiments are generally worthless, for example what if we tested Chocolate on dogs? No one would think it is safe to eat! In terms of medical practices the most extreme examples publicly known are the works of Joseph Mengele on the Jews, African Americans in the Tuskegee experiments and the infection of Guatemalans with syphilis, these may not have consciously been considered human sacrifice, but these people who were sacrificed for science were not really even seen as human. (the cult of eugenics is another clear example) How many animals have been tortured and died in the name of cosmetics alone? These are certainly not the only sacrifices made in the name of science. So it is our human sacrifice makes the practices of “primitives” pale in comparison and yet we claim the moral superiority because we personally profit more from it. I am not against slaughtering animals ritually so long as they lived in decent conditions and were killed as humanely as possible, which were two conditions that went back to ancient days. It is considered very bad juju if the animal flinched or showed fear, or if it was not killed cleanly and quickly.

The hypocrisy of our rulers is all just another level of the battle for the collective mind, which is fought by controlling the collective view of events. Do not be fooled, many a soul has been sacrificed in the name of Coca Cola, or General Electric. How many people have died for Uncle Sam? Or the Goddess of “liberty” Libertas AKA Columbia? Today these gods of the American empire have overshadowed the European versions of Libertas, in England this is Britannia, the French have the goddess Marianne, the Spanish have Hispania and the German state is represented by their goddess Germania. Together they form a religion of pain and western oppression, they are no doubt the hungriest and most demanding of Gods and regularly require fresh blood to be spilled in their name. However there are far more nations than this which have been represented by personifications, for example “Mother Russia” or “Mother India” and while there are male examples, it is curious that so many of these personifications are liberty goddess's. Collectively I refer to these goddess's as Columbia, but all personifications of nation states are without a doubt archons, so that if metaphysics is real, these archons must have severe metaphysical implications.

During the French Revolution even atheists created the “cult of reason” and actually worshipped Marianne as a goddess of reason! They saw her as a personification, but it is just one more example of the theocratic tendencies of any power structure, even atheist ones. Libertas, or the goddess of liberty herself cannot be demonized without demonizing the concept of liberty itself, so while a symbol can be used to enslave, it does not mean that the symbol or even those things which it represents are “evil.” Even if her modern forms have their roots in old conspiracies and theocracies, many people associated with Marianne for a variety of reasons, she even found her way in to Anarchist propaganda at times, both in a negative and positive light. So instead of slandering the Occult or a symbol as being purely “demonic” or “evil,” it is much more accurate to say that archons or rulers co-opt the symbols of revolution in order to create a new authoritarian hierarchy. (Germania is even often depicted with marijuana or hemp, due to her original association with Freya.) The archons do not have creativity, the rulers of this world, even if they are magicians do not create the symbols of magick, they take them over and use Occult technologies for authoritarian ambitions. This is one more reason there can never be an orthodoxy or authority as to what Anarchism is and that so long as there is hierarchy, even an internal hierarchy, liberty herself will be used to destroy freedom, that the more credible a symbol, the more the archons will try to co-opt it. We might jump the gun and hopelessly try to stop using all symbols of freedom, but we would be better off becoming monist magicians and learn to know our minds beyond the abstract and when we do that, we will know how to properly use symbols without being controlled by them.

This goes on everyday, every second, I cannot think of how many have died in just the time it took me to write this page, all in the name of sacrifice, some distant promise of a good life in exchange for blood and death, capitalism is clearly a cult of death more powerful than anything before it. What is important to recognize with true sacrifice is that it is not really about placating the gods or trying to bargain with them, sacrifice is about the causality of deciding to give up one thing for another, you sacrifice your place on Earth and your human ego in order to go to be more divine. The sacrifice of human and animal life is only good when those beings truly desire it themselves and usually this is not the case, never when it comes to animals and so it is all really a sacrifice to the ego and to your worldly self, which means the death or sacrifice of the spiritual self.

When we consume in an unsustainable way we are worshipping death itself, we sacrifice all manner of nature, animals and humans (at least partially through human labour as well as through pollution caused by unnecessarily hazardous industry) in this way we show our allegiance to be on the side of destruction and doom in return for short term ego gratification. Each purchase is a magickal ritual paying homage to all that lowers consciousness. Do not hate the physical world as Gnostics are often misrepresented as doing, but love all life and consciousness, all things have some spark of life in them, even the rocks and streams, lakes and the sky. It is arguable that even cars and factories and all man made things have a life of their own, how often do people personify objects like boats and all manner of things and although we shouldn't hate these objects, we should understand unfettered industrialism to produce useless crap at great cost to the environment and ourselves is not maximizing consciousness and life on this planet.

Capitalism is not an efficient way of preserving the ecosystems that allow all life forms to live. Forests are better at creating consciousness and life energy than garbage dumps and coal burning power plants, for this reason we must stop sacrificing to corporate archon god forms that do not have any real life, stop worshipping governments and systems that proliferate death and which are in many ways the self feeding reservoirs of all that death energy. It is the system that we must defeat, not the physical world, the original physical world was all life and it is the systems which spread ignorance and all that imprison the soul. All things that are physical are alive, but some things are symbiotic, part of an ecosystem and some things destroy the environment. It is the system that has tricked us into believing in it and worshipping it, even though it is the one thing that is not alive, that doesn't even exist outside of the twisted imagination of black magicians. We must return to a way of life that helps to spread as much life as possible, to return to balance and connection to the life systems which do truly exist and which quite literally created us. We must abandon authoritarian idolatry and “worship” real life forces which we discover according to our nature, forces that were once all around us, and which continue to call us home.

Even if we are to transcend this physical realm, we must ensure that it remains intact so that all other souls, even if they be non human may have a livable and sane reality to exist in while they learn the truth of their own divinity. Abandoning other souls to the mercies of despots, especially those which you are essentially one with is not something an enlightened person would do. Perhaps the best Anarchists can do is damage control, keeping the archons from destroying everything, but never fully overcoming them on this plane, even so it is only through total rejection of archons that we can escape them, resistance to hierarchy is resistance to ignorance. Even if Anarchists can never win decisively does not mean we should give up, or that we do not make the world a better place than it would be without such actions. The longer we can preserve nature or freedom the better off we are and if one life can be made free, the Earth is still worth living in and is still worth fighting for. If we do not connect the journey of all other souls to our own and act only selfishly, then we will never have the divine knowledge and state of mind that it takes to return to the metaphysical source of all. After all, the forests and oceans and all the rest are all extensions of you as well, so by saving the natural life systems you are saving yourself and to do otherwise is to pursue suicide. This is not a threat of eternal hellfire, it is the reality that there are consequences to your actions, even if you can't see the connection between your purchases and the destruction caused by manufacturing, it is real and we all will be held accountable.

From the perspective of a consensus reality, the wars of Earth are analogous of the war inside the universal mind and within each of ours, in the same way that various archon memes compete for your attention and energy, various governments and corporations want to enslave you as well. In war the soldiers are personifications of different ideological belief patterns, though each soldier from a country will have at least some differing views, they have consented to represent their country, their peoples dominant archons. This may seem like an exaggeration, but when you recognize the numerous Occult symbols found on their uniforms, it is clear they represent archetypal energies which have been empowered through the glamour of propaganda spells. A medal is nothing but a talisman, given to someone who empowered their military's archon through some "brave" and generally stupid action, just look at the iron cross, or the medal of honour, or silver star etc, they are indistinguishable from ancient Occult symbols. Likewise many badges, the oak leaves officers wear, the stars of generals, all these have very specific Occult meaning and armies such as the Romans had red uniforms because red is the colour of Mars.

Armies clash and mix to form new orders, soldiers are the most obedient servants to their various archon masters, different pools of vampiric energy trying to manifest a reality through black magick of their own dominance over the other group, attempting to spread their empire throughout all known physical consciousness. Once a people have been conquered by foreign invaders cultural assimilation to the now dominant archons begins and extermination of the old memes follows, all so that the newly conquered people's magickal energy, can empower the triumphant archons which exist to impose their kind of consensus reality. This is perhaps easier to see in more ancient cultures where war was overtly ritualized, from the Aztecs to notions of Bushido with Samurai or many other cultures, it was understood that there were certain rules and procedures for the battles and war, which are in effect the rules of the ritual sacrifice. Then with Abrahamic religions came zealots and the advent of total war, then the ritualism became increasingly covert and the battles more ruthless. The best example of this is most likely being the second world war, with the well documented Occult practices and symbolism of the Nazis, another good example is of course the crusades which was blatantly a battle of "gods." Still the fact remains, all wars are wars for consensus reality, using violence to try and intimidate people in to surrendering their power and consent through treaties to an archon of some type or another, religious or secular.

If you study the history of war and have an understanding of numerology and Occult holidays (holy days) and symbolism then it becomes very tempting to say that soldiers are literally sacrificed wearing Occult symbols on auspicious days in order to feed the archons. Days on the cusp of the zodiac signs changing, usually the 21st, or 22nd of the month seem to pop up again and again, but through numerology and astrology it is possible to find many correspondences between historical dates and Occult meaning. How much is coincidence is hard to say, but there is more than chance would provide and it is undeniable that Hitler and Reagan used astrology. (The Federal Reserve act was passed the day after the winter solstice, or the cusp of Capricorn and Sagittarius, the presidential inauguration is January 20 etc) The idea that there is a group of black magicians conducting these blood rituals to feed their demonic overlords can be tempting and while the symbolism does point in this kind of direction, any government carrying out any war, with or without any kind of symbolism or date is essentially conducting human sacrifice, whether or not they are conscious of it, the archons are controlling them. Many countries do have a long history of incorporating magick in to their governments, indeed since religion is just institutionalized and hierarchical magick, any government which worked with religious figures, had prayers and so used magick.

No government can conduct a truthful war, since all hierarchy is based on lies and ignorance, so all actions of the government are ignorant as well. Surely defending your people is "legitimate" and we might even consent to some special war time hierarchy, but no government should exist in the first place, so it is all just a charade, a giant game of fools consenting to die for powers and some preferential memes, almost none of which they actually understand. We can say for certainty that the American establishment currently controls the majority of the world, has the most powerful military and corporations and so it is that the American empire is essentially a one world government. I would go further and say that international banking cartels and other corporations are more powerful than the president and essentially control America and that the two party system is a lie to create the illusion of choice. These cartels use the American military as their primary muscle, however there are always other governments, other archons who would love to be top dog and are willing to fight for that power. While the international banking cartels may have once been more powerful, it is questionable that they control Russia and China today and given Islam's avoidance of usury they have struggled to fully colonize the middle east. (an often overlooked reason for the wars there) There is also some good news in that some Latin American countries have to some degree managed to break free from their grip and now have more independence since pre-Columbian times. (There are a few other pockets of resistance here and there as well)

In the same way that European aristocracy, or world mafia organizations are fraught with deceit and ruthless individuals killing each other to climb up the pyramid, the oligarchs of today are not above betraying each other, or making temporary alliances, those who ruthlessly pursue power will do whatever they think will increase their power. For this reason, even if there is a one world government, which plays up supposed rivalries and wars for human sacrifice, these are the kind of people who would betray each other as soon as it profits them, which is in many ways indistinguishable from how various wars are portrayed in mainstream propaganda. The question is not really is there a one world government, the interdependency of the global capitalist economy has successfully created a New World Order and since governments write the laws this has been achieved more or less legally. The real question is why anyone would support organizations which at their core demand human sacrifice and perpetuate eternal conflict?

Hitler is the obvious example of mass manipulation and the kind of horrors the majority is capable of placing over the minorities. Even mainstream historians admit Hitler was involved in Occult practices, so while an atheist may not believe in such things, it is clear that rulers do use aspects of it for their own gain. It is clear to me he knew full well about the manifesting properties of metaphysics and intentionally harnessed the will of the people for his own "triumph of the will." Himmler, the head of the SS was also in control of Occult ceremonies, probably even more than Hitler, with his SS headquarters at Wewelsburg castle he planned to make it the religious centre of the new Nazi religion. In the castle basement, Himmler and 12 leading SS generals representing the zodiac carried out all kinds of ceremonies based on worship of the "black sun," as represented by the Nazi forms of the swastika, which is itself a symbol used in a variety of ancient traditions. "SS" was not actually made by the letter "S" but a rune and all SS knives bore the death head symbol and were ritually charged with energy, as knives are themselves ritual props. One more of many links between Nazis and the Occult is Rudolf Hess, who along with being the "deputy fuhrer" was an astrologer and studied the Occult in general and one of his projects was mapping out the ley lines of the third Reich.

One of the reasons Hitler wanted to eradicate the Jews was probably because of the power of the Kabbalah and his fear of magickal powers attacking would contribute to his attempt to eradicate the Gypsies and Freemasons as well. It is documented that Hitler did close down all kinds of Occult lodges in his conquered territory and set up his own SS lodges. The SS actually had many expeditions around the world, such as to Tibet and Antarctica which had Occult theories in mind, looking for Shambhala or the "hollow Earth." Most people think they understand how insane Nazi racism was, but it gets even crazier than the usual crap, it was not based purely on theories of evolution, but the idea that the Aryan race was divine, from the mythical land of Hyperborea, or Thule, and somehow connected to the hollow Earth and mythology of Agartha otherwise known as Shambhala. Nazis clearly believed some far out stuff, even by the standards of Occultists, and if they had won the war their alternative histories would of been taught in schools, pointing out just how tenuous our grasp of history is when it is written by the winners. One thing is clear, Hitler did see his hatred of Jews in Occult terms, that he was engaged in a mystical battle for the planet against "the elders of Zion" who according to anti-Semites looking to turn all Jews into scape goats, have their own Occult intentions for conquering the world. (Whether or not it is true, Hitler basically believed it)

It is clear that Hitler didn't want any magickal competitors working against him, this theory is even more substantiated if you believe Hitler was in communication with etheric entities. This theory is complicated but well documented, if it is true it must of been archons contacted through various rituals such as those of the Thule society, a German Occult group that played some part in helping Hitler's rise to power. It has also been said by Hitler's private secretary that he would occasionally have seizures and was frightened terribly of certain entities, seizures of course having been shown to produce in some people a variety of kinds of visions. Epilepsy would even in certain cultures mean the person had a calling to be a Shaman, though Hitler obviously was no Shaman in the traditional sense, he was a heavy user of amphetamines and had also been prescribed opiates. There is evidence which suggests he may have had syphilis and some other ailments which would have made him extra crazy and so he was prescribed these drugs to help him function. It is interesting to note that when the Germans really started to lose the war, Hitler claimed it was because "their will wasn't strong enough," the will of course is the most crucial element of any kind of magick. The examples of Nazi Occultism are numerous and well documented, they are also beyond the scope of this book, suffice to say do not let the gross Nazi distortions of Germanic Paganism scare you off from an amazing religion.

While the Nazis were overtly Occultists, it is difficult to say just how conscious the rest of the world's governments are of their service to the metaphysical entities created by their work, however we should not doubt that they are completely insane in their own way and capable of such things. Certainly the British and American governments have a lot of blood on their hands, if you total up their entire history each of them has killed more than the Nazis and certainly cannot be held up as champions of anti racism. Within the US government, state crests, various departments of the federal government are rife with Occult symbolism, generally of a Masonic character, even the street designs of Washington DC show the significance of Occultism in American history.

Aleister Crowley worked for the British government as a consultant about Nazi Occultism, apparently suggesting the V for victory hand gesture to Churchill as a kind of Occult gang sign to destroy your enemies. He was also involved with British intelligence during both world wars, not to mention rumours of him doing rituals to kill Nazis magically. (Dione Fortune engaged in magical warfare against the Nazis as well, though not in a government capacity.) Of course this is just scratching the surface of the strange government involvement of this man, which certainly makes him suspect of many conspiracy theories, most noticeably involving the rocket scientist Jack Parsons and the man from naval intelligence, one L. Ron Hubbard. It's all far too much to go in to here, but old Crowley certainly had some unsavoury connections, another example being the English Fascist Major General JFC Fuller. Crowley was probably mostly in to it for his own ego gratification, as he would not be able to pass up playing spy, he probably thought he was playing them, and they probably thought they were playing him. He was a patriot however and fighting Nazis isn't really something to be ashamed of, he is still worth reading and considering as an Occultist, just make sure you understand he is not to be idolized or trusted about anything and you will be fine. There are of course other conspiracies as he did openly claim to be working for a "great white brotherhood" or "secret chiefs" who secretly direct world events, but then he also spoke out against the "black brothers." "You can take or leave all this as you want and I certainly don't worry about it, but to explain quickly, the black brothers are basically black magicians who didn't have the guts to go through with ego death and instead focus only on power and so Crowley and the white brotherhood saw themselves in opposition to these forces. (Christian conspiracy theorists think in black and white and always leave out that side of it, preferring to only demonize Crowley.) Even Ian Fleming had some Occult knowledge and actually had a connection to Crowley during the war and recommended him for the interrogation of Nazi Occultist Rudolph Hess.

Going back to queen Elizabeth, her court astrologer and magician John Dee was also the founder of British intelligence, literally the original 007, actually coining the term "British Empire" he had a strong influence on the planning of colonization and British expansionism. Among other things he claimed that British people such as the legendary King Arthur had been to America and so had a claim to the land. He and the Alchemist Edward Kelley are also credited with creating or discovering perhaps the most complex and powerful form of western magick we have today, interestingly it divides the world up in to areas ruled by "angels" though the exact nature of these entities is definitely contested. Known as “Enochian magick” it is in many ways an ideal system for conquering the world, if there is a case to be made for black magicians ruling the world, they would have a hard time coming up with a better system. Just as the angelic orders of either “dominions” or “principalities” rules the countries of the world in regular Christian theology, in the Enochian system there is an angel for each country and so by evoking and controlling a particular angel, you could theoretically control the archon or angel of a particular country. Given John Dee's clear imperialist ambitions it is not a stretch at all to think that he would attempt to use this system to take over the world for England, we could even say it is Protestant magick to counter the Catholics. Occult tradition holds that Dee was the inspiration for Shakespeare's play “the tempest” because he was given credit for calling up the storm that sunk the Spanish armada which threatened to invade England. I do not believe Enochian inherently “evil” but the spirits which are called upon certainly have curious behaviour for “angels.” Enochian has a variety of Gnostic elements such as 30 aethyrs which could correspond to the 30 aeons of Gnosticism, it is enough to make me wonder if some of the “angels” are not more like aeons or archons, but then all Christian angels are archons.

The life of John Dee makes for very interesting historical reading and it is far too complicated to go in to here, suffice to say he helped to secure England's protestant revolution and played a very significant role in western Occultism and was in his time one of the most respected “scientists” and mathematicians in Europe. John Dee and the Tudors forged alliances with alchemical Bohemian aristocrats like Rudolph II and Fredrick V Elector Palatine which leads to the 30 years war with the tyrannical Hapsburgs of the “Holy Roman Empire.” Some say John Dee's associate Edward Kelley was nothing but a con artist who took John Dee for a fool, but to me this is an overly simplistic answer put out by atheists in order to explain Enochian magick. This argument is based on the idea that Dee and Kelley were commanded to swap wives and loosen up sexually, but if they met with real spirits this could well have happened. Given that Dee founded British intelligence and was a spy, it is safe to say he was no naive fool, he was also perhaps the smartest man in Europe at the time, so I think these critics do not give him enough credit. If he was a con, given the way Enochian was created, in order to be credible, Kelley would have had to have been an even bigger genius himself, with an enormous amount of Occult knowledge. However authentic magicians are often simultaneously tricksters, not to mention the spirits they encounter. So then to me, given that Edward Kelley accompanied Dee on his travels through Europe, it is far more likely that Kelley was himself recruited as a spy by Dee.

A person cannot understand history without understanding the Occult influences upon it, whether or not you believe metaphysics is real, this omission from mainstream history is itself part of the Occult manipulation the people go through. For example there is the curious role of Rasputin discrediting the Russian royal family, as well as Cogliostro helping to discredit the French royal family, that while it's possible their intentions weren't to spread freedom, I like to think they acted knowing it would lead to revolution and that their intentions were to destroy the governments. While most would be quick to point out these characters as frauds and charlatans and in some ways they probably were, conning greedy aristocrats out of their money and helping the poor as they did is exactly how I would expect an enlightened person to act. (Gives new meaning to Alchemists making gold!) Rasputin belonged to some kind of weird antinomian Christian sect and some conspiracy theorists link him to the Rothschilds, but it's hard to say for sure, much of this theory seems to rest solely on the fact that among others he helped out oppressed Jews in Russia. I especially like Cogliostro, but conspiracy theorists hate all Freemasons and so see him as working for the Rothschilds as well, (again its hard to say) but to my knowledge he does seem to have some real spiritual knowledge and created an Egyptian form of Masonry and also made Masonry open to women for the first time. Cogliostro claimed to be able to read hieroglyphics (before Champollion) which is not as far fetched as it may sound, since Islamic scholars translated them using Coptic a thousand years or so earlier and no doubt hieroglyphics have a variety of magickal and Qabbalah like meanings beyond the superficial readings. No one can deny the Freemason's played a role in the French revolution, but what is open to interpretation is their motivations and we must remember there are plenty of valid reasons for wanting to overthrow monarchies and the Catholic church, you don't need to be Satanic, you just need to love freedom and truth. Even if the Rothschilds did play a hand in these revolutions (as all plutocrats try their best to manipulate all politics) we must be careful not to over simplify things and demonize Cagliostro and Rasputin simply because they do not conform to the Christian religion. There is also the fact that Gandhi was heavily inspired by the teachings of Theosophy, but since he is but one of many remarkable minds influenced by that philosophy, (not always for the better) it is clear that what we know of history is but a dim shadow of the reality.

All this points not so much to a world controlled by a monolithic group of elite black magicians controlling the world, but the reality that all governments, even those with good intentions are fundamentally organizations of black magick. This also indicates that the revolutionary drive is given form by Occult forces but become corrupted, unless it can maintain its Anarchist core. While I have listed some historic examples of the rulers using Occult forces its important to keep in mind the more common Anarchist examples of Occult revolution are even more ignored by mainstream historians and generally destroyed by those who conquer them. Since the archons obviously control this world, they have done everything they can to destroy all knowledge of real spirituality and instead present it as authoritarian mind control, a historian may doubt my claims, but it is obvious enough why their aren't many ancient documents of overtly revolutionary heretical Occult groups, especially when they spoke in code or had oral traditions. However the intention of this book is not to provide an in depth historical survey of Anarchist Occultism, or of oligarchical Occultism, but for those who look in to it it is clear that since Occultists have access to the fountain head of culture, they have a particular ability for directing the flow of history, allowing those blinded by egoism to be quite successful if they wish to chase after power.

All government officials take part in this consensus war, all forms of hierarchy demand domination of people and so all those who work to strengthen a hierarchy, work to strengthen the archon which personifies that organization. The domestic variation of this consensus war are the police, each with a badge or magickal talisman that gives them authority, often a six or five pointed star, or some other variety of Occult symbol marking them as the archon's security forces. Police demand that no one step outside their archons prescribed rules, which may euphemistically "keep the peace" by ensuring those who are screwed over can never fight back against their masters. Archons are the real "thought police" and they live inside your head, infecting people and inspiring them to become regular police or soldiers so as to enforce the status quo, the authoritarian version of consensus reality. Once a government archon has taken hold of the minds of a people, it is the police who are used to present the illusion that the government is there to protect people, that the people should be grateful for their enslavement. More importantly the function of the police is to crush any dissent before it can turn in to an insurrection, minorities are brutalized because any break from conformity weakens the memetic integrity of the system and so long as the people are divided by petty things like race, they cannot unite to fight their real enemies. Not to mention the fact the police protect the wealth of the ruling class from the poor so that the human administrators of the government archon and economy can remain in power.

Personally I do not think any one person has absolute control over the world, or even all the governments, but it is obvious that the biggest egos of the world run it and so are controlled by archons, just not necessarily in such a concrete or paranormal manner as all the leaders being alien reptilian shape shifters! One thing is certain though, that some high up people at least used to use Occult symbolism in a very direct and conscious way, but I don't think that anyone who isn't at the top of the conspiracy could say exactly how it works. Paranoia, disinformation, mistakes and flat out charlatanism are so rife within conspiracy circles that whatever truth is there is highly obscured by other peoples theories, which come into conflict with the one that is correct. All you would have to do as a government agent is create some ridiculous theory, then if anyone big in the conspiracy community disagrees with them, they only have to accuse that person of being a shill and part of the conspiracy, or better yet accuse them of being mind controlled and then the people studying these things become even more divided. What most conspiracy theorists do not understand is that black magicians work by spreading fear, so it is very much in their interests to make would be revolutionaries think they are all powerful wizards with demonic or alien help and there isn't anything they can do about it. In fact even if there is demonic archons helping them, they are doing it by spreading fear and so rather than making people afraid of the government, the best thing to do is spread courage and ultimately Anarchism since it is the most fearless of societies.

What becomes more apparent the more I research such things is that ultimately it doesn't matter which individuals are doing what, yes there are all kinds of terrifying conspiracies out there which are real, but what is even more scary is that people should be rebelling against the system even if the news never lied and everything was as it seemed. Even if all the other stuff really is going on it does no good to put an end to a secret government when the systems that allowed it to take shape (ideas that hierarchy is just and good) are still accepted by most people, cutting off the head does no good when you are trying to replace it with a new one. The real rulers of the world are the archons, the memes of hierarchy which control the minds of almost all people and it is only by spreading awareness about how to deal with them and how people can rule themselves, that we can overcome the problems of the world and bring peace and freedom.

Past moments

When everything in the world seems to be wrong, I might as well just sing a song,
Just to feel alive, even if it only makes me feel like I want to die,
Just to be the rock and roll Bodhisattva, the one who teaches the partiers to come right at ya.
In the eye of the storm, peace through hunger,
The best world is the one that never loses its wonder.
Where are we going and would we all be better off not knowing?
The best seeds are wild, the ones which give fruit yet don't need our sowing .
How long do you think you can run from the sweet truth? How long do you think I can?
We're on our way whether we want to be or not, some just look directly to the plan,
Others look to the sky or the ground but they never hear a sound.
Worthless words and thoughts to all those who know what I mean, and to those who don't I should really only scream.
Do your best to make your way, don't ever listen to what I say,
It seems so wrong that everything is right, but maybe we all just love to fight.
To wake up in the dream that this is everyone's nightmare,
When they speak of material things, it's hard not to sit and stare.
Sit in a hole where you think you can account for all things,
But whats worse then knowing everything that fate will bring?
My own world was always bigger than ours, I am lost inside my high resolution ivory tower.
Acid corroding a problem to make a solution, deception arising in great profusion.
Have mercy because all will feel these things, even if they never thought they had,
But these are the things that unite us and they are the farthest things from bad.
I am with you even if you cant read this, we'll meet one day when we see it as bliss.

Chapter 11 – Pressure

When it comes right down to it, we humans controlled by our egos have one thing in mind, how much can I reinforce my sense of self? How can I empower my memes and archons? How can I use my identity to get what I want in the world? The process of overcoming this ignorance has definitely made it hard for me to socialize with other people, trying to limit the ego, seeing that I am not my memes makes it hard to present myself with a coherent relatable identity, no doubt living in this way has become increasingly isolating. I am not sure how much longer I can live this way and yet I know I cannot honestly live any other way. I have become too honest for my own good. As an Anarchist I am not bound by any imaginary set of rules, I follow only my own sense of justice which is apparently more closely attended to than other people, who more often than not rely on the “moral majority” for guidance. If you accept the authorities' and society's claims to know what is right then why bother to question it? Standing up for what you really believe is no easy job when the whole world seems to be going down the toilet and all the while dancing to MTV. The only people more rejected than someone with sub culture memes is someone who can see through memes and ego mind games. Even the most moral people with the best intentions have proven untrustworthy to me in that no one seems to understand who they really are and anyone who lies to themselves cannot be honest with anyone else. I do not feed people's power trips or reinforce their hypnotic trance of who they tell themselves they are and so I do not fit anyone's agenda.

Evil if it is anything is determined only by a lack of love, so what is justice in such a world and how are we to make it a reality? People must find the beautiful peace of living in balance with the truth which will lead to love for all, so it is justice is not a pound of flesh and can only exist in total Anarchy and cooperation, for justice is perfect freedom. All injustice is a violation of some being's freedom and so we must balance the scales and realize it is the middle way we should take, sustainable cultures which provide equality through neutrality of memetic values. The duty of all those who love justice is to restore equality after someone has violated it, that is perfect freedom necessitates equality and so we must restore perfect freedom by correcting ignorance and taking the right action to create sustainable justice, rather than just terrorist government protection rackets. Above the stormiest clouds is always a clear sky waiting to reveal the sun which has been hidden from view. Living by words is very different from living by actions, knowing the truth is very different from living the truth. Let your heart be as light as a feather, justice, like love is blind and so realize all values are weighed through duality and that freedom from the merchant who placed the scales in her hand, with all his loaded measures, comes from taking that hand in yours, as you would a lover's and with that the adjustments of life become an act of love. For that merchant with his “uniform commercial codes” of authoritarian conduct would sell us tyranny and corruption, for “property is theft” and Anarchy is unity, the balance of all things from which the truth is found.

People who make little to no effort to develop their consciousness cannot begin to understand what it means to have an expanded consciousness, otherwise they would have that level of consciousness. So when two people meet with a large gap in awareness it can no doubt create a lot of misunderstandings, those who really know and understand themselves often forget what its like to be ignorant and those who are ignorant generally try and make everyone into versions of themselves. As an Anarchist I cannot say one person is better than another but I can say a functional society depends on people who are both socially and self aware, but in order to be really socially aware, to know how you effect other people, you need to know who you really are and what you really want. This goes beyond knowing what memes you like, to knowing what motivates you, when you are lying to yourself and how you can work on your less healthy personality traits.

Anarchy Nazis

Surrealistic punkers skip merrily to the liquor store for life,
We've been raised to think revolution can be bought for a bargain of a price,
Punch anyone who looks at you even remotely funny, stab em in the eye and take all their money.
Rebel against everyone most especially against yourself,
Do what I say and think individually and nothing else.
Walk ten miles in your own shoes and have anal sex within infected prostitutes, Carnality always cures the blues, searching through your motives will uncover all my clues.
A heroine of hedonism desensitizes with pure pleasure for no discernible reason, Cutting off the governments head and making robots roam naked is my kind of treason.
Selfish misconceptions say the world is fucked, so keep on raping it, Punish them for your pain they don't have feeling anyway.
When you seek worth for only yourself, you will only ever know discontent,
But when no one wants the only thing you give, dissolution is the sentiment.
Peace and War are things we ignore,
Till a shot to the head sends freedom out the door.
The law of the land is to obey the iron hand, always buy name brand or live as a freak making a stand.
Evolve to solve miseries resolve over the human fate that is barring the gate,
Paradise is a carrot tied from a stick,
We keep trying to follow it but we're getting nowhere quick.
Who's holding it is the man behind the scenes,
Like a demon we all blame him for the death of all our dreams.
If you run away they'll keep biting at your heels,
Drugs will never be an escape though some may show you the 7 seals.
Most will think you less than human, even when they give free meals,
To hell with tolerance when there is no understanding of another's mind,
Synthetic self righteous charity for the delusion of being kind,
Chemical nihilism perceived as rebellion will never set us free,
But neither will closing our hearts to those who know how to be.
Image fulfilment is for fools, those who dream of being cool,
Popularity for the weak who cant remember how to seek, who much to early meet their peek,
Then wander around wondering what went wrong, the subject of the same old song.
To the would be heroes of our time, who refuse to fall in line,
Don't forget that the people you're trying to rescue, are the ones who always oppressed you.

If I cant be a disgusting wretch, its not my revolution. Class and with it universal value systems must be abolished if Anarchist society is to take hold. I am interested in making people more free, not censoring or repressing idiots, or even trying to make everyone fit my idea of morality. This is a crucial distinction that must be clearly defined by all those who would pursue Anarchism, so long as you put people into internal hierarchies, there will be external hierarchies.

The question of appropriate values within society is no doubt a major and paradoxical one, this is especially true within an Anarchist society. As Anarchism sets out to abolish all forms of hierarchy from society, it is imperative to be aware of value systems and the relativity of their validity. False oppositions are created to give the illusion of choice that we live within "democracy," the left blames corporations and capitalism for the problems of the world, the right blames the government and bureaucracy for the problems of the world. What surprisingly few realize is that both are interwoven and to blame, these days they are even generally the same exact people. Even if there was no state, or church, or monetary system, there would still be the possibility of a new elitism taking hold in the name of social morality. Often called "PC Fascism" it is definitely a turn off for many people (especially "punk" oriented people) to try and interact with activists or some well meaning hippies. Really this can come from anyone who is uptight and trying too hard to make everyone "get along" by forcing everyone to their view of what is politically correct, ironically alienating almost everyone else in the process. While it is generally used against liberals, to be fair conservatives often engage in their own forms of PC Fascism and simply call it being a "social conservative." This is seen in notions of "family values," homophobia and trying to censor musicians and artists they don't like, or really anything contrary to Christianity. While right wing propaganda claims to support the individual, in reality at any chance they get, they strike down diversity and target minorities, for what they are really trying to "conserve" is the hegemony of the Christian and especially WASP power structures. The only individualism in the statist right wing is in terms of individual property rights, but even here the laws generally only protect the rich, who are legally allowed to steal from people through capitalism, thus PC Fascism is surely applicable to the right wing too, but that is more like conventional Fascism and so when I say PC Fascism, I mean cultural authoritarianism.

Sure it is great to make sure people like minorities, women, and homosexuals aren't oppressed, but there is a very real danger of going too far and putting your own hang ups on other people, perhaps even singling certain groups out and so patronizing and isolating them in an attempt to protect them. The question becomes what are the values of an Anarchist society if those values are to remain non elitist? What sense of morality is to be encouraged and what if anything should be met with physical repression? Most would say being a loving person is a good value, but should we kill all those who are not loving enough? Create prison camps? Maybe try and forcibly indoctrinate those who aren't loving? This is of course silly and brings to mind all kinds of questions as to what it means to be loving, and loving of what exactly? Do we love hitting each other in a mosh pit? Am I offensive? Of course I am, I am human, there is no way for me to anticipate or accommodate the full range of needs and preferences of the people around me. The best I or anyone can do is try to stick to the truth, but the truth is often offensive, the truth is everyone is offensive in multiple ways for multiple people and so we should not take our own values as universal absolutes.

If the goal of Anarchism is to keep people from ruling others then wouldn't the chief value of an Anarchist society be to not impose our will on others? I suppose it would be if there were to be a value, however should this value itself be imposed on others? At what point does this value become self defence or intervention? If you subscribe to the idea the means should be congruent with the ends then perhaps we are not justified in armed struggle against the state, even if it is self defence. However if you are like me and believe within an Anarchist society you would for example be justified in imposing your will on someone by stopping them from going on a murderous rampage, then armed struggle is basically justified, the means would fit the ends. The question of morality in an armed Anarchist revolution is made pretty moot by the fact that it is generally tactically unfeasible without massive overwhelming support from the vast vast majority of the people. It is still important to ask at what time does it become important to step in and keep others from imposing their will on others? But this is a much more complicated question than whether or not violence is ever justified.

If we were to follow the Wiccan rede of "Do as though wilt, lest ye harm none" then it would seem the only rational thing to do would be to stop others from doing harm to others. After all just because you don't want to impose your will doesn't mean you should be a doormat. This is of course a precarious position if we are to not fall into hierarchies of who is the least elitist or the most moral, a certain amount of compromise, understanding and forgiveness of others ignorance is required. Unless an institution of hierarchy is set up, physical harm or severe harassment is being committed, it is often more harmful to try and police everyone about arbitrary standards in morality or what is in good taste. This is however often a difficult distinction to make and we must have the humility to know we are capable of repeatedly making mistakes. Morality is how drug laws and religious imposition and in fact racism and prejudice is spread, the KKK honestly believed it was their moral imperative to free whites from “dangerous” black people, that they had a moral imperative to defend themselves from what they basically considered rapists and criminals. Nazis also believed that eugenics was the moral and compassionate thing to do, that people of “inferior” races or those who were disabled would be better off dead and so morality is always based on which information you take for granted. (in this case racists assume whites were superior)

While eugenics and lynching people is obviously something to be resisted, the truth is unless we master telepathy or something similar, humanity will always have misunderstandings and so get on each others nerves and so I do not believe in a universal morality that is suitable for everyone in every situation. The best we can do is try not to step on each others toes and in most cases learn to forgive if someone unknowingly steps on ours, likewise if someone purposely stomps on our toes we have a right to get mad and defend ourselves. This does not mean we should organize into groups and try to wipe out anyone who wears boots as if this would solve the problem, or that all people who step on toes where boots, or even that we should organize to make sure everyone is indoctrinated into thinking such actions are intolerable and that we should label these people something stupid like “stompers.” Instead if we are to maintain an Anarchist position we must treat each racist or offensive person as an individual and deal with them on an individual basis. (unless they are part of a bigoted organization) Unfortunately there is no world racist headquarters that can be engaged in war (besides maybe the “white” house) or even debate (assuming racists actually responded to rational argument) and so apart from abolishing institutional hierarchies which are all rife breeding grounds for oppression, we can only hope to change others by our own examples, by creating our own cultures rather than claiming to have the monopoly on morality. Divide and conquer is probably the main tactic of the archons and so building up solidarity is key, but making yourself in to a moral authority or an authority on what is or isn't appropriate culture will only create more division and so it is we must focus on creating new cultures, rather than destroying offensive ones.

I like the punk ethic of brutal honesty, especially if it hurts, learn to love that part of life too. No one has to love everything they just have to learn to tolerate other peoples love for those things which they think are ugly, that is, so long as it is not oppressive. Punk cannot really be defined in universal terms, it is not something that will be the same for everyone, the idea is to be the true self, to live in truth as an individual free from societal constraints. In this way of life lies the very essence of what is necessary to pursue enlightenment, whether or not your family or friends want you to get a job and be normal. Conformity is anathema to both enlightenment and punk rock, so is the consumer culture obsessed with status and products created through the oppression of the natural world and the working class people throughout the world. As I am too poor to afford anything but the cheapest beer, I realized a certain philosophy, that if I learned to love the worst beer, from then on I would love any beer that I drank and that this same principle can be applied to all aspects of life.

Why aren't there more jokes about white males? Because white males are the cause of all the worlds problems! (See... offensive jokes can be funny) Black humour is always going to be around, there will always be those drawn to shock value and in some cases it is absolutely imperative to a healthy society to have that kind of humour, to upset people and challenge accepted norms, for it exposes ignorance that would otherwise go unnoticed. So instead of trying to censor people perhaps it would be better to come up with jokes which make fun of ignorant people? As I have mentioned before, one favourite method of Chaos magicians is to “banish with laughter” and so if we want to banish prejudice, we must turn prejudiced people in to a joke, we must take away the ego gratification they get from putting others down and ridicule their idiocy by pointing out just how stupid their perspectives and notions of superiority are.

As far as I can imagine, an Anarchist society will not function so much because everyone will be the same all loving person, but because we will have learned how to deal with the fact that everyone, even if they have good intentions are still fucking ass-holes in a variety of crappy ways. While it isn't a hippies wet dream, this is preferable to a homogenized and sanitized culture that demands conformity to artificial standards placed upon relative realities. Educating the ignorant about their prejudices is great, but unless the prejudice is institutional I have little to no faith in organizing against every ignorant asshole out there, there is simply too much about everyone that pisses me off to think this is ever a practical or even desirable goal and I am relatively very open minded. Expressing your opposition to offensive people is fine, great and actually very important, but so is the humility to realize you are offensive to others as well and that trying to force your notion of equality on others is impossible. While I may be alienated, I am alienated in many ways because I am so tolerant, even of assholes, but people who demand everyone think in terms of duality have very little tolerance for this kind of thinking. It is easy for people who believe in the illusion of some absolute PC reality to label others according to some prejudice, when the reality is people do hurtful and ignorant things but are usually more of assholes than actually prejudice, and this is because the measure of absolute PC'ness is a completely subjective and individual.

PC Fascism is very real, and just like a good fascists the oppressors do not even realize they are doing something wrong, they do not think it is the same to treat someone who fits their particular prejudice badly which is precisely why they are prejudice. For example a strait edge person treating someone who drinks alcohol like shit, even though that person is not doing anything wrong is just as arbitrary as being prejudice against things like race or gender. From strait edgers discriminating against drinkers and drug users, to vegans and vegetarians claiming moral superiority because they put plants below animals in their hierarchies, there are all kinds of subjective things which people can use to divide the Anarchist community. Even if drinking were inherently evil and destructive to everyone, alienating people over little things is even worse, we all have character flaws and we all get on each others nerves and to try and make it so that nobody ever offends anyone, or does anything slightly against the grain is to take away freedom, not to give it. (it will also have the side effect of driving a person completely insane) Self righteous moralism and the denouncing of others you disagree with just to make yourself feel good about yourself is something which we are all prone to at some time or another, but it is ironically even more common in those who would try to improve the world.

How we handle situations that upset us or test our discipline is limited by our personal strength, luckily I believe the limits of our strengths are arbitrarily placed by ourselves. Different things are harder for different people depending on their values, but really it just comes down to how stubborn and determined we are. I suppose the best way for someone to become stronger in their will is to first become determined to become more determined. At the flip side it's important to not sweat the small stuff, to have a sense of priorities with all the problems of the world and when dealing with assholes to pick your battles wisely. There are plenty of worthy fights out there to keep anyone busy, don't waste your time trying to "correct" everything you find offensive. It turns out attacking people and calling their persona ugly is generally ineffective and only makes them feel defensive, so instead we might try to give them the tools to grow their awareness in their own way until they can figure it out on their own. We often make things much harder than they are by convincing ourselves something is a much bigger deal than it is, or that something is much scarier than it really is.

How does one who looks for truth in this world make their way in a culture built on lies and oppression? What is the best way to fight class war? By having no class. Should we truck fuck a cop to watch him bleed? The "authorities" have named themselves the enemy of the people, should we destroy those who have declared war on my people for no reason? How can we resist the genocide of "the war on poverty" which in practice seeks to destroy the natural world and enslave the workers? Oh how the system forgets the poverty of mind that believes the contradiction that everyone can be rich in a capitalist system, when a rich person is defined as someone with more wealth than others. There is certainly a case to be made for lower class militarism and yet at the same time many poor people have no real conception of trying to make society a livable situation, in fact due to propaganda quite often the poor are some of the biggest adversaries to social and political progress. Many of the biggest victims of the state cling to religions and social customs designed to enslave them and in some cases they show little to no political awareness whatsoever and yet are determined to make sure that the factors that oppress them and everyone else remain in place.

The idea that your income determines who you are is a spell cast by capitalists and communists alike which serves to reify the importance of abstract wealth or “money,” but in reality we are all human, we are all creatures on this Earth and so this must be the basis of our allegiances. Sure if there are rich people hoarding wealth then steal from them, but judging based on their level of wealth they seem to have is a mistake, for it supposes that they actually own those things or that private property exists and so you are strengthening that consensus reality of the class systems existence. This is complicated as there are rich people out there who most strongly consent to the class system and are plotting to consolidate their power over all those who have less wealth, there are real aspects to the notion of class war but we have to understand the real problem is a lack of understanding. By having no class I mean we all have been trained to have our own values and so we each have our own hierarchies, so by having no class, by being crass, by being impolite in the punk sense or being brutally honest, we help to dissolve the boundaries between people. If you see rich people, or bourgeois people challenge them, be impolite to them for we must destroy the thought police in our heads and there's and this means denying the social conventions which encourage conformity. Likewise challenge the assumptions of poor people, do not expect them to be Anarchist just because they are oppressed and instead see everyone as an individual. Being rich means you are guilty of hoarding wealth, which is justification for being targeted in some respects, but we should not make the mistake of thinking all rich people are sadistic or consciously plutocratic. Even sadist upper class people are this way because of their environment, their self righteous assumptions of superiority and so once again the problem is more a matter of their psychosis and ignorance. They are often too sick to reason with and this will no doubt get ugly, but only because they are too delusional to come to grips with reality and so those that can be cured of their greed and rehabilitated should be.

By having no class I mean we should have no universal norms as to social behaviour, but rather individual attempts to live in accordance with Anarchism as circumstances arise. We should also not fear trying to cross class lines and infiltrate or otherwise influence those who have more money than us, for it is far better they join us than fight us. The rich are either supporting a system that is trying to kill everyone else, or they are consciously organizing that system to actively make war on the lower classes and all too often the distinction is blurred. So while wealth redistribution should only be practised against the rich, this should not be the only tactics Anarchists adhere to, after all many poor wish they were rich and so would be no better if they had the money. People with an authoritarian communist mentality like to dismiss “lifestyle Anarchism” but how can we bring about Anarchy if no one changes their lifestyle? How can we fundamentally change our lifestyles if we do not overthrow the oligarchs? The distinction is ultimately an illusion and from what I can see is more the pretence of intellectuals trying to set up a cultural elitism and convince themselves they are doing something worth while.

Within society there are all kinds of classes to fight not just the economic classes and so we must understand that we cannot be a part of any class, we cannot contribute to society in anyway that stratifies us into categories based on rank. We must go beyond these class distinctions and in many ways it is important to antagonize all levels of society, to go outside of our comfortable niches and insular groups to shake people out of their comfortable view of hierarchical society. We should be glorifying poverty to the rich and empowering the poor at the same time, freaking out all kinds of normies, and letting all those who think they are “hardcore” know that they are no better than anyone else. Believing the rich to be bad and the poor to be good is still basing your values around the concept of money, which is itself an arbitrary meme which has no real value itself. No matter how much money you have we are all subject to a basic continuum of being somewhere on a scale between ignorance and denial, though we can work to overcome both these things, rich or poor, most people are one of the two. The ignorant will be willing to live in accord with the truth, while those in denial will fight against it, any rich person who wants to live in truth and give up their wealth should be welcomed, any poor person who supports tyrants is themselves a tyrant.

A distinction must be made between the ignorant and those who are in denial, those who are in denial are usually those who control the ignorant, but there is no doubt that any person raised in a wealthy family in a wealthy part of town will have little to no understanding of the problems caused by capitalism. Far from it they will probably feel justified in their wealth, that their family somehow “earned” it, and since they probably did it legally they probably feel they have committed no wrong by making as much money as possible, even though riches always come at the cost of environmental and human exploitation. Denial is itself the result of a deeper kind of ignorance and so this is not a factor of class, because class is an illusion created to divide and conquer the people. Class is a factor of culture spreading ignorance, if a culture values exploitation then it is the culture that is wrong and ignorant people merely perpetuate those mistakes.

In order to combat this we must destroy the very notion that society can create a universal value system and to do that we must take every opportunity to present alternatives to the status quo, especially if it takes people out of polite comfort zones. By creating idioms and cultures which are intended to become a norm we create the status quo and ideologies and with that hierarchies. With this comes the need to judge others according to how well they fit into our lifestyle choices and determine how entertaining they would be in our lives, how a relationship with them would make us look to others. This is a deadly kind of class war which has divided all kinds of people, the closest thing I have found to a lifestyle that has no class, that fights this impulse is punk rock. To me there are no rules, no values other than to be real, to be honest, anything goes as long as it's what you really want within your own truth. Have no class, it doesn't matter if people don't think you are loving because that is a subjective and pointless question, one which gets you stuck into value systems that are a lie, that have no truth or love or hope.

Love is a fine thing in theory to value, but as it is defined as the emotion of valuing something it's really the only thing anyone has ever valued, so hippie love can be just as artificial as yuppie love, because it is sold on a much more specific and less up front view point than punk rock. That isn't to say you would be living in truth if you never thought of anyone but yourself, but that you understand no individuals idea of love is something that should be considered universally applicable. People with authoritarian notions of love belong to a class that is always trying to sell their beliefs to everyone, trying to get others to adhere to their value systems instead of encouraging and inspiring others to be their real selves, which is done by inspiring them through examples of courage. These examples can take many forms from making a complete fool of yourself, to puking on a busy sidewalk, the creation of art, to head butting a wall and freaking out on random people, becoming inappropriately loud and yelling at those who demand constant calm, picking your nose in public and purposely offending those who refuse to see any other way of looking at things. While consciously being contrary to people and refusing to be subject to their demands for political correctness may seem unloving, if done correctly it is in fact the most loving thing you can do since it teaches people to love something new.

I have often felt like we are all living in a commercial, the product is culture and all too often we sell our endorsements for much too cheap, still others often buy what we sell even if deep down we all know its useless crap. The gears of industry would grind to a halt if people thought about what it is they really want, who among them can imagine what it is that they would have in their life if there was no commercials or advertisements in the world. Economically and spiritually, the search for escape is what gets us lost and trapped. We must escape the commercial and stop trying to sell anything, even the truth, simply put it out there for others to take or leave as they will. So called intelligent humans are nothing but complex and decadent hedonistic apes, we have just abstracted our desires in to a variety of unfulfilling forms, diluting them into all kinds of products compensating for unsated needs. For example we use pornography (like they show in advertisements) instead of having healthy attitudes towards love and sex and life and just fucking and enjoying ourselves like we want to.

The hard part for most people is having the courage to listen to someone even if they are offensive, or what they say is scary, or even if they appear to be obviously wrong, for example many people no doubt would disagree with a lot of what I have said and refuse to even consider it. Many spiritual and non spiritual people are so driven to seek love they will pathologically seek to avoid anything that seems remotely hostile or confrontational in a fit of rejection and so although they will be in denial about it, they will be trapped by some new kind of hate instead of just taking things for what they are. The truth is people on some level or another usually believe what they want, unfortunately part of the truth is most people don't want the truth because then they would have to change their lives and take responsibility for themselves and for the state of the world. I wonder why I would want to believe such a thing? Perhaps some kind of ego self righteousness to justify feeling better than other people? Maybe, but although such kinds of ego motivations must always be looked out for, believing such a thing is not very gratifying to my ego, especially since when you acknowledge such possibilities it goes a long way to dissolving such pleasure and ego reinforcement. (I hope.) It is important to understand those dedicated to self improvement, no matter how successful they may be have no right to feel better than other people, of course that is probably why most people get into self improvement in the first place and it is ironically the ultimate obstacle to true self improvement. We must seek out the ugly truths, the unflattering truths about ourselves, then try to understand our true motivations for how we judge others, this must be done to understand the more easily recognizable motivations and find the ones outside of cultural values.

Most people value that which makes them happy, yet clearly most people are not truly happy with their lives and yet in vain they continue to value the same kinds of things, so then this is because people generally do not value self awareness since this requires facing pain and dealing with their issues. So it is people go for what is pleasurable in the short term, valuing things which distract the mind from any real awareness. Without self awareness no one can know what will really make them happy, they only know they are unhappy and so will seek out anything that can temporarily provide escape, rationalizing these things in to a hierarchical value system which often becomes misconstrued as morality, but which is ironically the cause of their desire to escape in the first place. So it is if they are ignorant of the fact they are fundamentally irrational beings and do not know how to incorporate this in to their outlook, the more rational they think their hierarchy of values is, generally speaking the more pathological it is.

Pointing out the atrocities of the government means nothing to people who think capitalism is still justified, or that if we just had the right leader things would be better. Educating someone about the historical evils of hierarchy means nothing if the person is unwilling to take responsibility for their own actions, to think for themselves or to explore the truth without holding onto cultural baggage. Rationally explaining Anarchism doesn't do much good with people who want to blame others for their own unhappy lives, who want to put people into hierarchies based on race, gender, religion, sexual preference or material status. These people will always be blind to any such arguments until the reason they came to such mistaken outlooks is overcome and so "educating" people about this kind of mental illness is not fixing the original problem. If it antagonizes them to Anarchism as it often seems to do than it might even do more harm than good.

The problem is not so much the historical atrocities that go on under the guise of sexism or racism etc, it is the unconscious factors of the mind which create and perpetuate such ignorance, the cultural context which is the source of justification for all tyrannical behaviour. This delusion is rooted in the idea that other people or external factors are responsible for an individuals state of mind or happiness, giving way to the idea that an "authority" has a right to determine what is best for others. These symptoms, racism and sexism are good places to start to use for examples of how hierarchy is never good, they are also good targets for people wishing to improve the lives of those most effected by hierarchy, but they are not in themselves the root of the worlds problems. These prejudices are just two of the most original and blatant examples of the problems caused by hierarchy, but we should not think for a moment the world would be functional so long as the other forms exist as well. (Communism is a good example of this.)

It is a lack of self awareness which allows a person to think that they will be happy by oppressing other people and so raising consciousness is the only means of getting people to voluntarily stop oppressing others. While I am very much in favour of secular education that is not from the government or capitalism, to accomplish this goal we need to step outside of linear logic and balance it with intuitive, empathetic and creative aspects of consciousness, because without mastery of irrational processes, logic will always be twisted to prove all kinds of hierarchical realities. Hierarchical people believe themselves to be rational, in fact they often pride themselves on how they repress anything irrational and because they haven't learned to deal with their emotions, because they do not know themselves, because they have no imagination and repress their genuine human passions they have become neurotic, angry and selfish. Blaming others becomes important to them because all their logic tells them society should make them happy, but they know it doesn't, so scape goats must be found to rationalize their lack of fulfilment and protect their pride. All the while such people use consumerism and other forms of escapism to pacify their emotional needs with what they believe is the rational way to be happy. Logic alone can never spread Anarchism because it is the irrational idea that a person can or should be purely rational, which drives people to seek out the linear logic, which then puts things into categories and value systems, which then seek to create universal constants which everyone must adhere to, according to whatever authority created them.

People have emotional issues which cannot be solved rationally, when they try to solve them rationally since they have limited information and no emotional drive to seek the truth of who they really are, they will rationalize incorrectly about why they are unhappy. You cannot rationalize about why you are unhappy if you avoid the irrational, because happiness and unhappiness are irrational aspects of consciousness. So because so much of consciousness is non linguistic and otherwise irrational, you cannot really know yourself if you only stick to rational interpretations. So it is that pointing out the rational flaws in other people's thinking will only lead to endless debating, which is itself often a form of avoiding the real issues, avoiding those irrational aspects of self which ultimately supersede logic and express themselves in what the ego believes to be logical ways. Most rationalist Anarchists do this by focusing on the memes of language, trying to out read and out debate everyone, most hierarchical people do this by mistaking memes of authority and the prejudice that creates, for reality and goodness.

When asked how can you have values within an Anarchist society without becoming elitist? We must first ask ourselves what we mean by the word "Anarchy" and the fact that it means so many different things to so many different people, we can even say each person has their own definition. For me this kind of individual defining of words is Anarchy in motion, especially with the word Anarchy itself and while many rationalist Anarchists are made uncomfortable when the words and definitions they hold up as idols are exposed as subjective, I believe this is potentially one of Anarchism's great strengths. To quote Humpty Dumpty, "when I use a word... it means just what I choose it to mean, neither more nor less." ... "The question is," said Humpty Dumpty, "which is to be master — that's all." In this way there cannot be any authorities on Anarchism, those who attempt to force their definitions on others are those who are the slaves of words, or the archon of that meme. So in this context the closest to a formal definition of Anarchy I would attempt is something that's definition is constantly in flux and which is dependent on the person using the word, but ultimately it is formless. If you don't like the idea of enslaving words, then practice meditation and learn to quiet the mind and in this silence you will see yourself outside of memes. Any symbol or word can through interpretation be idolized, fixed and turned in to orthodoxy or dogmatic ideology, so it is even with Anarchy, the magick of a symbol can have the intentions of the creator hijacked, or twisted, it can also overwhelm the intentions of others who might use the same symbol. The capacity for abstraction is one of the key elements of magick and so Anarchism, as something in which each individual can act out their will and live in true freedom, is in many ways something that refers more to magick itself, rather than to any depiction or interpretation of it.

This isn't to say abstraction is always a problem, but that so long as you accept the interpretations and abstractions of others passively, rather than creating your own, you will be chasing shadows, disconnected from the imagination and alienated from your own understanding. From the commonly held belief of being filled with violence, mob rule and destruction, to any number of political and philosophical schools of thought, to highly individual definitions of any scope and variety, there is almost no limit of possible ways to look at the subject of Anarchy and we should not dismiss any potential view. By creating our symbols, yet understanding their limitations and the true inexpressible essence of that which is symbolized, we are freed from the machinations of the archons. We must be allowed to reinterpret each new situation to fit our goals so that it might not be pinned down and corrupted by the forces of hierarchy, that which is nameless cannot be controlled or diluted by consensus, consensus can only determine how we experience such realities as a group. Authoritarian realities are created when a group has come to consensus their view of something is superior to other realities and so is opposed to contrary realities, thus they are opposed to the notion of consensus reality itself. Anarchist reality can only manifest when there is unanimous consent for those involved and so is an affirmation of consensus reality itself and so is able to function according to reality, rather than artificial abstraction.

If you are an Anarchist it is completely self defeating to use the word and attempt hierarchical organization of these different definitions. This doesn't keep people from trying, perhaps labelling them endlessly into splinter groups of splinter groups then set within a personal values system. In the same way religions degenerate into sectarian dogmatism, Anarchists are often much too quick to alienate each other over arbitrary labels because they have no understanding of the experience and practice of Anarchism and have instead turned it into an abstraction. These Anarchist paradigms usually tend to destroy themselves in petty disputes over hierarchies within the larger scheme of Anarchy, endless debating and name calling in an attempt to see who is the best read in political theory, who's definition is the "one true" Anarchism. By trying to determine the "best" course of action, competition erupts in creating a value or priority list within group agendas and within day to day lives between individuals. Marx says this, and Proudhon says that, I can quote more than you, blah blah blah.. These authoritarian Anarchists sparsely have an original thought in their head and yet feel compelled to debate and demand universal adherence to their own view of an autonomous society. This kind of endless dissection in an attempt to have a value system personal or otherwise, can very often and ironically lead to the destruction of the Anarchism within the individuals so obsessed with theories and abstractions about it. By creating these artificial and dubious pyramids of paradigms we must understand that our language is highly variable and that these abstractions can distort our vision of the overall idea.

Anarchism to me is something you are and you be, you discover and cultivate within yourself. Learning from others, while keeping a humble and open mind is imperative, but I would argue that at most it is no more important than learning how to discern within yourself the truth, how to think of Anarchism in your own way, for if you cannot do that you cannot make any honest contribution to society. Despite the plethora of writing on the subject, depending on classical thinkers from the last two hundred years is very narrow in scope and sources, it neglects the rich ancient history of human Anarchism, as well as shuts us off from learning to think for ourselves or contributing our own new perspectives. By understanding that all language is relative, we also come to the realization that some words are more varied than others in how people will define things. By allowing others to act according to their own value systems we can be more fluid and less theoretical, by acting as an example of your values rather than trying to argue everyone into accepting your values and your definitions, we create a culture that is truly based on free will rather than intellectual elitism.

There is a tendency to claim the authority of being able to label people into different ideologies which you can then justify treating differently according to how much you like what they think. Actions are louder than words, talk is cheap and pigeon holing others based on your own definitions is an excuse to slip into elitism, it is an excuse to dismiss and ignore new information because you have a category that it fits within to some vague degree. (Academics do this for a job) Insurrectionist Anarchists, green, individual and communal, syndicalist, primitivist, illegalist, egoist, post left and on and on, we must create a world where each person can choose their own personal style of Anarchism, each unique, each person an authority on themselves but no one else, all the while learning from each person we meet about a new and completely equal definition. If you do not define Anarchism in an Anarchist way you must not be fully Anarchist, but then I do not recognize any authorities who claim the right to say who is an Anarchist and who is not, nor do I want others to take me as an authority.

It seems in many ways by our individual definition of the word we reveal more about ourselves, then we do about the concept we are trying to define. The more we learn to develop our consciousness of Anarchism defined purely by our own being, the more we come to learn of ourselves and so the better we will be at functioning in a healthy way within society. Anarchism depends on the participation of all individuals, it depends on people's ability to rid themselves of authoritarian behaviour and think for themselves and so we must be very careful about the idea that Anarchism could ever have a static and universal form, it is much to divine for that. Whether or not we believe Anarchism is for the world, by considering the concept of Anarchism from our own views, we must ask ourselves questions like, what would I do in an Anarchist society that works? What could that possibly look like? What examples of Anarchism can I find in everyday life? Once you begin to look in an unbiased way you will have to accept that Anarchism on some basic level is commonplace in the world and that it has a long history within humanity. Cultures which valued aspects of it were for their times at perhaps the greatest level of sophistication and this is because the more Anarchist a society is, the more it must have people who know themselves and what it is they really want in life.

This is a DIY definition of Anarchism, because within a truly Anarchist society, collectivists and individualists and everyone else must all inhabit the same Earth. So it is you must take into account it is arrogant to think you can understand every point of view and have everyone understand you, no matter how well you try and explain yourself, or how long you listen. We must learn to communicate in ways beyond simple pure verbal language, paying more attention to our actions and how each person is relating and less attention to how many pros and cons there are to a quote from someone who had no more authority than anyone else on such an inherently subjective concept as Anarchism. (the exact same attitude is needed for religious scripture) Knowing what Emma Goldman thought about Anarchism is all well and good, but if you don't know what you think about it, if you haven't thought about it enough to form your own individual opinions then it doesn't really do you much good. Different times and different cultures, as well as different individuals will all bring enormous variety of opinion, instead of debating the morality and rationality of a theory, pay more attention to what it is we can do right now. Much of what classical thinkers say is still very relevant today, but instead of finding the perfect label for our customized mish mash of political and social philosophies, lets start living our own unique and creative form of Anarchism, one which allows us to function with other people and not demand everyone prioritize everything the way that you or anyone else does.

Brow beating each other brings our consciousness away from the fact that there is no singular form of Anarchy, that it, like consciousness is different for everyone except that it always allows others to do as they will free of hierarchy. When we die to this consciousness we lose our objectivity that such a concept is ultimately endlessly open ended. In this way Anarchism reflects the human consciousness and allows us to step into our own true being, rather than a label or ego. If we can learn to stop labelling others and instead pay attention to the present moment, of how we and other people act, we will learn a new level of equality that will enable us to see from different perspectives. This tendency to order things into hierarchies we call values has been implanted in our minds from a very young age and it is these rulers of the mind, the subconscious processes with their own agendas that we must really watch out for if we wish to be free. Being able to dismiss others as whatever label you happen to give them is anathema to equality and understanding.

When we learn that its all the same because its all different then we understand that it is ultimately up to our own definitions, we can then fall out of duality and into a state where everything is seen for what it is, as well as how it relates to everything else we label. It isn't possible to create a system that is good for everyone and simultaneously the same for everyone, what we need instead is a way of doing things with people we do not agree with on various things, so long as they are not imposing on anyone. We must also expect that we will upset each other with our ignorance of each other, however when we cease to label each other so much this will solve a lot of the problem. I know people reading this may try, even subconsciously to categorize or organize according to values and memory the language I am using instead of paying attention to the words themselves. No one is objective and while attempting it has its advantages, we must not ever kid ourselves in to thinking we are succeeding and so for this reason Anarchism is perfect, because it allows us to unite the subjective with the objective to the greatest degree possible.

Since Anarchism is like all words defined by consensus, yet relates to all notions of human consensus in general, we could try not even defining it at all, instead, it reminds me of the quote "those who speak do not know, those who know do not speak." In this way Anarchism is synonymous with the divine and a kind of metaphysical source of free will and even our very beings. Through everyone's values we decide what to do and which expression of Anarchy we will act upon, whether it is to do only as we are told like a good little monkey or learn to think for ourselves, we are always expressing our own definition of Anarchy. This true expression through our actions is contrasted by our literal personal definitions of Anarchism, those who believe it evil should learn how to come to their own decisions and not the medias, they should also consider whether or not they want any ability at all to determine their own life. When they meet the Anarchist inside them they will learn who it is they really want to be, then it will be obvious that the world must learn to sort out what it really thinks about Anarchy. How a person lives their lives is how they define Anarchy and how they define it with words is perhaps close to what their subconscious thinks of how well they are living their own life and how much they know themselves. (as I pointed out before the authorities like to use it for war zones or violent situations.)

Does this make an Anarchist's definition of Anarchism better than someone's who doesn't claim to be an Anarchist? Nope. What Anarchists should be spreading is not what to think, (no matter how nice and great the thoughts) but how an individual can go about learning how to learn, and learn how to think for themselves and what it is they really want in life, what their true will is. Anarchism will not happen because someone came up with some infallible philosophy or morality, it will not even happen because someone comes up with the perfect means of organizing society without leaders, it will happen when each individual really learns how to think for themselves. When people learn the deeper values of knowing themselves and what they really want then Anarchism is inevitable.

Anarchy is an interesting paradox, while by all reasoning that I can come up with it is preferable to all other things, but if you set it as a universal value, especially in the current world, you are going to make yourself a slave to an abstraction. There are always some situations possible in infinity where something will be preferable to something you usually value more than other things and so no fixed or universal definition of higher value should be attached to anything. When you put something at the top of a value hierarchy you make your happiness dependent on it to some degree, so if Anarchism is your standard, then in this world you will not be happy with much of what you encounter. You should not make your happiness dependent on Anarchy and while logic and emotion demand you should prefer it and strive for it, you should not define it as good and government as bad, but see it as much more practical in almost all situations. Leaders in situations of group self defence may sometimes be temporarily preferable, likewise people with massive egos who wish to delude themselves will see government as more valuable for that purpose and so find ever new justifications for this kind of martial law. As soon as you put Anarchism at the top of your values hierarchy, the question comes of how to define it, then given the limitations of abstraction and an individual persons limited ability to rationalize absolute truth, it is only a matter of time before you start creating an Anarchism that becomes authoritarian, puritanical and dogmatic, something that is self contradictory and oppressive. If nothing has inherent value over other things can there ever be progress? Well yes, in a sense we might define progress as everyone achieving their true will to a greater degree, so we might say progress is manifesting functional Anarchism for all to a greater degree. We avoid making progress towards Anarchy in to a values hierarchy by realizing any impediment to this is not really “bad,” but instead is an opportunity to grow in such a way as to be free of one more obstacle which has limited our ability to function in Anarchy. In this work of Alchemy the spectrum of progress is endless, we just determine which way we want to go or when we might want to stop through our definitions, but a successful revolution will continue as long as the planets orbit the sun.

If I had to label myself, I suppose I might be called a post-structuralist utilitarian Anarchist, just as I might call much of my philosophy a post-structuralist utilitarian ontology, but I find such labels pretentious and create the illusion of a new idea when Anarchy is as old as nature itself. I am an Anarchist magician, I practice Anarcho magicae, I create a temporary order for utilitarian purposes but do not become entrapped by that model and am free to change according to the moment. Due to me being the only one who fully understands what I mean by that and the fact I am not basing it's use on anybody else's use of the words, it is not a label I would really use in any situation, nor does it mean I wouldn't identify as something completely different tomorrow. While using a label in this situation here might provide a hint as to what I am trying to communicate, it is none the less a double edged sword which can cut us all up just the same. (I cant say I understand it, but from what I know I especially find all of “postmodernism” pretentious, I can't see anything new in it, at its best it is basic ideas of Buddha or Hermes, but without the wisdom.)

This obsession with having the “right” kind of Anarchy is the result of a kind of memetic fundamentalism which has put the fundamentalist view of Anarchism in a higher place in a personal hierarchy than any alternative. While some of these people are very well read, perhaps even with lots of activist and radical experience, what they fail to realize is that there is no universally applicable form of Anarchism. The notion of a pure bred memetic strain of classical European Anarchism as the only true form of Anarchism is itself counter revolutionary and hierarchical. We need pluralism, not fundamentalism, we are all memetic mutts not superhumans, no one is perfect, no one should feel superior for having Anarchist views which have more theory behind them, even if they are truly more practical and revolutionary. It is up to the individual to define it, it cannot be imposed without negating itself and it is a blind idiot who thinks their inherently limited ideas of Anarchy should, or even could be applied to everyone and all situations. This is a common understanding among street punk Anarchists, who in my experience often in many ways have the most experience with practical Anarchism in terms of day to day living, yet often lack much theoretical knowledge. This can in some lead to a different set of cultural hierarchical values placing drugs and alcoholism, or hedonism in general above all other things, which generally leads to the self fulfilling prophecy that the world is fucked so we might as well get drunk and not even attempt changing anything. In contrast I have found that Anarchists involved in activism or especially Anarchist propaganda often have the most theoretical knowledge and have the least practical experience or knowledge and can hardly tolerate anyone who disagrees with them about anything. (From a spiritual perspective we might relate the two approaches to the left and right hand paths of Anarchism.) What we need is to take the middle way, to find balance between the theoretical and the practical, all the while recognizing the limitations of our own ideas and human communication, for it does have utilitarian value to know the opinions of others, to use words to figure out and accomplish what you really want in life, but only if we know what the reality is beyond words. While Anarchism may have memetic expressions such as the word itself, the symbol, or its traditional definitions, it is not a meme in itself, it is a condition of society and individuals. Having preferences and making choices is very important, but being attached to the desires for those preferences is putting them in hierarchies and ultimately destroys happiness. In the same way that you should not be attached to the desire to be free of your attachments to desire, (unless you want to) you should not put Anarchy in a hierarchical value system. The more you can do this, the happier you will be, but then your happiness isn't to be valued more than other things either!

Values are subjective and so ultimately are not subject to objective forms of debate, all attempts to create a universal code of "moral" conduct come down to emotions and irrational aspects of the mind which are inseparable from consciousness and thus they are opinion. No matter how well reasoned those opinions may be they still exist in the realm of the subjective and cannot be a justification for putting yourself above others. There are some activists who are not motivated by an urge to help others but by the desire to not be like those they hate and these people ironically often become like those they hate even though they usually do not see it. This is one of the many inevitable pitfalls of making your activism a matter of your subjective ego rather than a matter of truth and spreading equality and freedom. When people can learn to better set aside their egos, not take things so personally and yet retain their capacity for independent thought, then society will naturally turn towards a healthy culture and it will do so in an Anarchist fashion, rather than someone dictating what is PC and what is not.

In the same way that you are not really enlightened if you can only stand to be on a mountain top monastery far away from common people, you are not really an Anarchist if you can only get along with others or treat people as equals if you are on the commune. If you are Anarchist so that you can feel righteous, or better than people you have failed to truly be an Anarchist, just as a spiritual person, especially if they seek unity with divinity will fail if they feel the need to escape from common people. The proof of your enlightenment, or Anarchism is your ability to be one, or have solidarity and be equal with all people in all situations, this does not mean encouraging their ignorance, but not using your piety or Anarchism to put yourself above others as this is just a means of one upping people you secretly hate. Being Anarchist or enlightened far away from any challenging people is not difficult, but being able to show those who are ignorant true wisdom is the mark of a sincerely egalitarian and wise person and what's more, it actually makes the world a more functional place. In fact some of the best ways to spread Anarchism or enlightenment is often achieved by not speaking of Anarchism or spirituality, as this supposes a certain level of righteousness, but instead relating to others while maintaining an honest disposition on the basis of mutual understanding that all people are seeking truth, even if they don't know it. Try experimenting in your interactions with non Anarchists to see if your ideas make any sense to them, avoiding trigger words like "Anarchism" or "god" or "divine" yet explaining some of the implications of these things for life on Earth. If the ideas make no sense to anyone, then they are not really that effective at creating any kind of beneficial change in the world, for they will not effect the people who need it most. That is preaching to the choir does little to solve the problems of the world and a lack of patience will never change this and so you must learn no matter what you do, you are no better than anyone else.

One way in which spiritual philosophies can help activists is providing a philosophical foundation from which to examine your own motives and mindset, to provide an individual an opportunity to see what is in them that is beyond their individuality, beyond their ego and allow for motivations that are not based on petty selfishness and self deceit which that often entails. Egos in activism can be a very real problem, people who wish to do good to feel superior, rather than because they feel their actions are appropriate can be very divisive, their intentions manifest as them being an asshole to others (or even worse being idolized by others) when that energy could of manifested towards solving a problem.

Within activist culture there is some who seek to be “hardcore” primarily for the validation of group acceptance or to set themselves above mainstream people, rather than for the purpose of changing the world for the better. All too often within the counter culture (and especially in the mainstream culture) there is a tendency to acquire the memes of your chosen group or “scene” as a means of establishing yourself high on the hierarchy of values. This happens in activist cultures as well as yuppie cultures and is ironically a mindset that in some ways limits the individuals understanding of the very memes they seek to infect themselves with. A follower seeks to follow orthodox values of the group, to make sure they have all the required memes and live by them, but in this frantic search to “fit in” they limit their capacity to stop and try and understand the memes themselves, they stop being truth seekers who find truth in a kind of culture and become consumers of culture. These people are not usually the ones who create new memes for that culture, but instead seek to become authorities on the memes of that culture. These people seek to conform to that culture instead of understand it or add to it because the creation of a different meme would require unorthodox thinking, when what they are interested in is some degree of cultural fundamentalism.

This often creates subtle or obvious authoritarianism in that cultural fundamentalists expect others to adhere to their memes, that their memes are not even products of culture (as all social convention and values are) but are instead universal truths which are “politically correct.” The word “correct” implies that everything else is wrong and that it is not a matter of opinion but of unquestionable dogma, while the word “political,” in this context meaning social and cultural correction must be imposed on everyone who is not correct. The term itself then is a contradiction, on one hand it suggests an absolute truth, “correctness” but on the other hand it is admittedly a matter of “politics” and so culture and so is inherently subjective and outside the bounds of absolute truth. (For example some people of African descent refer to each other as “niggers” and while this may arguably have unhealthy consequences, are white activists going to tell them not to? Is it truly universally incorrect? Or is it a healthy way for them to remind each other they live in racist tyranny that must be opposed?) This usually goes unnoticed by the individual who thinks they are “correct” and quite probably other activists a lot of the time, but a persons motivation is a factor in their actions and their social interactions and metaphysically speaking those intentions can work to manifest egotism and authoritarian behaviour rather than Anarchism. Telling people what their true will is, is not effective and so instead we must show them how to figure out and achieve their true will, but to do this we must ourselves practise this method constantly and work by example.

One clear example of the negative side of this activist egotism is the practice of debating to assume superiority within a group, by this I mean debating for the desire to win rather than to find the truth or come to an agreement that benefits everyone. While there are few who would admit to debating in such a way, many do so, often on both sides of a topic and most do it unconsciously because they lack in depth self awareness. You may consciously seek the truth, you may even get a degree in science and learn formal logic, but if you lack the emotional awareness which allows you to detach from your desires you will only have a more effective means of making your irrational desires seem rational. Through winning debates you will only build up this egoism more and more so that if you do eventually lose, it will hurt your pride all the more and you will find some way to go in to denial or derail the debate, all because you never learned how your heart works. This creates an elitist culture within activism which alienates people who do wish to make the world better, rather than make themselves appear to be better, or promote their emotional bias. Tactical mistakes can be made in such ways choosing demonstrations which are not effective as well as creating divisions in the group, creating internal conflict which in general does more to bring down activist groups than the government. Its not fun to work with judgemental know it alls who are more interested in quoting books and letting others know how well read they are, rather than coming up with practical solutions.

Egotism within activism and Anarchism is in my experience the main source of internal conflict, generating pride and ideologies with an inability to work with others who have different opinions. The desire to make sure everyone thinks exactly like you and that everyone knows you are the most politically correct and ideologically educated is not a sound tactic of unifying people behind the more universal causes. Far too many Anarchists, or at least a lot of the most vocal ones are quick to abandon any cause which requires they compromise their Anarchist principles in any way and so they accomplish nothing. The reality is that the only way change will happen is gradually and this means that Anarchists must compromise on issues to build solidarity with other groups who in part share the same concerns to achieve mutual goals. Some "Anarchists" seem to think that all is required of them is to sit back and criticize others, nit picking their flaws and that this constitutes creating change, when the reality is we must find concrete objectives and achieve them, even if that means compromising to some degree in the present. Then from that position of progress determine which new goals are most practical to pursue which can lead us a little closer to Anarchism, but if Anarchists are not willing to work with anyone but other Anarchists they will never spread their ideas or make any progress. If you wish to change the world then you need an extra strong dose of humility and patience in dealing with others and the best means of doing this I know of, is to become more self aware, using a variety of mystical and Occult traditions to face your archons. This does not mean surrendering your critical thinking or becoming a passive unquestioning follower, but it does mean that you stop putting things in terms of "me" and "everyone else" or even to some degree "Anarchist" and "non Anarchist." Because I am challenging the egos of activists and Anarchists, those people who falsely believe they are their egos may even see my suggestions as attacking them, or as otherwise offensive in order to dismiss my ideas and retain their ability to see themselves as the authorities of righteousness, but would do well to overcome their puritanical obsessions so that we can get on with creating solidarity.

No one has the right to limit how people can express themselves so long as those expressions are not actions that keep someone else from expressing themselves in the way they want. No one has the right to change others to their will so long as those who would be changed are not directly causing change to other people against their will, by which I mean stopping them from achieving their own will. (black magick) Unfortunately people will always get offended by something, in fact some people are offended by PC culture and so instead of organizing to eliminate offensive things, (for example homophobia or sexism) it is much more effective to strengthen the cultures which are being attacked by the offensive expressions and then the offensive people become the minority. People are entitled to have offensive expressions since being personally offended by the expressions of others are the result of your own lack of control, rather than by the actions themselves, which most often would have nothing to do with you as an individual if you did not want to be offended. Whats more in some cases, in some ways you should want to be offended, it is the sign that you need to become active to help others overcome their ignorance, but if you censor ignorance it is your attempts to go in to denial about its existence, your attempt to be ignorant of other people's ignorance. Instead of having a tantrum what you can do is create a new cultural form which exposes the fallacy of the offensive statements you despise, or which exposes the ignorance of the offensive people, for example making up jokes about what you consider to be casual or cultural racism and sexism etc. (This is very different from the actions of institutions and groups which oppress people and have physical implications and which must be stopped using direct action.)

Censorship can never bring about freedom because it is the removal of freedom, prejudices are not going away anytime soon, so instead of censoring memes we should focus on exposing memes for what they are and creating more appealing ones. It is a mistake to think that just because you have more Anarchist memes that you are a better person, such people only have a more mainstream Anarchist perspective, everyone is always equal no matter what culture they have, we are all one. Anarchy is allowing others to have their own memes and still being able to work together and live in peace, it is a society of ultimate diversity and this includes the right to be an ignorant asshole. These assholes certainly open themselves up to memes they find offensive, but the only really oppressive memes are those that force people to stop being able to pursue their own. So Anarchists must always be on guard for notions of purity, or conformist attitudes that there is only one way to be Anarchist, the notion that making everyone the same PC person is possible, or even desirable. While making sure you personally do not offend others is a great thing, it is insanity to think you can make a society with no memes in bad taste.

Let the ignorant expose their ignorance through their memes so that they can then in turn be exposed to the truth of Anarchy, those who are forced into hiding will never see anything but their own illusions. Prejudice and isms will not go away by making their memes illegal, it will only cause more repression and an even more bitter concentration of the culture for those forced into exile. Shunned by society these cultures will fall into memetic inbreeding of ever more virulent hate and ignorance, festering and waiting to explode. Instead let the ignorant and possessed come out in public so that they can have their paradigm publicly deconstructed and all cognitive dissonance exposed and exorcised. Memetic diversity, like genetic diversity is crucial to breeding out prejudice and all the other cultural problems that come from xenophobia and a lack of an open mind. Those who stick to one memetic line as if they were sleeping with their siblings create deformations in their minds and all those they infect with their narrow views and this can only be stopped by total transparency and free expression. Censorship, or attempting to set up a universally applicable culture that is "good" creates memetic inbreeding, and just like European aristocracy and redneck hillbillies it leads to madness, deformities of the mind and unhealthy specimens which amplify genetic deficiencies and weaknesses, such as authoritarian behaviour. For this reason we need to encourage memetic diversity and the breeding of strong ecosystems, some mutations will be weird, even unpleasant, but they will naturally die out if they can not adapt to an Anarchist environment. Anarchism must encourage constant agitation, even within its own society in order to prevent stagnation, in order to prevent memetic inbreeding and authoritarian tendencies and this requires offensive people to piss other people off.

Censorship is useless for dealing with problems, creating your own expressions against the offensive, yet admitting their right to express themselves is the only way to provide people with true examples of what the opposing cultures actually represent. Getting upset against memes is pointless, what is more useful is stopping the most oppressive actions carried out by people who have accepted prejudice memes and creating new memes which can overtake the prejudice memes. (for example having gay pride parades) Instead of whining about offensive people learn to create memes which will either educate such people or offend them back, such as creating cultural roles for strong women and being open about homosexuality, or by expressing and creating cultural diversity from various races and social groups. You cannot destroy a meme, you can only make it obsolete and unpopular and you do not do this by brow beating people, condescending to them or being patronizing, you do it by showing the benefits of the alternatives. While it may be cathartic or emotionally gratifying, condemnation of offensive memes is in general not nearly as effective as creating new memes to replace them, in fact antagonizing ignorant people will only polarize things more and in their tiny minds give them more justification for their bigotry. In mainstream culture it can also discredit those who organize against bigots who start to look like the victims, however this principle can work to activists benefit as well. For example Christians hate homosexuals supposedly on moral grounds and yet as people become more exposed to the reality of a minority group like queer people, they see for themselves the negative stereotypes aren't true and so Christian homophobia is starting to make them look worse than the people they are against. Activists must create a new culture and they will never succeed so long as they assume a role of cultural superiority and elitism, since that is exactly what they are trying to replace. Activists must stop reacting to all the problems of the world and start proactively creating alternatives which will naturally be seen as beneficial when younger people contrast the two forms of society. What is needed is a culture of diversity where people are allowed to be who they are, but can see examples of what may be healthier lifestyles without being subject to guilt trips or authoritarian bullies hiding behind what they think is Anarchist intellectualism.

Even if someone is racist or otherwise prejudiced, as long as they have no power over others I think they are entitled to their values, as ignorant as they may be their opinions will not be changed through reason, since prejudice is an absence of reason, instead we must make due trying to limit their ability to act out that prejudice on others. Exposure to alternative view points, experiences of their bias being wrong will eventually create awareness, but censorship of ignorant peoples views can never be effective. One thing I am certain of, the pursuit of a universal system of morality by which all of society must live, is bound to cause more problems than it solves and at best could only lead to a repression of the truth to create a society of polite liars. I am not necessarily saying anyone should put up with shit they find offensive and I am not trying to censor PC people from expressing their disgust, but be prepared, everyone is offensive and no matter how hard you try, you will sometimes be offensive yourself. (especially if you think its your role in life to correct everyone)

The truth as far as I can see is that morality does not even really exist, it is always (no matter how rational or functional) an artificial construct created to meet certain emotional and intellectual desires and since everyone has different needs and desires, to expect everyone to adhere to any universal morality or value system is inherently doomed to failure. Instead let us focus on how to overcome our own ignorance and then try our best to exemplify our own understanding and live accordingly. Talking with others about how they offend you is fine, in fact if you feel like you are willing and able to improve the incredible amount of bigotry and prejudice in this world I heartily encourage you to do so, but censorship of “offensive” material can never work. Many people do casually tell prejudice jokes, or casually use insults like “fag” and often these people do not sincerely believe what they say and so it is important to challenge such bigoted behaviour, but in a way that destroys the ego gratification that was the motivation in the first place. (IE making the joker look stupid for using such ignorant and arbitrary insults, perhaps equating them with Nazis, the KKK or fundamentalist Christians in a funny way, anything which puts them down below the group they insulted is good, or you can simply mock their bad sense of humour.)

Censorship is trying to stop others from affirming their view of consensus reality, which is trying to stop them from manifesting a reality by force rather than because what you consent to calling reality is actually more beneficial. The intention cannot be to impose your reality on others and censor them, the intention cannot be to create a reality where everyone accepts a culture because of mass opinions as to what is “politically correct” or what is the utopian ideal. (even if it truly is right) Instead the intention must be to create greater understanding in every individual, to get to the truth and let people make their own decisions about what is appropriate communication. People must be free to make their ignorant statements so that they can be engaged in further discussion until their ignorance is overcome and from this process both sides will come to a greater understanding of reality and with that understanding be more functional. If your intention is to make everyone like you, you have failed to manifest Anarchy and so the intention must be to spread and encourage awareness, both in others and in yourself, no one knows what is best for all in all situations and so instead of condemning the most obviously offensive people, try to encourage recognition of the truth. Governments censor affirmations that we can live without them, PC people censor affirmations that show some people are incredibly ignorant, but in both cases this is black magick, imposing realities on others and attempting to stop each person's right to determine and affirm their own reality out of a fear that others might agree with that reality. Fear cannot end ignorance and so I believe it is a mistake to try in this way to get everyone to love everyone else completely, if it is going to happen it will happen naturally and not due to conscious movements proclaiming the one truth.

When you see someone being an asshole, your first response should be to ask yourself how you can learn from their example to become a better person yourself, then and only then can you start to think about how any serious problems caused by that person can be fixed. Many types of oppression are subjective, what is oppressive to one person is not to another and so to claim that no one can do an act that you find annoying can be more oppressive than the act itself.

We walk a balance between rejection and formalism, manners are intended to set standards of conduct and proper behaviour, but have made us dishonest and even blind to certain things in bad taste. Raw human expression even when not offensive is hardly polite, but when we stray from the accepted etiquette of whatever group we are in, we risk righteous rejection. Formalism is a major component of our self created prisons that keep us in the world of forms. Formalism is a sneaky totalitarian psychological warfare method to keep everyone policing each other and keep all honest human expression to a minimum. As long as there is little honest expression all kinds of lies can be passed off as everyday truths, after all we see it all the time and everyone seems to agree that such interaction is truthful and so it must be, right? All they had to do was create a proper rebel etiquette and all the bases were covered, people could “keep it real” in a completely false way, but since they often even honestly believe they are being truthful, it is all the more effective. By creating dogmatic standards of etiquette we limit the creation of new forms of human expression, keeping people trapped in a box, this makes them much easier to control and much easier to limit the information they receive to base their decisions on.

Formalism is a rational idea but do you really feel that rationality is always the best way to go? As there must be a balance between the rational and irrational we must also try to be aware of how we affect others, acting out thoughtlessly our impulses may seem honest, but if we take a second to think about our actions, they may not affect other people in accordance with how we honestly intended and might create misunderstanding that was not part of our will. Just make sure you don't play along with people trapped in games, unless maybe you are honestly trying to keep a low profile. Etiquette really is just the procedures of a culture that allow its members to communicate intention, but the more dependent on these procedures we are, the more we take them on unconsciously and the more we can be manipulated by them, always growing a mind to increase the power of the archons. While having your intentions understood is certainly important, in my experience these cultural algorithms generally do more harm than good and encourage people to examine social situations from a very superficial perspective, not to mention tell “white lies.” This means certain cultural rituals must be performed and so long as they are performed well the individual has status within the community, whether or not the person or the rituals actually have any real or healthy effects. Even if etiquette is to be destroyed, unfortunately learning how to play the games of culture is currently important if you wish to be understood. Etiquette can be exploited for memetic warfare and so while you should try and make yourself aware of all the unconscious rituals you participate in, there is still some use in remembering how to perform them if you want to infiltrate other groups.

There is a big difference between being offended by something and being oppressed by something and people who are obsessed with being PC need to understand this. Someone being a piece of shit and using offensive terms, or doing anything which does not stop you from doing something is not oppressive. It can be offensive as hell and it can make you sad but this is in some ways the unavoidable result of living in a free society, not that we are totally free yet, but you cannot force people to love each other and you cannot tell people what to say. Being offensive can become oppressive when it turns into severe harassment but freedom of expression must be paramount. After all many oppressors thought it awfully offensive that a black person should want to sit at the front of the bus or go to a good school, its important to realize being offensive is not always a bad thing. The emphasis must not be on trying to get everyone to adhere to some community based value, even if that value is universal love, instead we should emphasize the need to let other people live in the manner they choose and as this happens, love will naturally increase. We cannot and should not try to get everyone loving the same things, but instead try to get everyone to let others love what they want, so long as it does not create a hierarchy.

Moralism is based on the premise of dualism, which is itself the source of hierarchy. Dualism begins with a hierarchy of two levels, good and evil, but since hierarchy demands subjugation, “good” memes then start to apply hierarchy to other aspects of life which effect a persons actions. This hierarchy grows even if only subconsciously into creating a hierarchical person who applies hierarchy to more and more things, until eventually everything must be codified. Once you accept dualism, you have values, which means you want to stop anything which contradicts your values, which makes you react reflexively to anything “bad,” you learn to hate and in that hate you become an ideologue. This makes you associate unpleasant emotions with something in reality, which makes you try to stamp out realities, which makes more negativity for others who then have to defend themselves against you. With dualism a person never feels totally “good” about the world or themselves, its a mindset that can never really be reconciled and so once you open this Pandora's box, all kinds of “evils” come out, there is always more evil to face, more reasons why there is not universal goodness. This starts a viral avalanche of duality that becomes the justification for all kinds of hierarchies which of course leads to oppression and corruption.

If a person values worldly things over truth, then the ego can set in to pursue wealth or “high value” realities, all manner of abstractions and memes are given precedence over the direct perception of truth and the mind becomes obsessed with identifying with its unsatisfying values. In this pursuit all things which get in it's way will be deemed “evil” and the first casualty of this eternal dualist war is always the truth, since in truth the values are all personal opinions based on limited awareness. All memes existing in a dualist perspective are inherently predatory memes, born in to conflict they are the memes which seek to overcome other memes which are perceived to be contrary to their reproduction. Once the dualism is in place in the mind then the meme has a way of manipulating it's host to seek out any who deny its “value” or validity and by varying degrees forcibly impose the meme on all with different views. Those who resist, those with different memes or who seek truth instead of culture will be thrust into conflict no matter what their feelings on the subject are, or what their actual effect in the world is. Dualists which are attacked will denounce the attackers as “evil” and both sides will believe themselves to be “good,” no doubt both sides having what they believe to be exhaustive logical rationals for their moralist judgements.

These dualist memes depend on always having some evil to overcome to justify their existence, for example if their were no criminals we wouldn't need police or laws, therefore police need criminals to justify their existence. The war against “evil” can never end by dualist means because there are always new memes to overcome, new reasons to hate the “good” on their crusade due to the atrocities they undertake. So a byproduct of the dualist mentality is new people who disagree with the new hierarchy and the value system of those memes, this means duality itself cannot stop existing by the conflict created by dualism, since that is the means of perpetuating duality. If the conflict were to end then there would be only “good,” which would be like monism and if that were to happen then memes would not be able to exist under the umbrella meme of “good” in a person's value system and so they will always adapt to find new kinds of memes to demonize. To put it another way, since the values based memes can only exist in the context of dualism, they would not be able to spread in a monist culture which is supposedly their goal, or what they define as a purely “good” world. Hierarchical memes will always need “evil” in order to justify their own existence, should they ever really defeat evil, people will lose their dualist illusions and start to act in accordance with truth instead of their limited notions of value. In the exact same way capitalism depends on the artificial scarcity of wealth to create demand, hierarchy depends on the artificial scarcity of “good” to create a demand for power structures, “evil” exist so that people demand “good” conquers the world.

All actions based in dualist notions of destroying “evil” are a tautology, it is saying reality is based on “good” and “evil” and so I will destroy all “evil,” which implies that “good” can exist without the very thing that defines and creates it. If this were possible then there would no longer be the duality that is the basis of this reality, you cannot have white without black. Another common tautology is to think you can add goodness to the world, that you can make your life more “good,” but this is like saying one plus infinity equals more than infinity, there is nothing to add, good or evil to infinity. The potential for pleasure and pain are always in your mind no matter what reality you are in, there is only actions which are in line with truth and those which are ignorant, the degree of happiness and freedom you experience is the degree you live by the truth or in balance with nature. “Good” cannot exist without “evil,” therefore to defeat “evil” we must also stop defining “good” and repressing “evil” and then we can start integrating our awareness to be aware of all things and live by the truth, not the truth we have been told, but the truth we come to understand for ourselves. To force your truth on others is to be ignorant of their ability to come to awareness and to ignorantly believe truth is something that can be understood through force, when in truth this will only create lip service. To say awareness is “good” and ignorance is “evil” is to make a distinction from an ignorant perspective, there is only the reality and our projections, words will never accurately describe reality and our preoccupation with these memetic mind traps is the source of our consent to archons.

The purpose of dualist memes is to wipe the Earth clean of some “evil” but for the purposes of the tautological memes reproduction and this leads to a never ending escalation of conflict, endless repetition of the cognitive dissonance and ever more strict hierarchies to mobilize the warriors in the fight against the “evil.” Duality is how sadomasochism takes hold, it gives emotional gratification to those people who play out the cultural roles which allow them to fight “evil” and see themselves as “good,” thus feeding the archons that have infected them. Identity becomes based around this personal myth and the ego must find ever new means of projecting the “evil” which actually only exists in itself, in its self defeating search to create a world that is only “good.” Duality creates cognitive dissonance in that it is the idea that reality is composed of two irreconcilable forces, but the sum total of reality must itself be one thing and so the splitting of reality in to two forces is contradictory and a delusion, either reality is one thing, or it is not the true reality. The more that “evil” is fought, the more the ego can claim to be good, but since cognitive dissonance still exists, in that duality can never make a holistic universal view of reality, the ego creates its own pain and so can never be satisfied. Cognitive dissonance in general creates a state of uneasiness in the mind, especially when part of your mind, part of reality is defined as something evil and to be destroyed.

Since evil can never be destroyed by a dualist mind, new sources of justifying the discomfort that is felt from the cognitive dissonance must be found in the form of elaborations on your definitions of “evil” or by discovering new evils. This creates a feedback loop of cognitive dissonance through a constantly evolving memetic definition of duality and like an astral thought form it is strengthened the more you focus on it. This feedback loop empowers the archons with food in the form of your focus on them and all the emotions created by the delusions, but it is through your emotions that you become provoked in to actions that increase your ignorance, further polarizing your mind in to duality so that you will have stronger emotions for more food. Since it is never satisfied with cognitive dissonance, or external projections of “goodness” such as consumer products, the ego of the dualist then becomes increasingly frustrated by its inability to live up to the “good” and to destroy the “evil.” The ego is based on delusions which ultimately makes a person unhappy and so it will need ever more intense experiences of “good” to keep ignoring the real problem, which is the lack of a monist context that allows a person to stop acting reflexively to arbitrary notions of duality. In this way dualism always leads to forms of oppression and hierarchy and in the evolution and elaboration of these memes, comes ever more efficient predators until we get a world filled with governments and predatory economic systems, and hosts filled with ever more passion and certainty of their “goodness.”

Once hierarchy sets in then cognitive dissonance is fundamental to a memetic paradigm and the means is created for that person becoming some form of an ideologue, after all why should they even bother to consider the point of view of those who are “evil” or at the bottom of the hierarchy? Once they have made up their mind as to what is “good” they can dismiss or demonize everything else, they will not think critically about new situations they deem to be either good or bad, but have the bias of those preexisting opinions. Once you start dismissing information and other points of view, then all kinds of flaws can start to make their way in to your thinking which will never be corrected so long as only the “good” is ever taken into consideration. Some examples of this is the idea that the pope is infallible, or that America is always on the side of freedom even when it enslaves people in a global empire, but while these are some of the most obvious and developed dualist ideologue memes, the same kinds of mistakes occur with less deeply held and popular dualist ideas. Ideas such as that all homeless people are parasites, or that being fashionable or rich is a “good” thing.

These dualist delusions are the main driving force behind the world we find ourselves in today, religious zealots, governments, capitalists, all of them must constantly find new sources of “evil” for their “goodness” to fight, their existence is defined by their enemies and if they have defeated all their enemies they will create new ones. In terrorism which they hypocritically blamed on the Muslim religion they have found a never ending “evil” which will perpetually feed them with scapegoats as to why the world is so unpleasant. Like the original scapegoats, who were sacrificed in order to redeem the communities sins, Muslims and all who are termed “terrorists” (like Anarchists) will be sacrificed to the demiurge.

The focus has become wiping out “evil” at all costs and never learning anything, in fact to consider or try and understand the “evil” is often itself considered “evil” and so the delusion is never really understood. Since people never actually understand what they consider “evil” they continue to fear it, this fear can never create a world of pure goodness and is used to justify ignorance of monist reality. The dualist fears monism will lead to complacency but those who are aware and understand the causes of unpleasant emotions and oppression will not sit idly by while others suffer, for they understand and operate under the principle of universal unity. While New Agers love to talk about oneness and may even consider themselves monist, they still create duality by going in to denial of those things they define as “negative” and so are ignorant of those things and so still have cognitive dissonance to overcome.

Since duality also separates a person from nature and divinity, it is the root cause of cognitive dissonance as a person cannot fully live in truth until they are in a state of oneness with the all of reality. Anarchism, especially with a mystical perspective is in my opinion the most effective means of uniting all polarities, starting the Alchemical process that leads to higher awareness. Through a cultivation of Anarchist awareness, a state of mind in which that individual is capable of understanding what would be required to live in total Anarchy, a person can bring themselves towards a state of oneness with all that is and free themselves from the illusions of cognitive dissonance. Not only setting themselves free, but creating a mind that will help to set others free from delusions and all the archons and rulers which have plagued this planet for so long. At the same time the kinds of mysticism which seek oneness with the universe inherently lead those who are sincere and successful closer to Anarchist viewpoints as they realize that seeking to dominate and harm others and the natural world is seeking to do harm to yourself. Although not usually overtly political, we do see strong Anarchist tendencies all over the world in mystical or Occult traditions which have not been co-opted by the establishment, but I strongly suggest to them activism and direct action is a very effective means of facing the fears created by the ego. Anarchism is the only way to avoid cognitive dissonance and hypocrisy or lies in politics and so those who seek out truth, mystical or political must overcome notions of dualism and so hierarchy.

When someone believes in good and evil their reactions can be more easily anticipated (especially when you control things like media, religion and education systems) and so can be controlled by causing events which get people to react in accordance with their values (to concede willingly) but which is really in the manipulators interests. To escape this reactionary impulse we must develop a monist mindset. When you have dualist value systems and are confronted by something, you filter it through that predetermined value system and react according to the assumptions held about the situation. On the other hand someone in a monist mindset will analyze the situation as a whole for what it is, rather than how it relates to what in the past has been decreed “good” or “bad.” So long as you think in dualistic terms you will limit your perception to an artificial value system rather than what is actually functional for people, this is the source of holy wars and racism, greed and hierarchy and it is the strings that puppet masters use to make their slaves dance for them.

Reactionary minds are easy to manipulate, all you have to do is trick them into thinking you are one of them and then blame your enemies for something you did. Perhaps some group is doing something which is not really harming your group, but which has been defined outside the culture of what is “Christian,” or “capitalist,” or “American,” then it is easy to get eager cannon fodder to die for your purposes. Importantly they will do it with consent to the state reality, these willing kinds of people make the best sacrifice for those who worship death and tyranny, law and greed. Some examples might be blaming crime on racial minorities, or drug users when the real cause of crime is poverty, but since people hate crime and fear to understand poor people, they will then consent to more of a police state. (Since the CIA deals drugs this is even more manipulative) There are many ways in which people have had their bias used against them, but it is inevitable when you fall in the trap of believing in universal evils that require no amount of understanding on your part. Since members of hierarchies have this bias we can use memetic warfare to exploit this weakness to an Anarchist advantage, however in the long run Anarchy can only come from overcoming ignorance.

A dualist will pretty well always say that an amoral monist is “bad” since they deny their definition of “good,” where as a monist will probably see the dualist as being ignorant, or perhaps narrow minded, ignoring one side of a subject. For a dualist who actually considers such things there are few things as “evil” as the idea of monism, for dualism defines itself in its struggle against something and monism diffuses this conflict. Dualism has been defined by the dualist as “good” and so anything else is by definition “bad.” The real struggle for a dualist is not as they think against some projected fantasy of evil such as Satan, but against the very notion of things being neither good nor bad. Monism is more threatening to a culture based on duality than “evil” because evil is an inherent part of duality, it is what makes duality possible, monism can destroy the concept of “good” as well as “evil” and so the dualist fears all “good” realities will be destroyed along with the notion of duality. “Evil” empowers those who define themselves as “good,” it gives them something to fight against, but monism destroys this dynamic changing the very ontology away from the grandiose egotism of thinking you are a “good” person, justified in doing whatever you want with “evil” people.

To many people today the idea that we should abandon notions of “good” and “evil” seems strange, even dangerous, but in reality it has been the norm for many cultures and while these cultures may not meet up with Christian ideas of “good,” they weren't by most peoples standards “immoral” or “evil.” Various religions were mercifully outside notions of good and evil, from the Pagan traditions of Europe the emphasis was much more on facing life with courage, but in India we get some very interesting notions of enlightenment through monism. Buddhists are not generally considered to be “evil” people and yet the concept of good and evil is not really present in it and so while it may not bring about utopia or a purely “good” world, it is not something to be feared either. There are many examples of monism, so while the reactionary demands their must be absolute rules, it is clear that people do not need some external authority to define “good” for them to do those things to which most ascribe that label.

One example which is often quite contrary to many cultural definitions of “good” but which we could all learn from are the Aghori Sadhus, who live in the cremation grounds of India and eat the offerings left for the dead. Living a life that is in many ways purposely disturbing so that they may go out of their comfort zones, part of their training is that they cannot leave the cremation grounds for 10 years. In some ways they are among the greatest ascetics, but also drink whiskey, smoke ganja and practice Tantric sex. They make a point of breaking taboos in order to overcome any sense of disgust or repulsion from the divine, for them to reject anything is to reject Shiva as the creator of all things and yet they understand the ignorance of government and capitalism better than most. Fearless in their universal love sometimes they eat the dead, or eat shit, or whatever is placed into their only possession, a bowl made from a human skull. To them all things in existence are holy and it is through learning to love all things, even the repulsive, that they create a state of “distinctionlessness” in their minds so that they come to know Shiva in all things, perfect in all forms and so join with the divine. In this process they come to acquire many magickal Tantric powers and techniques or “siddhis,” but such power is meaningless to them, never to be used to empower them, only to help others who come to them. While most people would be disgusted by such a culture, even call it evil, they do not hurt people unless someone fucks with them, they also do not participate in systems which cause so many problems in the world and so they are much wiser than the fools who generally denounce them.

All information counter to the narrative of Christianity, the government, or capitalism will be branded “evil” and as these systems are the most dominant on Earth. They must blame their short comings, their own “evil” as justified in relation to the “evil” of others, but this ideologue mentality will only create more conflict in the world, more dissatisfaction with the system and so more and more elaborate means of encouraging ignorance must be created. Capitalists are experts at creating distractions and various means of pacifying people through consumer goods, they also work to produce weapons which can be used to fight their righteous wars, as well as create the products which make up a “good” lifestyle. Christianity provides the the most powerful framework and philosophical basis of expanding and breeding dualist memes, (secular or not) it and religions like Islam and Judaism also do this, as well as nationalism, but it's fundamentalist dualism has historically been behind most of the bloodiest conflicts. God fearing people try to only be good, and in fear of not living up to the standards of the purely “good” “god” will take it upon themselves to do all kinds of terrible and ignorant things, even trying to send others to an eternity of pure “badness” we call hell. The government's role is to impose through force its own notions of “good” and to organize through hierarchy (having the “good” controlling those who are not so “good”) the means of acquiring power and using that power for the purposes of those who think themselves “good.”

All of modern civilization is based on the idea that personal wealth and ambition is good and nature and the simple natural pleasures in life are bad because some people feel the need to dominate nature. Nature is capable of unpleasant circumstances, hurricanes and earthquakes etc but these are not “evil,” and except when put in terms of angering some god (doing “evil”) most people recognize this. Natural disasters may be emotionally disturbing to the extreme, or even horrifying, but they are not “evil,” they are simply the result of being ignorant of how to prepare or deal with such eventualities. Duality has separated humanity from nature, it is the origins of our war against her, defining consumerism as “good” and natural life as ultimately “bad.” These are the values which have turned her truth, in to our vain and suicidal artificial constructs, which blind us from the fact that we are part of nature and all that we do is natural and so cannot be put in terms of duality any more than an earthquake. If the dualist memes are not corrected, then humanity will seek ever more destructive forms of ridding itself of the “evil” it insists upon creating through trying to rid itself of other people's “evil.” One day someone or some robot programmed according to dualist morality will get a “good” idea that all organic life must be destroyed because existence is entirely “evil” and due to the world that duality is creating, it will be a position that will in their own eyes be totally justifiable.

This isn't to say atheists are any better in a dualist mindset, Communism being the obvious example of how authoritarian they can be in the name of what they choose to define as “good.” While many people like to believe they have overcome the superstitions and prejudices of a religious mentality they underestimate how many memes have been accepted in to secular culture, but which are descended from religious mentalities. Culture may in many ways be improving in terms of religious freedom, the separation of church and state, but many “family values” are lightly concealed religious agendas that seek to impose themselves on the world. More than this since most people lack the historical context for their own societies, they do not recognize the basis of their moral beliefs. Monogamy, homophobia, patriarchy, prohibition, imperialism and government as we know it are in many places foreign religious imports, which were at least strengthened by Abrahamic religions if not introduced by them, yet remain despite secularization because people have not moved beyond the dualist moralist mindset which supposedly justifies them. Puritanical precedence's as to how culture should operate were set long ago in the Abrahamic world and so people have taken them for granted so much they no longer question it. Freeing your mind is not as easy as having a secular government, many religious memes remain in the mind of the atheist, simply because they have been so common for so long. In fact atheists may in some ways be even bigger slaves to these memes because they are often unconscious of their religious context and ignorant of any psychological methods capable of overcoming them. It doesn't take belief in a divine being to think you are a moral authority and capable of determining right and wrong for everyone, it only takes a lack of self awareness.

The idea of a universal morality is not effective at creating a world in line with individual preferences, nor is it capable of creating much "good" in the world, even by its own standards. I may prefer apples over oranges but this does not mean everyone does, does not mean oranges are "bad" it does not even mean that I don't find oranges enjoyable, sometimes I even want oranges more than apples. Through dualist thinking however, we have not only attempted to rid ourselves of what the oligarchs don't prefer, but we have taken it upon ourselves to make sure no one gets to enjoy their own preferences if they are not matching with our own. This has gone far beyond a conflict of interests, a situation where there aren't enough apples to go around, or that the production of oranges is preventing anyone from having apples, but the very idea that some would have different preferences is so disturbing to those most entrenched in dualism, that genocide and totalitarian governments have been justified. It's not enough to prefer apples, the very existence of oranges is tempting to some, all information contrary to the idea that oranges are bad must be wiped out as it is a threat to the legitimacy of the good apple meme. Having preferences is fine, being attached to those preferences causes pain when things don't go your way, being so locked in to your preferences that you will engage in a means of getting what you want at the expense of others is the height of hypocrisy and duality is the justification of peoples wilful ignorance of this hypocrisy.

The key then is to think in unending spectrums of relativity and not hierarchies, you will be more effective and objective not to mention happier. Although you wont believe in "good" anymore, so long as you are not repressing your natural will and giving serious thought to who you are and what you really want, ironically you will probably do more of what others consider to be "good" then a hundred authorities trying to convert everyone to their value system.

I have talked of many forms of duality, from good and evil, fear and love, physical and metaphysical, yin and yang, oneness and plurality, observer and observed, truth and ignorance and even the duality between monism and duality, which are all to some degree united in that you are one with all knowledge. You are always the one who defines things, or accepts other people's definitions, but in the end these are all just words masking the reality which is all these things and none of these things. You can dissect anything with the sword of abstraction, but reality is always fundamentally one thing, we can call this the Chaos that contains all order, but still those who look to words rather than experience to signify meaning, will not understand fully. Within humanity is another duality which we have made, which has obvious anatomical distinctions but not so much when it comes to psychological or spiritual distinction, this is the apparent duality of male and female. While most men and a good chunk of women do not like to think of such things, this division is central to the concerns of Anarchists and Occultists, it is symbolic of all dualities and so all hierarchies and all conflicts. In Gnostic versions of Genesis the first human was a hermaphrodite and was split in two by the archons in order to enslave us, and while not literally true it does say a lot about the problems of humanity. If we as a species cannot find balance on this level, we cannot find balance on any level. In the end what most people think of gender is nothing but cultural roles created by consensus, we are all one species, we are all one reality and so the battle of the sexes is among the most ignorant behaviours we could possibly engage in.

With the exceptions of demonizing Muslim people to justify invasions, feminism has generally fallen out of common awareness, it has almost become something quaint that those hairy arm pitted girls of the sixties and seventies did. It's true that women in western civilization enjoy more equality today than perhaps since the days of Pagan goddess worship, but still many things remain, especially in the rest of the world. In the west there are still wage inequalities, but from my very limited understanding as a young man, the battle for feminism here is now usually a much more subtle and vague process of changing cultural values, rather than institutional oppression. One of the many problems with this phase of cultural growth is the role of male feminists, or feminism in activist communities in general. As a male I can say that I definitely do not understand what it is like to be a woman, so because of this, being vocal or even writing about feminist issues is not something I feel too comfortable with, after all if you aren't a woman then it's a pretty big handicap in articulating their problems in society. What's even worse is that as a man I may see some issues in feminism that are not very flattering to women, but will need to be addressed all the same if there is to be true equality. What we have to realize is that we all have bias towards the gender we identify with, that we need each other to understand each other and that escalating the war of the sexes can never bring about peace. As I have thus admitted my own bias and that I am far from an expert on the subject, please keep in mind I am trying my best.

The irony that some men may be silent in their encouragement of feminism, or fail to get involved because of a fear of being seen as a sexist or the similar fear that feminists are sexist themselves, is perhaps more pervasive than women realize. (not to mention being seen as effeminate which will mean oppression for those men also) For me it honestly may just be a fear of sounding ignorant and patronizing but I could hardly write a book such as this without addressing gender issues, even if I am limited in my understanding, however just because I am a man does not mean I have no interest in equality. As men generally do not understand what it is like to be a woman with all the social pressures that create that gender role and women generally do not understand what it's like to be a man with all the social pressures of that gender role, it undoubtedly creates a lot of misunderstanding! This happens even among people who really mean well and who are genuinely trying to sort out the mess that is human culture. Since I can only give a male perspective on feminism, while there are things that will be obvious to all people in the subject, I feel I should focus on things which may have been overlooked by many women so that a more balanced view can be achieved. (after all equality means the opinions of men are important too) Most feminists I have met and most feminist literature I have read has been more or less great, (though the non Anarchist stuff is definitely lacking) but I have noticed there is a certain tendency in feminists to dismiss any kind of critique of feminism by a man as him simply being sexist. Often they are right, but sometimes it is a very automatic dismissal, which is itself a symptom of those feminists' own sexism. As I said most feminists are great, but I have also met the occasional psychotic bigot who is merely posing as an egalitarian out of spite, who either secretly or openly wish they could castrate the men of this world. To some degree this is to be expected, but what is most troubling about this, is that even the good feminists often tolerate or overlook the Valerie Solanas's of the world and so it is that many men feel comfortable tolerating the sexism on our gender's side. Even though it is generally more oppressive to be a woman, even if Valerie was just telling a sexist joke, if you are going to allow some of the language as from people like her you cannot blame some men for doing the same, or really deny anyone's free speech and that is how it should be, everyone expressing their own view.

It is clear that this is a patriarchal world, that women are oppressed, maybe it is even so completely patriarchal that no one in this culture really knows what equality means anymore. Certainly sexist men do not treat effeminate men well either, I can definitely say that if a man acts incredibly feminine then he will lose a lot of respect from the majority of males and he will be looked down upon even by most females. We are enslaved to these ingrained culture based gender roles that subconsciously effect us and create emotional and rational responses in us that are often unjustified due to the memes or conditioning that we have received. People who are trying to rid themselves of the unhealthy practices of sexism are confronted by a world of misunderstanding and confusion that has surrounded them since they were born, the truth of equality is hard to imagine fully.

When we can't really define the word "equality" striving for it is not an easy task. For example, in my humble opinion if men treated women exactly the same as they do men, then most women would in fact be treated a lot worse in many instances. Violence would increase in many ways, especially since the emphasis in so much feminist literature seems to be about getting women to repress their "feminine" sides and act in a traditionally "male" gender role. If the sexist idea that men shouldn't hit a women out of some vague idea of chivalry were no longer mainstream, that men no longer thought that women are the targets of only cowards, then many women would find it very disturbing indeed. There are plenty of men out there who would hit any man weaker than them for a slight offence, but refrain from hitting women because they are afraid of the cultural implications. At the same time there are plenty of women who do horrible things, including their own domestic violence because they know their male victim wouldn't hurt a woman physically. All the same there are certain benefits to being women, such as getting preferential treatment in custody battles over children and other things that would have to be surrendered if men and women were treated exactly the same. I have yet to see feminists protests male strip clubs and say they are objectifying men, or that we should also be helping all the male or transsexual prostitutes out there. This is laughable to some, but if men and women are equal, then either both kinds of strippers are fine, or neither are and so those "feminists" who forget this do not seek true equality, for equality is a two way street and is no simple thing to strive for.

Finding out what real equality means is made all the more complicated by the fact that so much of our etiquette and social functions are unconscious. The two gender roles are each based off ignorant stereotypes and feed off each other to create an arms race in the battle of the sexes, the search for ways to manipulate the other gender without having to be upfront and honest. Honesty is a tactic that has no place in cultures so fundamentally based on lies as ours and so each role develops memes to compete with the other gender. Men need to be made to understand that it is actually in their own best interests that women be treated as equals for a number of reasons and they need to know that they will not actually be losing the benefits of being a man, but rather gaining the benefits of being a women and that when all people can enjoy all the benefits, we will all be much happier. The only other alternative is to try and get everyone into a purely male gender role, or a purely female gender role, neither of which would be healthy at all. Equality really is in the best interests of everyone, from the fearful women who live in a passive manner, to the men who have had to shut out their emotions.

If feminists want to succeed in spreading equality they need to understand that given that equality means destroying gender roles, that feminist women are asking men to in a sense willingly become oppressed by non feminist men and women. Now feminists may not have too much sympathy for men, but understanding this is still crucial to getting males to support feminism. They must also plan their tactics around the fact that we cannot read their minds, nor can the average man be expected to intuit things or understand anything that isn't painstakingly crystal clear. At the same time feminists must come to a better understanding of why women themselves adhere to and encourage patriarchal cultures, that if they can do that they will be able to find the weak spots of this culture.

In my opinion the greatest oppression faced by women is that their minds have all too often been hypnotized in to thinking they deserve their lower status, that it is right for them to be dominated, that it is natural or common sense, when it is among the most grievous of distortions and lies. In my opinion then, far worse than pornography or strippers is the fashion culture and dating magazines which teach young women to be submissive, vacuous, anorexic, superficial, vain, manipulative and the very same kinds of girls who actually become porno actresses. That is pornography may indeed make women seem like inferior beings to the eyes of a man, but fashion and dating magazines teach women directly to be inferior sex objects. Muslim countries do not have strip clubs or pornography, yet they are definitely not feminist and so we see that the sex industry is a symptom of the problem, rather than a root cause. So, if women can free their minds from oppression, then they can be the knight in shining armour that saves men from their own manliness! This world of men is poised to destroy all life and so long as men have no respect for the feminine we will continue our global suicide.

Fixed gender roles creates a schism in the psyche that makes the ego of a person codependent with their lover because they seek in them a balance to their own mental imbalances. Whenever people start to think they own something, either an object or something that is alive problems will occur, especially when its actually a person that is owned. By having clearly defined and authoritarian gender roles the institution of marriage becomes a factory for the creation of workers pumped out in what is called the "family unit." Through a persons manufacturing, a child is infected with gender memes which from the earliest age (baby boys in blue, girls in pink) seek to make the soul repress anything that doesn't fit their assigned gender role. This "nuclear family" was specifically created by social engineers to promote and strengthen the kind of patriarchal capitalist system by encouraging non community family practises, private property and competition among various blood lines. It has also gone a long way to perpetuate racial and class segregation but also conformity in general, especially in the days when it was taboo to get a divorce, destroying social safety nets that would allow individuals to branch out if their home life became unhealthy.

So long as people repress aspects of their mind they will never be able to utilize their full potential, most are not even really aware of such aspects in themselves, in the case of males they will often feel due to their conditioning that such realities are homosexual or at least "girly" and will often fear it. Once again we see the tactic of divide and conquer and a divided mind is much easier to manipulate then a mind that truly knows itself. This further fragmentation creates a personality that is fundamentally seeking to put value distinctions on things based on how "male" or "female" the perception is and so we see a further degradation into dualist artificial values based on the inane pursuit of pure reason. This division of the two principles is quite probably the main weakness from which the archons have been able to exploit humans and condition them according to their mentally unbalanced and authoritarian point of view. If divide and conquer is the main tactic as it seems to be, then there can be no bigger division then that between male and female.

Men see that smart and dumb women, beautiful and ugly are all generally attracted to an incredibly limited and dysfunctional gender role and so men seeing they will have to lie to pretty much any woman will choose to the best of their ability a women who is easy to fool, someone who appears stupid or "ditsy." Seeing that deep emotional and intellectual satisfaction is impossible with such a stupid woman men will seek out a beautiful women in order to try in vain to compensate for this, the reasoning being that if you are going to have a fake relationship, it might as well be with a hot girl. Since men are not allowed to be emotional they project on to women the missing aspects of themselves in their desire to be a whole human, which creates in the man an attraction towards the cliché of the dumb blonde, or the porno culture in which we find ourselves. Women are thus compelled to conform to that kind of a gender role, the stereotype manifests in reality to a certain degree like a self fulfilling prophecy.

Mainstream women then use what intelligence they have to try and appear as the dumb blonde stereotype which no doubt instills within them a certain lack of respect for men whom they so often feel to be shallow and callous. Seeing the limitations of the male gender role and perhaps feeling insecure in a world they perceive to be filled with borderline psychopathic brutes, strait women become attracted to those whom make them feel safe. This safe feeling more often then not comes from the most psychopathic and brutal, a manly man they feel can protect them from the other males and compete within the system of murder and domination. This manifests its own self fulfilling prophecy and is strengthened by the cultural expectations of men providing women with the material lifestyle that they use to compensate for their own lack of mental stability.

Thus since both gender roles are pathological projections, each side is trying to live vicariously through the other because we are all forced to become mentally unbalanced. We are stuck in a cycle fed by both genders, where the division of the sexes is taking the direction of going to ever more absurd cultural cliches as the gender role memes evolve. So while feminists are right in some ways to get women to take on some traits from the male gender role, they can take it beyond the point of balance and start to hate their own gender role. Whats more they may ignore the fact that men too need to be balanced, that it is these males which are probably the most important tactically to change, since patriarchy will never end so long as there is still patriarchs.

The battle of the sexes of course takes on new dimensions within the context of the queer community and homophobia, these are large and important issues which I do not feel totally qualified to say much about. Suffice to say homophobia is directly linked in my mind to the repression of the feminine in general. I am not really queer at all, but through my spirituality I have definitely come to break out of the normal gender roles in some ways which Anarchist politics are not usually aware of. As such I have seen how people treat me differently, even in the Anarchist community, women are more suspicious of me and I am not as good at relating to men, but even some few queer people assume that anyone who breaks out of these gender roles must themselves be queer, because to some degree those people often believe in the very stereotypes they were trying to fight. From these experiences I realized those who are not aware of realities beyond form, who do not have gnosis of their bodiless spark of awareness, can only rationalize who they are and so are not fully capable of deconditioning their minds from culture roles. Dualism is the source of conflict, unity the greatest expression of love, but we should not make the mistake of putting these concepts in to a competition. All things can be defined in any way we want and when we learn that we have been doing this all along, instead of believing in symbols we do not understand, then we can overcome our ignorance.

There is an interesting problem today about being loving, it can in fact do much more damage in some cases than being hateful, really all hatred is, is a disagreement about what reality to love and so to simply proclaim "love is all you need" is really a shallow and naive statement. Love is all there is, so then yes I suppose it would be all you need, but a love of what? Does a heroin addict not love heroin? How about a love of murder? A Love of all people? Well certainly if you can honestly pull it off loving all people can be helpful, but if you love someone do you let them thrash around murdering other people you love? Is there to be no tough love? Is there no helping people to grow who are stuck in an unloving mind? Turning the other cheek creates just as many victims or more as an eye for an eye, in that the sadists who love to give pain will not be opposed and just go onto their next victim, it is enabling abusive behavior. What is needed is to disarm these people and get them out of power, not in a revenge mentality but to stop them from continuing to molest children and rape women, murder, and steal from old ladies, or create systems from which they can impose their wills on others. Even if we are filled with love for the perpetrators of such actions, it does not mean we should let them do these things, nor shrink from using the only effective tactics we have, direct action.

Seeking only love can not only turn you into a door mat, but a conformist who lies to themselves about who they are so that they will be accepted by the mainstream. If "all you need is love" then in this culture to be loved you need the name brand clothes and products and you need a position of power so that you can help your friends inflate their egos. Should we seek the love of a sadist who gets pleasure from our pain? What about the masochist who loves to hurt themselves? Surely John Lennon and Jesus didn't mean that kind of love? Well the fact remains love is more than what people feel at some hippie peace festival where everyone is more or less on the same page. Mark Chapman loved shooting John Lennon and Christians committed genocide against Natives as an act of love to save their souls and for love of Jesus, soldiers fight for love of country, love of their people, love of adventure and love of violence and yet it all goes so wrong. So it is the hippies notion that they are loving while others are not is based on the bias that their cultural view of love is dormant in all people, universally applicable and superior to everyone else's view of love, but is in reality nothing more than another form of authoritarian arrogance, that is hippies do not accept others for who they are, they want everyone else to be hippies. When not in denial hippies are still filled with some form of disgust, they generally don't want to be around people who think differently, people who are contrary to hippie ideals or who are "negative." Real love is altruism, real love is honesty, even if it means telling people honestly I do not love what you are doing, or who you are and here is why. The pursuit of nothing but harmony breeds conflict by not standing up for yourself and allowing others to run amok, how will others know they are making mistakes if we tell them we love everything they do? Real love is much more like the punk idea of plurality, individuality or being your true self and accepting others warts and all, but also telling others the truth when they piss you off and what's more punks do not want everyone to be a punk, they want everyone to be real.

So while being a loving person seems like a "good" idea (since love cannot be forced) the question remains, who's idea of love? I would argue the only sane way to love is to try and understand what it is you truly love, outside of exterior influences and ego, once you do that then you can start to contemplate how these values effect yourself and other people and then adjust. Extreme caution must always be kept that you aren't fooling yourself and just doing what is easiest, or falling into some artificial value system created by people you think are admirable, or your friends. Remember that Christians often act authoritarian out of a sense of love, they do not want us to go to hell and so seek to impose their religion in order to "save" us, so it is we do not need people to be more loving, we need people to have more understanding. How many conformists call their fellow conformists friends and yet if these people knew themselves they would realize if it wasn't for a fear of rejection and loneliness, they wouldn't want anything to do with these "friends." So much of the hippie ethic is geared toward harmony at all costs and avoiding conflict that often these people are only doing this out of hedonism and a personal laziness when it comes to having to deal with other people. Then the hippie can feel self righteous and use passive aggressive tactics when the other person acts stupid or loses their temper. While not all hippies are like this, I do see it in most and it is not love in these peoples hearts, it is fear and complacency, it is the pride of feeling like you are a better person because you have a more clearly defined moral code or that you have less of a temper. Anyone who can't find something worth changing in the world or isn't mad at something isn't paying attention. Love and hate is another false duality and you would be hard pressed to find a war that wasn't started by those who consider themselves more loving than their enemies.

In order to fix the problems of the world it has to be understood that many racists feel the need to enslave and exterminate other peoples in the name of love, a sexist may in the name of love feel that a women cannot take care of herself or make decisions or something stupid like that and so feel the need to control her and from their idiotic perspective, they do it out of love. What I am trying to say is that our ideas of love must come from brutal honesty first and foremost and also must not be totally fixed, that is to say we must always be ready to look at things in a new way if we are to have any kind of healthy love at all.

We do not need PC fascism any more then we need Nazi Fascism, I am sure Nazis were very polite to each other most of the time, they even loved each other but it doesn't mean they were healthy minded people. Just because you speak with a smile on your face and in a polite manner does not mean you are not a total asshole or that you are a good and loving person, just because you avoid conflict does not mean nobody has reason to confront you about what a jerk you are. Positive thinking is definitely not being in denial of everyone who has a critical attitude towards you.

All too often I see so called loving hippies when confronted abstain from the situation and then justify their actions because anyone who isn't polite or is confrontational must be wrong about everything. If we were all more comfortable with ourselves, then we would not be so easily offended by ignorant assholes saying stupid things. This is a razors edge of not allowing oppression yet not becoming oppressive in our own ways and its something that is not talked about enough in the world. I cant claim to have all the answers, I am certainly not a model for the ideal person, or what is traditionally thought of as a loving person or even a “good” person, but then I don't really think we should be having models for such things, inspiration yes, but not universal standards.

If you can only love people while you are on E or who you take E with then you are not a very loving person at all, you are in fact in love with a drug and whether or not that drug is a good thing, you shouldn't fool yourself into believing it is more than that. The total avoidance of conflict in the face of authoritarian tyrants is not the result of a peaceful person but a hedonist who is too lazy or cowardly to seek out the truth and go outside of comfort zones. Without confronting liars and ignorance we will sink into easy answers and comfortable pseudo truths which is really just wishful thinking, it is also more often than not a means of feeling superior to those who you think to be too aggressive. Life has pain, there is no way around it, nature has aggression and it has murder, to try and deny this is to deny nature and so in order to achieve unity you must not strive for total peace but integration of the light and dark, expect pain, prepare for it and embrace it. Do not bring it on or pass it out needlessly, but do not run from it for in so doing you will only give it power over you. In repressing our dark sides we only create more conflict and allow those energies to grow through our avoidance of dealing with them. By avoiding pain and our dark sides we fall into duality, but everything has purpose and everything is a means of growing our awareness and capacity for love. Seek out your fears and your hatred and embrace them, for in so doing you will learn what they are worth and be able to transmute them to something useful, rather than letting them remain as they are, use those energies to show you were you can grow your understanding.

Passively letting the world go to shit is not peaceful, it is suicidal and selfish, consenting through inaction is for self protection not peace or love and when words cannot defend you it is your actions that must do so. Polite conversation is the enemy of awareness, if we only stick to polite topics nobody will ever talk about anything worth while and no useful or transformative information will ever spread. Denial of the truth through complacent passivity is not really much better than intentionally lying. This passivity that allows bullies and tyrants to go on doing what they want because the “loving” people run from conflict, or anything that forces them to stand up for what they supposedly believe in is not love at all but fear. In my experience hippies are not filled with love or peace, but a desire to indulge in the pleasures of living a safe life that denies the existence of conflict, it may be that real peace can be accomplished, but it will not happen by ignoring all that is contrary to our comfortable little notions.

After enough time and exposure, in at least some subtle way we learn to love what we believe to be true, for example a person who believes the world necessitates lying will love lying. Not only this but a person exposed to different kinds of pain may become a masochist of sorts, a person who believes capitalism is the best possible way for humanity will love to work within it whatever the cost to human and environmental dignity and a person who sees hate and violence as the culturally acceptable way to get things will learn to love them. This happens through the mind's innate ability to adapt to circumstances and it's attempts to put things in an equilibrium. We can see hippie love as truth, but this is still a cultural limitation and so instead we should learn that the truth is we should strive only for the truth, and then we will love the truth and then we will act in truth and from there we will find the greatest peace possible.

The size of a persons heart is not measured by how much a person loves those who are like them, but by how much they love those who are different. This is true with all things, it is not much of an accomplishment to love only that which is beautiful and pleasant, especially since the individual is always deciding what to apply these labels to, but when you love all things you grow your heart. This is not to say that you should become a masochist or not try to change the world, but that thinking in black in white is a prison and some of the most beautiful things are those which seem ugly at first. At the same time, if love is the most powerful thing in the universe, then nothing can destroy a person quite like it.

Once we realize that it is more enjoyable to give than to take it can be tempting to try and be altruistic through giving all that you can, however it should be noted that by not occasionally taking you are limiting the joy of others to give, that by taking you can receive the joy of giving by giving the joy of giving to someone else. The thing that you receive may not be of as much worth to you as giving something but you are giving by taking and so pleasure is compounded. If you believe the divine wishes us to be happy then by taking pleasure in existence you are in this way being altruistic, of course the divine wants to give us pleasures far beyond the material and so you can turn your spiritual growth into an act of giving, by doing this we go into a feedback loop with the divine in that by becoming more altruistic we grow spiritually, we can take pleasure from this growth and the process feeds on itself, not to mention all the other reasons to grow spiritually and be altruistic. We should not think that there is only pure altruism and pure selfishness, most actions are somewhere in between, especially when we consider the oneness of things, but those who can be happy through giving have found a way of life that is truly and consistently open to joy.

We may wonder if things have an intrinsic value or if it is all arbitrary, in many ways I believe it is both simultaneously, we are all divine, we are one with everything, if the divine fits the label "good" then so is everything that exists. Being able to create anything as a divine being makes the value of such things arbitrary and relative, from which we get cultural and personal value systems, but in the end it all comes down to what you are trying to accomplish that determines what is "good." Many bible thumpers criticize atheists saying that without "god" there is no way for humanity to know what is right or wrong and that somehow this makes reality meaningless. Obviously this is wrong since there are so many great atheists out there, not to mention the dubious morality of their god according to their own standards, Yahweh is a hypocrite and so it is no surprise they are hypocrites which often "sin" themselves and only feign piety for selfish reasons. Now as all things are divine and all actions that anyone undertakes are acts of love or "Eros," from all things we choose according to our egos what seems relatively good and what we should will to manifest, so the question is not what is good? But what is worth willing? All things are arbitrary on one level and divine on another, so clearly we must will ourselves to be aware of the divine, which will allow us to know how to mediate the arbitrary.

There are many people who think they know what they want, think they know what is good, but upon experiencing it find themselves disappointed, or surprised, or at least find such pleasures fleeting and so the question is not as simple as many assume. What is it we truly want? What is our true will? What is worth devoting our energies to? To the Gnostics the point of life is to overcome the influence of the archons, or of astrological energies or any factors which rule us and hence prevent us from using our free will, from this perspective we could say our true will is to develop our capacity for free will, which is accomplished through gnosis. Many people will themselves to be ignorant, or powerless, or dualistic, or will themselves to see only the relative cultural values, many people have a will to abandon responsibility for their own happiness and awareness and all of these desires are the result of archons and so it is clear to me the true will is the will for freedom and freedom can only exist in Anarchy. In order to know what your true will is, you must first know the truth and in that process you will shed yourself of all lies, all that you willed for yourself in vain. To me it's exhilarating to think we participate so deeply in all levels of creation and that really free will is a fundamental aspect of reality, that we are blessed with the ability to do anything when we are ready to take on that power and will ourselves to do so.

Mandatory freedom is not truly freedom and so it is with free will. It is part of my fatalism to be a person who creates their own destiny, who chooses to use my free will. My will stretches out to direct all that I know with total precision. It is my will to have the awareness that allows me to control my addiction to megalomania and realize my true impulses, it is my will to know my true will. We control everything so completely we can control it to make everything outside our apparent grasp. What is value when everything is arbitrary? We are on the threshold of the dawn on a new era of awareness to which we will all be able to see even if we have our eyes closed. So that we may look upon each other and ourselves in totality and the image of hate will fade away. The process of transformation from multiple but separate awareness to singular interconnected awareness is underway. Of course you are Osiris, Krishna, Isis, Freya, Jesus, Sophia, Hekate, Buddha, the one, for there is no one else to be when there is only one. There is no one to save but yourself and there is no one to save us from but ourselves, there is no one to fear but yourself, at the same time there is no one to ignore and let suffer but yourself. Proper realization will put everything as it should be. In the end, we each fight our own Armageddon alone, in the mean time we fight to let everyone be free from those aspects of themselves that wish to control everyone else, the government ego of the collective mind.

How we all must seem to one who knows the truth. The beast in humanity which battles with the goddess, the great horror of the soul, ignorance of itself. To desire the worldly but not act on those desires is just as sinful as acting on them, but what is worse is that repressing desires keeps you from learning why they are not worth while and so you never grow beyond them. Probably everyone has secrets they would love to tell the world, everyone is afraid of losing love for something. We are experiencing the most decadent time in history and yet apathy has also never been as high. We struggle to lose our desire for we desire desire itself and have yet to face this demon. Familiarity breeds contempt so in some form or another we keep our eternal dissatisfaction by not facing the demon desire which is the source of power for all its various offspring. We know once we plunge into desire itself totally all values will disintegrate, all lust for this world will vanish in any sense that has been familiar before. How often is it said that anticipation is better than the actual thing being waited for, that it is "the journey not the destination." Once this is achieved the distractions will be meaningless and the true path will be revealed. Where it goes I cannot say.

Counter cultures are often denounced for their hedonistic lifestyles but when you consider the mainstream theft, murder and brutalizing of the poor followed by the rape of the environment perpetuated by people who support the system because it has defined itself as "legal," then the counter culture doesn't look so bad. Having sex freely and getting high and avoiding the system as much as possible is very much the nobler act and far more in line with wisdom. This is not to say escapism is better than resistance, but it is better than consenting to tyranny. There can be no justification for a system that destroys the capabilities and potentials of life for the profit of the few, base hedonism which does not hurt anyone is much healthier than refined hedonism through consumption of the Earth's life support system. That any moral outrage is possible against queers and illicit drug users who harm no one is among the biggest hypocrisies in history, masquerading under a thin veneer of family values people with incredible hang ups and insecurities have imposed puritanical rule on others. Their god won't let them have fun and so no one should according to them. Many Christians hate Sharia Law but they love to pick and choose from Leviticus to make their own theocracy and it is this kind of authoritarian garbage that permeates mainstream values systems and that has allowed for claims of moral superiority when they work to commit crimes against humanity and the rest of life on this planet. Their "moral" justification is that it is the most expedient way for them to make their living, anything else would be an infringement of their "freedom."

When we dive into hedonism we will find in this lifetime or some other that the toys of consumerism are for children no matter how far technology goes. Indeed the greatest obstacle to discovering this is that as technology continuously progresses there is always a new toy to try and fill the void with. Most peoples ideas of hedonism will no doubt lead ironically to pain, but the true hedonist knows what will truly lead them to happiness. We should do what we want but we should know what we truly want and that is what is best for us. Knowing what is best for us isn't always easy though and many westerners are nihilists without even knowing it. One thing must also be kept in mind that yes we can do whatever we want, all us humans really know for sure is that we seem to be alone in the universe on an isolated rock left by ourselves to make whatever rules we want. However, whatever actions we take we will always have to face the consequences of causality.

Most people do not do things that will satisfy the desire they really have, they do some diluted abstraction of a suppressed desire that is rooted by what are often hidden motivations. If for example someone used my idea of experiencing unsuppressed desires as justification to murder someone then perhaps they should first look at their desire to shift personal responsibility onto others. Those who think they may want to murder based on what I have said should also look to first overcome the desire to be angry, or the desire for self pity, these are far more fundamental than the desire for murder and so if they are properly handled then the desire for murder will go away by itself. Never mind the fact that if they are killed or imprisoned because of a murderous rampage, they will not be able to dive in to many other desires and if they desire murder more than anything else, well then it is bound to happen whatever I say. Generally speaking however we do not want to know what is best for us because then we wouldn't be able to blindly indulge in trivial things. I suppose most of us within our main awareness just want what is easy, but on a deeper level in the long run surrendering to unconditional love without all the toys is much easier.

Sex is a natural drive and should not be repressed any more than the need for air or food, and eventually you will find a society based on free love, romance, or being polyamorous to be far more fulfilling than the present society in which casual sex usually requires lying. It is possible to cause yourself harm by hyper ventilating or by getting fat, likewise there can be benefits from controlled breathing practices and fasting, so while I find it hard to think of much of a downside to excessive sex, Tantric sex, or withholding orgasm can have amazing results. Maximizing happiness is the goal and this can only be accomplished by knowing what we truly want which is to maximize happiness. So what we realize is that its not really any material thing we want but a state of mind. The best way to effect the mind is not through physical action, but mental action, this is of course achieved by "knowing thyself." Maximizing happiness will not come from an imbalanced mind, though you may have to experience some excess before you believe me, or before you can overcome the curiosity of what excess is like, knowing yourself does mean knowing your limits, which means you have to go past them in some cases! While at times you should know what it means to be alone, maximizing happiness cannot occur without social interaction as it too is part of our innate natural drives and so we must also keep in mind that maximizing happiness means we learn to make others happy as well and that a purely selfish hedonism is actually incredibly limited. Once we have tried all there is at the divine's buffet of life, then we will know what we truly want, we will know how to make a balanced meal and get the nourishment we need for our growth as humans.

Buddhism expresses the human predicament very well, there is no good and evil only our egos projection, a truly enlightened person does not "feel attracted to or repelled, by things seen (dittha), heard (suta), sensed (muta), or cognized. (viññāta)" Not only must we surrender the desire for material things, but the desire to hate that which offends us, only then can we start to live in a state of mind where wisdom can flourish and our actions cease to be based on ignorance. Buddhists wouldn't use the term "true will" as they thought of it being more like surrendering the will, but the principle is the same from another point of view, the true will in part at least is to stop desiring, or stop engaging the untrue will for useless things which create problems for humanity, which according to Buddha is attachment to all desires. So we must will ourselves to overcome attachment, until we get to the point where we can stop willing all together and exist in anarkhos, nirvana, windless sales, the state of gnosis which is free of ignorance and personal projections of value and bias.

Desire is not "bad" but must be understood if you are to not be controlled by pettiness like consumerism and lust that drives a person to dishonesty and a loss of independence and all manner of things that are a distraction from things that give true pleasure. While Buddhist institutions have certainly collaborated with governments or have acted as a theocracy, Buddhist teachings certainly do promote an Anarchist world. While I am not ascetic in many ways, it is clear to me consumerism is absolutely anathema to truth, to happiness and to the health of the planet in general. These attachments bind a person to fulfil these desires whatever the cost and in that choice of priorities consciousness is narrowed to screen out all that is not part of those desires. In this narrowing of consciousness all kinds of unwise things will be done and all kinds of trouble will be brought upon the person by the mistakes they make because they were not paying attention to the big picture, to the true will. (for example global warming and wage slavery) Those who seek power to satisfy the egos desire will only find disappointment and temporary pleasure, seek not power but truth, and when you find that truth you will have the knowledge to know what true power is, what is truly worth effecting with your power and how you can achieve such goals.

I built my own world to escape from the real one, but it turns out my creation is worse than reality, and now I have forgotten the way out! I know a made an exit in there somewhere, but I have to find it indirectly, find it in the courage to live truth and be truth. The best test of a persons character is when they will do what is right when they do not know they are being tested. I know the pleasures of the flesh aren't sin, just relatively unpleasurable to the ecstasy of immateriality, they are in fact the comfort of Earthlings who are lost and far from home. I do not mean the gross consumerism of the state but true hedonism, knowing the source of all pleasure, that which is the fountain head of ecstasy. The true pleasures of the flesh are those which are created as instinctual and natural joys given to us by the divine as intrinsic desires, the quest for knowledge and exercise of creativity, companionship, sex, food and altered states, the joy of music and art. These are the reflections of heaven which we may know on Earth and so long as they are treated with the respect that divine union deserves, they are the means by which we may come to experience the truth of divinity. Do not seek anything above anything for that is to deny the divinity in all things and seek comfort in the illusion of hierarchy.

Not wanting love, not wanting to be alone, not wanting to want, just being what I can, a being trying to be itself. The closest thing to a goal there is, is to be happy never reaching your goals, this is the true drive to be, not to achieve, but through detachment having no fear and accomplishing great works that mean nothing to you personally. Are you in love with life? Is it an abusive relationship? Stand up for yourself and make your own way in the world, not to impress anyone, not to prove something to yourself, but because this world needs inspiration.

The attachment to desire for immediate gratification is probably the biggest threat there is to freedom. Ascetic anti consumerism, freedom from desire goes beyond abolishing capitalism, to abolishing the desire to have someone tell you how to run your life. But it is not desire that is the problem, but attachment to desire, for it is the attachment which makes life hard when things don't turn out as desired. It is attachment which obscures the true will and seeks comfort rather than awareness and once that path is taken, all consciousness is eventually taken over by it. Put more effort into determining what you should put your efforts in to, do not have emotional attachment to your beliefs, only have emotional attachment to the act of pursuing truth, then all of life will be ripe with potential gratification and wisdom.

You may of gleaned some insight in to this concept of "true will" by now, but it is a much more complicated philosophy than you might first assume, after all it is not easy to figure out what you truly will. It has already been argued by some that the Thelemic pursuit of "true will" has Anarchistic tendencies and while it does have obvious Anarchist implications, it would be very superficial to claim like some critics that this is all it means. While Crowley's personal politics left much to be desired in terms of Anarchism and there is no clear evidence he ever studied it in depth, it does not mean his philosophy is not highly compatible with it. Ideas such as "do as thou wilt," were explicitly explained to mean that we should not follow authorities who are against our will and that to keep others from their true will is a violation of Thelemic principles. There are a variety of Thelemic writings which could be interpreted from an Anarchist perspective, most importantly are Crowley's "Liber Oz" and his work entitled "Duty" which explains the rights and obligations of all Thelemites to themselves and to other life forms on this planet. While Crowley didn't exactly realize it and some Thelemites might not like it, the obvious conclusion to make from such writings is that Anarchism is the only kind of society that could live up to such ideas. What's more it is undeniable that ultimately an Anarchist society is one devoted to fulfilling the true will of each person and that I have personally found that both philosophies are very helpful for understanding the other.

From a mystical and political perspective it makes a lot of sense that we should be getting in touch with what we really want and not just what we have been told to want, if more people in the world knew themselves they would not settle for being blind puppets who are bought off with a dishwasher and a TV. If people knew their true will they would realize they are missing out big time in life by spending it in a job that they hate which is also quite often pretty useless to the kind of society that people would truly want. If it was not for fear and doubt, what kind of person would not want to be in an Anarchist society? If it was a truly functioning Anarchist society who would truly choose to be a wage slave, clearly the only people who may prefer the system we have are the oligarchs who are manipulating others. I think that for the most part if they really had any self awareness even the oligarchs would be much happier in an Anarchist society, even if it meant they give up living in huge mansions relatively alone, they will have gained something much more valuable, a much deeper level of fulfilment on all levels. So for the most part, given the rising rates of depression and suicide, the increasing gap between the rich and the poor and a number of other statistics, it is quite obvious people are not really going for what they truly want in life. People are spending their lives doing what they think, or have been told will make them happy rather than what actually will, they are afraid to go for the chance at true happiness in favour of safe mediocrity.

From this perspective "do as thou wilt" and searching for the "true will" is very Anarchist, but it should be understood there are deeper mystical levels to this. To me the true will is at least at first the search for truth and the expression of it, for if you do not know the truth of who you really are, you cannot know your true will. It does often seem like people do have a will to deceive themselves but this is not the true will, this is a more mundane desire which stems from fear of not being able to accomplish the true will or deal with its ramifications. If Anarchism is the truth, then the true will must also be something in line with Anarchism, it could not be masochistic or elitist for if it was then it would be self deception. So everyone's true will must be at least in part to find the truth, to do this fully we must know the highest truth that underlies all things, to learn this we must join with our higher selves knowledge of all these things and so the two goals are interrelated and ultimately part of the same act. Anyone who has reached their higher selves, that is to say more or less become enlightened and reached spiritual attainment knows them self completely and so I would argue would want others to become aware themselves, among other reasons because they would see their own interconnection with everyone else. By its very personal nature this is not something that can be forced, it cannot come from dogma or texts but it can be encouraged. One of the best ways to do this would be to create an environment which allows people to explore and consider their true wills and help to provide them a means to fulfil it, so long as it does not impede others doing the same. I can think of no better way of organizing society for this goal than Anarchism, in fact it almost seems to be custom designed for this purpose and is a goal that would otherwise be impossible on a mass scale.

Religions are great as long as nobody follows them, at least not just one religion or according to dogma, but are religions part of the true will? So long as your religion has you dependent on authorities for truth, you will never have that truth yourself, which I believe very much to be a part of a person's true will. The truth is the source of all forms and so obsessing over what might be the right form is more of a distraction than an act of true will. From introspective laziness people wish to believe what authorities have told them, all the while accepting what they say without question, or at least unbiased scrutiny. However people can never free themselves of the responsibilities of free will without plunging in to ignorance and they will always be left with the choice to determine the truth, even if authorities say their truth is the only truth. You cannot cop out on your decision making responsibilities by having a guru, because you have thus decided to have faith in whatever this human (or even divine being incarnate) tells you. So while your cognitive abilities may be flawed, having a brilliant guru will do you no good if you do not know how to interpret their wisdom, something that can only happen when you know how to think for yourself. Without the crucial aspect of critical and outside the box thinking, even if your guru speaks the truth you will not be able to comprehend it and so instead of trying to find infallible authorities, we must learn how to learn ourselves, rather than learning to regurgitate superficial words. This kind of thinking however is much harder than just being told you only need to read a book and you will get to everlasting peace, no the truth is much harder than that, you must be capable of developing your own ideas. This doesn't mean we should arrogantly presume nobody has anything to teach us, but that all teachers are also students and all students can be teachers. In the same way that there is more to being a scientist than knowing other peoples science, that each scientist must be capable of doing their own research and creating their own theories, spiritual seekers must learn to do their own experiments and come to their own conclusions.

Can capitalism lead someone to their true will? Since capitalism relies on endless growth and an authoritarian monetary system that systematically denies people what they really want in order to profit from the laws of “supply and demand” and creates a situation of servitude for the profit of the few, capitalism is one of the biggest obstacles to humanities' true will. Not only this but capitalism beguiles people and distracts them from thinking about what it is they really want to do with their lives, keeping people busy doing what they are told to do in order to make money. While a detailed interpretation of Liber Oz and Duty is beyond the scope of this book and most of it is obvious enough in terms of its Anarchist implications, I will make a few comments here as it pertains to capitalism in a way that many have missed. Crowley's essay Duty states that “It is a violation of the Law of Thelema to abuse the natural qualities of any animal or object by diverting it from its proper function, as determined by consideration of its history and structure.” Crowley does go in to the environmental implications of this, that it is wrong to waste resources but I would add that as capitalism cannot help but be wasteful in its goal of achieving profits, it is fundamentally contradictory to this precept. Much deeper than this I would argue that the hoarding of wealth and nature by the rich and by all those who believe in the concept of private property is itself a waste and diverts it “from its proper function.” That hoarding something keeps people from using it, thus it cannot fulfil its function and so those who are not using something have no will to have it in that moment, thus they have no right to it except when they use it. Private property creates waste in this way and so demands the “abuse” of nature and objects to create more products that will sit unused or in bank vaults, just for those who are intent on acquiring more than they can possibly use. He goes on to say, “Thus, to train children to perform mental operations, or to practice tasks, for which they are unfitted, is a crime against nature.” Who could truly argue against the fact that training employees for capitalism perpetrates many “crimes against nature” and that most people in general are unfit for their work under the capitalist system. (not to mention the current education system which is itself training employees.) “To seek to dominate or influence another is to seek to deform or to destroy him; and he is a necessary part of one's own Universe, that is, of one's self.” So as the government and capitalism is based in competition and domination, as with all other forms of coercive hierarchy, they are in essence outlawed by Thelema.

The idea that someone is justified in their actions because they are “just doing their job” is a great example of the incredibly flawed logic and morality of workers and managers, police, military etc, which is of course incredibly prevalent in today's society. As if the fact that you are being paid to destroy and enslave everything is an excuse. Would we accept this reason from a mob hitman? Then why do we accept it from people like soldiers, police or loggers, animal furriers, or oil workers?

The statement that you are just doing your job is like saying, “I am just acting like a tool because I want to surrender my decision making ability. I am doing horrible things because when it comes to feeding my family this is the most convenient manner to do it. I am only destroying the environment because I don't want to look for a different job. I am justified in locking people up and foreclosing homes because it is culturally sanctioned within the market economy. I am only enslaving other humans because I don't care about learning how my actions effect the world or what I can do to actually contribute to society. I am just enslaving people in the third world because that is how you run a business. I am only killing brown people because someone told me to do it. These are not reasons that are justified to do anything and I will suggest to you, that if you ever find yourself saying "I am just doing my job" then you have the wrong job, if for no other reason then you are not really very motivated or attached to your work, if all it is to you is just a job.

In my experience people do these things because its easier than taking responsibility for their lives and doing what they really want in life, but the ramifications of them not doing their true will is the world we live in. This is a world where anyone can justify just about anything so long as they are being paid to do it, this is a mentality worse than that of a prostitute, because at least the street corner crack whore has relatively no illusions about what they are and they aren't actually hurting anyone but themselves. This total abandonment of logic, responsibility and acknowledgement is the power of the consensus trance to justify our actions based on what other people are doing, or what others consider a worthy reason to do things and there are many more examples that go completely unnoticed by everyone. The true will is based on truth and so the greatest obstacle to this is becoming distracted by all the false wills that society tries to sell to you and sadly we are presented with so many possible distractions that most do not even realize they are being distracted.

The desire to conform makes us ignore information that is contrary to that desire, but we also have the desire to avoid feeling guilty and so we ignore the fact that we ignore any information that is against the mainstream of our chosen form of cultural values. When we accept insanity as an everyday matter of common sense then we have surrendered our consciousness to authorities who do not have our best interests at heart and we consent to our own destruction out of laziness and fear towards learning anything outside the orthodox. Once you accept liars as authorities you will fight to preserve their illusions due to your own pride and fear of change. (there's no way YOU could be fooled, its everyone else who is a fool right?) This is all a direct result of people not really knowing what their true will is, but accepting rulers telling them what it is they truly want.

Clearly the true will is not necessarily the obvious will, for example a junkie may want heroin but not really want it deep down, a person may want to be strait but deep down are queer, a person may want to keep their virginity due to Christianity but want to get laid, there are many examples where people fool themselves into doing the opposite of their true will. Maybe this seems naive but I believe a consciously aware person's true will is not to participate in the global genocide that is occurring right now. So it seems to me that people's true will is in terms of community actually for Anarchy, but their conscious will is often for tyranny, or some degree of it that uses euphemisms. Clearly getting people to act on their true will is not as simple as telling them what it is, the consensus trance can only be broken by making people more aware and so the people must be made to understand there are people right now living their true will, people who have stopped making excuses and faced their fears.

Anarchism then is much more than an idea about politics or the lack there of, it seems to me to represent a fundamental law of the universe, that of free will, which not only means we can make our own decisions but do whatever we want. However just as there are other people to consider in Anarchism there is consequences for our actions in the universe of free will. Since we are the divine, why would God/ess want to limit our freedom and power unless of course we weren't loving and aware enough and it was our own will to limit our metaphysical power. "Love is the law, love under will." To make something happen we first have to love the situation we are in so as to transmute the fear, then truly love what we want to happen so we can have a pure will for that goal manifesting. The fullness has to take the pain of sadism and masochism and as we are all it, when we hurt someone "else" we hurt ourselves and in that sense we hurt the fullness itself. War and government is the neurosis of the world soul and on some levels we are severely mentally ill. To do your true will and to allow others to do theirs with no impingement is to be truly mentally healthy.

Although hedonism is great and important it does not mean the most beneficial thing in life is to become a heroin addict. To do so would be escapism and if you feel the need to escape you aren't happy, which means you aren't living your true will, not to mention you are then not doing a very good job of being hedonistic. Hedonism is the pursuit of pleasure and so to be a good hedonist we must do what is ultimately pleasurable and that is our true will, that which is the most pleasurable. Of course if we lived in a world where everyone let everyone live their true will then I don't think people would have the desire to escape. It's important to keep in mind as you grow in magickal awareness and practice that the emphasis should not be to get yourself a bunch of toys or money or sex or other purely selfish motivations. While these things can be nice and I am not about to say you should never use magick for material things, there are more important things than physical pleasure and a lot of things which are much more pleasurable. You can learn a lot about yourself based on what you think you want, learning to "be careful what you wish for" you will realize what is really important when getting material things does not make you happy. It is handy and good to know how to manipulate reality but the real benefit of learning magick is learning how to become a more aware person, to face your demons and create the kind of mindset that you really want. To realize your true will and come into union with your higher self is the real motivation for magick, or at least it should be unless you want to go in circles chasing fairy gold your whole life. Learn how to connect with Chaos and grow as a person and all the magickal abilities will happen as a side effect, the thing is once you can do that, then material things don't seem so appealing, or at least they don't control you anymore.

In his own magickal diaries Crowley would write, "I have been asking Ethyl about Political Wisdom." (Ethyl refers to his experiments with huffing ether) "I find do what thou wilt is given by NE SUTOR ULTRA CREPIDAM in a very humble but important way." This translates to "Shoemaker, not above the sandal" and refers the idea that a person should not act as authorities in matters which they have no expertise. Bakunin's quote that he will trust a shoemaker to make shoes is highly relevant here, as despite our essential equality, we have different qualities and skills as individuals, thus different roles which our true wills will take. Continuing Crowley says "I got too, an idea of what I am fighting—and am ready to die—for. Parallel: battle of Ivry (was it?) where Protestant defeat would have meant the invasion of France by a swarm of Monks, spies, inquisitionists etc. Now I want to protect children—who should be crowned and conquering—from parents, schoolmarmes, doctors, tax gatherers, lawyers, parsons, politicians etc. It's hard to say what one means on such a big scale especially as this war seems to have no precedent. Of course there must be tuition, family discipline, hygiene, and so on: but at present it is the official or one acting as such who must be squelched. The more I think, the more my vision clouds over, with thoughts. I'm certainly not an Anarchist, for the family is the smallest and so vilest unit of government: nor a Socialist, for the state is the largest and so the least human unit. I suppose then, that—with Ethyl as without—I want a Patriarchal-Feudal system run by initiated Kings. I think, though, that in applying the Law of Thelema to all cases necessity will indicate the form of government required." This last remark is interesting and refers to Pagan notions of theocracy, no doubt Crowley would want to be the king, but probably wouldn't like other people in power. This attitude is also found in Crowley's "Book of Lies" Chapter 81, entitled "Louis Lingg" after one of the Anarchists who took the fall for the Haymarket affair, "I am not an Anarchist in your sense of the word: your brain is too dense for any known explosive to affect it. I am not an Anarchist in your sense of the word: fancy of a policeman let loose on society! While there exists the burgess, the hunting man, or any man with ideals less than Shelley's and self discipline less than Loyola's-- (Ignatius Loyola the founder of the Jesuits) in short, any man who falls far short of MYSELF-- I am against Anarchy, and for Feudalism. Every "emancipator" has enslaved the free."

From this and other things we do get clues as to Crowley's view being in accordance with my interpretation of true will, but he was admittedly mixed up when it came to politics and we can see that he was clearly not well read on Anarchist ideas. The argument in the Book of Lies that Anarchy would not work because we cannot trust the police to be free is an interesting one, albeit a farcical one and this little poem is a good example of Crowley's paradoxical humour. In the end I don't think that Crowley really believed he fully lived his true will and so if we actually do as he says we will not take him as an expert in politics and so not really listen to him. It is a precept of his religion of Thelema that a person should not speak of things of which they do not really know, and since no one really knows how others should live it follows that we should not go around telling other people how to live, hence Anarchism is the only way society could run under such a philosophy. Crowley himself said he was unsure about what politics would look like in his ideal world, but that "necessity" would be the deciding factor and we can see Anarchism is necessary for everyone to achieve their true will, even if Crowley was too ignorant to recognize it. I cannot see how it would be anyone's true will to be the top of a hierarchy, for this would be a dreadful responsibility that would distract a person from far more important and interesting things, not to mention it would place inherent limitations on other people achieving their true will, thus authorities can only lead to ignorance. As this would also be a negation of oneness it would also be a contradiction to Crowley's notion that, "every man and every woman is a Star!" Or as he says in duty, "Unite yourself passionately with every other form of consciousness, thus destroying the sense of separateness from the Whole, and creating a new baseline in the Universe from which to measure it." He may have broken many important barriers and came to some great realizations which are essentially Anarchist, but being the first of his own particular type, as is natural he made more than a few mistakes about its application.

Crowley having been raised in a puritanical upper class Victorian household would of had many archons to overcome and he most certainly carried himself as an aristocratic man, and an authority on many things. While riddled with contradiction there is evidence he had at least an intuitive understanding that Anarchism is ultimately the only way things can go if we are to achieve our true will. According to one biography Crowley would reportedly sometimes say that "at heart he was an aristocrat, in mind, a kind of Anarchist" and there in lies the dualist egotism he never fully overcame. Though, even when he was aristocratic it was egalitarian and more out of a seeming hatred of weakness and imposed conformity, he also says, "live as the kings and princes, crowned and uncrowned, of this world, have always lived, as masters always live" and in this way all people are monarchs as in Alchemical symbolism. In his book "Confessions" he writes, "[The Law of Thelema] admits that each member of the human race is unique, sovereign and responsible only to himself. In this way it is the logical climax of the idea of democracy. Yet at the same time it is the climax of aristocracy by asserting each individual equally to be the centre of the universe." So while I can agree with much of Thelemic philosophy I have no problem rebelling against Crowley or correcting his obvious mistakes, prejudice and apolitical opportunism, but then that is after all what Crowley would want, people who think for themselves.

In this world we are most often ignorant or wilfully in denial of our true will and when we combine this with an inefficient means of pursuing truth or our true will it is because we are plagued by an even deeper ignorance. The only absolute is infinity and infinity in truth is a kind of limitless freedom, and so the pursuit of the truth which must be absolute in order to be totally true, is the pursuit of freedom. Governments and morality therefore are a very ignorant and inefficient means of pursuing truth or freedom, for true freedom means freedom for all beings within infinity. This means in truth freedom can only come from Anarchism and the abolition of duality which is a limitation on infinity and so a product of ignorance, but with knowledge, freedom and truth will spread to all people and then we will be on to something beautiful. When we escape the illusion of good and evil and instead focus on raising awareness and a world which is truly practical, (one where we work together instead of against each other for the profit of the few "moral elite") then I know we all will know what true "goodness" really is. When humanity decides its true will is not to oppress and murder each other it will come to the conclusion that Anarchism is the only kind of society that can accomplish this, it is the only way we can reach our true will, to reach our full potential and be set free from our illusions.

Are You Having Fun Yet?

Get up, its time to go to that glorious show,
Doom coming you better hide, its time to be fake, life is a ride.
Don't you know there is no protection, sell your life away for an hourly wage or no one will want to share it with you.
Eat the Friday night alive and drink it in,
This is your time for release, the time to make and ass of yourself.
Did you want a quiet night at home, are you lucky enough to have one?
Factory line workers who want to live,
Helping to fund some others death by a faceless master with ice for blood, of whom no one is more enslaved.
Seeing only limitation, seeing only the duties of destruction,
Starving innocence, people trading a forest for a ghetto.
If you don't abuse the women in your life at least mentally, how will she ever respect you?
If you don't make the man in your life feel superior, how will he ever love you?
Or maybe you just have to learn to do it sub consciously to each other so you can have a clean conscience.
Now send that women to go do the dishes and don't forget to hate anyone who is a different colour.
There is nothing like obsessive compulsive colour coding to make you feel important.
Look at all the people walking down the street, can you see everyone who is desperate to feel alive?
Can you see who cant see themselves?
Watching or doing, everyone is screwing,
Twisting expectations to the final conflagrations,
Where are we going to? Is it desired by me or you?
Step back and think is this as hard as we make it?
There are no real rules, grammar or otherwise,
Don't hold yourself back for some final attack.
Time is leaving and things will get stranger,
If you aren't living in the moment you aren't living at all.
We've always worked together its just been for humanities fall.
We can make a correction and change our direction,
But will have to go out of old comfort zones.
Those old violent undertones.
War in your mind keeping out the decision for peace,
The alternative is hopeless that there's nothing left to teach.

Chapter 12 - There, Inmost point, a Strange land Dwelling in eternity,

In my experience it is quite rare to find someone who is anti-Anarchist who has actually bothered to find out anything specific about it, bothered to read the literature and see exactly how plausible it is and how such a society might be run. All arguments against Anarchism that are applicable today that I know of have been answered in great detail over a hundred years ago and yet Anarchism remains obscure. Anarchism was probably most popular during the 30's or the time of Emma Goldman and the Spanish civil war, but the government has done a superb job of making people forget about it, or spinning it from a very well defined and explained social practice to something only criminals believe in when it suits them. I remember talking to an older man once about politics and it came up that I am an Anarchist and his reply was "ah no you're not, you're a nice kid", he didn't believe me when I tried to explain there was more to it than doing whatever you want. He demanded we look it up in the dictionary so that he could prove it to me, he then apologized when he realized he had no idea what he was talking about. This shows just how ineffective Anarchists have been at spreading the word and this is a sad fact that must be fixed if people are to ever really grow.

It is a cruel kind of ignorance that allows people to talk about how stupid or evil Anarchism is when they haven't read one book on the subject or even a small article. The problem is that political ignorance is easier, if you knew there was a much much better way of running things then it would be a lot harder to justify sitting on your ass and letting the world go to hell, you might not have such a clear conscience about the horrors of capitalism if you knew that there were alternatives. All too many people would rather be wrong and part of the group that is winning, then right and an outsider, today being called an Anarchist is almost as bad as being called a Nazi, except that people actually take Nazis seriously. The vast majority of people would have a completely different view of Anarchism if they only took the time to look into it, but why with their arrogance would they bother to do that when the TV so politely offered to do all the thinking for them.

The problem is not a lack of information, especially in the days of the internet, the problem now is that Anarchism has the complete opposite connotations to its true meaning and that people in general are much too apathetic and fearful when it comes to politics. If Anarchism is to become popular, perhaps in the beginning it must have some shallow mainstream value, some kind of covert semi Anarchist subversion technique that will spread through the culture to make people more aware of non hierarchical organization and how it is applicable in everyday lives in a very practical and enjoyable way. Its a disgusting thought to think of repackaging Anarchism so that it could be marketed to the mainstream, it would also be incredibly hard to do this in a way that could simultaneously have mass appeal to consumer culture but not be assimilated by corporations to be sold back at us. Perhaps this is not the answer at all, making activism and political awareness a trend that is entertaining, it would no doubt have to be handled very carefully, but then considering how little progress Anarchism has made in the last 40 years, there may be no other option.

The media must be infiltrated and Anarchist memes implanted, as long as no one is personally profiting, and Anarchism is not corrupted into consumerism, I don't see a problem with it. We have already seen corporate attempts to co opt the Anarchist symbol, and culture, they are really trying with punk rock, we need things that will be taken in by the machine, but which will ultimately infect it with Anarchy. This idea, disturbing as it might be points to the fact that unentertaining truth cannot compete with disinfotainment, that is the brand of Anarchy has horrible public relations with the market obsessed masses, numbed by years of manipulation, ideas about autonomy are confusing to the populace. The culture of corporate artifices, the wall of manufactured landscapes is so complete that the real world is a foreign and alienating thing to them, whether or not we are trying to destroy this way of life, we as Anarchists must try to relate to such people in their own way, if we are to get passed the emotional blocks which keep people from living in truth. We do not have to beat them at their own game, but we do have to play with them if we want them to listen while we try and talk them out of the spectacle, the game of misdirection. This may seem authoritarian and if not handled correctly could be, but the alternative is spewing propaganda telling them everything the masses believe is evil and that they should listen to everything you say and change their life completely, an attitude which is definitely authoritarian.

Rome wasn't burnt in a day, but when it comes to informing the public, most people won't even bother to learn something about Anarchy and this is perhaps the most crucial issue Anarchists face today, but few of them seem to acknowledge that Anarchism is seen as a joke by the bourgeois. The first thing that needs to change is the common person's eagerness to be ignorant, remember having all the information in the world won't help you if no one will take you seriously enough to listen to you. We must use images, which are not necessarily overtly Anarchist to destroy the image of America or our local nationalist ideals being healthy or "good" and if we can do that, then people will on their own start to look for alternatives. Anarchists have to adapt their tactics accordingly, so long as people take the convenience of labelling and dismissing things they do not personally investigate, they will throw out the truth and their freedom and they will do so eagerly. I realized this by taking part in dozens of protests yet seeing almost nothing change, seeing the media either lie or ignore the issues and focus on the most superficial aspects of the protest itself. Thinking about how meaningless and ineffective mainstream legal protest is, I took some acid and decided to focus on finding a solution and the following is the result.

Alone

They will only listen when I have nothing left to say,
I wanted to improve life but I forget to give time for play.
Irrational humour and love abandoned to court wisdom's gaze,
Searching through a myriad of cornucopias has left me in a rainbow haze.
Not comfortable with contentment or satisfied with seeking,
Building the minds structure with efforts always peeking.
Finding the errors with settling for superficial opportunities that arrive,
But never finding the depths of worthy desire leaving me feeling less than alive.
Exploring my soul defining as I go, bearing it all to show, trying to dissolve ego.
Going deeper, with no end in sight, my eyes shine with a burning blue light.
If they ever wanted me, it was to distract them from the struggle of their plight.
They didn't value one who forgot what they thought was so funny.
To stop attaining possessions the biggest sin against their sacred money.
Got to have bravado to be the man who wins the girl,
I couldn't just show her that her mind is as the universe's swirl.
Expecting more of her than I do for myself and others,
To be with me would take a supernatural lover.
I want more than I deserve or maybe I'm just insecure,
I've made up my mind, I don't know my worth and that I am unsure.
Unwilling to fight even to defend makes me easily defeated,
But I never really lose because I know power games are for the conceited.
Simple rhymes with endless complexities of thought,
Philosophical masturbation is the only thing I've got.
Still I'm trying to improve, I'm writing out my blatant mind,
On the trail and on the move, no one cares about what I find.
There's some darkness and an unquenchable light that burns,
To be a leader sending them to lead themselves expect no reward,
You'll have little success as few will leave the company of the horde.
Just don't be mad when no one can lead you or ever understand,
Find the joy of healing others when their down, if they'll take your hand.
Though there wont be many who are willing and my ability is even less,
I don't know what else to do is something I must confess.
I hold onto the faith that destroys just who I am,
Because it is the proof that not all religion is a scam.

The Protest of Reality

Many people wish to change the world and make the government more responsible, but protest and activism have largely failed to get most people socially active, the best reason I can think of for this is because traditional activism does not in itself motivate or entertain the common people. Despite good intentions and causes that should get everyone involved, it is almost inherently an intellectual elitist activity, which has only served to channel the passions of the common people away from participation. It has in some ways created a distinct social class of activists, who define themselves as such and so are separate from non activists. This distinction in some cases is even seen as a profession and while I completely agree with devoting yourself to creating social change, it is something which cannot help but create division among those who would like to improve the world in some way or another. In some cases this type of activism has actually resulted in a very efficient means of taking away people's personal power. This is because it has among other things created the illusion of a free society by sending the message that by being one in a sea of chanting protesters and waving a placard you are achieving an effective means of dissent and social movement, it is also built on the assumption the government actually listens to the people it rules or that they are entitled to their status as our rulers. The message then of such a group is as impersonal and unemotional as the very draconian laws that are likely being protested against. This form of activism, that of conventional pacifist protest and appealing to authorities and the mindset there of, serves more of a constraint on the individual than the system because at least the system can be pointed at and defined in a much clearer sense. With discernment we see the loss caused by the rulers is so profound that no appropriate punishment could simply be asked for, getting hung up in the horrors of this world we may consider sacrificing ourselves as martyrs of peace, but instead of thrashing around in a world turned upside down, we must take a moment to reflect, to suspend our actions and accept the gravity of the situation. With such a limited model of dissent the people who would be involved if they felt their means were effective and personally inspiring, will be alienated from activism in general, giving some kind of excuse such as "protests don't work so I'll just look after myself and my family." Of course if traditional pacifist protest did accomplish anything it would be made illegal.

The culture and ideology of legal pacifist protest is in itself inherently dictatorial and authoritarian. It is saying that we are here as a group for this allotted reason and we are limiting out all other perspectives and motivations as well as means of advocating. The mindset of cohesion through authoritarian organization has so permeated our psyches that even within Anarchist activism we have in some cases alienated certain peoples through our exclusivity of tactics. Why should we for the systems convenience separate ourselves into neat little blocks based on which tactics we advocate, is this not opening us up to all kinds of state divide and conquer tactics? Would not the pink block be better protected and so better able to use their tactics by mixing with the black block? Likewise would not the black block be better able to strike out in surprise when concealed among the likes of the pink block? If the protest is big enough the cops will attack whoever they can in order to incite violence to show on the news and so we might as well stand together.

Maybe total mass mob groups of unorganized chaos isn't the best tactic, but one thing is certain, that we need greater fluidity in our tactics and above all greater tolerance of different tactics being used. It seems to me there is all this division within anti-establishment groups and the beauty of the cosmopolitan nature of this dissent is not being fully actualized. We are having all these diffuse protests against whatever specific cause here and there, maybe a protest about one thing or another and nothing much gets accomplished. We have made a critical tactical error in spreading our forces too thin and what's worse we even sometimes fight against each other because of some relatively minor difference in philosophy. All too often we have also made the common mistake of trying to treat the symptoms instead of the cause of the problem. The people need to come together and protest what we refer to as "society" as a whole, to protest the very notion of government and the culture we have created, even dare I say our own personal beliefs and states of mind? We should in fact protest the very notion of the existence of reality.

I would like to see a form of protest with it's main concept being an all inclusive demonstration for the purpose of creating a mirror of society. Have everyone protesting everything at once shouting at the top of their lungs everything they think is wrong in the world. The best kind of protest I could imagine, besides of course radical direct action, would be to have an integration of pure art with activism. Combining the emotionally ratifying elements of art of which in some form we are all lovers of, with the unfortunately generally uninspiring intellectual knowledge of the state of the world. Art is our entertainment and even when it has a revolutionary message it generally only creates passive observers and thus has actually helped the forces it hopes to fight. We must blend this with the dry intellectualism and follow it up with direct action. Intellectualism by itself, given the crisis of the state of the world should have been enough to convince people it's in their own best interest to look after one another and the Earth, but it hasn't largely done this since learning and acting on knowledge for most is not seen as fun. This approach has shown itself to not be enough and now we have to entertain the masses into taking the gun away from the global head.

The concept I have in mind is no doubt offensive to some activists, the common people especially, and probably a good deal of artists as they and the protest itself will all be included as targets within the protest. If for some strange reason some crazy wretch is deranged enough to take my idea seriously, I would also make a good target of protest, as well as all those degenerates who act out anything I say. Protest must become psychedelic in the most literal of senses, it being Latin for "mind manifesting," as we must manifest the collective mind for all to see. It must reflect the quintessential character of the culture as a whole, and pry open the eyes of those most determined to keep the vision narrow, there by forcing truth at least to some degree to those who would be in denial. I am writing what I am doing, I am writing what I am doing, I am writing what I am doing. Protest is to me justified to use all forms of culture known as an extension of their free expression. Let all racist and homophobic, sexist and elitist forms of thought be exposed in plain sight, symbolically represented in a grand micro-macro cosmic representation of all our idioms and memes. Let them exist being represented by a synthesis of all kinds of artistic expression within a frame work, not to judge the things that are represented, but merely present them in as tangible and palpable a form as possible for everyone to see for themselves. We have been blinded by the use of cultural memes to keep us from recognizing common absurdities within society. To fight this cultural war we must create an anti meme meme, a meme of revolution that is so mercurial as to never be digestible by the dominant system, something that can virally attack the state bacteria culture.

Of course it would take far too many people to totally cover everything within our culture so the most important things must be chosen by those who wish to present them. Small groups or single individuals would present concepts in some artistic form, or ideally mixing all known art forms. (Sculptures could be used as props in plays with background music etc) Chances are this would have to be done with different people performing different things simultaneously as there simply wouldn't be enough time for everyone to take turns on a stage. I personally think it would also be more life like and fun to see a huge crowd of spontaneous representations of cultural insanity going off at the same time. The Pink block has done this to some degree but has not gone to nearly a full enough extent and has generally limited their expression to whatever protest they happen to be at.

Although my general idea is not violent there are certain times and places for that which should be tolerated by all those participating. I'll leave that to the individual to decide when those times and places are, as violence itself can be a form of artistic expression after all. However, I do think different tactics would be more pertinent in this kind of protest than the traditional black block approach. While I think black block tactics are relatively some of the most effective means of protest that people do, the goal of the protest of reality is somewhat different and might not be best served by such means. I think the use of violence must also be satirized in both the protest and state contexts, for example having people dressed as police beating down protestors and then looking heroic, or protestors beating people dressed as police and acting like they are actually accomplishing something.

We must have some consensus about what we want our culture to really be about and the first step in that is making people more aware about what our culture already is. We must have a psychedelic vomiting of creative expression right there on the lawn of parliament, or white house or the highway or Main Street or wherever. Create a protest where each protester is the personification of their own will, or that which they are protesting, which is seen through newly created mediums of improv/street/classical theatre as well as dance, painting, music, or literally all artistic mediums. These would converge with any other form of expression imaginable to form a living comprehensive diagram of what our culture is and what are the underlying motivations for such things. Simultaneously acting out how these things affect everyone in everyday life. Each person would become a living effigy to whatever they wish to represent, anything at all which they wish to protest about or convey. It would be a sociological panopticon of all of humanities lower nature. A person could dress up as patriarchy, or drug laws, a politician, or themselves, if they hate buttercups and rainbows they could become that or destroy some representation. Using artificial forms, artistically created is better than using real buttercups because it shows the intrinsically human nature of such perceptions. Different groups would then organize themselves to create a demonstration of what they wish to represent, we could have materialism shaking hands with deforestation and working together to theatrically murder a person who is the environment. Or show outright the effigy of capitalism whipping small third world children while people dressed as smoke stacks and pollution act out poisoning everyone with other people dressed as smog clouds. As much as possible the groups should try and use humans in specialized costumes as props for their plays, though of course the groups will have to work within their means and putting to use sculptures and other forms of art are important within this protest.

Most importantly would be to show the whiny protester archetype being destroyed by fascist police and the effigies of social justice and social progress being raped and murdered. The second most important issue in my opinion would be to show using art, how art has enslaved the masses and created images which create the illusion of personality and rebellion, but in fact give birth to selfish greed and complacency. There are limitless messages which could be conveyed and it would be left to those involved to choose their own message and means of expression. Fictional activist groups could also be created like "Trolls for the equality of imaginary creatures" or "Ragamuffins against Fashion." Or although not as funny, sometimes creating realistic sounding groups for a protest can have a beneficial result. Even if that made up group has only one person, if you can make other people believe it has many members it will make the masses more motivated and inspired, as they seem to be sheep waiting for a grand social revolution to start before they make any real actions. Offensive expressions are highly encouraged, such as foetus's being BBQ'd in either support or against the issue of abortion, or ideally both simultaneously, there's even room for commentary on vegetarianism in such a display. However since I think the success of such a grand protest would lie in it being all inclusive and showing all sides of an issue, the concept of shock and offensiveness must itself be attacked. For example it could be made visible to everyone in some kind of display that GG Allin was a sensitive man and pussycat at heart, a troubled queer and a teenage cross dresser lashing out at the world of small town America, of course something more universally known might be more effective.

My idea is not so much to create artistic propaganda, but let everything be seen only for what it truly is, though most likely blown up to the extreme, a kind of living diorama of our cultural simulacrum and to be most effective, it would be as offensive to as many people as possible, but without losing the attempted objectivity. However objectivity itself could be represented and shown to be an illusion of culture which must be slain by personal gnosis. Hypocrisy and contradiction could make out together, and then have a three way with an effigy of myself, it would all be ridiculously decadent and ludicrous to show what traditional protest really is. It is imperative that these things be acted out showing how they affect everyone in everyday life. Not just the poor brown people across the ocean but the fucked pathologies that are so common they go unnoticed right here by most people. A protest that screams what's wrong is that nobody really cares what's wrong, nobody wants to talk about the astral garbage floating around the "collective unconscious," or if you prefer "social milieu." That the only real individual is the one who realizes they are part of the whole. That everything must function like one organism or else all will suffer, if this is taken as true then every other message is petty compared to this being realized. Whether or not you put a spiritual value to existence, we are all humans and we are living on this planet and so we must start acting like it. We must proselytize unconditional free expression without the authoritarianism of proselytization.

Right from the time we are born we are bombarded with messages to make us lose the context of the information we receive so that we will not know how to properly deal with our existence, but rather be forced to act within the illusionary state model. If the truth can be conveyed then the right course of action will be more or less self evident to those who can understand it. Once people are presented with truthful observations the viewers can come to their own conclusions as to what is good and what is bad in that truth. The kind of revolution we need does not lie in spirituality or even politics, what keeps people enslaved is not laws but the fact that it is far too easy for them to ignore or miss the truth among all the garbage that is presented to them. So many red herrings, straw men and filibusters have been given to us from our likewise programmed parents, politicians, teachers, and television personalities, that we have lost almost all orientation as to the way things should be, instead buying into the idea things will never change, which is of course why nothing much changes. Even with education that gives objective facts (which it rarely does) we have lost the context of how to process such facts and those facts that are objective serve to distract from other more important ones. Although we may have good intentions we are much like zoologists trying to study the mating habits of couches. We can't seem to figure out why we are failing but we don't have the lateral knowledge or context to realize couches don't have sex and no government will listen to a protest that deals with core issues, that doesn't force them to change directly.

We must use all things in existence excluding nothing from our consciousness with the intention of creating an open ended, self feeding and sustaining form of alternative consciousness. The government will stop treating us like babies when we stop acting like babies crying to an authority figure to fix all our problems. Although what I am proposing could easily be called immature it is really just an advertisement for much more radical direct action and insurrection against all those who use advertisements and more. The government treats terrorists more like adults than it treats the public, because the terrorists are conceivably a threat, big brother would never treat its little sibling as an equal. I am not necessarily advocating terrorism but we should be aware of certain realities. I do believe that there is still value in bad ideas in that they provide insights to things we wouldn't have normally considered. It's time for a brutal culture wide self examination of which, whether we like it or not, we are all a part of, it's just that culture is multifaceted.

We all know things are corrupt and unfair and yet like some battered wife we seem to think doing the same old things will accomplish anything more than the same beatings and same ass rapage. That is more or less how Einstein defined insanity. Some battered women even think they deserve their "punishment" and that "oh he really loves me" but it is a sick relationship based on abusive S&M and it must end, we must stand up for the women in all of us. When it comes to countries which claim to be democratic, or a republic I agree with Henry Ford when he said "people get the government they deserve," but I think it's time the free people, the real activists, who have no government helped to teach others in a more direct way how to deserve freedom. The reason the mainstream people deserve their beatings and lack of freedom is because they think they want it, maybe if I can show them this and what is really worth wanting then I will deserve freedom and we can get over this martyr/beaten wife syndrome.

Society as a whole has not been holding itself accountable for holding the government accountable about how power will be used in our name. We have to demonstrate the fact that demonstration has been useless and that we aren't listening to them anymore when they lie about listening to us. The state simply cannot be reformed enough to be incorruptible, as long as there are hierarchies there will be exploitation and abuse of power. The activist culture has in a very real sense been in a naive denial about the fact that the common people in general don't give a shit about anyone who is not a loved part of their own lives. This should be put before the people in a very blunt and unadulterated way that people have in the big scheme been acting like selfish fucks and even if this is because of social engineering, the public cannot be molly coddled anymore into taking their medicine. I don't want to set up an us and them situation of activist authoritarianism, as the protest of realities' main goal is to actually eliminate that from protest, but truth must still be presented. Many activists are fucked in their own way and I am no exception, but I think it's important to let the public know what they really are and force their heads out of their asses. Society will reap what it sows and all must be made aware of what is coming down this current path one way or another. If ultimate disaster strikes let no one say that they were not warned. The pacifist protesters again I must stress must be shown to be self righteous, arrogant, pretentious know it all, whiny PC pricks. Even if they aren't all that way, self deprecation is crucial to growing beyond your flaws not to mention having a sense of humour and if that message is proclaimed by the protesters themselves, they will have redeemed themselves in many ways and proven that the statement itself is not totally true. Let all negative stereotypes be created and seen for what they truly are.. Stereotypes. A person could even represent all stereotypes born of representations of generalization and arrogance.

The protest of reality will seek to mirror back as much as possible all the ugly uncomfortable truths that are everywhere seen. Blow them up and amplify them to absurd proportions and then have them act out what is happening in the world. The protest of reality is essentially a giant chaotic demonstration which is the simultaneous performance of all of the mini plays and art forms of each group or individual willing to create a demonstration. A person who is not demonstrating should be able to walk around and see different groups protesting different things all around them, in all kinds of ways all at the same time. This is done so that any attempt to have a cohesive political message is drowned out by all the other groups and absolutely nothing is really accomplished in terms of getting a coherent unified message across to the government or media. No single person could ever speak for the protest of reality including myself. As the conclusion of this part of the demonstration all actors will break the 4th wall in every conceivable way trying their best to interact with bystanders and onlookers, as well as police and anyone and everything that is there. Let each person represent their own personal opinion and own effigy of what reality is and what is wrong with it. Perhaps one of the goals of the protest should be to create such a disturbance to the cultural mind and system (in a generally peaceful way) as to warrant making protest illegal.

Let us lead others to become leaders who lead others to become leaders of themselves and no one else. We need a gestalt diarrhea on the government grounds of everything their culture has created, the psychedelic vomit left for everyone to see for themselves what we live in. What I am trying to expound is everyone should try and expound their own version of the truth no matter how ugly it is to the mainstream or politically correct.

Since conventional protest has largely become moral masturbation and the mainstream culture is so decadent, both sex abscessed and yet so sexually uptight in many respects, we need to reflect this and I think the best way to show this would be to have an orgy right there out in the open for everyone to see. This would be the ultimate form of protest in a dehumanizing, alienating technocracy where through the use of computers and cell phones many people have nearly eliminated real human interaction. Loving your neighbour has never been so much fun or taboo, it is a perfect way to disgust people with homosexuality and promiscuity sending several somewhat contradictory messages at once, especially when the police step in and violently stop the act of making love. Freud believed that all mental illness sprang from some sort of repression or problem with the patients' sexuality, could it be that the state of the world could be explained by the lack of public orgies? One thing is clear, the masses in general do not give a fuck about protesting, or activism or even safe guarding their own freedom, Anarchists have to compete with all modern forms of entertainment for their attention and let's face it, handing them a Chomsky book isn't going to cut it. Public orgies can motivate the people so anaesthetized, so obsessed by consumerism they have brought the world to the brink of suicide in to attending a protest which seeks to end capitalism and so orgies are the best tool activists have for getting the apathetic masses off their couches and on to the streets!

The less time people spend working at jobs or spending money or otherwise supporting the system the better off we all are, for this reason it's time to fuck everything that moves. However this would not necessarily be an orgy for the pleasure of it, it would be an act of protest against all that separates us as people, as there is nothing quite as equalizing as an orgy. It would also be a nice message to all those who believe we should be ashamed of our bodies and urges. Personal egos would be tried like nothing else as we would all be seen in our natural glory; this would be quite the statement against the hidden lecherousness of our society and the superficial hedonism of our people. Feminist dominatrix's could if so inclined, have their way with men or in some other fashion assert themselves over willing men as a display of sexism. If we are going to have moral masturbation we might as well have moral orgies. Two wrongs do not make a right, unless it is made as an ironic provocative protest about that wrong enacted by willing participants. Other kinks and fetishes would of course be encouraged. Let the strait guys have sex with each other in protest of homophobia. Asexuals too would have a place to abstain to point out the flaws with human sexuality, or they may like certain heterosexuals force themselves to participate in acts they find unpleasant in order to remind onlookers, this is a serious protest and we suffer for it to send you a message.

We all at one time or another have sexual urges (besides asexuals) and yet many people are in denial about it, and demonize it, however the other extreme is no better, that of pure selfish carnality with no genuine concern for other people. What better way to protest reality than making statements about how we are brought into this reality? I myself do not get laid nearly enough because of my sense of old fashioned romanticism, this could be a protest simultaneously against an ego oriented monogamy based on guilt, as well as the loss of real romance and human connection today, whatever you want. It is also a good statement in that it says, "well if we are all fucked, we might as well fuck each other." If marriage is the cornerstone of society as Christians say, then it is definitely a prime target of the protest of reality. Public orgies are definitely a good means of attacking said cornerstone, assuming of course there is someone out there who wants to destroy society? There is much room for a number of statements to be made by such an act, life in many ways can be viewed as an orgy of genes, or more metaphorically as a metaphysical orgy, or an orgy of memes, though granted it is often all about S&M. This orgy would of course be the last act in the demonstration after all protesters have broken the 4th wall and attempted to get outsiders involved as it is almost certainly going to be met with police oppression.

There is much potential within this model of protest to show the underlying Anarchism of ontology. Only when we are honest enough and comfortable enough with each other about our genuine motivations that we can have a giant civilization wide orgy in public space, can we really be taken seriously as people who know themselves well enough to say what is best for society as a whole. Not that voyeur orgiists should become our leaders, but that we should all be comfortable enough with ourselves to actually do it if so inclined and at least be tolerant of it when we see it.

Since getting large numbers of people to agree to have public orgies may be difficult and if not handled correctly unsafe, the protest of reality will most likely have to be waged in much smaller groups. This could be done spontaneously in places of interest like say the mall or Walmart, star bucks, museums, city hall and that kind of thing. This would all be made much more interesting with all the different costumes people would have for the representations. Somehow I don't think burning a flag or effigy is as strong a message as the president getting fucked in the ass by the oil companies while giving Christ a blow job... it feels so good to have bad taste. It would be a great thing to see a human Walmart effigy fucking a Chinese person in the middle of the store while whipping them and making them work, or something of that nature, use your imagination... It's fun! However great and unique a message you could get by protesting alone and jerking off in public dressed in some strange manner, it will be incredibly hard to explain to the police that you are not a pervert but protesting reality, which may be something you want to consider beforehand.

Humanity doesn't honestly know where it wants to go, we seem to have an identity crisis especially as we become less racist and prejudiced. Since history began we haven't had many other motivations other than killing different groups of people, hatred has ironically been pretty successful in the task of uniting the largest groups of people. Do we want to go in the direction of technological supremacy of the few over the many? Or in the direction of loving acceptance of all points of view? I am so incredibly narcissistic and pretentious I astound even myself... my hubris knows no bounds. The homogenization of humanity has itself become a product for mass consumption within the ego driven mass market media.

We must protest the fact that protests aren't working and never will. Once something is blown up into its most extreme form imaginable it is seen as it is, absurd and usually dangerous. We must show that the very foundation of our hierarchical human culture is absurd ego maniacal psychopathy. We must point out the fact that it's absurd we have to point out the absurdities and social injustices to everyone. We must make it impossible for the common people to ignore the misery and self gratifying waste that is our culture which is actually fed by all of us.

Art and entertainment are the most powerful means the government has at its disposal for keeping the masses pacified, especially the more revolutionary art which gives the illusion of a free society. The Romans knew this well and kept the mob occupied with the gladiator fights, now we have the American gladiators and 500+ channels to watch them on, not to mention reality TV instead of living reality, the Romans could never have imagined such a complete means of pacification as we have now. Let all sit in "sin" as we passively worship the American Idol. Never mind what's happening watch this commercial then you can be loved once you get the product, then the two of you will watch more American Idol rather than actively loving each other.

We are cultural bulimics who feast upon our own shit which we then puke up again. This puke is not nutritional and it's causing us to die, our bodies are then being fed to our children along with our own puke and shit and this cycle just keeps repeating. We are here living off death and destruction so as one grand display of our complete decadence we should have the orgy on top of the effigies of rotting corpses from all our enslaved third world minions. As tempting as it may be, we should not have sex with those corpses as a statement of our cultures racism, as it wouldn't lower itself to sleep with third worlders, (unless maybe they are prostitutes) though statements about necrophilia are more than welcome.

We need to bring to light that there is a concept that only white people can save the world, that there are millions of souls screaming in torment "oh please save me white man from our culture I don't know anything, I'm just an ignorant savage who doesn't even play video games. My people don't live in obscene luxury so we must be lazy even though we work 16 hour shifts every single day at age 10." It is the authoritarian attempts of western civilization to save the world from "savagery" that is now the greatest threat to the planet and was the original public justification for colonization and now the American imperialists justification for spreading "democracy." (The notion of the "white man's burden" continues to this day under various euphemisms like "nation building.") We must show this western world what it really looks like and not how it wishes itself to be seen. It's not like their isn't any reason for motivation, that the stakes aren't high enough what with the threat of all life being obliterated. We must show everyone their way of life is the way of death and it has been spread across the world and that no debate of philosophical or ideological dogmas are ever going to change the fact that materialism means destruction, apathy, misery, distress and pain. We are even so deluded we can justify killing women, children and men in the name of freedom and egalitarianism.

There is a mass pathology which has created the psychosis mindset that our actions don't matter and so the protest of reality must come to a climax that is the cultural orgy. Let nothing be too perverse or ugly so long as it is true. May everything be geared towards maximum controversy of all subjects idly chattering themselves to extinction, marching in sync, within the heart of an atomic explosion upon a desolate wasteland devoid of anything organic, so that not even a little germ will be allowed to live outside the will of the oligarchy. The main stream counter culture seems to be waiting for someone deranged enough to call them self the antichrist to lead them to freedom or some such bullshit. The child who will lead a revolt against their parents, well this biblical bullshit has self profited itself into existence. This is no surprise as when you cause a shit hole existence like this to come about, eventually a kid is going to come around who is pissed off enough to try and rebel. By enacting all manner of blasphemy, perhaps even enacting the book of revelations at the protest to show how ridiculous literalism is, having Jesus going around cracking skulls with a rod of iron, a woman clothed in the sun standing on the moon fighting a dragon. We could show Christians that their god is not going to smite us, that their version of the apocalypse is absurd and will not happen and that they should stop waiting for a saviour and save themselves. It's the only sane conclusion to take in a world like ours.

Fuck the PC agenda that is a whole culture of one authority waiting to take over from the last garbage marathon provocateur; it won't change anything fundamental until people fundamentally change. Everyone is PC to their own politics, even if their politics are sexist, racist, homophobic notions of "do as I say not as I do." All of it is ludicrous and pointless and everyone knows it, perhaps instead of trying to get everyone anal about not offending anyone, we should work on making everyone tolerant of people's expressions? Perhaps instead of fighting about who has the most ethical and polite culture, we should stop supporting the institutions that are killing us.

I come from absolutely the most privileged and wealthy kind of background imaginable, the white lower class of North America and yet I still find the time to write about how bad my life is and how depressing it is that whoever doesn't love me. I am not important, I am not even really alive, and I am just the channel for which real life, the real creation can come into existence. Construct a working model of the mass ego which is the total culture, or the notion of a mainstream and you can control all those who unwittingly fall for such superficial simplicity. This model can then be acted out ritualistically as the rape of the imagination so that all can see it for what it really is. We live this world every day in our actions.

We must leave the image nation that our art can only entrap us in, the image nation is the culture of living in static views of subjective personal suppositions but which seems to be objective, it is the nation of passive observers who do not create but take what they are given. Instead we must become the I-Magi-Nation, this is where all things are blended and changing, a world of creators and participants and of course those words are pompous and cheesy and crap, there is no way for truth not to be. The imagination of the profane must spill out into the plane sight for everyone to behold in the distorted mockery of itself and submit to humility.

All secret perversities of which we all hold must become proclaimed and no longer hidden. They have festered in denial to cause the infection of our society with the false concept of normality and so create a stronger polarization empowering those very things we seek to deny. Let all those who demonized others be demonized, let us glorify our deviations and conform to the idea of individual rights, we are the sarcastic cosmic irony of our own self deluded lies. Cynicism is a failure, I have no hope for it, it won't ever get much headway in a world of such conscious young people, with their naive delusions of idealism and freedom. They are just the ritual sacrifice to the system of the death emancipation movement. The apocalypse culture who thinks it's cool to spread destruction and violence.

It's cool to try and create a world that is an embarrassment to the Christian god or so they thought, but no one ever could match the raging fury of the tyrannical dictator Yahweh. Luckily I don't think he exists, but still why try to take vengeance on something doesn't exist? Because people believe in him Yahweh will definitely be a target of the protest of reality. We'd rather love the hatred of love then try and do something against the institutions that were here when we were born. Revolution is itself an institution and it's far too cliché to say revolution is a cliché. There's no one to revolt against except ourselves, the only way to rebel now is to hate music. How dare we claim to exist when there is so much beautiful "Chaos" waiting to be let in? If you simply present deluded people the truth they will think you are stupid or insane, but that is like I said before, because they have absolutely no context for relative truths like the idea that everything is subjective. "How can anyone tell me the sky isn't blue? That is complete nonsense to say it could be otherwise, in fact Ill kill anyone who does say so because it's so damn offensive to me!" This is how ludicrous the perspective is that there is only one perspective. We need to be more like Loki, Eris and Abbie Hoffman, we need more pranksters shaking up the order of the "gods."

Can't find enough people to protest reality with? Don't be sad, you can do it on your own in everyday life by guerrilla art tactics and playing tricks that show to people that society and reality are not what they seem. Spread some Chaos in the name of love, even if some people may hate you for it and don't forget to masturbate furiously, or not according to your liking, anything that destroys the idea that there are social norms is welcome. My generation's identity is the generation of having no identity and now that I've figured that out I'll probably be killed and all trace of every idea of mine will be wiped out. But as long as there is a life form to destroy, or who can destroy my ideas, the ideas of free expression inherent within all things will still exist. The war against war will go on and on and on and on, until there is absolutely nothing.

This book is the protest against reality. These words are the physical intention that words are the blasphemous crystallization of pure essence, which is itself intention. Since no word can fully encapsulate it's meaning they are self murdering paradoxes of meaning. They have thus become meaningless. However you wouldn't have much of a joke if there were no such things as words. Reality is the ultimate joke and the joke is important even if it demands everything else must die. Until we are all one big tranny prostitute living on a garbage pile staring at the great TV in the sky with syringes in its wrists nailing it to the ground, a smoke on its lips with and a nice goat to sit on its pierced cock. Are you going to be the image or the essence it's trying to imitate? This is the image of the imitating image and it won't leave your face even while you scream for mercy.

All those who kill will themselves be killed and the price you paid for the original sin is nothing compared to the torment you will be placing on yourself after you realize the countless holocaust victims from each time you washed your hands with soap. How many innocent germs have been destroyed by you damn heartless vegan speciesists!? Hypocrisy is everywhere, everyone is flawed because that is the nature of perfect truthful beauty. I will take vegans seriously when they infect themselves with AIDS so that they do not kill germs within themselves. If you think you aren't contradicting yourself it's because you aren't thinking hard enough. I personally despise art as much as I hate pacifist protest but I am a big fan of contradicting myself, even though I hate the idea of being a fan of anything, especially nihilism. The idea that some ideas will not be tolerated is an idea that will not be tolerated. Everything will go inside out so the minds we think are private will be visible to all and we will be seen not by our clothes or skin colour or race or gender or any other category, other than who we truly are, naked creatures having all kinds of kinky sex. Most people do a kind of ego strip tease for each other, especially lovers, I always fancied myself a nudist so I am not really sure how to voyeur anyways, I kind of like the idea but I generally just streak around, I am definitely an ego slut. We are the mirror of each other because we can never really truly see ourselves except in what others give to us and we have definitely given the system far too nice of an image in which to see itself. They have managed to create a culture of vanity in a world where no one really sees themselves. The last vestiges of the creative life drive will never waver in their resolve that existence can be beautiful until they are all destroyed.

The activists must employ guerrilla psychological tactics and the ultimate symbolic warfare to surgically bring to light the pathologies of our culture. It is foolish to think the state hasn't engaged us in psychological warfare and refusing to fight them on this front due to some abstract notion of intellectual objectivity is the result of this. Until recently in terms of complete cultural change we have made little to no progress in properly engaging them on that front, this requires adaptation of our tactics. From the hedonist to the purely intellectual this self gratifying masturbation that is our culture has gone on long enough. The superficial must be rooted out and ostracized, create a trend of hurting the trendy people who followed the trend of hurting trendy people. It's all madness created to distract you from your own power. Make a protest demonstrating theatrically or poetically the hypocrisy and bullshit. Enact the politicians being subjected to what they have subjected the peoples of the world, of all histories to.

Many people seem to think things will get better somehow as if by a miracle, indeed if things did get better in a major way it would be tempting to call this a miracle. Some people believe they do not have to actually do anything physical in order to make the world a better place; this is because we have been sold the over simplified New Age idea of "positive thinking." This mentality has been a barrier to making good people active within activism or giving them unrealistic expectations towards how cultural progress will be achieved. Spirituality and prayer have been co-opted in order to keep us from acting in the here and now. The desire for divine intervention definitely has its place within the protest of reality, religion and specifically the passive addicts of this opiate are to be targeted. Of course while religion is an obvious target we must target the will of the people to be saved from some unseen force, when the reality is they only need to be saved from their apathy and inactivity.

The best way to do this is by realizing these enactments can go with this New Age thinking to point out how ludicrous it generally is. Sometimes we don't realize how silly some of our beliefs are until they are shown before us. This will be done by turning the protests into massive magickal operation encompassing as many people as possible to dramatically debase and caricaturize popular entertainment and our own fallacies. We will use so called "magick" to target our reliance on waiting for miracles, but also as a means of attacking everything within established culture. This tactic should be shown as a celebration of all that is perverse and depraved within society, we will evoke the evil so that it can be destroyed or exorcized from the collective mind. People have been hypnotized in to only responding to the reality created by symbols and so we will respond to this reality by using symbols to snap them out of their hypnotic trance. This has great value in a non magickal context, but this kind of protest would if for no other reason than by "coincidence" resemble certain magickal rituals, it's a small step from effigy to voodoo doll, chanting to spells, signs and art to sigils..

We can simultaneously create more participants by letting those who believe in such things utilize these tactics when they create their own section of the demonstration through art, as well as debase the naive desire for divine intervention. We must take the freedom to associate, or freedom of assembly past the current limits and one way we will do this is by using the freedom of association to help the public free associate (in the Freudian sense) all of the memes or different parts of the protest. That is the assembly of protestors and spectators will be a massive cultural experiment in group education and therapy through free association. Different personifications and interactive symbolic art will talk to people to create a consensus of association, but also provide opportunities for participation in representing and experiencing aspects of reality.

The protest will expose how many other cultural scenarios that are commonplace encourage this same corruption and authoritarian tendencies and let everyday people see their dark side, see it personified before them and also if they are willing to participate in their own actions and through the climax of the protest, (probably ritualized in a basic way) the evil can be dealt with and banished from the Earth and all the participants through sex magick. The real beauty of this is that much of this magick can be done without common people even realizing it is Occult. Although having overtly Occult themes in parts of the protest is also highly encouraged, if you want to get the authoritarianism out of bourgeois people just passing by, there probably is no time to fully educate them and they will be more willing to participate if they think it is all just weird art.

It should not be construed that I believe magick alone will save the world or that faith in magick is an excuse to not act in a physical and direct way. Nor should it be construed that I believe this kind of protest will really have much effect in world politics or solve any major problems, this is not even the reason for such a protest. The real reason for the protest is simply to create awareness of certain realities and as a kind of advertisement for direct action in the form of sabotaging the system and tactics which may actually have some real results. At any rate if we could make real activism entertaining enough to get everyone involved then there would be no need for a revolution, then there would only be activism and the jungles of the I-Magi-Nation could start to overgrow the concrete artifices that we constantly surround ourselves with.

Things are so desperate right now that we need to make everyone aware of all facets of culture; this includes the Occult, whether or not it is “real,” we should act out these “revelations” which the people should be aware of so that they can start to actually live. Too many would be revolutionaries sit waiting for a mass movement and just like Christians waiting for the second coming of Christ, they die never really being in the here and now. These “revolutionaries” ignore the work that must be done now to make the world a better place, they believe they should wait, but it is this very waiting which keeps mass movements from happening since no one ever gets around to actually starting anything. It’s like expecting a cake to bake itself because you know you have all the ingredients, all the while talking about how much you like cake. The revolution is not something that will happen in the future, this idea is disinformation, the truth is there is a resistance and it’s a resistance that has been happening from the beginning. Since the dawn of civilization there are some who remained free, who remained in Anarchy, but the disease of the rulers tricks people into submitting to them by misleading people into consent, by making others think they have much more power than they really do. The system has turned the world in to a world of whores and called this civilization, especially those in the Abrahamic traditions; all the while we could have been having orgies for free. You will never be a revolutionary if you think it is something in the future and to ignore the resistance of your ancestors that has been happening throughout history, is to remain alienated and divided from your allies, people which looked to you in the future to carry on the struggle.

The desire to have a purely “good” movement is a desire that destroys all movements; any allies interested in increasing freedom in the world should be encouraged. As all lifestyles within the protest of reality will be encouraged and at the same time denounced, the Occult communities goal must become to turn everyone into a magician, or a nation of Magi. The protest will be a state of mind in which all things are seen for what they are, where personal growth is emphasized and all are free to do as they will. Too long have we kept our mouths shut and allowed the profane their ignorance, it has always been argued that common people are not worthy of magickal awareness, but I argue that it is because they lack these things that they seem to be unworthy. Yes the time has come for the deranged flakes to come out of the broom closet and try once again to levitate the pentagon. I am not the only one who believes we are actually in a kind of magickal war and so Anarchists may as well let such people have a platform, at least within a protest of the kind that I have in mind. Not to mention Tantra and sex magick is some of the most effective, so why waste such good energy? Does it not make much more sense that today those who are unworthy and have Occult knowledge and political power would do everything they can to make the masses ignorant of true personal power?

Government magick is mass hypnotism and we need to make people aware that they are not immune to it. No one can force magickal awareness on them and we shouldn’t even if we could, but we should have massive public demonstrations to make others more aware that there are completely alternative ways of looking at reality. Blasphemy is the best means of magickal defence from spells attempting religious conversion. Once people are more aware of just how many diverse perspectives of reality there are, they cannot help but be more open minded in some way, whether or not they accept the validity of those alternative viewpoints. Of course atheists should be made to feel more than welcome within the protest of reality and religious dogma and symbolism should only be used in terms of ridicule, though of course atheism is not above ridicule either.

This protest of reality will threaten to destroy everything in the name of creation. There are severe implications for the intellectuals to debate about, from spending time debating the implications of spending time debating implications. They won't ever get it as long as they try to think about it. Unseen messages are everywhere; it's not a conspiracy when it's right out in the open for all those who care to look. But most don't care and this must be shown to them, even that they don't care that they don't care. We deny truths and then we deny that we deny truths. I still can't figure out the difference between a conspiracy and a corporate board meeting. There is it seems no other way for such people to open their eyes than the shock of the pain from falling off a cliff hitting them, a fall caused because they were staggering around with their eyes closed caught in some kind of delirium. This protest is the last call to wake from this delirium before the fall, we will wake up wont we? Even if we are all immortals as we are life itself, we must try and wake up, especially while standing on the threshold of total obliteration. This is realized as even more dire for the vast majority of people who don't believe such things, but whatever your cosmological views may be, we are in quite the fucked situation. For those waiting for a saviour you better not let Jesus or Krishna or the aliens from the Pleiades, or whoever it is catch you on your ass while the Earth is being destroyed.

By simply reflecting back to most people who they really are, they will be so disgusted they will most likely kill you, at least if they can't get you to shut up, anything for them to further ignore who they are. They are the very embodiment of the idea that everything with a body should be destroyed and they don't even know it. I am the embodiment of the concept that everything must be allowed to exist. I cannot destroy other embodiments but I do wish to make it clear what certain embodiments truly represent. Everything is good at what it does, even if all it is, is some jackass lying on his back writing self righteous mumbo jumbo while tripping on LSD.

It seems the I-Magi-Nation will always be at war with the image nation so let's be sure at least to take lots of pictures and as long as they war so will the protest of reality go on. All things must be able to be expressed; I don't think this concept has been properly advocated by activists. All too often it seems we don't want equals we want worshippers. Even when their goals are the same who can share the glory when it's based on smug self satisfaction? We must ruthlessly search out and destroy ruthlessness and destruction. This has been named as high treason in the I-Magi-Nation... DEATH TO THE MURDERERS! May the hypocrites be made to live through the ramifications of their lies. Punishment will be given to all those according to their crimes. There will be KNOW room left in our hearts for the heartless ones. It should of course always be kept in mind that I have absolutely no idea what I'm talking about and that I am wrong about absolutely everything I say, further more I am no authority on anti-authoritarianism, however I am also no authority on what I am or am not.

Slaughtered Aspiration

She didn't show much care for the turmoil of this mind,
But I still wish she would care for her own soul's condition.
She is my first thought, a troubled teen with a black tar addiction and a love of squirting rigs, she is the maiden whoring herself in search of pleasure.
As a virgin she used to frequent her dad's house, her parents being separated it was one of the oldest places she knew.
What irony he is a doctor and a musician, a brilliant guy with a big python he keeps in the basement. There she would go and huff gas and she swore she could see the future, though no one could understand what the hell she was trying to say.
First she just smoked weed, then she was on to speed, then heroin just to sleep, all to end up a street kid gone astray who lives on the road, scrambling for a stash of any shit that will hold her attention.
What is she to be? What life is my love to live? Kidnapped in her search of skag by bankster junk dealers, spirited away to the terrible depths of the sex trade and held captive by their lust.
Freedom in full bloom, the high sun's energy on Earth,
She was out picking poppies grown by her mom, an old acid freak hippie with a huge garden of delights,
Her land the focus of some bankers desire, bankers who have taken up laundering for these same dealer scum,
The formation of a conspiracy few would believe and fewer still really understand, and now poor Helen held ransom, for those plants filled with poison.
Her mom talked to a witness, a friend of hers on the street, really a beautiful lady though she can be a bit of a bitch, she is a sweetheart once you get to know her, a train hopper girl with her big black dog. She saw the whole thing waiting for a train by the crossroads on the edge of town,
She says she saw Helen selling herself for smack and picking poppies in the garden, she looked pretty strung out but then a huge black limousine pulled up and she got in.
Her mom cut down her crop, making sure that nothing was left she went to the government,
But the kidnappers seem to be in with them, with the bank handling the ransom of her mother's land, They said she is a runaway, that she is staying at a hotel owned by the banksters and that she has to stay to work and pay off the food she ate and the costs she owes.
Her mom sent a negotiator, a busker and a writer who makes his own instruments, a traveller and a thief, but clever as hell and an expert with words, he came back saying they want the whole farm.
An unknown Plutocrat who might as well have been invisible had taken a liking to her body and had payed her well to buy her services.
But he, the rich one, was connected to the cartel and had strong links to this international bank as he trades in precious metals and runs the smack trade for them.
When propositioned she agreed and he brought her back to his gated community for rich bankster fucks, only to find a group of suits that get their jollies from torture and that they had plans to gang rape her later that night.
Thinking her weak, they let her out of her bonds, then they started fighting with each other over who would get to rape her first, in the scuffle she showed them what lawlessness means.
Falling to the floor she pulled from her bag a bottle of my finest quicksilver white lightning, I had brewed it just for her, and she took a rag, made a cocktail, sparked it and torched the place, Lighting it up in a beautiful fire for the whole world to see what goes on in there.
When I heard she was missing I left right away, searching 3 hours for my lost love, Pedalling my way to my heart, gears turning through my yearning, till the vision of her fire led my way.
Not far from those ruins I found her in the dusk, what light was left in her eyes fast turning dark.
The fucks had hung her from a tree, lynched her for her opposition,

I threw down my bike and barely had time to cut her loose,
My switch blade glistening in the fire, I had made it razor sharp.
I held her on the ground and loosened the noose from her neck,
Coughing up blood she could not speak, so she looked at me in silence.
Her neck made blue from bruising, her eyes would tell me what to know,
She pulled a picture of us, from her pocket soiled and wet,
Round my head was a heart, twas within a frame of love.
Then in her eyes I saw worry, for the first time she had no joke,
As if to say I'm sorry, that she would surely croak.
Her heart had grown and flowered in full and now in turn it goes to fall,
As her body from the tree, her colour changes and I can see, the life runs out, her palm grows cold,
And in her eyes I see her soul.
The paramedics came in the flashing sirens light and took her far from me,
Not sure if she would make it, not sure if I should go free.
I ran from them to be alone, not knowing what to do,
If it turned out I hadn't saved her, then nothing it seemed was true,
Chills ran up my spine and my skin would start to crawl,
If she would leave me I did not know, if I could live at all.
I prayed but the tingles would not stop and I thought of my own death.
If I would be forever wounded, then I would chase my soul,
And heal the world as best I knew, for in it I had found true love.
From there depressed and feeling suicidal, I walked up to the K Hole,
A sleazy little club on the edge of time, an astral refuge where hobbled street kids meet,
Time repeats and you cant tell if you are on your feet, but somehow you come down.
I came up as my friend was coming down, he was going to his body to make sure no one stole his drugs.
Homeless and quite happy about it, he was sitting outside the club cross legged asking for offerings from those who pass by,
His dread locks covered his face though he was not really much of a hippie, he knew what had happened but saw fit to show me the beauty of death.
He told me how he had almost overdosed, had drank some poison laced in some drug to save his friends as it was killing them, they were heavy users and he had to get it away the only way he could.
Then he pulled out a joint and holding a big flaming lighter in his left hand, sparked it up with reverence.
After a few puffs a big piece of ash fell on his arm and he smeared it over his skin with a smile, as if to say, "love can be found in all things, we all turn to dust."
Taking the joint I asked him what I should do, he picked up his drum and played and danced, telling me to "be without fear."
Singing his song leaving me in silence, he knew no words would be enough and so gave me a line that was fat like a snake and sent me on my way inside the club.
There I met my friend the owner, he was definitely a strange one, a foreigner though no one knew where he came from,
To look at all the women who honoured him he seems almost like a pimp, Rumour had it he used to be involved, but all that I knew told me he was a lover of women and did more to show them their power, knowing plainly only jackasses care about wealth.
Sipping his wine he told me how he had even tried to get Helen to stop her hooking, how those with power had overwhelmed his own influence.
He ran this underground club for all the freaks providing all the drugs a person could want, there was Ivy running up the walls, the seats covered in leopard print, drinks ran freely from taps all around and all the while on the stage, an all girl band called the Maenads played their raucous music naked. They were the heaviest, craziest band in town and were known to beat the living shit out of anyone who messed with them.

In this club, closing time is a circle, the millennium, the zombie toad apocalypse or whatever you want to call it and in the middle is an elevator to your trip, the higher the floor, the higher you get.

My friend knowing my troubles saw that the line I had taken was coming in to effect, so he pointed the way and I stumbled to the elevator.

Stepping inside and pressing the button for the thirteenth floor, I went up fast and saw outside the universe.

Sending Anarchy down in to it, I knew I had my own power and realized the process.

Scuz Luv is the fractal formula for all creation,

Scuz is the shit fertilizer for all the blossoms of love.

For there is not a form of life that does not shit in some way,

And there is not a shit that some form of life cannot live off of.

The Earth is what you get when you are too prudish to have an orgy with the universe,

Time is taking a breather from this universal orgasm that unites us all,

An orgasm that is overwhelming like the beauty of Helen,

And I often thought to stare upon her for to long would cause tears to stream from my eyes.

Compassion the central axis,

A world of endless digressions of splintered perfection

A crystalizing of information through awareness from the centre of time

Self similar I squared,

Scuz potential and luv causality,

The divine was a wimpy dork, so made this world to toughen up and become a punk.

The creator, that selfish bastard wants someone to love,

Someone to do something for so that it can act altruistically.

Splitting it's awareness, things got out of control, now we exist and see not our self.

People of all times saw the time fractal, though they may not of recognized it, or defined it as such, everyone had there own way of defining it and each was a form within.

Searching through other worlds on K I can always tell when I am back, Home is where your stash is.

I came out of it in front of the club and saw my friend had gone,

Walking on so that I might contemplate my fate, the K long faded I wondered what to do.

With no means for revenge, my will in truth unknown, I met a vagabond, an old poet with only one eye, he was drinking some brew and sitting with his two dogs.

I came up while two crows across the way looked down on us from the power lines,

Perhaps guessing my state from the look on my face, he offered me a drink.

I told him my story, how the bankers would go free and my love lost once more,

He listened intently and then he told me his story,

He was an old biker who had fought more fights than he could remember, loved more women then a man could expect and travelled the roads all over this land,

He told me to have courage and live with honour, that often "the wise are fettered while fools go free, by beauty that breeds desire," and after telling me of his loves and losses, related that there are "none so good they have no faults, none so wicked they are worth nought."

Walking on I see my selfish sadness, my lack of will to act.

With a sarcastic smile I think to myself, what wasted time it is, being in the moment,

I'm doing nothing with my life, doing nothing with my life being someone who doesn't have a career, It's all about progression, got to be a god who plays games, being occupied is important if you want to distract yourself, don't be nothing, Zen is the devil, be your possessions and your collection of crude pretensions.

Remembering fun times in squats and old worn out scenes,

Its an ongoing process getting sober and clean,

Rebellious interactions and childish laughs, uncensored broken mirrors reflecting conditions of scat, Scalped humour cutting to the bone, what solid Kore do you suppose is so hard?

Like a Cainite sinning, its the pursuit of the fullest form of redemption, seek it out for forgiveness, experience it all so you can get past those petty desires, its all the way to make the feeling complete.
Emptiness and void, but filled with joy.

What needs are these? I cease to be, but look into weird skies,

Changes eternal and unsettled worlds, but what is worth forever?

If I could see a face of beauty looking with loving eyes in to what path have I fallen?

In to what depths do I rise, a question of unimagined content, the pursuit of which remains illusive, the source of my confusion.

Falling down, I meet the ground, my old friend there for me again, in to the Earth, love for what its worth, but eat of life no more.

My unwanted advances towards hope ignored, swept off my feet to land on my ass, where is the other of Chaos?

Where is its match?

Only it knows itself, but through limited projections of order, that which is the simulacrum of the original mated together as one.

Apparitions of obscure glory, what visions I see that no one will know, but eat the truth, I am happy aloof, a loner at heart who loves her who went wrong.

How dare she show interest in me, how dare she tell me she cares, what does she think I am? Human?
No simple glory this animal is above all that, below their conditions for success I am triumphant in my failure, proud from their rejection and inter-ested in all.

What riddles I leave for those who can't read, since poetry is dead and I've left my battered head, Epitaphs unknown, fallow fields for seeds I would sow, but each to their own, for pleasure is grown, by all those who seek the truth.

What rhythms are these, that leave me in peace?

In vowels repeating these words are all said,

In speeches no one has heard,

Secret structures unfolding their work, a telling of tales unnoticed,

Patchwork revelations and Earthen confabulations, spiralling as they're flushed down the pisser.

Secret window of Chaos, open before me, to view a love all my own, Untouched and eternal, it is a flow that could sustain, for all times that which I could live for.

That no one could see as I, a form of narcissism to be sure,

But I could always count on my love more than others,

In a nutshell, everywhere is a mirror of my bride who is perception.

Diving in to darkness an abyss of torment, my soul is calcined in the fires of passion, experiments in pain to learn tolerance for the nutriment of awareness.

Joy for all time is a blessed embrace, but such simple pleasures give little to those who seek the source of their mistakes, a gentle caress is a stab in the back, from the one who would make you love all.

Chapter 13 – For Adversity

The news is in from Helen's mom, she died in the hospital room alone and without comfort, the bastards wouldn't even give her decent pain killers because she is a junky. With her murder I no longer have any attachments to this world, I am dead to desire and have run out of patience for the ignorance of the oligarchs. The other day we had a wake and a BBQ at Helen's mother's, I watched a gang of bikers ride out flying down the road like a screeching murder of crows, her mom is tight with the founder of an all female gang who all dress in black leather and when they found out about Helen, they started looking for targets for to kill. Helen's mom supplies them and they are going to start a war with the drug dealers who work for the bankers in order to protect their territory, they may not find out who is responsible, who that rich billionaire fuckhead is, but since the cops aren't doing anything for a homeless junky girl, at the very least they might get some revenge for Helen's death. Even though they lynched her on the street nothing is being done about the murder, some asshole bishop is blaming Helen, saying that it was a suicide he blamed the music she listened too and her drug addiction. This kind of thing happens a lot, when the rulers of this world murder someone, especially someone who inspires people to resist them, they murder their enemies and make it look like a suicide. By taking a rebellious hero and making it look like they died from suicide, it helps the rulers of this world to spread despair, it helps to discredit the teachings of their enemies and encourages rebellious people in general to also commit suicide, hell, if my writings ever got famous enough, they would probably do the same to me. Helen wasn't famous when she died, but the Bishop is calling for more police to enforce stricter drug laws and now no one even thinks of her, all of this makes me so sick I can hardly even write about it without puking or screaming, or crying.

People are so locked into their consensus trance, so stuck on the spectacle I sometimes think the only way to get the attention of the mainstream is with sensationalism. This has really got me wondering about how effective murder might be for spreading Anarchism, it is obvious that purely legal means or protest are insufficient, that those with enough money can get away with anything. I wonder what would happen if someone high up was assassinated? Really the more oligarchs killed the better, they may have people eager to replace them, but I would still rather have second or third string autocrats than their top choices, at the very least it may be a good means of getting media attention. Despite the fashionable pacifist philosophies of today, the world would have been a better place if someone had offed Kissinger, Rumsfeld, or Cheney in the 60's. Anarchism is already associated with terrorism, further more it is misrepresented as mob rule which just goes to show that even if you are peaceful, even if you play by the rules, the media and establishment will condemn its enemies anyway that it can. When it comes to the use of violence for Anarchist purposes a person is damned if they do, damned if they don't. Obviously if it is to be successful at all, any attempt to spread a message through violence needs to be worked out very carefully memetically. This is especially true since Anarchy is fundamentally against the use of violence against other people, except in self defence. This is even harder since the nature of the oligarchs attack on humanity and the world is so abstract, that most people do not even realize they are being attacked, all because it hides under euphemisms like the "economy" or "law." Clearly if widespread transformation is going to happen it is going to take some new tactics, especially in propaganda and memetic warfare.

Glorifying the murder of corporate CEO's and government officials is a risky tactic but it may be a good way to get exposure, though the kind of message I have is ripe for misinterpretation and twisting to make me look crazy, that's how it goes when your enemy controls the media. I have just become so sick and tired of demonstrations which accomplish nothing, symbolic acts, standing up for your principles is fine, but a time comes when you realize the same old tactics are not working and when you realize that, then your protesting stops being about creating change and becomes simply a matter of pride and stubbornness. Maybe I am just getting tired of living myself, but I am finding it hard to avoid fantasies of murdering the heads of oil companies, murdering the kind of fuckers who killed Helen and are killing the planet. Death comes to us all, the rich and powerful, the poor and oppressed, the brave and the fearful, what is up to us is how we meet that transformation and what we leave behind, kings will fall and though a bishop may pray, in the end Anarchy is change and he will bow to the dawn of a new day. At the very least killing some of the oligarchs would mean those fuckers didn't get away with their bullshit like they thought they would, that their money can't pay the price of their corruption. At any rate activism needs to change, to adapt to government tactics if it is to succeed against them and this is something that Occultism can shed light on, to help people to think outside the box and break the consensus trance of the rulers.

Last Chance To Be Human

I am boring, I am alive outside of conformity and compromise,

I met Helen begging for change, 17 and a prostitute,

She was beautiful but too strung out to see this Magus.

She was always at home, sleeping on the streets with a backpack and some skag, there was nothing to do but get high, pass out and die, she was well aware and scared but brave, not sure how to be, just sure she wants it free.

Wisdom at a young age, but a hopeless kind of gaze, its a sad thing to see, when I wish I was her not me.

Getting clean when your life is a bore, trying to get a job when your infected tracks are sore,
Some will often judge, with poverty a sin, but those who have a conscience know that money is no win.
Taken by the medics the pig rulers blocked out all visitors, caring only for matter, they said she is a wanted woman for the destruction of property.

There she laid and 9 days staid, in her last breaths she spat blood in their face,

They declared her dead and she became a denizen of realms beyond.

Bankers then claimed her mothers possessions as their own,

What wealth that land will bring is taken for the few, no more will its proceeds feed the poor, no more will it generate the flowering divine within, no more will we enjoy the love of the gentle Earth's embrace.

Now knowing this, I see the future falling, what hope of change I have seems dead with her, dead like the plants in winter, dead like that Plutocrat's spirit.

Revenge on my mind, but more a desire for justice, all I can do is try to play some crappy gutter punk blues on my guitar,

A song that won't bring back what is already gone, but could soften the heart of any Plutocrat, if only they had ears to hear.

This song I played has channelled my hate, I realize blind vengeance won't do, such pettiness heals no wounds, my words must live on and reveal their lies to truth.

That if I should die now, I would do no right, for if in her I lost my sight, the pigs would eat all and none would oppose,

Such simple vanity says my rage is not wrong, but in this war, I must bide my time and hit those targets, aimed and strong.

Still, there is sadness everywhere, irreconcilable irrevocable wretchedness wrapped really tight, strangling, choking, breathing forgetful,

It is time for spring again, but the sun is not as bright as it should be,

It faded in its somber gaze as it looked down upon an unknown miscreant swinging from a tree, unforgiven appetites and reprobate repugnance, death for all those who wait around.

It's a macabre adventure to die first, it's your friends lonely breath that takes the last exhale of night in to the dark surrounding quiet that we call death.

Splitting forever apart, no attachment too grave to give, no relation to quick to love but still, forgiveness for those who want more, no forgiveness for those who want none.

Sleepy shadows and arabesque dreams forgiven memes and quiet visions of a world of untouched beauty.

I'm catching up to creators and lost street kids in parks, but who ever said life would be easy?

This world is stripped of one more beautiful veil, undone by misfortune and cast out by common opinions, homeless experiences and unbroken conspiracies of wild adventure.

Truth, Life and Wisdom demonized by those tyrants who would prostitute the mystery of her beauty, All to worship in their religion of death.

Creating laws through their sinister powers, shackling us to a prison of ignorance, all so that we may never extinguish our desires and gain freedom from the authorities and rulers.

My mind is a hurricane with swords dropping like rain, with her in the eye, calmly dying, slowly disappearing, and there is no rescue, there is no end, wisdom's end paid for by the powers that be.

Teeth clenching so often my jaw hurts, no uppers for me.. it's all rage

This time when I fall there will be no one to see, no one to remember, no one to wonder what I meant.

Crack this motherfucker reality open like a broken glass pipe, opening it up like a motorcycle throttle right in to a brick wall.

We all meet death, so lets go bravely, with a smile, maybe foaming at the mouth ready for the next adventure.

Principalities all around, the powers that be don't want us to see,

So she will pass all alone, never knowing her home, betrayed and afraid,

Lost, inspired but unseen, not of this world or the next but in between.

Next time when we die, I hope there is more time, then to just get high and quickly say goodbye

I'm coming back in horror, vengeance on my mind,

Burning Christians in the pale moon light

Burning Christians in the pale moon light

Burning Christians in the pale moon light!

But that is just a dream that I could hate as well as them and this world of forms belongs to those who hate, those who seek power

Death is coming, life is now, it's gonna be a long Kali Yuga, those who have nothing worth dying for, have nothing worth living for.

Anarchist martyrs we will reincarnate till better times, living like peter pan immortal children born again

Disciples of Khaos, back alley Bodhisattvas and whacked out warriors fighting till they reach the punk rock Valhalla, full of cheap beer and whiskey, chugging in the unending mosh pit to a song of pure rebellion.

What lifetimes await when our opposition is fate,
Ready to help, when the people fight back - junky's with AIDS needle blow guns, cooks poisoning the upper class, minimum wage maids cleaning nothing but blood sacrifices on the altar of revolution.
Anarkhos direct action the tactic of universal freedom for all who are crushed by the rulers,
7 year old subway street kids huffing paint, shoplifting filthy adorable little saints,
Freed from their prison and all judgement put against them, climbing up on those who kicked them down.

Dancing in the dark, children of Nyx addicted to freedom and wandering in wonder Ideas like smoking light bulbs, short circuit awareness shatters to a poison shard cutting in your brain,
If only people would drop the pipe and pick up a Molotov, those unwanted children who found a family in the gutter, in a world of unwanted adults, who were never loved for themselves, only the lies of their persona's.

The God of this world is an addict and a pimp, and made this world to justify addiction,
Goddess is a drug and a whore who is sold by her pimp dealer,
When I loved her did I become a John, or is it Johanite?

I am the source of all heresy.

Immortal drunks of ecstasy, bathed in pleasure, drowning in sorrow, reborn anew, instilled with creation, desperate and doubting, walked up circles in abject objection,
Explorer of fantasy, adventurer in the bounds of pleasure, what decadence it is to think I created a universe just so that I might find the ultimate kick and save it in the self righteous heroism of my martyrdom.

Such petty thoughts are of a mortal's mind, so might this be the ruthless valour of the divine in its search for awareness which compels my soul?

A stranger in all lands, a rebel against rebels and mainstream alike, its not nihilism, that's too simple, much more like loving lost lesions, healing the masochists and standing up to sadists, being celibate and masturbating,

My friends speak in tongues to their dogs, train hoppers and leather foot hobos travelling the eternal summer, they found a way to survive and what a life, after life, after life..

Still not sure where we're headed, may be to an early grave.

Sweet dreams of me not being stinky, followed by passionate long lasting naked laughter in the embrace of the nights abyss that is the illusion of our lives.

Drift and dream, so why not follow through?

The Earth is waking up, one way or another, even if its by being burnt and poisoned, cut down and depleted, through our creation of a global threat we will either come together or perish, those who seek to stand alone, seek suicide.

Its now or never, what ironic twist that humanity will deliver itself through its masochistic efforts to stick us all in the corner, while we're still fighting,

Putting us in the position where we learn to get along or be destroyed and deserve it,

But life will continue, and the vain glory of this planet will be obliterated once more.

Can I take a picture of living in the moment? Its for when I cant remember how to do it anymore.

Its hard to ask for help when you are living in a world beyond words, its hard to speak without your mouth, when your out of your body, never mind your mind.

Today I am awash in forgotten dreams and unloved beauties, random acts which splintered potential and worked away our wills to the childish naive glories of our pride,

I remember her in the old days, but it was another life, it was another self, moved far away to be unloved, but remain in obscurity a mutated novelty of lost ambitions.

How will I be remembered? How shall I mosh up a hurricane? Shatter views in reckless abandon, and watch the unfoldment of nature transmute the poison in to a flower.

Simpler times which seemed endless, and I remembered what it was to stand for love, but in those times it was in me to mirror the progress of the others, and look to the end of the book first, then spoil it for everyone.

Leaving me hung over and stranded, paying homage to the blurs of uncaring disillusion with the realities of fashionable existence.

Outside the constructs of artifices, passions and love, loneliness and joy, total wonder of the all, Another high life moment, another knock on the door, waiting to go home, waiting, to find a place in the eternal.

But my patience for procrastination in wearing thin, and I am in the old dementia of thinking I am young, so as to not ruin the games of my playmates.

No more contemplation, but the engagement of disaster, stark obscuration of relinquished glory, supposed non compliance but total obedience to the true will of destiny.

Inspiration lost in shadows, I'm so selfish I want to make the worlds pain my own,

Drown it in the waters of life and soar to glory, experience it all, even the unbearable, shattered mind of shrouded wisdom, it does no good, but it never said it would,

For what a fool condemns is what freedom sends, and on this Earth is source of our birth, waking to a new world, its rapture in our ways, its down to getting high, its forgiveness getting by.

Counting on no one, I am that which no one wants to count on, but someone there for anyone, still optimistic, just to stick it to them, angsty impressions, just to be both sides and stop being taken seriously, but in this assorted scripture, lies the ugliness of language, for it conceals the meaning in its fragment escalations.

Its not polite to give rational reasons to be hopeless, I wouldn't want to offend anyone so I might as well get high by myself.

Maybe I hate everybody, maybe I am filled with love but if I am a solipsist, then I can always be alone and masturbate to myself S&M style.

I know she will be reborn, a spirit too bright to burn out, but what fate awaits her, what tortures must she endure?

Her form now turned to ashes as it was consumed by fire, they have been spread at the roots of the place from which she was hung, Overcome by their desires the rulers would try and rape the feminine form and use her image, but never succeed in capturing her spirit, for she is now the tree which branches to tangents unbound and they see only her shadowy reflection, for they have no creative potential and so do not understand that which they seek to possess.

Their murder of her, is the reflection of their betrayal to all life, their exploitation of all unspoiled wild beauty, that which brings forth the expressions of pure freedom.

She was an outsider with popularity, her life a secret of the unknown which cannot be told, which defies explanation yet is the foundation of noetic intensity, clear and universal yet without interpersonal attainment.

She who is utterly pure, she whose justice extends widely is most holy, holding snakes sweet like honey fed by the first matter of sacred cows in the great work of transmutation.

I want to be alone in the embrace of the goddess, connected by tree antennas to the energies of the Earth, crawling in life, at one with it all,

Old souls dying young, how many lifetimes will it take to get over her?

How many deaths till I feel alive?

This is your immortality, this is your reincarnation, a recycled prophet of choice.

To eat of wisdom's fruit is the nourishment of freedom and in it the seeds of Anarchy

And with that she is reborn, springing to life once again, in a hope of being unborn and so there by feeding, the future of our mind.

To understand the modern world of western civilization, we need to understand its memetic foundations, specifically those dealing with philosophy and the religion of Christianity. Whether we believe in it or not, Gnosticism is perhaps the ultimate syncretic religion and having at least some basic understanding of it is required if you are to understand Christianity at all. It is the ancient worlds attempt to find the meaning behind all religions and its myth provides a variety of insights in to how authoritarian religious thinking took hold of the world and how the feminine principle (Sophia) became imprisoned in a world of patriarchs bent on spreading ignorance. The fact that few people have heard of Gnosticism and fewer still know anything about what was at one time a very popular religion, is yet more evidence of just how successful totalitarian ontology has been in wiping out anything which presents alternatives.

Gnosticism is not something that can easily be summed up, it is not something that appeals to minds used to looking for quick and easy answers or religions which promise eternal bliss in heaven just for going to church and giving them some money. There were a variety of Gnostic schools with quite an array of different view points and within each of these schools, each individual would be expected to have their own ideas, their own interpretations, their own experimental data. It was not a matter of believing the dogma of some priest but of personally mapping the metaphysical realms and coming to your own individual understanding. Given its lack of authoritarian dogmas the term “Gnosticism” is so nebulous as to be thought by some scholars to be a pretty useless term, but I like the term because it encourages a person to study a wide variety of viewpoints. I do not agree with everything in Gnosticism, but according to Gnosticism I am not required to, I can pick and choose to find what fits with my own experiential knowledge of spirituality and come up with my own views, I am even encouraged to study other religions and do the same. Whats more this is the same as the work of an artist magician, to create your own path and allow others to follow their own and so I am free to update it with modern ideas, to leave behind any outdated or unanarchist interpretations and really find what works for me. While of a very different flavour, Gnosticism for those who know little of it is in many ways closer to Buddhism than it is to Christianity, however this is quite an over simplification. From Tantric sex practices and using entheogens, to elaborate mystical rituals and cosmologies, Gnosticism presents a world view that is for many people today totally counter to everything we believe a religion is, and this is because it is authentic. Sophia, who is our mother and who's tears are the rain, channels liquid emotion precipitated from the imagination of reality, those who drink from the cup of prayer are saved from drowning in ignorance because life absorbs the effluent knowledge of the fountainhead source of all. While there were undoubtedly Gnostic teachers, the emphasis was always on the individual learning, not building up hierarchical institutions, dogma, or prescribed rules, but methods of directly understanding the nature of consciousness.

Some Gnostic schools are labelled “elitist” and since Gnostics were often highly literate and literacy was not common among the poor there may be some truth to this, but it cannot really be said of all them. In fact one of the main reasons I am so interested by Gnostics was that most Gnostic schools had at least some Anarchist tendencies, from living communally and without private property or even hierarchy, to being antinomian and against theocratic and imperial rule, to treating woman and homosexuals as equals, they were pro choice, some were polyamorous and some even nudists. In many ways I suspect a lot the accusations of them being elitist are the same kind of charges that right wing Christians bring up against “liberal elites” or anyone who points out their ignorance, that is the Gnostics were using logic to effectively counter the arguments of faith based ideologues who wanted to impose their beliefs on others. As far as I know only Christians, or scholars heavily influenced by Christian culture really call Gnostics elitists and this is because of the idea that real salvation means more than believing the words of a book or priest. Instead the Gnostics believed that since humanity is born ignorant of reality, self awareness had to be cultivated, had to be grown through practices and so to me were no more elitist than any other religion which taught enlightenment, they just called it gnosis instead. Christianity has authoritarian institutions that murder anyone who disagrees with them and so it is truly among the most elitist philosophies ever devised. Such accusations then are influenced by Christian propaganda or projections of their egotism predicated on their love of easy answers which they believe will send them to heaven. That is Christianity is not seeking awareness but instead simply demands obedience from all people on the planet, it is actively seeking to convert all people and destroy all other religions, where as Gnostics were content to let others believe as they like. In fact in the “testimony of truth” a man (or woman) who has “command” of themselves and who knows themselves speaks with their mind and “is patient with every one; he makes himself equal to every one, and he also separates himself from them.” This means a Gnostic is an individual that does not engage in the mistakes of others, but still recognizes their equality with them. (You might have to excuse some patriarchal choice of language, but that is just how people spoke back then, it's the correct use of words, just as English says “mankind” and so it does not reflect any Gnostic patriarchy.)

The Gnostic gospel of Phillip goes so far to say “men make gods and worship their creation. It would be fitting for the gods to worship men” and while as an Anarchist I do not want anyone to worship me, it is easy to see how god fearing people might interpret this kind of talk as elitist. It's an idea that is quite at home in Occult circles as in many cases the gods serve a magician more than the other way around, though it can be quite an equitable relationship. Gnosticism is a magickal religion, it basically says that a religion where people are not divine is what happens when someone turns the gods created by magicians in to archons in order to enslave others. Some Gnostics thought themselves above the law and above good and evil and so it is not surprising that dualist authoritarians would consider people who claimed to be divine and in control of the gods to be elitists.

While some Gnostics did divide people in to groups according to their level of spiritual realization, (Hylics, Psychics and Pneumatics) Gnostics are incredibly diverse in their beliefs and even those who used such terms have often had the context twisted by Christians who were openly engaged in political polemics against them. Eventually anyone can achieve gnosis as Gnostics believed we all have sparks of Sophia within us, it is just that some of us are currently more ignorant about it than others and unwilling to become more aware, the fact remains most people do not want it and do not seek it out and so in this sense will remain ignorant of gnosis. So a Hylic is really just someone who is totally focused on worldly things putting no effort in to raising their awareness and so it is totally accurate for a Gnostic to say they would not benefit from practices they have no interest in and do not engage in. Since we each create our own realities, if you are materialist atheist Hylic, you will create a reality in which you are in many ways soulless and so the degree to which you attain gnosis of your divinity, determines how divine you really are, which is not really a matter of elitism but the unavoidable reality of consciousness and magick.

Given that it is the rulers which organize matter in to a prison and fill us with corruption and ignorance, from an Anarchist perspective we can interpret these classes much like a class war. This would mean that the Hylics would be the rich, who being obsessed with materialism are farthest from enlightenment and the most possessed by archons. Psychics are the middle class who when the revolution comes and brings anarkhos may know freedom, but generally according to their good works, that is how good they have treated the poor. Lastly is the pneumatics, who are the lower class or are those who have given up private property to live in communes and who upon achieving gnosis or anarkhos are not bound by the law and cannot sin, that is they may steal and fornicate and all the rest but are not damned because they are free of the prison of the system and are justified in doing what they will in order to free others. (They cannot be judged like those who consent to the rulers of the system and those who do not realize they are divine) What talk there is of matter in a sense being corrupt can on many levels instead be interpreted as the corruption of materialism and the system and its rulers, the corruption of institutions and the hierarchies who govern this planet and fight with each other for control over it, causing the soul to live in a “house of poverty.” We can also see in this a strong ecological statement, that the unbridled greed of the system destroys the nature of Sophia in order to organize this matter in to our prison of jealousy and covetousness.

Since gnosis is self awareness, (which ultimately means awareness of our divinity) it is easy to for those who have not achieved it to get offended when Gnostics seem to portray it as something which improves a persons mind. This is not to say that Gnosticism saw itself as the only way to gain self awareness, but that any system of thought sees itself as having the best answers and Christianity does not even really focus on creating greater self awareness. Christians and modern scholars see Gnosticism as elitist because it says we need a special knowledge (gnosis or enlightenment) for salvation (transcending the material plane) yet it never seems to occur to them that belief in Jesus to get in to heaven is itself the result of a certain kind of knowledge and so its own type of elitism. The fact is some people are fucking morons and as they are ruling the world, (both now and then) it is easy to look down on such ignorant people who fall for such lies and deception and claim that anyone who disagrees is evil. So then perhaps some Gnostics seeking gnosis were assholes to other people whom they may have regarded as morons. Modern Christians claim anyone who disagrees with them worships the personification of evil known as Satan and is going to eternal damnation, which to me is about the most elitist thing you could say. Gnostics just said people will reincarnate until they attain gnosis, but since these critics of Gnosticism generally have little self awareness, they do not even recognize their hypocrisy. Of course it should again be said the term “Gnostic” is highly nebulous and that some groups disagreed strongly with others, that as Christianity grew out of Gnosticism, some of the Gnostics must have been assholes as some of them became Christians. It seems some were more aristocratic than others or were otherwise complacent with the Roman empire and so it would not be surprising to find elitism in some cases, especially among the more ascetic sects. These people are however the minority and in any group there are bound to be at least a few assholes and hypocrites.

Some groups of Gnostics actually had their bishops, priests, etc chosen by lots for each day, or each ceremony, so that even a lay person new to the group, (though perhaps initiated ritually, probably using entheogens) could be a bishop for the day, another person would read scripture, another person hand out the sacraments etc, having no fixed roles everyone would thus take turns directing the ceremonies according to chance. Gnostics welcomed new myths and points of view and actually held these artistic creations to be the proof of a initiates gnosis, they would welcome anyone in to their group who was willing to learn, yet maintain peaceful egalitarian attitudes towards Pagans and Christians. Gnostics even participated in other people's religious practices and so all this surely points out that most groups were anything but elitist. In fact so central was equality to Gnostic notions that even the most “enlightened” members of a group were thought to be no better than anyone else, that while someone might be especially wise, their wisdom is no substitute for another individual to develop their own awareness. Much to the consternation of Christians often even women were seen as equals to men and were free to take on all the same roles within the group, with special attention payed to female characters in scripture that were glossed over or even demonized by Christians.

If Gnosticism is elitist in the eyes of Christians it is because they refused to accept the hierarchy and authority of the Christian church, instead demanding that their initiates improve themselves, grow their awareness and not be satisfied with their ignorance. All this is completely unnecessary when you believe that all that is necessary is faith in Jesus and anyone who doubted that fact would clearly be seen as arrogant for thinking they were worthy to make up their own mind. Gnosticism is like a religion for students of comparative religion and so telling other people the metaphorical meaning to religions they want to take literally is bound to piss a few people off. Most of the time the charge of elitism comes from modern scholars who are using the label in an overly simplistic way, however its clear that Gnostics would join a variety of different religions, including Christianity and no one could even pick them out since they would simply silently interpret the symbols, rather than take them literally. Gnostics understood that any religion can potentially produce gnosis and any individual can free themselves from ignorance if they put in the effort and so I would argue that one of the main teachings of Gnostics, was the idea that elitism is actually humanities main problem. To me it is clear that the biggest source of conflict between Gnostics and others was their insistence that we are all divine and so hierarchy is ignorant, that religion should not be taken so literally and that people have no obligation to entrenched power structures, that we are all potentially equal in the “Pleroma” and so should behave accordingly on Earth.

Politics was the major reason for Gnosticism's obliteration, once Christianity took hold it could not handle people telling everyone that the symbols actually mean something and so they had to be outlawed. Some Gnostic groups seem to have been to various degrees revolutionary, though generally in a pacifist sense there were some exceptions and it is clear to me that in part, some of the “Jewish” rebellions against Rome were in fact Gnostic. Some of the most interesting Gnostic sects from an Anarchist perspective are the Borborites, Cainites, Carpocratians, Adamites, Ophites, Nicolaitans and the Simonians and these make up the majority of my favourite Gnostic groups. Some interesting Christian heresies which came later, even in to relatively recent times would sometimes have varying degrees of Gnostic flavouring, they are the Brethren of the Free spirit, the Diggers, the Ranters and the good old Dulcinians, who preached that since Christ taught poverty, we should kill the aristocrats and clergy, take their property and hold it in common.

There are two main types of Gnostics, those who were extreme ascetics and those who were of a libertine bent. The libertines believed as I do that with the right intentions and mindset and meditative or Occult practices, the desires of the body can be exhausted and then we can transcend, that once gnosis is achieved indulging the flesh does not entrap a soul, that leading up to this it is the best way to grow beyond these desires. This should not be confused with pure hedonism, as the goal here is to overcome desire, it is just that the methods do not include going in to denial or repressing these desires, but instead exploring them with a mind to find their limits and ultimately why we are truly better off without desire. The libertines were totally against Jewish notions of modesty and the law of Moses and were willing to do anything that suited them that was still in line with truth. As divine beings, law does not apply to those who know they are divine, especially if those laws were created by the theocracies or demiurge, everything a divine being does is itself divine and so shame is the result of the ignorance caused by archons. The ascetics on the other hand were among the most disciplined in the world, the Cathars in the middle ages would under certain circumstances even starve themselves to death so that they might transcend.

Perhaps the most radical, even by modern insurrectionist Anarchist standards were the Cainites, who believed that breaking the law, even committing murder against the oppressors was not only justified, but virtuous because it made the system of the archons unworkable. Cainites would even call upon Gnostic angels to help them “sin” which they saw as a kind of rebellion against the world of the demiurge. “Sin” was anything against the laws of Moses, the laws of the theocracy and so the laws of the demiurge, created to maintain and strengthen his prison for the soul, in many ways they are the bars of the prison and so breaking the laws of the theocracy is service and homage to the true divine reality. From this perspective Cainites were mystical revolutionaries, using magick to do battle with their oppressors. Anything which weakens the system is helpful for the spirit and so revolution is gnosis in action, a person with gnosis is fearless, they have overcome the illusion of the rulers ability to enforce the rule of law and bravely risk punishment in their opposition of tyranny. Fear of the police created by their prestige and glamour in the media does more to maintain the law than any cops physical actions, it is a terrorist spell which must be broken by each insurrectionist. So to Cainites direct action and sin against the theocracy is a kind of initiation, a means of helping others achieve transcendence to the true reality outside the control of the archons and so is the result of achieving gnosis in what I like to think of as a kind of cult of Anarchist illegalism. All things a divine being does is holy and so those who have gnosis of their divinity are beyond sin and it is the work of the rulers to keep us ignorant of this and playing by their rules.

The character of Cain in the Torah was seen as a hero who stood up against a tyrannical god and refused to make a blood sacrifice, that Abel was serving an evil slave master who demanded animal sacrifice, while Cain a working man had only crops that he had grown. Not only this, their “Gospel of Judas” turns the morality of that character on its head as well, turning Judas in to the hero who understood Christ better than anyone and Jesus actually told him to sell him out to the Romans as part of his plan to overthrow the demiurge. (Cain was also thought to be the inventor of both music and of black smithing and so in a sense Alchemy as well.) In fact to the Cainites, many generally despised characters from the Torah such as Esau were looked upon as prophets of the revolution, in the case of Korah, (though it is unclear as there is two Korah's they probably would of liked both) we learn of a character who rebelled against Moses and was brutally wiped out as part of his extermination of all those who questioned his rule or his religion. Yahweh told Moses to kill people for worshipping a golden calf, but this is just one example of his tyranny, in the story of Korah's rebellion “Moses” also resorts to black magick, killing people through plague and having others “swallowed” up by the Earth.

As one of the most libertine sects of Gnostics the Cainites had many counter culture tendencies, including the practice of sodomy, (making orthodox homophobes very uncomfortable) they believed that the body being material was inherently corrupted and so could be defiled by indulgence in sin. There is little information about them but it seems they did not see much point in maintaining good health and so probably engaged in drinking alcohol, drug use and promiscuity, along with the Carpocratians they believed that a soul must have every kind of experience before it can transcend and so by “sinning” in this life they would be swung like a pendulum in to a good life after they die. Knowing the truth that the real divinity is love, that it would not massacre people or act anything like Yahweh is said to, the Cainites sought to show the true reality of forgiveness and the perfect mercy which is an inherent part of the true divine force and they did this by “sinning.” Everything must be experienced by a soul if it is to have “perfect knowledge” and so transcendence cannot happen until a soul knows first hand what sinning is and why it is ultimately not desirable. There fore drinking, orgies, eating pork and living as you wanted was the only way to get over repressed desires that keep you attached to the material world, that the true divine was so good we can come to know this goodness by allowing it to forgive us for all these sins. To me it seems the idea is that the soul does not want to transcend because it feels like it is missing out until it has had orgies and plenty of partying and a variety of bodily experiences and that the theocracy which imposes its laws actually perpetuates sin by keeping people ignorant of these things and so keeps the soul from feeling fulfilled and so transcending. (Drug prohibition regarding the sacraments of the mysteries by the Jewish and Roman state would likely be an important aspect of this as well) To the Cainites the image of a vengeful punitive “god” is an obstacle to understanding true divinity, especially given the horrors of this world, so they taught we should not feel guilty for finding pleasure where we may. They taught that upon achieving gnosis through Occult means we will be free regardless of our engaging in sensual pleasures and that this pleasure for the ultimate purpose of overcoming all desire is far preferable to consenting to the system of the rulers and demiurge. This is a far cry from what passes as “Christianity” today, but even Paul of Tarsus said, “Everything is pure to those whose hearts are pure. But nothing is pure to those who are corrupt and unbelieving, because their minds and consciences are corrupted.” (Titus 1:15) We might also say that the divine through us must know everything, even what it is to be self indulgent and if the body was inherently corrupt then taking care of it was not very important. While libertine behaviour was accepted, it is likely the Cainites were like Epiphanes and the Carpocratians and some other Gnostic groups who were against private property, (including monogamy's idea of owning your wife) recognizing that consumerism and the monetary system inherently supports the system of the demiurge and so is a trap, an act of ignorance. To many Gnostics, private property is a denial of our unity, resulting from jealousy and is the cause of theft which they see as wealth redistribution. So it is lawlessness waits in the thirteenth aeon, represented by the sign that isn't a sign, underlying all the others as the unbalanced symmetry which necessitates the wheel of time spinning, all so that the healer who bears the serpent of wisdom wrestles with time, cures poisons and builds a temple to eternity to continue the pursuit of perfection in all things.

These Gnostic schools which I have mentioned were radical antinomians who believed that humanity should be free and equal individuals, that truth meant living in accordance with what we would today call Anarchism and that external religious authority was anathema to gnosis. Bakunin famously said “ if god really existed, it would be necessary to abolish him” and in terms of the “god” of Abraham, it was these Gnostics who put this idea in to practice, realizing instead we are the ones who are truly divine, not Yahweh. Despite some modern claims to the contrary, this should not be equated with Satanism, or Luciferianism because if anything Satan was created by the demiurge which they hated and so in their eyes was no better, the “evil” of the world was proof of how flawed the maker was. (Lucifer is a Latin word and originally a Roman god and is not found in any Gnostic texts and only later became associated with Satan in the Christian tradition.) While it is hard to really understand the Cainites especially, there must have been a lot of political bias in how they were depicted by the Christian church, which unfortunately is the main source of information we have on them. I cannot say I agree with the idea of killing random people, but there is no evidence of this, though it is not hard at all to believe that some would have been driven to violence by the theocrats and so seek to murder their oppressors. After all when we consider the totalitarianism of Judaism or the corruption of the Roman state who can really blame them?

If Gnosticism was started as a revolution against Jewish and Roman theocracies then Cainites were among the most radical, but all of them were engaged in a kind of cultural and metaphysical war against the archons. Like an Anarchist the enemy of the Gnostic is the principalities and powers, rulers who teach you to ignore your own direct experience, to give up on experimentation and free will and obey their demands and accept their false reality. To a Gnostic, a person can only gain true knowledge by rigorous self examination and directly experiencing all of reality free of prejudice, so It is clear why such a philosophy couldn't be made in to a state religion. Christianity then, as a kind of half aborted deformed and inbred bastard child of Gnosticism would have to destroy all trace of its predecessor if global conversion was to take place. The demiurge is said to be the abortion of Sophia, that is the religion of Abrahamic traditions and hierarchy in general is what happens when wisdom personified aborts its creative processes and then that creation or limited form of infinity becomes idolized.

This loss of historical context, or any loss of context in general can cause all kinds of misunderstandings between people, so that if one does not know what it is like to walk in another's shoes, then that other person may seem very insane or stupid. Very smart people do very stupid things because they have missed some key information for whatever reason and so lost all perspective on the truthful context. So it is with people who think they are honest because they work to oppress others indirectly, or directly through the capitalist system. How many people think they are an honest hard working family person, who pays their bills and supports their family, but not realize or understand the implications that they are working to destroy the planet and enslave third world people. “Good” people are paying through their taxes for bombs to explode on children, but they do not see this because they have no context for how the system really operates.

There are many many examples of this kind of loss of context, for example how would an honest person be treated in a world of liars? If almost everyone in your society is a thief, liar and murderer (at least indirectly) then wouldn't being honest put you at odds with everyone? This no doubt would create a lot of conflict for you if you were to speak out against such things and indeed you would be labelled all kinds of monstrous things and you would be truthfully monstrous to those kinds of people if you refused to keep your mouth shut and play the game. Anarchists can certainly relate to this and most likely the common people would project on to the deviants, all the horrors which they themselves cause, but which they do not understand.

All too often this is seen in romantic and social situations, where two people are lonely so they feign interest in the pursuits of others so that others will be motivated to pretend to be interested in what they have to say. In the end you get a bunch of fools sitting around lying to each other and themselves, pretending to give a damn about each other when all they are really doing is trying to pretend that they might not be better off sitting alone. In the western world of politics so few people have a grasp of what is really real that it is easy to convince yourself that all the lies are true, especially if you falsely believe yourself to be one of the few who do know what is going on, that you are somehow above all the lies. Perhaps you think this because you lie better than other people you know and more people pretend to be interested in what you have to say, but whoever best helps others to escape from the loneliness of being honest is considered most popular. Often most of those people who love popular people are probably just trying to ride their coat tails through lies so that more people will try to lie about being interested in them. This all sounds very paranoid and cynical when I say it and there is some honest people out there, but I think there is a whole lot more people who honestly believe they are not liars when they are. After all if you do not understand yourself then how can you be honest with anyone else? This is believing you are your ego at the very least, so this is a very pervasive thing. While I do not claim to of achieved total gnosis permanently, or to know much of anything, at least I realize that I do not know much and don't pretend otherwise. With Gnosticism in particular however I seem to find ideas that are much like those that come to me in entheogenic ecstasy, I had experiences which led me to recognize truth in them, rather than reading some mythology that sounded plausible. So I highly encourage anyone interested in what I have to say to look into Gnosticism further, especially if you are already experienced with entheogens.

I do not write these things because I think spirituality is crucial to Anarchism (though self awareness is) I am all for keeping it secular in terms of group dynamics, I write these things to try and extol some of the implications on spirituality that being an Anarchist has. I do not want to spiritualize Anarchism, at least not for atheists, but instead Anarchize spirituality. When the subject of mysticism has come up in some Anarchist thinkers, the die hard atheists often ignorantly try to make some weak argument that it is in some way authoritarian, perhaps because a mystic might know something others do not. This no doubt speaks to a justifiably deeply felt pain caused by the actions of religious people throughout history and so with little to no investigation they more or less claim that "anyone who says they know something I do not believe is an authoritarian!" Of course this itself is a pretty authoritarian mindset, especially when they do not understand the philosophies they are condemning or the science they assume proves them correct. It is even more silly because they themselves are claiming to have knowledge that mystical people do not have, that atheists are the only ones with an understanding of reality and so they are setting themselves up as authorities at least as much. (never mind the fact that each person knows a variety of things that other people do not) Even agnostics can potentially become elitists, or authoritarian, most of them seem to not even try to investigate the truth, but are content being ignorant, some even think no one knows the truth and so proclaim this as truth by default. I am not sure if I like agnostics, they seem a bit too sure that they do not know the truth, maybe we all know the truth, we just don't know we know the truth, or know how to stop being in denial? But then I do not have a strong opinion on the matter.

Atheists have often been hypocrites, especially in terms of being authoritarian, they are telling spiritual people they are wrong in regards to things they themselves have no experience in. Some act as if they could know for a fact that all mystical experiences that ever happened were wrong, when there have literally be millions throughout history. In fact science has proven over and over again there is more to reality than what the five senses perceive and in fact science was created in part to overcome the obstacles of being blinded by the apparent reality of the senses. This kind of hypocrisy, small mindedness and double standards is something that has to be scrutinized within all Anarchists and its important to understand that just because we don't agree with other people, doesn't mean they are wrong. Just because someone believes something different does not make them an elitist, even if they wish to share their opinions, it only becomes elitism when they try to force it on others and set themselves up as being the only way, in this atheists are just as susceptible. To some people who call themselves Anarchists it seems like they have the only true view of reality and so anyone who disagrees with them is not really an Anarchist at all, when the truth is no one really understands what Anarchism would mean on a global scale. Saying that all mystical or spiritual people are automatically authoritarian or pro-government is like saying all atheists are selfish and hedonistic and evil and that because there is no “god” all people will only act like murderous cannibal pigs.

Some atheists assume that anyone who has spiritual experiences wants to be a hierarchical guru with followers, this also assumes the experience is more intellectual than it is, rather than a knowledge from direct experience which is actually beyond words. Of course these people who are so quick to label other people elitist most often do not believe that such a thing is possible and so project petty egoism onto something they have not bothered to investigate. They are coming with the presupposition that it is at best a mistaken experience even though they have no idea what the experience is like and so they come up with some bias argument such as it being a ploy to win converts or impress others. Not all people who call themselves Gnostics have achieved gnosis and so are not above doing ignorant things sometimes, but the same can be said of any group of people, because we are human we error. This is true at least until we have complete and constant gnosis of our divinity and if that has ever happened in all of history is not something I can say for sure.

Atheists all too often take religion just as literally as fundamentalists and then wonder how anyone could possibly believe such crap and while a purely literal interpretation is often stupid that is not what mystical texts are talking about. Because of this for example a Gnostic may seem elitist because they say an atheist or person who has not had “gnosis” does not really understand their texts. A real Gnostic is no more an elitist than if there were only a few people who had tasted a mango and then tried to tell others about it. If these people had written about eating the mango and others read it, then fought over the meanings of the metaphors and comparisons used to describe the experience, the people who had eaten the mango would not be elitists because they say that people don't understand what that mango tastes like. How does anyone describe something as simple as the taste of a piece of mango, or any perception without resorting to comparison? If you as a good skeptic were to suspend judgement and consider that our language is not really up to such a task, then imagine for a moment if it were possible to have a direct experience of the divine, clearly it would be a much harder task and unlike the mango as unique as it might be, there would be absolutely nothing even close to compare it to. When we consider the role of entheogens in religion we could now imagine some theocratic asshole made mangoes illegal, demonized them and then destroyed all explicit reference to the mango itself in the historical accounts. When you consider this, you will start to understand why there is so much confusion as to the meaning of mystical texts. The whole point is that we should be trying to eat the mango and figure it out for ourselves, by which I mean acquire gnosis, don't worry so much about learning to interpret metaphors until after this is achieved, because an explanation is no substitute for the experience itself. It is no doubt much harder to describe a mystical experience than other things and so it should be no surprise if mystical texts seem like incoherent psychobabble, but just because you don't understand it, doesn't mean it has no meaning.

If you were in the mindset of some atheists and had never seen a mango then it may even be tempting to say that no such thing exists, how could anything produce such a sensation as what is described? More often than not the atheist is coming into the idea with materialist assumptions, they are assuming before hand that they are right and make all their conclusions based on those assumptions without ever considering they could be wrong. For some of them nothing beyond the five senses exists and so they become totally incapable of discerning even close to objectively the merits of a philosophy they often judge, while knowing the scantest of information about it. On the other hand most spiritual people are all too happy to incorporate science into their spiritual beliefs whenever possible, but they understand that a reality exists before science is capable of explaining it.

No doubt it is a distressing thought for ideologues to think that you would have to experience gnosis (which is shut out by such predetermined dogmatism) in order to understand what the hell these mystical people are talking about. To some of them it must seem like there is some club that they aren't allowed into, that they have been shut out of because of some authoritarian theocracy, but rather its just they haven't learned to open the door, or are too scared to leave their baggage outside. To many atheists, the suggestion that something cannot be proven scientifically is proof that it is a false idea or some kind of a con and so positivist ideologues can dismiss anything which can potentially provide evidence their scientism is wrong. Science is ironically using magickal thinking in this, in that a scientist does not believe in anything until there is a scientific consensus about it as if the consensus is what made it true, rather than nature and in that sense they are right, but not for those believe otherwise. There are no real authorities on teaching what is beyond words, nobody but the individual can impart that understanding.

The Gnostic texts and other mystical teachings are really for people who have either had full on gnosis or at least temporary glimpses throughentheogens, those who have begun to realize there is something outside of Plato's cave, but this does not mean such people are elites, only that they have found a path that is working for them. If these people have had spiritual understanding they will understand this does not make them better than anyone else, this would be impossible if you know we are one, if you know we are all enlightened at our core. Even when I try to explain this point about the problems of explaining such experiences the only ones who would really understand me are those who have tried to explain the same ineffable experiences and so to some degree there is no point in expressing them at all. While this may be true in some ways I do believe we can at least help each other articulate some aspects of the experience, we can sort out our own experiences better in our own mind by expressing it somehow, we can let those who have not yet had the experiences know that something beyond wonderful is waiting for them. I do believe it is possible to get something from mystical texts without having had an experience of gnosis, but this is a pretty laborious task, one which requires the learning of a whole new language, that speaks of things you do not overtly know, a language that may have a different form for each individual source. Unfortunately for atheists this cannot be done in a mindset to prove how smart you are, or how wrong spiritual people are, you cannot seek out such experiences as gnosis with a mindset to do anything but live in truth.

Mystical experiences are a global phenomenon, its just that it may have different descriptions in different religions, or different individuals will use different language and have a different personal understanding of the gnosis. Because the personal lexicon of each person is different, each mind will represent it in a uniquely personal way so as to be best understood by that person and so it is the explanation of the gnosis will be at least somewhat unique to each person, each being as valid as any other, though some may be more confusing or use more subtle metaphors.

Through the proper application of one or more Shamanic and mystical techniques such as meditation, ritual,entheogens and other methods of leaving the body, anyone can experience gnosis or ecstasy. It is not authoritarian for a person who has had mystical experiences to claim some knowledge about reality that others do not have, anymore then it is for a physicist, or for a Russian to say they understand what its like to be in Russia better than those who have never been there. In fact anyone who has had gnosis or experience of universal unity, will understand that since the experience is beyond words that really it is something that cannot be explained, something there never could be an authority on. How could anyone say that all gnosis was wrong or an illusion without going through each specific experience themselves? Just because you have taken psychedelics does not mean you have experienced gnosis as it does not happen all the time, especially not the lower or even medium doses, or in those without the right intentions.

There is of course a big difference between a mystic and a priest or guru and all people should be weary of those who would set up religions around themselves or claim that they are the only way to the divine. If someone starts justifying doing horrible things or telling people they have to depend on them for salvation that is authoritarian, but I do not consider these people to be Gnostic, even if they think they are, this is much like trying to be the king of Anarchists. However in some texts confusion could happen if the Gnostic logos happened to say there is no way to heaven but through me. This is non authoritarian because the logos is not a person, which makes it being authoritarian pretty difficult, (even if it becomes personified) but also because the logos is something in each person. Then there is the fact that you need to understand that such a statement is not talking about a specific religion or even a specific symbol, it is more like saying “the only way to the sky is off the Earth”, “the only way to swim in the ocean is to get in the water.” This is not an authoritarian statement but common sense, the problem happens when the personification (Jesus) is thought to be a real person saying you will go to hell if you don't worship me. In reality the logos is a symbol of the one way, but Jesus is not the only symbol of this one way and so the laymen is easily confused.

To those of many mystical traditions it is in fact crucial that humanity get its act together and start treating each other right, even if we should all ultimately be striving to transcend. What could give an individual the right to be an authority on the divine in any way which sets them up as better when we are all one? The answer is nothing! When real gnosis is achieved it is evident that no authority could really create this for you by going to church, instead the individual has to do it for themselves and so aside from giving advice or a learned scholar being an expert on literature rather than spirituality, there really is no way to be an effective teacher. Even if you could give people spiritual experiences perhaps in a Shamanic kind of role, they need to learn how to do it on their own if they are going to transcend and you are not there to impose your views on them.

I do believe the classical Gnostic and Hermetic texts have some unique and wonderful insights into the implications of the spirit worlds, but all religions have this mystical principle at their core, they simply use different symbols to convey it and elaborate certain aspects more than others and so all have their strengths and weakness's depending on what you are looking for. Different cultures create different environments and so require different symbols and practices to free their people from the cultural conditioning which keeps them enslaved and so different religions have different ways of approaching oneness. If a religion becomes institutionalized however, it falls into the hands of the archons, who then twist it for their own benefits and so it may not be recognizable, but all religions and mystical traditions that I know of are in some sense congruent if you know how to interpret them.

The reason I bring all this up is not because I want to convert everyone to Gnosticism, this is simply one of many philosophies that are valuable and with Anarchist tendencies, however in my opinion it does explain to a better degree than most why humans do stupid things. I also want to show that having spiritual beliefs and experiences is not as some claim a factor which makes it impossible to be an Anarchist, that there were in fact Anarchists for literally thousands of years and throughout most of that time it was in fact linked to mystical philosophies rather than a purely secular political idea. This is not at all to say you have to believe what I do to be an Anarchist, on the contrary Anarchism is in fact much less clear cut as to its borders than many people think, like so many average people with Anarchist leanings who do not even know the meaning of the word Anarchy, individual understanding is paramount to mysticism and everyday life.

Gnosticism is relevant to Anarchists in that it presents a model (even to some degree to atheists) why leaders and people do the things they do. Through its concept of archons and our struggle with them from birth we get a philosophy that teaches us to question authority and to recognize our own rights as individuals, but also to try and understand our unity. Whether or not you believe in metaphysical beings is really ultimately irrelevant as long as you understand that these illusionary thought processes are real factors in the human mind. There is no such thing as red devils with pitchforks but that does not mean we don't each have our own personal demons. Gnosticism fleshes out these philosophies in such a way that we can understand why governments will never work from a psychological perspective and for those who believe such things it goes into spiritual details as well. In the text “the dialogue of the saviour” we get an idea of the Gnostic attitude towards political power and its opposition to the truth when the logos essentially tells us to be as Anarchists. "The governors and the administrators possess garments granted only for a time, which do not last. But you, as children of truth, not with these transitory garments are you to clothe ourselves. Rather, I say to you that you will become blessed when you strip yourselves!"

It is important to note that we definitely should not be going on some holy crusade to kill all the leaders who are possessed by archons, but rather if possible help to free them, help to make them aware of their egos and the effect that it is having on them, at the same time providing a broader framework for denying their assumed right to rule other people. If you feel the need to kill politicians you should have a much better reason than because you think they could be possessed, after all you couldn't kill a literal demon that way anyways. The Gnostic philosophy is applicable on a global level but it can only be carried out by the individual and so you are much better off focusing on your own inner archons than trying to exterminate physically the ones possessing leaders. First you kill the cop in your head, then you try to create an environment where others will see the benefits of doing the same for themselves, this means being there for them if they want your help, but also doing activist work through direct action.

Gnosticism is useful for learning how to free yourself, Anarchism is important for understanding how to free others, if you aren't free yourself then you won't be a very functional Anarchist and if you don't start to apply to your life what you learned as a Gnostic, then you probably didn't learn much from it. If you are spiritually aware then you will want other people to be truly happy and although you cannot give others gnosis, you can help to create a society that is less reliant on the archon mentality. Hierarchical thinking, materialism and selfish consumerist ideals are all detrimental to everything but egoism and so the Gnostic and Anarchist are the same. The archons are the different aspects of your ego which keep you mentally unbalanced, keep you chasing after petty things and wanting to impose yourself on the world. If there are some Anarchists out there who cannot see a need for people to work on these problems, these sources of elitist hierarchical thinking, then it really makes me wonder how they ever expect anything to change.

Archons rule the world and gnosis is holy Anarchism, so as far as I am concerned any philosophy which can shed light on overcoming the idea that we need rulers will have at least some value to Anarchists and for spiritual Anarchists Gnosticism will provide additional layers of wisdom. The Gnostic archons feed off our fear and pain and selfishness, our pettiness and greed and so who could say that overcoming such concepts is not important? The only people I could think of would be those who mean to literally be rulers, for it is in their interests that others be in the same backwards mindset as them. As we are all in Anarchy unless we want to be ruled, then archons both Gnostic and literal need to make us want them in order for them to exist, so it is any real change must include a revolution of the mind. We need to understand that ultimately a person with "gnosis" will not allow themselves to be ruled by anyone and will not want to rule anyone and so it is the Gnostic and Anarchist both need to work to make themselves and others more aware. Though some atheist Anarchists may not agree with spirituality as being real, they are entitled to choose that for themselves so long as they do not choose it for others, likewise it would be just as fruitless and hypocritical for a Gnostic to try and force their beliefs.

How in some supposed utopia, could there be anything but Anarchy? Not that I believe Anarchism would necessarily be a utopia, but that if utopia was achieved it would be Anarchist. We are taught utopia is impossible and so we believe it and it is so, the vast majority of people don't even bother to try and improve things besides maybe their personal financial status. We can each create our own universes and this is real freedom, this is total Anarchy and it may seem like or actually be Chaos, but there never was such a thing as evil, just various levels of love perceived. Yes you should do what thou wilt, but after some time you will realize there are consequences to your actions and it is not the pleasures of the flesh you truly want, for the consequences eventually show that these pleasures are fleeting at best. Then you will find that you want to help free others for not only will you discover an inner compassion you may not of realized was there, but also the courage to see it through. You will also realize it is in your best interests that people get along and work together, that the world not be destroyed, you will discover it is your true will to realize the unity of all things.

The goal is not to impose Anarchism on anyone but to remove the impositions that have been placed on people who do want it. You may have a great spiritual tradition like Buddhism or Gnosticism or some form of Paganism or whatever happens to be best for you, but trying desperately to get people into the same path as you, even if it truly is the best path is not a very good tactic for creating spiritual change in the world. Instead we need to create the society where spiritual traditions will be based on their effectiveness for each individual, rather than social pressures which seek to make everyone the same. If you believe you have the one true way then you should have faith that in such a society where everyone is given the proper information and free choice that they will make the right decisions. I am not saying the goal is to make heaven on Earth, but that Anarchism provides the best framework for creating the best kind of world for both spiritual and atheist people.

There are some Christian fundamentalists who like to claim that talking about Anarchism, Thelema, Gnosticism or a myriad of other esoteric or even pretty mainstream philosophy is somehow oppressing them because they are philosophies which say we refuse to be ruled by fundamentalist Christian values. These fundamentalists fail to recognize we are not forcing them to do anything, we are merely not letting them force us to do things. If a Jewish, Christian or Muslim fundamentalist girl wants to be treated as less than a man and ordered around like a slave that is her right, but should she choose to think for herself then it is not oppressing anyone to protect her from those who would harm her. It is not oppression of Christians to keep governments or other groups from imposing Christian values on everyone. Fundamentalist versions of the Abrahamic religions have made it a part of their religions to impose their religion on others and so when this is countered by people who wish to resist, the fundamentalist sees themself as the victim. Starting with the racist notion of the "chosen people," as I said before, intolerance is a defining feature of the Abrahamic religions and so they cannot tolerate anyone who does not tolerate their intolerance. While refusing to let fundamentalists dominate others may in fact be keeping them from fully practising their religion, their religion is black magick and no individual has to change their actions to suit the theocratic beliefs of others.

Clearly the world would be better off without the Abrahamic religions but what is also clear is that forcibly destroying these religions is hypocritical and impractical. However, any individual has the right to defend themselves from whoever would force them to follow their religion, a fundamentalist has every right to espouse their intolerant religion but those who would avoid being made in to a slave have a duty to make sure they can never impose those religious views. If a Christian has values that say abortion is wrong then they have every right to keep that baby they don't want which is the result of a rape, if they are gay and Christian they have every right to pretend otherwise and lead a miserable life, but they do not have the right to choose that for anyone else. They make arguments like the act of gay people getting married detracts from the value of the word "marriage," but by this reasoning I could argue that Christianity detracts from the value of what the word "religion" means, or even the word "Christ" itself. Perhaps I am offended by their use of these terms and I may not even agree that they actually follow the true definitions of these words, but I still think they have a right to use them if they choose.

It should be understood that anyone who thinks they are fulfilling "god's will" by imposing religious values is completely delusional, the divine has given us free will and those who believe in the divine and believe that it does good, should respect it's decision to let people make their own decisions. By trying to impose religious law on others you show a lack of faith that the divine will judge accordingly. (assuming you believe the divine judges people) If you think you know what the divine wants, then you seem to think "god" is in a state of lack and incompetence, you would think that the divine cannot accomplish what it wants without you, this then is massive arrogance. This kind of thing usually happens with people who take holy books literally and who think it is folly to try and interpret the holy books in a personal way, they fail to realize that taking the books literally is an interpretation itself, especially since it requires dealing with all the contradictions.

This should be understood by spiritual Anarchists as well, that even if your cause is truly right and beautiful, it has nothing to do with the divines will but your own personal will. All acts of humans are for human reasons, especially when it comes to trying to change the world, but then if we are divine it is redundant to claim to do the will of the divine. If you see ignorant actions all around you, it is natural to want to influence others to not do so, but any attempt to force your religious values on others is both ineffective and according to most religions is itself sinful.

The greatest spell they ever cast on you was to make you think magick isn't real and that your own power was to be feared. Knowledge that isn't acted upon or shared is wasted, likewise with magick it has much more potential than just the pleasures of the flesh. One thing we can do is use magick either covertly or overtly for activist purposes. There is a lot of potential for useful things to be done magickally in conjunction with direct action, in fact to me the two go hand in hand. We are all more or less guilty of creating the pain in the world, at least indirectly through the economy, but it is time we made sure we leave the world in a happier place for having known us. In some very real ways magickal war is upon us whether we resist or not, whether we are conscious of it or not, to sit and wait for the universe to fix itself is fool hardy, even if it truly will fix itself. To do otherwise is like saying its OK to destroy the world because Jesus is coming back to save us, this seems very childish to me and it has for too long been used as permission to do horrible things or allow horrible things to exist.

The war for consensual reality is being played out in your mind for all time, to desire to ignore it is the cause of the problem and it doesn't take a genius to realize doing what causes the problem is not a good solution. Although I do not believe in a universal form of ethics for all situations and people I do believe we must all constantly try to better understand and improve how we interact with the world and what our true will is. Given the current economic system it is almost impossible not to in some way contribute to the problems of the world, to help offset this, those who work within the economy must do some kind of helpful work just to have a neutral influence, this is hard news for hipster cafe crowd who know how the world should work. Knowing why you do something and the effect that it has on other people is absolutely crucial to having any kind of self knowledge, to growing as a person and to creating a sustainable and pleasant world both for yourself and everyone else. Egoism is in many ways the root of the problems in the world, now some would argue that people are too much like sheep and blind conformity is a large part of the problem, but this conformity stems from the ego's desire to be accepted by the masses. At the same time it does take some courage for a person to be an individual who swims against the mainstream, thinking for yourself is great, thinking only about yourself is horrible.

You might not believe we should totally overcome the ego, but what I think is most important, is trying to understand the mechanisms of it, so that you can get rid of the parts you feel don't really work and eliminate whatever is an impediment to your own growth. You should also try to understand the underlying unity of all things that lies beyond the ego, while having faith in your individual ability to connect with that one thing. Service to the divine is in willingness to grow in awareness and to put that awareness in to effect through your worldly action, it is not in giving offerings to statues, (though that may have magickal effects, teach humility and otherwise raise awareness through theurgy) the divine is in all things, there is nothing to give it, it has no sense of lack or want, all things are within its power, it does not need you to do anything for it. Instead people who believe themselves to be separate or who are enslaved by others need your help and service, this is true Bhakti, or devotion to the divine, for by helping the divine that is trapped in illusion (people and the natural world which is overrun by corrupt humans) we actually do something for the divine that is useful.

We cannot convert anyone to achieving oneness, we cannot force it on anyone, just like Anarchy, everyone must want it in their own way and in their own time, but we can help to remove that which impedes growth for society. This does not mean we create laws to repress desire, it means we eliminate the systems which keep us from realizing our true will, our own personal freedom and knowledge of self. Freedom from desire and attachment to the material is important, all things that we desire other than union with the divine, (which includes the aspects of it imprisoned by the systematic enslavement of life) must eventually be overcome. However one problem with religions is when they try and force others to overcome their material desires, to conform to their limited morality, because this is treating the symptoms rather than the cause and it will usually ultimately cause more problems than that which it seeks to repress. If someone feels desire then it means they feel a lack and in this way we must rid the world of desire, there is no reason why anyone should feel lack in this world and so direct experience of joy is what is missing, direct experience of that something we feel is missing. Through the Anarchist abolition of the concept of property there would be little to no desire because everyone would own everything, when we have no more desire for material things we will begin to focus more on the transcendent and on real interactions with other people. With the ending of the concept of property we will go a long way to losing the desire to seek out material things, to hoard things, to compete and play ego games. In such a world there will be no more defining ourselves by our possessions, there will only be the embrace of the moment, all stemming from the annihilation of economic want and the peace that will bring.

There are some people who believe altruism is impossible because what is good for the whole is good for the individual, at least in the long term, that we are always motivated by selfishness, that people do good to feel good, or to avoid guilty pains. While certainly this is a factor I do believe it is possible to lose consideration of yourself in an action, to go beyond the ego and do things not because you benefit or because you fear guilt or shame, but because others benefit. In fact I know this is true because I have done it myself at times and so I emphatically reject the idea that selfishness is always the motivation, especially the selfishness that seeks to build up the ego by doing good works. It is possible to exist in a state of consciousness that does not think of "I" and this is in fact the basis of meditation and mysticism. This may be a hard point to get to but the world would be a much better place if people at least tried, a mental state of selfless giving for the sake of only other people. This may seem impossible to some but through attempting it we will learn many lessons on how to be a more enlightened person, though ultimately this cannot even be the reason we follow this practice. When Anarchism is achieved, when there is no concept of property, giving materials altruistically becomes easy, for it does not even seem like a good deed since nothing belongs to you individually, it never occurs to you that you should have exclusive rights to something and so giving others is perfectly natural, so in this way generosity will cease to exist.

What for lack of a better word I call altruism must go beyond simply giving to those in need to doing what it takes to free those who are slaves to the system of oppressors, even if it means we have to sacrifice some of our own happiness for the sake of others. As we are one altruism is in a sense impossible and so perhaps a better word to use would be "compassion" or communal-passion, but compassion is far more reaching than altruism and so is not used in all the same contexts and not generally in politics, even though Anarchism is without a doubt the most compassionate way of life. What I mean to say is that we as a species can work together as one to achieve mutual benefits in the long term big picture, at the cost of some individuals voluntarily sacrificing in the short term their selfish interests. This does not mean becoming a sheep or doormat, it means helping others when we are capable of doing it and if they want our help. This does not have to mean horrible toil with no end in sight, but it's important to do what we feel we are capable of doing while remaining balanced, this could take the form of volunteer work or even seizing the day, embracing the joy of everyday life, but also learning to take joy in creating joy in others. By inspiring others to be more alive and free, you are with the right intentions being altruistic, this can be done in direct actions as well as finding joy in sowing freedom in little ways everyday. If you are not happy in your activism if you do not take some time for yourself then you will be ineffective and unhappy, you will "burn out." This is remedied by having fun every once in awhile, you are thus refuelling your ability to do more serious work and in this way fun too becomes a form of altruism. Sincerely working to help others is a very beneficial way of learning what is beyond yourself, what your true will is, what it takes to become an honest person and what it is that is really inside you. From all these lessons we are given experiences and realizations that will help anyone on their spiritual path and with a spiritual understanding, help any activist to have more determination and drive.

It is also true that in political Anarchist groups or in Anarchist societies there is often a sense or feeling of endless possibilities of the joy in life that could in some cases be called magickal. Anarchism is about maximizing freedom for all and freedom is the ability to exercise the true will and fulfilling your will is magick and so in many ways the goal of the Anarchist is to create a world of magicians. Anarkhos, or a mind that is free of archons can be likened to gnosis and as some degree of gnosis is required for magick, in many ways an Anarchist mindset is needed to achieve magick. A mind totally overcome by archons will have no free will and so magick will be impossible for them and as a person overcomes the archons, not only do they have more control of their consensus reality, they naturally become Anarchist in temperament and mind. Further more it should be understood that there could never be an authority on magick anymore then their could be an Anarchism, it is something different to each person. Each person contributes to magickal awareness in their own way, wanting different things from it and doing different things with it, so there could never be authorities on things that each person could learn in their own equally valid way. We could in a global Anarchist society theoretically do just about anything so long as we work together, likewise I do not care to put any limitations on what is possible through the use of magick, especially if everyone was a magician. Each of these concepts is left solely to the individual to define.

By learning magick you invariably learn how to connect to the divine and so you cease to depend on authorities of theology and ontology. The religious institutions of today fear magick for this very reason, for who would go to a priest when you know how to enter the spiritual worlds by yourself at will, in the here and now. Though you may still learn from others, a proper magician will not take them as infallible authorities to whom we must appease and submit to, knowing how to think for yourself and DIY is crucial to learning to work magick. This is much the same as an Anarchist who can learn from classical thinkers on the subject or from other people in general, they can learn from them but they do not (hopefully) set them up as authorities, instead both the Anarchist and magician insist on first hand experience and learning how to do it yourself.

If you ask people what they think when they hear the words “magick” and “Occult” they often think of Satanists and evil things, maybe Witches and a variety of stereotypical images, or at best they think it doesn't exist and is merely a delusion or a con, but this is in reality because they have had a spell cast on them. This spell is designed to keep them ignorant slaves endlessly cycling out rituals they do not understand to communicate a message they usually do not really mean, to someone who will probably misinterpret it. This culture of wilful ignorance and unprotected memetic orgies is being manipulated in order to make anyone either hate or dismiss anything which might set them free from the delusions of the consensus reality. If you don't know what questions to ask, it doesn't matter if we have free will, you can debate the corruption of politics all you want, you will never understand why it all goes to shit.

History is rife with examples of Anarchist cultures which functioned very well, though of course there is always room for improvement, the reason governments have managed to survive is they are very good at convincing others there is no other way. Many if not most of these examples in ancient history were mystical and magickal groups and throughout history it cannot be denied that such people have often been the driving force of creating a more egalitarian and democratic society. From Simon Magus who cast out any who would mistakenly worship him as a leader, to William Blake and the enlightenment era thinkers, to the spiritual leaders of the Indigenous resistances, Occultists and mystics have thoroughly been involved in creating a freer and essentially Anarchist world. Atheism will never convert everyone to its faith and so this mystical Anarchist threat to the state and church can expose the spiritual fallacies of the state and religious institutions' claims to authority more completely than any atheist critique, as it can show what real spiritual reality actually is. This is in fact the prime reason why these traditions have been so maligned and even exterminated throughout history, they are the antithesis to theocracy and the secular governments which came from them. It just so happens that these Occult groups tend to not be so preoccupied with creating vast armies or formalized doctrines of economics and instead leave people to be autonomous in their own way.

Before Emma Goldman, Proudhon, Bakunin and Kropotkin was Aradia, Chuang Tzu, Diogenes and Zeno, Anarchist thought is nothing new, especially in terms of mystical groups, in fact almost whenever magick is seen in a positive light and a strong part of the belief system, Anarchist tendencies inevitably seem to be present. I am not a big fan of much of Marx but Pythagoras beat him to the punch as well, those interested in ancient Anarchism should also look up Antisthenes, Aristippus, Pao Ching-yen and Yang Zhu as I have found them to shed a lot of light on the nature of free will and what is truly worth wanting in life and society. In many tribal cultures the “chief” is not so much a leader but a spokesmen or facilitator and while I am not saying there has ever been a utopia, or even that we should be exactly like historic examples, there is much we can learn as Anarchists from them. Anarchism if it is to succeed must be more than economics and politics, we must create an Anarchist culture as a whole and for this purpose Indigenous and Pagan societies are a gold mine of wisdom. When people believe they do not need a middle man to acquire spiritual truth then they find that spiritual truth and don't tend to believe they need an authority to tell them how to live at all. While these ancient societies were not perfect and had their prejudice's it is anachronistic to apply modern standards to them and in many ways they were still far more egalitarian than many are today, including some ways which modern Anarchists often overlook. Though of course we should not passively accept whatever we are told and when applicable we should not be afraid to be heretical and update a philosophy, we should not make the mistake of throwing out the baby with the bathwater.

While in some ways it is not correct to say that tribal or Indigenous peoples are “Anarchist” what they have cannot generally be called a government either, their way of life is something all together different which eludes our European labels. Indigenous organizations might better be described as a direct and true communal democracy, though it still retains certain unique characteristics which are further quite different from tribe to tribe. Indigenous cultures who had tens of thousands of years of successful culture, were taken over because they didn't see the value in consumerism and so did not bother creating vast technological and economic infrastructures with which they could conquer other people. In many ways they are more socialist than Marx, yet since Anarchism is inextricably linked to European culture we should not think that the models we get from that tradition are universally applicable or right for all peoples, that we should create a new kind of cultural imperialism that refuses to allow various ethnicities to do things in their own way. It is authoritarian arrogance which might even be called unconscious racism to assume that there is no room for improvement from those European doctrines of the nineteenth century, that there is nothing we have to learn from tribal peoples.

The slave revolution of Haiti was galvanized and united by Voodoo, it was even officially started by the “Bois Caiman” ceremony which would eventually lead to the first successful slave revolution and the one of the biggest embarrassments for a colonial empire. The reason why Voodoo has such a bad name in western society is specifically because it was used by slaves to fight back against their Christian oppressors, casting spells of defence so that they might know freedom and so the religion was demonized. It is a shame to me that Voodoo is not more popular, especially among African Americans as it is one of the coolest religions which I know of, its tribal and Shamanic origins are very well preserved and taken on a new life of its own, a religion of free people who will never be slaves again. Voodoo has much to offer for those looking to learn magickal practices, especially in terms of invocation and it is ignorant bigotry which has defamed this powerful and beautiful religion.

Not only can we learn from the example of Indigenous groups like the Igbo people of Africa, the Xeer legal system of Somalia, the Zapatistas or the Iroquois confederacy of Turtle Island, we can learn from tribal people's all over the world, including ancient European Pagan traditions. In Iceland the land was specifically colonized in order to escape the monarchy of Norway and an interesting legal system known as the "Icelandic commonwealth" was created for those who consented to have a representative or arbitrator. There was no real executive branch so much as groups created for mutual aid, for helping to feed each other and protection in case of violent feuds. (you could go it alone if you chose) This system survived until Christianity and foreign influences ultimately corrupted it with more capitalist and monarchist ideas. In capitalist countries people pride themselves on what they own, where as people in indigenous societies generally took pride in how much they could contribute to the society, with the laws of hospitality being among the most important customs.

In many cases given their class systems and aristocracies the political systems of Pagan Indo-European cultures cannot be said to be Anarchist, but they were in some ways regarding religion, economics and other aspects of culture more egalitarian than many "democracies" today. Celtic society too had some very egalitarian notions comparable to the Icelandic commonwealth, yet at times there was also was a kind of caste system and slavery and so it is hard to generalize accurately. In Pagan Europe some tribes managed to remain more independent and freedom loving than others and while some monarchies did develop, because of the culture of individualism in general, but also a lack of capitalist infrastructure, a more communal economy was required and as I said before, polytheism allowed for much more spiritual tolerance. (For example a variety of gods, the use of entheogens or public rituals involving sex, promiscuity etc, not to mention a general lack of institutional orthodoxy.) Though most knowledge about them is lost, the pre-Celtic people's of Europe were perhaps even more Anarchist in that they were much more like other Indigenous societies than most European societies. So we should not hesitate to welcome the Neo-Pagan traditions in Anarchism as most of them are specifically looking for egalitarian religions and I doubt any of them really want kings or ancient class systems. So while I won't get overly romantic about these culture's, we do not have to take the authoritarian parts to see the value in their religious practices, any more than we have to believe the Earth is flat.

Freedom and creative thought go hand and hand and magickal practices focus very much on both these things, so it should be no surprise that a magician does not want to be ruled. While there are attempts at reconstruction, since the Christians destroyed the details of Pagan religions most Pagans today are "eclectic," that is they practice a mix of traditions. So it is perhaps more accurate to say that Neo-Pagans are magicians and Occultists and that a magician or Occultist can take symbols and practises from wherever they like, that they are spiritual Anarchists. (They certainly don't want a new theocracy) As nature is sacred, any Pagan worth the name is an environmentalist and while they may not have thought it through, for environmentalism to be successful we must overthrow capitalism and so the state that is fused with it and from there create a new society based on Anarchism.

There was even a Roman god called Liber Pater, or the "free father" which goes back to prehistoric times but would eventually become blended with Dionysus. His holiday Liberalia, on March 17 or what is now St. Patrick's day, was originally a fertility and entheogenic festival in which people would eat honey cakes and drink wine and have orgies. (mushrooms were likely in the honey and or wine) Later on this cult was associated with Roman lower class called plebeians who "worshipped" Liber as the god of freedom and free speech, wildness and ecstasy, the religious freedom he bestowed allowed them to maintain some semblance of freedom within that slave society. Along with other forms of Dionysus, Liber could very well have inspired aspects of Gnosticism, a symbol of the popular revolts of the most undomesticated people with their mystical experiences that exorcise and demand their rights as individuals and as a class. This cult along with that of the free fathers wife Libera was eventually forcibly reformed by the Roman senate who saw it as a threat to their power, it was appropriated, regulated and sanitized, eventually the original rituals would even be ridiculed, yet it is clear that it represents the last expressions of a free people being consumed by authoritarian civilization. (Libera is not the same as Libertas and is associated with Persephone and as the wife of Dionysus, Ariadne as well, with Libera's mother being Ceres or Demeter and her links to Eleusis also being celebrated on Liberalia, this shows yet more associations to entheogens.)

A wax effigy of Julius Caesar was actually crucified at his funeral on Liberalia and the cross is a symbol of Dionysus, he was symbolically resurrected as a god of the theocracy, having previously been given the title of high priest of Rome, pontificus maximus. As the “dictator for life” Caesar would give his name to the following Emperors and they would attempt to emulate his deification and trick the people in to worshipping them as gods, only they would do it while they were still alive. This tradition was then combined with a plethora of other crucified gods and represents some of the clearest origins of the seed memes for Roman Christian theocracy. The bible brings in legends of Julius Caesar and all the rest of the popular contemporary mythology, so as to steer the masses in to a state theocracy.

While there has been more than a few scholars theorizing about the Roman creation of Christianity, from what I have learned, the historian Josephus Flavius (Some believe he was really of the Calpurnius Piso family) with the help of the Flavian emperor Titus twisted the myths further, satirically painting Titus as the messiah of the Jews or more specifically as the “son of man” of the new testament. This theory was explained by the researcher Joseph Atwill in his book, “Caesar's Messiah” and holds that Jesus of the new testament is the emperor Titus and the “son of god,” meaning his “father” Vespasian was in turn is associated with Yahweh, or god the father. We know from his own writings that Josephus was a Pharisee, an aristocrat and Jewish rebel leader, but sensing defeat urged his followers to kill each other as suicide is sinful. After casting lots they kill each other until as the story goes, Josephus is left with only one man and he convinces this man they should both live, so Josephus becomes a traitor and joins the Romans. Josephus even admits that due to an ambiguous prophecy, the Jews were expecting a messiah, but he says that Vespasian is this true messiah and so we can see that Vespasian was attempting to make the Jews worship him as a god and this kind of Roman theocracy was a primary cause for rebellion. (See “The Jewish Wars” by Josephus, Book 6 Ch 5 and Book 3 Ch 8 for the very suspicious story of how Josephus gained the general Vespasian's confidence, and even inspired him to become emperor.) Where he failed, Vespasian's son would continue in this work and the gospels were written in such a way as to be black humour about the destruction of the temple and the victory of Titus when he put down the rebellion. In fact many of the prophecies supposedly created by “Jesus” about the “son of man” were fulfilled by Titus and were more like bragging. The military campaign of Titus into Judea matches the life of Jesus according to a very specific sequence of similarities and according to a specific “typology” or genre of Roman literature. This fits so completely, that along with some other basic research in to the Roman creation of Christianity, only a person with blind faith could dismiss it as coincidence and so we see it was in part done to trick people in to worshipping the Emperors as gods. (There are always many layers to mythologies but this one is very clear)

Stories of deified emperors performing miracles was not uncommon, but was especially prevalent with Vespasian. So we see Vespasian was said to have miraculously cured a blind man and healed a crippled man and while this theocratic propaganda claims the emperor was sceptical of his own ability, it was obviously a publicity stunt to encourage emperor worship. Vespasian cures a blind man with his spit and in John 9 Jesus does the same thing, while Jesus also cures a crippled man in Mathew 9. (See Tacitus, Histories, Bk. 4. 81. and also Suetonius in his propagandized biography of the emperor) In the bible here, the Jews are said to be sceptical of Jesus and this is because in this case Vespasian is Jesus and so they were suspicious of his staged miracles. Just as he was dying we can see more of Vespasian's black humour as he was quoted as saying “Oh dear, I think I am becoming a god” and accordingly after his death he was indeed deified in the imperial religion. Surprisingly many members of the imperial family of Titus are canonized as the first Christian saints, yet no one finds this suspicious!?

From another researcher named Stephen Huller, going in a totally different direction than Atwill, I learned how Marcus Agrippa II was most likely the author of the Gospel of Mark and while this author painted Agrippa as a benign character, it became obvious to me that he too was a major part of this plot. While I do not agree with all the ideas of the author, such as his views on Gnosticism, when read in the context of other works regarding the origins of Christianity in the Roman government, Huller's book "The Real Messiah" is still very important in explaining aspects of all this. He came to this conclusion about Mark by interpreting a relic which was said to be the throne of this apostle and this is especially important because the Gospel of Mark is the earliest in the New Testament and most scholars agree Mathew and Luke are based on it. Marcus Agrippa II is also known as King Herod and is the last in a dynasty of the Herodian Kings of an area which includes what we now call Israel, a puppet government of Rome, who's father was friends with the likes of Caligula and who were for generations a thoroughly corrupt family. Now it so happens Agrippa II had an incestuous relationship with his sister Bernice, who at one time was also the mistress of Titus (before he was emperor) linking them all together quite nicely, in fact Agrippa helped Titus put down a Jewish revolt and was well connected in the Roman world. So then if Vespasian is the father, and Titus is the son, it would seem that Marcus Agrippa is the Holy Ghost writer behind the prototype of their theocratic autobiography.

According to mainstream scholars Agrippa was also "coincidentally" friends with Josephus Flavius and helped him write his histories, this is important because Josephus is the closest thing to "proof" of the historicity of a man named Jesus Christ and a whole lot of other things. Josephus is considered by many scholars to be a reliable historian, but according to even mainstream history he was a Jew and a traitor to his people, he was adopted as an adult by the Flavian family (Hence the name Flavius) and became their historian and propagandist and so whoever he was, his character is highly suspect. While the histories of Josephus may often be true, just like the mainstream media today it does not mean it is in context or without political motives or above the occasional well placed lie. Given the multitude of evidence of the prominent role played by the Flavian dynasty in the birth of Christianity, it is more than a little suspicious.

If this wasn't enough, according to the scholar Robert Eisenman in his essay, "Paul as Herodian," the man known as Paul of Tarsus is to some degree in league with Bernice and Agrippa and according to some scholars may have even been in Herod's family, a man who by all accounts has shaped much of Christianity as we know it today. Paul does show some Gnostic elements to his teachings, but like many other Christian works with Gnostic aspects, this would be because Christianity as we know it didn't exist at the time and he was talking to Gnostics, using their own language in an attempt to convert them. Keep in mind that by all accounts Paul started out as a persecutor for the Jewish theocracy, that his name was originally Saul and so many works attributed to Paul could be referring to a Gnostic, who's teachings were twisted by Saul impersonating him. This would make the book of acts a parody of history as well and it is in this book that Paul is put on trial by Agrippa and released, (Perhaps even a satirical reference to how the plot was conceived as Paul tries to "convert" Agrippa) it is thought to be authored by the apostle "Luke" who also supposedly wrote one of the gospels. Now all this may seem like a stretch, but if you research these topics yourself it is easy to see the official history of Christianity is almost entirely fabricated. The Roman government routinely changed history to suit their propaganda, even taking out the names of artists they didn't like on their own works and so with something like Christianity, as a state religion it is guaranteed to be altered heavily.

As I mentioned before, Christianity would eventually be twisted further by Constantine and the Bishops making Christianity the official Roman means of domesticating its people. Christianity was concocted as a distortion of many popular religious movements most noticeably Gnosticism, which itself was influenced by a wide variety of sources, such as mystical Judaism, the Orphics and the various cults of Dionysus, but also Egyptian religion, Hermeticism, Pythagoreanism, Chaldean Oracles and other Mesopotamian and Pagan forms of mysticism. (Even Hinduism and Buddhism likely contributed as at Alexandria) The Jewish influence on Gnosticism comes from John the Baptist and to some degree possibly the Essenes, but from the Mandaean Gnostics we explicitly learn that Jesus was a false messiah, and some argue they say that Paul created the story to lead people astray. The name “Jesus” is taken from a kind of Kabbalistic formula for the logos called the “pentagrammaton” spelled YHSVH which represents the five elements. (though ancient Jews left no writings spelling Jesus that way, it makes a lot of sense Cabbalistically speaking) As I mentioned before “Christ” means “anointed one” and was a common title of mystical priests, it referred to a cannabis anointing oil used by Gnostics so that the name “Jesus Christ” or the Logos was the name of a state of mind that was hijacked and presented as a historical person.

Judea was rebelling against the Romans from a variety of groups, but I would argue with two main political motives, the first were those who wanted an independent Jewish state, represented by a variety of Jewish factions with different views as to their religion. The second political motive was the Gnostics who wanted to overthrow all archons, all rulers and free people in general and given they were oppressed by Jewish and Roman theocrats, wanted a more Anarchist communal type of society free of institutional religions and monetary systems. Christianity then was created to co-opt the Gnostic and Jewish revolutions and mix the diverse symbolism of Gnosticism (some of which was inspiring non Jews to become Gnostic and rebel as well) with authoritarian Jewish religious ideas, thus creating a state religion capable of uniting an empire. While “Christians” were persecuted by some emperors, thrown in the Colosseum as the classic image holds, this would in reality generally be Gnostics and Jews who were engaged in rebellion, with the history being changed to make the government run groups look like martyrs. While Gnosticism is thought by most Christian scholars to have come after, there was after all a wide spectrum of beliefs in Gnosticism, from the more Jewish versions on one hand, to the more Pagan on the other and quite often the same congregation could have a variety of types involved. As “Jesus” never existed in the flesh and even modern Christian bibles are rife with references to Pagan mythology, we can see that those who believe in a historical Jesus must have come after the creation of the texts, while those like the Gnostics who openly taught their religion as mythological allegory must have been the creators. As the term Christ referred to the initiates of the baptism of fire, or anointing oil ceremony, there were many Christs (even if cannabis wasn't involved) and through Gnostics people were turned in to Christs and hence called themselves Christians, even more often than Gnostics, however it would largely be the opposite of the religion we know today. (Many Gnostic groups managed to avoid the martyr syndrome which is so pronounced in Christianity, again we must understand there was a huge variety of “Gnostics” just as today there is quite a variety of “Anarchists.” That later on after “Christianity” had been successfully co-opted, “Christians” using more pacifist tactics would be acting very differently in general.)

Then the Roman state along with the non Gnostic Christians destroyed most of the historical context, they aborted and sold out the revolutions as a form of mind control, associating it with pacifism and being a good slave, ideas which have now spread across the world. (The details of this are too much for this book and so I encourage you to read the above sources I cited. From here on I will speak as if they are true, though I will not write as if you have any knowledge of them which I have not provided.) As the emperor needed some genuine spirituality in the religion, the New Testament is made from twisted Gnostic teachings, perhaps even some of the names of the apostles are taken from Gnostic teachers, but many are names seemingly taken from the Roman and Herodian rulers as with Mark. While Titus put his own story in to the bible so that people would worship him, there is Cabala in the texts and other mystical symbolism, some of which could be taken from the “Q source” in order to twist them as they are often Gnostic teachings. Though there are no copies still around and the Q source could also just be a rough draft of the Roman texts, at the very least it is easy to interpret much of the symbolism of the New Testament in Gnostic ways. (Gematria, or the number symbolism of words and alpha-numeric codes was widely practised in the ancient world and would be a perfectly natural thing to consider when your letters are also numbers.)

Using the Gnostic symbolism and writings they unknowingly preserved some of the encoded entheogenic wisdom and other mystical ideas in the New Testament, but put in stories of the Caesars. While there are mushrooms in the art of Churches, to me it is likely this is due to Gnostic infiltration in to the church, that obviously most Catholics were not participating in this kind of Eucharist, but that artists, or perhaps a few mystics and secret heretics were continuing the true religion while using the Catholic symbolism in order to avoid persecution. (Christian writers on the heresies of the Gnostics often complained of covert Gnostics.) Many of the antinomian heresies were essentially ancient forms of Anarchism and while we may find the idea of ancient revolutions or ancient Anarchists hard to imagine today, if people don't like the government today, why would it be any different in those times when the government was even more openly tyrannical?

It is funny to think of the memetic roots of the modern day counter culture and Anarchist thought, we have lost much of the historical context and assumed we created a culture of freedom, but it is something that is found around the world. It has been noted by some authors that Buddhism and punk rock are highly compatible, for example a certain Buddhist monk made the statement that "Buddhism is spiritual Anarchy." Certainly they are both anti consumerist and place an emphasis on knowing yourself and relying on yourself as an authority, to question everything and to get beyond contrived notions of self. In this way the counter culture can also be likened to Greek philosophy, the Stoics having somewhat of a hippie edge to them and the Cynics being like punks. This is of course not a perfect comparison but when we remember that the Greeks were handing out Ergot potions at Eleusis, basically dosing everyone with LSD there is probably more of a connection than most realize. Still I think its kind of cheesy to talk about punk and fit it into anything else, mystical or otherwise, I think its a mistake to try and define punk, punk is punk so shut the fuck up. I am all for Dionysian orgies and parties, but still I think it would be a mistake to think that concerts or raves today really have the spiritual depth to them that these kinds of things had in the ancient world. (We can fix this!) However I would argue that despite how cultured and civilized we think we are today, there is still the undercurrent of the ancient Pagan mystical traditions. Thank the Goddess we haven't all been turned into "good" obedient quiet little workers, I hope and suspect that nothing they can ever do can totally take that away. The average psychedelic dealer may be a far cry from a Shaman, but its a lot better than nothing, we might even think of entheogens as a fail safe created by nature in case authoritarian religions take hold, we can always relearn what people used to know.

If someone claims to believe the things that many religions seem to profess, like loving each other, being good to each other, treating others as equal to yourself, then really there can be no better society than an Anarchist one. If these people believe in their gods, then they should trust in their gods abilities to create people who are capable of living up to the god's principles. Anyone who claims to care about other people should be an Anarchist and it could be argued if you take a mystical perspective on the meaning of religions, that most, if not all religions were started by people who were generally at least somewhat Anarchist, but had their teachings warped by those who wished to control others. You have to have something to offer the disenfranchised masses if you are to appeal to anyone, you have to offer them something different, I would argue in most cases new religions come around specifically because the old Anarchist mentalities of other religions had been corrupted. For those who wish to trek out into the wilder-ness of individualist realities, who wish to find their own truth, we can make our own homes out there but we should never forget those who imprison themselves, we are always united in the Chaos of nature.

There is an undeniable overlap in the the Anarchist and spiritual communities, yet very little has been done to further integrate the cultures and goals of these two groups. In some ways this understandable, as it is considered bad taste to speak of politics in spiritual situations and spirituality in Anarchist circles, but if we look in to history we can see that we cannot really understand one without the other. I have noticed people in the activist community, even if they are atheist generally live by principles which are central to spiritual teachings, often putting these principles in to practice much better than religious people. Some have some vague spiritual understanding, but many Anarchists are very busy people and have plenty of reading to do as it is, so a study of the Occult is not something they ever get around to. Another kind of person are the spiritual people with Anarchist values that are more or less undefined in any political sense or are otherwise not acted upon, these people are ignorant of hard political theory and generally not very active as they are often busy pursuing spiritual practices. If it were put before these people plainly, most would likely agree that Anarchism is the kind of world we should be striving for and that most of their day to day approach is in fact often Anarchist in nature. Both these kinds of people would do well to learn more about that which is vaguely understood by them, I would argue that through the attainment of this knowledge both groups would be more effective in their goals. Truth which is only ever contemplated, is no good to a spiritual person and Anarchism is the most direct means of putting an enlightened self awareness in to practice.

Anarchism should be deadily important to pretty much all Occultists and Pagans today, though of course I think it should be important to everyone, but these are people who have historically known all too well the kind of repression and religious intolerance that can occur. Even today these are minority peoples who definitely can be ostracized and subject to intolerance and stereotyping, Christians in Africa kill people they claim are Witches, even children and I can safely say I know there are some who would like to do the same here in North America. So in the name of self preservation Pagans and Occultists have a duty to try and ensure that their practices are safe guarded from ignorant bigots who wish to destroy them in the name of some twisted idea of holiness. Any Pagan who sees nature as sacred should walk the walk and help in environmental matters, this should be common sense for all people, but if you believe everything has a spirit and everything is interconnected this should hit you a bit harder. Any person who believes in freedom of thought and expression can do no better than help to create a freer world, so it is these people need to fight for their rights, all people need to fight for their right to exist.

Only in an Anarchist society would mass spiritual awareness be possible, short of divine intervention (which is a fatal mistake to wait for) there is no way that a mentally disturbed society with governments that actively brain wash people in to being selfish, authoritarian and violent can ever bring about a mass awakening of real consciousness. Not that within an Anarchist society spirituality would be placed on people, or even that converting people would be more prevalent, but that an Anarchist environment would be a place where true spiritual determination is possible. In Anarchy the questioning of all things is encouraged, not to mention being freed of wage slavery people would have the time and standard of living required to devote themselves to their spirituality more fully. Spiritual awareness would naturally occur and would flourish much easier because humans would be living in their most natural environment and as the gods make up the forces of nature, it can only be as they intended. Even the morbid and alienated Occultist has many reasons to instill in others the need for society to allow people to be themselves and act according to their true will, for example in an Anarchist society they wouldn't be so damned alienated! This isn't about getting people to see things the way you see them, especially in a spiritual context, but getting people to agree to let each other do their own thing in a way that does not involve the corruption of hierarchies.

It is true the traditional Occult groups often have grades, but they are almost always more like grades in school rather than rank to which orders are sent down. The grades are just a sign of a level of competency with the information of the group, equality is still paramount and the individual is left to educate themselves. Just like we should trust a "shoemaker" to know better than us how to fix a shoe, we should probably have some basic understanding that the people with higher grades know that Occult system better than us, that an Occultist has some insight in to the nature of consciousness that others might not have. This does not mean we have to be a slave to our shoemakers or those who have mastered an Occult practice, but that people who study and practice something generally know more about it than those who do not. Also it should be understood that most of these groups act more like study groups or ceremonial working groups with no real agenda beyond that, so while there are definitely authoritarian cults out there, non hierarchical organizations are quite prevalent. Not to mention you definitely do not need to be part of any group to be an Occultist and most are in fact "solitary practitioners." Anarchism can help Occultists deal with and understand the warning signs of an authoritarian cult, but also since promoting atheism is not an effective answer to stopping the spread of authoritarian cults, Occultists can use their awareness of consciousness to subvert such groups and free brainwashed minds.

I cannot stress enough that I do not prescribe any person's philosophy, do not believe me or anyone else in your reality, do not follow anyone, but learn how to learn, learn how to use your mind and figure things out for yourself, only then will you be capable of really understanding others anyways. Those who think they know themselves and are the master of their own mind, when they have come to the conclusion they do not need to learn anything, nor practice in its use are the blind who tell everyone else what to see. The question is not, are the traditional forms of religion and the Occult Anarchist or not, Anarchism is a term that is relatively new and so as a new creation is by definition not exactly the same as old things. Nor is the question, are the mystics of the ancient world all Anarchists? Or all perfect? If you only learn from people who you like completely, or who you agree with about everything, then you will never learn anything. History is full of mystical revolutions based on the abolition of hierarchy and the creation of societies based on mutual aid and egalitarianism, but the question is not is the Occult a better form of Anarchism? But what can we learn from the past to understand our present situation better and what are some things we can do to fix our problems?

Those who have the knowledge and power to effect change in the world have the duty to use it for the betterment of all life and I think perhaps this is why so few people have the courage to become real Magicians and Witches. There is a lot of responsibility that comes with being able to use magick, it would be selfish and childish to treat it as simply your play thing to get you laid or to get rich. New Age techniques are for the people in the modern days trying to manifest consumer products, they don't want anything that will make them more self aware. Its foolish to think as they do that the ancients who created the philosophies didn't really have anything worth while in terms of practical manifesting techniques, which they learned from testing and implementing over thousands of years. This is quite ironic because many New Agers put Egyptians, Hindus or Mayans or other cultures on a pedestal and yet do not bother to learn the real techniques that allowed them to become spiritually aware! Many are into sacred geometry yet know nothing about Pythagoras or Freemasons, so New Agers are kind of like the pop music groupies of the magickal tradition, yes it does work just like the pop stars are technically making music, it does not mean it is really anywhere close to high quality.

If you are a New Ager I don't mean to put you down, but to encourage you to learn more methods, to know that there are thousands of years of carefully acquired information on the subject of manifesting and that you should challenge yourself to do the best you are able to. The emphasis to manifesting and magick also needs to go beyond selfish pursuits and in to trying to make the world a better place. Most New Agers don't even realize what the Occult is all about and so they do not bother to get into it, having bought in to the propaganda of bigots they, like so many others associate it with Satanism or what they define as "black magick" but I can say first hand it has a lot to offer anyone on a spiritual path.

In my experience the New Age movement has been largely commercialized to sell books and overpriced things that supposedly make you healthier. There are far too many trend tendencies and above all too many superficial claims of promising enlightenment without people having to really change their life or personalities. Expensive New Age seminars and workshops promise all kinds of skills which could be learned for free if teachers had any integrity or the students had any discipline. Unfortunately some of the fluffier Pagans can even fall in to this capitalist trap, but spiritual knowledge should be free and those who would charge money for it, or make it in to a business show themselves to be incredibly ignorant of the most fundamental aspects of spirituality. Too many have some dream of making their living off their knowledge, and they may even have some real technical knowledge and while I am not against donations for time and effort put out, instead of turning awareness and magick in to a commodity, we should focus on building up the magickal community, a community which doesn't need money and can be independent of the system which oppresses us. There is not nearly enough challenging information in the New Age movement, very little that is revolutionary and it is all too easily commercialized by the consumer culture. Most New Agers fear the very Occult philosophies which they have unwittingly ripped off and yet they tend to feel like they are authorities on the spirit world, especially if the can channel a "spirit" who will tell them whatever they want to hear. Its important that New Agers be brought up, not condemned for their superficial knowledge, not everyone needs to become a master of Enochian magick, but there is much more useful information out there than the fluff that is pedalled as spiritual enlightenment. Some spiritual people have the idea that only an enlightened being can do any good, or that we should focus on transcending and this is a huge problem. Not only does it ignore history, but it is part of the escapist, and especially consumerist mentality created by the New Age philosophies which help to perpetuate and strengthen the manifestations of the archons, but once they are seen for what they are, the archons cannot control you. This is really all part of the hippie authoritarianism, the avoidance of anything complicated or brutal in an attempt to make the world a better place, it is much like the idea that only pacifist tactics are justified in resistance, that all we can do is pray to our masters to set us free.

Violence is a large issue which neither I, nor anyone else can answer fully, but even if you do not feel comfortable doing it, I think its crucial that we support a diversity of tactics. One thing I can definitely say is using violence, magickally or otherwise requires much thought before hand by the practitioner, this is especially true in that there is almost always a much better way to get your will. As far as I am concerned destruction of property is not violence at all, it is vandalism. Violence against humans is reasonable when it is done in self defence or in defence of life itself and given the critical situations of the environment and the oppression of third world countries we are in a time that pretty well anything against the system can be justified as defence. As people in the third world are being murdered and enslaved and their lands plundered through capitalism, if we have real solidarity with them as any true Anarchist would, then an attack on them is the same as an attack on yourself and so defending them is self defence and to argue otherwise is the cowardice of an uncle Tom. Given that our world faces total colonization by GMO's and enslavement to technocratic Fascists, it is not hard to justify the use of violent action, but this does not mean these are the most effective tactics and even in situations where they are effective, we still need a diversity of tactics. While it is puzzling there aren't assassinations of bankers and other nefarious business men in terms of righteous retribution, it is true that it is not for the most part an effective means of changing anything, however as I said before, some targets are worth hitting because they are the best at what they do.

Left wing intellectualism may turn people with a certain kind of mentality in to Anarchists but it has obviously failed to convince most people and while anyone can criticize anyone, there is nothing revolutionary about demanding everyone rebel in the exact same way. Those who feel the need to demand the end of all alternatives to their chosen form of Anarchism would do well to remember that the abolition of hierarchy necessitates the abolition of conformity and cultural and social domination; and so diversity of tactics, opinions and lifestyles is intrinsic to Anarchism and should be encouraged.

Any revolution which does not have the overwhelming support of the people is doomed to failure, especially an Anarchist revolution since Anarchist martial law does not make any sense. Considering the military that such revolutionaries would be facing it is absurd to think the current Anarchist population could be successful in any way that would very tactical. We are for the most part fighting abstract concepts such as hierarchy, this is not something that can be blown up but must be worked on psychologically. If you kill all the government and military somehow, that does not mean the average person is going to be any more Anarchist. While violence might be used to justify taking away rights from the people, they are mostly gone now anyways, so really just make sure either your defiance comes with lots of propaganda explaining your position, or it remains an unsolved mystery.

Some people call for violent revolution openly, and given the state of the world I cannot help but support such efforts, but I cannot pretend that there is much strategic advantage to such acts, at least when it comes to creating an Anarchist society. If such people feel they can honestly fight a revolution successfully then by all means they should do so, but most of the time those calling for violent revolution have very little skills or ability to do so. Anarchism cannot be created through violence, however armed resistance is useful in stopping people from destroying the planet and specific individuals from oppressing others. So long as the goal is destroying some specific part of the system rather than creating Anarchy, it does have strategic value, but while such a goal is very much worthwhile in itself, it is a mistake to think that destroying the system is the same as spreading Anarchy. (such acts might grow Anarchist awareness in your consciousness but not in anyone who isn't already open to it) We are already in a class war, that's what the class system and hierarchy means, violence will not spread Anarchy very well but given the state of the environment there is a good case to be made that destroying the system that is killing all life is a bigger priority. After all if everything is dead there can be no Anarchy and so trying to open the eyes of a bunch of wilfully ignorant bourgeois slaves who are complicit in the murder of all life, is perhaps not the most pertinent goal.

Global class war is already happening, just because the elites of the world usually declare it using euphemisms and newspeak about freedom does not mean that Anarchists killed, activists imprisoned, nature destroyed, people impoverished and countries invaded is anything but war. War is here now whether you want it or not, unless you are in the third world it is being waged indirectly and covertly, but it is real in first world as well, the loss of constitutional rights is an act of war against the citizens, what is up to you is your ability to face up to it and to do something about it. For those who believe only pacifism is ever justified, or that we should only pray or try to focus on being enlightened, even the Dalai Lama has said in various ways that sometimes violence is justified, that it is "foolish" not to use self defence. He said "at the moment that the being is our enemy we may have no choice but to kill our former friend, but we will kill with regret and compassion for someone who has, as it were, become temporarily insane and does not recognize us." He is no doubt naive about global politics, (though he is a Marxist, he even jokes he is farther left than China!) but it is safe to say the governments of this world and the plutocrats who really run things have gone mad with power, that they will kill us in order to enslave us as much as possible and so we must defend ourselves. The Dalai Lama would say we must use the minimum amount of violence necessary and I agree, especially given the tactical reality we are facing, we must do what we can to disarm and restrain the tyrants ability to destroy us and the planet, we are all one, but they have gone insane and do not recognize this in any way and so we must stop them before we cannot resist at all. Tibetan Buddhists have gone to war, they fought back against communists, but before this they wrote out texts about how to deal with Muslim invaders and others and had a "formulae for killing unjust kings." Shaolin Monks learned Kung Fu for a reason and the reason is this world has violent people in it who will oppress you if you give them the chance. We can also see that the mystical warriors known as Ninjas, famous for their psychic skills and magical powers, as well as their incredible martial arts abilities, are thought to come from Buddhist/Shinto monks called the Yamabushi. While the mystical side of these warriors is often dismissed, they were certainly knowledgeable about Japanese Occultism, they were also found in independent communities of working class people who had very democratic systems and were defending themselves against feudal warlords bent on restoring the class system. The justification of violence against tyrannical kings is answered in great detail in the Bhagavad Gita and is the primary theme of this great work. Even with Gandhi in India, there were many other groups pursuing very different tactics, often violent in nature which contributed to the British handing over power to the person who would at least play ball with them. (Just as Malcolm X and others balanced Martin Luther King) Just because the tyrants learned they can trick pacifists by not directly sticking a gun in their face until the last moment, does not mean they aren't trying to enslave you and so you should wake up and be here on this Earth now and not wait for enlightenment!

The elites of the world have made it explicitly clear, either you are with them, or you are against them, whether or not you recognize this or are a violent person, they are deadly serious in their black and white thinking and in the end pacifists will be killed just the same. The oligarchs showed no quarter to Pagans or Witches, none to Indigenous peoples when they committed genocide, why do you think it is any different now? Race war is happening as we speak, the government is filled with racist eugenicist crypto-fascists, the rights of citizens are a fading memory and anyone who opposes their absolute power can be labelled a terrorist, do not be so naive as to think Anarchists will be treated any better, how much longer must the genocide continue before pacifists agree violence is justified?

So I say if your goal is to destroy some specific aspect of the system then there is little to no need to win the public over, in some cases it might even be best to do so without revealing yourself as Anarchist, so as to limit government propaganda. Anarchism depends on consensus from the people and such agreement is definitely missing right now, nor will violent acts be likely to improve Anarchism's image in society. It is however also a mistake to think that because the mainstream media will use such acts for pro state propaganda, that such tactics are not necessary or helpful, the mainstream media will always be pro establishment whether Anarchists are pacifists or not. It is the sole purpose of the mainstream media to strengthen the position of the establishment (if in no other way then by generating capital) and so it should not be pandered to or relied on in any way, we can only hope to create alternative media. No matter who you are or what you do some people in the world will hate you or disagree with you, in the end all you can do is try to be informed and do what you think is right.

Any revolution is composed of more than just warriors, any revolution needs more strategy than simply killing off the ruling class, it needs logistics, propaganda and building of infrastructure to take over are all crucial forms of life support. So while Food not Bombs, or squatting and dumpster diving may not be as revolutionary as killing the president, they are still tactics which have revolutionary advantages. Given how ignorant people are, it is safe to say Anarchists are in for a long war and so we must focus on maintaining the environment on which life depends and stopping the government from achieving the technocratic supremacy that will allow them to censor people and quell any rebellion. Once public support is achieved for Anarchism, violence will become increasingly important, the people in power will most often never be turned in to Anarchists and they will never peacefully surrender that power no matter how nicely they are asked, no matter how pacifist the Anarchists, no matter how much public support. At the same time I do believe that much more effort should be made in to propagandizing the police and military about the benefits of Anarchism, or at least about the importance of standing up to authorities and reaffirming the idea that they are suppose to be public servants, not servants of the oligarchs. Only when the protectors of the oligarchs are won over will they be defenceless and while this is easier said than done, it is easier than trying to win over the oligarchs themselves. The people who run this world would rather have an openly dictatorial system than an Anarchist society and because of this armed insurrection will more than likely be necessary in the last stages of the revolution, but tyrants are easily replaceable so long as the vast majority of people believe in hierarchy. So it is that Anarchists must create an alternative infrastructure which is capable of transferring the power, overgrowing society with Anarchist memes to strangle the roots of hierarchy, rather than only trying to cut off the heads of state.

Lack of care for the environment shows just how separated we have become from the global consciousness, all things that exist have a spirit and are alive in their own way, it should be obvious to all but it is not, so I will repeat that we are inextricably interconnected with all life and so all things. For this reason we must learn to live with and respect nature rather than seek to dominate her, environmentalists and all people have much to gain from the concepts of animism, pantheism, and panentheism, depending on their spiritual views. Pantheism is the idea that all matter has within it the divine, while panentheism is the idea that the divine is in all matter, but also outside of it and animism is simply the idea that everything has it's own spirit and is alive. When we see the natural world as alive, as having inherent value rather than only economic value, when we learn that we must maintain relationships with other life forms rather than act as if their lives have no meaning, then we can start to truly understand nature and learn of the truths that hide from those who have no respect and make war against the web of life. It is from this process that magick is made possible and from it people can learn to live sustainably and in accordance with natural processes which of course is best exemplified in Anarchism.

Activism approached in the right way can also be thought of as a means of yoga, for yoga means "union" and the primary task of Anarchists is to build up solidarity. Through activism we learn a lot about ourselves and the world, we learn determination and more often than not we learn more than we normally care to learn. To be an activist, whether through direct action or more conventional social work, we embark on a practice that will test our limits and make us grow whether or not we want to. What is more instead of personal aggrandizement which is so common in spiritual and secular worlds, we learn to help others and the true meaning of humility, altruism, dedication. We learn what it means to have integrity, for activism is the process of strengthening the integrity of union with all. Activist work can be seen as a spiritual path and the process of realizing individual Anarchism as spiritual growth, you do not need to be spiritual to be either an Anarchist or activist, but all these things require much of the same kind of mind.

The knowledge of the metaphysical aspects of magick will greatly benefit from the growth that occurs from activist work and the magick is also of course of great value to the activist work and spiritual growth of the individual. Despite the fears of religious fundamentalists who do not understand their own religion, it is crucial to the well being of the soul that a person learn how to deal with the spirit world directly. It should be obvious that to grow spiritually you should learn about the spirit world, if you wait till you die to explore the heavens you could get lost. It should also be obvious that we should not be made slaves to certain portions of our minds that will destroy the entire being if they are left to control everything and are not restored to their place of equilibrium within the whole. All these things can be accomplished through activism and magick.

The Occult has a place today in activism for the simple reason that it is real, it has real implications for society and it is the key to understanding sociology and psychology. What better skill is there for anyone to learn than how to control reality, to make things better for everyone including yourself and explore the limits of reality? Anarchism can never function unless it is in line with all forms of truth and the truth is consciousness is central to everything humans do. Any successful form of Anarchism must be in line with what we know about consciousness and the Occult offers the most ancient and structured, time tested form of psychology known. This then obviously has huge applications in growing as a person or understanding other people and the world at large. In order to change the world, first we must understand the psychological reasons that created the problems and that keep people complacent and ignorant. If you are a dogmatic authoritarian riddled with fears, neurosis and arrogance it doesn't matter how much activist work you do, if you cant figure out your own awareness you cannot figure out the problems of the world. If you are a spiritual seeker but cannot focus on anything but your own selfish needs, then you will never attain enlightenment and so by combining spiritual practice with Anarchist practice, we can accomplish both goals.

As for practical forms of magickal resistance, in the protest of reality I already suggested how sigils can be used in protest by putting them on to signs, but I should add spray painting them on the street is good too. Sigils could be used to do anything from saving the rain forest to helping that girl (who is willing) to get away from an abusive boyfriend, all the way to changing laws or making others more aware in general. Psychic self defence usually has more to do with unjustified paranoia than genuinely being attacked, but corporations are admittedly trying to invade your mind and there are a variety of Occult techniques that can help protect you. Familiars can be used for self defence but you must be extra careful in how you program them, especially in how they choose their targets and what they do with them. Like the Cainites rituals can be done to ensure successful direct action operations or illegalism in general, or to help with any legal complications that may arise. If you are trying to use magick for activist purposes its important to pick proper targets, try to get to the root causes of things and try to be specific in your intentions. If you have enough energy to deal with it, such as in a group, target the root causes that created the desire for the draconian course of action. As always this should be followed up with physical actions to help the ritual along.

Divination should be done before any magickal ritual, but once mastered it can with the right person be very useful in all kinds of intelligence gathering, I have seen my own predictions come true too many times to have much doubt in it. Divination is best used to acquire information about what has already occurred, or what is occurring at that moment, such as “what are the police or company planning to do right now.” “What are so and so's intentions in this deal? Are they being honest?” There are many many uses for divination in direct action but it does require someone who really knows what they are doing. At the very least the tarot is incredibly useful for getting to know yourself better, your motivation and your unconscious processes, it is potentially a doorway to astral realms and provides one more map of consciousness. The future is not fixed, but the tarot can show you where you are headed if you continue on the same path, it can show you what will happen if you do any number of things. Psychic skills if they can be developed have obvious advantages, from remote viewing to being able to pick out the undercover cops, to having premonitions of police raids, but of course such skills are hard to master and without a lot of experience are of an unreliable nature, though intuition can certainly be improved through such practices. The police, CIA and the U.S. military admits to using these kinds of tactics and psychic agents, so we must meet them on this front.

In most cases with magick its probably best to not target any person specifically with a curse, no matter how awful they are, it is almost always better to try to change their policies or the results of their actions etc. This makes more sense in a tactical way, since for example if you are not careful, cursing the president could cause him to go even more insane and make his actions even worse. Casting magick to foil imperialist agendas or fill politicians head's with Anarchist ideas has clear benefits, but since the president and most of the elected officials are figureheads there are few individuals who are worth targeting individually. Perhaps some specific CEO's or bankers are worth targeting, especially if they own large portions of the company, but only if you are comfortable with that kind of karma or down and dirty action. For the most part this is pretty unnecessary, cursing a CEO may make his life miserable or could even kill him, but chances are it will not change the specific issue you are trying to fix. If you want to stop bankers from robbing people, since its a systemic problem it is better to do a working to stop that, then targeting individual bankers. A curse may be gratifying to sadistic vengeance tendencies, but if he does not know or believe the magickal reason for it, it's not likely to do much good, after all just because bad things happen to a CEO does not mean this CEO will change their ways.

One way or another, we are whether we like it or not in a kind of magickal battle for the collective unconscious, a battle between the forces of tyranny and the forces of freedom and to make things even more complicated, everyone has both sides within them. When applying magick to activist causes I think that it should always be kept in mind that you should never do anything magickally that you would not be willing to do physically. So for instance it may be possible to kill or curse someone magickally but unless you are willing to directly kill them, (assuming you could get away with it) then you shouldn't do it.

The egregore of various corporations can be targeted, you could even sacrifice corporate buildings using explosives or molotovs and do something to exorcise the corporate egregore as you do so. More important as far as I am concerned, specific social issues or corporate and government policies can be targeted. Cursing corporate egregores makes more sense than cursing the CEO's as they are basically possessed by it, but money empowers it and so you should target it's supply of income and it's stock prices. Instead of trying to manifest events that destroy a logging company physically, you might also try to do a ritual to restore nature, to make people more environmentally aware, or to save a specific area that is being threatened. As a lot of energy would be needed you could in a public protest banish the “demon” of disregard for nature, or consumerism, a particular authoritarian tendency, or even hold regular public masses to banish the government or hierarchy in general.

Since corporations have accumulated so much power and energy and involve so many people they are a strong consensus reality and so we cannot rely on tactics involving overpowering them metaphysically (at least without a whole lot of people) and so you can go to any secular protest and try to do rituals to harness that energy for magickal ends. (Overtly or not) It is crucial to work proactively as well, to define yourself as being for something, rather than being against something and then can create alternative cultures and symbols which are magickally created and which promote Anarchism. When it comes to magickal activism getting your sigil or familiar seen by as many people as possible is often helpful, this is of course logos and mascots for most organizations, but I doubt that most of them are very well ritualistically made to their full potential. (The word mascot come from French mascotte meaning "sorcerer's charm, 'faerie friend,' good luck piece" or essentially a fetish) The media can be used in this way though unfortunately most of us do not have the ability to get our symbols on mainstream TV. It should be possible to hijack corporate sigils or logos for these purposes but depending on how actually magickally conceived they were, it may be difficult to take them over. Depending on how deeply you believe in the literal magickal warfare of some secret group of magicians ruling the world, you may want to consider that you could be opening yourself up to attack from them and so take appropriate precautions.

Even if you don't believe in magick many other people do which makes it a potentially effective form of resistance, for example many people today are Christian, if a group were to picket a corporation, or government building and publicly curse the corporation or building itself, this would make a lot of the workers nervous and add another layer of psychological pressure to the protest. It doesn't even have to be a real curse, but just a show that would fool the superstitious, though of course real rituals work better and cursing a corporate egregore as a whole could do a variety of things to help. Still a bit of magickal terrorism may be appropriate if say anyone who buys a fur coat thinks they will be cursed, but even if they don't believe in such things people are probably going to be a bit weary of going past a black magick ceremony/protest to get into a store to buy things or to go to work. This all depends on the circumstances and besides doing black magick rituals to frighten away Christian fundamentalists, most often its probably better to stick to more positive and life affirming magick, trying to manifest what you do want, rather than trying to manifest destroying what you hate.

Since trying to raise peoples awareness unknowingly could be characterized as black magick by some, it is very important to know exactly what you are doing and why. There is a lot of potential problems that must be taken into account whenever you are effecting people specifically, instead of some law or something more general. Just as it is not cool or beneficial to slip someone LSD it is important to take into account how you will affect someone and that you don't give them more then they can handle. Now, I would be in favour of spiking some politicians and bankers with LSD and doing a variety of magick to make them more aware, but still this must be done very carefully. The case can easily be made that drastic times call for drastic measures, you must make sure you know what you are doing with magick, it is potentially more dangerous then a loaded gun. The goal is not to send everyone to the insane asylum or to give selfish fearful fools incredible magickal power, or to get revenge on tyrants, the goal is to spread awareness and Anarchy.

It should also be kept in mind that there could be repercussions for representing Occultists and Pagans as black magicians, however this goes into the whole argument about whether or not violence is justified in protest. I think this is a question only each individual can answer, while many modern Pagans and Occultists have tried very hard to be accepted by mainstream society, the fact remains we do not have freedom of religion, we do face oppression and prejudice and the traditional lifestyles of pre-Roman Europe are in many cases illegal to pursue. Our ancestors made a clear attempt to resist the memes of the empire, environmental degradation, the war on drugs, Christian prudery and notions of shame, corporate Fascism and capitalism and most of modern society are all anathema to most traditional Pagan cultures. The fact that Pagans might try to gain acceptance by the mainstream is because they are still brainwashed by the magick of the state and Christian culture. I do not want acceptance by the mainstream, I want to get rid of the notion that there even should be a mainstream, especially because complicity to this mainstream society is fundamentally fucked. The rulers can be defeated, it may take secretive actions, but we must be resourceful and dynamic in our tactics, for Occultists a little bit of death magick like the sting of a scorpion can strike by surprise, we can cum together for the revolution, not for vindictive vengeance born of moody obsessions, but for a ruthless and penetrating loyalty to truth.

That said, someone with skill and knowledge could learn from Voodoo practitioners who create zombies, or South American Brujos and the Thugs of India who use datura. More precisely I mean the active chemical found within datura and a variety of other plants called scopolamine, a chemical used to hypnotize certain people in to doing the bidding of the sorcerer. While this is most certainly black magick, this practice was recently modernized by Colombian criminals by using pure scopolamine, so that it is even more potent and easy to dose someone and so has greatly increased it's potential for activist use. "Devil's breath" as it is known, is used by thieves to control people in a kind of mind control, getting the victim to open up their apartments, or withdraw money from the ATM, the victim is put in a hypnotic state where they will do anything they are commanded! What's more the victims have no memory of what has transpired, yet when properly controlled appear to outside observers to be totally normal. A high ranking victim could be chosen then the target can be used to sabotage their own agenda, used to infiltrate a building or provide information and items or money that could be used to do all kinds of direct action. There are all kinds of tactically relevant actions which could be accomplished through the careful use of scopolamine, for example it would be possible to temporarily take hold of a police officer or politician, or to command some stock broker to sell all their shares or transfer money from their bank accounts to a place of your choosing, theoretically you could even tell them to bring a bomb in to a building. Targets are easily dosed from a beautiful woman, though if you don't know what you are doing poisoning them is a distinct possibility, it is also quite possible to accidentally dose yourself, scopolamine also has a propensity for creating powerful long term psychosis, so be extremely careful! Occultism no doubt will provide many mind tricks that will help, for example, opium does mitigate some of the poisonous effects of scopolamine and so was added to Witches flying ointments. Also, the "Holy Moly" of Hermes given to counter the sorcery of Circe is the Snowdrop flower (Galanthus nivalis) and this contains the chemical galantamine which can block the effects of scopolamine. As Aradia taught her Witches, if you are trying to assassinate someone, such poisons are one way magickal people have traditionally killed others, so do not underestimate the potency of these plants. (Even if Stregua was invented in the 1800's it's a good mythology!) Given that Europe was probably for much of it's history the world capital of scopolamine use, it would be strange indeed if Witches or ancient Pagans sorcerers were not aware of this, and it seems to be a major source for the term "bewitched." While Christians hated all Pagans or "Witches" no matter what they were doing, even in Pagan Greece we do see laws against sorcery or "Witchcraft" which to at least sometimes would relate to something like this. Being able to control the minds of other people, literally turning them in to hypnotized slaves is about as black magick as it gets, but then that is precisely the kind of magick the government puts on to others and so under certain circumstances could definitely be justified in the name of self defence. That is the CIA tried various drugs including scopolamine to brainwash people as in the MK ULTRA and so while they officially denied the program's effectiveness, they are either liars or incompetent. While any fool knows the CIA are liars, even if they failed with that particular program, inspired by their coke peddling Colombian allies, it is safe to say the CIA is now aware how to use scopolamine. So this tactic potentially provides Anarchists with one of their greatest tools and any insurrectionist group would be foolish to not learn more. Though of course this is something which most Anarchists would abhor, I am not encouraging or denouncing anything, I am simply illustrating traditional means of heretical groups using magickal tactics against their oppressors.

Some people think its possible to change the system from the inside and while we should continue to keep political pressure on the government and corporations using above ground tactics, in the end there is only so far this can take us, the system cannot be reformed in to Anarchism. Though infiltration can be very effective, you just need to make sure you cause more damage to the system than you help it. This can be hard in key positions of power where you are expected to show loyalty by slaughtering innocence on the altar of capitalism, it will take time we do not have to climb up the hierarchy to use reform tactics and the system is purposely designed to thwart any attempts to make it healthy. In this respect perhaps the most important branch of government to target for long term and wide spread infiltration would be the education system. That is the education system requires relatively less corruption from it's employees and it provides opportunities for kids to be exposed to what we me might call "archon vaccines." This would mean that Anarchists would pose as teachers, (but still be properly qualified) but expose kids (the younger the better) to Anarchist ideas which get them to challenge the status quo and even teach them to organize in to non hierarchical groups. If enough Anarchists joined the government education system this would largely eliminate the need to propagandize people in later life, as they would have been taught to see through authoritarian bullshit before it can hypnotize them.

If you can stomach the charade, making them think you are one of them has some serious potential, (especially joining law enforcement) infiltration of the government or a corporation in order to sabotage it somehow, to destroy some kind of expensive equipment or corrupt their computers and intelligence is an effective tactic, or it could be as simple as whistle blowing. Never quit a job you hate, sabotage covertly until they fire you, being fired also makes it easier to take money from the state through welfare. Many workers have already infiltrated evil corporations, if they can be woken up they could sabotage them very easily, becoming a janitor or security guard has all kinds of tactical advantages for saboteurs and so by covert actions, you can really screw things up for a corporation. You don't even have to take credit for it, you don't have to put out some communique or explanation, just sabotage, the longer the corporation thinks it is just malfunctioning equipment or procedures, the more you can fuck with them. This is especially helpful for people who would be full time activists but feel financial obligations to take care of their family, if you get caught, simply pretend like you are incompetent and then get a new job and once no one is paying attention to you, do the same thing there. Sabotage might not spread Anarchism that effectively, but it sure as hell will help to stop the corporations and governments, especially if sabotage culture can be popularized, perhaps even under the guise of non Anarchist politics and just spreading disgruntled worker culture.

As society becomes increasingly technological, it will become increasingly important for the revolution to keep up, to hack the system, to find cracks in the technology that can be exploited, either for the logistical benefit of revolutionaries, or as a direct attack on some institution. In terms of counter intelligence, security culture, computer virus's and a variety of tactics, hackers will play an increasingly important role in the world revolution, not to mention the dissemination of information. The internet must remain free and open, the spread of information is crucial to raising awareness and educating the masses outside mainstream media. Whats more it provides us with a means of directly attacking institutions' computer systems, potential income through digital theft, allowing for intelligence gathering, but also throwing digital wrenches into the works of the machine.

While hardly insurrectionist I get a big smile from the idea of allying with nature to defeat the rulers, a person could conduct class warfare by going in to high end buildings where the rich have their condos and apartments, upscale hotels and some office buildings and according to where it is release things like fleas, lice, bed bugs, ticks, cockroaches, carpenter ants and termites, mice and rats. Ventilation systems can be used to spread incredibly foul smells like rotting fish etc and in some cases it could be possible to spread mold throughout the walls of certain buildings. Termites can't eat metal sky scrapers, but bed bugs, fleas and lice could be spread in a corporate building and would be taken home by the people, (obviously you would try to get the managers) irritating them beyond belief, causing them to miss work, letting them know that they cannot leave their crimes at the office, they will not be safe at home from protest. The poor often have easy access to these creatures due to their lower standards of living and so it is not hard at all for us to capture some and release them in some vulnerable places, so that the rich can learn what its like to have a parasite feeding off them. This meme could spread so that many different people would constantly be infecting the homes of the rich, even targeting specific CEO's and politicians so that they cannot rest and so would not be as capable of coming up with their terrible plans. This could be done anonymously or statements could be made to the corporation and press telling them what has happened so that once the workers know, the building will have to be shut down and sprayed, seriously demoralizing and angering those on top and leaving poison residue around the workplace, just as their companies leave pollution in nature.

If you are going to go the property damage route with protest, you are better off throwing Molotov's and bombs then you are rocks, smashed windows will not bankrupt most companies, but a burned out building or two just might. Although "morally" speaking the act of destroying corporate or government property is totally justified, you may only succeed in having an insurance company pay to have more natural resources used to replace that which you destroyed, and having more resources used to make more bank windows or whatever else is something we need to avoid, even though its incredibly gratifying. There is no doubt that destroying corporate property has enormous therapeutic value and some propaganda value to like minded people, (totally unhelpful propaganda for most people) but lets not kid ourselves and think most often it is any more then that. Some corporations can be put out of business, but it will be very hard to destroy enough property to take out the real players, multinational conglomerates and banks. While I am not against the black block at all, it has to be recognized that if the cops are sending in undercover provocateurs to start riots, then it is something the cops want us to do and so for the most part must be in their interests more than ours. Since we will never get restitution from the corporations for all their abuse a bit vandalism for therapeutic purposes is justified, maybe even helpful, but if that is all Anarchists do it is treating the symptoms and not the cause. Burning down all banks does not destroy the culture of banking and capitalism, and so culture itself must be attacked, but since the pacifist side of Anarchism already has a lot of people working for it and lots of people already hate the bankers, this is not likely to be a problem, so maybe it's time to light up?

Physical violence to humans is most often only really tactically sound in direct action (generally non lethal means like tying up a guard or something to sabotage industry), within "Eco terrorism" in terms of doing what is necessary to stand in defence of nature, and Animal Liberation Front operations which may require dealing with humans in your way, this is all as far as I am concerned self defence, or defence of others. With environmental actions and A.L.F. there are definitely big benefits to blowing up equipment, spiking or lying about spiking trees, (just make sure you notify the media so loggers are aware, the companies may neglect to tell them.) destroying fur coat factories and things that can put corporations out of business and you can save some lives, but still this is not a solution to hierarchy, but a treatment. Targets must always be carefully chosen, blowing up most government buildings will do very little to nothing to put them out of business and most often saves no lives whatsoever, so corporations generally make for better targets. Governments are set up to protect the wealthy, which means corporations, when attacked governments don't lose profits, but they gain credibility, corporations run the planet anyways so we can exploit this weakness and by hurting their profits and putting them out of business and simultaneously cost the government tax and campaign money. While some tactics such as sabotage will not ultimately solve the problem, anything which can detain disastrous corporations from functioning even for one day, provide us with one more day to live, one more day for the environment to exist and heal, one more day of lost productivity for the system, one more day of freedom before they try to impose martial law.

It is possible that taking out a specific politician in some cases may prevent something from occurring in the future, but chances are he is not working alone and so will often mean multiple targets will have to be hit. That said there may still be a few people which are tactically viable targets to take out for other reasons, however they are definitely the minority. It is true that given the conspiratorial nature of illegal economic and political practices, the most viable targets are small groups and so killing a few well researched and specific targets could potentially bring down a whole lot of tyranny. Certain families have definitely shown a continuous effort to put forth their Fascist agendas, I wouldn't be bothered one bit if someone took out the Rockefellers or Rothschilds or any billionaire for that matter, but taking them all out is going to be tricky and best done all at once. Certain developments may be stopped and environmental areas saved by the death of a wealthy developer, but this is a rare exception as it is corporations which cause most of the problems and the killing of a few CEO's is not likely to stop even one corporation. (There are some that are worth a try however.)

We need a diversity of tactics, we cannot rely on any one route because the problems of the world were not created in one way and so people should be encouraged to do anything they can, whenever they can which even remotely helps to spread freedom. This is not to say a person should not prioritize, but that you cannot successfully introduce people to Anarchism by demanding they adhere to the most radical forms at the beginning, instead people must be eased in to it and the softer tactics do fill this crucial purpose. At the same time more radical approaches are helpful forms of propaganda for those who are already dedicated Anarchists, not to mention the practical advantages that comes from direct action and interfering with the establishment. While at this stage some assassinations may be helpful, what we need is mostly sabotage and illegalist actions, for example robbing banks can supply groups with funding to do other things and also takes away power from the banks themselves and so is a tactic that I would like to see a lot more of.

What people do is up to them, I do not necessarily encourage or denounce anything but I think its important that strategy comes before reactionary emotional outbursts of revenge. I want revenge for Helen almost more than anything, but the desire for revenge is not a proper motivation for the revolution and will serve only to cloud judgement and send us off onto missions which are not really that important. Unfortunately at this stage it is still the establishment of Anarchist infrastructure which is most important and establishing an Anarchist society is pretty difficult when few people understand what Anarchism is. However, we cannot deny that we are opposed by social Darwinists, (some even admit it) that they have great power and clearly consider themselves to be predators, so we can either become the source of their next meal or we can deal with reality and take out those who would prey on us. While symbiosis is how nature mostly operates, there are predators and in humanity these are the psychopaths, the crypto-fascists who created and run the system and if they are consciously intending to prey on us we have the right to defend ourselves by any means necessary. Even non psychopaths who have power act as if they are psychopaths by the nature of the system and so all those who would appease the predators who feed on them, have been domesticated and are being farmed, making them dangerously delusional. Survival is a dirty word when it is said by the poor, the lower class, but when it is said by the oligarchs, by the politicians it is a matter of patriotism and honour. So while it may be hard to break your conditioning that pacifism is always best, I say to you that your sanctified slave morality is the enabling of tyranny, the flagellation of the masses for masters who feed off their blood and tears in exchange for the promise of future obliteration.

Patriotism

Tradition is the state's way of saying our boot has always been stomping your face and it always will.
A good civilian becomes a serf in debt, but heroes pillage other countries till there is no one left to kill.
Stabbing women's cunts with bayonets cuz we like to watch them slowly squirm and bleed to death.
Then the real fun starts since I haven't had a woman in weeks, Ill fuck her long past her last breath.
Starve out the Natives as we strangle their country and call it "developing," Corporate colonialism backed by government goons, see the new world order enveloping.
The CIA sells us drugs with a smile but keeps it illegal so they make more cash.
Make the would be upstarts into junkies, who only care about filling their stash.
Shut up and watch TV, the super bowl is what big brother wants you to see.
The international bankers own us, but we'll just wait for Jesus to save us or maybe Ashtar command.
Work for arms dealers or slavery incorporated, never mind the fact that waiting is the reason we're all damned.
We sit around and pat each other on the back in awe of the new technological war machine,
Then when asked why there isn't peace its the old excuse we're only humans, as nuclear weapons wipe the world clean.
In Africa grown men rape newborn babies because they think a virgin can cure them of AIDS,
But our biggest concern is overthrowing governments that don't let us leach through euphemistic free trades.
Pay them 3 cents an hour because 1000% profit isn't enough,
We have to fill our houses to be human and there's always newer stuff.
Our homeless are the worst they are all just lazy bums,
Don't they know the most important thing in life is simply acquiring funds?
The weak deserve to die, compassion must be rooted out,
Always do what you're told, we'll kill any who stop to doubt.
You know you are controlled by liars,
Trying to free the slaves is just preaching to the choir – Obey

Chapter 14 – Gate of the Divine

Patterns of unity are everywhere in nature, everywhere in reality, fractal extensions of one thing. This was clearly understood by the ancients in “that which is below is as that which is above, and that which is above is as that which is below, to perform the miracles of the one thing.” I am the grass and trees, ants and birds, wolf and sheep, human and alien, angel and demon all at the same time. I can feel so lost sometimes, but really I know where I am now more than ever, we are each the centre of the universe for we each contain the universe within us, in an boundless reality we are always in the middle no matter where we go. I was always in the same place I just didn't realize it. I Know I'm going to be alright in my life. I may not know exactly where I am going, I may get confused and even scared, but I will always be alright even when I think I won't. Love is real I know it has to be, I'm just so incredibly strange it's gonna take one extraordinary women. I thought Helen could be that woman but she is gone now. I know now I have to learn to love myself when I am alone, to love my friends, family and while I will always resist them I must love even my enemies. We are here to learn how to love, love the comfortable and pleasurable as well as the painful. I'm not sure exactly what kind of person I want to be, I just want to be me. I want to change the world but I need help, I guess I need to try and inspire rebellion and the best way I know to do that is to be as real as possible, but I have to define that for myself which includes trying to be responsible for my part of the world, my own universe. There is no end to the dichotomies; but each number is the same distance from infinity. I may not know who I am right now but I am rebuilding myself infinitely better than I was before, which is really just recognition that I am constantly changing. I sometimes get so caught up in examining my life and acquiring knowledge about the world that I forget to live it, to be here in the moment in the world. Confidence is really just having faced fears of insecurity and seeing all self doubt as illusion created only by the incredible power of our minds.

Matter is the crudest metaphor of energy fluctuations that I know of, thought made tangible for the divine expression of all things, a means for experiencing experience. The divine is to be found in all perceptions, a pantheist perception preferred but also as a fountain head outside of all we can know. This physical universe is like one big padded cell. A room closed off from all outside view, in a house where the furniture is constantly changing. We should learn to love waiting, for with perfect patience comes perfect piece of mind. Now sitting in this little box inside the sun might not seem so bad, what with eternity to look forward to, the discipline of true meditation must be learned in order to express the silent meaning of the universe, unarticulated and analytically thoughtless. The sight of seeing as one is the direction we all must head and hope to ever more greatly express and encourage our compound perspective. To desire to desire nothing is perhaps the last obstacle of enlightenment. All of life is allegorical of the inner processes, so be natural in order to utilize what you were created with, what exists in reality and so to be true to yourself is to live in a true world, when all people can do that things will get much better. I am an animal, but since I do not repress this fact, since I am not in denial about them, my animal urges are natural and healthy. Those who are in denial create a world of denial and illusion, a world of lies, the living mirror of their denial encases them in a world of their own deceit. In this world I am a wretch, but I work with nature, I see the ways of nature and know that I am in line with the truth, that I am at peace with my own being. I see that to be wretched is healthier than building a world dedicated to lies, filled with consumer trappings of my own future doom, the elaborations of my own vanity.

The world is a work of art, made possible by the cooperative temperance of those who wish to spread life, Mother nature is an Alchemist and we are all performing her great work through the union of opposites, mingling fluid harmony in the diversity of positions. I have gone into the woods, I have joined with her and all life itself, I have stepped into the fractal forest and aligned myself to its pattern; I have given my energy and will to her work and received her wisdom. Do not be fooled, decomposition and murder are her ways just as well as growth and birth; it is our vanity which seeks to
