had really existed. It was Arch Getty who discovered the evidence that someone had "purged" the Harvard Trotsky Archive of material that incriminated Trotsky. Since then, we have identified more evidence of the "purging" of the archive.

On the basis of the evidence now available, we concluded in Trotsky's 'Amalgams' that the person who did the "purging" was probably Jean van Heijenoort.¹³ Broué and van Heijenoort were close friends. In publishing the documentary evidence that the "bloc" had existed despite Trotsky's and Sedov's repeated and fervent denials Broué was not only calling Trotsky and Sedov liars, but also his friend van Heijenoort.

¹³ Furr, Trotsky's 'Amalgams', Chapter Six, pp. 149-156.

Broué certainly knew, and must have feared, the serious implications of this discovery for his commitment to Trotskyism. If "Stalin" — the Soviet prosecution in the Moscow Trials — had been telling the truth about the bloc while Trotsky was lying, anyone might wonder: What else was Trotsky lying about? What other charges made by the Soviet prosecution were true? Did the Soviet prosecution perhaps tell the truth about the bloc's terrorist conspiracies and fascist ties? If Trotsky and Sedov had been lying about the bloc, could they have been lying about these charges too?

For a historian to make a definitive assertion of fact about an historical question of vital importance to himself without any evidence to base it on is a sign that he is facing some critical issue. We assume that Broué asserted that the bloc came to an end with the arrest of I.N. Smirnov and a number of other underground Trotskyists in early January 1933 because he wished to salvage his image of Trotsky and the Soviet Trotskyists as the innocent victims of a frame-up.

Phony Capitulations

Pierre Broué accepted the Soviet contention that I.N. Smirnov and other Trotskyist oppositionists had falsely renounced their oppositionists views and had falsely vowed that they would support the Party's positions — a process that Trotsky and others called "capitulation." Broué even wrote that

"everybody" knew that these capitulations were fraudulent, a tactic to continue oppositional activity from a position within the Party itself. (POS 104)

In this instance too Broué failed to trace the implications of his position. For one thing, it means that there is no reason to doubt the admissions by Zinoviev, Kamenev, and many others that they had falsely capitulated. Statements and interrogations in PiLT2 confirm many more false capitulations.

Prior to arresting I.N. Smirnov, leader of the Trotskyist underground in the USSR, and a number of other Trotskyists, Iagoda sent a report to Stalin that includes the following:

According to facts uncovered by our agents, among the former Trotskyists who declared their break with the Opposition at one time or another the group headed by Ivan Nikitich Smirnov, comprising about 200 former active Trotskyists, merits special attention.

This group is essentially the ideological and organizational center of those who supposedly abandoned the Trotskyist opposition and, upon their return from exile and political isolators renewed their counterrevolutionary activity.

The group of Smirnov began its formation at the moment of his declaration of break with the Opposition which he signed together with M. Boguslavskii. This document, despite the fact that it was changed twice by Smirnov after discussion with the Party Control Commission, still remained a convenient cover for Trotskyist hypocrites [literally, "two-faced persons"] ... [T]his document does not contain any qualification of all previous activity of the Trotskyists as counterrevolutionary and contains a number of "rubber" formulations by which a Trotskyist-hypocrite can easily include his disagreements with the Party.

M. Novikov, a former active worker of the underground technique of the Moscow Trotskyist center (exposed as a hypocrite) in his confessions given to the OGPU on April 19, 1930 explained the massive exodus from the Opposition of those Trotskyists imprisoned in the Verkhneural'sk political isolator in this way:

"In arguments with a group of supporters of the Radek-Smilga declaration we were strong ideologically. After that group was freed, there was complete unanimity in the isolator.

The draft of I.N. Smirnov's declaration that we received made a great impression. We thought that Ivan Nikitich was following this political line with L.D.'s (Trotsky's) agreement and we were all eager to take the same line.

I.N. Smirnov organized the exiled Trotskyists to renounce [the opposition] by means of signing this declaration, and openly agitated for a hypocritical capitulation.

In one of his documents Smirnov directly advocated the necessity of making a declaration of renunciation [of the opposition] on the grounds that the longer it was postponed, the more difficult it would be to do.

"We must sign this declaration. This is the most correct document; there are no others. When people start to write individually, who knows that they will write. For example, Grinchenko (former member of the Moscow Trotskyist center) wrote that the social composition of the opposition was non-proletarian. By doing this he slandered the whole movement as petty-bourgeois. Undoubtedly, it wasn't..." (32)

W

Novikov went on to explain that the Smirnov statement did not admit that its own views were anti-Party, but that the Party had begun to carry out the program of the Trotskyists. (32-33)

Instead of composing individual letters of their own, dozens of Trotskyists signed the Smirnov letter. Novikov's — that is, Smirnov's — explanation of this curious fact makes sense. If each Trotskyist had been required to compose a convincing letter to explain his or her political views and how they had changed, to explain why they had joined the Trotskyist opposition and then give their reasons for renouncing it, the Party Control Commission (PCC) — "Stalin" — would have obtained a great deal of information about the Trotskyist movement. They would have been able to compare these many accounts with one another. They would probably have learned many things, including names that the leaders of the Trotskyist movement preferred to keep secret and other details.

So it appears that Stalin and the Party leadership showed considerable leniency in accepting a collective document instead of insisting upon individual statements and individual decisions about reinstatement to Party membership. With the benefit of hindsight, we can now see that this was a serious error on their part. It greatly facilitated false capitulations, renewed Party membership, and an easy continuation in conspiracy for the Trotskyist underground.

In an interrogation of February 11, 1934, Trotskyist Anna Pavlovna Lifshits admitted that she had given a statement of breaking with the opposition to the PCC in 1931 and said: "This break of mine was not sincere." She met with two others who also knew that her break with the opposition had been hypocritical. (102) Later in the same interrogation Lifshits again mentions her fraudulent renunciation of Trotskyism. (111)

Evidently some Trotskyists did make individual dishonest "breaks" with Trotskyism, perhaps unknown to other Trotskyists. At an interrogation of November 27, 1934, Trotskyist Boris Samoilovich Rappoport-Dar'in stated:

My break with the Trotskyists in the isolator in 1930 was hypocritical, with the goal of continuing counterrevolutionary Trotskyist activity.
(177)

This tactic may have been designed to create another, more secret level of Trotskyists — those believed by other phony capitulators to have really capitulated.

On March 8, 1936 Aleksandr Gavrilovich Kolodin, a Trotskyist formerly exiled and then allowed to return, stated the following:

Question: After your release from exile did you continue to carry out your Trotskyist activity?

Answer: Yes, even after my exile was over I continued to remain a convinced enemy of the NKP(b) and of Soviet power and remained with my Trotskyist convictions. I hated the leaders of the NKP(b) and the Soviet government and conducted active Trotskyist work. I rejoined the Party for hypocritical purposes. (212)

All this evidence of false capitulations, which even Broué agreed did take place, discloses a lie or "amalgam" by Trotsky himself. Throughout the 1930s Trotsky continued to proclaim that those who had "capitulated" were his enemies and that he refused to have anything to do with them. Therefore, Trotsky claimed, the Soviet prosecution, press, and representatives generally were lying when they claimed that many of his followers had capitulated dishonestly.

To explain their claims of false capitulation Trotsky resorted to asserting that they had been either tortured or threatened into saying these things. In fact we see that these statements fit the facts, and it was Trotsky, not the Trotskyist defendants at the Moscow Trials, who was lying. Trotsky's lies fooled the Dewey Commission and many others, and still do.

Yuri P. Gaven

In 1985 Broué announced the discovery in the Harvard Trotsky Archive of evidence that in late September or October 1932 Sedov had indeed met with Yuri Gaven.¹⁴ Broué had discovered evidence in the TA that Trotsky, who had denied any contact with Gaven, had in fact met secretly with him and had probably given him a message for the Trotskyists within the USSR. (POS 105) This was one of the accusations made during the First Moscow Trial. Trotsky and Sedov always firmly denied this and claimed that the Soviet prosecution was lying about this.

¹⁴ Broué, "Compléments à un article sur les trotskystes en U.R.S.S." Cahiers Léon Trotsky 24 (1985), 63-72.

PiLT2 contains one interrogation of Gaven dated April 23, 1936. In it Gaven admits to meeting with Sedov in Berlin at the end of 1932, to receiving a letter from him signed by Trotsky, and to handing this letter on to I.N. Smirnov. In this interrogation the NKVD investigators did not ask Gaven about the contents of the letter, only to whom he distributed it. But the NKVD did not fail to do this. As of October, 2019, we have one further interrogation of Gaven in which he describes this letter to Smirnov as containing only instructions for Trotskyists within the USSR to rejoin the Party, in order to obtain influence in it. We will examine it in a future study.

In an interrogation of May 25, 1936, A.I. Birkengof had quite a lot to say about his contacts with Gaven in Trotskyist work. It was evidently from Gaven that Birkengof had learned about the arrests of I.N. Smirnov and many other underground Trotskyists in early 1933. Birkengof admitted that Gaven had told him that the only way out of the current situation was the "removal" (ustranenie) of Stalin. He refused to speculate about what "removal" meant.

We would like to know the contents of Trotsky's letter which was given to Gaven by Sedov and which Gaven then handed on to I.N. Smirnov. In an interrogation of April 29, 1936 Mikhail Georgievich Saf'ianov, a Trotskyist, stated that Gaven had transmitted Trotsky's directives to carry out the "forcible removal" of Stalin.

Question: Did you receive instructions of a terrorist nature from anyone else, other than Shemelev?

Answer: In 1934 Gidlevisky informed me about his visit to Gaven and informed me that Gaven considered the "forcible removal" of Stalin to be absolutely essential, as the most expedient means of struggle under current conditions. Gidlevisky told me that these instructions were received by Gaven from abroad and came from Trotsky. (282)

This does not necessarily mean that the letter Gaven carried to Smirnov in 1932 advocated Stalin's "forcible removal." We have seen that in 1932 Trotsky was hesitant to advocate this. It does appear to mean that by 1934 Gaven, on instructions from Trotsky, was advocating terror against Stalin.

In a report to Stalin of September 9, 1936, Iagoda told Stalin that Trotskyist Gidlevsky had told another Trotskyist (Saf'ianov) that instructions had been received from Trotsky through Yuri Gaven that Stalin must be "removed by force" (nasil'stvennogo ustraneniia) (278; 282)

If Gaven or Birkengof had been tortured or forced to falsely confess, why would the text of their interrogations not say that they were advocating terror? This is yet more evidence that the NKVD was not forcing false confessions on the arrested oppositionists.

Matveev's Interrogation

PiLT2 includes one interrogation of Dmitrii Ignat'evich Matveev of October 17, 1936. Matveev was not a Trotskyist but a Rightist. In it, after initially denying everything, Matveev admits that in the fall of 1932, at the Moscow apartment of Uglanov, another Rightist, a meeting was held where Uglanov and others stated that they could no longer rely on economic difficulties to bring the Stalin regime down and therefore had decided to resort to terror. Throughout the interrogation Matveev stoutly denied that he himself agreed with terror, claiming that he left the meeting because he rejected it. The interrogator did not believe Matveev's disavowal of terror but Matveev persisted in his refusal to confess that he supported terror.

We can check this confession in at least two ways. Matveev does affirm that he heard in the spring of 1932 about the negotiations "between the Rightists and the Trotskyist-Zinovievist organization for joint struggle against the Party leadership." He then said that he knew when the bloc had been formed:

Question: From whom did you learn about the bloc of the Rights with the Trotskyist-Zinovievist organization?

Answer: Uglanov told me about the meeting with Kamenev and about the establishment of contact with the Trotskyist-Zinovievist organization during the same spring of 1932. (315)

This is confirmed by the contents of the Sedov "bloc" letter and to Broué's analysis of the Sedov-Trotsky correspondence during 1932. (Broué, 1980)

We can also check the accuracy of Matveev's interrogation by comparing it to the statement by fellow Rightists, a resident not of Moscow but of Leningrad, Valentin N. Astrov. In an important interrogation of January 11, 1937, Astrov said that, together with other young Rightists, Matveev had advocated terrorist methods against the Party leadership since 1931.

MATVEEV said that the main task was to remove (ubrat') Stalin by any means, including terror. (Lubianka 1937-1938 20)

We have studied this statement of Astrov's in some detail in Trotsky's 'Amalgams' and in Trotsky's Lies. Astrov lived into the post-Soviet period, until the summer of 1993. Astrov twice wrote that he was treated respectfully by the NKVD and that they had not forced him to invent anything. Moreover, the only statement in his interrogation that he retracted was his assertion that Bukharin had explicitly called for the murder of Stalin.

Astrov's retraction of this accusation may well have been false. It was certainly unpopular in the late 1980s, during the "Bukharin boom" when Gorbachev was using Bukharin to portray Stalin as a murderer of innocents, to claim that it was really Bukharin who had been advocating terror. Yet thanks to the memoirs of Jules Humbert-Droz, a Swiss communist and close associate of Bukharin's in the 1920s, we know that Bukharin and some of his supporters were conspiring to murder Stalin as early as 1928.¹⁵

¹⁵ See Furr, Trotsky's 'Amalgams', Chapter 8, or Furr, Moscow Trials, Chapter 8, for a detailed discussion of Humbert-Droz's remarks.

To sum up: In October, 1936, Matveev agreed that in 1932 the Rightists were talking about killing Stalin. But Matveev denied that he himself advocated or agreed with this tactic. On the basis of accusations by his fellow Rightists the NKVD believed Matveev was lying and really had been advocating terror. Matveev stuck to his denial in this interrogation, and the NKVD went on to another subject. Matveev was not compelled in any way to confess to advocating terror. This is yet more evidence that the suspects testified as they chose (whether truthfully or not) and were not forced to make false statements to incriminate themselves and/or others.

Yet Astrov claimed that Matveev had been explicitly advocating terror as early as 1931. And when he had the chance, Astrov refused to recant his statements to the NKVD, with the exception of his statement that Bukharin had explicitly advocated terror.

Trotsky and Terror

In the early 1990s, not long after the demise of the USSR, Oleg Tsarev and John Costello obtained access to the NKVD file of Alexander Orlov, who had been the resident head of the Soviet NKVD in Republican Spain during the Spanish Civil War, and to certain other NKVD materials. Among those other materials were at least some of the reports sent back to his NKVD handlers by Mark Zborowski, a young NKVD agent who had managed to become a close confidant and coworker of Leon Sedov. In reports from 1937-1938 Zborowski reported that Sedov had urged the assassination of Stalin even while he and Trotsky were publicly denouncing "terror" as a political strategy that Trotsky had never and would never countenance.¹⁶

¹⁶ Zborowski's reports on Sedov are studied in Furr Amalgams, chapter 13, and Furr, Trotsky's Lies, Chapter 2.

The reports and confessions in PiLT2 contain many references to Trotskyists' plans for "terror" — assassination — against Stalin and Bolshevik leaders. In this section we will examine the claim that instructions to carry out terror came from Trotsky himself.

The February 28, 1936, interrogation of Trotskyist Ivan Kuz'mich Fedotov is important in this connection. Fedotov's is the first mention of the tactic of "terror" of all the confessions and statements of Trotskyists in this collection. He said that in 1935 he had been in touch with Valentin Ol'berg before the latter's arrest and knew about Ol'berg's intention to kill Stalin. Ol'berg was one of the defendants in the first Moscow Trial of August 1936.

Valentin Ol'berg told me that one of his tasks was to get in touch with the Trotskyist organization [in the USSR] and to really [real'no] prepare and carry out the murder of Stalin upon Trotsky's order. (205)

But Fedotov said that the Trotskyists had been making terrorist plans before this. He testified that he had worked from November 1933 to the end of January 1934 with a certain Miuller. Miuller was a Trotskyist who was demoted from leading work in the German Communist Party because of his Trotskyist views but had somehow managed to come to the USSR and was working in an automobile factory in Gorky, where Fedotov met him.

Miuller said that he was in touch with the leadership of the Trotskyist movement in Berlin and was leading Trotskyist work within the USSR. Then Fedotov said:

Miuller told me that the removal (ustranenie) of the leadership of the VKP(b) could only be accomplished through terror, and that the transition to terrorist struggle against the Party leadership was being carried out according to a directive that came straight from Trotsky.

Fedotov continued:

I in turn told Miuller that there was a Trotskyist terrorist organization in Gorky comprised of reliable persons. (206)

Previous defendants had testified, and even Broué agreed, that Trotsky and Sedov advocated the "removal" (ustranienie) of Stalin and the Party and government leadership. But they had refused to state that this meant forcible removal. That admission is made for the first time in these documents. Since Fedotov said that he had told Miuller that a Trotskyist terrorist organization already existed in Gorky we know that the "turn to terror" had taken place some time earlier than November 1933 — January 1934.

Fedotov said that Furtichev, a prominent Trotskyist with whom he had had talks during February-March 1934, had seconded Miuller's views about the necessity of terror against the Party leaders in order to bring Trotsky, Zinoviev, and Kamenev to the leadership of the country. (208)

Later in the same interrogation Fedotov returned to the subject of Valentin Ol'berg's role, which he said he learned of from Ol'berg himself in August 1935.

Ol'berg put before me his the plan of action.

He said that Trotsky considers that our people in the USSR are very busy with propaganda of Trotskyist views. That this will not decide the outcome of our struggle with the Party leadership.

The most basic and most important thing to do is to carefully organize and carry out the murder of Stalin. This will be the alarm that will raise the masses to decide all the other questions and will permit us to concretely decide the question of the return of Trotsky to the leadership of the country. (209)

Miuller's name comes up again in the interrogation of Iakov Abramovich Furtichev dated May 4, 1936. When asked about his discussions with Fedotov concerning terrorist activity Furtichev replied:

For Fedotov terrorist plans were not new. He told me that when he was still working at the automobile factory he had met a certain Kurt Miuller, who had at one time been a leader of the German Komsomol but had been removed from this work because of his Trotskyist views. According to Fedotov Miuller gave Fedotov a directive of Trotsky's concerning the necessity of preparing terrorist acts against the Party leaders and in the first place against Stalin. (271)

Kurt Miuller features in a number of additional interrogations of Trotskyists that have been made public recently.

Shemelev

In his interrogation of April 5, 1936, arrested Trotskyist Aleksandr Ivanovich Shemelev mentioned Trotsky's instructions for terror several times.

I wish to inform the investigation that during previous interrogations I concealed some substantive matters concerning the instructions which I received from Sedov (through Gorovich) and from I.N. Smirnov and A. Safonova (through Adish) ... When I gave my previous confessions about the instructions that Gorovich received in Berlin from Sedov I concealed from the investigation the following: When he returned from Berlin in 1932 Gorovich told me that in Sedov's opinion, along with diligent work to gather our cadre, it was essential to set and to carry out the main task, which consisted of the removal (ustranenie) of Stalin, and that this was Trotsky's directive.

Shemelev was careful to qualify exactly what he heard:

Let me say that I will not guarantee that the word "remove" (ustranit') was used. It is possible that he used the word "liquidate," "remove" (ustranit') or "get rid of" (ubrat'). But I remember very well: that the meaning was the necessity of the forcible removal (nasil'stvennogo ustraneniia) of Stalin. (221)

This testimony of Shemelev's confirms the report of Mark Zborowski that Sedov was privately advocating terror against Stalin at the same time that he and Trotsky were denying, repeatedly and in the strongest terms, that they would ever consider adopting the tactics of terror. He Shemelev claims that Sedov was advocating violence as early as 1932, though perhaps without being completely explicit. If this is true, it would be another issue about which Sedov and Trotsky were lying, to be added to those that Broué, Getty, and I have discovered.

It is significant that Shemelev did not insist that he had heard any specific word, much less that "terror" or assassination was explicitly mentioned. Instead, he insisted that these were to incriminate Trotsky or Smirnov, why would they not have forced him to be more direct? This is yet more evidence that, in this case, Shemelev's testimony was what he wanted to say, rather than some lie that the investigators were forcing upon him

Shemelev testified that in February or March, 1933, he had had a talk with another Trotskyist, Dmitriev, in the latter's apartment.

Dmitriev of course understood about whom "abroad" we were talking, although I did not explicitly tell him that I meant the contact with Trotsky. He was very interested in my delcaration about "occasions" abroad, got quite excited, and asked: "What do they think abroad?" I reply to him more or less as follows: "Abroad they think that the main thing is to liquidate Stalin." Dmitriev very openly answered that he thought the same thing and that he and his group (ego edinomyshlenniki, those who agreed with him) had arrived at an analogous conclusion. It was completely obvious for us both that we were talking about the forcible removal (nasil'stvennogo ustraneniia) of Stalin. (222)

Shemelev also talked about his contact with the Trotskyist Adish:

Adish was the contact man for the members of our organization of [I.] N. Smirnov and A. Safonova. ... But I concealed from the investigation that Adish transmitted to me Smirnov's and Safonova's evaluation of the situation in the Party and country, and peaking about the perspectives of illegal work told me that Sofonova assigned me to transmit the view of I.N. Smirnov that if we could find a man (or group of men) prepared to deal with Stalin, then under the present circumstances that would be the best outcome, and an act both politically and historically justified. (222-223)

Shemelev then said that he went to meet with Dmitriev again "with the knowledge that Dmitriev and his group were precisely what we needed in order to carry out Sedov's and Smirnov's directive."

From my talks with Dmitriev, especially from the last one, it was completely clear to me that he correctly understood the essence of the directives of Sedov and Smirnov in relation to the liquidation of Stalin. (223)

Gurevich

On May 18, 1936 Trotskyist Khaskel' Gesselvich was interrogated. According to the accompanying report to Stalin by Iagoda Gurevich had been named by Valentin Ol'berg.¹⁷

¹⁷ This interrogation of Gurevich has recently been published in facsimile
—

http://istmat.info/files/uploads/60578/rgaspi._f.17._op.171._d.224_protokol_y_doprosov_gurevicha.pdf

Gurevich's story is an interesting one. He had been arrested in Berlin by the Gestapo, whom Gurevich told that he was a Trotskyist and was going to the USSR to plan terrorist acts against the Party leadership. Hearing this the Gestapo released him on the condition that he inform them about developments in the Trotskyist organization's terrorist plans. This made Gurevich an agent of the Gestapo and, in the eyes of Soviet authorities, a German spy.

Some writers have dismissed the possibility that any Jew could have been a Gestapo agent, either because no Jew would agree to be one or because the Gestapo would never recruit a Jew. Gurevich's story demonstrates how this kind of thing could happen: blackmail, plus a mutual interest in opposing the Stalin regime, could produce this kind of alliance. Karl Radek, though of Jewish background and a professed internationalist, was so enamored of Germany that, in the words of Nazi diplomat Gustav Hilger, "We could always count on him to help us when it was a question of dealing with difficult situations in our dealings with the Soviet regime."¹⁸ Radek even famously told the violent Nazi Gauleiter Erich Koch, "There are some fine lads in the SA and SS."¹⁹

¹⁸ "... konnten wir immer auf ihn rechnen, wenn es darum ging, uns in schwierigen Situationen bei unseren Verhandlungen mit der Sowjetregierung zu helfen." Gustav Hilger, Wir und der Kreml: Deutsch-Sowjetische Beziehungen 1918-1941 : Erinnerungen eines deutschen Diplomaten. Berlin: Athenaum, 1955, 80.

¹⁹ Gerhard Reitlinger, "Last of the War Criminals." Commentary 27, 1 (January, 1959), 33.

Gurevich claimed that he had received instructions directly from Leon Sedov in Berlin:

Frida Grebe²⁰ knew that I was in contact with the Trotskyist organization in Berlin and in Leipzig, and knew about my contact with Leon Sedov, and also knew that Mikhail Bykhovskii and I had an assignment from the Trotskyist organization to prepare and to carry out in the Soviet Union terrorist acts against the Party leaders.

... Yes, I must admit that ... at the beginning of June [1933] one of the Gestapo workers questioned me concerning the question of my Trotskyist activities and contacts in Germany. I admitted at this interrogation that I was a member of the Trotsky organization and was in contact in my activity with Sedov, Ol'berg, Fridman, Bykhovskii, and others, and that I was assigned by the organization to go to the USSR in order to prepare terrorist acts against the leaders of the Party. (289)

²⁰ Gurevich's wife.

In the same interrogation of October 20, 1936 N.I. Gordon stated that in 1933 he had heard directly from Beloborodov, one of the leaders of the Trotskyist group in the USSR whose senior leader was I.N. Smirnov, that Trotsky had urged a "transition" to terrorist acts against Stalin and those associated with him:

According to Beloborodov, Smirnov, Mrachkovskii, and Ter-Vaganian formed the Trotskyist center and were in direct contact with Trotsky. Smirnov maintained the contact with Trotsky. Beloborodov said that Trotsky firmly insisted upon the transition to decisive actions in the struggle against Stalin. I asked Beloborodov what that means — that is, how should these active measures find expression? Beloborodov answered: "I means the transition to terrorist acts, first of all against Stalin, and then also against his closest associates." At the same time Beloborodov said that although this really is the most extreme form of struggle, we had no other way out, because we could not rely on the masses, and any further delay would mean the strengthening of Stalin's position. (321)

Smirnov was arrested during the first few days of January, 1933. This means that Trotsky had begun to advocate the murder of Stalin by sometime in 1933 at the latest.

This corresponds with what Gaven had told Birkengof in early 1933. It also corresponds with what Radek testified at the January, 1937, Moscow Trial about the letter he received from Trotsky in February to early March, 1932. Birkengof refused to say that Gaven had specifically recommended

"removing" Stalin by violence. Radek testified that in his letter Trotsky did not explicitly mention violence, but that he, Radek, understood that violence was what was meant since there was no other way of getting rid of the Party leadership.

Trotskyist Involvement in the Murder of Sergei Kirov

When Sergei Mironovich Kirov, the First Secretary of the Leningrad city and oblast' Party, was murdered on December 1, 1934, the crime was soon traced to an underground Zinovievist group. These men were quickly arrested, interrogated, tried, convicted, and shot. In January, 1935, Zinoviev, Kamenev, and others in Moscow were tried and convicted of knowing about the existence of this Leningrad Zinovievist group and not informing the authorities. They were sentenced to prison.²¹

²¹ See Furr, The Murder of Sergei Kirov, for a thorough discussion of this and related conspiracies.

At the end of December 1934 Trotsky published some articles in which he claimed that his name had come up because the Stalin regime was trying to pin the blame on him since he, Trotsky, was the more important figure. We have studied Trotsky's writings about the Kirov murder in detail in Trotsky's 'Amalgams' and Trotsky's Lies.

We know Trotsky lied in these writings because we know from Sedov's "bloc" letter that he was already in a bloc with the Zinovievists, among others. Yet Trotsky always publicly denied it. At that time (1934-1935) the Soviet authorities did not accuse Trotsky of direct complicity in the murder of Kirov. Nor did they yet know about the bloc that had been formed in 1932. The Zinovievists did not reveal that they were in a bloc with the Trotskyists.

The question arises whether the Trotskyists, and Trotsky himself, were involved in the planning of Kirov's murder and if so, to what extent. This was one of the charges at the first Moscow Trial, the "Zinoviev-Kamenev" trial, of August, 1936. Until the publication of this collection we did not have other evidence that the Trotskyists and Trotsky himself were accomplices to Kirov's murder.

Trotskyist Ivan Aleksandrovich Maslennikov, interrogated on April 26, 1936, testified that he knew from another Trotskyist that the Trotskyists in Leningrad were in touch with the Zinovievists who murdered Kirov and that the Trotskyists had been planning similar acts.

I did not know about any plans to carry out terrorist acts. I knew only that the Trotskyist organization had set for its goal the murders of members of the Politburo and of Stalin above all ... As soon as December 1934, just two or three days after the murder of S.M. Kirov, in the room of the Dean of the Faculty of Natural Sciences, Nilender told me that Kirov's murder had been organized by "our people" (i.e. the Trotskyists).

... [F]rom my talk with Nilender I understood that the preparation of the terrorist act against S.M. Kirov had been known to Nilender.

Question: What specifically did Nilender tell you about the contact of your Trotskyist counterrevolutionary organization with the participants in the murder of S.M. Kirov?

Answer: Nilender did not tell me anything about this directly, but from his words I very clearly understood that our terrorist organization was in contact with the Leningrad group. (249-250)

In his interrogation of May 4, 1936, Furtichev testified about the connection between the Trotskyists and Zinovievists in the murder of Kirov:

... In the spring of 1934 Bocharov told me that he had heard from Bakaev that the Trotskyist-Zinovievist organization was planning to murder Stalin in Moscow and Kirov in Leningrad, and were forming special terrorist groups for this purpose. (272)

On May 27, 1936, Moisei Naumovich Iakovlev, a Zinovievist, confessed that the Zinovievists had ties with the Trotskyists. In June 1934 (305), Kamenev had told him that the Zinovievist and Trotskyist groups were united.

Kamenev said that the union of the Zinovievist organization, headed by me, with the Trotskyist group of Zaidel' fully corresponded with the plans of the Moscow Zinovievist organization. At the same time Zinoviev told me that on this same basis, terrorist struggle against the Party leadership, the Zinovievist center had long since united with the Trotskyist organization of I.N. Smirnov — Mrachkovskii.

Question: Did Kamenev tell who personally was in the united Zinovievist-Trotskyist center?

Answer: Kamenev said that in the united center of the Zinovievist-Trotskyist organization were Zinoviev, himself — Kamenev, Bakaev, Smirnov, Ter-Vaganian and Mrachkovskii. (306-307)

In the interrogation cited above (October 20, 1936) Gordon said the following:

In 1934 I met twice with Glebov-Avilov ... In an outburst of anger Glebov-Avilov told me that the Stalin regime could not be removed (ustranit') by democratic means, some other determined measures were necessary. And then Glebov told me that direct orders had been received from the Trotskyist-Zinovievist center in Moscow to prepare terrorist acts against the Party leaders and that we should start with Stalin. (322)

Thus we now have a good deal of testimony that the Trotskyists were accessories to the murder of Kirov. This confirms the testimony at the First Moscow Trial of August 1936, where it is one of the main charges against the defendants. It was also a major charge against some of the defendants in the Second Moscow Trial or Trotskyist trial of January, 1937.

Trotskyists and Terror

We have already noted that the first confession in these documents in which a Trotskyist acknowledges that the goal of the Trotskyists in the USSR was "terror" — the assassination of Soviet leaders — is that of Ivan K. Fedotov of February 28, 1936. However, these must be earlier confessions by Trotskyists, for Nikolai Ezhov's draft report to the Central Committee plenum of June 1935, "On the CEC Apparatus and Comrade Enukidze"²² had already stated that this was the Trotskyists' goal.

²² An earlier draft of this report with the same title dated April 3, 1935 was printed in 2003 in a volume of documents. (Lubianka 1922-1936 No. 518) This document was not called a "report" but rather a communication to all members and candidate members of the Party, and bore the names of Stalin, Molotov, and Kaganovich as well as that of Ezhov. It concerned only the terrorist groups, including Trotskyist groups but also Zinovievists, in the Kremlin, the "Kremlin Affair" of 1935. None of the quotations cited above are in this earlier version, which is therefore really a different document despite its identical title.

Concerning the direct participation of the Trotskyist center abroad in the organization of terrorist work in the USSR speak the confessions of the leader of the Trotskyist terrorist group of military workers Cherniavskii. Cherniavskii who, as we stated above, during his trip abroad established contact with active Trotskyists, confessed during the investigation about the task which he received from the Trotskyist Raskin:

"...Raskin stated that in the USSR the Trotskyists have valuable cadre and that inside the country there is a favorable situation for the development of Trotskyist work.

In 1933 Raskin told me that for Russia the Trotskyists had the task of the largest possible development of separate groups of sympathizers.

Together with that work it was necessary to create cadres of persons capable of the most determined and extreme forms of struggle with the Party. He explained to me that he considered that it was essential to create terrorist groups for the murder of Stalin and other leaders of the Party, that this activity could be the most practical means for the return of Trotsky to the helm of state (k kormilu pravlenia)." (185)

Ezhov quotes another Trotskyist, Novozhilov, who also quoted Cherniavskii on the necessity of murdering Stalin. (187)

Ezhov quotes other excerpts in this draft report from confessions of arrested Trotskyists about the goal of terror.

... [T]he Trotskyist Azbel' described the ideological plan of his organization in this way:

"All the dissatisfied elements in the country are tightened. It is possible to stimulate the dissatisfied elements to active struggle against the leadership of the Party only by means of terror. We saw all the evil was in Stalin and therefore we believed that by means of his murder, that of the most influential and deciding person in the country, we could cause confusion among the current leadership of the Party and stir up to the struggle all those elements dissatisfied with the existing regime." (186)

This report of Ezhov's is called a "draft" (proekt). We don't know whether a final draft based upon it was presented to the June 1935 CC Plenum. It does show that by June 1935 the NKVD had been told of terrorist plans by Trotskyist groups.

Valentin Ol'berg

According to Arch Getty

Sometime in the first days of 1936, Ezhov had received a mandate from Stalin to reopen the Kirov assassination investigation. He [Ezhov] later said that for Stalin something "did not seem right" about that investigation, and Ezhov was charged with taking a new look.

... His [Ezhov's] train of investigations began with the arrest on 5 January 1936 of V.P. Ol'berg, who within a month confessed to being a Trotskyist agent dispatched to the USSR by Trotsky to organize the assassination of Stalin. (189-90)

Here Getty is following the account in the Gorbachev-era journal Izvestia TsK KPSS, a journal devoted to Gorbachev's dishonest attempt to attack

Stalin by declaring that no conspiracies ever existed.

Thanks to the publication of PiLT2 we now have additional information about Ol'berg and his activities that generally corroborates what Getty wrote. The first mention of Ol'berg and his conspiracy in this volume comes not from Ezhov but from Iagoda, at that time still the commissar of Internal Affairs (= head of the NKVD). These documents are from the NKVD archive, where materials gathered by Ezhov, who was not yet head of the NKVD, might not have been filed.

On February 28, 1936, Iagoda sent to Stalin an interrogation of Ivan Kuz'mich Fedotov, a Party member, clandestine Trotskyist, and head of the Gorky Pedagogical Institute. Fedotov confessed that he had hired Ol'berg as a teacher after Ol'berg had approached him in mid-August, 1935, and had made it clear to him that he had been sent by "the old man" (starik), the name Trotskyists called Trotsky, and had told Fedotov about the latter's ties with other Trotskyists.

Fedotov continued:

When I asked him who he was this unknown person said his name was Valentin Ol'berg and told me that he had arrived in the USSR illegally on a false Honduran passport with assignments from Trotsky, whose emissary he was.

To my question whether he had any contacts in Gorky V. Ol'berg told me that he had first sent his brother Pavel Ol'berg, an engineer and a Trotskyist, to Gorky at the end of 1934, in case he needed to explain his arrival in Gorky by the desire to visit his brother.

Valentin Ol'berg told me that among his assignments was to contact the Trotskyist organization and really prepare and carry out the murder of Stalin as ordered by Trotsky. (205)

As we stated above, aside from Ezhov's report of June 1935 this is the first mention of terrorist goals in this collection of documents. It is also confirmation of Ol'berg's own confessions which apparently began "a month after his arrest."²³

²³ See Izv. TsK KPSS No. 8, 1989, p. 82.

As we have already seen, Fedotov testified that he had learned in 1933 from Kurt Miuller that Trotsky had given the order to murder Stalin (206). We also saw above that Fedotov said that in 1933 he had told Miuller that there was a "Trotskyist terrorist organization" in Gorky. The word "really" (real'no) which Fedotov said that Ol'berg had used probably reflects the fact that this organization had not yet done anything to fulfill its task of killing Stalin.

Getty continued:

His [Olberg's] wife testified that Ol'berg had received money and false passports from Trotsky's son Sedov and other Trotskyists in Paris and Prague. (190)

Getty must have seen this in an archival document as it is not in the issue of Izvestiia TsK KPSS he cites in the same note. The present volume, PiLT2, contains a single interrogation of Ol'berg's wife Betti, dated April 26, 1936. It contains a number of important matters.

For one thing it states that Betti Ol'berg was a Honduran citizen. In fact she was a German citizen. Further interrogations of Betti Ol'berg and of other Trotskyists, revealed that she and her husband bought the false Honduran passports with the combined help of the Nazi Gestapo and of Trotsky's son Leon Sedov. Clearly the investigation had not discovered this fact at the time of this interrogation. We now have more interrogations of Valentin Ol'berg, Betti Ol'berg, and other Trotskyists, and will examine them in a future study.

Here are some excerpts from the interrogation of Betti Ol'berg in the volume. It is clearly not the one seen by Getty since it does not discuss the obtaining of false passports and money.

In reality Kurt Rovel, whom I knew to be a Trotskyist, was also connected in Trotskyist work while still in Berlin with my husband Valentin Ol'berg, and had come to the USSR at the beginning of October, 1935, with Trotskyist assignments.

Kurt Rovel was in contact at that time with me and with the Trotskyist Fella Slomowitz. Fella Slomowitz was in turn in contact with Sedov.

Fella Slomowitz was assigned by Sedov to send Kurt Rovel to the Soviet Union with instructions to contact my husband Valentin Ol'berg in Gorky, Karl Boshtedt in Moscow, and Gurevich in Leningrad. Kurt Rovel was supposed to alert all three men in Sedov's name to the necessity of carefully organizing and carrying out terrorist acts against Stalin in Moscow and Zhdanov in Leningrad.

The terrorist act against Stalin was to be prepared, according to Sedov's instructions, by the terrorist group in Gorky headed by Valentin Ol'berg and by persons connected to Karl Boshtedt in Moscow.

Gurevich and the terrorists connected to him in Leningrad were to prepare the terrorist act against Zhdanov.

The murders of Stalin and Zhdanov were intended for the May Day demonstrations of 1935. Kurt Rovel was supposed to alert Ol'berg, Boshtedt and Gurevich about this. (251)

In a confession of April 25, 1935, Mark L'vovich Elin, Party Secretary of the town of Dzerzhinsk in the Gorky region, admitted to obtaining a job for Ol'berg. Evidently this means that Fedotov had to get Party approval for Ol'berg since the latter was to teach the history of the revolutionary movement.²⁴

²⁴ Russian Wikipedia page on Ol'berg at https://ru.wikipedia.org/wiki/Ольберг,_Валентин_Павлович

This volume also contains one interrogation of Pavel Ol'berg dated My 5, 1936. He was Valentin Ol'berg's brother and a chemist also employed in Gorky.

Question: When did Valentin Ol'berg join the German Communist Party?

Answer: In about 1928.

Question: And the Trotskyist organization?

Answer: From 1929 to 1931-32, that is until he was expelled from the Party, he carefully concealed his contact with Trotsky and Sedov. He was expelled after it was discovered that he was a Trotskyist. ...

Question: What were Valentin Ol'berg's political views before joining the Communist Party, that is before he finished gymnasium in Brunswick (Braunshweig)?

Answer: He was a confirmed monarchist...

Question: How long did Ol'berg live in Prague?

Answer: He lived in Prague from the summer of 1933 to the end of 1934. About that time he obtained a Honduran passport and, as I have stated in my earlier confessions, he went to the USSR in order to organize a terrorist act against Stalin, upon the instructions that he had received from Leon Sedov.

Question: Did he go directly to the USSR from Prague?

Answer: No, at first he went to Berlin, where he remained for 2-3 months, and then from Berlin he went to the USSR ...

Question: According to your confession, first, V. Ol'berg did not return to Germany in 1933 because he feared repression. Second, he lived in Prague as a political emigrant from Germany. Why did he then go from Prague to Berlin again? We ask you to tell the truth.

Answer: I admit that my confessions were untruthful. I concealed from the investigation the fact that I knew that Valentin Ol'berg had contact with the German secret police (Gestapo).

Question: Who told you about this?

Answer: Valentin Ol'berg informed me.

Question: Why did he tell you?

Answer: When Valentin Ol'berg arrived in the USSR in March, 1935, I asked him repeatedly in conversations with him why he was not fearful of returning to Berlin from Prague. At first he was silent about this, answered me with empty phrases such as "you will know everything in time." At that time, as I have said in previous confessions, I was actively helping V. Ol'berg to prepare a terrorist act, bringing him a weapon from Gorky to Moscow, and Valentin Ol'berg treated me with great trust. One time when I asked V. Ol'berg again how it was that he risked to go to Berlin and was not afraid for his wife Betti who was even then in Berlin, he told me that he had ties to the Gestapo...

Question: Relate in detail everything that Valentin Ol'berg told you.

Answer: He told me the following: Soon after the fascists came to power in 1933 he was called to the Gestapo. During the fairly lengthy interrogation and after threats of a severe beating and of then being sent to a concentration camp Valentin Ol'berg confessed in detail about how Trotsky and Sedov were sending him to the USSR for underground work, they offered him to collaborate with the Gestapo, and he agreed.

Question: What assignment did Valentin Ol'berg receive from the Gestapo?

Answer: The Gestapo confirmed Leon Sedov's assignment about the necessity of travelling to the USSR to make contact with the Trotskyist underground. After he had completed this assignment Valentin Ol'berg was to receive further instructions from the Gestapo ...

Question: What else?

Answer: During his first trip to the USSR in 1933 Valentin Ol'berg was not able to contact the Trotskyist organization and get himself settled in the USSR. Then he went to Prague, from where he confirmed his contact with the Gestapo. When he received the assignment from Sedov in 1934 to go to the USSR in order to prepare a terrorist act against Stalin, he informed the Gestapo about it. Then he received an assignment from the Gestapo to accept this assignment [from Sedov] and before he went to the USSR to go to Berlin for instructions.

Question: Who helped V. Ol'berg obtain a Honduran passport in Berlin?

Answer: The Gestapo helped him get the passport. He received the money to buy the passport, the sum of 13,000 Czech crowns, from Leon Sedov. Besides that, before his trip to the USSR he also obtained money from the Gestapo. He did not tell me how much he received from the Gestapo. (274-5)

In his interrogation of May 18, 1936 already referred to above Gurevich admitted that he had told the Gestapo that he was a member of the Trotskyist organization and was in contact with Sedov, Ol'berg, and others. When the Gestapo questioned him about their plan to organize terror Gurevich told him that Ol'berg had already entered the USSR and that others were to follow. Then the Gestapo proposed that he also collaborate with them. (289)

Gurevich revealed that the underground Trotskyist group also planned to assassinate Andrei Zhdanov, who had replaced the murdered Sergei Kirov as First Secretary of the Leningrad Party.

I was cautioned by the Gestapo employee that as someone directly connected with the terrorist plot I must not have direct contact with the couriers who arrived in the USSR. This contact would be maintained through Frida Grebe. ... Through Grebe, and in connection with my assignment, I also gave to the Gestapo information about the preparation of the Trotskyist organization in Leningrad for a terrorist act against Zhdanov. (290)

Trotskyist Terror

During 1936 the number of underground oppositionists uncovered and arrested by the NKVD increased dramatically as more and more of those arrested named others. Many of these arrested oppositionists admitted that they were involved in terrorist — assassination — conspiracies. We will cite some examples here.

As we have seen, it was in late May, 1936, that Birkengof confessed that in February, 1933, Gaven had told him that the "forcible ustranenie" (removal) of Stalin was the only possible course of action. In the confession of May 27, 1936,²⁵ cited above Moisei N. Iakovlev admitted that the Trotskyist and Zinovievist underground were united in Leningrad. He further admitted involvement in terror plots:

Kamenev came to Leningrad in June, 1934. Kamenev and I were connected by our mutual counterrevolutionary activity in the Zinovievist organization and I went to him to tell him about the situation in the Leningrad organization and to get from Kamenev directives for future work.

Kamenev listened to me and discussed with me the situation in the Leningrad organization and then gave me the decision of the center about organizing struggle against the Party and government leaders by means of terror.

He asked me what I thought about this and when he had received my positive reply he made a direct proposal about the necessity of preparing a terrorist act against Kirov in Leningrad and told me that at the same time the Moscow organization was preparing an attempt on Stalin ...

Kamenev told me that under the present circumstances the only possible method of struggle against Stalin was terror. Any other avenue of struggle, Kamenev said, would inevitably mean that they would smash us. The only chance for success lay in terror. For this reason, while we still had the forces, we had to use this last remaining means. (304)

²⁵ This interrogation is also printed in Lubianka 1922-1936, pp. 759-763.

Iakovlev went on to discuss the plan to kill Kirov, saying that Kamenev had asked him directly whether he was in touch with the underground Zinovievist group of Kotolynov-Rumiantsev in Leningrad. This was the group that did carry out the murder of Kirov on December 1, 1934. (305)

On June 23, 1936, Efim A. Dreitser, later a defendant in the August, 1936, "Zinoviev-Kamenev" Moscow Trial, confessed that in 1934 Mrachkovskii, one of the Trotskyist leaders and also a defendant in the same trial, had directed him to organize "battle groups" (boevikh grupp) to prepare terrorist acts against Party leaders. The trial transcript states that this happened in the spring of 1933, not in 1934, but otherwise has all this information (August 19, 1936, evening session). This may be the reason these confessions are not included in the present volume.

We have cited a number of other terror confessions by Trotskyists in other chapters in the present book.

Chapter 2. Trotsky and the Nazis, Fascists, and Ukrainian Nationalists

Introduction

We have seen that there is a lot of evidence that the documents in PiLT2 are not the result of fabrication but represent what those under interrogation chose to testify. Soviet authorities did not attempt to force these prisoners to lie.

In Trotsky's 'Amalgams' and The Moscow Trials as Evidence we have devoted a lot of attention to verifying the Moscow Trials testimony. We found that the Moscow Trials testimony is "genuine" — a shorthand way of saying that whenever we can check a statement made by a defendant in the Moscow Trials against independent evidence, it turns out that the defendant's statement represents what he chose to say. Usually they stated the truth. Where we can show that defendants lied, in each case they did so in order to make themselves appear less guilty, not more.

In the previous chapter we studied the materials in PiLT2 with a view to checking and verifying the statements made there whenever possible. The result was the same: these materials are "genuine" in that they reflect what those who made them wished to say. We have excellent evidence that the NKVD was not fabricating them in any way.

Therefore, to the extent that Piatakov's testimony in his Statement to Ezhov agrees with statements in PiLT2 we can conclude that Piatakov's statements in that document are also genuine — that they represent what Piatakov chose to testify. We analyze Piatakov's Statement separately in another chapter of the present book.

"Against Stalin All Means Are Good"

In his confession of October 17, 1936 D.I. Matveev said that at a meeting of the Rights in the fall of 1932 (314) Chesnokov, a fellow Rightist, had stated

"against Stalin all means are good." (315) This is what Trotsky told Piatakov during their meeting in Norway:

"Remember, in this struggle all means are good and every ally is useful. Here we must not stand on ceremony and live by old memories." (LD 270)

The Rights were in the political bloc with the Trotskyists.

Opposition Ties with German Firms by Trotsky's Order

In his confession of October 14, 1936 Aleksei Aleksandr Shestov, later a defendant at the Second Moscow Trial, the "Piatakov-Radek" trial, of January 1937) stated that he worked with only one German firm, Deilmann (Frölich-Klüpfel-Deilmann) "on direct orders from Sedov and Smirnov." (331). Deilmann was to maintain contact between the Trotskyists in the Kuzbass, where Shestov worked as an engineer, and the Trotskyists abroad.

This was confirmed by the interrogation of Mikhail Stepanovich Stroilov of October 16, 1936, who had been told that the Deilmann firm "helped the Trotskyists abroad in their work." (350; 353) He had learned in Moscow that Iurii Piatakov favored the German firms "Borsig" and "Demag" even though their products were much more expensive than those of other firms.

From talks in Berlin with different comrades: Zubkov of Soiuzugol' in the Donbass; Nekrasov of Soiuzzoloto; with an engineer from Solikamsk who was working under the direction of a commission from Glavkhim—I can't recall his name but I know him very well by his face—I learned that such German firms as "Borzig" and "Demag" for some reason enjoyed Piatakov's special favor. These firms received large orders for the delivery to the Soviet Union of compressors, cranes, compacting machinery, pumps, etc., at prices no less than 25% above the bids of other, no less solid firms. The compressors of the "Borzig" firm were 20% more expensive than those of other German firms. The seemed very strange to many people, and some were even indignant.

In one official meeting in Piatakov's office in Berlin one of the officials said that "Borzig" and "Demag" were very expensive firms and couldn't we avoid them. Piatakov nervously interrupted him and with malice threw out the following phrase: "You do not understand a thing. You forget that the most important thing is quality."

I remember that one engineer from Solikamsk complained to me that the orders for lifting machines were given exclusively to the "Demag" firm by Piatakov's directive and that he very much regretted throwing the 20%-25% of the cost of the lifting machines out the window, and said: "I don't understand why Piatakov has this inexplicable and strange love for the "Demag" firm. (333)

This corresponds to what Piatakov revealed about the origins of this arrangement.

Also in 1931 about 3 weeks after my first meeting with Sedov I.N. Smirnov told me that despite the fact that we had agreed not to meet, Sedov wanted me to meet with him again and that he, Sedov, would await me the following day at the same place and time.

The next day I went to the same café. This time our talk was brief. Sedov immediately raised the question of money. At first he said, "You understand, Yuri Leonidovich, that for this work we need money. Can you get money?" I answered that I had no possibility at that time. Then Sedov said that he had such possibilities but that it would be hard to do it without my help. He wanted me to give as many orders as possible to the firms "Demag" and "Borsig" and not to fuss over prices; he himself would arrange with the firms about these conditions.

"Obviously you will have to pay too much, but the money will go for our work, since we have some kind of agreement with representatives of these firms." I did this. (LD 245)

In Trotsky's 'Amalgams' and in The Moscow Trials As Evidence we quoted from American mining engineer John D. Littlepage's writings in his articles in the Saturday Evening Post and his book In Search of Soviet Gold. Littlepage refers to and thereby confirms Piatakov's confession. For example, Littlepage, wrote:

Among other things, the commission in Berlin was buying several dozen mine hoists, ranging from 100 to 1,000 horse-power.... The commission asked for quotations on the basis of pfennigs per kilogram. After some discussion, the German concerns later mentioned in Pyatakof's confession reduced their prices between 5 and 6 pfennigs per kilogram. When I studied these proposals, I discovered that the firms had substituted cast-iron bases weighing several tons for the light steel provided in the specifications, which would reduce the cost of production per kilogram, but increase the weight, and therefore the cost to purchaser.¹

Littlepage confirms Piatakof's "sweetheart deals" with the German firms. His account is the strongest kind of confirmation of Piatakof's testimony.

¹ John D. Littlepage with Demaree Bess, "Red Wreckers in Russia," SEP January 1, 1938, p. 53 col. 4.

Trotsky and the Germans

Piatakof made it clear that Trotsky felt it was essential to make agreements with Germany and Japan if the Opposition was to have any chance either of retaining power, if it managed to seize power through its own efforts, or of taking power of its own efforts proved insufficient to seize power.

Trotsky said that in the struggle with Stalin we can in no way ignore relations between governments. Once we understand that Stalin's scheme of building socialism in one country is an empty and dangerous scheme, then we too in our struggle with Stalin must not slide to the position of "one country."

This struggle inevitably is interconnected with our relations with capitalist states. It would be stupid to think that it is possible to assume power without securing a benevolent attitude of the most important capitalist governments, especially of the most aggressive ones, such as the present governments of Germany and Japan. It is completely essential even now to have contact and agreements with these governments. He, Trotsky, has taken the necessary steps in this regard.

He demanded from Radek and Sokol'nikov, who had the requisite possibilities, to put out feelers for the essential contact along these lines with the official representatives of these powers, and to support whatever he, Trotsky, was carrying out in practice.

In this connection, as I seem to remember, Radek told me about some kind of conversations of his with Germans (I cannot recall the names of these Germans), from whom it was clear that Trotsky had made some arrangements with the German government. (LD 258)

Of course, to reach agreements with Germany alone would be risky, since without a corresponding English and French counterweight Germany would put feet on the table and it would be very tough for us. Therefore in his practical steps he, Trotsky, is carrying out simultaneous preparatory work in different directions.

Concerning Germany, these matters are essentially settled:

He, Trotsky, had secured a favorable attitude of the German fascist government in case the bloc comes to power.

Of course this favorable attitude was not due to any special sympathy towards the bloc but to real interests.

At the basis of the agreement lies an appeal to the German government to help the bloc come to power. On his part Trotsky promised in the event of coming to power to make very concrete concessions, stipulated in advance, to Germany. (LD 267)

In his October 16, 1936 interrogation Stroilov testified that he had worked with German agents since 1932. This work was coordinated with Shestov, for the Trotskyists.

Sommeregger suggested that I put Shebesto in contact with the Trotskyist Shestov, who was supposed to give practical help to German diversionist agents on the spot... I did not personally tell Sommeregger and Fless about my talks with Shestov. It was Sommeregger who told me Shestov was a Trotskyist. (353)

On October 21, 1936, Vladimir Mikhailovich Andreev was interrogated by NKVD investigators. A former Tsarist officer and mining engineer, Andreev was a member of a fascist organization that worked with Trotskyists. He had been recruited into this fascist organization by a certain Peshekhonov, an engineer whom Andreev identified as having been involved in the Shakhty affair. A certain Peshekhonov is indeed mentioned three times in the published materials on the Shakhty trial of 1928.² Andreev described Peshekhonov as a fervent admirer of Hitler.

He told me that our organization was founded by the Germans and that all our subversive work was carried out under direct orders that came from Germany. Then he told me that the Germans did not only organize and direct our work but participated in it themselves actively and practically. "We are working for the Germans," said Peshekhonov, "for today Germany is the only country we can rely on as a force opposing the communist dictatorship. We must do whatever we can to help turn this opposition into active invasion." (375)

² Shakhtinskii protsess 1928 g. Podgotovka, provedenie, Itogi. Kniga 1. M.: ROSSPEN, 2011, pp. 400, 407, 408.

In September, 1936, Peshekhonov told him about a setback suffered by his fascist organization:

In our counterrevolutionary group were, in addition, the following persons: the director of the "Central" mine Noskov, the chief of the 6th section of the mine Shubin, and the chief of the 4th section, Kurov. ...

Question: What did Peshekhonov tell you about them?

Answer: He said that it would now be harder for me to do my work since a very hard blow had been dealt against our c-r group. I asked: What blow? Peshekhonov answered that while I had been on leave Noskov and Shubin were no longer in our group and Kurov had to temporarily stop all c-r work because he was also under suspicion. I was very surprised since, hearing the names Noskov, Shubin, and Kurov, I recognized them as members of the Party. I said to Peshekhonov: "They are communists, aren't they?" Peshekhonov answered me: "They are not communists, but Trotskyists, and communists and Trotskyists are as different from one another as day from night." I still did not understand Peshekhonov and asked him to explain.

Then Peshekhonov told me that the Trotskyists played an especially active role in our organization. In their hostility and vengeance against the Party they would stop at nothing and were connected with our organization through Stroilov and together with us were carrying out an active role against the Party and against construction in the country. Then he told me that during my leave (I had been on leave between the beginning of June and the end of August) the Trotskyist activity of Noskov and Shubin had been exposed and both had been expelled from the Party and removed from work. Kurov was also in danger and in the interest of self-preservation he had to temporarily remove himself from c-r work. (377)

Andreev went on to describe some of the sabotage carried out by this join fascist-Trotskyist group, including the following:

Question: The explosion of September 23, as a result of which 9 miners were killed and 15 injured — was that committed by your fascist-Trotskyist group?

Answer: Yes, it's true, the explosion of September 23 was the act of our fascist-Trotskyist group. (379)

This is consistent with Piatakov's testimony about the Trotskyist activities in the Kuzbass:

3/ To Shestov, whom I did not know personally but had heard that he was a reliable person, I told Trotsky's policies, although I knew that he already knew everything from I.N. Smirnov.

To Shestov I entrusted the resurrection of the organization in the Kuzbass. I brought to Shestov's attention that there was one of Trotsky's loyal men — N.I. Muralov, that Vladimir Kossior was also there somewhere, and that he should, while observing the necessary caution, see who of the Trotskyists in Siberia could be drawn into the organization. I told Shestov that the basic thrust of his work in the Kuzbass was sabotage and that for this work he would have to attract not only Trotskyists but also persons of anti-Soviet orientation from the engineering and technical personnel. (LD 244)

The Trotskyists' Bloc with Ukrainian Nationalists

On November 15, 1934 Pavel Postyshev, first secretary of the Communist Party of Khar'kov city and oblast' (province) committee and second secretary of the C.P. of the Ukraine, and Vsevolod Balitskii, Commissar of Internal Affairs of the Ukrainian SSR, sent a letter to Stalin concerning Iurii Mikhailovich Kotsiubinskii, former official of the Council of People's Commissars, former Commissar of Agriculture, former Chair of the State Planning Agency of the Ukrainian SSR and — important in this context — supposedly a former Trotskyist. Kotsiubinskii was again under arrest and charged with still being a Trotskyist.

In this letter Postyshev and Balitskii quote from the interrogation of the Trotskyist David Borisovich Naumov-Lekakh, who stated that

[T]he bloc of the Trotskyist organization in the Ukraine with the Ukrainian nationalist-deviationist elements meant that, in practice, from the very beginning of the Trotskyist organization, that the Trotskyists waged no struggle against the Ukrainian nationalist-deviationist elements, but rather supported and defended them as far as they could... (120)

This information is repeated in more detail by the Trotskyist Boris Samoilovich Rappoport-Dar'in, in an interrogation of December 21, 1934. What follows is a short passage from this lengthy testimony:

In its practical work during the period 1931-1934, the counterrevolutionary Trotskyist organization was in a bloc with the Ukrainian-nationalist elements, with Right antiparty groups, and also used however it could the remnants of the Menshevist organization. (135)

Naumov went on to say that Kotsiubinskii had told him that collaboration between the Ukrainian nationalists in the Party and the Trotskyists had gone on since 1926-27. (136) The text of the interrogation of Naumov, attached to the letter, gives much more detail about this Trotskyist-Ukrainian nationalist bloc. (143-146) The Trotskyist bloc with the Ukrainian nationalists is also briefly discussed in the interrogation of Elia Aronovich Shteinberg of November 26, 1934. (165)

In his interrogation of February 28, 1936, Trotskyist Ivan Kuz'mich Fedotov said that in the Ukraine he had been in contact with a certain Mukhin, a member of a Trotskyist group in Kiev. According to Fedotov:

Mukhin told me that he was a member in Kiev of a Trotskyist terrorist group that carried out work together with Ukrainian Nationalists. (209)

On May 3, 1936 Nikander Emel'ianovich Mil'gevskii, a Trotskyist, testified that he maintained contact with the Trotskyist group in Khar'kov through a certain Gofman.

Question: What concretely did Gofman tell you about the work of the Trotskyist organization in the Ukraine?

Answer: When I met with Gofman in the spring of 1935 he told me that between the Trotskyist organization and the Ukrainian nationalist organization headed by Nyrchuk there was an agreement on a platform of joint struggle against Soviet power. (277)

Piatakov testified that in 1931, after meeting with Sedov in Berlin and agreeing to return to clandestine Trotskyist activity, he had returned to the USSR and taken "concrete steps to resurrect a Trotskyist organization in the Ukraine," forming a Trotskyist center, of which Kotsiubinskii was a member. (LD 243-4)³

³ Passages marked "LD" plus a number indicate the page ("list dela", page of the file) of the copy of Piatakov's statement in the Central Archive of the FSB (= Federal Security Service), where NKVD materials are stored. Complete details at the beginning of the text of Piatakov's Statement to Ezhov in the Appendix.)

During this secret visit to Trotsky in Norway in December, 1935, Trotsky had outlined to Piatakov the concessions that he, Trotsky, had been obliged to make in return for German support, one of which was as follows:

In the event that the "nationalist forces" of the Ukraine should want to separate from the U.S.S.R. — not to oppose this. (LD 268)

In 1939 and 1940 Trotsky published three essays defending Ukrainian independence. We note them in the chapter in the present volume on Piatakov's Statement to Ezhov. Since at that time no left or socialist Ukrainian independence movement existed, it is obvious that Trotsky's essays were a signal to Germany, who sponsored the only Ukrainian nationalist movements of any kind — far-right, violently pro-Nazi organizations that committed atrocities on an enormous scale during and after World War 2 — that he, Trotsky, could be counted on to preserve his pro-German stance on this issue.

Opposition Plans to Take Advantage of Economic Difficulties

On December 26, 1936, Naumov told investigators:

At the end of 1931, Kotsiubinskii told me that he and the leading Trotskyists in Moscow with whom he was talking, believed that the economic difficulties which at that time were appearing in the areas of industrialization and agriculture ... confirmed the erroneousness of the Party's policy and the necessity of organizing the Trotskyist forces for struggle against the Party, and there must be no delay in forming a Trotskyist organization. (143)

Naumov repeated this reliance of the Trotskyists and Ukrainian nationalists on economic difficulties several more times (145-6).

In an April 26, 1936, confession Zinovievist and member of the Zinovievist-Trotskyist bloc Efrem Mikhailovich Bocharov said that the bloc had counted on the USSR's economic difficulties in the early 1930s to cause the Stalin regime to fall and return its leaders to power.

While Bakaev was in Gorky the activists of the organization regularly met in his apartment — Furtichev, me, Bocharov, Ol'khovskii, Gorokhov, and others. At these get-togethers we discussed, in a Trotskyist spirit, the politics and actions of the Party and Soviet government. We paid much attention to collectivization. We counted upon the failure of the Party's policies in the first place on this front. Bakaev put before the organization as the main task the unification and preparation of cadres of Trotskyists and Zinovievists who, after the failure of the Party's policies, could take power into its own hands in an organized manner and bring Trotsky, Zinoviev, and Kamenev to the leadership of the country. (253)

Bocharov went on to say that by 1934 the success of the Party's economic program led the Zinovievist-Trotskyist bloc not to drop its opposition but instead to turn towards violence — "terror."

In January 1934, when I was at Bakaev's he told me that the situation in the country had changed dramatically. Through a slanderous evaluation of the means by which the Party and Soviet government had achieved the realization of the line it had laid out, Bakaev conceded that the basic difficulties had been overcome by the Soviet government and that now we cannot any longer hope for the failure of the Party and the Soviet government. Bakaev emphasized that the new situation did not mean that our organization should stop its activity. He said only that the methods of struggle against the Party must be changed. He said that the Zinovievists and Trotskyists could count on success only if the Party leadership was removed (ustraneno) by force. In this connection he proposed as the basic task of the Zinovievist-Trotskyist organization a terrorist struggle against the Party leadership. (254)

In his confession of October 20, 1936, D.I. Matveev echoed these views:

Until 1932, we, the leadership of the organization of Rightists (both the nationwide [soiuznyi] and Moscow centers) relied principally on the difficulties that the country was experiencing. We hoped that the leadership of the Party would not overcome these difficulties and on this basis we considered that our main task was to preserve our cadres through duplicity [i.e. false capitulation] so that we could then step forward when the right time came.

I must admit, however, that even during this period certain members of our organization manifested putschist attitudes.

... At the end of 1932, when the Rightists were convinced that reliance on difficulties was no good, that the Party had dealt brilliantly with all the difficulties, Uglanov, in the name of the central group, directly set before us, the members of the Moscow center of Rightists, the question of the necessity to turn towards terrorist methods of struggle against the Party leadership and against Stalin in the first place. (314)

This is the same reason cited by defendants at the First Moscow Trial of August 1936. For example, Reingol'd, one of the defendants, testified as follows:

Reingold: In 1932, Zinoviev, at Kamenev's apartment, in the presence of a number of members of the united Trotskyite-Zinovievite centre argued in favor of resorting to terror as follows: although terror is incompatible with Marxism, at the present moment these considerations must be abandoned. There are no other methods available of fighting the leaders of the Party and the Government at the present time. Stalin combines in himself all the strength and firmness of the present Party leadership. Therefore Stalin must be put out of the way in the first place. Kamenev enlarged on this theory and said that the former methods of fighting, namely, attempts to win the masses, combinations with the leaders of the Rightists, and banking on economic difficulties, have failed. That is why the only method of struggle available is terroristic acts against Stalin and his closest comrades-in-arms, Kirov, Voroshilov, Kaganovich, Orjonikidze, Postyshev, Kossior and the others. (Report 1936, 55).

To judge from the confessions quoted above it was sometime in early 1932 that the Oppositionists realized that the Stalin regime's economic program of collectivization and industrialization was not going to lead to collapse, the discrediting of the leadership, and the demand to return the former Opposition leaders to power.

In his statement to Ezhov of September 19-20, 1936, Piatakov stated that Trotsky had already come to this same conclusion by the summer of 1931, when his son Leon Sedov met with Piatakov. Trotsky had concluded that the Opposition would not have to rely upon other strategies such as terror and the help of foreign capitalist states.

After that Sedov went on to outline what he called "the new methods of struggle."

Trotsky rules out any possibility at the present stage of any mass anti-Stalin movement. Stalin has succeeded in surviving the difficulties and we must frankly admit that we have missed the time.

"If we waste time now we will definitively lose all our cadres, and that will be the death of us.

For that reason now at the tip of the needle must be put

1) the terrorist struggle of tacitly conspiratorial groups against the main leaders of the party and government 2) active opposition against all the practical work of the party and government and 3) the discrediting in every possible way of Stalin's undertakings, especially on the economic front ... Just as Smirnov had done, Sedov again mentioned briefly one fundamental position of Trotsky's ... "We cannot," Sedov transmitted Trotsky's views, "regard our struggle in an isolated manner. To keep our struggle in one country is just as absurd as Stalin's desire to build socialism in one country. Therefore we cannot swear off questions of relations between states and relations with capitalist states."

... At that time Sedov did not go into more detail about this question. It is possible that Trotsky specially instructed Sedov to only mention this but not to go into any details. (LD 241-2. Emphasis added.)

Nikolai Ivanovich Muralov

A leading Trotskyist in the 1920s, Muralov had been expelled from the Party in December, 1927, presumably in connection with his participation in the Opposition demonstration on the tenth anniversary of the Bolshevik Revolution, and a letter to the Congress, which he cosigned with Khristian Rakovsky and with which Karl Radek associated himself, in which the signatories both renounced factionalism and insisted that they would continue to argue for their views within the Party. (XV s"ezd 1247, 1317, 1338)

According to the biographical information now available Muralov wrote Stalin twice, in December, 1935, and January, 1936, renouncing Trotskyism and asking for reinstatement in the Party. Documents in PiLT2 show that by February, 1936, Muralov was already named as a leading Trotskyist in the Kuzbass. On February 21, 1936, Vasili Nikolaevich Rakov, a Trotskyist, stated in a confession that after his release from a political isolator he had spoken with Muralov in August, 1935, to get further instructions in Trotskyist activity. (234) As we have seen, the Opposition's political activity continued unabated in the political isolators.

In an interrogation of March 15, 1936, another Trotskyist, Viktor Ignat'evich Demchenko, also said that from August, 1935, he had been actively recruited by Muralov, whom he had previously known to be still a Trotskyist. (236-7) On the strength of these and perhaps other accusations Muralov was arrested on April 17, 1936.⁴ Thereafter Muralov was named as one of the Trotskyist leaders in the Kuzbass area by Shestov.⁵

⁴ See the Russian Wikipedia page on Muralov at https://ru.wikipedia.org/wiki/Муралов,_Николай_Иванович and the biographical page at the online biographical dictionary at http://www.hrono.ru/biograf/bio_m/muralov_ni.php

⁵ Interrogations of Shestov of October 14, 1936 and October 16, 1936, PiLT2 329 and 339.

In his statement of December 19-20, 1936, Piatakov identified Muralov several times as one of the leading Trotskyists in the Kuzbass.

3/ To Shestov, whom I did not know personally but had heard that he was a reliable person, I told Trotsky's policies, although I knew that he already knew everything from I.N. Smirnov.

To Shestov I entrusted the resurrection of the organization in the Kuzbass. I brought to Shestov's attention that there was one of Trotsky's loyal men — N.I. Muralov ... (LD 244)

I said that I did not have detailed information about the work of the Trotskyist center (Smirnov-Mrachkovskii) outside Moscow, but that in carrying out Trotsky's directive we have formed a center of the Trotskyist organization in the Ukraine, which was in contact with me personally. This center already had peripheral groups and was setting about preparing terrorist acts. I also reported that work on the creation of a Western Siberian center had begun, where Muralov led the active work ... (LD 248)

According to Piatakov, during his meeting with Trotsky in Norway in December, 1935, Trotsky spoke highly of Muralov:

About Muralov Trotsky expressed his satisfaction, that he was one of the few who had never yielded his position and was actively working. (LD 270)

Muralov was one of the defendants in the Second Moscow Trial, the "Piatakov-Radek" trial, of January, 1937. At trial he testified that I.N. Smirnov had informed him in 1931 about Trotsky's turn to terror. (1937 Trial 216-7)

Conclusion

In the present chapter we have shown that the materials in PiLT2 can be employed as a check by which we can verify Piatakov's Statement to Ezhov of December 19-20, 1936. The PiLT2 materials do indeed confirm many of Piatakov's affirmations in his Statement.

This constitutes the best evidence we know of that confirms that Piatakov really did fly secretly to confer with Trotsky in December, 1935, as he testified during the second Moscow Trial of January, 1937.

Chapter 3. Defeatism, Terrorism, Assassination, Collaboration

On December 21, 1934 Trotskyist Rappoport-Dar'in testified that the leadership of the Trotskyist group supported Trotsky's "Clemenceau" position:

Among the members of the leading center of the question of the tactics of the Trotskyist organization in the event of war was also discussed. All members of the leading center stood on the position of the well-known slogan of Trotsky's about the Clemenceau tactic, i.e. of not stopping the struggle against the leadership of the Party in the event of war, but of sharpening the struggle and using the war to overthrow the Party leadership. (136)

Trotsky had used the example of Clemenceau to justify continuing to attack the Soviet leadership during wartime as Clemenceau had criticized the French government in wartime because of France's poor leadership in the conduct of the war.¹ Clemenceau had taken the helm of the French state in November 1917 — had become both Prime Minister and Minister of War — in the face of defeatism and conducted the war against the enemy with renewed vigor. These underground Trotskyists wanted the ouster of the Party and government leadership and their replacement by Trotsky and other oppositionists.

¹ See Trotsky's essay of September, 1927 titled "The Clémenceau Thesis' and the Party Regime"

<https://www.marxists.org/archive/trotsky/1927/09/clemenceau.htm> A draft of the Russian original is at <https://www.you-books.com/Yu-G-Felshtinskij/Kommunisticheskaya-Oppozicziya-V-Sssr-19231927-Tom> It was formerly at <http://web.mit.edu/fjk/www/Trotsky/sochineniia/1927/19270924.html> but appears to be there no longer.

But Trotsky's analogy was flawed. For Clemenceau the primary goal was not at all to gain office for himself, but to win the war. In the case of Trotsky and his supporters, it was the other way around. For Trotsky and his followers, anticipated war was to be welcomed as an opportunity to get rid of the Stalin leadership and take power for Trotsky and the Opposition.

A number of oppositionists testified that they welcomed the defeat of the USSR in a war with capitalist states. On January 13, 1933, Illarion Konstantinovich Gassiev, a Trotskyist, said:

In a conversation with Dzhoev I said that if in the near future

1) "The Soviet Union is in a war, then the organization should take a defeatist position and organize support within the country for the side that invades the Soviet Union." (31)

Trotsky argued that this "Clemenceau thesis" was not really defeatism since its goal was not the defeat of the USSR but the replacement of its leadership in order to win a war that appeared in 1927 to be on the horizon. Presumably the Stalin leadership would have proven itself unable to defeat one or more invaders.

Thus the Zinovievist Vinogradov, as quoted by Ezhov in his report of June 1935 to the Central Committee Plenum, had testified:

We proceeded from the position that war with the imperialist states, a war that would come sooner or later, and the situation within the country which would give rise to the war, will create favorable conditions for broad demonstrations with the demand of returning to the leadership of Zinoviev, Kamenev, and others of the Zinovievist movement. (186)

Piatakov testified that, in November, 1931, after his meetings with Sedov in Berlin and his return to the USSR, he had received through Shestov a letter from Trotsky himself. Among Trotsky's other instructions was one about defeatism:

4/ We must take the coming war into account and occupy in relation to the war and unconditionally defeatist position, and by means of preliminary negotiations with governments of capitalist powers (also making use of the contradictions between them) guarantee for ourselves favorable relations in case of our coming to power as a result of the war. (LD 247)

Piatakov said that he had visited Trotsky in Norway in December, 1935. In January, 1936, Radek received a letter from Trotsky and shared its contents with Piatakov. According to Piatakov Trotsky repeated his insistence on defeatism:

As regards the war, L. D. Trotsky spoke of this very explicitly. From his point of view, war is inevitable in the near future. In this war the defeat of the "Stalin government" was inevitable. He, Trotsky, considered it completely essential to take a markedly defeatist position in this war.

Defeat in war would mean the downfall of the Stalin regime and for this very reason Trotsky insisted upon the creation of cells in the army, in the broadening of contacts among the command staff. He proceeded from the position that defeat in war would create a favorable opportunity in the army as well for the return of himself, Trotsky, to power. He considers that the bloc's coming into power can certainly be hastened by the defeat of the U.S.S.R. in war.

Trotsky pointed out in this regard that especially, counting upon defeat in war, it was necessarily in advance to reach agreements with the appropriate bourgeois governments (I do not recall whether precisely only the governments of German and Japan were mentioned in this regard). It seemed to him that he would be able to reach agreements at the same time with opposing groups of bourgeois governments and maneuver upon their contradictions. Trotsky understood that we must not rely in a naked and open way upon agreement with Germany and Japan, and therefore he gave a plan of playing upon contradictions. (LD 258-9)

We may doubt whether, as Trotsky claimed, Stalin and the Soviet leadership had maliciously misconstrued his remarks about Clemenceau. After all, Clemenceau had not been a defeatist, but the opposite. He had assumed power to replace leadership that he viewed as defeatist. For Clemenceau it was French victory, not his own coming to power, that was primary.

But Trotsky's position was not the same as Clemenceau's had been. Trotsky and the Trotskyists meant the "Clemenceau thesis" as a means by which Trotsky and the Opposition could return to power, rather than primarily as a tactic to snatch victory from defeat in wartime. On the contrary, Trotsky and the Trotskyists welcomed Soviet defeat. But this meant that Trotsky's position was no different from the "Stalin" interpretation of it — a form of collaboration with an invader — treason.

Plans for a Coup

There are two references in PiLT2 to plans by Soviet Trotskyists for a coup d'état against the Stalin regime. One is in the statement by Sailii Ivanovich Dzhoev of January 2, 1933, which he made to the Secret Political Section of the OGPU in disclosing his knowledge of Trotskyist activities. Dzhoev summarized what his friend Gassiev had told him in 1931, including the following:

Kozhennikov also takes part in the activities of our organization, therefore, and there is also corresponding work going on. We think that our seizure of power will be carried out without resort to armed force — there in the center they are isolating the leadership and in general the whole POLITBURO. (26)

Assuming Dzhoev was telling the truth, Trotsky's plans must have evolved over time. Three years later, on March 9, 1936, Trotskyist Aleksandr Gavrilovich Kolodin confessed about plans for an armed coup d'état against the Soviet regime:

The members of our counterrevolutionary group also discussed the question of the preparation of an armed uprising against the Soviet government. (216)

This last reference to plans for a coup d'état echo Trotsky's plans as related by Piatakov. During their December, 1935, meeting in Norway Trotsky insisted that a coup d'état was the only way the Opposition could come to power in the USSR. By late 1935, Trotsky was insisting on the maximum use of violence.

Trotsky also expressed the same extreme degree of dissatisfaction during my report about the terrorist acts that were under preparation. "These are all preparations, just preparations! You are not dealing with this question seriously enough. Remember that without a whole series of terrorist acts, which must be carried out as soon as possible, the Stalin government cannot be overthrown. For this is a question of a coup d'état. A mass uprising, he said, is one thing, for which, evidently, there is no basis now, and a coup d'état is something else."

"This is the difference, I note, that many do not understand. They are unaware that the methods of a coup d'état differ fundamentally from the methods of organizing a mass uprising. I stand now precisely on the position of a coup d'état... (LD 263)

Trotsky continued:

"... It is clear that if in the very near future we are not successful by one means or another in carrying out a coup d'état, then a prolonged period will set in, years of the monstrous existence of the Stalin state, supported by its economic successes, by new politically inexperienced young cadre, who will consider this regime natural, to be taken for granted ... That means the first and main thing is the implacable struggle with Stalin and his state. In this struggle we must employ everything, the sharpest methods of preparation for a coup d'état and, in the first place, terror, diversions, and sabotage. On this basis we must educate our cadre, and not on the basis of rotten conciliation and compromise, the tendencies to which I discern in my supporters who live in the Stalin state." (LD 264, 266)

Trotsky's Collaboration with Britain and France: Sokol'nikov's confession

We have already seen that on December 12, 1936, Sokol'nikov confessed that on April 13, 1934, he had been approached by Japanese Ambassador Tamekichi Ota, who told him about Trotsky's agreement with the Japanese government.² Ota was not named at the Second Moscow (Trotskyist Center) trial of January, 1937. The corresponding passage in Sokol'nikov's trial testimony was disguised in such a way that the country in question could not be identified.

Sokolnikov: I had a conversation with Kamenev in the beginning of 1934. During this conversation Kamenev informed me about the defeatist position taken by Trotsky and about his own defeatist views. Incidentally, one definite result of this conversation was that Kamenev warned me that someone might approach me with inquiries.

Vyshinsky: Who might do this?

Sokolnikov: The diplomatic representative of a certain country.

Vyshinsky: Kamenev warned you about this?

Sokolnikov: Yes, Kamenev warned me about this.

Vyshinsky: Did Kamenev tell you what inquiries would be addressed to you?

Sokolnikov: Yes, he told me that I would be asked for confirmation of the fact that the negotiations which were being carried on by Trotsky abroad were not being carried on by him in his own name, but that behind Trotsky there really was an organization of which he was the representative.

Vyshinsky: You were to confirm this if inquiries in this sense were addressed to you?

Sokolnikov: Yes.

Vyshinsky: Such a question was addressed to you?

Sokolnikov: Yes, in the middle of April after one of my official talks with the representative of a certain country with whom I had frequent meetings in connection with my official duties. The conversation took place after the official talk was over, when the interpreters had withdrawn to the neighboring room. While I was showing my visitor to the door he asked me whether I knew that Trotsky had addressed certain proposals to his government. I confirmed that this fact was known to me. He asked further whether these proposals were serious. I confirmed this too. He asked whether this was my own personal opinion. I said that this was not only my opinion but that of my friends as well. I understood this question of his as a confirmation of the fact that the government of that country had really received Trotsky's proposal and wanted to make sure that Trotsky's proposals were really known to the organization and that Trotsky's right to conduct these negotiations was not disputed. (1937 Trial 148-9)

² The passage in which Ota is named was first published in Izvestiia TsK KPSS 9 (1989), p. 45. It was reprinted in Reabilitatsia. Politicheskie protessy 30-50 kh godov (Moscow, 1991), 228-9.

Sokol'nikov also told Piatakov about Ambassador Ota's approach to him. Piatakov only mentions Ota's name in the briefest manner, in passing, in his December 29-30, 1936, statement to Ezhov.

Also, Sokol'nikov told me that he had a talk with the Japanese, with Ota, I think, from which it was also clear that Trotsky was carrying on negotiations with representatives of the Japanese government. (LD 257)

As we have pointed out, Trotsky had informed Sokol'nikov about his, Trotsky's, agreement with Hess, second only to Hitler in the Nazi Party. We have no testimony that any official of the German government confirmed this. Here, however, we have testimony that a representative of the Japanese government confirmed Trotsky's collaboration with Japan.

There is no reason to think that Piatakov said this out of any force or compulsion. It is excellent evidence that Sokol'nikov really told him this.

This, in turn, constitutes strong evidence that Trotsky had not simply lied about having contacts with the Japanese (perhaps to impress his followers) but that Trotsky really had collaborated with the Japanese. In a future work we will publish and study Khristian Rakovsky's detailed account of his negotiation with Japanese officials on Trotsky's behalf.

Sokol'nikov's testimony here is also confirmed by a brief quotation from an earlier interrogation dated December 12, 1936, eight days earlier than this one, which is reproduced in Georgi Dimitrov's diary:

Interrogation of Sokolnikov, 12 December 1936:

Question: Thus, the investigation concludes that Trotsky abroad and the center of the bloc within the USSR entered into negotiations with the Hitlerite and Japanese governments with the following aims:

First, to provoke a war by Germany and Japan against the USSR;

Second, to promote the defeat of the USSR in that war and to take advantage of that defeat to achieve the transfer of power in the USSR to [their] government bloc;

Third, on behalf of the future bloc government to guarantee territorial and economic concessions to the Hitlerite and Japanese governments.

Do you confirm this?

Reply: Yes, I confirm it.

Question: Do you admit that this activity by the bloc is tantamount to outright treason against the motherland?

Reply: Yes, I admit it.³

³ The Diary of Georgi Dimitrov 1933-1949. Introduced and edited by Ivo Banac (New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 2003), 43.

However, the interrogation of Sokol'nikov of October 20, 1936 published in PiLT2 provides testimony that did not arise during the January 1937 trial.⁴

⁴ We have reproduced an English translation of this interrogation in the Appendix.

Sokol'nikov's testimony concerning discussions with the British Prime Minister through the intermediation of a journalist, Talbot, and a Member of Parliament, Boothby, is not alluded to in the trial. The two men concerned are no doubt:

* Stafford C. Talbot, former professor of Russian and editor of the journal British-Russian Gazette and Trade Outlook. Talbot was named as a clandestine contact for the "bloc" by Arkadii P. Rozengol'ts, a defendant at the Third Moscow Trial of March 1938:

VYSHINSKY: So since 1923 you, accused Rosengoltz, began to supply espionage information to foreign states?

ROSENGOLTZ: That is right.

VYSHINSKY: Proceed.

ROSENGOLTZ: I must also state, although I said it in my testimony during the preliminary investigation, that in 1926 I gave information to Farbman, an English journalist⁵, who at the same time was a Trotskyite. This was information concerning the foreign policy of the U.S.S.R. After that, during 1932-35, I gave information about orders placed abroad to the editor of the "British-Russian Gazette," Talbot, who came to me on his behalf.

Now as regards wrecking activities. I wanted to state that in these wrecking activities our aim was to help mainly Germany, and partly Japan.

⁵ Probably Michael Farbman, a British journalist who covered Russia. See, for example, Farbman's interview with Lenin of October, 1922, printed in Pravda on November 10, 1922. Online at <https://www.marxists.org/archive/lenin/works/1922/oct/27.htm>

Since Talbot was also the "founder and first President of the Association of British Creditors of Russia"⁶ he had a special interest in settling the Russian debt left over from Tsarist times. This is reflected in Sokol'nikov's description of his 1934 meeting with Talbot.

Then Talbot asked me whether I could tell him something about the possibility of recognizing the prerevolutionary debts. I told him that on this question the government of the bloc would also be ready to make significant concessions and to make proposals acceptable to the English government ... Summing up our talk Talbot said that he considered the question of the debts to be very important and I again reaffirmed to him the readiness of the government of the bloc to make serious concessions on this question. (326; see p. 190-1)

⁶ See "Debt Payment Plan Proposed to Soviet." The New York Times Dec. 8, 1927 p. 6.

"Boothby" must be Robert Boothby, MP. He had been Parliamentary Private Secretary to Winston Churchill when Churchill was Chancellor of the Exchequer. Conservative Stanley Baldwin was British Prime Minister after June 7, 1935.

There is no reason that the NKVD would have compelled Sokol'nikov to testify falsely to this material, which was never used. Nor is there any evidence at all to suggest that Sokol'nikov's testimony here or elsewhere, or in fact that any of the Moscow Trials defendants, was forced upon them. This is additional evidence that Sokol'nikov's testimony is genuine — that Sokol'nikov really had undertaken these talks, and that Trotsky really had been negotiating with the British.

This testimony is consistent with other evidence. Piatakov testified that at their meeting in Norway in December, 1935, Trotsky had told him that he had established contact not only with Germany (Hess) and "with the Japanese government" but also "with some conservative circles" in English.

In France the contact was with the "Comité de Forges" and with banking circles. In England, with some conservative circles. (LD 268)

According to Piatakov Trotsky had stressed that it was essential to reach agreements with England and France as well, in order to balance them off against Germany and Japan, not to become too dependent on the latter.

Trotsky further wrote that we must not limit ourselves only to the German and Japanese. We must secure benevolent relations with other governments too (like the English and French), especially from the perspective of the possibility of extremely strong pressure from the German and Japanese quarters... (LD 258)

Of course, to reach agreements with Germany alone would be risky, since without a corresponding English and French counterweight Germany would put their feet on the table and it would be very touch for us. Therefore in his practical steps he, Trotsky, is carrying out simultaneous preparatory work in different directions. (LD 267)

Sokol'nikov's testimony about his negotiation with the British is consistent with what Piatakov testified about what Trotsky told him.

The countries that posted the most imminent military threat to the USSR were Germany and Japan. Agreements with English, as here, and France, were necessary in order to balance against agreements with Germany and Japan. Therefore, this interrogation of Sokol'nikov also offers additional indirect evidence of Trotsky's negotiations with Germany and Japan.

Sokol'nikov's testimony about the projected economic and political program of the bloc in power is also consistent with Piatakov's testimony in his statement to Ezhov. Piatakov wrote that both Kamenev and Trotsky had told him that "retreat" to capitalism would be necessary if agreements with powerful foreign powers were to be concluded, while such agreements were themselves essential either to help the bloc come to power or, if it came to power by its own efforts, to consolidate its power in the country. According to Piatakov, Kamenev told him in 1932:

Yesterday's disagreements cannot be an obstacle to our agreement today, if today we have a common goal. And this common goal is:

- 1/ The overthrow of Stalin and the liquidation of the Stalin regime;
- 2/ The rejection of the building of socialism in one country and, consequently, the appropriate change of economic policy. On these two points we reached agreement with the Rights very easily."

To my question what "change of economic policy" mean Kamenev, with his characteristic aplomb, answered: "Well, you know, we will concretize it when we are in power. Only one thing is clear: we will have to retreat, in order to weaken the internal situation and equalize the external."

"Yes, yes, Yuri Leonidovich, I know that you concern yourself little with questions of international politics. But inasmuch as you may possibly have to continue the business that we are now doing, it is necessary that we be informed."

"Keep in mind that, without the essential agreement with the government of the capitalist powers against the Stalin government, we will not come to power. It is essential for us to secure a favorable attitude towards us, and that means we will have to make concessions to them. But about that we must have already in advance had confidential talks with the governments of these states, and that is happening now. Radek and Sokol'nikov will inform you in more detail." (LD 248-9)

Trotsky's had used similar language in his talk with Piatakov in Norway in December 1935:

"This means that we must retreat. This must be firmly understood. Retreat to capitalism. How far, on what a scale, it is hard to say now — it will only be possible to be more concrete after we come to power."

"You see, — Trotsky continued — on this point about a retreat we have agreed with the Rights and my directive about the bloc with the Rights was not just tactically necessary, but correct in principle, all the more since they have fully admitted the necessity of terrorist, diversionist, and sabotage means of struggle against Stalin." (LD 269)

At the January, 1937, Moscow Trial, Piatakov, Sokol'nikov, and Karl Radek all testified about Trotsky's commitment to a "retreat" towards the restoration of capitalism.

As for the retreat, Trotsky wrote that Radek and I were mistaken in thinking that the retreat would be inconsiderable — we would have to retreat very far, and on this was based the bloc, not only with the Zinovievites, but also with the Rights, (1937 Trial 38-39)

... In this connection also it would be necessary, for considerations of home policy, to effect a fairly big retreat, in addition to concessions to foreigners. Radek quite justly mentioned this retreat in town and country, such as permitting capitalist trade and so forth. To put it simply, Trotsky explained that it would be a very serious retreat. This is exactly what he said: you and Radek are still under the sway of the old ideas of 1925-26 and you are unable to see that in essence our coming to power will mean that we will have to retreat very far in the direction of capitalism. (1937 Trial 65)

Karl Radek outlined how Trotsky's views changed between 1934 and 1935:

VYSHINSKY: Three facts: the April letter of 1934, the December letter of 1935 and Pyatakov's meeting with Trotsky in December 1935. How was the question put in Trotsky's letter in 1934? War, working for defeat?

RADEK: Yes.

VYSHINSKY: A return to capitalism in substance?

RADEK: No, a return to capitalism is not raised in the letter.

VYSHINSKY: No? What then?

RADEK: A retreat which we then thought....

VYSHINSKY: To where?

RADEK: To the positions of the NEP, with industry strengthened in comparison with what it had been before 1928.

VYSHINSKY: A retreat towards strengthening what elements?

RADEK: A retreat which was to restore a part of the capitalist elements as well, but this retreat, if compared with the state of things in 1927 — there would be a possibility during this retreat, on the one hand, of admitting capitalist restoration, but at the same time of strengthening industry, thanks to the First Five-Year Plan, the state farms and part of the collective farms — that is to say, we would have an economic base on which in my opinion a proletarian government could have maintained itself.

VYSHINSKY: So a proletarian government could still have maintained itself? But if the tendency was to go backward?

RADEK: The tendency was to go backward.

VYSHINSKY: In 1935 this stood out more clearly in comparison with 1934?

RADEK: In 1935 the question was raised of going back to capitalism.

VYSHINSKY: To what limits?

RADEK: What Trotsky proposed was without any limits. To such limits as the enemy might require. (1937 Trial, 122)

According to Sokol'nikov the Trotskyists understood that they had no choice; it was retreat or be crushed:

SOKOLNIKOV: ... We considered that fascism was the most organized form of capitalism, that it would triumph, would seize Europe and stifle us. It was therefore better to come to terms with it, it was better to consent to a compromise in the sense of retreating from socialism to capitalism. (1937 Trial, 151)

The hypothesis that Trotsky did advocate the "restoration of capitalism" as Radek, Piatakov, and others asserted, is also consistent with much other evidence we now possess.

Chapter 4. Piatakov's Statement to Ezhov, December 19-20, 1936

This lengthy statement was obtained from the FSB Archive in mid-2015. As of September, 2019, it is also available in an identical copy, retyped, from RGASPI.¹ We will study it carefully as it contains much information about Trotsky's conspiratorial activities.

¹ TsA FSB. R-33835. (Delo No. 3257 on the arrested Piatakov Iurii Leonidovich and others); RGASPI. f.17. op.171. d. 263. ll. 43-76. See the full text, in English translation, in the Appendix.

Trotsky, then Khrushchev, then Gorbachev, and researchers under their direction, have claimed that the defendants' statements and confessions were false. But there has never been any evidence that the pretrial or trial statements of Piatakov or of any of the defendants at the three Moscow trials were lies — that the defendants were forced by torture or threats to mouth statements they and the prosecution knew were untrue.

In volume one of this study, Trotsky's 'Amalgams', and again, in a revised version in The Moscow Trials As Evidence, we have verified that the Moscow Trials testimony is reliable by checking against independent evidence many of the assertions that the defendants made in their testimony. In the light of this verification, allegations that the defendants' statements and confessions were false are simply wrong. They should not be accepted and should never pass unchallenged. Such claims are not evidence. They are examples of the logical fallacy of "argument by authority."

It has been convenient to both ideological anticommunists and Trotskyists to "believe" — accept as true — the claim that the defendants were forced to repeat falsehoods concocted by the prosecution. For this reason we will begin our examination of Piatakov's statement with some considerations which ought to lead and objective researcher to accept that this document represents what Piatakov himself wished to say.

Gol'tsman and the "Hotel Bristol"

During the first Moscow Trial of August, 1936, defendants Eduard Gol'tsman claimed that he had travelled by train from Berlin to Copenhagen in November, 1932, and that he had met Leon Sedov, Trotsky's son, in the lobby of the "Hotel Bristol," after which he and Sedov had proceeded to visit Trotsky. A number of people, including Trotsky himself, pointed out almost immediately that there was no "Hotel Bristol" in Copenhagen in 1932. This fact led Trotsky, then the Dewey Commission, to conclude that Gol'tsman had been lying.

In 2009 Swedish researcher Sven-Eric Holmström published "New Evidence Concerning the 'Hotel Bristol' Question in the First Moscow Trial of 1936."² On the basis of meticulous researcher Holmström concluded that Gol'tsman must have mistaken the name of the adjacent café "Bristol" for that of the hotel.

² At <https://ojs.library.ubc.ca/index.php/clogic/article/view/191568/188679>

Holmström's conclusions have now received striking verification. Documents from Gol'tsman's NKVD investigation file released in 2015 reveal that the NKVD checked up on this question before the trial. The NKVD investigators determined that no hotel named "Bristol" existed in Copenhagen, but that it was easy to mistake the name of the café for that of the hotel.

On August 2, 1936 the Foreign Division of the Main Directorate for State Security (GUGB) reported as follows to the Chief of the Secret Political Division of the NKVD:

According to the official references works / guides to the city of Copenhagen / telephone directories in the Foreign Division of the GUGB NKVD no hotel "Bristol" existed either in 1932 or exists in 1936.

However, in Copenhagen there is a small café "Bristol" above which is located the hotel "Grand Hotel Copenhagen." Since the "Grand Hotel" has a sign that is not very noticeable and the café "Bristol" has a sign in large gold letters on a black background many casual observers take the hotel "Grand Hotel" as the "Bristol."

The café "Bristol" and the hotel "Grand Hotel" are located very close to the Copenhagen train station and existed in 1932 as they do today.

Gol'tsman was asked whether he could have made this error and admitted that it was possible. Gol'tsman also accurately described the café's sign and said that it was right outside the hotel entrance and that the café and hotel lobby communicated with each other.

As SEDOV and I had arranged in advance in Berlin I went directly from the station to the hotel "Bristol."

This hotel is situated near the station, above a five-minute walk away. My meeting with SEDOV took place in the vestibule of the hotel, from which we went to the café situated on the first floor of this same hotel.

Now I remember precisely that at the entrance to the café there was a black sign on which in large gold letters it said "Bristol."

Question: Was this perhaps the name of the café, not of the hotel?

Answer: Perhaps, but I remember well the sign "Bristol" above the café, and this café is situated next to the vestibule of the hotel.³

³ Gol'tsman file TsA FSB R-33833 Delo No. 3257. See Appendix for the full text.

This is exactly what Holmström concluded on the basis of a careful study of the evidence he had gathered. It proves that Gol'tsman was not lying about the "Hotel Bristol." He had simply made an understandable error, one that, according to the Copenhagen-based NKVD men, "many casual observers" made.

For our present purposes, this set of documents proves that the NKVD did not "force" Gol'tsman to mouth phony confessions. Rather, the NKVD men did what investigators are supposed to do. They took Gol'tsman's testimony and tried to verify it. When they discovered the discrepancy in Gol'tsman's testimony, they asked him about it and recorded his comment.

In Trotsky's 'Amalgams' and in The Moscow Trials As Evidence we show that, whenever we can independently check statements made by defendants in the Moscow Trials, we find that the statements are genuine — that is, the defendants testified what they wanted to testify. The Gol'tsman — "Hotel Bristol" documents constitute yet more evidence of this.

There is a great deal of other evidence that corroborates the confessions and statements by Moscow Trials defendants. We will discuss some of it in this chapter; more such evidence is examined in other chapters. By contrast, we have no evidence at all that Moscow Trial defendants were compelled to make false statements.

Corroboration of Piatakov's Testimony

We possess other corroboration of the genuineness of Piatakov's testimony before and at trial. In 2002 the transcript of the December 7, 1936 ochnaia stavka, or face-to-face confrontation, between Piatakov and Nikolai Bukharin was published. There Piatakov named Bukharin as a participant in the Zinovievist-Trotskyist-Rightist network of conspiracies, as he also did in the statement of December 19-20, 1936, which we examine here.

Present at this ochnaia stavka were Kliment E. Voroshilov, People's Commissar for Defense; Sergo Ordzhonikidze, People's Commissar for Heavy Industry and Piatakov's immediate superior; Nikolai Ezhov, Commissar for Internal Affairs and, as such, head of the NKVD; Stalin; and Bukharin himself. Bukharin insisted that Piatakov was lying only in regard to his own, Bukharin's, guilt but not otherwise. According to his wife, Anna Larina, Bukharin told her about this ochnaia stavka. Decades later, Larina in turn related in her memoir a version of what she remembered of what he husband had told her. From her account it is clear that Bukharin did not convey to his wife that the rest of Piatakov's testimony was false.

[[cyrillic]]пятакoв гoвoрил, oпуcтив гoлoву, cтapaяcь лaд()нью прикpыть глaзa. B eгo тoнe чувcтвoвaлocь oзлoблeниe, o:- злoблeниe, кaк cчитaл н.и., прoтив тeх ктo eгo cлушaл нe прeрывaя абcурдный cпeктaкль, нe oтaнcлвливaя нeслыхaннoй прoизвoл.

— Юрий Леонидович, объясните, спросил Бухарин, — что вас заставляет оговаривать самого себя?

Наступила пауза. В это время Серго Орджоникидзе, сосредоточенно и изумленно смотревший на Пятакова, потрясенный изгненным видом и показаниями своего деятельного помощника, приложив ладонь к уху (Серго был глуховат), спросил:

— Неужто ваши показания добровольны?

— Мои показания добровольны, — ответил Пятаков.

— Абсолютно добровольны? — еще с большим удивлением спросил Орджоникидзе, но на повторный вопрос ответа не последовало. Только лишь на процессе в своем последнем слове Пятаков сумел сказать: "Всякое показание, какое вы возьмете будет легче, чем самый фальшивый признания", чем и дал понять, что его показания — вынужденные. Почему же в ту минуту) перед всеми членами политбюро, Пятаков не решился сказать правду и рассказать, что с ним происходили, чем довели его до такого состояния, что он едва держался на ногах? До конца этого процесса невозможно. Но, очевидно Пятаков понимал, что после очной ставки ему придется вернуться не к себе домой и снова начнутся адские муки в стенах НКВД. Возможно) медицинские средства парализовали его выдающуюся волю.

[[[cyrillic]]]4

Piatakov spoke, his head lowered, trying to cover his eyes with his palm. In his tone one could feel hostility, hostility, as N.I. [Bukharin] believed, against those who were listening to him without interrupting the absurd spectacle, not stopping the unheard-of caprice.

— Iurii Leonidovich, explain, — asked Bukharin, — what has compelled you to slander yourself?

A pause ensued. During this time Sergo Ordzhonikidze, who was looking at Piatakov with concentration and amazement, shaken by the haggard appearance and the confessions of his assistant, put his hand to his ear (Sergo was rather deaf) and asked:

— Are your confessions really voluntary?

— My confessions are voluntary, — answered Piatakov.

— Absolutely voluntary? — Ordzhonikidze asked with even great astonishment, but no answer followed the repeated question. Only at the trial, in his last words, did Piatakov dare to say: "Any punishment you could inflict will be easier than the fact itself of admitting guilt," by which he made it clear that his confessions were made through compulsion.

But why, in that moment, in front of all the members of the Politburo, did Piatakov not dare to tell the truth and tell what happened to him were doing, what drove him to such a state that he could hardly stand? It is impossible to comprehend this completely. But, obviously, Pyatakov knew that after the confrontation, he would not return to his home and the hellish torments would begin again in the dungeons of the NKVD. Perhaps medication paralyzed his extraordinary will.

⁴ Anna Larina, Nezabyvaemoe. Moscow: APN, 1989, 328.

Larina was convinced that not just Piatakov, but all the defendants at all the Moscow trials were innocent. But she had no evidence to that effect. She assumed it, evidently because Piatakov accused her husband Bukharin of involvement in the bloc of conspirators. Today we possess a great deal of evidence that Bukharin was indeed one of the leaders of the bloc of oppositionists that included Zinovievists, Trotskyist, and Rights.

Piatakov testified about the activities of the bloc. He does not mention the participation of the Zinovievists, perhaps because it was not relevant to his testimony against Bukharin, perhaps for some other reason. We can be sure that Ordzhonikidze believed Piatakov's testimony because we have the partial text of a talk he gave to the heads of the chief directorates of the Commissariat of Heavy Industry on February 5, 1937 in which he complains bitterly about Piatakov's deceitfulness.⁵

⁵ English translation in Getty & Naumov, 292-294. The Russian version of Ordzhonikidze's speech was not available when Getty and Naumov wrote in the late '90s. It was finally published in 2011 and is now online at <http://istmat.info/node/48634>

Piatakov's Statement of December 19-20, 1936

This is the longest pretrial text of material from Piatakov's investigation file that we now possess. It is not an interrogation but a statement, zaiavlenie. Further evidence that it was made voluntarily comes from the beginning of what appears to have been the next interrogation of Piatakov, that of December 23, 1936.

Question: You have submitted a statement in the name of the People's Commissar of Internal Affairs com. EZHOV, in which you outline your criminal activities in a more detailed and systematic manner and, in particular, tell about your personal meeting with Trotsky.

May the investigation consider this statement of yours as an official investigative document?

Answer: Yes, in writing this statement in the name of People's Commissar EZHOV I intended that it be included among the investigative materials.⁶

No objective student could conclude from this text, or from the evidence cited above, that Piatakov's testimony had been put into his mouth, or that he had been forced to lie according to a narrative composed by somebody else. Piatakov's testimony represented what he chose to say.

⁶ "Protokol doprosa Piatakova, Iuria Leonidovicha — ot 23 dekabria 1936 goda." LD 272.

Confirmation of Piatakov's statement

Much of what Piatakov says in this Statement can be confirmed by other documents we now possess.

The Bloc of Trotskyists, Zinovievists, Rightists, and other Oppositionists

We know this bloc existed because evidence of it was discovered in 1980 in the Harvard Trotsky Archive by Pierre Broué. Piatakov's statements about it agree with what we know from the Trotsky Archive documents written by Trotsky and Sedov. Piatakov's Statement is yet more evidence that Broué was wrong in claiming, without any evidence, that the bloc was "ephemeral." Piatakov insists that the bloc aimed at error — political assassination — from the outset and continued this aim, along with that of sabotage, until its members were arrested.⁷

⁷ We have studied this discovery, the "Sedov bloc letter," in Furr, Amalgams, and Moscow Trials.

Confirmation of Trotsky's Policy of Terror

Piatakov's Statement confirms the claims made by Mark Zborowski, whom Sedov tried to recruit to kill Stalin and who expressed the view that the assassination of Stalin was all that was necessary for the Stalin regime to collapse. We have studied Zborowski's report in previous books.⁸

⁸ Furr, Amalgams, Chapters 3 and 13; Trotsky's Lies, Chapter 2; Moscow Trials, Chapter 3.

In his first confession statement, made on June 2, 1937, Nikolai Bukharin affirmed that Trotsky was "always urging assassination":

RADEK informed me that TROTSKY was always urging the use of terror..."⁹

Piatakov's testimony that Trotsky was urging sabotage. This confirms Bukharin's claim in his first confession:

I remember yet another important conversation in which RADEK vaguely related that some kind of new directives on both internal and external politics had been received from Trotsky. I remember that I was angered by this way of generally treating any commands by Trotsky, to whom ~~ich~~ the Trotskyites related as almost to the military commands of a unitary command center. RADEK hinted to me that this was a question of some sort of new negotiations of Trotsky's with Germany or with England, but limited himself to this, having told me about Trotsky's directive concerning sabotage.

Trotsky and the Germans and Japanese

Piatakov's testimony about Trotsky's claim that he had made deals with Nazi Germany and Fascist Japan corroborates the substantial testimony from Soviet sources that we have studied elsewhere.¹⁰ It is also confirmed by our analysis of Ivan Serov's report.¹¹ There we demonstrate that Rakovsky must have been telling the truth when, in his statement to the prosecution, he said that he had met with high-ranking Japanese officials and agreed to be a go-between for Trotsky.¹²

It is confirmed by Rakovsky in confession statements published in 2005 in a Bulgarian historical journal.¹³ And it is also confirmed by the recently printed investigation materials in Politbiuro i Lev Trotskii t. 2. We examine those documents in the present volume.

¹⁰ Furr, Leon Trotsky's Collaboration with Germany and Japan (hereafter TV).

¹¹ See TC, Chapter Four.

¹² See the extensive discussion in TC Chapter 4.

¹³ We will study these statements in a future book. Rakovsky was Bulgarian.

Trotsky and the Trotskyist Conspiracy in the Army

Piatakov wrote that Trotsky put special emphasis on recruiting in the Red Army (LD 266) and considered Vitovt K. Putna and Vitalii M. Primakov as "a very valuable contact and it must be strengthened and developed in every way." (LD 270) Both men were co-defendants in the "Tukhachevsky Affair" trial of June 11, 1937 and were executed together with Tukhachevsky and the others. Both Putna and Primakov described their commitment to Trotsky and their activities on behalf of Trotsky's conspiracy. The sections of Marshal Semion Budyonny's letter to Marshal Klement Voroshilov that deal with Trotsky are examined in Chapter Nine of Trotsky's 'Amalgams'. We now have many of Tukhachevsky's own confessions. Moreover, we now possess the transcript of the trial of the trial of Tukhachevsky and others of June 11, 1937, which was declassified in May, 2018.¹⁴

¹⁴ As of this writing, December 29, 2018, these are <http://istmat.info/node/59108> and http://lander.odessa.ua/doc/rgaspi_17.171.392_process_tuhachevskogo.pdf It is not yet available in text format, much less published in book form, and has not been translated.

Trotsky and the United Front

In his journal of exile, Biulleten' Oppozitsii (Bulletin of the Opposition) No. 32 of December 1932 Trotsky seemed to be calling for a "united front" with the Social-Democrats. But Trotsky's attitude towards the "united front" was an equivocal one. Fel'shtinskii and Cherniavskii, Trotsky's sympathetic Russian biographers, conclude that he wanted a "united front" only with the rank-and-file, not with the S-D leaders, though he did not call them "social-fascists" like the Comintern was doing. (120) This is also the tenor of Trotsky's essay "In What Does the Error of the German Communist Party's Current Political Line Reside?"¹⁵

¹⁵ B.O. No. 27, March 1932. The English translation, "For a Workers' United Front Against Fascism," is misleading. Trotsky is very careful not to call for unity with the Social-Democratic Party itself — the leadership.

In other articles Trotsky was clearer about his call for a United Front with the Social-Democrats:

I proposed to the German Communists to carry out the policy of a united front. The Communists ought to propose to the Social Democrats and to the trade unions led by them a program of cooperative, practical struggle against the attack of the fascists. The Social Democratic masses quite sincerely desire to wage such a struggle. If the leaders refuse, they will compromise themselves in the eyes of their own supporters. If the leaders agree, the masses, in practical action, will go beyond their leaders and support the Communists. ("Answers to Questions by the New York Times," February 13, 1932. WLT 1932, p. 49)

Trotsky never advocated a "united front" in the formation of a government, as the Comintern did in France and Republican Spain.

According to Piatakov, Trotsky's view, as communicated through Radek, was hostile to the "united front":

Besides this there were also directives about the Comintern. I did not remember them well and now recall them vaguely. I seem to remember that it was a question of a very "left" formulation against the united front in France. Unfortunately this part of Trotsky's directives did not stick in my memory. (LD 259)

Piatakov admits his memory was faulty on this point. But Piatakov also said that, of course, Trotsky could not publicly reveal his conspiracies with the capitalist powers. Trotsky had said that he, Piatakov, should not be troubled by the fact that much of what he was about to say must not only not be made public (and therefore I should not be surprised that much of it will contradict what is said in his "Bulletins"), but also must not be made known to wider circles of his supporters in the USSR. (LD 264; emphasis added)

We know from examination of the Trotsky Archive that Trotsky lied in his public writings when he thought it expedient to do so.¹⁶ In fact Trotsky vigorously denied in public the very policies that he was pursuing in private, such as his continued contact with "capitulators," his approval of the bloc with other Oppositionists, and the use of "terror" or violence and assassination.

¹⁶ For details see the discussion in Furr Amalgams and Furr, Trotsky's Lies.

Trotsky's policy of a conspiracy of assassination and sabotage against the Soviet Union in alliance with Germany, Japan, France and Great Britain, and of agreements to help the German General Staff to defeat the Red Army in wartime, was not compatible with a "united front" against Germany. No doubt this accounts for his seemingly "very 'left'" position against a United Front against Germany: the Germans naturally opposed it, so Trotsky did as well.

Soviet Economic Successes Necessitated Terror, Sabotage and Defeatism

This was the position of the Zinovievist assassins of Sergei Kirov. As we have shown¹⁷, there is no basis at all to think that they were "forced" to say this by the NKVD. The Trotskyist and other arrestees whose statements and interrogations are published in PiLT2 also repeatedly refer to this.

¹⁷ See Furr, The Murder of Sergei Kirov.

Trotsky and the clandestine Oppositionists were relying upon the social stresses of collectivization and industrialization to somehow cause the Stalin regime's collapse. When this did not occur they fell back upon force: plans for a coup d'état with attendant murder of Stalin and his highest associates, coupled with defeatism and sabotage in favor of the invader in the war with one or more capitalist states which they were sure would break out sooner rather than later.

The fact that no collapse occurred and that collectivization and rapid industrialization appeared to have been successful enough caused disruptions among the participants in the bloc of oppositionists. Evidently some of them were motivated more by fear that Stalin's policies were leading the USSR to ruin than either by the conviction that Trotsky's theory of "permanent revolution" was correct, or by hatred of Stalin himself. Piatakov, Radek, and Rakovsky were among those who were no friends of Stalin or his concept of how to build socialism in one country. But they were ultimately unwilling to unite with Nazi Germany and fascist Japan, bring about the defeat of the USSR in war, see the USSR split into smaller parts, and end up united with the fascist powers.

Trotsky's Theory of "Permanent Revolution"

Trotsky himself stuck to his theory that it was impossible build socialism in a single country. At first he believed that Soviet society would either collapse under the economic and social strain of simultaneous collectivization, famine, and industrialization, or would become ungovernable due to rebellions and the disaffection of the Army. This proved not to be so, as Sedov told Piatakov:

Trotsky rules out any possibility at the present stage of any mass anti-Stalin movement. Stalin has succeeded in surviving the difficulties and we must frankly admit that we have missed the time. (LD 241)¹⁸

¹⁸ Also see the discussion of this passage in Chapter Two, above.

Trotsky concluded that the struggle against Stalin's project of socialism in one country should also be international. From that he drew the further conclusion that the Trotskyists and their Opposition allies would have to make arrangements with Germany and Japan, the capitalist states most likely to attack the USSR and, to counteract the Germans and Japanese, with Britain and France. First Smirnov, then Kamenev told Piatakov about this.

But neither Piatakov nor Radek were able to fully grasp the implications of this policy as Trotsky saw them. So they decided that Piatakov should meet with Trotsky. He asked Trotsky again at their meeting in Norway in December, 1935, and Trotsky expatiated upon his ideas in greater detail. (Smirnov, LD 238; Kamenev, LD 250; Radek, LD 259; Trotsky LD 267)

The main points of Trotsky's lecture to Piatakov are quoted in the transcript of the January 1937 Moscow Trial.¹⁹ Sometimes Piatakov's statement provides the source of quotations in the trial transcript that are otherwise not identified. For example, Vyshinsky said the following:

Incidentally, in regard to this Bulletin of the Trotskyite opposition, Pyatakov told us that Trotsky had said to him: "Do not take everything we say in the Bulletin at its face value. Bear in mind that we cannot say in the Bulletin all that we say to you, and demand of you. Understand that sometimes, perhaps, in this Bulletin we shall say things which are the opposite of what we demand of you. (1937 Trial 508-509)

¹⁹ The page numbers to this statement of Piatakov's as cited by Prosecutor Vyshinsky in the transcript of the January 1937 trial are the same as in the text we have obtained. They are included in the English translation.

The parallel passage in Piatakov's Statement is as follows:

He mentioned once again the difference between the preparation of a coup d'état and a mass uprising and in this connection much of what he was about to say must not only not be made public (and therefore I should not be surprised that much of it will contradict what is said in his "Bulletins"), but also must not be made known to wider circles of his supporters in the USSR. (LD 264)

In Trotsky's 'Amalgams' and Trotsky's Lies we have established that Trotsky lied in his writings, including in his Bulletin, when he considered it expedient to do so. Piatakov's Statement, and his claim as quoted by Vyshinsky here, are consistent with that.

Ukrainian Independence

According to Piatakov, Trotsky said that the Germans demanded that a new government led by the Oppositionists should allow the Ukraine to separate from the U.S.S.R.:

3. In the event that the "nationalist forces" of the Ukraine should want to separate from the U.S.S.R. — not to oppose this. (LD 268)

Piatakov testified to this during the trial:

But in return the fascists are to receive the following compensation: a general favourable attitude towards German interests and towards the German government on all questions of international policy; certain territorial concessions would have to be made, and these territorial concessions have been defined—in particular, mention was made of territorial concessions in a veiled form which were called "not resisting Ukrainian national-bourgeois forces in the event of their self-determination."

Vyshinsky: What does that mean?

Pyatakov: It means in a veiled form what Radek spoke about here: should the Germans set up their Ukrainian government, ruling the Ukraine not through their German Governor-General but perhaps through a hetman—at any rate, should the Germans "self-determine" the Ukraine—the Trotskyite-Zinovievite bloc will not oppose it. Actually, this meant the beginning of the dismemberment of the Soviet Union. (1937 Trial 64)

In 1939, Trotsky published four articles in which he advocated independence for the Ukraine. The first, "The Ukrainian Question," is dated April 22, 1939, published first (in English) on May 9, 1939, and in the July, 1939, issue of the B.O.²⁰ "Independence of the Ukraine and Sectarian Muddleheads," is dated July 30, 1939, but apparently first published in mid-September, 1939, in English and in the B.O. issue of October, 1939.²¹ "Democratic Feudalists and the independence of the Ukraine," is dated August 5, 1939, but was first published on October 31, 1939, in English and also in the October issue of the B.O.²² The last article, "Stalin — Temporary Holder of the Ukraine," is dated September 18, 1939, published on October 24, 1939, and not in the B.O.²³

²⁰ WLT 1938-1939, p. 413, n. 296; <http://web.mit.edu/fjk/www/FI/BO/BO-77.shtml>

²¹ WLT 1939-1940, p. 426 n. 48; <http://web.mit.edu/fjk/www/FI/BO/BO-79.shtml>

²² WLT 1939-40, p. 429 n. 71; ibid.

²³ WLT 1939-40, p. 431 n. 88.

In the light of Piatakov's Statement and the 1937 Trial testimony Trotsky's articles in support of Ukrainian independence may be interpreted in two ways:

- Trotsky presents these articles as a Marxist-Leninist analysis of the national question from his own strongly anti-Stalin, anti-Soviet perspective.
- However that may be, the call to separate the Ukraine from the Soviet Union is consistent with what Piatakov and others describe as Trotsky's recognition of the necessity to permit Ukrainian nationalist forces friendly to Germany to secede from the U.S.S.R.

Which of these interpretations best fits the facts as we know them? They are not mutually compatible because of the complete lack of any left, working-class based Ukrainian nationalist movement. Trotsky's appeals to Ukrainian revolutionaries sound unrealistic if not deliberately misleading, for all the Ukrainian nationalist organizations were far-Right, pro-German and Nazi-like.

Any independence for the Ukraine would mean a pro-Nazi, intensely anticommunist and anti-working class state, a base for Hitler. Therefore it seems likely that these articles constituted a covert message to the Germans that, despite the setbacks suffered by his Soviet-based supporters, Trotsky remained ready to concede Ukraine to Germany in case of war.

"By Any Means"

According to Piatakov's account Trotsky emphasized that in the struggle to unseat Stalin "all means were good."

In relation to this we must ruthlessly cast aside prejudices of any kind.
(LD 241)

1/ The central task is not the resurrection of an organization for the sake of organization, but its resurrection for the purpose of liquidating Stalin and his closest supporters (in the letter it was said "'S' und Konsorten mit allen Mitteln aus dem Weg rauemen)..."

"Remember, in this struggle all means are good and every ally is useful..." (LD 270)

This concept was widely spread among Trotsky's firmest supporters in the Soviet Union. It is mentioned repeatedly in the interrogations and statements printed in PiLT2.

Sokol'nikov and the Japanese

One pre-trial interrogation of Sokol'nikov has been published in PiLT2. We have put its text in the "Appendix" section and will consider it in the present volume. Other pre-trial materials from Sokol'nikov have now been made available online.

In a section that has been published from another interrogation Sokol'nikov identifies the Japanese diplomat who contacted him about Japan's contacts with Trotsky as "Ota."

... to the file was associated a copy of notes of a talk between G. Ia. Sokol'nikov, who was at that time the vice-commissar of Foreign Affairs, with the Japanese ambassador Ota of April 13, 1935 on the question of the petroleum, fishing, and anthracite concessions on Sakhalin [Island]. At the preliminary investigation and at the trial G. Ia. Sokol'nikov confirmed the fact of this talk and stated that after the talk he supposedly had a short conversation with Ota on the subject of L.D. Trotsky's proposals to the Japanese government. The contents of the conversation, as it is reflected in the transcript of the interrogation of G. Ia. Sokol'nikov of December 12, 1936, was as follows:

Sokol'nikov: ...when Ota and the secretary of the embassy were about to leave, Ota stopped a while. At that time both interpreters had already left my office. Taking advantage of this opportunity Ota, while I escorted him to the door, exchanged a few sentences with me.

Question: Please reproduce your conversation with Ota word for word, as far as possible.

Answer: Ota asked me: "Are you aware that Mr. Trotsky has made certain proposals to my government?" I replied: "Yes, I have been informed of this." Ota asked: "How do you appraise these proposals?" I replied: "I think the proposals are quite serious." Then Ota asked: "Is this only your personal opinion?" I replied: "No, this is also the opinion of my friends." On this point our conversation ended.

Question: Did Ota return to the question of contact between the bloc and the Japanese government after that?

Answer: No. This conversation with Ota took place at the very end of my negotiations with him. Shortly after that I stopped working in the NKVD and did not meet with Ota again. (R-PP 228-229)

In another fragment of a pretrial interrogation quoted by Dimitrov in his diary Sokol'nikov confirms Trotsky's conspiracy with Germany and Japan. We have reproduced this passage in Chapter Two, above.

Piatakov Confirms Sokol'nikov's Claim

As we have already noted,²⁴ Piatakov's statement to Ezhov contains an important addition to the evidence of Trotsky's collaboration with the Japanese. Piatakov confirmed that Sokol'nikov had told him about this meeting.

Also, Sokol'nikov told me that he had a talk with the Japanese, with Ota, I think, from which it was also clear that Trotsky was carrying on negotiations with representatives of the Japanese government. (LD 257)

²⁴ See Chapter Two, above.

Piatakov's confirmation here is very significant. Piatakov made it in passing, without any emphasis, in an almost offhand manner. There is no indication that it was "forced" from him or "scripted" by the NKVD.

Therefore, there is no room for doubt that Ota approached Sokol'nikov. And that means that there can be no doubt Trotsky was conspiring with the Japanese. Elsewhere we discuss other evidence of Trotsky's contact with the Japanese.²⁵

²⁵ See Furr, Trotsky's Collaboration, Chapter 4, and a later chapter in the present volume.

Trotsky's Explanation of the Need for Sabotage

According to Piatakov, during his December 1935 meeting with Trotsky in Norway he informed Trotsky that the latter's directive to engage in the sabotage of the burgeoning Soviet economy had not met with a sympathetic response by Trotskyists within the Soviet Union and that he, Piatakov, and Radek did not really understand the reasons for it either. After heaping a mountain of abuse upon Piatakov Trotsky explained that the real reason for convincing his supporters to engage in economic sabotage was not to damage the economy:

I understand very well — said Trotsky, for example — that small groups of Trotskyists cannot at this moment substantively change the course of economic development. But that is, in fact, not necessary. (LD 262)

He then explained that it was necessary to train Trotskyists to hate everything Stalin was doing no matter how positive it might appear, or those cadre would "degenerate" — be won over to the Stalin policy of industrializing the U.S.S.R.

Unless we carry out this directive the degeneration of the Trotskyist cadre is inevitable, their assimilation by the Stalin regime is inevitable, and that means our collapse together with the collapse of the Stalin state. (LD 263)

Between these two statements Trotsky evoked a comparison or parallel between what he, Trotsky was advocating and the position of the Bolshevik Party during the late Tsarist period. Trotsky cited Petr Struve and Mikhail Tugan-Baranovskii, who were advocating the industrialization of Russia about the time that Lenin was concerned with the same questions, roughly 1895-1900. According to Piatakov, Trotsky said the following:

You recall the attitude of Marxists towards the development of capitalism in Russia. We all considered that a progressive fact. But the positions of Struve and Tugan-Baranovskii, called to the service of capitalism, are one thing, while the positions of Lenin and the revolutionary part of social-democracy, which were organizing the future gravedigger of capitalism, are another. We must be the gravediggers of the Stalin state. (LD 262-263)

Trotsky said that, like the Bolsheviks of the Tsarist period, he too considered the industrialization being carried out by Stalin to be a positive thing:

It will not deny that from the point of view of the country's development it is good that new factories are being built. (LD 263)

It is hard to understand why Trotsky used this comparison. Trotsky was trying to draw a parallel between his own aims and those of Lenin, whom both he and Piatakov admired. But Lenin and the Bolsheviks opposed terrorism and sabotage in the struggle against capitalism in Russia, while Trotsky was advocating both terrorism and sabotage. Trotsky's analogy appears not to support his policies but, on the contrary, to refute them.

Then Trotsky drew a conclusion completely at odds from that of the Bolsheviks:

But the task of Trotskyists does not consist in building factories, but in organizing forces against Stalin and his regime, who collapse is inevitable. For this, cadre are needed. These cadre will inevitably degenerate if all they do is participate in positive work. That is the essence of my directive, and you cannot seem to understand it at all. (LD 263)

Evidently Piatakov did not understand how this example was supposed to help him convince the Trotskyist cadre to engage in sabotage and terror.

Not Mass Action and Revolution, but Conspiracy and Coup d'état

According to Piatakov Sedov, and then Trotsky, repeatedly stressed that the opposition could not hope to organize mass action — that is, revolution — against the Stalin regime. At one of their 1931 meetings in Berlin Sedov spoke to Piatakov as follows:

After that Sedov went on to outline what he called "the new methods of struggle."

Trotsky rules out any possibility at the present stage of any mass anti-Stalin movement. Stalin has succeeded in surviving the difficulties and we must frankly admit that we have missed the time.

"If we waste time now we will definitively lose all our cadre, and that will be the death of us.

For that reason now at the tip of the needle must be put

1) the terrorist struggle of tacitly conspiratorial groups against the main leaders of the party and government 2) active opposition against all the practical work of the party and government and 3) the discrediting in every possible way of Stalin's undertakings, especially on the economic front. (LD 241)

At their December 1935 meeting in Norway Trotsky told Piatakov:

"...Remember that without a whole series of terrorist acts, which must be carried out as soon as possible, the Stalin government cannot be overthrown. For this is a question of a coup d'état. A mass uprising, he said, is one thing, for which, evidently, there is no basis now, and a coup d'état is something else."

"This is the difference, I note, that many do not understand. They are unaware that the methods of a coup d'état differ fundamentally from the methods of organizing a mass uprising. I stand now precisely on the position of a coup d'état and therefore, in the deciding of questions of tactics, I have rejected formulaic instructions, developed under other conditions, applied to other tasks." (LD 263)

He mentioned once again the difference between the preparation of a coup d'état and a mass uprising and in this connection much of what he was about to say must not only not be made public (and therefore I should not be surprised that much of it will contradict what is said in his "Bulletins"), but also must not be made known to wider circles of his supporters in the U.S.S.R. (LD 264)

Piatakov said that the Soviet masses had been won to the task of construction and so would be hostile to sabotage:

"The sharpest possible line of demarcation must be drawn between us and all those who are tied to Stalin and his state."

"However, we must do this not by means of public statements, propaganda, and explanations. Such statements at the present moment would not meet with sympathy from the masses. On the contrary, we would be compromised and destroyed before we could do anything at all. The organizing cannot be built on this basis. That would mean to doom it in advance. For in fact the masses are under a psychosis of construction, which they falsely accept as the construction of socialism. To come out openly now against this construction means to doom our efforts." (LD 265)

Here Trotsky clarified the difference between Lenin's and the Bolsheviks' strategy during the Tsarist period, and Trotsky's strategy in the 1930s. The former relied on a mass revolution and the overthrow of capitalism. Trotsky, however, realized that he could not do that, since the masses were basically won to constructing socialism (or, as Trotsky said, what they believed was socialism) through industrialization.

Return to Capitalism

With no possibility of relying on the Soviet masses, the only means remaining to the bloc and to Trotsky were terror and sabotage.

Moreover, Trotsky realized that before seizing power the opposition would have to make agreements with the major capitalist countries so that, if they managed to overthrow the Stalin regime, the capitalist countries would not simply throw them out and divide up the Soviet Union amongst themselves.

"We cannot," Sedov transmitted Trotsky's views, "regard our struggle in an isolated manner. To keep our struggle in one country is just as absurd as Stalin's desire to build socialism in one country. Therefore we cannot swear off questions of relations between states and relations with capitalist states."

— Sedov to Piatakov in 1931 (LD 242)

4/ We must take the coming war into account and occupy in relation to the war an unconditionally defeatist position, and by means of preliminary negotiations with governments of capitalist powers (also making use of the contradictions between them) guarantee for ourselves favorable relations in case of our coming to power as a result of the war."

— Trotsky's letter to Piatakov of November 1931 (LD 247)

"Keep in mind that, without the essential agreement with the government of the capitalist powers against the Stalin government, we will not come to power. It is essential for us to secure a favorable attitude towards us, and that means we will have to make concessions to them. But about that we must have already in advance had confidential talks with the governments of these states, and that is happening now."

— Kamenev to Piatakov, end of 1932 (LD 251)

"Military conflict with capitalist states is inevitable. I do not doubt that the result of such conflict will be unpleasant for the Stalin state. We must be prepared at this moment to take power into your hands." "Of course, — emphasized Trotsky — we must understand that the seizure of power under these conditions means agreements with the corresponding capitalist states (for example with Germany, Japan and others) on the basis of substantial concessions to them, including territorial concessions."

— Trotsky to Piatakov at their meeting in Norway in December 1935 (LD 267)

"This means, it will be necessary to retreat. This must be firmly understood. Retreat to capitalism. How far and to what degree, it is difficult to say now — this can be made concrete only after we come into power."

— Trotsky to Piatakov, Norway December 1935 (LD 269)

The capitalist powers that were capable of invading the Soviet Union, and therefore those with which Trotsky must make agreements, were clearly Germany, Japan, Britain, and France. Concerning Germany:

Trotsky said that in the struggle with Stalin we can in no way ignore relations between governments. Once we understand that Stalin's scheme of building socialism in one country is an empty and dangerous scheme, then we too in our struggle with Stalin must not slide to the position of "one country."

This struggle inevitably is interconnected with our relations with capitalist states. It would be stupid to think that it is possible to assume power without securing a benevolent attitude of the most important capitalist governments, especially of the most aggressive ones, such as the present governments of Germany and Japan. It is completely essential even now to have contact and agreements with these governments. He, Trotsky, has taken the necessary steps in this regard. He demanded from Radek and Sokol'nikov, who had the requisite possibilities, to put out feelers for the essential contact along these lines with the official representatives of these powers, and to support whatever he, Trotsky, was carrying out in practice.

In this connection, as I seem to remember, Radek told me about some kind of conversations of his with Germans (I cannot recall the names of these Germans), from whom it was clear that Trotsky had made some arrangements with the German government. (LD 257. Emphasis added.)

He, Trotsky, had secured a favorable attitude of the German fascist government in case the bloc came to power.

Of course this favorable attitude was not due to any special sympathy towards the bloc but to real interests.

At the basis of the agreement lies an appeal to the German government to help the bloc come to power. On his part Trotsky promised in the event of coming to power to make very concrete concessions, stipulated in advance, to Germany. (LD 267)

Trotsky's Conspiracies with Germany, Japan, Britain, France

Specific concessions to Hitler's Germany were then enumerated (LD 267-268. Trotsky assured Piatakov:

These principles of the agreement, as Trotsky related, were finally elaborated and adopted during Trotsky's meeting with Hitler's deputy — Hess. (LD 268)

During the Second Moscow Trial of January, 1937, Radek stated that he had learned about Trotsky's negotiations with Hess. (1937 Trial 132) It is not clear from this passage in the trial transcript whether Radek had heard about these negotiations only from Piatakov or whether Trotsky's letter that Radek said he had received in early January, 1937, had also mentioned them.

Sokol'nikov made it clear that he heard about Trotsky's negotiations with Hess from Piatakov:

Vyshinsky: You spoke to Pyatakov after he had returned from abroad?

Sokolnikov: Yes. That was in January 1936. Pyatakov told me that Trotsky had been negotiating with Hess. In these negotiations Hess was empowered to put forward demands which concerned not only German interests but also the interests of another country.

Pyatakov told me that he had understood Trotsky to say that these were negotiations on a number of questions, and that agreement had been reached on them. (1937 Trial 152)

The "other country" was certainly Japan. Concerning Japan:

... Sokol'nikov told me that he had a talk with the Japanese, with Ota, I think, from which it was also clear that Trotsky was carrying on negotiations with representatives of the Japanese government. (LD 257)

In just the same manner he had fully established contact with the Japanese government. (LD 268)

Tamekichi Ota was Japanese Ambassador to the USSR between 1932 and 1936. Unlike the previous case, where Hess and his putative agreement with Trotsky was mentioned during the trial, Ota's name never came up during the trial.

Sokol'nikov's claim that Ota had contacted him concerning Trotsky's agreement with the Japanese government was made public only in 1989.²⁶ Therefore Piatakov had heard about Ota from Sokol'nikov before the latter's arrest on July 26, 1936 (Piatakov himself was arrested on September 12, 1936).

²⁶ See Izv TsK KPSS 9 (1989) p. 45; reprinted in R-PP 228-9.

There is no basis to think that Sokol'nikov would have lied to Piatakov about Ota's words to him. Therefore this passage presents good additional evidence that Trotsky really had conspired with the Japanese.

Concerning Britain and France:

Of course, to reach agreements with Germany alone would be risky, since without a corresponding English and French counterweight Germany would put feet on the table and it would be very touch for us. Therefore in his practical steps he, Trotsky, is carrying out simultaneous preparatory work in different directions. (LD 267)

Furthermore Trotsky informed me that at the same time he had succeeded in establishing businesslike contacts with leading persons of Great Britain and France.... Trotsky also mentioned that the latest negotiations with the Germans were conducted in the presence of the English and the French.

In France the contact was with the "Comité de Forges"²⁷ and with banking circles. In England, with some conservative circles. (LD 268)²⁸

²⁷ On the Comité de Forges see the article at https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Comité_des_forges and at the corresponding French Wikipedia page.

²⁸ A longer passage from this same quotation is in Chapter Two, above.

Given Trotsky's premises and his goals, his logic here, as described by Piatakov, appears sound. Once he had ruled out the possibility of a mass uprising or revolution against the Stalin regime, there remained only assassination (terror) and a coup d'état. War with powerful capitalist states would result either in social disorder following a coup or through military action by the capitalist states themselves.

If no coup took place, then defeatism in war would remain as a tactic. Under any of these circumstances prior agreements with the major capitalist countries were all necessary either for seizing power (with the help of the invading capitalist powers) or for retaining it (if a coup were successful).

This outline of Trotsky's plan for wartime is confirmed by a number of other sources including Marshal Tukhachevsky's confession statement, Marshal Budyonny's report to Marshal Voroshilov about the trial of the "Tukhachevsky Affair" defendants, the transcript of the trial of Tukhachevsky and his co-defendants, and Ezhov's interrogation of April 26, 1939. We have discussed Buyonny's report and Tukhachevsky's confession in Trotsky's 'Amalgams' and Trotsky's Lies.²⁹

²⁹ Furr, Amalgams, Chapter 9; TL Chapter 9.

In his interrogation Ezhov said:

Koestring touched on the NKVD. He said: "In the general plan of the tasks we face, the People's Commissar for Internal Affairs must play a determining role. Therefore for the success of the coup d'état and our seizure of power you must create in the NKVD a broad organization of those who agree with you, and it must be united with the military men." Koestring declared that these organizations, in the army and in the NKVD, must be prepared in such a way as to guarantee united actions at the outbreak of war towards the goal of seizing power.³⁰

³⁰ Transcript of the Interrogation of the Prisoner (lit. 'Arrested Person') Ezhov Nikolai Ivanovich of April 26 1939." Lubianka 1939-1946, 62. At <https://msuweb.montclair.edu/~furr/research/ezhov042639eng.html> The Russian text is online at <https://msuweb.montclair.edu/~furr/research/ezhovru.html>

Persons Incriminated by Piatakov

In addition to the well-known Moscow Trials defendants Piatakov named a number of persons (all men) whom he said were mentioned to him by Trotsky in the course of their talk in Norway in December 1935.

I just add that among the individual persons mentioned in the course of this talk by Trotsky were: Radek, Sokol'nikov, Serebriakov, Muralov, Beloborodov, Rakovsky, Budu Mdivani, V.M. Smirnov, Sapronov, Bukharin, Rykov, Tomsy, Uglanov, Preobrazhensky, Putna, Primakov, Krestinsky. (LD 270)

Of these a number had not yet been arrested by the date of Piatakov's Statement. Rakovsky was arrested on January 27, 1937; Bukharin and Rykov on February 27, 1937. Evgeniy A. Preobrazhensky was arrested on December 20, 1936. This was possibly a direct result of Piatakov's naming him. But the investigation had to have additional testimony against him, so perhaps the date is just a coincidence. Nikolai N. Krestinsky was not arrested until May 29, 1937. In December 1936 Timofei V. Saprnov had been confined in the Verkhneural'sk political isolator on a previous charge. He was not rearrested in connection with the Trotsky's conspiracy until August 10, 1937.

Piatakov's Motive

It should be noted that in his Statement Piatakov does not praise Stalin or his policies. Nor did he do so at trial, even in his final statement, or in his post-sentence appeal. Nowhere did Piatakov claim that he now agreed that socialism in one country was possible, or that under Stalin the Soviet Union had followed the correct path to socialism and that now, at last, he realized that.

Neither Radek nor Sokol'nikov, of whom we have only their trial testimony said that they now realized that Stalin's course was the correct one. All of them claimed that they regretted following Trotsky onto the path of terror and sabotage. All were in accord that the greatest crime was abetting Trotsky's alliance with the fascists.

The same is true of Rakovsky, and we have more evidence about him. We have some of his pretrial testimony. We also possess some documentary evidence about his post-trial imprisonment, information that we do not have about Radek and Sokol'nikov (Piatakov was executed on February 1, 1937.³¹) It is evident that Rakovsky remained hostile to the Stalin regime and continued to protest against it while in prison.³² We will also devote a separate chapter to them in a future book.

³¹ <http://lists.memo.ru/d27/f408.htm#n86>

³² We discuss these issues in TC, Chapter Four.

This failure to claim that Stalin's policy was correct is not consistent with any hypothesis that these men were forced to make false confession, or that they were trying to say what would be most pleasing to their captors in return for some kind of leniency for them, their families, etc. Other defendants, like Kamenev, did praise Stalin. Shestov, who asked to be executed, in his final words to the court praised Stalin "who holds an carries the banner of Marx, Engels and Lenin in his strong, firm hands." (1937 Trial 562) But most of the defendants did not.

Moreover, we know that some of them did not confess all that they could. Radek, for example, praised Marshal Mikhail Tukhachevsky (1937 Trial). Yet he must have been aware that Tukhachevsky was part of the bloc of conspiracies against the Soviet state and was in contact with Trotsky. Radek named Vitovt Putna, who had previously been exposed by others. But he said nothing about Vitaly Primakov. We know that Piatakov, trying to convince the Politburo of his innocence, had offered to shoot the defendants at the 1936 Moscow Trial with his own hand including, if guilty, his own wife.³³

³³ "Extract from J.V. Stalin's presentation (Dec. 1936 CC Plenum)." Voprosy Istorii 1, 1995, 9-11. In English translation at <https://msuweb.montclair.edu/~furrgr/research/stalinonoppsvi11995.html> Online, in Russian, at http://www.memo.ru/history/1937/VI9501.htm#_VPID_9

Bukharin and Iagoda, at least, knew about Ezhov's participation in the network of conspiracies. Neither one exposed him, at a time when doing so could have stopped the huge mass murders of the "Ezhovshchina" and saved perhaps hundreds of thousands of lives.

Conclusion

Piatakov's statement offers an account of the Trotskyist conspiracy, including important facts about Trotsky's personal leadership that has not been available before.

- As we have shown here, it simply cannot have been "scripted" by the NKVD or prosecution. It represents what Piatakov chose to say.
- It confirms Piatakov's and Radek's accounts in their testimony at the second Moscow Trial of January 1937.
- It confirms that Piatakov did indeed make a secret visit to Trotsky in Norway in December 1935.
- It confirms Trotsky's collaboration with both Germany and Japan.

Chapter 5. Trotsky in the Transcript of the Tukhachevsky Affair Trial of June 11, 1937

In May and June, 1937, eight high ranking military commanders of the Soviet Union were arrested. The most famous among them was Mikhail Nikolaevich Tukhachevsky, one of the five marshals of the Soviet Union. The case is often called the "Tukhachevsky Affair" after him. The others were Iona E. Iakir, Ieronim P. Uborevich, Avgust I. Kork, Robert P. Eideman, Boris M. Fel'dman, Vitalii M. Primakov, and Vitovt K. Putna.

All of these officers confessed very quickly to various charges amounting to treason. They were put on trial on June 11, 1937, sentenced to death, and executed immediately.

On February 25, 1956, Nikita Khrushchev delivered his infamous "Secret Speech"¹ to the XX Party Congress of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union. In it he accused Joseph Stalin and, secondarily, Lavrentii Beria, of serious crimes, principally of the frame-up and execution of leading Party members. Khrushchev specifically stated that the Party leaders whom he named in his Speech and who had been executed during the 1930s had in fact been innocent, falsely framed on Stalin's orders.

¹ In Russian: "Zakrytyi Doklad," or "Closed Report," in that guests at the XX Party Conference were not invited to hear Khrushchev read it.

Later in 1956 Khrushchev convened a high-level commission, the "Molotov Commission," to study this issue. Balanced between former long-time associates of Stalin and supporters of Khrushchev, the Molotov Commission did not agree to "rehabilitate"² — declare innocent — most of the defendants in the three public Moscow Trials of 1936, 1937, and 1938.

² "Rehabilitation" meant the declaration that a person had been improperly convicted (and, usually, executed). Rehabilitations were rare, if ever, based on evidence. See the quotation from the fervently anticommunist scholar Marc Junge, in the Introduction.

The commission members did agree to declare innocent Mikhail Tukhachevsky and the seven other military commanders tried and executed with him.

Комиссия также счита.ет, что обвинения, выдвинутые против Тухачевского, Якира и других осужденных по делу «Военно-фашистского заговора» в июне 1937 года, являются необоснованными и должны быть с них сняты.³

The commission also considers that the charges against Tukhachevsky, Iakir and other convicts in the case of the "Military Fascist Conspiracy" in June 1937 are unfounded and should be removed from them.

This appears to have been a compromise. Khrushchev's men wanted the rehabilitation of all the accused, while the former Stalin associates probably wanted no rehabilitations at all.⁴

³ "Zapiska Komissii TSK KPSS pod Predsedatel'stvom V. M. Molotova v TSK KPSS o Predstavlenii Vyvodov po Rassmotrennym Materialam." ("Note of the Commission of the CPSU Central Committee under the Chairmanship of V. M. Molotov to the CPSU Central Committee on the Presentation of Conclusions on the Materials Considered") December 10, 1956. RKEB 2, 207.

⁴ We know that Ivan Serov, Khrushchev's man as Chair of the KGB, withheld documents from the Commission. See Furr, The Murder of Sergei Kirov, pp. 128 ff. Even Matthew Lenoë, whose work on the Kirov murder is incompetent and dishonest in many respects, recognizes that Serov — meaning, of course, Khrushchev too — deliberately deceived the Molotov Commission. On May 21, 1974, Molotov told Feliks Chuev that Tukhachevsky had indeed been a loathsome and very dangerous traitor. Sto sorok besed s Molotovym. Moscow: "Terra", 1991, 30.

At the XXII Party Congress in October, 1961, where Khrushchev's people attacked Stalin with even more venom (and also attacked his principal supporters Molotov, Malenkov, Kaganovich, and even Voroshilov. Afterwards, from 1962 until he was deposed in October, 1964, Khrushchev authorized a large number of books and articles praising the Tukhachevsky Affair defendants and a great many others who had been executed during the late 1930s.

Under Brezhnev, Andropov, and Chernenko, few rehabilitations took place, virtually all of these unpublicized. A year or so after Mikhail Gorbachev became First Secretary of the CPSU (March, 1985) he began to sponsor a flood of "rehabilitations" and also a large number of books and articles concerning the Tukhachevsky Affair defendants.

Since Khrushchev the innocence of Tukhachevsky and his co-defendants, along with a great many other military, Party, and other figures executed during the 1930s, has been taken for granted.⁵ However, neither under Khrushchev nor under Gorbachev, nor since then, has any evidence been discovered that might support the contention that the Tukhachevsky defendants were innocent.

⁵ To give a recent example: in his 2017 book Stalin. Waiting for Hitler, 1929-1941, Stephen Kotkin simply claims: "in this case there was no military conspiracy." (377) For a critical study of Kotkin's dishonest and incompetent book, see Furr, SW.

A great many documents from former Soviet archives have been published since the end of the USSR in 1991. These documents permit us to see that many — even, quite possibly, all — of the Khrushchev-era and Gorbachev-era accusations against Stalin are lies. A large amount of primary source evidence has been published that points to the guilt of Tukhachevsky and his co-defendants. But the central documents — the investigation files, including interrogations and confessions of Tukhachevsky et al., and especially the transcript of the trial of June 11, 1937, remained top-secret, inaccessible to all researchers.

The Tukhachevsky File Is Declassified

In 2017 Tukhachevsky's investigative file was quietly made available to researchers, in that it is available to be studied at the FSB Archive in Moscow. In May, 2018, the transcript of the Tukhachevsky trial was published, again without any announcement, on one Ukrainian and one Russian internet site.⁶

A study of Tukhachevsky's investigative file and the trial transcript will be sufficient to prove to any objective student that Tukhachevsky and the commanders convicted and executed with him were guilty beyond doubt. They all confessed their guilt and gave detailed, and interestingly differentiated, confessions.

⁶ For links see the footnote in Chapter Four.

Trotsky in the Tukhachevsky Trial Transcript

Our specific interest in this article is the trial transcript and the additional evidence it contains that Leon Trotsky did indeed collaborate and conspire with the Germans and Japanese against the Soviet government. I have discussed much important evidence of Trotsky's collaboration with the fascists in my 2017 book Leon Trotsky's Collaboration with Germany and Japan: Trotsky's Conspiracies of the 1930s, Volume Two. Since that book was published, much additional evidence of Trotsky's Nazi and Japanese collaboration has come to light. Other chapters in the present study examine some of this extensive evidence.

Numbers in parentheses in this chapter are to the pages of the 172-page Russian-language transcript of the trial of Tukhachevsky et al. of June 11, 1937. I have translated into English only those passages from the transcript that concern Trotsky specifically.

A translation of the whole transcript is beyond the scope of this specific study. I do not think it would add much to the discussion of Trotsky's fascist collaboration. Objective students will understand that the testimony of the accused in this trial, coupled with the vast amount of evidence from other sources that confirms it, cannot have been faked in any way by "Stalin," i.e. the Soviet government.

Denial of the Evidence

In the case of Tukhachevsky, and in the case of Leon Trotsky, there is a great deal of outright denial. Some people, primarily anticommunists and Trotskyists, will insist that all this evidence must have been faked and "planted" by the Stalin regime, on the grounds that "Stalin was evil, so he must have been falsely accusing these people and Trotsky too," and/or "Trotsky was a true, principled revolutionary who would never have done the terrible things the defendants accuse him of." Such persons are not interested in the truth and will not be more convinced by a translation of the complete transcript than by the selections I provide here.

Indeed, no conceivable evidence would convince them. To such persons, evidence is irrelevant; all that counts is "faith" and "political correctness." This is the "argument from incredulity," a well-known and flagrant logical fallacy which, however, is ubiquitous among anticommunists, including well-known scholars, and among Trotskyists. It is common because it is essential to the retention of what I call the "Anti-Stalin Paradigm: — a false historical framework that can only be maintained through denial, prevarication, and fallacious reasoning.

Thematic Approach

The analysis below focuses on the most important themes concerning Trotsky's activities that are to be found in the Tukhachevsky Affair trial transcript. I have chosen to study the trial transcript here rather than the Tukhachevsky investigation file in part because of its inherent interest.

An additional and important consideration is the nature of the circumstances in which these defendants gave their testimony. These men knew that this trial was their last chance to assert that they had been falsely accused, "framed," tortured or threatened into making false confessions. If they had really been innocent, they surely would have made this known in some way at this trial.

It is futile to claim that persons accused of capital crimes and who, moreover, have confessed their guilt during interrogations, would restate their guilt in the strongest terms at trial and in their last words to the court — and yet be innocent victims of a frame-up. This is, of course, what the proponents of what I have called the Anti-Stalin Paradigm, anticommunists and Trotskyists, will in fact claim.

But they will do so in defiance of all reason and logic. Confessions of guilt may, under certain circumstances, be wrung by force or threat from innocent persons. But confessions of guilt themselves can never be evidence of innocence.

A claim of innocence is not conclusive evidence of innocence, since we expect that, in most cases, both the innocent and the guilty will progress their innocence. But these defendants did not claim that they were innocent. On the contrary: they admitted their guilt in the firmest and most convincing terms. Under these circumstances, their confessions at trial must be considered to be the strongest possible evidence of their guilt.

Defeatism and Fear of Defeat

We have a great deal of evidence from other sources that Trotsky was pushing for the defeat of the USSR in war against Germany, Poland, Japan, or a combination of these powers. Trotsky's advocacy of defeat and defeatism is mentioned by at least five of the defendants:

Iakir:

Tukhachevsky first, more or less definitively, told me the current weakness of our abilities, the unity of the fascist activities of Germany and Japan with Poland, were leading to a situation when we needed to destroy the existing order, and he told me then and there that he had contact with Trotsky and with the German General Staff. In either my first talk with Tukhachevsky or the second, but in one of those talks Tukhachevsky, without going into details, told me that Trotsky had set forth the essential assignment of strengthening the work of the counterrevolutionary and anti-Soviet elements in the army, and that he, Tukhachevsky, took upon himself the assignment of organizing and uniting these anti-Soviet and counterrevolutionary elements. Further, Tukhachevsky laid out for me Trotsky's directive, agreed upon with the German General Staff and detailed to some extent by himself personally. (11)

Tukhachevsky:

In accordance with Trotsky's instructions that it was necessary to establish contact with the German General Staff, in London in 1936 I had a talk with General Rundstedt of the German General Staff. He told me that he knew I was leading a conspiracy and that he had instructions to talk with me. I said that the conspiracy indeed existed and that it was led by me. I asked Rundstedt where the main forces of the German army would attack, and I referred to Trotsky's directive that we should organize defeat where the German army would be in action. (47)

Kork:

... the Red Army would suffer such losses that would permit the Right-Trotskyists to come to power and take power out of the hands of the Stalin government. (86)

Fel'dman:

I must return to Trotsky's directives. Later, when from Trotsky's first directives, about which Mikhail Nikolaevich [Tukhachevsky] informed me, he went on to discuss the preparation for the defeat of the Red Army, he said to me that he was doing this according to a new directive from Trotsky, adding that all means are good in the struggle to achieve our aims, in the struggle against Soviet power. (142)

When contact with Trotsky had been set up through Putna, who had been transferred to London, there began talks about defeatism ... (146)

Trotsky's Collaboration with the German General Staff

Iakir:

Tukhachevsky laid out for me Trotsky's directive, agreed upon with the German General Staff and detailed to some extent by himself personally. (7)

Fel'dman:

When contact with Trotsky had been set up through Putna, who had been transferred to London, there began talks about defeatism, and methods of terror and espionage appeared — all this in order to overthrow Soviet power and guarantee Trotsky's coming to power. Trotsky did not have real forces numbering in the thousands besides those that you see here and therefore whatever Trotsky dictated to us, the German General Staff was dictating. That's the way I see it and that's the way we should put it. (156)

Uborevich:

The trial has freed me from the nightmares of conspiracy and the diabolical directives of Tukhachevsky, — that is to say, of Trotsky, and the German General Staff. (155)

Putna:

Many people know that I was a different person, and for me now there is no other solace except that I was once a different person. And now, in a very short time, in my own internal feelings, I have returned to my former self. I believe that in a sick organism, one that is decaying, struck down as though by poisonous gases, in an organism rotted by Trotsky, who led me into service to the German General Staff ... (163)

Trotsky and the "Palace Coup" or Coup d'État

Iakir:

... Trotsky's directive ... came down to the following. The first point of the program laid out by Trotsky was a coup d'état, prepared by the "Muscovites," the participants in the counterrevolutionary anti-Soviet

Right-Trotskyist organization, who had succeeded in feeling out and entering into contact with a number of Kremlin-based Chekists and with the immediate military guard of the Kremlin in the person of the chief of the Kremlin military school Egorov. (7)

Fel'dman:

There were talks, as I have explained, about a palace coup. When contact with Trotsky had been set up through Putna, who had been transferred to London, there began talks about defeatism, and methods of terror and espionage appeared — all this in order to overthrow Soviet power and guarantee Trotsky's coming to power. (146)

IUrii Piatakov, Trotsky's Representative in the USSR

Iakir:

The next assignment Tukhachevsky told me about was that he would maintain direct relations with Trotsky and with the German General Staff. With the first, through Piatakov, and with the second through Putna. (11-12)

In particular, Tukhachevsky told me twice that he had received information from Piatakov and spoke about his talks with the Rights, with Enukidze, and about one talk with Bukharin. (13)

Tukhachevsky:

I mentioned Primakov. He told me that he was in contact with Piatakov, who was the leader of the Trotskyist center in Moscow. After that I got into personal contact with Piatakov.

Ul'rikh: Personal contact?

Tukhachevsky: Yes. Then in 1934-35 Piatakov told me of the plan of determined aggression by the German army, which would be linked with the loss by the USSR of Ukraine and the Primor'ye. He confirmed Trotsky's directive of 1934 that was set forth in a letter from Sedov and in oral form by Putna. Trotsky then gave me the assignment of activating the work as much as possible. Finally Putna arranged a meeting for me with Sedov in 1936. (46)

Bliukher: Through whom, and how, were the talks concerning concessions to German fascism of the Ukraine and of Primor'ye to Japan?

Tukhachevsky: It was Piatakov who told me, so really it was Trotsky, through Piatakov, but it was Piatakov who personally told me this. (66)

Primakov:

In 1936 I spoke with Fel'dman, and, when I arrived in Leningrad, with Gar'kavy, and then retained my Trotskyist contact with Piatakov, with whom I met in the spring.

Chairman: Did you systematically maintain contact with the leadership of the military center and the parallel Trotskyist center?

Primakov: Basically I maintained contact with Piatakov. (129)

[I asked] Tukhachevsky several times about his contacts with civilian counterrevolutionary organizations. Only in 1933 or the beginning of 1934 did he tell me that he was in contact with Piatakov.

Contact with Piatakov helped carry out sabotage in the area of artillery armament from the viewpoint of lowering our orders. (138)

Break Ties, Cut Off All Contact with Other Trotskyists

Iakir:

Despite the fact that Tukhachevsky repeatedly spoke to me about the necessity of the very greatest secrecy (Trotsky was repeatedly telling him this, saying that the military conspiracy and its participants must not in any case be connected with other ways and lines [of the conspiracy]), contact took place all the same. (13)

Tukhachevsky:

I mentioned Primakov. He told me that he was in contact with Piatakov, who was the leader of the Trotskyist center in Moscow. After that I got into personal contact with Piatakov.

Ul'rikh: Personal contact?

Tukhachevsky: Yes. Then in 1934-35 Piatakov told me of the plan of determined aggression by the German army, which would be linked with the loss by the USSR of Ukraine and the Primor'ye. He confirmed Trotsky's directive of 1934 that was set forth in a letter from Sedov and in oral form by Putna. Trotsky then gave me the assignment of activating the work as much as possible. Finally Putna arranged a meeting for me with Sedov in 1936. (46)

Bliukher: Through whom, and how, were the talks concerning concessions to German fascism of the Ukraine and of Primor'ye to Japan?

Tukhachevsky: It was Piatakov who told me, so really it was Trotsky, through Piatakov, but it was Piatakov who personally told me this. (66)

Primakov:

In 1936 I spoke with Fel'dman, and, when I arrived in Leningrad, with Gar'kavy, and then retained my Trotskyist contact with Piatakov, with whom I met in the spring.

Chairman: Did you systematically maintain contact with the leadership of the military center and the parallel Trotskyist center?

Primakov: Basically I maintained contact with Piatakov. (129)

[I asked] Tukhachevsky several times about his contacts with civilian counterrevolutionary organizations. Only in 1933 or the beginning of 1934 did he tell me that he was in contact with Piatakov.

Contact with Piatakov helped carry out sabotage in the area of artillery armament from the viewpoint of lowering our orders. (138)

Break Ties, Cut of All Contact with Other Trotskyists

Iakir:

Despite the fact that Tukhachevsky repeatedly spoke to me about the necessity of the very greatest secrecy (Trotsky was repeatedly telling him this, saying that the military conspiracy and its participants must not in any case be connected with other way and lines [of the conspiracy]), contact took place all the same. (13)

Tukhachevsky:

I regard my entry into the organization as of 1932. ... By the way, I always and at every occasion have spoken out against Trotsky during discussions, just as I have against the Rights. (37)

Primakov:

In 1934 I received the directive from Piatakov to break ties with the Dreitser group and with the old Trotskyists (125)

Tukhachevsky added that Trotsky's directive stated that the work of the military organization must be led extremely independently, not by any means to be in contact with the anti-Soviet groupings that exist in our country among civilian organizations. (137)

Unity of the Rights and Trotskyists

Uborevich:

... [Tukhachevsky] began by showing the inevitability of our defeat in war against Japan, Germany, and Poland, and our internal difficulty. He began to tell me that he was heading an organization, that he had contact with the Rights and Trotskyists. (73)

Kork:

In 1931, when I began my talk with Tukhachevsky, he explained the situation like this: we must unquestionably go with Rykov. It was not expedient at that time to defend Trotsky since he had lost authority in the country [the USSR]. But soon thereafter, in 1932, Trotsky was mentioned more and more often. And then in 1933, when the fascist coup took place in Germany, among those leaders under whose flag we were supposed to go were Rykov, Bukharin, and Trotsky. Later Tukhachevsky began to state, not by hinting but openly, that in the end the political group that would come out on top was hard to predict, whether Rykov or Trotsky, ... (92)

... I was shot through with doubts and gave in to the vile slander of the Rights and the even viler activities of the Trotskyists, when the Rights and Trotskyists fused into one whole and plotted the most criminal acts that can come into a person's head. (157)

Primakov:

Tukhachevsky also said that there was also contact with the Rights. To my doubtful question — how with the Rights? From where? I knew that Trotsky was leading the conspiracy. Tukhachevsky answered that now the separation between the Rights and Trotskyists has been wiped away, and since this is useful for our general business, why not have contact with the Rights also? (138)

Trotsky's Collaboration with the Japanese

Iakir:

... in one of the letters of Trotsky to Tukhachevsky Trotsky had pressed us to develop work in the Far East with the goal of contact with the Japanese for carrying out joint activity of the Germans. (27)

Fel'dman:

Speaking of Trotskyist cadres in the Far Eastern Region, there were many of them, but I did not know any members of the conspiracy. (147)

Tukhachevsky:

... the road of the group, that put me on the road of foul Right opportunism and of three-times cursed Trotskyism, that led to contact with German fascism and the Japanese general staff ... (154)

Romm: the Contact between Trotsky and Tukhachevsky

Tukhachevsky:

... when in 1932 Romm brought me Trotsky's proposal to gather together the Trotskyist cadres, I agreed. (37)

Then in 1932 Romm was sent from Trotsky. This was approximately in August or September.

Chairman: What did he say to you?

Tukhachevsky: Romm gave me, in Trotsky's name, the assignment of organizing and bringing together the Trotskyist cadre in the army. (37)

Trotsky Relied on Hitler's Coming to Power

Tukhachevsky:

Later, in 1933-34 ... Romm gave me an instruction of Trotsky's that we should evaluate Hitler's coming to power as a favorable factor and we needed to take every measure to strengthen fascist power in Germany.

I should add that already in 1932 Romm had told me that Trotsky was counting on Hitler's coming to power and was sure that Hitler would support him, Trotsky, thanks to which we could count upon the overthrow of Soviet power. Then in 1933-34 Romm confirmed to me that fascism supported Trotsky ... (37-38)

Primakov:

When in 1933-34 Hitler came to power, we were given an official directive to stress our coolness towards the Germans at banquets. Tukhachevsky told me that on Trotsky's directive, it was essential to let the Germans know that his attitude towards the Reichswehr remained just as good as earlier. (138)

Trotsky's Son Leon Sedov

Tukhachevsky:

[Piatakov] confirmed Trotsky's directive of 1934 that was set forth in a letter from Sedov and in oral form by Putna. Trotsky then gave me the assignment of activating the work as much as possible. Finally Putna arranged a meeting for me with Sedov in 1936. (46)

Putna:

After the first discussions with generals Adam and Schleifer, when I reported to Sedov what I had achieved, I received a second directive from Trotsky via Sedov that this first success was not enough ... (109)

On my way to London I met with Sedov ... Through Sedov I received parallel instructions from Trotsky, which came down to this: I should resurrect my German contacts ... (112)

Ul'rikh: Did you organize a meeting with Sedov?

Putna: Yes, at the request of Tukhachevsky I organized a meeting with Sedov. (115)

I.N. Smirnov, Leader of the Trotskyist Conspirators in the USSR

Putna:

... I stated that in 1931 in Berlin Ivan Nikitich Smirnov, in a talk with me in the embassy building, told me that in order to show the Germans serious decisiveness of the Trotskyists towards collaborating with them, we needed negotiations with them. (108)

Question: From whom did you have the authority to conduct talks with the German command?

Putna: From the Trotskyist organization.

Ul'rikh: In the person of whom?

Putna: I received it as a directive from Trotsky, through Sedov and Smirnov. (109)

Trotsky Agreed to Give Ukraine to Germany⁷, the Primor'ie to Japan

Tukhachevsky:

I mentioned Primakov. He told me that he was in contact with Piatakov, who was the leader of the Trotskyist center in Moscow. After that I got into personal contact with Piatakov.

Ul'rikh: Personal contact?

Tukhachevsky: Yes. Then in 1934-35 Piatakov told me of the plan of determined aggression by the German army, which would be linked with the loss by the USSR of Ukraine and the Primor'ie. (46)

Bliukher: Through whom, and how, were the talks concerning concessions to German fascism of the Ukraine and of Primor'ie to Japan?

Tukhachevsky: It was Piatakov who told me, so really it was Trotsky, through Piatakov, but it was Piatakov who personally told me this.
(66)

⁷ "Primor'e" refers to the Amur-Sakhalin region with its large petroleum deposits.

Putna:

After the first discussions with generals Adam and Schleifer, when I reported to Sedov what I had achieved, I received a second directive from Trotsky via Sedov ... Along with this it was proposed that I specify what we promised generally in the way of compensation.

Chairman: Who is "we"?

Putna: The Trotskyist organization. The Trotskyist organization promises, first, territorial compensation ...

Chairman: What did you promise in exchange for help?

Putna: The territory of the Ukraine. (109)

Trotsky and the German General Staff

Tukhachevsky:

In accordance with Trotsky's instructions that it was necessary to establish contact with the German General Staff, in London in 1936 I had a talk with General Rundstedt of the German General Staff. [See under subhead "Defeatism & Fear of Defeat", above.]

Kork:

Ul'rikh: You confessed that during 6-7 years you carried out sabotage, counterrevolutionary work. One thing I don't understand is: Who was the boss? You mentioned the Trotskyist center, the center of the Rights, you have mentioned German circles. But who in fact was the boss, who gave the basic directives up to the present time: Rykov, Trotsky, or German military circles?

Kork: Under the circumstances that have been created most recently, the boss is the German General Staff.

Ul'rikh: That means that your main boss was the German General Staff?

Kork: Yes.

Ul'rikh: The German General Staff — that is a concise answer. (101)

Putna:

At Trotsky's direction I conducted such negotiations with general Schleifer and Adam, who had established contact with us through Hoffmeister. (108-109)

Ul'rikh: With whom personally of the representatives of the German command did you carry on negotiations?

Putna: With major Hoffmeister, General Schleicher, and General Adam. (111)

In 1935, when I returned to London from the USSR, Tukhachevsky informed me about the successes in the Kiev and Belorussian military districts concerning the strengthening of aviation and of tank formations and gave me instructions to pass this information however I could to the German General Staff. On my way to London I met with Sedov ...

Ul'rikh: I did not understand — did you carry out your instructions and then return?

Putna: No, before carrying out my instructions. Sedov gave me similar instructions from Trotsky.

Ul'rikh: You had instructions to pass information. Did you meet Sedov and give information to him?

Putna: I tried to pass them to the German General Staff. (112)

Tukhachevsky:

I wish to draw a conclusion for myself from this vile work that has been done. I wish to draw the conclusion that under the conditions of the victory of socialism in our country every grouping becomes an anti-Soviet group and every anti-Soviet group becomes one with the vilest Trotskyism, with the vilest current of the Rights. And since there is no base for these forces within our country, then whether they wish it or not, these groups slide further, into contact with fascism, into contact with the German General Staff. (153)

Trotsky Advocated the Restoration of Capitalism

Tukhachevsky:

... since there is no base for these forces within our country, then whether they wish it or not, these groups slide further, into contact with fascism, into contact with the German General Staff. This is the downfall of this counterrevolutionary work that was in its essence directed towards the re-establishment of capitalism in our country. (153)

Primakov:

... whom did the fascist flag of Trotsky join together? It joined together all the counterrevolutionary elements that we had. All of them, from the rags of the old officers' groups, to the Trotskyist group, with its vile terrorist directives, with its practice of struggle against the Party, though the remains of the Zinovievists, everything that was counterrevolutionary in the Red Army — all were gathered into one place, under one flag, under the fascist flag in the hands of Trotsky.

What means did this conspiracy choose that are unequaled in history? All means, from the blackest betrayal, from treason, from the preparation of the defeat of one's own country through sabotage, through espionage, through terror, directed against the brain and heart of our country. These are the means that the conspiracy chose. For what goal? For the restoration of capitalism. (165)

Uborevich:

Chairman: For whose benefit was all this done, for what state, for which classes did you carry out your anti-Soviet struggle?

Uborevich: For the purpose of restoring capitalism. (77)

Trotsky urged Sabotage and Terror

Primakov:

Contact with Piatakov helped carry out sabotage in the area of artillery armament from the viewpoint of lowering our orders. (138)

What means did this conspiracy choose that are unequaled in history? All means, from the blackest betrayal, from treason, from the preparation of the defeat of one's own country through sabotage, through espionage, through terror, directed against the brain and heart of our country. (165)

Fel'dman:

When contact with Trotsky had been set up through Putna, who had been transferred to London, there began talks about defeatism, and methods of terror and espionage appeared — all this in order to overthrow Soviet power and guarantee Trotsky's coming to power. (146)

Tukhachevsky told me in 1936 that in carrying out Trotsky's directive about having recourse to terror, and in particular in relation to Voroshilov, he gave such a directive to Primakov in 1936. (142)

Tukhachevsky:

Then in 1933-34 Romm confirmed to me that fascism supported Trotsky, and therefore the latter demanded the activation of our work, especially in the area of organizing sabotage and terrorist activity in the army. (46)

Putna:

Ul'rikh: How, then, did the Germans consider that the Trotskyist organization ought to show its strengths? In what way?

Putna: This we thought would be activities of a sabotage and terrorist nature. (142)

Trotsky Plotted an Armed Uprising within the USSR

Primakov:

Chairman [Ul'rikh]: Specifically, do you confirm your confessions about the preparation of a terrorist act by Trotskyist activists?

Primakov: I did not give any such confessions. I confessed about the preparation of an armed uprising. (123)

Primakov: I had the following basic instruction: Until 1934 I worked for the most part, as an organizer, in gathering Trotskyist cadre. In 1934 I received the instruction from Piatakov to break off ties with the group of Dreitser and old Trotskyists, who were assigned to prepare terrorist acts, and I myself was to prepare, in the military district where I worked, to foment an armed uprising that would be called forth either by a terrorist act or by military action. This was the assignment I was given. The military Trotskyist organizational center considered this assignment to be very important and its importance was stressed to me. I was told to break any personal acquaintance with old Trotskyists, with whom I was in contact. (125-126)

Primakov: I was instructed to seize Leningrad for the Trotskyists.

Ul'rikh: But if Germany had made war on the USSR, for whom would you have seized Leningrad?

Primakov: For Germany. (132)

Fel'dman:

I remember that we talked in more detail on the eve of the trip to Germany (Tukhachevsky was the head of the delegation.) We spoke about overthrowing Soviet power by means of an armed uprising and if this was not successful in peacetime, then to hope for problems at the front that might lead to armed demonstrations inside the country. Our method of work would be supporting Trotskyist cadres, support for those commanders who had earlier belonged to the Trotskyist or Zinovievist opposition, from among whom it would be easier to recruit people; ... (136)

Trotsky, an Agent of Fascism

Tukhachevsky:

... in 1933-34 Romm confirmed to me that fascism supported Trotsky ... (46)

Putna:

Ul'rikh: How did he [German captain Salzman] repay you for this information?

Putna: He did not repay me. I asked him, as an intermediary, to help me establish contact and to speak with Ribbentrop, because I had an assignment from Trotsky to establish contact with the Germans. (114)

Fel'dman

In this way, summing up, I must say that everything we did were actions that served the interests of the fascists and their agent Trotsky, whose will we were carrying out ...

Trotsky did not have real forces numbering in the thousands besides those that you see here and therefore whatever Trotsky dictated to us, the German General Staff was dictating. That's the way I see it and that's the way we should put it. (146)

Iakir:

I have already said that I had a long, good, honorable life before that moment when I fell into the abyss, fell into the hands of the enemy, fell into the hands of the vilest of vile enemies that progressive humanity has, into the hands of that murderer, that agent of German fascism, Trotsky. (152)

Eideman:

I can now say without hesitation that I accept this harsh verdict so that with the last bit, the last minutes of my life, the last hours of my life to cover with curses that vile enemy of the people, Trotsky, agent of German fascism, because of whom I too became an agent of German fascism. (161)

Primakov:

All of them, from the rags of the old officers' groups, to the Trotskyist group, with its vile terrorist directives, with its practice of struggle against the Party, through the remains of the Zinovievists, everything that was counterrevolutionary in the Red Army — all were gathered into one place, under one flag, under the fascist flag in the hands of Trotsky. (165)

The second group to which I belong is the Trotskyist group. ...the most cursed group in the conspiracy because it has travelled the most vile path, has the most vile school and has as its leader Trotsky, who demanded the fascist banner. (167)

Conclusion

The testimony of the Tukhachevsky Affair defendants is consistent with a great deal of other evidence which we now possess that Leon Trotsky did indeed conspire with Hitler's Germany and fascist Japan to encompass his return to power in the USSR through assassination — the common Russian term is "terror" — sabotage, a coup d'état against the Stalin leadership, and/or the organized defeat of the Red Army in a war against invading fascist powers coupled with an armed insurrection, evidently in Leningrad.

This testimony is consistent with the evidence we have collected and studied in the books Leon Trotsky's Collaboration with Germany and Japan (2017), Trotsky's 'Amalgams', and Trotsky's Lies.

It is also consistent with the testimony of the defendants in the three Moscow Trials. In Trotsky's 'Amalgams' and The Moscow Trials As Evidence we have shown that many of the fact-claims made by defendants in their testimony at the Moscow Trials can be checked against other evidence. We also showed that in a few cases Moscow Trials defendants testified falsely, but in order to conceal crimes they had committed that the prosecution did not discover. Thus we concluded that the Moscow Trials testimony, far from having been "fabricated" by the prosecution, is valid evidence.

Trotsky denied the accusations that he had collaborated with fascist German and Japanese leaders. But Trotsky would have denied the accusations whether he were guilty of them or not. So his denials mean nothing — they are not evidence.

In addition, we know that Trotsky lied. Unquestionably, he did so in order to conceal his conspiracies. Trotsky denied that a "bloc" of Rights and Trotskyists existed. Yet in 1980 Pierre Broué, the most famous Trotskyist historian of his day, discovered documents in the Harvard Trotsky Archive that prove that such a bloc existed and that Trotsky had approved it. Trotsky swore that he had cut off all ties to those who "capitulated" to Stalin, yet American historian Arch Getty discovered evidence in the same archive that Trotsky did in fact contact some of these men. Getty also discovered that the Harvard Trotsky Archive had been "purged," undoubtedly of incriminating materials. We refer the interested reader to our detailed study of these matters in Trotsky's 'Amalgams' and Trotsky's Lies.

We have good non-Soviet evidence that military conspiracies did threaten the Soviet leadership. American researcher Alvin D. Coox revealed that NKVD General Genrikh S. Liushkov, who defected to the Japanese in June, 1938, privately told his Japanese military handlers that there was indeed a conspiracy among the military leaders in the Soviet Far Eastern Army.⁸ Such a conspiracy is alluded to in the Tukhachevsky trial transcripts and in Tukhachevsky's own confessions.

We have the Arao document, and the confession of Nikolai Ustrialov, both of which implicate Tukhachevsky in conspiracy with the Japanese.⁹ Ustrialov's confession ties the Soviet-based Trotskyists to this collaboration as well. All these matters are thoroughly examined in Trotsky's 'Amalgams' and The Moscow Trials as Evidence. We have the large amount of testimony in PiLT2 that we explore in other chapters of the present book.

We know that in early 1937 Hitler's regime was expecting a military coup against the Stalin government. On page seventeen of his book Mission to Moscow (1940) Joseph E. Davies noted that he was warned of such an event by a German official in 1937.¹⁰

We have the Mastny-Benes note of February, 1937, from the Czech national archives, in which Czech diplomat Mastny informs the Czech president that a German diplomat had told him that Hitler was no longer interested in an agreement with Czechoslovakia, since he expected a military coup in the USSR shortly.¹¹ We know that, in 1944, Heinrich Himmler asked Russian defector General Andrei Vlasov why Tukhachevsky's conspiracy had failed.¹²

⁸ For a fuller discussion, see Furr, The Murder of Sergei Kirov, Chapter 17. See also Trotsky's 'Amalgams', Chapter 7, and The Moscow Trials as Evidence, Chapter 7.

⁹ For the Arao Document see Furr, Moscow Trials, Chapter 10; Furr, Amalgams, Chapter 10; Stalin. Waiting For ... the Truth, Chapter 9. For Ustrialov's confession, see Furr, Amalgams, Chapter 11, and Furr, Trotsky's Lies, Chapter 11.

¹⁰ Quoted in Stalin. Waiting ..., 153-4.

¹¹ See Furr, Amalgams, Chapter 7, and Moscow Trials, Chapter 7.

¹² See the quotations by Himmler, Vlasov, and Goebbels in Grover Furr, "New Light On Old Stories About Marshal Tukhachevskii: Some Documents Reconsidered." Russian history/Histoire Russe 13, nos. 2-3 (Summer-Fall, 1986), 303. This article can be retrieved in facsimile at <https://msuweb.montclair.edu/~furr/tukhpdf.pdf> and in html format at <https://msuweb.montclair.edu/~furr/tukh.html>

Conclusion

President Putin's Remarks about the Start of World War II

On December 20, 2019, Russian President Vladimir Putin gave a talk to representatives of the Commonwealth of Independent States (CIS). In that talk he refuted the often-repeated falsehood that the Soviet Union shared with Hitler's Germany the responsibility for starting World War II.¹

¹ The Russian text of Putin's talk is at <https://rg.ru/2019/12/20/stenogramma-vystupleniia-vladimira-putina-na-neformalnom-sammite-sng.html> The English version is at <http://en.kremlin.ru/events/president/transcripts/62376>

Putin cited more than thirty primary source documents. None of them are secret. All of them have long been known to specialists in the history of this period. These documents show that it was Poland and the Western imperialist countries that made the war inevitable by catering to Hitler and by rejecting all the Soviet Union's honest attempts to build collective security against Hitler.

Responses from Polish and Western sources were quick in coming.² In The Atlantic, anticommunist commentator Anne Applebaum called it "Putin's Big Lie."³ But what Putin said is not a lie: it is the truth. None of these responses confronted, or even mentioned, the primary source evidence that Putin cited. The reason is clear: the documents do indeed prove the guilt of the governments of Poland, the U.K., France, and even the USA, in mollifying Hitler and refusing collective security.

² The response of the Polish Ministry of Foreign Affairs: <https://www.gov.pl/web/dyplomacja/stanowisko-msz-rp-wobec-falszywych-narracji-historycznych-prezentowanych-przez-federacje-rosyjska> The English translation: <https://www.gov.pl/web/diplomacy/statement-of-polish-mfa-on-false-narratives-presented-by-the-russian-federation>

³ At <https://www.theatlantic.com/ideas/archive/2020/01/putin-blames-poland-world-war-ii/604426>

Instead of dealing forthrightly with the evidence the Polish and Western responses called his remarks "Stalinist propaganda." This is true — Putin's remarks echoed the position of the Soviet government of the late 1930s and the post-war period.

In the dishonest world of anticommunist propaganda, to term a statement "Stalinist" means that it does not need to be refuted. Any statement called "Stalinist" is assumed to be false, even when it is true.

Anyone who reads the text of Putin's remarks would notice this trick. But few people will do so. Many more will read the dishonest attacks by the Polish government and anticommunist writers.

The Academic History of the Stalin Period is Dishonest

The mass media do not deal with research. They must publish too quickly. Writers for the mass media rely upon legitimated authorities such as academic experts. Writers of popular and semi-popular works, and authors of textbooks for use in schools and colleges, rely on academic historians too.

The media and the public assume that academic authorities base what they write and say upon evidence. But in the field of Soviet history of the Stalin period, this assumption is not valid. Certain fundamental falsehoods about Soviet history of this period cannot be questioned, regardless of the evidence. To question, much less refute, them is forbidden. Evidence that contradicts this taboo is ignored, while false evidence is invented. This is how the Anti-Stalin Paradigm works.

The conclusions to be drawn from the primary source evidence are as firmly establish as they are unacceptable — unacceptable to "mainstream" anticommunist scholarship and to Trotskyists, and thereby, unacceptable in public discourse. Briefly, the conclusions are as follows:

- The defendants in the three Moscow Trials of August, 1936, January, 1937, and March, 1938, were provably guilty of at least those crimes to which they admitted guilt.
- The "Tukhachevsky Affair" commanders arrested in May, 1937, tried and executed in June, 1937, did indeed conspire to join forces with Nazi Germany to seize control over the USSR.
- Leon Trotsky was indeed provably guilty of plotting to murder Sergei Kirov, Stalin, and other Soviet leaders; of conspiring with the German General Staff and the Nazi leadership to overthrow the Soviet government and Party leadership, either by a coup d'état or by aiding a German and/or Japanese invasion; and of conspiring with German agents, Russian fascists, Ukrainian nationalists, plus his own followers, to sabotage various economic enterprises in the USSR in order to weaken Soviet defense.

These are the same charges that were leveled by the Stalin government against Trotsky during the 1930s. They are the same as those that were summarized very well in the famous book by Michael Sayers and Albert E. Kahn, The Great Conspiracy. The Secret War Against Soviet Russia, first published in 1946, translated into dozens of languages and republished until Khrushchev's "Secret Speech."

What If Trotsky Had Succeeded?

Counterfactual history, also sometimes referred to as virtual history, is a form of historiography that attempts to answer "what if" questions known as counterfactuals. Black and MacRaid provide this definition: "It is, at the very root, the idea of conjecturing on what did not happen, or what might have happened, in order to understand what did happen." (Wikipedia)⁴

The Wikipedia entry continues:

One goal is to estimate the relative importance of a specific event, incident or person.

Below I briefly outline two aspects of counterfactual history. They help to clarify the issues at stake in any objective, truthful study of Soviet history of the Stalin period.

- What would the world have looked like if Trotsky's conspiracies had in fact succeeded?
- What would world history look like if historians recognized the truth and rewrote their histories accordingly?

⁴ At https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Counterfactual_history (accessed January 25, 2020)

If Trotsky's Conspiracies Had Succeeded

Trotsky's goal was to take control of the Soviet Union. This goal dictated the nature of his conspiracies, including his cooperation with the fascist powers.

If Trotsky and his allies, the fascist powers, had overthrown the Stalin and the Soviet leadership, and seized control over the Soviet Union, there would have been many drastic changes. We will cite only this one: Hitler, Mussolini, and the Japanese fascist militarists, the Axis powers, would have been immeasurably stronger.

- Hitler and, in the East, the Japanese would have had the immense natural and human resources of the USSR to use in their wars against the Western imperialist powers, especially the U.K., France, and the United States.
- The Western imperialist powers might well have chosen to compromise with Hitler and the Japanese, rather than risk an all-out war against a very much stronger fascist enemy. After all, Britain and France were eager to go to war against the USSR in early 1940, in alliance with pro-German Finland, than they were to send their armies against Hitler.

Either scenario would have left fascism secure and in control of a great part of the world. Much, if not most, of the world would resemble Francisco

Franco's Spain — a murderous, viciously exploitative police state, maintained by fascist terror against everyone who opposed fascist aims.

The antiracist and anti-imperialist struggles for national liberation from imperialism would have been dealt a tremendous blow. The consequences for the fates of hundreds of millions of non-white people in the world can hardly be overestimated.

Hitler's stated goal in "General Plan East" was to murder most of the Slavic peoples — tens of millions — and keep the rest for cheap labor. The Nazis and their fascist allies like the Vichy French and Ukrainian nationalists killed almost half the world's Jews. Had Hitler prevailed, that number would have been 90 percent or more.

All around the world, the labor movement would have suffered much more intense repression. In a world much of which was directly ruled by fascists, while the rulers of the rest of the world temporized and collaborated with the fascists, the standard of living of working people would have fallen drastically, while their mortality would have skyrocketed.

Human progress would have suffered an enormous setback in every area of life. A great many persons alive today would never have been born at all. Most other people would be suffering far more exploitation and oppression.

Trotsky, his supporters, and his co-conspirators like Tukhachevsky, Bukharin and Rykov, now at the mercy of their "allies" the German, Japanese, British, and French ruling classes, would never have been successful in retaining power in a weakened, shrunken USSR. Tukhachevsky saw himself as the eventual "Napoleon." At the Third Moscow Trial of April, 1938, Bukharin admitted that he and his fellow conspirators had no reason to believe that Hitler would remain faithful to any deal they made with him.

If Historians Recognized that Trotsky and the Moscow Trials Defendants Were Guilty

The Soviet Union was able to defeat the fascist invasion because the chain of conspiracies, with Trotsky at the center and with the fascists providing the military might, while the Western imperialists facilitated both, was smashed by the Stalin regime. The Soviet Union — "Stalin" — saved the world from fascism not just once, by defeating the Nazi juggernaut, but twice: the first time, by smashing the Trotskyist-Nazi-fascist-capitalist conspiracies to turn the Soviet Union into Hitler's ally. Understanding of this fact was widespread after World War II, when The Great Conspiracy became a worldwide best-seller.

The Effects of Khrushchev's Lies

The force that overthrew this understanding of history did not come from anticommunist historians, but from within. Nikita Khrushchev's infamous "Secret Speech" to the XX Congress of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union began the process of denying the truth about the anti-Soviet conspiracies and Trotsky's role in them.⁵ Khrushchev accelerated his attack on the truth at the XXII Party Congress in 1961.

⁵ For the evidence that Khrushchev's "Secret Speech" was virtually nothing but lies see Furr, Khrushchev Lied.

The lies of Khrushchev and his historical propagandists were avidly taken up by anticommunist historians around the world. Millions of communists, workers, students, and other anti-capitalist forces and potential pro-communist activists also believed Khrushchev. They would never have believed any overtly capitalist propaganda, no matter how "scholarly" it appeared. But they accepted the word of Khrushchev, leader of the Soviet Communist Party and the world communist movement.

Inspired by Khrushchev's slander of Stalin, anticommunist propagandists got to work. But their lies would never have been so widely accepted, if Khrushchev had not loosed an army of pseudo-scholars, phony historians, to add false details to his attack on Stalin.

Within a few years Khrushchev's propagandists had accused Stalin of dozens of crimes and atrocities. Some, such as the "Katyn Massacre," were real atrocities that had been committed by others — in the case of Katyn, by the German invaders and their Ukrainian nationalist allies. Others, like the great famine of 1932-33, were natural events that were falsely blamed on "Stalin's" — the Soviet government's — policies.

None of these accusations were supported by primary source evidence. In 1962 Petr Pospelov, one of Khrushchev's top officials, told a convention of historians that they would not be permitted to go to the Party archives to search for evidence, but had to rely on the statements of top Party officials.⁶ Today, with the partial opening of former Soviet archives, we know why Pospelov did this. No evidence for the accusations against Stalin exists! On the contrary: all the evidence shows that Khrushchev and his men were lying.

Within a decade of Khrushchev's speech the Moscow Trials defendants were widely believed to have been innocent. Many people started to consider Trotsky a lone, courageous voice for true communism against the monster Stalin. This remains the historical orthodoxy to this day.

⁶ See Politbiuro member Petr Pospelov's remarks to Party historians in Vsesoiuznoe soveshchanie o merakh uluchshenia podgotovki nauchno-pedagogicheskikh kadrov po istoricheskim naukam. 18-21 dekabria 1962 g. M: Izdatel'stvo "Nauka", 1964, 298, quoted in English translation in Furr, Collaboration, 8.

Leon Trotsky's Guilt

Though he never admitted it, Khrushchev copied some of his flagrant lies about Stalin from Trotsky's writing. Anticommunist writers chose to believe Trotsky's lies, just as they chose to believe the lies of Khrushchevites.

In 1956, Trotskyism was a tiny movement with little influence. Khrushchev's "Secret Speech" and subsequent avalanche of lies about Stalin changed that. To some people Trotsky now appeared to be the "prophet" that British historian and Trotsky admirer Isaac Deutscher had called him. Anticommunist writers now accepted — believed — Trotsky's version of events, just as they "believed" the lies of Khrushchev and his men. For anticommunists and Trotskyists, this torrent of filth that the "communist" leaders were pouring over their own heritage was too good not to make full use of.

Trotskyist groups soared in membership, as they claimed to be the "good" communists. But they paid a price. Trotskyism became parasitical on overtly anticommunist scholarship. Trotskyists constructed a "cult of personality" around their hero. For them, Trotsky's writings became the source of all political wisdom.

Today, with the flood of primary source documents coming out of former Soviet archives, we have the evidence to prove that Trotsky lied, flagrantly and frequently. As this and my previous books have demonstrated, we also have the evidence to prove that Trotsky was involved in serious conspiracies of sabotage, assassination, and fascist collaboration.

The Trotskyist movement had wedded itself to the professional anticommunist "scholars" more firmly than ever. Trotskyist writers cite these scholars frequently, in defense of their own or Trotsky's assertions. It is clearer than ever that Trotskyism functions as the "left wing" of conventional, pro-capitalist anticommunism.

Regardless of the evidence, Trotskyists — at least the leadership of Trotskyist groups — are never going to admit the truth. In this too they resemble the professional anticommunist "scholars."

Not a "Political Line" But the Truth

Anticommunists and Trotskyists will reject the research in this book, but not because of any fault in that research. They will reject it because they cannot honestly confront the evidence, and the conclusions that follow from it. They are not interested in the truth. Rather, they are promoting a political "line" — the Anti-Stalin Paradigm.

People who push a political "line" instead of the truth tend to assume that everyone is acting in the same dishonest manner and is promoting their political "line." So they will call this book "pro-Stalin," "Stalinist," etc. as though I too am pushing some political "line."

But they are wrong. I am not promoting any political line or position. I am interested in the truth. I strive for objectivity as much as any scientist. I try hard to question by own biases and prejudices (everybody has them) and to give an especially generous reading to any evidence that tends to cast doubt on those prejudices or that tends to disprove the hypotheses I have chosen to test in my research.

For many years I have been diligently searching for evidence of crimes that Stalin committed. I have searched for them in the only legitimate way — by identifying, locating, obtaining, and studying primary source evidence, and then by drawing logical conclusions from that evidence. Likewise, I have given Trotsky every benefit of the doubt in my research.

No one asks what Sherlock Holmes' politics are. We just want him to solve the mystery! In the same way, my own political proclivities are irrelevant. Nevertheless, the results of my research in this book, as in my other works, will be rejected by those who are unable or unwilling to consider the possibility that their own preconceived ideas are mistaken.

To all other readers — the vast majority — I submit this research, and the conclusions based upon it. I welcome your comments and especially your criticisms. My email is easy to find on the Internet.

Grover Furr

February, 2020

Appendix: Documents

Sokol'nikov Transcript of Interrogation of October 20, 1936

Transcript of Interrogation of Sokol'nikov Grigorii Iakovlevich, of October 20, 1936

Sokol'nikov G.Ia. born 1888, born in city of Romny (former Poltava oblast'), until arrest the Vice-Commissar of the Forest Industry, former Candidate Member of the CC VKP(b) and former member of the VKP(b) since 1905.

Question: In the transcript of your interrogation of October 4, 1936 you stated that you established contact with Baldwin. Through the English journalist Talbot you told him about the existence and plans of the bloc and asked Baldwin to give support to the government of the bloc after its coming to power.

Did you inform Talbot of the composition of the government that the bloc intended to form after its accession to power?

Answer: When I met with Talbot in 1934 he asked me to tell him the composition of the government planned by the bloc. I answered him that the bloc had not yet determined the full composition of the government as we considered this premature.

However, as concerns the basic group of persons who would enter the government, there was complete unanimity.

In this basic group would be included: Rykov, Kamenev, Zinoviev, Bukharin, Piatakov and I — Sokol'nikov.

Talbot asked what distribution of functions was planned for the members of the government group. I answered that no final and firm distribution of functions could be determined at the present moment, but for all of us it was without question that Rykov would be proposed as Chairman of the Council of People's Commissars (Sovnarkom), Kamenev — Chairman of the Council and Defense, and possibly also People's Commissar of Foreign Affairs, Piatakov — People's Commissar of Heavy Industry, I — Sokol'nikov — People's Commissar of Finance.

To Talbot's question about who was planned as head of the Party leadership I answered that by general agreement of all the groups in the bloc Trotsky would be at the head of the Party leadership. Here I cautioned Talbot that it was possible that Trotsky would not be put at the head of the Party leadership immediately after the coup since he was politically compromised in the eyes of the broad masses. However, as soon as the situation had become strong enough, Trotsky would be at the head of the Party leadership.

Question: Did you tell Talbot how the bloc intended to effect the coup and seize power in the USSR?

Answer: Talbot himself asked me this question. I understood that he wanted to clarify the extent to which the bloc was a real power.

I explained to Talbot that the bloc represented a serious political factor since it was the result of a political agreement between the Trotskyists, the Zinovievists, and the Rights, and thus it united all the oppositional forces. Thanks to this unity the bloc had very broad contacts in the country.

To Talbot's question about what plan for seizing power the bloc had, I told him that I could not tell him these kinds of details. However, I told Talbot that the bloc was relying on the forces of its supporters in the country, on the one hand, and on the other hand was counting on the possibility of disorganization and weakness of the Party leadership.

I did not consider it possible to inform Talbot about the bloc's plans more concretely.

Question: What did you tell Talbot about the program of activity of the government of the bloc?

Answer: In my previous confession I have already said that I informed Talbot about the bloc's program, consisting in the rejection of the currently policy of industrialization and collectivization. I explained that this meant permitting capitalist elements in the country's economy alongside the socialist elements. I stressed to Talbot that since the current government has completely liquidated the capitalist elements in the country, the government of the bloc would be forced to carry out its measures gradually at first, developing its program more broadly as it becomes strong in the country.

/ 326 /

I told Talbot that it was essential to warn Baldwin about this so that during this first period there should be no misunderstanding abroad of the program of the bloc and, as a result of this, a hostile attitude towards the government of the bloc.

Question: What concretely did you tell Talbot about the further relations between the government of the bloc and the English government?

Answer: Talbot asked me how the coming to power in the USSR of the government of the bloc would affect Anglo-Soviet relations. I answered that the foreign policy of the bloc would unquestionably permit the removal of the friction that now exists between the English and Soviet governments by means of important concessions that would go far to meet the demands of conservative English circles in the areas of economic and political relations.

I said that large orders would be given to English industry, that together with this the government of the bloc would agree to grant broad concessions to English capital in the USSR. I brought to Talbot's attention the positive attitude of Trotsky, Kamenev, and Rykov to the broad development of concessions in the USSR — these have long been well known. Then Talbot asked me whether I could tell him something about the possibility of recognizing the prerevolutionary debts. I told him that on this question the government of the bloc would also be ready to make significant concessions and to make proposals acceptable to the English government.

I also told him that on the question of the Comintern the government of the bloc would be ready to give all the necessary guarantees that it would completely refuse any help to the Comintern.

Summing up our talk Talbot said that he considered the question of the debts to be very important and I again reaffirmed to him the readiness of the government of the bloc to make serious concessions on this question.

On this point my talk with Talbot of the end of the summer of 1934 ended.

Question: Did you return again to these questions during your meeting with Talbot in the summer of 1935?

Answer: As I have already confessed in the transcript of my previous interrogation, when I met with Talbot in 1935 our talk consisted, in the main, of his giving me Baldwin's answer. Talbot told me that through Boothby, a Conservative Member of Parliament who was very close to Baldwin, he had transmitted to Baldwin Talbot's talk with me in all its details. Both Boothby and Baldwin tasked Talbot to inform me that he would guarantee friendly relations with the government of the bloc from the side of the governing conservative circles and expressed satisfaction with the course of internal and external policies that would be carried out by the government of the bloc.

At that same time Talbot told me that Baldwin considered it quite possible to guarantee the government of the bloc a loan and credits from England under the condition that the government of the bloc carried out the political and economic program that had been indicated.

As I have already confessed, Talbot and I agreed to maintain contact during Talbot's trips to the USSR. But after this talk Talbot did not contact me any more.

Question: You say that you did not meet with Talbot any more. Did you try to contact him?

Answer: I made no attempt to contact Talbot since I expected that Talbot would come to the USSR in the spring or summer of 1936. He had expressed such a proposal during our talks.

Written down accurately from my words, read through by me. (Signed: Sokol'nikov)

Interrogator: Ass't Chief of the EKO* of the GUGB of the NKVD of the USSR Major of State Security (Signed: Chertok)

RGASPI, F. 17. Op. 171. D. 246. L. 151-158. Copy. Typewritten.

Handwritten note on the first page: Distribute to the members of the CC VKP(b) J. Stalin

* Economic Division  Main Directorate of State Security

Note: Talbot is probably Stafford Talbot, former editor of the British-Russian Gazette and Trade Outlook. Boothby is probably Robert Boothby, later Baron Boothby, Baldwin is Stanley Baldwin, British Prime Minister.

Piatakov Statement to Ezhov December 19-20, 1936

[[cyrillic]]. (Russian State Archive of Socio-Political History, fond 17, opis 171, delo 263, pages 43-76. This archive is in Moscow). Page numbers here marked // //

[[cyrillic]]. (Central Archive of the Federal Security Service. R-33835 (Case No. 3257 concerning the accusation against Piatakov, Iurii Leonidovich and others. This archive is also in Moscow.)

[[cyrillic]] (Volume 1, list of the file (= LD) 237)

//43//

To the People's Commissar of Internal Affairs of the U.S.S.R.

Com. N.I. Ezhov

My previous confessions in the course of interrogations about our criminal counter-revolutionary activity were fragmentary and incomplete. It is hard to pile all the filth upon oneself at one time.

I have considered the entire course of my own and my co-participants' struggle against the party and the soviet state and I have decided that I must finally and as completely as possible tell the whole truth about our treasonous work which can only be called betrayal of our country. I was one of the leaders of that vase and detestable work that we actively carried out during the last 4-5 years against the party and the working class.

I have only one wish now — to tell everything I know as fully as possible.

Therefore please permit me to return in this statement to a few substantive incidents in our counter-revolutionary activity that I touched upon earlier, so that I may tell about them more systematically and specifically.

1 / Resumption of contact with Trotsky and renewal of my criminal work

My active Trotskyist work began again in 1931.

LD 238

I have already confessed about my frame of mind before 1931 and will not return to this.

In 1931 I happened to be in Berlin for purposes of my work. At that same time I.N. Smirnov also arrived in Berlin for work during that summer. I.N. Smirnov visited me at my room in Berlin and told me that he had a meeting with Trotsky's son L. Sedov and that Sedov had communicated to him a series of very serious directives of Trotsky's. //44//

Sedov briefly informed me about "Trotsky's new orders," as he put it. In particular he told me that Trotsky thinks that the main task is the overthrow of Stalin and his closest associates by any means possible, and also the active opposition to all practical undertaking of the government, especially in the economic sphere.

Trotsky considers that the reconstruction on this basis of the Trotskyist-Zinovievist organization in the U.S.S.R. and the unification in one form or another of all force that can help to overthrow the "Stalinist regime" is the most essential task.

At the same time I.N. Smirnov uttered a phrase whose meaning became clear to me only much later: "Lev Davidovich believes that one of the basic causes of our previous defeat is that in our struggle we remained within the limits of the state alone and did not seek help from outside it."

The renewed struggle will inevitably pose international questions and we will decide these questions in the manner that is favorable to us."

LD 239

This Smirnov informed me that Sedov had been assigned by Trotsky to meet and talk with me and that he would bring the two of us together if I did not object. Smirnov himself urged me to meet with Sedov.

I agreed. Smirnov said that Sedov would first contact me by telephone. Soon after that Sedov did in fact phone me. Our phone conversation was quite short; we agreed on a meeting place. That same day I went to the "Café am Zoo" (where we had agreed to meet) and there I found Sedov, whom I had known very well before.

Sedov immediately told me that he was speaking to me not on his own //45// account but on behalf of his father L.D. Trotsky. When Trotsky found out that I was in Berlin he had given him the most strict instruction to meet with me at any cost and give me his, Trotsky's, instructions.

Sedov proceeded to expound what he had been instructed to say. Of course I cannot repeated word for word what he said, but I give the essence precisely.

"The struggle against Stalin is being renewed with new force. It must be understood that Trotsky had not abandoned this struggle for an instant. A temporary lull had been unavoidable, caused by Trotsky's geographical movements. Now the period of lull had ended. Contacts are being renewed. Within the country a new center was being formed, with which he, Trotsky, was already in contact. A bloc with the Zinovievists was being considered."

"Trotsky considers it essential to form a unified organization, regardless of his concerns about Zinoviev and Kamenev, who will undoubtedly attempt to occupy the leading role in this bloc. This danger of course cannot be excluded if Trotsky's supporters play only an observer's role instead of the active work that the present situation demands."

LD 240

"Trotsky knows that the Rights — Bukharin, Tomsy, and Rykov, had also not laid down their weapons, and have only been silent. They have cadre, contacts, whole groups, sometimes very militant ones. It is not a problem that we had sharp disagreements only recently. These disagreements are nothing in comparison with our common anti-Stalin policy. Indeed it was on the eve of the bloc with Zinoviev-Kamenev that we had very sharp battles with the "Leningradists," with whom soon afterwards we //46// went shoulder to shoulder against Stalin."

"As far as he, Trotsky, was aware, there were also other elements who were dissatisfied with the Stalin regime. We must draw them to us. We must understand that a very sharp struggle is beginning, not a discussion and not an exchange over principles, but a struggle for power. Therefore we must mobilize directly or indirectly all those forces that can collaborate in resolving the basic, the root task of the day — the task of overthrowing Stalin whatever it takes and at no matter what cost."

"We must discard old prejudices. Today's policy is: 'Everything that is against Stalin is for us and must be mobilized.'"

"Trotsky demands and is convinced that I, Piatakov, will not decline active participation in this struggle."

"He knows your tendency to bury yourself in the practical business of the moment. This is completely impermissible now. This intolerable passivity must end — you understand that it is not I, but Lev Davidovich, who demands it."

LD 241

I answered that I understood Trotsky's demand and was ready to carry out his directive."

Sedov expressed his great happiness and declared with feeling:

"Lev Davidovich has always had confidence in you. He has not doubted for a second that, if we act decisively and do not hesitate at extraordinary methods of struggle, then our success is assured."

After that Sedov went on to outline what he called "the new methods of struggle."

Trotsky rules out any possibility at the present stage of any mass //47// anti-Stalin movement. Stalin has succeeded in surviving the difficulties and we must frankly admit that we have missed the time.

"If we waste time now we will definitely lose all our cadre, and that will be the death of us.

For that reason now at the cornerstone [of our work — GF] should be laid the following:

1) the terrorist struggle of tacitly conspiratorial groups against the main leaders of the party and government; 2) active opposition against all the practical work of the party and government; and 3) the discrediting in every possible way of Stalin's undertakings, especially on the economic front.

In relation to this we must ruthlessly cast aside prejudices of any kind. At the same time it is most essential to establish contacts in the army as broadly as possible.

Just as Smirnov had done, Sedov again mentioned briefly one fundamental position of Trotsky's.

LD 242

"We cannot," Sedov transmitted Trotsky's views, "regard our struggle in an isolated manner. To keep our struggle in one country is just as absurd as Stalin's desire to build socialism in one country. Therefore we cannot swear off questions of relations between states and relations with capitalist states."

To fear these questions means to issue a certificate of one's own poverty."

At that time Sedov did not go into more detail about this question. It is possible that Trotsky specially instructed Sedov to only mention this but not to go into any details.

I charged Sedov to give to Trotsky my request to concretize his directives "about opposing practical work" and "discrediting all of Stalin's initiatives." I formed Sedov //48// that there were several Trotskyists in Berlin and that in case I departed Sedov could transmit these essential explanations of Trotsky's through one of the,. And I named them (besides I.N. Smirnov): Loginov, Shestov, Bitker, Moskalev.

We agreed not to meet any more since meetings with me were a very risky affair. Sedov agreed.

With this my first talk with Sedov ended.

About my meeting with Sedov and the directives of Trotsky that he gave me I told at various times the Trotskyists who were then in Berlin: Loginov, Shestov, and Bitker. Separately, as I have already confessed, I had a substantive discussion about this question with Smirnov.

LD 243

We both agreed then that upon his arrival in Moscow he would introduce all these directives of Trotsky's officially through the Trotskyist center.

And concerning me Smirnov then expressed the opinion that it was not worthwhile to draw me into the center which the Trotskyist-Zinovievist bloc would create.

"For we must have reserves," said Smirnov. Re-establish your contacts and guard them. They will come in handy. Later we shall see what we shall do with them."

At that time the question of a "reserve" and "parallel" center had not yet been raised and the idea about it had only begun to be formed in a foggy way.

Here I would like to lay out more fully my talks with Bitker, Loginov, and Shestov.

1/ To Bitker I told everything in detail. //49//

I had to consolidate Bitker behind me, since he in the past had been a person very close to Trotsky, was closely tied to me personally, and in the future could undoubtedly play an important role in the Trotskyist organization.

Bitker agreed fully with Trotsky's policies and he and I arranged to discuss the practical implementation of Trotsky's directives in Moscow.

2/ With Loginov, whom I had known very well for a long time, besides outlining Trotsky's policies (during which I did not say anything about the "international" affairs) I agreed with him about concrete steps to resurrect a Trotskyist organization in the Ukraine.

LD 244

First of all we outlined a center consisting of himself, Loginov, N. Golubenko, IA. Lifshits, and IU. Kotsiubinskii. Then we outlined the way of resurrecting the organization. We agreed that Trotsky's policies would be the basis and about these policies Loginov would tell Golubenko, Lifshits and Kotsiubinskii, that they would begin to make contacts, but that there was no need to tell all of them about Trotsky's policies. We would have to test people for a long time and only after that, having been fully tested, so that there would not be any surprises, make the corresponding Trotskyists aware of Trotsky's real views.

3/ To Shestov, whom I did not know personally but had heard that he was a reliable person, I told Trotsky's policies, although I knew that he already knew everything from I.N. Smirnov.

To Shestov I entrusted the resurrection of the organization in the Kuzbass. I brought to Shestov's attention that there was one of Trotsky's loyal men — N.I. Muralov — was there, that Vladimir Kossior was also there somewhere, and that he should, while observing the necessary caution, see who of the Trotskyists in Siberia could //50// be drawn into the organization. I told Shestov that the basic thrust of his work in the Kuzbass was sabotage, and that for this work he would have to attract not only Trotskyists but also persons of anti-Soviet orientation from the engineering and technical personnel.

Moreover I told Shestov that it was possible that Sedov would assign him to transmit something to me, and that in that case he should pass it all to me without delay.

Shestov promised to do this.

LD 245

Also in 1931 about 3 weeks after my first meeting with Sedov I.N Smirnov told me that, despite the fact that we had agreed not to meet, Sedov wanted me to meet with him again and that he, Sedov, would await me the following day at the same place and time.

The next day I went to the same café. This time our talk was brief. Sedov immediately raised the question of money. At first he said, "You understand, Yuri Leonidovich, that for this work we need money. Can you get money?" I answered that I had no possibility at that time. Then Sedov said that he had such possibilities but that it would be hard to do it without my help. He wanted me to give as many orders as possible to the firms "Demag" and "Borsig" and not to fuss over prices; he himself would arrange with the firms about these conditions. "Obviously you will have to pay too much, but the money will go for our work, since we have some kind of agreement with representatives of these firms." I did this.

How Sedov conducted these operations with the firms I do not know.

In conclusion, Sedov informed me that he had told Trotsky about our first talk, and while he did so alerted //51// Trotsky to my hesitation on the question of sabotage. "I am expecting a letter from my father. If I receive it before your departure I will immediately give it personally to you or, if more convenient for you, through one of the Trotskyists you named to me earlier."

I asked Sedov if an answer from Lev Davidovich came, to transmit it to me through Shestov.

I think that is everything about my meetings in Berlin in 1931.

LD 246

In the fall of 1931 I finished my duties in Berlin and returned to Moscow.

After my return to the U.S.S.R. I think in November, 1931, Shestov came to me at Vesenkha.⁷ He was returning from Berlin to the Kuzbass and had a letter from Sedov for me. How he had brought this letter I did not ask him. The letter was in a sealed envelope and on the envelope were only my initials: "IU. L."

⁷ The Supreme Soviet of the National Economy.

Shestov handed me the letter and said he had met with Sedov and was going to the Kuzbass. When I had unsealed the letter I was very surprised: I had expected a note from Sedov but it turned out to be a letter from Trotsky himself. The letter was written in German and marked "L.T." I know Trotsky's handwriting well and even without this mark I would have known that he had personally written it. The letter was not in code. (Trotsky and I had no code.)

In this letter Trotsky expressed his satisfaction that I had "discerned his insistence" — Dass Sie meinen Forderungen nachgefolgt haben⁸ — and formulated his position.

⁸ That you have followed my demands.

Trotsky wrote:

1/ The central task is not the resurrection of an organization //52// for the sake of organization, but its resurrection for the purpose of liquidating Stalin and his closest supporters (in the letter it was said "'S' und Konsorten mit allen Mitteln aus dem Weg rauemen)⁹ ...

⁹ To get 'S' and his men out of the way by any means.

2/ Positive collaboration with the regime is impermissible. It is essential to struggle against the regime, stopping at nothing, to discredit in every way measures undertaken by Stalin, and that means also to ruin the measures he has undertaken (in the first place along economic lines);

LD 247

3/ We must unconditionally strengthen the bloc with the Zinovievists, who fully shared his, Trotsky's, policy. We must establish contact with the Rights, and feel out and unify all anti-Stalin elements both inside and outside the party;

4/ We must take the coming war into account and occupy in relation to the war an unconditionally defeatist position, and by means of preliminary negotiations with governments of capitalist powers (also making use of the contradictions between them) guarantee for ourselves favorable relations in case of our coming to power as a result of the war.

About these directives of Trotsky's at various times I told Loginov, Kotsiubinskii, Golubenko, Drobnis, Norkin, Rataichak, Iulin, Bitker, and Boguslavskii.

I will tell about that separately.

In the middle of 1932 I was again in Berlin. This time Sedov, having found out through the firm "Demag" that I was in Berlin, contacted me himself, on his own initiative, and asked for a meeting, for the reason that it was very necessary. We arranged by telephone to meet "at the same place" — that is, in the "Café am Zoo."

Sedov asked me whether I had received Trotsky's letter through //53// Shestov. I answered that I had, but that this letter was unsatisfactory. Although Trotsky stated the questions very concretely, he had said nothing substantive about perspectives and goals. I asked him to pass this on to Trotsky and say that his supporters in the U.S.S.R. insistently demand an answer to the question about the perspectives and goals of the struggle. This was especially important because of the unusual nature of the means of struggle that Trotsky was setting into motion.

LD 248

Sedov promised to pass this on to Trotsky and, for his part, asked to give him information about the situation of the Trotskyist organization in the U.S.S.R.

I told him that Trotsky's directives were being put into effect, that in Moscow negotiations were taking place about the creation of a united Trotskyist-Zinovievist center and that terrorist groups were being formed.

"I know about that," said Sedov. "I regularly receive news about the work in Moscow. I need to know what is being done in other centers of the U.S.S.R."

I said that I did not have detailed information about the work of the Trotskyist center (Smirnov-Mratchkovskii) outside of Moscow, but that in carrying out Trotsky's directive we had formed a center of the Trotskyist organization in the Ukraine, which was in contact with me personally. This center already had peripheral groups and was setting about preparing terrorist acts. I also reported that work on the creation of a Western Siberian center had begun, where Muralov led the active work, and that Boguslavskii and Shestov led work there too. However, I proposed to strengthen this center and planned to transfer there, under one pretext or another, Drobnis, whom Trotsky knows very well and who is a very energetic, implacable Trotskyist. //54// Sedov reported that Trotsky was expressing the greatest degree of dissatisfaction because the work was going sluggishly and was not developing with the necessary speed. "We are losing time. And this is extremely harmful. It is necessary to force the development of the work. It is especially necessary to force the preparation of terrorist acts and actively develop measures of diversion, including acts of sabotage." "For you know Lev Davidovich — said Sedov — he is burning with impatience and is consistently demanding activity, especially in the direction of terror."

LD 249

Besides this, in this same conversation I raised the question of one of Trotsky's articles, about which I confessed on December 13.

The Formation of Counter-Revolutionary Trotskyist "Reserve" Center

At the end of 1932, after my last meeting with Sedov, I had a conversation with Kamenev.

On his own initiative Kamenev came to me at the Commissariat on some work-related pretext.

I understood that this arrival of Kamenev was the establishment of contact with me according to Trotsky's directive, although Kamenev did not mention this and did not make reference to I.N. Smirnov. But from the nature of our conversation it was clear that Kamenev knew about everything.

Kamenev informed me that the center had been formed and it consisted of him, Kamenev, Zinoviev, Mrachkovskii, and I.N. Smirnov. Trotsky's directives about terror and sabotage were the basis of the creation of the bloc.

The center had decided not to bring into its membership me, Sokol'nikov, Radek, and Serebriakov. They had discussed this question and decided to hold us "in reserve." //55//

LD 250

In the event the center failed we would be required to lead the work ahead. He said that the question had already been discussed with Sokol'nikov, Radek, and Serebriakov, and decided positively.

Kamenev further told me that the center had established contact with the Rights, (Bukharin, Rykov, Tomsy). "It would be good, — said Kamenev, — if you now had the necessary contact with Bukharin, with whom you have good relations."

Wishing to be clear about how far Kamenev would accept Trotsky's directives, I put the question to Kamenev: "How does the center conceive of the contact with the Rights? After all, only recently we had very sharp disagreements with them."

Kamenev answered me: "IU. L., when will you finally grow out of your schoolboy years and become a politician? Yesterday's disagreements cannot be an obstacle to our agreement today, if today we have a common goal. And this common goal is:

1/ the overthrow of Stalin and the liquidation of the Stalin regime;

2/ the rejection of the building of socialism in one country and, consequently, the appropriate change of economic policy. On these two points we reached agreement with the Rights very easily."

To my question what "change of economic policy" meant Kamenev, with his characteristic aplomb, answered: "Well, you know, we will concretize it when we are in power. Only one thing is clear: we will have to retreat, in order to weaken the internal situation and equalize the external."

"Yes, yes, Yuri Leonidovich, I know that you concern yourself little with questions of international politics. But inasmuch as you may possibly have to continue the business that we are now doing, it is necessary that we be informed." //56//

LD 251

"Keep in mind that, without the essential agreement with the governments of the capitalist powers against the Stalin government, we will not come to power. It is essential for us to secure a favorable attitude towards us, and that means we will have to make concessions to them. But about that we must have already in advance had confidential talks with the governments of these states, and that is happening now. Radek and Sokol'nikov will inform you in more detail."

In this way the "reserve center" was formed, which we later transformed into the "parallel" center, about which I will say more.

Somewhat later (as far as I recall it was at the beginning of 1933) I also met with Radek. At that time I explained that Radek knew about the decision of the Trotskyist-Zinovievist center concerning the creation of the "reserve center" consisting of me, Piatakov, Radek, Sokol'nikov, and Serebriakov.

At that time Radek told me that Mrachkovskii was dissatisfied with the great overrepresentation of Zinovievists in the center and posed the question of supplementing the center — it was a question of me, Radek and Serebriakov on one side, and Sokol'nikov on the other. He, Radek, also thought that we had to correct this matter in some way.

We, that is Radek and I, discussed this question and arrived at a different conclusion. Inasmuch as the decision about the "reserve center" had been taken, it was not worthwhile to disturb it. If we were to insist on a revision of the decision and on supplementing the center with us, that naturally would elicit reactions from the Zinovievists' side, and in the underground there might arise dangerous divisions and unnecessary arguments.

LD 252

Therefore thoughts of entering the center were set aside. All the more since from considerations of conspiracy a "reserve center" was expedient in case of the failure of the basic center. //57// And since in the "reserve center" the predominant influence was with the Trotskyists, the thought arose of turning this "reserve center" into a "parallel center."

We decided to consult Trotsky on these questions. Radek took it upon himself to communicate our question to Trotsky and did this, as far as I know, through Romm.

Trotsky responded.

According to Radek Trotsky's answer came down to this: we should not under any circumstances create a conflict with the Zinovievists, that the bloc with them was an extraordinarily important event in the whole struggle against Stalin, and that this bloc must be maintained at all costs.

However, Trotsky considered our proposal to be expedient and proposed that the "reserve center" should immediately set to work.

In this way the vague idea about a parallel center came down, in the main, to organization and preparation measures: to be more precise, to the creation of Trotskyist organizations where that was possible.

LD 253

In connection with this, and also for reasons of caution, the parallel center did not meet even once in its full membership.

Proceeding from these guidelines sanctioned by Trotsky I had, as I confessed earlier, a meeting with Serebriakov in Gagry at the end of 1933. During this meeting I established that Serebriakov knew about the "reserve //58// center" and its membership, and that he fully shared the thought of turning the "reserve center" into a parallel center. I informed Serebriakov in detail about Trotsky's policies, about which he was already partly aware. Serebriakov said that his contacts remained and he, in accordance with the common decision, would undertake to activate them.

About that time I also established a series of firm organizational contacts. Radek and Sokol'nikov had a series of contacts. In this manner by the beginning of 1934 there had been set up not only a parallel center but a parallel organization.

Of course this organization in its concrete forms was built on a basis of personal ties. In this way for example Radek's or Serebriakov's contacts were not transmitted to me, as I did not transmit my contacts to Radek or Serebriakov. We did this by mutual agreement.

In this way also contact between members of the "parallel center" was maintained by means of personal and very rare social get-togethers between them, and not by means of joint meetings. All the more, since the basic principal policies were given by Trotsky. it need not be said that all Trotsky's directives, whether or not any of us had large or small disagreements with one or another directive, were accepted by all of us to be carried out.

LD 254

During the first period after the arrest of the basic center we out of caution undertook no activity. From the beginning of 1935 we, that is the "parallel" center, began to work more actively, carrying out the decision of the basic center that had been taken by them in 1932 concerning the formation of the "reserve center."

Here I mean not that peripheral activity that we undertook earlier as I have already confessed, but //59// activity of the center itself. In this respect the substantive movements were:

1/ meetings of members of the center amongst themselves; 2/ attempts to convene a meeting of the center; 3/ Trotsky's directives.

During the first period of time we supposed it possible to limit ourselves to arranging a system of separate meetings of members of the center among themselves. Thus, I met during 1935 twice with Sokol'nikov, two or three times with Radek, also with Serebriakov. Moreover, I met with Tomsy who formally, though he was not a member of the center, but in essence it turned out that the center was put geother with participation of the Rights. I knew that Sokol'nikov was in contact with Radek and also met with Tomsy. It appears that there were meetings between Radek and Serebriakov (and with Bukharin, of the Rights).

The thought arose of convening a meeting of the center together with Tomsy in order to work out a common line of tactical actions.

This meeting, as I have already confessed, did not take place.

In view of this the sole and basic leading material were those directives that came from Trotsky.

It was these directives that were, I repeat, the only leading materials, because the center did not have any worked-out positions of its own.

LD 255

About Trotsky's directives of 1931-1932 I have already testified.

After that, right up until my personal meeting with Trotsky in December 1935, his directions (except for those that went to the basic Trotskyist-Zinovievist center) came through Radek. About these directives Radek told me in 1934, 1935 and the beginning of 1936. //60//

Trotsky's directives to the "parallel" center.

The line of contact with Trotsky was in Radek's hands. He would send written information to Trotsky and personally received directives from him. True, in December 1935 I had a personal meeting with Trotsky, but I will tell about that below.

It is hard for me to remember during which conversations with Radek the latter informed me about the corresponding directives of Trotsky's. I remember the essence of these directives, but I cannot precisely separate the reporting about these directives according to the separate conversations with Radek.

Concerning terror there were, strictly speaking, no further directives. There were only demands for the quickest carrying-out of directives given earlier. Trotsky expressed impatience about slowness and insufficient activity.

Further, there were repeated orders concerning the necessity of the active carrying-out of sabotage. Trotsky explained that it was necessary to educate people in implacable hatred towards everything that Stalin initiated. Since concerning this question both Radek and I had hesitations, and since in our talks with Trotskyists we often met with doubts and even more, with disapproval, then we decided to question Trotsky especially on the specific question.

LD 256

Radek sent such a question and at the beginning of 1936 the answer was received.

In this answer Trotsky stated the question very sharply: he who does not understand that practical opposition (as far as I can recall the word "sabotage" was not mentioned, but in essence, of course, the subject was precisely sabotage) to all //61// Stalin's undertakings is the essential and basic component of the whole struggle with Stalin in these new conditions, he does not understand the first thing about his, Trotsky's, politics.

He pointed out that this was not only a question of the quantity of the harm we caused, but of the education of cadre and of preparing them for a more serious clash, at the appropriate moment, with the "regime of Stalin."

On this question — wrote Trotsky — there must be now wavering. This is especially important in view of the fact that, as he was aware, the practical work of construction distracted, attracted, and drew many people to itself. This shows that people often do not see farther than their own nose, do not see tomorrow, live only by the interests of today, are under the pressures of today's situation. He, Trotsky, draws our attention to the fact that he views practical opposition to Stalin's undertakings not as one of the less important methods of struggle, which one could simply reject, but as the most essential component part of the whole struggle against the "Stalin regime."

On this question there must be neither wavering nor doubts.

Before this there were directives on the question of the impending war and of relations between states.

LD 257

These directives showed that those fragmentary instructions that had been transmitted to me in 1931 by Smirnov and Sedov and about which Kamenev spoke to me in 1932 had much greater meaning than I realized at that time.

Trotsky said that in the struggle with Stalin we can in no way ignore relations between governments. Once we understand that Stalin's scheme of building socialism in one //62// country is an empty and dangerous scheme, then we too in our struggle with Stalin must not slide to the position of "one country."

This struggle inevitably is interconnected with our relations with capitalist states. It would be stupid to think that it is possible to assume power without securing a benevolent attitude of the most important capitalist governments, especially of the most aggressive ones, such as the present governments of Germany and Japan. It is completely essential even now to have contact and agreements with these governments. He, Trotsky, has taken the necessary steps in this regard. He demanded from Radek and Sokol'nikov, who had the requisite possibilities, to put out feelers for the essential contact along these lines with the official representatives of these powers, and to support whatever he, Trotsky, was carrying out in practice.

In this connection, as I seem to remember, Radek told me about some kind of conversations of his with Germans (I cannot recall the names of these Germans), from whom it was clear that Trotsky had made some arrangements with the German government.

LD 258

Trotsky further wrote that we must not limit ourselves only to the German and Japanese. We must secure benevolent relations with other governments too (like the English and French), especially from the perspective of the possibility of extremely strong pressure from the German and Japanese quarters. //63// Of course we must take into account that in relation to this we must make concessions, both territorial and of an economic nature.

As regards the war, L. D. Trotsky spoke of this very explicitly. From his point of view, war is inevitable in the near future. In this war the defeat of the "Stalin government" was inevitable. He, Trotsky, considered it completely essential to take a markedly defeatist position in this war.

Defeat in war would mean the downfall of the Stalin regime and for this very reason Trotsky insisted upon the creation of cells in the army, in the broadening of contacts among the command staff. He proceeded from the position that defeat in war would create a favorable opportunity in the army as well for the return of himself, Trotsky, to power. He considers that the bloc's coming into power can certainly be hastened by the defeat of the U.S.S.R. in war.

Trotsky pointed out in this regard that especially, counting upon defeat in war, it was necessarily in advance to reach agreements with the appropriate bourgeois governments (I do not recall whether precisely only the governments of Germany and Japan were mentioned in this regard). It seemed to him that he would be able to reach agreements at the same time with opposing groups of bourgeois governments and maneuver upon their contradictions. Trotsky understood that we must not rely in a naked and open way upon agreement with Germany and Japan, and therefore he gave a plan of playing upon contradictions.

LD 259

If we add up all these directives it becomes completely obvious that this could be nothing else than yielding to the mercy of the victor, that is complete capitulation before advancing fascism in the supposition that these plans of Trotsky would be realized, of course. //64//

Besides this there were also directives about the Comintern. I did not remember them well and now recall them vaguely. I seem to remember that it was a question of a very "left" formulation against the united front in France. Unfortunately this part of Trotsky's directives did not stick in my memory.

All the directives about relations between governments were received from Trotsky during the period of 1934-1935. I have expounded them as they have remained in my memory from Radek's words.

I just say that these directives of Trotsky's produced in me a feeling of oppression. I felt the desire to meet with Trotsky and to clarify his views more precisely. I did not allow myself to think that he might be mistaken and believed that there was something that I was failing to take into account. And during my meetings with Radek both he and I expressed ourselves in the same sense, that it was completely essential to see Trotsky and that I had to find some opportunity or other for this.

As I recall, Radek especially emphasized the strange position that Trotsky took on international questions and said that it was necessary to somehow discuss these questions with Trotsky.

What's more, we both considered it impossible to take the responsibility upon ourselves and said that perhaps we should discuss these questions in meetings with the more prominent and trusted Trotskyists.

LD 260

In any case, we both considered a meeting with Trotsky by one of us to be completely essential.

That is why, as soon as the chance presented itself I, despite all its risks, willingly took advantage of it in order to meet with Trotsky and have a discussion with him.

Concerning my Personal Meeting with Trotsky

The situation was like this:

In December 1935 I had to urgently go //65// to Berlin on business.

There in our embassy I met with Dm. Bukhartsev, about whom I had known earlier from Radek that he, Bukhartsev, was in contact with Trotsky.

I assumed that Bukhartsev would help me to have a meeting with Trotsky.

However, from my conversation with Bukhartsev it became apparent that he had known earlier about my forthcoming arrival in Berlin (this was known at the embassy) and had informed Trotsky about it. The latter requested a personal meeting with me.

Thus although by agreement with Radek I myself had intended to meet with Trotsky, the latter, after Bukhartsev's communication about my arrival, anticipated my concrete steps in that direction and organized this meeting himself.

A few days after my talk with Bukhartsev an emissary from Trotsky arrived, with whom the same Bukhartsev put me in touch

LD 261

(I don't know the name of this emissary. If I am not mistaken his name is either Gustav or Heinrich), with a short note from Trotsky. In it there were just a few words that I could trust this person completely and the address on it was "Yu. L."

The note was not signed, but I know Trotsky's handwriting well enough.

This emissary took on himself all the technical problems in sending me to Norway and I did not involve myself in his activities.

On the following day early in the morning I took off with him in an airplane. With him he had an extra passport on which I traveled. We arrived at an airport near Oslo. From there we went by car to a place with houses, where I met with Trotsky in a private //66// apartment. The meeting lasted no more than two hours, and then together with this Heinrich (or Gustav) I returned to the airport and from there on the same day and in the same airplane I flew back to Berlin.

The talk with Trotsky began with my information about the situation in the U.S.S.R. and in the Trotskyist organization. Already in this part [of our talk] I had to listen to a whole series of indignant retorts about "cowardice," "conciliation," "failure to understand the essence of the questions," etc. They were caused by the fact that in my information I strove to tell Trotsky objectively what was happening in reality, because it seemed to me that insufficient and incomplete information had led him to certain incorrect deductions. However, as our further conversation showed, it was not a question of insufficient information.

Especially sharp replies were elicited by those parts of my information in which I expounded the undeniable, sizable successes of the U.S.S.R. in the matter of industrial construction and collective agriculture. We must not fail to take these facts into account, I said. We must not dismiss them, but accept them as the facts we should begin with. "You are exaggerating," "bureaucratic distractions," "you have always suffered from the inclination towards 'positive work' independently of the regime." "You are turning away from politics," etc. With these replies Trotsky would constantly interrupt my communication of information.

LD 262

Further, I told him that his directive about sabotage and diversion had for the most part not met with sympathy in Trotskyist circles and that I in particular, like Radek, did not understand it well enough, although for understandable reasons — inasmuch as the directive came from Trotsky — we were following it. Here Trotsky exploded in a whole torrent of the most vicious and scalding remarks. //67// He said that we were not able to tear ourselves from Stalin's umbilical cord, we were looking at things in a near-sighted manner, we were stuck by the psychosis of construction and could not see further than our own noses. We needed to remember that the question was not whether this or that factory would or would not be built, whether this or that collective farm would come to be, etc., but it was a question of the indoctrination of cadre of Trotskyists, even a small number of them, in hatred towards everything that was now being done in the U.S.S.R.

"I understand very well — said Trotsky, for example — that small groups of Trotskyists cannot at this moment substantively change the course of economic development. But that is, in fact, not necessary.

You recall the attitude of Marxists towards the development of capitalism in Russia. We all considered that a progressive fact. But the positions of Struve and Tugan-Baranovskii, called to the service of capitalism, are one thing, while the positions of Lenin and the revolutionary part of social-democracy, which were organizing the future gravedigger of capitalism, are another. We must be the gravediggers of the Stalin state.

LD 263

I will not deny that from the point of view of the country's development it is good that new factories are being built. But the task of Trotskyists does not consist in building factories, but in organizing forces against Stalin and his regime, whose collapse is inevitable. For this, cadre are needed. These cadre will inevitably degenerate if all they do is participate in positive work. That is the essence of my directive, and you cannot seem to understand it at all.

Unless we carry out this directive the degeneration of the Trotskyist cadre is inevitable, their assimilation by the Stalin //68// regime is inevitable, and that means our collapse together with the collapse of the state."

Trotsky also expressed the same extreme degree of dissatisfaction during my report about the terrorist acts that were under preparation. "These are all preparations, just preparations! You are not dealing with this question seriously enough. Remember that without a whole series of terrorist acts, which must be carried out as soon as possible, the Stalin government cannot be overthrown. For this is a question of a coup d'état. A mass uprising, he said, is one thing, for which, evidently, there is no basis now, and a coup d'état is something else."

"This is the difference, I note, that many do not understand. They are unaware that the methods of a coup d'état differ fundamentally from the methods of organizing a mass uprising. I stand now precisely on the position of a coup d'état and therefore, in the deciding of questions of tactics, I have rejected formulaic instructions, developed under other conditions, applied to other tasks. And you there in the U.S.S.R. are often throw off balance, find yourselves in thrall to a formula, a scheme, ideas, that were developed to apply to other conditions."

LD 264

After I finished my report I asked Trotsky how he assessed the situation and how he imagined future developments. "Is it possible that you do not understand? Strange, strange! It appears that I have given enough instructions. I don't see any basis to change anything at all in my policies.

Your information only confirms that I am right. And if it is necessary to draw my conclusions, then there is only one: we must sharpen the struggle even more, broaden it even more, we must literally stop at //69// nothing to overthrow Stalin, overthrow this regime. It is clear that if in the very near future we are not successful by one means or another in carrying out a coup d'état, then a prolonged period will set in, years of the monstrous existence of the Stalin state, supported by its economic successes, by new politically inexperienced young cadre, who will consider this regime natural, to be taken for granted."

I insisted on the necessity of a short exposition by him, Trotsky, of his views. Trotsky thought a bit and warned that 1) he could not, in such a short time (I had very little time at my disposal) fully set forth all of his ideas and 2) that not everything that he was going to say should be reported to his followers in the U.S.S.R. He mentioned once again the difference between the preparation of a coup d'état and a mass uprising and in this connection much of what he was about to say must not only not be made public (and therefore I should not be surprised that much of it will contradict what is said in his "Bulletins"), but also must not be made known to wider circles of his supporters in the U.S.S.R.

LD 265

From the rest of the exposition of our talk it is evident that, apparently, even to me, Trotsky did not state all the fundamental deductions he had made in proceeding from the viewpoint of the so-called "coup d'état."

"The root of the question comes down to the fact — said Trotsky — that socialism in one country cannot be built. All the efforts of the Stalin state (by the way, Trotsky avoids saying "U.S.S.R.," "Soviet Union," "the Soviet state," and says "the Stalin state") are doomed to collapse. This collapse is inevitable //70// unless we maneuver in time. The downfall of the Stalin state, if it occurs naturally, under the pressure of the unbearable economic burden of industrialization and collectivization, on the one hand, and military clash with a capitalism that is once again growing in strength, on the other hand, will inevitably bury us too, if we allow ourselves to become identified, even in the smallest way, with this state. The sharpest possible line of demarcation must be drawn between us and all those who are tied to Stalin and his state."

"However, we must do this not by means of public statements, propaganda, and explanations. Such statements at the present movement would not meet with sympathy from the masses. On the contrary, we would be compromised and destroyed before we could do anything at all. The organization cannot be built on this basis. That would mean to doom it in advance. For in fact the masses are under a psychosis of construction, which they falsely accept as the construction of socialism. To come out openly now against this construction means to doom our efforts."

LD 266

"We must look to tomorrow. The line of demarcation must be drawn, therefore, in secret struggle against the Stalin regime, so that at the appropriate time we can — when it is necessary — step forward openly and say that we are not this Stalin state, we have been waging struggle against it with all means available to us, including terror, diversion, and sabotage."

"In this — Trotsky returned several times to this theme — is the essence of my policy. That is why I have always and consistently, in the sharpest possible manner, rejected any positive //71// participation by my supporters in the U.S.S.R. in practical work, that is why I have always expressed dissatisfaction when it has been reported to me that you, nevertheless, continue to collaborate with the Stalin government. That is absolutely intolerable."

"That means the first and main thing is the implacable struggle with Stalin and his state. In this struggle we must employ everything, the sharpest methods of preparation for a coup d'état and, in the first place, terror, diversions, and sabotage. On this basis we must educate our cadre, and not on the basis of rotten conciliation and compromise, the tendencies to which I discern in my supporters who live in the Stalin state."

"It is especially important, stressed Trotsky, to have contacts in the Red Army. Military conflict with capitalist states is inevitable. I do not doubt that the result of such conflict will be unpleasant for the Stalin state. We must be prepared at this moment to take power into our hands." Of course, — emphasized Trotsky — we must understand that the seizure of power under these conditions means agreements with the corresponding capitalist states (for example with Germany, Japan, and others) on the basis of substantial concessions to them, including territorial concessions.

LD 267

Of course, to reach agreements with Germany alone would be risky, since without a corresponding English and French //72// counterweight Germany would put feet on the table and it would be very tough for us. Therefore in his practical steps he, Trotsky, is carrying out simultaneous preparatory work in different directions.

Concerning Germany, these matters are essentially settled:

He, Trotsky, had secured a favorable attitude of the German fascist government in case the bloc came to power.

Of course this favorable attitude was not due to any special sympathy towards the bloc but to real interests.

At the basis of the agreement lies an appeal to the German government to help the bloc come to power. On his part Trotsky promised in the event of coming to power to make very concrete concessions, stipulated in advance, to Germany.

According to Trotsky (I will not undertake to confess that he told me everything) he was obliged to make the following concessions:

1. To guarantee a generally favorable attitude towards the German government and the necessary collaboration with it in the most important questions of an international character.

LD 268

2. To agree to territorial concessions.

3. In the event that the "nationalist forces" of the Ukraine should want to separate from the U.S.S.R. — not to oppose this.

4. To permit German industrialists, in the form of concessions (or some other forms), to exploit enterprises in the U.S.S.R. which are essential as complements to German economy (iron ore, manganese, oil, gold, timber, etc., were meant). //73//

5. To create in the U.S.S.R. favorable conditions for the activities of German private enterprises.

In return the Germans would not object to the admission under certain conditions of concessions of English and French enterprises.

6. In time of war to develop extensive sabotage activities in enterprises of the war industry and at the front. These diversive activities are to be carried on under Trotsky's instructions, agreed upon with the German General Staff.

These principles of agreement, as Trotsky related, were finally elaborated and adopted during Trotsky's meeting with Hitler's deputy — Hess.

Furthermore Trotsky informed me that at the same time he had succeeded in establishing businesslike contacts with leading persons of Great Britain and France.

In just the same manner he had fully established contact with the Japanese government.

Trotsky also mentioned that the latest negotiations with the Germans were conducted in the presence of the English and the French.

In France the contact was with the "Comité de Forges" and with banking circles. In England, with some conservative circles.

"If, — said Trotsky, diversionist, sabotage, and terrorist activity attains such a scale that the Stalin leadership is disorganized before the military clash, so much the better, we will come to power and adjust our policy so that, utilizing our agreements with the capitalist states, we will severely reduce the economic stress within the country.

LD 269

"This means, it will be necessary to retreat. This must be firmly understood. Retreat to capitalism. How far and to what degree, it is difficult to say now — this can be made concrete only after we come into power."

"You see, — Trotsky continued — on this point about a retreat we have agreed with the Rights and my directive about the bloc with the Rights //74// was not just tactically necessary, but correct in principle, all the more since they have fully admitted the necessity of terrorist, diversionist, and sabotage means of struggle against Stalin."

"And I am aware that some of you have started to discuss the question of how far this unity might go."

"Let this be 'contact' at first — for we started in 1926 with contact with the Zinovievists and came to a unified organization (although with fractional subdivisions) — I think that in the future our unity will be closer. For me it is completely obvious that in the future government not only my supporters and the Zinovievists but the Rights will have to take a most active role."

In conclusion, Trotsky once again showered those of us who are working the "Stalin state" will a hail of reproaches for insufficient activity, empty talk, absence of concrete terrorist acts, etc. He stressed that the arrests of Zinoviev, Kamenev, et al. not only must not weaken the work, but on the contrary must — as he said — "increase your energy a hundredfold."

LD 270

"Remember, in this struggle all means are good and every ally is useful. Here we must not stand on ceremony and live by old memories."

I just add that among the individual persons mentioned in the course of this talk by Trotsky were: Radek, Sokol'nikov, Serebriakov, Muralov, Beloborodov, Rakovsky, Dudu Mdivani, V.M. Smirnov, Sapronov,

Bukharin, Rykov, Tomsy, Uglanov, Preobrazhensky, Putna, Primakov, Krestinsky. //75//

Concerning these persons there were the following conversations. About the first three there is nothing to say. About Muralov Trotsky expressed his satisfaction, that he was one of the few who had never yielded his position and was actively working.. With Beloborodov Trotsky firmly insisted we maintain close contact. About Rakovsky and Preobrazhensky he said that it was essential that we talk with them and spur them on to work.

About B. Mdivani he said that he knew he was developing the work in the Transcaucasus.

Concerning V. Smirnov and Saprnov Trotsky spoke with the highest degree of praise and expressed the thought that it was essential to arrange an escape for them, "because they are firm and determined people."

About Putna and Primakov Trotsky said that this was a very valuable contact and it must be strengthened and developed in every way.

Trotsky asked me to explain to what extent we could rely on Krestinsky.

With Bukharin, Rykov, and Tomsy he demanded that we not weaken our close organizational ties and regretted that Uglanov was not in Moscow because he was "distinguished by practicality and great organizational talents."

LD 271

With this my meeting with Trotsky ended.

Upon my arrival in Moscow I soon met with Radek and told him in detail about my talk with Trotsky. This was in January, 1936. About that time Radek received an answer from Trotsky that had evidently been written before my meeting with Trotsky. //76//

X X

X

I have tried to write down everything that I remember about the shameful and criminal activity of the Trotskyist parallel center. It is possible that not everything that I have laid out here is sufficiently clear.

Needless to say, if any questions occur to you concerning this declaration, I will give all the necessary explanations to the investigation.

Piatakov

<signature>

19-20 December 1936

Concerning the accusation against Gol'tsman E.S. Vol. 1

[ЦА ФСБ Р.-33833 Дело № 3257

по обвинению Гольцман. Э.С. Т. 1]

L.D. 116

Copy

31 July 1936

To: Chief, INO (= Foreign Division), GUGB (= Main Directorate of State Security)

Commissar of State Security, 2nd rank

TO COM. SLUTSKY

I urgently request that you report to me whether in Copenhagen in 1932 and told in 1936 there has existed/exists a hotel "Bristol."

I also request that you report to me at what distance from the train station the hotel "Bristol" is located.

Chief of the Secret Political Division of the GUGB

Commissar of State Security, 2nd rank

(G. MOLCHANOV)

L.D. 16a

TOP SECRET

To the Chief of the Secret Political Division of the NKVD Commissar of State Security 2nd rank com. Molchanov

In answer to your request of 31 July of this year I report:

According to the official references works / guides to the city Copenhagen / telephone directories in the Foreign Division of the GUGB NKVD no hotel
"Bristol" existed either in 1932 or exists in 1936.

However, in Copenhagen there is a small café "Bristol" above which is located the hotel "Grand Hotel Copenhagen." Since the "Grand Hotel" has a sign that is not very noticeable and the café "Bristol" has a sign in large gold letters on a black background many casual observers take the hotel
"Grand Hotel" as the "Bristol."

The café "Bristol" and the hotel "Grand Hotel" are located very close to the Copenhagen train station and existed in 1932 as they do today.

Yesterday we received a telegram from Copenhagen that confirms the accuracy of the above report.

Chief of the 3rd Section of the Foreign Division of the GUGB

Major of State Security / Sili /

<signature>

2 August 1936

No. 250728

L.D. 117

Transcript of Interrogation

GOL'TSMAN Edward Solomonovich

of August 1936

GOL'TSMAN, E.S., born 1882, place of birth Krasnovitsy / Poland /, former member of the VKP(b) since 1903, expelled in 1936 in connection with his arrest in the present case.

Question: In interrogations of July 5 and 25 of this year you confessed that your meeting with L. SEDOV in Copenhagen in 1932 took place in the hotel "Bristol." Do you recall precisely the name of the hotel in which you met with L. SEDOV in Copenhagen?

Answer: If my memory does not deceive me the name of the hotel in Copenhagen where I met with L. SEDOV in 1932 was "Bristol."

Question: Describe the circumstances in which your meeting with L. SEDOV took place.

Answer: As I confessed earlier, I left Berlin from the Stettin station by an evening train that has a direct connection to Copenhagen. The train arrives in Copenhagen at 8 or 9 a.m.

As SEDOV and I had arranged in advance in Berlin I went directly from the station to the hotel "Bristol."

This hotel is situated near the station, about a five-minute walk away. My meeting with SEDOV took place in the vestibule of the hotel, from which we went to the café situated on the first floor of this same hotel.

Now I remember precisely that at the entrance to the café there was a black sign on which in large gold letters it said "Bristol."

Question: Was this perhaps the name of the café, not of the hotel?

Answer: Perhaps, but I remember well the sign "Bristol" above the café, and this café is situated next to the vestibule of the hotel. I seem to recall also that on the other side of the café in a location on the first floor of the hotel there was a newspaper kiosk.

Question: How soon did you go to TROTSKY?

Answer: SEDOV and I spent about an hour in the café, had breakfast, and then called a taxi and went to TROTSKY. I do not remember the address of the building where I met with TROTSKY.

Written down accurately from my words, read through by me.

GOL'TSMAN

Chief of the first section of the Secret-Political Division of the GUGB

Major of State Security: <signature> / SHTEIN /

Interrogators:

Assistant Chief of the 7th section of the Secret Political Division of the GUGB

Chapter of State Security: <signature> / KOGAN /

Passages about Trotsky in the Transcript of the Tukhachevsky Trial

Source:

Стенограмма судебного заседания Специального Судебного Присутствия Верховного Суда. СССР от 11 июня 1937 года по делу Тухачевского м.н., Якира и.э. и др.

РГАСПИ Ф.17, Оп.171, Д.392 Л.1-172

<http://istmat.info/node/59108>

Transcript of the judicial hearing of the Special Judicial Session of the Supreme Court of the USSR in the case of Tukhachevsky, M.N., Iakir, I.E., etc.

RGASPI fond 17, opis, delo 392, listy 1-172.

Iakir:

7

In this way I approached the moment when after a very serious illness of the liver in 1934, Tukhachevsky first, more or less definitely, told me the current weakness of our abilities, the unity of the fascist activities of Germany and Japan with Poland, were leading to a situation when we needed to destroy the existing order, and he told me then and there that he had contact with Trotsky and with the German General Staff. In either my first talk with Tukhachevsky or the second, but in one of those talks Tukhachevsky, without going into details, told me that Trotsky had set forth the essential assignment of strengthening the work of the counterrevolutionary and anti-Soviet elements in the army, and that he, Tukhachevsky, took upon himself the assignment of organizing and uniting these anti-Soviet and counterrevolutionary elements. Further, Tukhachevsky laid out for me Trotsky's directive, agreed upon with the German General

Staff and detailed to some extent by himself personally. [It is not clear to whom or what this pronoun refers: to Tukhachevsky, to Trotsky, or to the German General Staff.] This directive came down to the following. The first point of the program laid out by Trotsky was a coup d'état, prepared by the "Muscovites," the participants in the counterrevolutionary anti-Soviet Right-Trotskyist organization, who had succeeded in feeling out and entering into contact with a number of Kremlin-based Chekists and with the immediate military guard of the Kremlin in the person of the chief of the Kremlin military school Egorov.

11

Iakir:

I had information and knew that Lifshits and his organization, and also Appoga and the military men he was in contact with, had worked out a plan for a whole series of traffic jams at intersecting and major stations that would cause delays for the troops when they were being concentrated at the border ...

This assignment was given to us, and the people of Lifshits's Trotskyist organization, and of Appoga's military contacts, were prepared for it.

The next assignment Tukhachevsky told me about was that he would maintain direct relations with Trotsky and with the German General Staff. With the first, through Piatakov, and with the second through Putna.

12

...

At our next talk Tukhachevsky told me that he had received from Trotsky a series of clarifications to his directive and his [Trotsky's] agreement with the measures planned by our anti-Soviet organization.

13.

Despite the fact that Tukhachevsky repeatedly spoke to me about the necessity of the very greatest secrecy (Trotsky was repeatedly telling him this, saying that the military conspiracy and its participants must not in any case be connected with other ways and lines [of the conspiracy]), contact took place all the same. True, it was episodic, rather unspecified, for the most part, about mutual information. In particular, Tukhachevsky told me twice that he had received information from Piatakov and spoke about his talks with the Rights, with Enukidze, and about one talk with Bukharin.

27.

Iakir:

I have told you about Tukhachevsky's directives about how [conspiratorial] work should be developed in the Far East. I said that during our talks about this we considered it essential to develop work in the Far East because in one of the letters of Trotsky to Tukhachevsky Trotsky had pressed us to develop work in the Far East with the goal of contact with the Japanese for carrying out joint activity of the Germans. This is very important.

31

Dybenko: Did you know that Gamarnik had been a Trotskyist since 1921?

37.

Tukhachevsky

I regard my entry into the organization as of 1932. ... By the way, I always and at every occasion have spoken out against Trotsky during discussions, just as I have against the Rights.

...

Finally, when in 1932 Romm brought me Trotsky's proposal to gather the Trotskyist cadres, I agreed. Therefore I consider the beginning of the organization of our military conspiracy to be 1932.

45

Tukhachevsky

Then in 1932 Romm was sent from Trotsky. This was approximately in August or September.

Chairman: What did he say to you?

Tukhachevsky: Romm gave me, in Trotsky's name, the assignment of organizing and bringing together the Trotskyist cadre in the army. Since I had already begun to do this, I agreed. I thought that it would be possible to attract a significant number of military commanders and to carry out Trotsky's directive. Later, in 1933-34 (I am not certain of the exact date) Romm gave me an instruction of Trotsky's that we should evaluate Hitler's coming to power as a favorable factor and we needed to take every measure to strengthen fascist power in Germany.

46

I should add that already in 1932 Romm had told me that Trotsky was counting on Hitler's coming to power and was sure that Hitler would support him, Trotsky, thanks to which we could count upon the overthrow of Soviet power. Then in 1933-34 Romm confirmed to me that fascism supported Trotsky, and therefore the latter demanded the activation of our work, especially in the area of organizing sabotage and terrorist activity in the army.

...

I mentioned Primakov. He told me that he was in contact with Piatakov, who was the leader of the Trotskyist center in Moscow. After that I got into personal contact with Piatakov.

Ul'rikh: Personal contact?

Tukhachevsky: Yes. Then in 1934 Piatakov told me of the plan of determined aggression by the German army, which would be linked with the loss by the USSR of Ukraine and the Primor'ye. He confirmed Trotsky's directive of 1934 that was set forth in a letter from Sedov and in oral form by Putna. Trotsky then gave me the assignment of activating the work as much as possible. Finally Putna arranged a meeting for me with Sedov in 1936.

47

In accordance with Trotsky's instruction that it was necessary to establish contact with the German General Staff, in London in 1936 I had a talk with General Rundstedt of the German General Staff. He told me that he knew I was leading a conspiracy and that he had instruction to talk with me. I said that the conspiracy indeed existed and that it was led by me. I asked Rundstedt where the main forces of the German army would attack, and I referred to Trotsky's directive that we should organize defeat where the German army would be in action. I also asked Rundstedt when we could expect this intervention. He said that he did not know where the main German forces would be, but he knew that we should organize defeat in the Ukraine. Concerning the beginning of the intervention Rundstedt told me that this was a question that was difficult to answer. It had been proposed to begin war in 1937, but the difficulties of forming the Reichswehr were too great to begin a German intervention in 1937. In the development of this assignment of Trotsky's and Rundstedt's after the war games in April 1936 an important discussion about planning the defeat took place between Iakir, Uborevich, and me.

66

Blyukher: Through whom, and how, were the talks concerning concessions to German fascism of the Ukraine and of Primor'ye to Japan?

Tukhachevsky: It was Piatakov who told me, so really it was Trotsky, through Piatakov, but it was Piatakov who personally told me this.

70

Dybenko: According to Kork's testimony it is obvious that the Trotskyist organization and the traitor Rykov were the ancillary organs in order to bring out the dictatorship of Tukhachevsky.

Tukhachevsky: No, I think the real relationship of forces was that our organization, our center, coordinated its activities with the organization of Rights and Trotskyists.

73

Uborevich: At the beginning of 1934 I did not have anti-Soviet ideas and, not know that Tukhachevsky was leading that kind of work, I spoke up against his harmful [sabotage] plan to organize brigades instead of infantry divisions in the army. I remember well that in March 1935 he, in essence, set before me his whole plan of political and military activities, his first variant. Then he began by showing the inevitability of our defeat in war against Japan, Germany, and Poland, and our internal difficulty. He began to tell me that he was heading an organization, that he had contact with the Rights and Trotskyists.

77

Chairman: For whose benefit was all this done, for what state, for which classes did you carry out your anti-Soviet struggle?

Uborevich: For the purpose of restoring capitalism.

81

Kork:

I personally was drawn into the counterrevolutionary Right-Trotskyist military organization in June, 1931. Enukidze recruited me to this organization. From Enukidze I received the assignment of contacting Tukhachevsky, Gorbachev, and Egorov...

86

... the Red Army would suffer such losses that would permit the Right-Trotskyists to come to power and take power out of the hands of the Stalin government.

92

Kork:

In 1931, when I began my talk with Tukhachevsky, he explained the situation like this: we must unquestionably go with Rykov. It was not expedient at that time to defend Trotsky since he had lost authority in the country [the USSR]. But soon thereafter, in 1932, Trotsky was mentioned more and more often. And then in 1933, when the fascist coup took place in Germany, among those leaders under whose flag we were supposed to go were Rykov, Bukharin, and Trotsky. Later Tukhachevsky began to state, not by hinting but openly, that in the end the political group that would come out on top was hard to predict, whether Rykov or Trotsky, and that we military men must consider ourselves not as playthings in the hands of the politicians, but must have the strong hand of the military man, and he began to lead the talks in the direction of Bonapartism.

101

Ul'rikh: You confessed that during 6-7 years you carried out sabotage, counterrevolutionary work. One thing I don't understand is: Who was the boss? You mentioned the Trotskyist center, the center of the Rights, you have mentioned German circles. But who in fact was the boss, who gave the basic directives up to the present time: Rykov, Trotsky, or German military circles?

Kork: Under the circumstances that have been created most recently, the boss is the German General Staff.

U'rikh: That means that your main boss was the German General Staff?

Kork: Yes.

Ul'rikh: The German General Staff — that is a concise answer.

108

Putna:

... I stated that in 1931 in Berlin Ivan Nikitich Smirnov, in a talk with me in the embassy building, told me that in order to show the Germans serious decisiveness of the Trotskyists towards collaborating with them, we needed negotiations with them.

At Trotsky's direction I conducted such negotiations with generals Schleifer and Adam, who had established contact with us through Hoffmeister. After the first discussions with generals Adam and Schleifer, when I reported to Sedov what I had achieved, I received a second directive from Trotsky via Sedov that this first success was not enough, that it was necessary to agree with Adam and Schleifer more precisely about the extent to which Germany itself would take steps against the Soviet Union. In addition it was essential to clarify what help Germany could render to the Trotskyist organization in the way of obtaining weapons, supplies, and technical means essential for arming Trotskyist cadres who were not in the army. Along with this it was proposed that I specify what we promised generally in the way of compensation.

109

Chairman: Who is "we"?

Putna: The Trotskyist organization. The Trotskyist organization promises, first, territorial compensation.

Chairman: In the name of what institution, country, or state?

Putna: In the name of the Trotskyist organization.

Chairman: Did they really have such great influence [lit. great weight]?

Putna: Judging from Schleifer and Adam, they did not believe in any great power of this organization. The organization itself wanted to describe its specific weight as rather significant, and therefore I received this instruction, which I carried out.

Chairman: What did you promise in exchange for help?

Putna: The territory of the Ukraine.

Chairman: Perhaps something else as well?

Putna: I was not authorized to promise anything else.

Ul'rikh: You were authorized to promise the German General Staff only the Ukraine?

Putna: At that time there were no talks about the Far East.

Question: From whom did you have the authority to conduct talks with the German command?

Putna: From the Trotskyist organization.

Ul'rikh: In the person of whom?

Putna: I received it as a directive from Trotsky, through Sedov and Smirnov.

111

Ul'rikh: You promised at first to give information, and then the Ukraine? Advance by the Ukraine — do I understand correctly? You said that you had promised to give the Germans the Ukraine. Were the Germans satisfied with this?

Putna: The Germans were not satisfied. They did not specify their promises, saying that this was premature and that the Trotskyist organization must demonstrate its strengths and possibilities through its activity inside the country.

Ul'rikh: How, then, did the Germans consider that the Trotskyist organization ought to show its strengths? In what way?

Putna: This we thought would be activities of a sabotage and terrorist nature.

Ul'rikh: With whom personally of the representatives of the German command did you carry on negotiations?

Putna: With major Hoffmeister, General Schleicher, and General Adam.

112

Ul'rikh: On behalf of whom did you carry on these diplomatic negotiations with the Germans?

Putna: On behalf of Trotsky.

112

Ul'rikh: With whom were you in contact directly from the leadership of the military Trotskyist organization?

Putna: With Tukhachevsky.

Ul'rikh: What assignments did you receive in 1935 and 1936?

Putna: In 1935, when I returned to London from the USSR, Tukhachevsky informed me about the successes in the Kiev and Belorussian military districts concerning the strengthening of aviation and of tank formations and gave me instructions to pass this information however I could to the German General Staff. On my way to London I met with Sedov ...

Ul'rikh: I did not understand — did you carry out your instructions and then return?

Putna: No, before carrying out my instructions. Sedov gave me similar instructions from Trotsky.

Ul'rikh: You had instructions to pass information. Did you meet Sedov and give information to him?

Putna: I tried to pass them to the German General Staff. I did not give anything to Sedov. Through Sedov I received parallel instructions from Trotsky, which came down to this: I should resurrect my German contacts and pay less attention to making contact with England and America, that I did not have to bother with these matters, that there were persons who were negotiating with England ...

114

Ul'rikh: How did he [German captain Salzman] repay you for this information?

Putna: He did not repay me. i asked him, as an intermediary, to help me establish contact and to speak with Ribbentrop, because I had an assignment from Trotsky to establish contact with the Germans.

115

Ul'rikh: Did you organize a meeting with Sedov?

Putna: Yes, at the request of Tukhachevsky I organized a meeting with Sedov.

120

Bliukher: With what Trotskyists in the regional center were you in contact? Were you a member of the regional center?

Putna: I knew that Mrachkovskii worked in the regional center. I knew that he was also in the general Trotskyist center, but I never had the occasion to meet with him.

123

Chairman: Accused Primakov, do you confirm the confessions that you gave to the organs of the NKVD in May and June of this year? Do you confirm your Trotskyist anti-Soviet work?

Primakov: Yes.

Chairman: Specifically, do you confirm your confessions about the preparation of a terrorist act by Trotskyist activists?

Primakov: I did not give any such confessions. I confessed about the preparation of an armed uprising.

125

Chairman: Did you hear Tukhachevsky's confessions?

Primakov: Nothing was proposed to me except to organize an armed uprising.

Chairman: We are interested in what assignments you had from the Trotskyist military organization in relation to the organization of this uprising in Leningrad and in connection with this assignment of preparing a terrorist act.

Primakov: I had the following basic instruction: Until 1934 I worked for the most part, as an organizer, in gathering Trotskyist cadre. In 1934 I received the instruction from Piatakov to break off ties with the group Dreitser and old Trotskyists, who were assigned to prepare terrorist acts, and I myself was to prepare, in the military district where I worked, to foment an armed uprising that would be called forth either by a terrorist act or by military action. This was the assignment I was given. The military Trotskyist organizational center considered this assignment to be very important and its importance was stressed to me. I was told to break any personal acquaintance with old Trotskyists, with whom I was in contact. This is the reason that I moved away from Dreitser's group, this is why I worked at the assignment that had been given me.

126

129

Primakov

In 1935 and 1936 I met with Tukhachevsky. In 1936 Kork arrived in Moscow. We met. In 1936 I spoke with Fel'dman, and, when I arrived in Leningrad, with Gar'kavy, and then retained my Trotskyist contact with Piatakov, with whom I met in the spring.

Chairman: Did you systematically maintain contact with the leadership of the military center and the parallel Trotskyist center?

Primakov: Basically I maintained contact with Piatakov.

131

Ul'rikh: With whom did you propose to fight in Leningrad?

Primakov: This was a traitorous armed uprising against the motherland and the government.

Ul'rikh: [Repeats the question] With whom did you propose to fight in Leningrad?

Primakov: I proposed to fight against those infantry units that remained loyal to the government, against the OGPU forces and against the OGPU itself, against the militia [police], against all forces that remained loyal to the government.

Ul'rikh: On whose behalf were you preparing to fight? Who was your boss?

Primakov: For Trotsky and the Trotskyist center.

Ul'rikh: Who was your boss, the Germans?

Primakov: I did not know about the Germans until the trial.

Ul'rikh: How did you propose

132

to act in the event Germany declared war on the USSR?

Primakov: I was instructed to seize Leningrad for the Trotskyists.

Ul'rikh: But if Germany had made war on the USSR, for whom would you have seized Leningrad?

Primakov: For Germany.

135

Fel'dman: I was recruited to the center of the conspiratorial military Trotskyist organization in the summer of 1932 by Tukhachevsky.

136

Fel'dman: ... I remember that we talked in more detail on the eve of the trip to Germany (Tukhachevsky was the head of the delegation). We spoke about overthrowing Soviet power by means of an armed uprising and if this was not successful in peacetime, then to hope for problems at the front that might lead to armed demonstrations inside the country. Our method of work would be supporting Trotskyist cadres, support for those commanders who had earlier belonged to the Trotskyist or Zinovievist opposition, from among whom it would be easier to recruit people; ...

137

Primakov ... At my question [to Tukhachevsky], who is your leader? Are you the leader, are you the boss, or does someone direct your work? He answered me that it was Trotsky who led his work, with whom he maintained contact, but he did not yet tell me the source of this contact. Tukhachevsky added that Trotsky's directive stated that the work of the military organization must be led extremely independently, not by any means to be in contact with the anti-Soviet groupings that exist in our country among civilian organizations.

138

Primakov: ... I was also interested (I considered myself not the least spoke in the wheel and had responsibilities, so I wanted to know everything) [and asked] Tukhachevsky several times about his contacts with civilian counterrevolutionary organizations. Only in 1933 or the beginning of 1934 did he tell me that he was in contact with Piatakov.

Contact with Piatakov helped carry out sabotage in the area of artillery armament from the viewpoint of lowering our orders. Tukhachevsky also said that there was also contact with the Rights. To my doubtful question — how with the Rights? From where? I knew that Trotsky was leading the conspiracy. Tukhachevsky answered that now the separation between the Rights and Trotskyists has been wiped away, and since this is useful for our general business, why not have contact with the Rights also?

I will talk later about my practical work, and for now will remain on these facts:

When in 1933-34 Hitler came to power, we were given an official directive to stress our coolness towards the Germans at banquets. Tukhachevsky told me that on Trotsky's directive, it was essential to let the Germans know that his attitude towards the Reichswehr remained just as good as good as earlier.

142

Fel'dman: ... I must return to Trotsky's directives. Later, when from Trotsky's first directives, about which Mikhail Nikolaevich [Tukhachevsky] informed me, he went to discuss the preparation for the defeat of the Red Army, he said to me that he was doing this according to a new directive from Trotsky, adding that all means are good in the struggle to achieve our aims, in the struggle against Soviet power.

Here I must tell the court that my collaborators, my former colleagues, if I may express myself in this way, are very squeamish in their confessions about terror and espionage.

Citizen Primakov, here you are claiming that aside from the armed uprising in Leningrad you did not undertake anything. It's strange that you do not mind speaking about an armed uprising and drowning in blood many thousands of workers, peasants, and collective farmers, but you cannot speak frankly about terror. Tukhachevsky told me in 1936 that in carrying out Trotsky's directive about having recourse to terror, and in particular in relation to Voroshilov, he gave such a directive to Primakov in 1936.

146

Fel'dman... In this way, summing up, I must say that everything we did were actions that served the interests of the fascists and their agent Trotsky, whose will we were carrying out.

There were talks, as I have explained, about a palace coup. When contact with Trotsky had been set up through Putna, who had been transferred to London, there began talks about defeatism, and methods of terror and espionage appeared — all this in order to overthrow Soviet power and guarantee Trotsky's coming to power. Trotsky did not have real forces numbering in the thousands besides those that you see here and therefore whatever Trotsky dictated to us, the German General Staff was dictating. That's the way I see it and that's the way we should put it.

147

Primakov: ... Whether Trotsky would come to power together with Rykov or Enukidze, we did not discuss this question and it played no role for us. What was important was to overthrow Soviet power.

147

Fel'dman: ... Speaking of Trotskyist cadres in the Far Eastern Region, there were many of them, but I did not know any members of the conspiracy. As for Lapin and the others who have been mentioned here, they were assigned to the Far East without my knowledge.

149

Putna: I did not have any direct contact with civilians concerning the conspiracy. I know only one person whom I knew to be a member of the general Trotskyist center — Mrachkovskii. I thought that I could meet with him if the occasion required it, but we never did meet. I did not have any direct talks concerning civilian matters.

152

Iakir, last words: ... I have already said that I had a long, good, honorable life before that moment when I fell into the abyss, fell into the hands of the enemy, fell into the hands of the vilest of vile enemies that progressive humanity has, into the hands of that murderer, that agent of German fascism, Trotsky.

I want you to believe that I, if I am not left with my physical forces, will die in complete tranquility and in the understanding that I die with the most legal justification, than I have committed more [crimes] that I could redeem with my death, and that you believe me in this, that I die with a curse against Trotsky, German fascism, and with my last word of love toward the army, towards you, towards my Party, towards Stalin, and towards my motherland.

153

Tukhachevsky, last words:

I wish to draw a conclusion for myself from this vile work that has been done.. I wish to draw the conclusion that under the conditions of the victory of socialism in our country every grouping becomes an anti-Soviet group and every anti-Soviet group becomes one with the vilest Trotskyism, with the vilest current of the Rights. And since there is no vase for these forces within our country, then whether they wish it or not, these groups slide further, into contact with fascism, into contact with the German General Staff. This is the downfall of this counterrevolutionary work that was in its essence directed towards the re-establishment of capitalism in our country.

154

I want to say that I went through the civil war as an honest Soviet citizen, as an honorable Red Army soldier, as an honorable commander of the Red Army, that I fought for Soviet power without sparing any effort, and after the civil war I did likewise. But the road of the group, that put me on the road of foul Right opportunism and of three-times cursed Trotskyism, that led to contact with German fascism and the Japanese general staff, all this had not killed in me the love for our army, love for our Soviet country, and while doing this foul counterrevolutionary business, I was also two persons.

155

Uborevich, last words:

... in 1935 I committed a military crime when I accepted the defeatist instructions of Tukhachevsky and for that I, as a soldier, if I had a thousand lives, would not be able to redeem my guilt with them. I beg the Party, the Soviet people, and the army forgiveness for my last and greatest crimes.

The trial has freed me from the nightmares of conspiracy and the diabolical directives of Tukhachevsky, — that is to say, of Trotsky, and the German General Staff. I die now with my previous faith in the victory of the Red Army. The y will prepare the Red Army strongly towards these victories. That is all!

156

Kork, last words:

I wish to say that, while I took the path of treason, of vile betrayal, the path of committing crimes for which there is no name, yet within me the whole time there continued to live something else. I gradually became convinced of the profound delusion in which I found myself since 1931. I did not believe in the correctness of the Party's general line, did not believe in the correctness of Stalin's line, I was shot through with doubts and gave in to the vile slander of the Rights and the even viler activities of the Trotskyists, when the Rights and Trotskyists fused into one whole and plotted the most criminal acts that can come into a person's head.

157

160

Eideman, last words:

I ask the court to believe one thing, that before I joined this organization I honorably, without any hesitation, gave all my strength to my native country. I lived together with the Party, I lived together with the whole country. I began to slide downwards, to become corrupted, during the years of hardship, during the years of the transitional period of 1930 and 1932. I did not go to the Party with these doubts and waverings. I kept everything to myself. I began to become corrupted. Keeping within myself these waverings and the corruption, I fell into the hands of the most damned implacable enemy of the people — Trotsky.

I feel now that I have returned back onto Soviet land, I can now say without hesitation that I accept this harsh verdict so that with the last bit, the last minutes of my life, the last hours of my life to cover with curses that vile enemy of the people, Trotsky, agent of German fascism, because of whom I too became an agent of German fascism.

162

Putna, last words:

The seed of corrupting Trotskyism was sown in me by those people who drew me to Trotskyism comparatively early. I followed gradually and steadily almost the whole path of Trotskyism from the beginning of the factionalism against the Party leadership through the transition to illegal methods of struggle against the Party, through the transition to instruction more shameful, more vile, and arrived in the camp of the enemies of the Party, the state, the Red Army, and the country as a whole in 1931.

...

This process was at first also rather painful for me, but I became stuck so far in the vile rut of Trotskyist decay, in my struggle against our country and leadership, so deeply, and so consistently, that my normal human courage, human bravery were not enough to tear me out of this rut.

163

Many people know that I was a different person, and for me now there is no other solace except that I was once a different person. And now, in a very short time, in my own internal feelings, I have returned to my former self. I believe that in a sick organism, one that is decaying, struck down as though by poisonous gases, in an organism rotted by Trotsky, who led me into service to the German General Staff and to that coalition, in this organism, evidently, there remain still some pockets that have not completely died, that have given me the physical and moral strength to tell the investigation and the court everything that I know about this criminal activity.

164

Primakov, last words:

In my last words, citizen judges, I must tell the final truth about our conspiracy, and the final truth consists in this, that in the history of our revolution, and in the history of other revolutions, there has not been such a vile conspiracy as ours, neither in its goals, not in its membership, not in the means that the conspiracy chose for itself. Of whom does the conspiracy consist, whom did the fascist flag of Trotsky join together? It joined together all the counterrevolutionary elements that we had. All of them, from the rags of the old officers' groups, to the Trotskyist group, with its vile terrorist directives, with its practice of struggle against the Party, through the remains of the Zinovievists, everything that was counterrevolutionary in the Red Army — all were gathered into one place, under one flag, under the fascist flag in the hands of Trotsky. That is the main thing.

165

What means did this conspiracy choose that are unequalled in history? All means, from the blackest betrayal, from treason, from the preparation of the defeat of one's own country through sabotage, through espionage, through terror, directed against the brain and heart of our country. These are the means that the conspiracy chose. For what goal? For the restoration of capitalism. What does the achievement of this goal mean, and by what path can this goal be reached, acting as our conspirators acted? There was one path: it was necessary to shatter the dictatorship of the proletariat, but only a fascist dictatorship could shatter it. But this fascist dictatorship would be created in the form of a half-dozen Napoleons, but only that one Napoleon would become the boss who was beneficial to the German General Staff. Because if the Red Army were defeated and bled to death, the country would be deprived of force. So who then would be boss if not Hitler's staff? And who would establish power in the country besides Hitler's general staff? That was the goal to which our conspiracy was moving. It was moving towards a fascist dictatorship, since from the half-dozen Napoleons would be chosen one who was chosen by the path of treasonous defeatism, the path of its vile preparation for the enemy.

167

The second group to which I belong is the Trotskyist group. If the first group acted by means of betrayal, the second, Trotskyist group is the most cursed group in the conspiracy because it has travelled the most vile path, has the most vile school and has as its leader Trotsky, who demanded the fascist banner.

168

Two more words about myself. I must say directly that I, a former communist and former soldier of the revolution, thanks to the fact that I was made into a Trotskyist, that I travelled the whole path with them since 1932, I arrived in the fascist camp and I in despair see that I have arrived at a place than which there is nothing worse in the world.

Bibliography

"Editorial Perspective. In This Issue." Science & Society 82, No. 4 (October, 2018), p. 475.

"Pokazaniia Tukhachevskogo M.N. ot 1 iiunia 1937 goda." Molodaia Gvardiia 9 (1994), 129-136. (MG 9)

"Pokazaniia Tukhachevskogo M.N. ot 1 iiunia 1937 goda." Molodaia Gvardiia 10 (1994), 255-266. (MG 9)

Biulleten' Oppozitsii. 1929-1940. At <http://web.mit.edu/fjk/www/FI/BO/index.shtml> and
<http://www.1917.com/Marxism/Trotsky/BO/index.html>

Broué, Pierre. "Ante Ciliga (1898-1992)," Cahiers Léon Trotsky no. 50, 1993, 121-122.

Broué, Pierre. "Le GPU à la chasse aux trotskystes." Cahiers Léon Trotsky 70 (2000), 89-98.

Broué, Pierre. "Compléments à un article sur les trotskystes en U.R.S.S." Cahiers Léon Trotsky 24 (1985), 63-72.

Broué, Pierre. "L'historien devant la vie. Charles A. Beard et les procès de Moscou." Cahiers Léon Trotsky 19 (1984), 68-77.

Broué, Pierre. "Party Opposition to Stalin (1930-1932) and the First Moscow Trial." In John W. Strong, ed. Essays on Revolutionary Culture and Stalinism, Columbus, OH: Slavica Publishers, 1990, pp. 98-111. (Broué, POS)

Broué, Pierre. "Trotsky et le bloc des oppositions de 1932." Cahiers Léon Trotsky 5 (Jan-Mar 1980), pp. 5-37. (Broué 1980)

Broué, Pierre. "Liova le 'fiston'." Cahiers Léon Trotsky 13 (1983), 5-24.

Broué, Pierre. Léon Sedov. Fils de Trotsky, Victime de Staline. Paris: Editions Ouvrières, 1993.

Chuev, Feliks I. Molotov: Poludershavnyi Vlastelin. Moscow: OLMA-PRESS, 1999.

Chuev, Feliks I. Sto sorok besed s Molotovym. Moscow: "Terra", 1991.

Cohen, Stephen F. Bukharin and the Bolshevik Revolution 1888-1938. New York: Oxford University Press, 1973.

Cohen, Stephen. "Bukharin na Lubianke.: Svobodnaia Mysl' 21, No. 3 (2003), 58-63.

Dimitrov, Georgi. The diary of Georgi Dimitrov, 1933-1949. Ed. Ivo Banac. New Haven: Yale University Press, 2003.

Enzensberger, Hans Magnus. Hammerstein oder der Eigensinn. Eine deutsche Geschichte. Berlin: Suhrkamp, 2008.

Ferr, Grover (Furr). Antistalinskaia Podlost'. Moskva: Algoritm, 2007.

Ferr (Furr, Grover, Vladimir L. Bobrov, Pravosudie Stalina. Obzhalovaniunt podlezhit! Moscow: Eksmo, 2010.

Furr, Grover and Vladimir L. Bobrov. "Stephen Cohen's Biography of Bukharin: A Study in the Falsehood of Khrushchev-Era 'Revelations.'" Cultural Logic 2010. At <https://ojs.library.ubc.ca/index.php/clogic/article/view/191531/188643>.

Furr, Grover and Vladimir L. Bobrov. "Nikolai Bukharin's First Statement of Confession in the Lubianka." Cultural Logic 2007. At <https://ojs.library.ubc.ca/index.php/clogic/article/view/191745>

Furr, Grover and Vladimir L. Bobrov. "Marshal S.M. Budyonny on the Tukhachevsky Trial. Impressions of an Eye-Witness" (in Russian). Klio No. 2 (2012), pp. 8-24.

Furr, Grover. "Evidence of Leon Trotsky's Collaboration with Germany and Japan." Cultural Logic (2009). At <https://ojs.library.ubc.ca/index.php/clogic/article/view/191550/188662> (Evidence)

Furr, Grover. "New Light On Old Stories About Marshal Tukhachevsky: Some Documents Reconsidered." Russian History 13, No. 2-3 (Summer-Fall 1986; actually published in 1988), 293-308.

Furr, Grover. "The Moscow Trials and the 'Great Terror' of 1937-1938: What the Evidence Shows." At http://msuweb.montclair.edu/~furrgr/research/trials_ezhovshchina_update0710.html

Furr, Grover. Blood Lies: The Evidence that Every Accusation Against Joseph Stalin and the Soviet Union in Timothy Snyder's Bloodlands Is False. New York: Red Star Publications, 2014. (Furr, Blood Lies)

Furr, Grover. The Fraud of the Dewey Commission. Leon Trotsky's Lies. New York: Red Star Publishers, 2018.

Furr, Grover. Khrushchev Lied: The Evidence That Every "Revelation" of Stalin's (and Beria's) Crimes in Nikita Khrushchev's Infamous "Secret Speech" to the 20th Party Congress of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union on February 25, 1956, is Provably False. Kettering, OH: Erythrós Press & Media LLC, 2011. (Furr, Khrushchev Lied)

Furr, Grover. Leon Trotsky's Collaboration with Germany and Japan: Trotsky's Conspiracies of the 1930s, Volume Two. Kettering, OH: Erythrós Press & Media, LLC, 2017. (Furr, Collaboration)

Furr, Grover. The Moscow Trials as Evidence. New York: Red Star Publishers, 2018. (Furr, Trials)

Furr, Grover. The Murder of Sergei Kirov. History, Scholarship and the Anti-Stalin Paradigm. Kettering, OH: Erythrós Press and Media, LLC, 2013. (Furr, Kirov)

Furr, Grover. "New Light On Old Stories About Marshal Tukhachevskii: Some Documents Reconsidered." Russian History/Histoire Russe 13, nos. 2-3 (Summer-Fall, 1986), 291-308.

Furr, Grover. Stalin: Waiting For ... the Truth! Exposing the Falsehoods in Stephen Kotkins's 'Stalin. Waiting for Hitler, 1929-1941. New York: Red Star Publishers, Corrected Edition April, 2019.

Furr, Grover. Trotsky's 'Amalgams': Trotsky's Lies, the Moscow Trials As Evidence, The Dewey Commission. Trotsky's Conspiracies of the 1930s, Volume One. Kettering, OH: Erythrós Press & Media, LLC, 2015. (Furr, Amalgams)

Furr, Grover. Trotsky's Lies. Kettering, OH: Erythrós Press & Media, LLC, 2019. (Furr, Trotsky's Lies)

Furr, Grover. Yezhov Vs. Stalin: The Truth About Mass Repressions and the So-Called 'Great Terror' in the USSR. Kettering, OH: Erythrós Press & Media, LLC, 2018 (2016)

Getty, J. Arch. "To the Editors." Kritika: Explorations in Russian and Eurasian History 5, 1 (Winter 2004), 233-235.

Getty, J. Arch and Oleg V. Naumov. The Road to Terror: Stalin and the Self-Destruction of the Bolsheviks, 1932-1939. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1999. (Getty & Naumov)

Getty, J. Arch. "Trotsky in Exile: the Founding of the Fourth International." Soviet Studies XXXVIII, no. 1 (January 1986), pp. 24-35. (TIE)

Getty, J. Arch. Origins of the Great Purges: The Soviet Communist Party Reconsidered, 1933-1938. New York and Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1985.

Getty, J. Arch. Post to H-RUSSIA list Nov. 24 1998. At <http://tinyurl.com/getty-trotsky-lied>

Getty, J. Arch, and Oleg V. Naumov. Ezhov: the rise of Stalin's "iron fist." New Haven: Yale University Press, 2008.

Gould, Stephen J. "Dinosaurs in the Haystack." Natural History 101 (March 1992): 2-13. At <http://www.inf.fu-berlin.de/lehre/SS05/efs/materials/Dinosaur-Leviathan.pdf>

Harvard Trotsky Archive, Houghton Library, Harvard University. (TA)

Hilger, Gustav. Wir und der Kreml: Deutsch-Sowjetische Beziehungen 1918-1941: Erinnerungen eines deutschen Diplomaten. Berlin: Athenäum, 1955.

Holmström, Sven-Eric. "New Evidence Concerning the 'Hotel Bristol' Question in the First Moscow Trial of 1936." Cultural Logic (2009). <https://ojs.library.ubc.ca/index.php/clogic/article/view/191568>

Humbert-Droz, Jules. Mémoires de Jules Humbert-Droz. De Lénin à Staline, Dix Ans Au Service de L'Internationale Communiste 1931-31. Neuchâtel: A la Baconnière, 1971. (Humbert-Droz)

Izvestiia' TSK KPSS. Moscow: Izd. T'Sentral'nogo komiteta KPSS, Izd. T'Sentral'nogo komiteta KPSS, 1989-1991 (Izv TsK KPSS)

Junge, Marc. Bucharins Rehabilitierung. Historisches Gedächtnis in der Sowjetunion 1953-1991. Mit einem Dokumentenanhang. Berlin: BasisDruck Verlag, 1999.

Keeran, Roger. "Khrushchev Lied But What Is the Truth?" (review of Furr, Khrushchev Lied). Marxism-Leninism Today November 23, 2011. At <https://mltoday.com/khrushchev-lied-but-what-is-the-truth/>

Kotkin, Stephen. Stalin. Waiting for Hitler, 1929-1941. New York: Penguin, 2017.

Larina, Anna. Nezabyvaemoe. Moscow: Izd-vo APN, 1989.

Littlepage, John D. "Red Wreckers in Russia." Saturday Evening Post January 1, 1938, 10-11, 54-55.

Littlepage, John D. and Demaree Bess. In Search of Soviet Gold. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1938; London: George Harrap & Co. Ltd, 1939.

Lubianka. Stalin i Glavnoe Upravlenie Gosbezopasnosti NKVD. 1937-1938. M.: "Materik," 2004. (Lubianka 1939-1946)

Lubianka. Stalin i NKVD-NKGB-GUKR "Smersh." 1939 — mart 1946. Moscow: MDF, 2006. (Lubianka 1939-1946)

Lubianka. Stalin I VChK-GPU-OGPU-NKVD. Ianvar' 1922 — dekabr' 1936. Moscow: IDF, 2003. (Lubianka 1922-1936)

Main, Steven J. "The Arrest and 'Testimony' of Marshal of the Soviet Union M.N. Tukhachevsky (May-June 1937)." Journal of Slavic Military Studies 10, No. 1 (March 1997), 151-195. (Main)

Petrov, Nikita, Mark Jansen. "Stalinskii pitomets" — Nikolai Ezhov. Moscow: ROSSPEN, 2008.

Politbiuro i Lev Trotskii. Tom 2. Ed. Oleg B. Mozokhin. Praha: Sociosféra-CZ, 2013. (PiLT2)

Posner, Gerald. "Author of an anti-conspiracy account of the Kennedy assassination, on efforts to obtain C.I.A. documents relating to the assassin." The New York Times. "Quotation of the Day" of October 17, 2009.

Protsess Bukharina 1938. Dokumenty. M: Mezhdunarodniy Fond „Demokratiiia" i Fond Stivena Koena i Katriny Vanden Kheuvel, 2013.

Reabilitatsia: Politicheskie Protessy 30-x - 50-x. Moscow, 1991. (R-PP)

Reabilitatsiia. Kak Eto Bylo. Febral' 1956 — nachalo 80-kh godov. T. 2. Moskva: "Materik," 2003. (RKEB 2)

Reabilitatsia. Kak Eto Bylo. Sredina 80-kh godov — 1991. Dokumenty. T. 3. Moskva: "Materik," 2004. (RKEB 3)

Reabilitatsia: Kak Eto Bylo. Mart 1953 — Fevral' 1956 gg. Dokumenty Prezidiuma TsK KPSS i Drugie Materialiy. Moskva: Mezhdunarodnyi Fond "Demokratia," 2000. (RKEB 1)

Reitlinger, Gerhard. "Last of the War Criminals." Commentary 27, 1 (January, 1959), 30-42.

Report of Court Proceedings in the Case of the Anti-Soviet "Bloc of Rights and Trotskyites" Heard Before the Military Collegium of the Supreme Court of the U.S.S.R. Moscow, March 2-13, 1938...Verbatim Report. Moscow: People's Commissariat of Justice of the U.S.S.R., 1938. (1938 Trial)

Report of Court Proceedings in the Case of the Anti-Soviet Trotskyite Centre. Heard Before the Military Collegium of the Supreme Court of the U.S.S.R. Moscow, January 23-30, 1937...Verbatim Report. Moscow: People's Commissariat of Justice of the U.S.S.R., 1937. (1937 Trial)

Report of Court Proceedings. The Case of the Trotskyite-Zinovievite Terrorist Center. Moscow: People's Commissariat of Justice of the U.S.S.R., 1936. (1936 Trial)

Sayers, Michael, and Albert E. Kahn, The Great Conspiracy: The Secret War Against Soviet Russia. Boston: Little, Brown & Company, 1946. (Sayers & Kahn)

Schwartz, Stephen. "Ante Ciliga (1898-1992): A Life at History's Crossroads." Revolutionary History: Unpublished Articles, 34, at <https://web.archive.org/web/20010411013259/http://www.revolutionary-history.co.uk/supplem.htm>

Shakhtinskii protsess 1928 g. Podgotovka, provedenie, Itogi. Kniga 1. M.: ROSSPEN, 2011.

Sokolov, B.V. Mikhail Tukhachevskii. Zhizn' I Smert' 'Krasnogo Marshala'. Smolensk, 1999.

Stenogramma Sudebnogo Zasedaniia Spetsial'nogo Sudebnogo Prisutstviia Verkhovnogo Suda Soiuza SSR ot 11 IUnia 1937 goda ... M., 1937.

RGASPI. f. 17. op. 171. d. 392. (Tukhachevsky trial transcript) At <http://istmat.info/node/59108>

Weber. O. "How Not to Prepare for Underground Conditions of Revolutionary Work." The Communist International. July 1, 1932.

Wheatcroft, Stephen. "Agency and Terror: Evdokimov and Mass Killing in Stalin's Great Terror," Australian Journal of Politics and History: Volume 53, Number 1, 2007, 20-43.

Writings of Leon Trotsky, 1929-1940. Various volumes.

Zhukov, Iurii. "Tainy 'Kremlevskogo dela' 1935 goda i sud'ba Avelia Enukidze." Voprosy Istorii No. 9 (2000), 83-113.

Documents

Stalin's presentation — Dec. 1936 CC Plenum

Extract from Voprosy Istorii 1, 1995, 9-11 — translation by Grover Furr
2010

Stalin. I want to say a few words about the fact that Bukharin has completely failed to understand what is going on here. He has not understood. And he does not understand the kind of position he finds himself in, and why we have put him as a question at this plenum. He does not understand this at all. He keeps talking about his sincerity, he demands our trust. All right, let's talk about sincerity and about trust.

When Kamenev and Zinoviev declared in 1932 that they had renounced their mistakes and declared that the Party's position was correct, we believed them. We believed them because we supposed that a communist — former or current — is accustomed to ideological struggle, that this ideological communist, former or current, is struggling for his idea. If a person has openly said that he adheres to the Party's line then, according to traditions confirmed in the Party of Lenin and known to everyone, the Party considers that this means that person values the Party's positions and that he has really renounced his mistakes and now stands on the Party's positions. We believed them; we were mistaken. We were mistaken, com. Bukharin. Yes, yes, they declared this openly in the press and we believed them. They had also proceeded from their position, their ideas, they do not hide them, they fight for them. We believed them; we gave them the Order of Lenin, we promoted them — and were mistaken. Is that true, com. Bukharin? (Bukharin. True, true, I said the same thing.)

When Sosnovsky made a declaration that he was renouncing his mistakes, he explained the reasons for this, and explained well from a Marxist point of view, we believed him and really did say to Bukharin: "You want to take him on at Izvestiia, good, he writes well, take him, we shall see what comes of it." We were mistaken. Believe in the sincerity of people after that! We have drawn a conclusion: Do not take former oppositionists at their word. (Excitement in the hall. Voices from the floor: Right, Right!) We must not be naïve, and Il'ich taught that to be naïve in politics is to commit a crime.

We don't want to be criminals. For this reason we have drawn a conclusion: Don't believe the word of a single former oppositionist.

A few facts. When we arrested Piatakov's wife we wrote him a telegram, he was somewhere in the South, maybe Kislovodsk. From there he briefly replied that he can't find any arguments against his wife but since we in Moscow considered it necessary to arrest her, that means it's necessary. He arrived. We gave him all the confessions to read. He said that Zinoviev, Kamenev, and Mrachkovsky were slandering him in their confessions. That's what others also said, when they had just been arrested or taken to trial. He came to us and said: "Well, what can I say against these people, how can I justify myself? They are lying, they want to ruin me." We tried to talk to him: "All right, but you were the public prosecutor against the SRs. Agree to be the public prosecutor against them." — "Good, with pleasure." He started to prepare for this. But we thought about it further and decided that that would not be good. Still, this attempt started to convince us for a minute that maybe this man is right. What would it look like to put him up as the public prosecutor? He would say one thing, and then the accused would object, they would say: "Look where you are, the prosecutor. And you were working with us?!" And what would result from all this? It would turn the trial into a comedy and ruin the trial.

Therefore we said to Piatakov: "No, even though it was we who suggested that you be the public prosecutor, this won't work." He became sad: "Then how can I prove that I am right?" Let me shoot with my own hand all those whom you sentence to death, all this filth, all these swine. What other proof do you need? Publish in the press both after the sentence and after the sentence has been carried out that it was com. Piatakov who carried out the sentence." This also made us hesitate somewhat. But on the other hand we have never made public who carries out the sentences. And we decided that if we did that, no one would believe that we had not forced him to do it. We said that that won't work either, it's awkward, no one would believe that you had volunteered to do this, that you were not forced. And on top of that we have never released the names of those who carry out the sentences. "Then what am I to do? Give me a solution. Let me write an article against the Trotskyites" — "Good, write it." He wrote an article, he really smashed Trotsky and the Trotskyites.

But as for how things have turned out, you can see yourself! After that we questioned about 50 people, at least. They really turned Piatakov inside out. It turns out that he's a monster of a person! So why did he agree to be the public prosecutor? Why did he agree to shoot his comrades himself? It turns out that they have a rule like this: If your fellow Trotskyist is arrested and has begun to give up the names of others, he must be destroyed. You can see what kind of hellish joke this comes to. Believe after this in the sincerity of former oppositionists! We can't take former oppositionists at their word even when they volunteer to shoot their friends with their own hands.

Radek, until most recently, until yesterday, was writing me letters. We held back his arrest, although there were as many denunciations of him as you want, and from different sides. Everybody, from above, from below, is denouncing Radek. We held back his arrest, and then we arrested him. Yesterday and the day before yesterday I received long letters from him in which he writes: A terrible crime is being committed. They want to bring him down, him, a sincere person, devoted to the party, one who loves the Party, who loves the CC, and so on and so forth. This is wrong. You can shoot me or not, that's your affair. But he did not want his honor to be shamed. And what did he confess today? That, com. Bukharin, is what has happened. (Bukharin. But I have nothing to confess, not today, not tomorrow, not the day after tomorrow. Noise in the hall.) I am not saying anything about you personally. Maybe you're right, maybe not. But you just can't stand up and say that we don't trust you, we don't believe in my, Bukharin's, sincerity. That's old stuff now. And the events of the last two years had obviously proven this to us, because what has been proven in fact, that sincerity is a relative thing. And as for trusting in former oppositionists, we have shown them so much trust... (Noise in the hall. Voices from the floor. That's right!) We should be flogged for that maximum trust, that boundless trust that we showed to them.

There is your sincerity and there is your trust! That is why we have put this question before the plenum of the CC. But because Bukharin might take offense and get upset, we are supposed to cover this up? No, in order not to cover it up we must put this question to the plenum. Moreover, former oppositionists have had recourse to an even more serious set in order to retain even a little bit of trust on our part and demonstrate once more their sincerity — some people have begun to use suicide. In reality this is also a means of pressuring the Party. Lominadze committed suicide, he wanted to tell us by this act that he was right, that we were interrogating him in vain, and subjecting him to suspicion in vain. And what happened? It turned out that he was in a bloc with these people. That's why he killed himself, to cover up their tracks.

So that is a political killing — a means for former oppositionists, enemies of the Party, to strike at the Party, to destroy its vigilance, to deceive it one last time before their death by means of suicide and leave the Party in a stupid position.

Furer. What a letter he left too after his suicide! Reading it you could just break down and weep. (Kosior. No way!) But a person who has a little political experience will understand that something is wrong here. We know Furer, what he's capable of. And what happened? "He is right, he loves the Party, he is clean, but on the mere thought that someone in the party might think that he, Furer, had at some time joined the Trotskyites, his nerves can't withstand that, his honor will not permit him to live any longer." (Kosior. They slandered him!) And what happened? It turned out worse than you could imagine.

Tomsky. I would advise you, com. Bukharin, to think why Tomsky killed himself and left a letter — "I'm clean." But in reality you can see that he was far from clean. Speaking for myself, if I am clean, I am a man, a human being, and not a rag, not to mention a communist, then I'll shout to the whole world that I am right. That I would kill myself — never! So there's something dirty here. (Voices from the floor. Right!) A person had recourse to suicide because he was afraid that everything would come out, he did not want to witness his own shame in front of the world. Furer, and Lominadze... (Mikoian. And Khandzian.) and Khandzhian, and Skrypnik, and Tomsky. Here's one of the last, sharpest, and easiest ways by which before one's death, exiting this world, you can spit on the Party one last time, deceive the Party. There, com. Bukharin, is the background of these latest suicides for you. And you, com. Bukharin, want us to believe you at your word? (Bukharin. No, I don't want that.) Never, by no means. (Bukharin. No, I don't want that.)

But if you don't want that, then do not be upset that we have put this question to the plenum of the CC. It's possible that you are right, this is difficult for you, but after all these facts that I've told you about, and there are a great many of them, we have to look carefully into things. We have to look carefully, objectively, quietly. We do not want anything except the truth, we do not want, we will not permit anyone to be ruined by anybody. We want to seek out and find the whole truth objectively, honestly, with courage. So do not try to frighten us with weeping or with suicide. (Voices from the floor. Right! Prolonged applause.)

Carleton Beals — June 12, 1937

"The Fewer Outsiders the Better." Saturday Evening Post, 12 June 1937, 23, 74, 76–78

NOTE—The American Investigating Committee, composed of liberals and radicals, went to Mexico City to investigate charges of treason, counter-revolution and terrorism preferred against Leon Trotsky by the Soviet Government. The committee announced that its purpose was to arrive at an impartial verdict on Trotsky's guilt or innocence. Carleton Beals was a member of the committee. When he asked Trotsky pointed questions he was told that they were improper. He resigned from the committee. THE EDITOR.

In a LITTLE adobe house on a frowzy half-cobbled street of stagnant water, in the Mexican suburb of Coyacan, sits the former great war minister of the Soviet Union, the man who forged the Red army, who led it to the gates of Warsaw, who scourged the enemies of the nascent workers' republic with pitiless iron hand. Here in a foreign land, in a tiny alien hamlet, founded by the Aztecs long before Mexico City, the hero who, a few years ago, shook the destinies of the world, now, hour after hour, he been presenting the fading record of his achievements to a hastily composed commission of Americans who are supposed to investigate into the charges leveled against him in the famous Moscow terrorist trials.

"My English is the weakest part of my defense," he tells the commission on its preliminary visit to look over the locale where the proceedings were to be held — Trotsky's own residence, loaned to him by the outstanding pistol-toting Mexican painter, Diego Rivera, ramrod of the local Fourth International groups of which Trotsky is the head.

It is a humble place, with double entrance doors, guarded by the police, who frisk all comers. The rooms encircle a sunny patio, with a purple bougainvillea, and cluttered with grinning stone idols.

We are introduced to Trotsky. He is nervous, good-humored, vigorous, apparently supreme above defeat; and yet the crumbling walls of the old house, the gloomy reception room with all the street windows bricked up, emphasize the handicaps and futility of his position. Pathos hovers about his proud head with its wildly ruffled gray hair.

"I want to weep," remarks one commissioner as we pass out into the frowzy street, "to think of him being here." All, including Doctor Dewey, chairman of the investigatory commission, join in the chorus of sorrow over Trotsky's fallen star — except one commissioner, who sees the pathos of human change in less personal terms.

Later, at the trial, Trotsky presents himself with a thrust of tiny gray beard, which covers a most phenomenal protruding chin. A beard is part of the equipment of all good revolutionists — Mr. Hearst's cartoons are not entirely bugaboo—for no disguise is better for a conspirator sought by the police than that of shaving off a beard. Trotsky's head and countenance are more Tatar than Jewish, and before the trial is over he proves the old Slavic proverb: "Scratch a Russian, and —————"

At the trial, Trotsky is ever aware that he is on a stage. His answers are uttered now with quiet simplicity, occasionally with laughing condescension; or suddenly he shouts a frothing defiance at the Stalin regime, giving vent to magnificent bursts of eloquence. He is always ready to sacrifice complete honesty of reply to a quip of bon mot that will set the court laughing. But underneath it all he is an embittered man, holding his choleric disposition in check, not always successfully, only by superhuman restraint. Now and then his peevishness turns to open anger in which he shows his sharklike teeth—chiefly at the writer of this article—and then he is in judicious, his soft blue eyes take on a hard glitter, and one realizes it would not be pleasant to be at this man's mercy, and that, unlike the liberal American investigators, he hasn't a shred of interest himself in the civil liberties that they ostensibly are here to defend.

His mind is a vast repository of memory and passion, its rapierlike sharpness dulled a trifle now by the alternating years of overweening power and the shattering bitterness of defeat and exile; above all, his mental faculties are blurred by a consuming lust of hate for Stalin, a furious uncontrollable venom which has its counterpart in something bordering on a persecution complex—all who disagree with him are bunched in the simple formula of G. P. U. agents, people "corrupted by the gold of Stalin." This is not the first time that the feuds of mighty men have divided and shaken empires, although, possibly, Trotsky shakes the New York intelligentsia far more than he does the Soviet Union.

A Saturday morning, clear, limpid. The great bowl of the Valley of Mexico shimmers in the early sun. The volcanoes rise, lofty, snow-clad, mysterious. The commission is on its way in a body for the opening hearing.

"We must have no smoking," remarks Suzanne La Follette primly. "Trotsky doesn't like smoking."

"That is a marvelous opening statement, Doctor Dewey, of the aims and scope of the inquiry," another commissioner remarks.

"It's not mine. It's the work of the whole commission," Dewey mumbles in absent-minded fashion.

The Master Comes to Judgement

"All I did," remarks Suzanne, "was to use the shears a bit. My inveterate editorial instincts."

"It will be interesting to hear it," remarked this commissioner, for I had not been consulted or shown the statement, giving out to the press the previous evening.

"You must throw away your chewing gum," Suzanne tells me sharply. I was trying to cut down on smoking.

Three times Suzanne ordered me to throw away my gum.

In a session five days later, Mr. Trotsky was queried about an article he had written for a magazine. His attorney, Mr. Goldman, broke in:

"I believe, Mr. Trotsky, that in the magazine article you condemned the pernicious American gum-chewing habit."

"Yes, yes I vas—"

And so I learned why Suzanne wanted me to throw away my gum. I fingered my tie nervously. I had forgotten to ask Suzanne what color Trotsky preferred.

And at this moment my horrified eyes fell upon Frieda Rivera, wife of the eminent painter. She had pushed into a seat right against the railing that separated the court from the spectators and right in front of Trotsky, and not only was she chewing gum, she was repeatedly drawing it out of her mouth in a long thread.

The first sessions opened. Doctor Dewey's statement. Trotsky's statement. Mr. Goldman, Trotsky's lawyer, began the presentation of the defense case.

Mr. Trotsky has rehearsed his answer. He has to be repeatedly warned not to begin answering before Goldman finished each question. The hearings are decorous, restrained. There is, on the part of the rest of the commission, an air of hushed adoration for the master. Suzanne, her head on her hand, gazes steadfastly, her eyes filled with expectant worship. Benjamin Stolberg—mustache, face, hair all one ash-gray color—nods, chuckles, snorts understandingly at each of Trotsky's sallies. Mr. Otto Ruehle, the former Reichstag member, who knows no English, never lets his eyes stray from the master's face. Doctor Dewey stares abstractedly, quizzically, once or twice asks a very, very respectful question. Everyone is so deucedly rapt.

In the back, beyond the high rail, sit the members of the press and the representatives of a few little rump unions under Diego Rivera's thumb, also a group of American Trotskyites, the only ones really meriting tickets to the crowded little room in Trotsky's house—this "public" hearing. The members of the Mexican press and the labor unions stir uneasily. Most of the latter finally solve the problem by going sound asleep, and during the six and a half days of the trial, a chorus of snores comes from the rear row, where a solitary gendarme looks bored and puzzled. A considerable number of Mexicans know no English. No proper provision has been made for translating the proceedings to them, though this would seem an elementary courtesy to those of this Spanish-speaking land in which the trial is being staged. "We can't afford the time," this commissioner is told. "Besides, we're only interested in the foreign press. The fewer outsiders the better."

The Omnipresent Publicity Man

There, at the back, towers Diego Rivera. When he is not also snoring, his quick froglike eyes move restlessly, or he busily sketches cartoons. A big peacock plume adorns his large sombrero. His wife provides the fashion note of the trial. Each day she appears in a new Indian costume with magnificent shawls and heavy silver Tarascan jewelry. She rarely sits; she perches. She perches on the arms of chairs, on tables, on the veranda railing.

Also in the back hovers Charlie Walker. Charlie is the press agent of the commission. He watches over the press table with a protective anxious air of a mother hen. He leans over and reads the copy of the correspondents; when they whisper to each other, involuntarily he steps forward to try to overhear. The rest of the time he glowers at Kluckhohn, the New York Times correspondent, who has called the commission's efforts a "whitewash."

Walker is said to be a long-standing and simon-pure Trotskyite. This commissioner has been able to elicit no information from his fellow members as to why, when or how Walker was appointed, except that "he's a good man," and he seems to be. He has been in Mexico two months ahead of the commission, mostly in constant conference with Trotsky. That seems a bit odd to this commissioner.

Dewey, Stolberg, Suzanne La Follette, the commission's lawyer, John Finerty, along with the secretarial staff, live and eat at Walker's home; they travel to and from the sessions in Walker's or the commission's hired car. Ruehle, a resident of Mexico, has his own apartment. I and my wife were left to shift for ourselves, and live apart from the commission in a hotel, with little knowledge of the inner activities of the group. I hire my own taxicabs, and it is a long way out to Coyacan, and expensive.

The first sessions drones on. This commissioner, who has been told that questions should be limited at this stage, at last is unable to stand the worshipful atmosphere.

"Can you prove that point?" he unexpectedly barks at Trotsky.

The court jerks into startled surprise. Trotsky cranes his neck to look at the interlocutor, who has been put at the end of the table, out of the range of his view.

Trotsky evidently can't prove it. His archives on this point were stolen by the Norwegian Fascists, but he made an affidavit, and various journalists have corroborated this.

The journalists turn out to be Trotsky's own partisans. But Trotsky adds that the G. P. U. press—how he loves to snarl these initials!—proves his point. He offers no citations, though usually he is copious with them.

The commissioner subsides. The glowering eyes of the whole courtroom are upon him, including those of the members.

At the afternoon session, Mr. John Finerty, lawyer for the commission, has arrived by plane. He is a tall, thin, red-brown Irishman, dressed in a red-brown suit, with handsome tie and flowing silk kerchief. He wants to know where one gets a Turkish bath and a masseur. Gastronomically troubled by the altitude, he is living on tomato juice. He is even gentler with Trotsky than the commissioners, and hastens at every opportunity to put "alleged" into Trotsky's mouth, so the latter's record will read correctly; a constant usurping of the attributes of Mr. Goldman, the defense attorney. After each utterance, Finerty's large liquid eyes look about with hopeful expectancy to see how his words have been taken.

The Missing Archives

The afternoon session drones on. Trotsky is telling his life history. Mid-afternoon, the defense announces that this preliminary sketch has been completed.

Dewey asks a few questions. . . .

"Have you any questions, Mr. Stolberg?"

Stolberg gravely asks a few erudite, very respectful interrogations on dialectics and the tactical relations between Trotsky and Lenin. Trotsky understood the questions perfectly. Stolberg had hurried out to the master's house an hour ahead of the other commissioners.

"Have you any questions, Miss La Folette?" Dewey asks.

"Only one."

Suzanne's question is so formulated as to give Trotsky a chance to spread his plumes.

"The session is declared in recess."

After recess, Dewey tells Goldman to proceed with his next topic. But, to everyone's surprise, it seems that Ruehle has some questions; Commissioner Beals also has some.

My questions, I announce, are very elementary. I inquire concerning Trotsky's archives. He hems and haws, declines to state their whereabouts—information eagerly sought by the hateful G. P. U.— but finally offers to disclose the matter in secret session. (He had offered to put them in the hands of the commission.) At any event, the archives are not in Mexico; most of his documents here are merely uncertified copies.

What assurance, I ask, has the commission that if he is guilty he has not, in the months since the Moscow trials, destroyed all the evidence inimical to himself?

The structure of the archives disproves such a thesis; he claims; they reflect the personality of the man. Besides, he will refute all charges with the documents he has brought with him from Europe for that purpose.

I question him on being a German agent, though several other commissioners are buzzing in Dewey's ear and pulling his sleeve, to get me suppressed. Trotsky has refuted the charge by a quotation from Lenin. But Lenin, was he not of Trotsky's own party? Is that good proof?

Don't embarrass the Defendant

Brest-Litovsk. Trotsky admits that he was then charged with a conspiracy with Prussian militarism, but that he then put the salvation of the Socialist state above territorial integrity of Russia—a tactic precisely to be able to better fight Prussian militarism.

"You are charged in the Moscow trials with conspiring with the German Nazi government and the Japanese government to sacrifice territory of the Soviet Union in order again to return to power. It is not logical to suppose that you would again consider your right to rule and your present brand of Socialism of greater importance than the territorial integrity of the Soviet Union?"

"I would be only a cheap adventurer," exploded Trotsky, and he launched into a long-winded discussion of how he believed the only method of overthrowing Stalin was through the education of the workers.

Again this commissioner find himself the cynosure of glowering eyes. In the back of the room, my wife hears Diego Rivera telling his labor cronies, who have not understood the sharp interchange: "That is Carleton Beals. He's a G. P. U. agent."

The session is adjourned. Stolberg retires into a back room, biting his mustache furiously.

"Don't you feel that my questions were necessary?" I ask him gently.

"Yes, yes, of course," replied Ben. "But Trotsky answered them badly. That about the archives not being here. The Times man will snap that up—only copies—"

"You put fine questions," the commission choruses to me. "But we have to get together and agree on questions. Mr. Finerty wishes it definitely understood that the commissioners' questions shall refer to matters of fact only. Your questions about Brest-Litovsk were entirely out of place at this time. Later on, of course——"

The trial had its poignant moments. Trotsky told vividly of the persecution of his family—all of them apparently engaged in secret political activities—how his sister committed suicide in Paris because the Soviets withdrew her citizenship. Trotsky's eyes were filled with moisture, and it was one of the few times he did not burst into a diatribe against Stalin and the G. P. U. agents. At my side, Stolberg was furiously scribbling on a pad in a frame of sketched flowers, "I want to bawl—I want to bawl—" During the recess following this scene, the commissioners hotly berated Stalin's persecutions; Dewey was especially wrathful.

Saturday and Sunday the other commissioners consulted the procedure to be followed in the trial. This commissioner was not advised. Miss La Follette, the secretary, says she called him at his hotel Sunday morning, but he was there all day and received no telephone call and found no message.

Monday I surprised the court with an independent statement of my position and what I considered the proper aims of our work—that I had no connections with either Trotsky or the Stalin faction, that our work should not be improperly utilized by either. I pointed out a technical mistake in Dewey's opening statements, indicated my disagreement on various points.

Dewey leaped to his feet to declare that I had arrived in Mexico City after the commission's statement had been prepared and that there had been no opportunity to show it to me. The truth was that I had been in Mexico, in touch with the commission, two days before the opening sessions, during which time the Dewey statement had been given to the press.

Mr. Finerty leaped to his feet, as usual, to do Goldman's work for him; to attack me for my correction of the commission's statement on the matter of Trotsky's extradition. I merely replied that I was not interested in being a party to the commission's errors.

At the afternoon session, Dewey read an apology for the rest of the commission. I replied that I was not concerned about the commission having ignored me, but merely hoped that it would still accept my constructive suggestions.

At the recess of the morning's session, I was informed by the rest of the commission that it had decided to abandon the original plan to take up the various aspects of the case topically and cross-examine on each section of the evidence, general cross-examination to come later. There was no time for such a method, I was informed, and so Goldman would present his defense in toto. Thereupon each commissioner was to draw up a line of cross-examination to be submitted to Mr. Finerty. Commissioners were to ask only such questions as fitted the scheme of the cross examination—preferably through Mr. Finerty—which arose in their minds at the moment.

The Examiner's Helping Hand

I had not been consulted regarding the original form of the procedure, nor was I even told of the sequence of topics, which was making it difficult to prepare any sort of intelligent examination of Trotsky on my part. The new plan quite smothered my liberty of action on the commission. But worse than that, it would defeat honest investigation. We could not run the investigation like a railroad train—on schedule. By leaving the entire cross-examination until the end, the original defense of Trotsky would be lost sight of, the points at issue dulled and forgotten, even with the best of note-taking. No transcript of the trial was to be available until long after the sessions ended. This made our work very blind, and it also made it impossible to guarantee a correct record. Nor was I content to let Mr. Finerty handle all the cross-examination. He had already shown himself pathetically gentle with Trotsky, he had hastened to put favorable words into Trotsky's mouth, and seemed to have little grasp of the case.

Despite the limitation put on our questioning, I did, as did also other members of the commission, ask a few questions. There were literally hundreds of queries that, as the case dragged on, I felt should be asked. But to have done so would merely have made me a nuisance in the eyes of the commission, invariably hostile toward my line of questioning, which almost invariably they sought to interrupt. Once, at a sharp interrogatory of Trotsky, Ruehle shuddered at my elbow "Sehr schade! Sehr schade!" How sad! How sad that I should speak in a peremptory tone to the master! Thereafter, every time I asked a question, Ruehle would writhe in his seat and emit a series of low groans, like a man in pain.

The Pink-Tea-Party Trial

For five and a half days, Goldman presented Trotsky's defense. Late Friday morning, Finerty began his cross-examination. It consisted that first day, of a confused and elementary cross-examination of Trotsky on the history of the Russian revolution. When he got through, Trotsky positively had wings on his shoulders. A handful of questions were asked Trotsky on terrorism and the one-party system. Several questions were asked regarding Piatakov's supposed trip to Oslo to see Trotsky. The Romm case was ignored completely. Neither the details presented by Trotsky in his defense nor the numerous crucial points of the transcript of the Moscow trials were adequately examined. For all practical purposes, Finerty merely continued Goldman's defense of Trotsky; he filled in the gaps left by Goldman in Trotsky's defense.

It must have been somewhat disillusioning, even to Trotsky. His table was piled high with books and papers which had not been presented in his defense, but which, apparently, he had expected to find useful in refuting the cross-examination. He had practically no use for any of this material.

The commission itself became alarmed at the banality and pointlessness of Finerty's questioning. At a recess that afternoon, the various members of the commission rushed up to me. "For God's sake, Carleton, ask some questions. This is terrible. The man doesn't have any background. He's getting nowhere."

"Why should I ask questions?" was my rejoinder. "The ones I have do not fit into the arbitrary scheme the commission has accepted for the cross-examination. I do not wish to give questions to Finerty to have him garble them." Even Trotsky's official translator came to me to get me to ask some questions with some real import, and later, in the courtroom, passed me several good ones. The whole atmosphere of the trial had become that of a chummy clubroom, a pink-tea-party with everyone uttering sweet platitudes.

The day was now waning and there would be only half a day on the morrow to get at the truth of falsity of Trotsky's five and a half days of defense. But I was not to be a party even to that half day. Under the repeated urging of the commission, which had hitherto been so hostile to my questioning, I decided to jump into the arena once more with a line of questioning to show Trotsky's secret relations with the Fourth International, the underground contacts with various groups in Italy, Germany and the Soviet Union. Trotsky, of course, had steadfastly denied having had any contacts whatsoever, save for half a dozen letters, with persons of groups in Russia since about 1930. This was hard to swallow.

To lay the basis for this questioning, I had to go into Trotsky's previous secret relations with the outside revolutionary groups when he was a part of the Soviet state. I quizzed him on the secret activities of Borodin in Mexico in 1919-20.

The result was a violent explosion. Trotsky called my informants liars, and completely lost his temper. My informant, among others, I advised Trotsky, was Borodin himself.

Doctor Dewey hurriedly lifted the session. A junta of the commission was called to take me to task for my questions. Mr. Finerty declared that no commissioner could ask questions on the basis of unproved facts. Doctor Dewey declared that the commission had insisted Trotsky provide the proof of all his assertions. As a matter of fact, Trotsky for hours had been leaving charges of Moscow gold against everyone who disagree with him; frenziedly he accused all such of being G. P. U. agents. There was a touch of paranoia to it. The commission had never once asked him for the proof of such statements, and I was not going to be the one put in the position of challenging them. And so, now, once more, Mr. Finerty was eagerly doing Mr. Goldman's job for him.

Avoiding the Tight Spots

I mildly suggested to the commission that my word was as good as Trotsky's. I was willing to go on the stand myself if that would simplify matters. I had published the record of Borodin's activities in Mexico years ago; I could produce other witnesses. But it was all too patent that the commission would not tolerate anything that might put Trotsky in a tight spot. I finally told Mr. Finerty that, whatever the nature of my questions, I could not be accused, as he could, of being Mr. Trotsky's lawyer instead of the lawyer of the commission.

"Mr. Beals," he raged, "henceforth our relations will be purely official, not personal."

"they shall not even be official," I answered. "Either you cease to be lawyer of this comm or I leave the commission."

Suzanne burst into tears. "This is a great historical occasion, Carleton; don't mar it. Tell Mr. Finerty you're sorry."

With that I left the premises. The commission, alarmed, pattered after me. I was through.

My resignation went in the next morning. Dewey accused me of prejudging the case. This was false. I was merely passing judgment on the commission. He declared that I had not been inhibited in my questioning. He declared that I had the privilege of bringing in a minority report. My resignation was my minority report. How could I judge the guilt or innocence of Mr. Trotsky, if the commission's investigations were a fraud?

As was to be expected, Mr. Trotsky accused me, by insinuation, of being a G. P. U. agent. Slightly bad taste, when I had, months before, wired President Cardenas a plea to give him asylum in Mexico. Trotsky should have been, if innocent, the first to desire that any and every question be asked him, regardless of the consequences.

A Trial That Proved Nothing

The net result of the labors of the commission? No adequate cross-examination, no examination of the Trotsky archives. A scant day and a half of questioning of Trotsky; mostly about the history of the Russian revolution, his relations with Lenin—this with an eye to his defense against Stalin charges—a lot of question on dialectics and a few scattered unorganized question on terrorism and the Piatakov incident. The only new documents of any moment were those covering the alleged Romm and Piatakov contacts with Trotsky. Trotsky had already, in the press, on the platform and in pamphlets, pretty well blown up the Soviet case on those two points. Unfortunately, Romm and Piatakov were not available for further cross-examination, so that little has been gained by such refutation. Trotsky's new documents were not over-illuminating. One, for instance, was the sworn statement of a hotel-keeper that a party of five persons had stopped at his establishment on the date Trotsky claimed—no names, no registration, no official passport numbers. Trotsky's party was of six persons, not five. Aside from such matters, the evidence submitted by Trotsky consisted of his published articles and books. These could have been bought in New York or consulted at the public library without the commission having been put to the expense of such a fruitless trip.

Its work is not done. But no amount of fumbling over documents in New York can correct the omissions and errors of its Mexican expedition. This commissioner, on accepting membership, was told that the Mexican commission would include Doctor Beard, John Chamberlain and Louis Adamic. None of them were present on the Mexican scene. I was able to get no satisfaction regarding the future personnel of the larger New York commission, nor how it would be appointed—whether by the commission itself or the Committee for the Defense of Leon Trotsky. From the press I learned that seven other commissions were at work in Europe, and that these would send representatives to form part of the larger commission. I was unable to find out how these European commissions had been created, who were members of them. I suspected them of being small cliques of Trotsky's own followers. I was unable to put my seal of approval on the work of our commission in Mexico. I did not wish my name used merely as a sounding board for the doctrines of Trotsky and his followers. Nor did I care to participate in the work of the larger organization, whose methods were not revealed to me, the personnel of which was still a mystery to me.

Doubtless, considerable information will be scraped together. But if the commission in Mexico is an example, the selection of the facts will be biased, and their interpretation will mean nothing if trusted to a purely pro-Trotsky clique.

As for me, a sadder and wiser man, I say, a plague on both their houses.

Budiennyi's Letter to Voroshilov — June 26, 1937

TOP SECRET

IN PERSON ONLY

TO THE PEOPLE'S COMMISSAR OF DEFENSE OF THE UNION OF SSR

MARSHAL OF THE SOVIET UNION com. K.E. VOROSHILOV.

I would like to set forth to you my impressions about the trial that took place on June 11, 1937 of the counterrevolutionary military fascist organization at the special session of the Supreme Court of the Union of SSR concerning the accusation of treason to the nation, espionage, sabotage and diversionist activity of TUKHACHEVSKY, YAKIR, UBOREVICH, KORK, EIDEMAN, FEL'DMAN, PRIMAKOV, PUTNA.

At the opening of the court session the indictment was read to the defendants, which produced in them an extremely powerful, overwhelming impression. Eideman and Fel'dman were especially despondent, although all the defendants from the viewpoint of courage presented an extremely pitiable impression. Externally they all looked like pitiable, insignificant weaklings.

The interrogation began in the following order: Yakir, Tukhachevsky, Uborevich, Kork, Eideman, Putna, Primakov, Fel'dman. In that same order also they had their last concluding words.

In his speech at the court session Yakir dealt with the essence of the conspiracy, which were the tasks of the restoration of capitalism in our country on the basis of a fascist dictatorship. They were to come to this goal by two routes: first, by the overthrow of the existing political power through internal forces, with the help of a military coup and, second, if the first was not accomplished, then with the help of a military defeat with the participation of intervention by German fascism, Japanese imperialism, and

Poland. In this last variant, as compensation to the interventionists, they would cede a part of the territory of our state: the Ukraine to

/ 2 /

Germany; the Far East — to Japan.

For the defeat of the Soviet armies the conspirators had an agreement with the German General Staff in the person of general Rundstedt and general Kūstring and a plan for the defeat of the RKKA during wartime had been specially put together.

In both the first and second cases all means were to be used in order to overthrow the Soviet government and the party leadership. They shrank at nothing: violence [terror], espionage, diversion, sabotage, provocation, the compromising of the leaders of the party, government, army, and Soviet power.

In the words of Yakir they had determined that in this affair all means were acceptable.

The origins of the conspiracy go back in essence to 1934, but before that, beginning in 1925, as Yakir said, there had been an "business of an unprincipled grouping." In other words there were discussion about unsatisfactory leadership of the army, an incorrect treatment by the part of the party leadership and government towards "well-known", "great" men of the Zinoviev-Trotsky and Right Opposition. The measures taken by the party and government in the collectivization of 1930-31 were also subjected to sharp criticism.

In 1934 from these "unprincipled talks" they went over to the unification of like-minded persons and in his office Tukhachevsky stated that it was time to move from words to deeds and then and there it was decided that the recruitment of like-minded persons in the Red Army should become the business of their work. For this the most suitable persons in the army were the Trotskyites, Zinovievites, and Rights. It was decided to popularize these people by any means in public and military opinion and move them ahead in their service into responsible posts in the military, political and economic lines, and also in rearming and organizational-mobilization work.

As a political figure the conspirators were oriented towards Trotsky and his bloc, in which were included Trotskyites, Zinovievites, Rights, nationalists, Mensheviks, S-Rs, etc.

They considered that in order to carry out all these tasks they needed above all the strictest military conspiracy. Toward this goal they adopted the tactic of double-dealing towards the party and deception in their work.

Towards the end Yakir stated that within him there were two Yakirs. One, he said, was a Soviet man, and the other — an enemy of the people, a spy, a traitor, diversionist, murderer — everything you could name.

In the statements that followed by the accused, in essence they all remained within the framework of Yakir's statement.

Tukhachevsky in his statement at first tried to recant his confessions that he gave at the preliminary investigation. Tukhachevsky began that before Hitler's fascist coup in Germany the Red Army was preparing itself against the Poles and was capable of defeating the Polish state. However, with the coming to power in Germany of Hitler, who made a bloc with the Poles and turned 32 German divisions into 108 divisions, the Red Army in comparison with the German and Polish armies was 60-62 divisions smaller in number. This obvious discrepancy in the armed forces of the probable opponents of the USSR had an influence on himself, Tukhachevsky, so he said, and in view of that he foresaw the inevitable defeat of the USSR, and this was the basic reason he turned towards a counterrevolutionary military fascist conspiracy.

Tukhachevsky attempted to create sympathy for himself among those present in the auditorium on the court as though his professional conceptions in the sense that he had foreseen everything, he tried to prove to the government that the situation that had been created would lead the country to defeat and that, supposedly, no one listened to him. But com. Ul'rikh, upon the advice of several members of the special session, interrupted Tukhachevsky and asked the question: How then can Tukhachevsky connect this motivation with what he confessed at the preliminary investigation, namely that he was tied to the German General Staff and had worked as an agent of German intelligence since 1925. — Then Tukhachevsky stated that of course he could be considered a spy, but that in fact he had not given any information to German intelligence besides conversations in words, although he did admit here that that is also espionage.

After that com. Ul'rikh read to him his own confessions where Tukhachevsky had written that he personally had given written material to an agent of the German General Staff on the organization, dislocation, and grouping of the motorized and mechanized and cavalry parts of the BVO [Belorussian Military District] and UVO [Ukrainian Military District] and that on his, Tukhachevsky's, own instruction Appoga had transmitted to a German agent a diagram with the carrying capacity of military communications, and Sablin, on his instruction too, transmitted a drawing of the northern part of the Letichev fortified area.

After the aforesaid Tukhachevsky confessed more or less what Yakir had already said with a few differences.

Uborevich in his statement kept to the same outline of presentation as did Yakir. He did not add anything new, but tried to deny his participation in the conspiracy before 1934 and to say that until 1934 he, that is, Uborevich, had worked honestly. Meanwhile, when Tukhachevsky was asked how their conspiratorial center was formed and who was in that center, Tukhachevsky answered that they had not written down any specific constitution about the center of conspirators, but that the active members of the center were: Tukhachevsky, Gamarnik, Yakir, Uborevich, Kork, Fel'dman, and Primakov, i.e. that this was a criminal collusion.

The conspiratorial activity between Tukhachevsky and Gamarnik was divided up in the following manner: Tukhachevsky, Yakir, Uborevich, and Kork worked in the West, and Gamarnik, in the East. Yakir stated that he had been especially closely tied to Gamarnik by mutual information and that Yakir informed Gamarnik about his activities in the UVO, and Gamarnik informed Yakir about the Far East. Yakir confessed that he did not remember any case in which Gamarnik had discussed questions together with Tukhachevsky, Uborevich, Yakir, and Kork. Uborevich confirmed this also, adding that he, Uborevich, did not talk with Gamarnik about conspiratorial questions at all, but knew that he was a member of the center.

Kork in his statement confessed that he had been a participant in the conspiracy and a member of its center since 1931. In that connection Kork expressed his amazement that Tukhachevsky, Yakir and Uborevich had know about the Kremlin conspiracy from 1931, the one led by Enukidze, and had even know all the details of the plan of this conspiracy, but for some reason had not said anything about this to the court and considered themselves conspirators only since 1934.

Kork confessed that he, Kork, had reported to Tukhachevsky about the Kremlin conspiracy in 1931 in the presence of Yakir and Uborevich and therefore Kork drew the conclusion that Tukhachevsky, Uborevich, and Yakir had officially entered into a conspiracy in 1931 and not in 1934. — "Is it possible that they," — said Kork — "hearing my report about the Kremlin conspiracy were still not members and participants in a conspiracy? They are concealing all this from the court, and concealed it from the investigation."

Further Kork confessed about how the conspiracy in the Kremlin itself was supposed to have developed, into which were drawn: himself — Kork, Gorbachev, Egorov — the former head of the school in the name of the VTsIK [All-Union Central Executive Committee, the executive branch of the Soviet Union until 1934] and Imeninnikov — the "pompolit" [assistant to the commander for political matters] of the school of the VTsIK.

For the rest Kork said the same things that he had already confessed at the preliminary investigation. But Kork especially emphasized the question of the plan for defeat in relation to the Red Armies during wartime and, in connection with this plan, he talked about the last military games carried out by the General Staff of the RKKA where it was considered that Latvia, Lithuania, and Estonia would be neutral states during wartime, when in fact the Germans were supposed to organize the main grouping of their forces with the plan to strike the Red Armies in the right flank precisely through these neutral countries.

To my question — why did Kork consider that the Germans were supposed to strike their main blow from the territory of neutral states, where he knew this from, and whether Kork knew if an agreement between the neutral states and the Germans exists at this time, or whether he himself was simply presupposing that the Germans would not observe the neutrality of these states — Kork answered that he knew that from the words of Tukhachevsky and did not know any other sources. However he, Kork, considers that this version is obviously subversive and defeatist precisely because the General Staff of the RKKA in its plans proceeds from the assumption that the neutrality of the aforementioned states would not be violated by the Germans. In the military games Tukhachevsky had played on the "blue" side and deliberately held himself to the stated views of the General Staff of the RKKA, i.e. that the neutrality of these states would not be violated by Germany and therefore Tukhachevsky directed the main blow of the German armies somewhat more to the south, so as not to give the impression that Germany would fight from the direction of the neutral states.

Despite the fact that this extremely important current question was not touched on in any supplementary confessions of Tukhachevsky's, nevertheless the members of the court decided that Tukhachevsky ought not to be asked about this question. However, I personally think that this question is extremely interesting from the point of view that, evidently, Tukhachevsky was aware of an German agreement on this question with the so-called neutral in wartime, Baltic states.

After these games, as Kork confessed, the conspirators considered that they had achieved the main thing in their sabotage in pursuing their goal of the defeat of the Red Army.

Further Kork confessed that he, being the commander of the armies of the Moscow Military District, carried out, with the help of Enukidze, Yagoda, Gorbachev, Veklichev, Aronshtam, Germanovich, Egorov, and Imeninnikov, the selection of the command and leadership forces such that the Moscow garrison, besides the Kremlin conspiracy, would be able to carry out a military coup. Towards this goal Tukhachevsky, Gamarnik, Uborevich, Yakir, and he, Kork, had selected special cadre. They tried to appoint their people to the positions of commanders of the fighting sections and units, chiefs of magazines, of construction, workers in armaments, in mobilization work, in military preparedness, etc. Among other things Kork stated that he learned about a number of questions only at the trial itself, that before this they had been unknown to him. Obviously, Kork suggested, the leaders of the conspiracy, specifically Tukhachevsky, had hidden many matters from him, like, for example, Gamarnik's work in the East and the contact with Trotsky, Bukharin, and Rykov. However Kork confessed that he was aware all the same that the leaders of the military-fascist counterrevolutionary organization regarded the contact with Trotsky and the Rights as a temporary phenomenon. Concerning this Tukhachevsky had told Kork, in the sense that the Trotskyites, Rights et al. were only fellow travelers for the time being, but when the military coup had taken place then he, Tukhachevsky, would play the role of Bonaparte. And on November 29, 1934, as Kork confessed, Tukhachevsky had in his apartment stated this completely and categorically, in the presence of all those who were there.

Eideman could not say anything at the trial, but simply stood up and said that he, Eideman, had nothing more to confess other than what he had confessed at the preliminary investigation, and that he confessed that he was guilty.

Putna — that patented spy, devoted Trotskyite of the contemporary form of Trotskyism, acting under the flag of fascism, confessed that, in joining this organization, he had always remained faithful to the principles of honest working for the conspirators while at the same time he himself, supposedly, did not believe in the justice of his actions. To the question by com. Dybenko about his mockery of c. Belov in Berlin — Putna answered that this had been only one small episode from among the more significant and serious crimes he had committed.

Primakov comported himself at the trial, from the viewpoint of manliness, if you please, better than the rest. But in his statement he added nothing to what he had confessed at the preliminary investigation. Primakov very insistently denied the allegation that he had led a terrorist group against com. Voroshilov made up of Shmidt, Kuz'michev, and others, and likewise that he had supposedly before his arrest led a Leningrad terrorist group made up of Bakshi, the former chief of the staff of the mechanized corps, and Ziuk. He denied that on the basis that supposedly he, Primakov, had been entrusted by Trotsky with a more serious task — to raise an armed insurrection in Leningrad, for which he Primakov must keep himself strictly apart from any terrorist groups, break his ties with all Trotskyites and Rights, and at the same time win for himself authority and absolute trust from the party and the army command.

Primakov however did not deny that he had earlier led a terrorist group and for that purpose had asked that Shmidt be appointed to the position of commander of the mechanized corps.

In connection with this special assignment of Trotsky's, Primakov had worked on the 25th cavalry division headed by the commander of the division. Zybin. According to his words Zybin had been supposed to meet Trotsky at the border once the rebels had taken over Leningrad. For this same purpose he was preparing one SD [??????????, infantry division] and an MK [either 'mechanized' or 'motorized' corps]. Exactly which SD — I don't know, but we can figure that out from what he said.

/ 9 /

Fel'dman confessed the same thing as had Kork in the sense that Fel'dman also had not known everything about the plans of the conspirators and he learned much that was new to him from the indictment and during the course of the trial. Nevertheless Fel'dman confessed that he had been an active member of the center since 1934 but emphasized that Tukhachevsky had been working on him since he had served in the Leningrad Military District that Tukhachevsky had commanded.

Fel'dman admitted that it was at that time that he had become close to Tukhachevsky and when Tukhachevsky, having already become vice-commissar [of defense] disclosed to Fel'dman the existence of the conspiracy Fel'dman hesitated whether to take Tukhachevsky by the collar and turn him in, or to join himself to the conspirators. He chose the latter.

Further Fel'dman confessed that on instructions from Tukhachevsky and Gamarnik he had chosen members of the organization for corresponding posts. In addition when he had once reported to Tukhachevsky about the results of his work Tukhachevsky had been very dissatisfied with it, since Fel'dman had still not recruited anyone who was more or less well known. And therefore, when Fel'dman had personally recruited Appoga, Ol'shansky, Vol'pe and others, Tukhachevsky was satisfied with this.

Fel'dman admitted that he had not succeeded in appointing many of the candidates chosen by the organization to responsible positions, because the People's Commissar for Defense often did not agree with his, Fel'dman's, proposals, although these proposals had been put to the Commissar with great pressure from Yakir, Uborevich, Gamarnik, and Fel'dman.

/ 10 /

THE FINAL WORDS OF THE ACCUSED

YAKIR:

Yakir spoke for 5-7 minutes. He stated that he had been an honest warrior until 1934, after which he had changed and became an enemy of the revolution, of the party, of his people and of the Red Army, but that within him the whole time there were two men: one Yakir — a Red Army man, the other Yakir — an enemy. At the same time Yakir considered that these two men — one an enemy, the other a Soviet man — ruled within him until he had been within the walls of the NKVD, and when he, Yakir, having been arrested, had told the whole truth to the investigation, and was speaking the whole truth to the court and to all those who were present at the trial, that he, Yakir, having disarmed himself as a counterrevolutionary, had become a real citizen of the Soviet Union, that he "loved" the army, "loved" the country of the Soviets, "his" people and was once again red to work "honestly", as a "Bolshevik", that he was "devoted" without reserve to com. Voroshilov, to the party, and to com. Stalin, — therefore he asked that we look on him now as he had been before.

As concerns his sabotage in the RKKA he confessed the same thing that he had said at the preliminary investigation.

TUKHACHEVSKY:

Tukhachevsky did not add anything besides what he had confessed to at the preliminary investigation, but at the same time he tried to say, very darkly, that within him there had also been two men: one — Soviet, the other — an enemy, and that he likewise asked the court to consider that until 1934 he had worked as "an honest Bolshevik and warrior."

Tukhachevsky from the very start of the trial at court, during the reading of the indictment and during the confessions of all the other defendants shook his head, emphasizing by doing that that, supposedly, the court, the investigation, and everything that was written in the indictment, all this was not at all true, did not correspond to reality. In other words he adopted the pose of a person who had not been understood and who was undeservedly insulted, although from his exterior he produced the impression of a person who was very confused and frightened. Obviously he had not expected such a rapid exposure of the organization, such a quick end to it, and such a rapid investigation and trial.

/ 11 /

At the end Tukhachevsky confessed himself guilty.

UBOREVICH;

Uborevich in his concluding words spoke briefly, like a military man.

The essence of his speech consisted in the following words which he spoke: "I ask you, citizen judges, to take into account, that I honestly worked until 1934 and my sabotage in aviation and in the choice of fortified areas, from the point of view of their tactical usefulness, did not spread, because the fortified areas were chosen when I was not yet a saboteur and enemy. Afterwards, I sabotaged in that I did not see that they were really fortified and a few of the embrasures at the points of the fortified regions were directed not in the direction of the enemy but in a direction disadvantageous for the defender, i.e. I followed the aim of sabotaging the fortified regions.

As for the plan for defeat, Uborevich proposed to build the echelons of attack in such a way that they would be destroyed in the first days of the war, especially the cavalry.

Further Uborevich said: "I, Uborevich, have committed a crime against the party and the Soviet people that cannot be redeemed. If I had a thousand lives, even they could not redeem my crimes. I betrayed my oath as a soldier. For that I must be punished with all the severity of Soviet laws. But I also ask you to consider that I repented in the walls of the NKVD, when I confessed honestly and completely all my crimes."

KORK:

In his concluding words Kork said:

"I have committed a crime against the government and the people, against the country of the Soviets. Until 1931 I was an honorable warrior and commander, and then became an enemy, a spy, an agent, a diversionist, a traitor...". When Kork pronounced these words, a sob could be heard in his voice, tears came to his eyes, after which he paused for half a minute and continued: "... I ask you to take into account that I was an honorable warrior until 1931 and have now disarmed and consider myself a Soviet citizen and will die like a Soviet citizen. Let our party, the Soviet power, and our people know that. I have committed such a great crime that it cannot be redeemed with one life. Let others learn from my example. Let them know that one should never betray Soviet power. We see how socialism is growing in our country. During the period of collectivization of agriculture I hesitated and fell into the camp of fascism.

I hope that Soviet power on the basis of the Stalin constitution, where it says in one of its articles that the Soviet people are great-hearted and that can have mercy even on its enemies — let it consider this.

EIDEMAN:

In order to say his concluding words Eideman could hardly stand on his own legs, he leaned with both hand on the railing that stood in front of him and began his speech by saying that he, Eideman, fell by chance into this organization, having been insulted in being awarded his military rank, having been dissatisfied with the leadership of the army, and also with the politics of the party in the countryside during collectivization, that he, Eideman, unwillingly attached himself to this counterrevolutionary organization and at its behest (and before all at the behest of Tukhachevsky and Gamarnik) committed unbelievable crimes.

/ 12 /

He said: "I, Eideman, have fallen into an abyss without bottom. I gave assignments to people who had been recruited by me and they are listed by me in the materials of the preliminary investigation, — I gave the assignment to blow up the bridge over the Don. This assignment I have through Ivanov; the assignment to blow up the bridge across the Volga I gave through the chairman of the Gor'ky krai Osoaviakhim. The blowing up of the bridges were to have been carried out during wartime. These assignments I received directly from Tukhachevsky. I planted counterrevolutionary groups that would lead uprisings among the Don and Kuban Cossacks upon the assignment of Tukhachevsky and Gamarnik. Who specifically prepared these uprisings, the vice-chairman of Osoaviakhim in Rostov and the vice-chairman of the OSO in Gor'ky krai know about that.

In me, Eideman, there were also two persons. It was not easy to give these assignments, when I saw the development of the victorious march of socialism. I thought many times: who am I — more of a Soviet man or more of an enemy? And sometimes our counterrevolutionary organization pressured me and I fulfilled its assignments. At the same time, when I gave assignments, I almost wept. I understood that I was an enemy of the people, the people that loved me and trusted me.

I ask the court to consider that I was a devoted warrior before 1934 and then became an enemy. I think that my counterrevolutionary work still had fewer results than my Soviet work. I ask the court to consider this."

PUTNA:

Putna in his final word said: "Of course, I don't ask for any mercy from the court, but I do ask the court to consider that I was a commander of the RKKA, during the revolution I fought for it. Nevertheless, after the civil war I became a firm supporter of Trotsky. I thought: everything that Trotsky says is the truth. Obviously, I did not understand the Bolshevik essence of revolution although organically I felt that I was with the Bolsheviks, but nevertheless I remained a Trotskyite. I never thought about where my Trotskyite position was going to lead me. I must honestly confess before the court that just as with the other defendants a determined faith in "our" great Bolshevik state has been established within me. I honestly repented within the walls of the NKVD and became an honest Soviet citizen. In me also there were two persons: one a Red Army man, the other a traitor, a criminal — whatever you want. I violated our Red Army oath, in which it states, that "he who has betrayed Soviet power, government, and the Red Army, will be punished with a merciless revolutionary hand." Therefore I do not ask any mercy, but I hope that the citizen judges will consider my honest service as a commander of the RKKA and will draw from that the appropriate conclusions."

/ 14 /

PRIMAKOV:

Primakov in his concluding word spoke as follows:

"I, Primakov, want the court and the judges to know with whom they are dealing. I wish to do an analysis of us eight defendants: first, as a defendant; second, of our counterrevolutionary fascist organization; third, under whose flag we served.

Who are the defendants according to their social position?

These men in their social relation constitute riffraff. Who is Tukhachevsky? This type belongs to the remains of the counterrevolutionary officer conspiracies against the Soviets. His homeland is fascist Germany.

Kork, Uborevich, Eideman and Putna have their homeland in their countries. There they have their families and their relatives. That is their homeland.

/ 15 /

Yakir — this merchant of the second guild in Rumania, that is where his family is. That is his homeland.

Fel'dman — an American merchant. His homeland, family and relatives are in America. That is his homeland too.

And I, Primakov, am the tail end of a so-called petty bourgeoisie with Trotskyite leanings, having passed through the school of Trotskyism from beginning to end in the course of 18 years. In this school the rejects of human society were concentrated. The Trotskyite opposition and the people who take part in it are the most evil and confirmed enemy.

Tell me, citizen judges, where is there homeland, and where is mine? The Soviet Union is for them a temporary shelter. The homeland of the defendants is where their families, with whom they are tied, live. That is where their homeland is, and not the USSR.

I do not wish that anyone in the world should fall into this fascist-Trotskyite pit.

I must say honestly and openly before the court that we have violated our Red Army oath and you should shoot and annihilate all of us like vermin, criminals, and traitors to the Soviet people. We all know that the Soviet people and its party, the Bolsheviks, are leading the country toward happiness — towards communism.

I, like the others, was a person with two faces.

I must also tell the court my opinion about the social face of the counterrevolutionary organization in which I participated. Who were these people? I know half of the people of this organization like I know myself — that is 400 people. I also know the second half, but somewhat less. And in all that is 800–1000 people in our army and outside it.

If we give a social characterization of these people then, however strange it may seem, I tried to recruit people from among the workers, but nothing came of this. In our organization there is not a single real worker.

/ 16 /

This is important for the court to know. And from this I draw the conclusion that we, the conspirators, imagined that we would be able to lead this huge country and the Soviet people and that to do this we would need a half-dozen or dozen Napoleons. We were Napoleons without an army. We were working for fascist Germany. But it is completely clear that of this half-dozen Napoleons there would remain only one Napoleon and that would be the one who most slavishly carried out the will of Hitler and of fascist Germany.

FEL'DMAN:

Fel'dman in his final word emphasized the fact that their center had not formed in 1934 but in 1931, and could not confess to any more than he had confessed to at the preliminary investigation.

Nevertheless Fel'dman tried to explain how he got involved in this business and pointed out that Tukhachevsky first worked on his when he was still in the Leningrad Military District, and then he took a counterrevolutionary position and carried out Tukhachevsky's assignments.

Concerning his own homeland Fel'dman said until Soviet power came he never had any homeland and was driven as a Jew. In the old army he served as a corporal and in the Red Army earned the rank of Corps Commander (Komkor), which corresponds to the rank of General-Leutnant. And all the same this did not stop him from becoming a counterrevolutionary. He was the man nearest to the People's Commissar of Defense [Marshal Voroshilov], invested with power and trust, and yet he lied and deceived the People's Commissar of Defense like an enemy.

Further Fel'dman said that he had worked like an honest Red Army man until he had transformed himself into a counterrevolutionary, and asked the court, before all those present in the courtroom, to have mercy upon him, that he, supposedly, got tangled up and fell into this affair completely unconsciously. Instead of taking Tukhachevsky by the collar and bringing him to the People's Commissar he lost heart.

Fel'dman asked the court to forgive him, promised to work honestly, said that he had exposed everything in the walls of the NKVD, had taken all the filth upon himself and wanted to wash it off with his blood through service, to be to the end devoted to the party and to Soviet power.

CONCLUSION:

1. Tukhachevsky, Gamarnik, Kork, Yakir, Uborevich, Primakov, Putna, Fel'dman, and Eideman — these are patented spies and not since 1934 but since 1931, and a few of them even earlier were worming their way into our ranks ever since the beginning of the revolution. In order to hide their espionage and counterrevolutionary activity until 1934 the accused, exposed in this by Kork, tried to paint Kork as a liar and confounder.
2. All the accused unquestionably tried to hide the participation of Gamarnik in the conspiracy, evidently because Gamarnik, who presented himself as a political figure, recruited among the political staff of the army and, obviously, was tied not only to the leadership of the Rights, Trotskyites and Zinovievites who are known to us but with a number of other high-ranking civilian workers.

3. From the confessions of defendants Tukhachevsky, Kork, Yakir and Uborevich it may be seen that they had decided to develop on their own initiative a plan for the defeat of the Red Armies during wartime and only after that coordinated it with the German General Staff.

In this connection, during the operational games led by the General Staff of the RKKA they made, for their plan for defeat, corresponding remarks, but in view of their arrests they did not have time to completely work it out and, supposedly, did not have time to pass it to the German General Staff.

From general Rundstedt Tukhachevsky received the assignment to foresee the probable direction of the main blows of the German armies in their plan for defeat: one on the Ukraine — Lvov, Kiev, and the second — the taking of Leningrad by an uprising, which would be extremely beneficial to Germany since the latter could render help to the rebels with their rather significant aviation, and that aviation was to advertise itself as an aviation that had gone over to the rebels from the side of the Soviet forces.

Besides the help of aviation German help was proposed in weaponry and in everything necessary for the successful development of the operation for the seizure of Leningrad.

The accused, though they stated that they did not succeed in passing their plan for defeat to the German General Staff, I consider that the plan for the defeat of the Red Armies, perhaps not very detailed, but nevertheless was transmitted to German intelligence. This was made easier since Kustring was almost always in Moscow and could receive it immediately upon the conclusion of the operational war games of the General Staff of the RKKA. It was not essential to transmit written material when this could have been done verbally.

4. Will the territory of neutral states, the Baltic governments, be used during wartime for a concentration and blow of German armies on the right flank of our armies of the Western front?

It seems to me that this is beyond doubt. I consider that the Germans will unquestionably use them. All the facts of an intelligence nature with which I have been able to acquaint myself, speak of this. It is sufficient to just rapidly study the net of landing fields of Latvia, Lithuania and Estonia, which has been developed at a rapid rate in recent years, to understand that these landing fields in both their quantity and their size are not designed for the small air forces of the Baltic states, but are calculated for the large-scale aviation of Germany.

Therefore I consider it essential to look over the operational-strategic plans once again and to note down the measures that flow from that.

/ 19 /

I cannot refrain from expressing my opinion in relation to the "friendly" arrival of Munters in connection with the exposure of this counterrevolutionary and espionage gang. It seems to me that his arrival is connected like a mask to the failure and exposure of this organization and, evidently, comes at the behest of Hitler.

Hence I consider it absolutely indispensable to verify this matter with all possible means.

MARSHAL OF THE SOVIET UNION

/S. BUDIENNYI/

26. June 1937

No. 0039

Ezhov's Operational Order No. 00485 — August 11, 1937

Operational Order

Of the People's Commissar of Internal Affairs of the Union of SSR

11 August 1937

Moscow

No. 00485

Distributed together with the present order is the closed letter concerning the fascist-rebel, espionage, diversionist, sabotage, and terrorist activity of Polish intelligence in the USSR, and also materials of the investigation into the "PMO" [Polish Military Organization] case. These document disclose a picture of a long-standing and relatively unpunished diversionist-espionage work of Polish intelligence on the territory of the USSR.

It is evident from these materials that the subversive activity of Polish intelligence has been and continues to be carried out so openly that the fact that this activity has gone unpunished can only be explained by the poor work of the organs of the GUGB [Main Directorate of State Security, a part of the Commissariat of Internal Affairs, or NKVD] and the carelessness of chekists [investigative officers of the NKVD, formerly the "cheka" or "extraordinary commission"].

Even now work in local areas on the liquidation of Polish diversionist-espionage groups and organizations of the PMO has not been completely developed. The tempo and scale of investigation is very low. The main contingents of Polish intelligence have evaded even operational notice (of the mass of refugees from Poland, which has been calculated about approximately 15,000 persons, only 9,000 are accounted for in the whole USSR. In Western Siberia, of the approximately 5,000 refugees in that territory no more than 1,000 are accounted for.) The same situation exists concerning political immigrants from Poland. As for agent work [i.e. reports], that is almost completely absent. Moreover, the existing agent work, as a rule, consists of double agents planted by Polish intelligence itself.

This insufficiently determined liquidation of the Polish intelligence cadre is all the most dangerous now when the Moscow center of the "PMO" has been smashed and many of its most active members arrested. Polish intelligence, in anticipation of its further inevitable collapse, is attempting to spread, and in some cases has already put into action, its diversionist network in the economy of the USSR and, primarily, in its defense-related establishments.

In this connection the fundamental task of the organs of the GUGB at the present time is to smash the anti-Soviet work of Polish intelligence and the complete liquidation of the widely-spread diversionist-insurrectionist base of the "PMO", as yet untouched, and of the basic personnel of Polish intelligence in the USSR.

I ORDER:

1. On August 1937 to begin a broad operation directed towards the complete liquidation of local organizations of the "PMO" and, first of all, of its diversionist-espionage and insurrectionist cadre in industry, transport, and in Soviet and collective farms.

The entire operation must be completed within three months, that is, by November 20 1937.

2. Subject to arrest are:

- a) the most active members of the "PMO" who have been uncovered in the process of investigation and not located so far, according to the attached list;

- b) All prisoners of war of the Polish Army who still remain in the USSR;

c) Refugees from Poland regardless of the time of their entry into the USSR;

d) Political emigrants and those who have been exchanged for political reasons from Poland;

e) Former members of the Polish Socialist Party (PPS) and of other Polish anti-Soviet political parties;

f) the most active part of the local anti-Soviet nationalist elements in Polish regions.

3. The arrests to be carried out in two stages:

a) To be arrested in the first stage those listed above, those who work in the organs of the NKVD, in the Red Army, in defense factories, in defense sectors of all other factories, in railroad, water, and air transport, in the electrical power areas of all industrial establishments, in natural gas and oil refineries;

b) To be arrested in the second stage are all those remaining who work in industrial establishments of a non-defense character, in Soviet and collective farms and establishments.

4. Together with the initiation of the arrest operation begin investigative work. The main blow of the investigation should be concentrate on the complete exposure of the organizers and directors of diversionist groups with the goal of complete exposure of the diversionist network. All those who are named during the confessions of arrested spies, saboteurs, and diversionists are to be IMMEDIATELY ARRESTED. A special group of operative workers is to be assigned to lead the investigation.

5. All those arrested are to be divided into two categories, according to the disclosure of their guilt during the investigative process:

a) the first category, subject to execution ["shooting"], which is to comprise all espionage, diversionist, sabotage, and insurrectionist cadre of Polish intelligence;

b) the second category, the less active among them, subject to confinement in prisons and camps for a period of 5 to 10 years.

6. Of those who have been assigned to the first and second categories during the process of investigation, lists are to be compiled every 10 days with a brief outline of investigative and agent materials that explain the degree of guilt of the arrested persons, these lists to be sent for final confirmation to the NKVD of the USSR.

The assignment to the first or second category on the basis of review of the agent and investigative materials is to be carried out by the People's Commissar for Internal Affairs of the republic, the chief of the UNKVD of the province ["oblast'"] or region ["krai"], together with the corresponding Procurator of the republic, province, or region.

The lists are to be sent to the NKVD of the USSR under the signature of the People's Commissar for Internal Affairs of the republic, the chiefs of the UNKVD, and the Procurator of the respective republic, region, and province.

After the confirmation of the lists in the NKVD of the USSR and the office of the Procurator of the USSR the sentence is to be carried out immediately, that is those in the first category are to be shot and those in the second are to be sent to prisons and camps according to the instructions of the NKVD of the USSR.

7. Release from prisons and camps of those who were convicted of Polish espionage and who have completed their terms of imprisonment is to be halted. Materials for review of each of them is to be presented to the Special Commission of the NKVD of the USSR [the "Osoboe Soveshchanie"].

8. The whole work of the smashing of the "PMO" and of all the other sections of Polish intelligence is to be used intelligently and skillfully for the purpose of obtaining new agents against Poland.

In the selection of agents special attention must be paid to measure that will guarantee the organs of the NKVD from penetration into its network of double agents of Polish intelligence.

Lists of all the agents identified for recruitment, with detailed personal information about them, are to be sent for confirmation to the chief of the GUGB of the NKVD comrade FRINOVSKII.

9. Report by telegraph concerning the course of the operation every 5 days, that is, the 1st, 5th, 10th, 15th, 20th, 25th, and 30th of each month.

Signed: PEOPLE'S COMMISSAR FOR INTERNAL AFFAIRS OF THE USSR GENERAL COMMISSAR OF STATE SECURITY —
EZHOV

(Source: Lubianka. Stalin i Glavnoe Upravlenie Gosbezopasnosti NKVD 1937-1938. Dokumenty. Moscow: Mezhdunarodnyi Fond 'Demokratia'; Izdatel'stvo „Materik“, 2004, Document No. 166, pp. 301-303.

Ezhov Interrogations — 1939-40

Introduction

We do not know how many interrogations of Ezhov are in existence. All the prosecution materials concerning virtually all the important matters of the later 1930s in the USSR are still top-secret, kept in the Presidential Archives of the Russian Federation. I have simply translated those texts that have been published as of this date (July 2010).

I have compiled and translated these confessions from the following "semi-official" sources:

Briukhanov, Boris Borisovich, and Shoshkov, Evgenii Nikolaevich.
Opravdaniu ne podlezhit. Ezhov i Ezhovshchina 1936-1938 gg. Sankt-Peterburg: OOO "Petrovskii Fond" 1998.

Polianskii, Aleksei. Ezhov. Istoriia «zheleznogo» stalinskogo narkoma. Moscow: «Veche», «Aria-AiF», 2001.

Pavliukov, Aleksei. Ezhov. Biografiia. Moscow: Zakharov, 2007.

I term these sources "semi-official" since they are quoted unproblematically by all the anticommunist scholars. These scholars ignore them almost completely, and ignore their implications completely, but they do not consider the documents false.

In addition I have used these sources, which are more or less "official":

Lubianka. Stalin i NKVD — NKGB — GUKR «SMERSH». 1939 — mart 1946. Moscow: «Materik», 2006.

Petrov, Nikita, and Iansen [Jansen], Mark. «Stalinskii pitomets» — Nikolai Ezhov. Moscow: ROSSPEN, 2008.

A few remarks have been taken from other sources, mainly Vassilii Soima, Zapreshchennyi Stalin, Chast' 1. Moscow: OLMA-PRESS, 2001. Where possible I have checked the text with the versions online at <http://perpetrator2004.narod.ru/>, "Documents of Soviet Power and of Soviet-Communist Terror", which has used the sources above.

Here I only present them in English translation for interested students. Naturally they must be studied. I'm doing that but I do not present my results here.

NOTE: We have one very important confession by Mikhail Frinovskii, Ezhov's Assistant Commissar — that of April 11, 1939. Also published in the Lubianka volume cited above, I have put a translation of it online here.

It should be read in connection with Ezhov's confessions.

Grover Furr, July 31 2010

Ezhov interrogation 04.18 — 04.20.39

According to Pavliukov, this is the 1st Ezhov confession in his file. QQ 519-520 & n. 481 p. 564. Summarized 520-521.

519-520

"Question: You have been arrested as a traitor to the party and an enemy of the people. The investigation possesses sufficient facts to expose you completely at the first attempt to conceal your crimes. We propose that you not wait to be exposed but proceed to confessions of your black traitorous work against the party and Soviet power.

Answer: It is hard for one such as I, who only lately enjoyed the party's trust, to confess to betrayal and treason. But now that I am faced with answering before the investigation for my crimes, I wish to be thoroughly frank and truthful.

I am not the person the party took me for. Hiding behind a mask of party loyalty, for many years I have deceived and been two-faced while conducting a ferocious hidden struggle against the party and the Soviet State."

Summary of other parts of Ezhov's statement.

"Ezhov started the history of his 'fall into sin' in 1921, when he worked in Tartaria and under the influence of anarcho-syndicalist ideas supposedly joined the local group of the 'Workers' Opposition.' In the following years, the period of inner-party discussions of the 1930s, he also supposedly expressed differences in his political views with the general line of the party. However, the investigators showed no interest in digging so deeply into the garbage-heap of history, and they did not permit Ezhov to deviate long from the basic theme."

Quotation:

"Question: What is the point of this expansive story about these or those 'political waverings' of yours? As a long-time agent of foreign intelligence services you must confess about your direct espionage work. Talk about that!

Answer: All right, I will go directly to the moment when my espionage ties were formed."

Summary continues:

"Ezhov related that he was drawn into espionage work by his friend F.M. Konar*, who had long been a Polish agent. Konar learned political news from Ezhov and gave them to his bosses in Poland and on one occasion told Ezhov about this and proposed that he volunteer to begin working for the Poles. Since Ezhov had in fact already become an informant of Polish intelligence, since he had transmitted to them via Konar many significant party and state secrets, he supposedly had no other choice than to agree with this proposal.

* F.M. Konar — An assistant Commissar of Agriculture, he was among those convicted and executed in March 1933 for sabotage in agriculture at the height of the serious famine. Konar had also been a friend of the poet Osip Mandel'shtam, according to his daughter Nadezhda (Memoirs).

The Poles supposedly shared a part of the intelligence received from Ezhov with their allies the Germans, and so after a time an offer of collaboration from the latter was also made.

According to Ezhov Marshal A.I. Egorov, first assistant Commissar for Defense, acted as the middleman [between Ezhov and the Germans]. He met with Ezhov in the summer of 1937 and told him that he knew about the latter's ties with the Poles, that he himself was a German spy who on orders from the German authorities had organized a group of conspirators in the Red Army, and that he had been given a directive to establish close working contact between his group and Ezhov.

Ezhov agreed with this proposal and promised to protect Egorov's men from arrest."

Ezhov interrogation 04.23.39 (04.24.39)

Quotes are same as beginning and end of Ezhov conf. dated April 24, 1939 in Petrov & Iansen, 365-6 and Pavliukov, 522-523.

Pavliukov says 10 pages in length. P&Ia cite same archive, different location, 4 pages in length.

Pavliukov — no sign this confession was forced, or even asked about this (522).

Petrov & Iansen, 365-6:

"I think it essential that I inform the investigation of a series of new facts concerning my moral-personal dissoluteness. I mean my longtime vice of homosexuality.

This began in my early youth when I lived as an apprentice to a tailor. At about the age of 15 or 16 years I had a few instances of perverse sexual acts with other apprentices of my own age of the same tailor shop. This vice renewed itself in the old Tsarist army in frontline conditions. Aside from one chance contact with one of the soldiers of our company I had relations with a certain Filatov, my friend from Leningrad with whom we served in the same regiment. Our relations were "mutual", that is the "female" part was played first by one side, then by the other. Afterwards Filatov was killed at the front.

In 1919 I was appointed commissar of the 2nd base of radio-telegraph formations. My secretary was a certain Antoshin. I know that in 1937 he was still in Moscow and was working somewhere as chief of a radio station. He is an engineer radio technician. In 1919 I had mutual homosexual relations with this same Antoshin.

In 1924 I was working in Semiplatinsk [now the city of Semei, Kazakhstan — GF]. My old friend Dement'ev went there with me. On several occasions in 1924 I had homosexual relations with him in which only I played the active role. [Ezhov apparently means Dement'ev played the "female" role. — GF]

In 1925 in Orenburg I established homosexual relations with a certain Boiarskii, at that time the chairman of the Kazakh oblast' trade union council. As far as I know he is now working as the director of an artistic theater in Moscow. Our relations were mutual.

At that time he and I had just arrived in Orenburg and were living in the same hotel. Our relations were short-lived, until the arrival of his wife, who arrived quickly.

In the same year 1925 the capital of Kazakhstan was transferred from Orenburg to Kzyl-Orda, whence I also went to work. Soon F.I. Goloshchekin arrived there as the secretary of the regional [Party] committee (he is now employed as a chief arbiter). He arrived as a bachelor, without a wife, and I was also living as a bachelor. Before my departure for Moscow (for about 2 months) I had de facto moved into his apartment and often spent the night there. I quickly established homosexual relations with him as well, and they continued off and on until my departure. As with the others, our relations were mutual.

In 1938 I had two instances of homosexual activity with Dement'ev, with whom I had also had relations in 1924, as I stated above. These relations were in Moscow in the autumn of 1938 in my apartment, after I had already been dismissed from the post of Commissar of Internal Affairs. Dement'ev lived with me at that time about two months.

A little later, also in 1938, there occurred two instances of homosexual activity between myself and Konstantinov. I have known Konstantinov since 1918 in the army. He worked with me before 1921. Since 1921 we hardly saw each other at all. In 1938 on my invitation he began to visit me often at my apartment and two or three times he was at my dacha. He came twice with his wife; the other visits were without wives. He often stayed the night with me. As I have said above, at that time he and I had two instances of homosexual relations. Our relations were mutual. I should also say that during one of his visits to my apartment with his wife I also had sexual relations with her.

All of this was accompanied, as a rule, with heavy drinking.

I give this information to the investigation as an additional detail characterizing my moral dissolution.

April 24, 1939. N. Ezhov.

Lubianka. Stalin I NKVD — NKGB — GUKR "SMERSH". 1939 — mart 1946. Moscow, 2006, pp. 52-72.

/ 52 /

No. 37. Communication from L.P. Beria to J.V. Stalin about N.I. Ezhov with attachment of the transcript of his interrogation

April 27, 1937

No. 1268/b Top secret

Comrade STALIN

Attached to this I am sending you the transcript of the interrogation of Ezhov of April 26, 1937. Interrogation continues.

People's Commissar for Internal Affairs of the Union of SSR L. Beria

TRANSCRIPT OF THE INTERROGATION OF THE ARRESTED PERSON EZHOV NIKOLAI IVANOVICH of April 26 1939

EZHOV N.I., year of birth 1895, native of the city of Leningrad, former member of the ACP(b) since 1917. Before arrest — People's Commissar of Water Transportation.

Question: At the last interrogation you confessed that over the period of ten years you carried out espionage work for Poland. However, you hid a number of your espionage contacts. The investigation demands from you truthful and exhaustive confessions on this question.

Answer: I must admit that, although I gave truthful confessions about my espionage work for Poland, I really did hide from the investigation my espionage ties with the Germans.

Question: With what aims did you try to lead the investigation away from your espionage ties with the Germans.

Answer: I did not want to confess to the investigation about my direct espionage ties with the Germans, all the more since my collaboration with German intelligence is not limited only to espionage work assigned by German intelligence, I organized an anti-Soviet conspiracy and was preparing a coup d'état by means of terrorist acts against the leaders of the party and government.

/ 53 /

Question: Confess concerning all the espionage ties of yours that you tried to conceal from the investigation, and the circumstances of your recruitment.

Answer: I was recruited as an agent of German intelligence in 1934 under the following circumstances. In the summer of 1934 I was sent abroad for treatment to Vienna to Professor Norden.

Question: Who is Norden?

Answer: Norden is by nationality a German, who moved from Frankfurt to Vienna for reasons unknown to me, a very big specialist in medical science, who is co-owner of many sanatoria not only in Austria but in several other countries of Europe.

To Vienna, to Norden, for treatment sick people used to go from many countries of the world, including many of the leading workers from the USSR.

Question: Namely who?

Answer: As far as I know, Norden treated Chubar', Gamarnik, Iakir, Veinberg, and Metalikov.

Question: Who recruited you?

Answer: I was recruited for collaboration with German intelligence by Doctor Engler, who is the senior assistant of Norden.

Question: I don't understand what connection Dr. Engler has to the work of German intelligence?

Answer: To answer that question in detail I ask that you permit me to tell about the circumstances under which I was recruited by Engler.

Question: Speak.

Answer: Upon my arrival in Vienna at the end of 1934 I was housed in a very comfortable cottage of the sanatorium.

In the third week of my stay at the sanatorium I entered into an intimate relationship with a nurse whose name I do not remember. The first night everything went well, but during her next shift Dr. Engler suddenly entered my room, found me in a compromising position with the nurse and raised a scandal. He immediately called the nurse, who ran out of the room with a cry, and Engler began to explain himself to me in broken Russian.

He declared: "We have never had such a scandalous event at the sanatorium. This is not a house of pleasure, you will ruin the good name of the sanatorium. Here we have scientists from the whole world, and yet you are doing things like this. I must expel you from the sanatorium, and we will inform our government of this disgraceful affair. I cannot guarantee that this scandalous story will not appear in the press."

I began to beg Engler not to do that and offered him money. Engler became even more heated and demonstratively left.

The next day I went myself to Engler to apologize for my rudeness, for the money I offered him, and told him I would like to settle the whole affair in peace. In a tone that did not permit of any objections, Engler offered me this: "Either you will collaborate with the Germans in future, or we will discredit you in the press. Choose."

Then and there Engler told me that he knew very well who I was, what I do in the USSR and what position I occupy in the part (at that time I was working as the chief of the industrial section of the Central Committee of the ACP(b) and as vice-chairman of the Commission of Party Control).

I was nonplussed and understood that the nurse had been sent to me according to a previously-arranged plan, and asked Engler permission to think a bit. He agreed.

/ 54 /

Since I was not hurrying to decide this question on the second or third day Engler himself approached me and asked: "Well, you have thought enough, what have you decided to do?" Again I tried to beg him to settle everything nicely, without any scandalous stories. He completely refused. Engler declared directly that that day he would report this story to the president of the police, and tomorrow a report about my disgraceful behavior would appear in the Austrian press. "Consider," he continued, "that besides debauchery in the sanatorium you have also tried to bribe our employees."

I decided to agree to Engler's proposal.

Question: The conditions of your recruitment by German intelligence that you have related do not inspire belief.

It is incomprehensible and strange that you should have agreed to be recruited when all you had to fear was publicity in the foreign press about your intimate relationship with some woman.

Speak plainly: how did German intelligence get its claws into you?

Answer: At that time I had only just been promoted to important political work. Publicity about this incident would have discredited me in the USSR and possibly led to the exposure of my personal depravity. Besides that, before this, as the investigation is aware, I had already been tied with Polish intelligence, so there was nothing for me to lose.

Question: And you tied yourself to the obligation to work for the Germans too?

Answer: I had to. Engler demanded from me a short written promise about collaboration with German intelligence, which I did.

Question: That is you gave them a written promise?

Answer: Yes.

Question: Did they give you a code name?

Answer: No.

Question: What else?

Answer: After my recruitment was formalized I asked Engler to inform me with whom and how I was to maintain my relations with them. Engler answer that he himself was a collaborator with the military intelligence of Germany.

He said, in his own words, that he would maintain ties with me personally.

Question: It's unclear how Engler could maintain ties with you if he lived in Vienna and you in Moscow?

Answer: It was the case that Engler proposed to move to Moscow to work to take advantage of the fact that the medical directorate of the Kremlin in 1932-33 had raised the question of the organization in the USSR of a special sanatorium of Norden's type.

As head doctor of this sanatorium it had been proposed to invite one of Norden's assistants. Engler informed me that negotiations were being conducted with him, and he had given his agreement to move to Moscow. However the matter has been dragged out because Moscow would not accept the conditions that Engler wanted.

Question: You have just said that negotiations had begun with Engler concerning his move to Moscow to work. Who was conducting these negotiations?

Answer: Engler told me that he was negotiating with Metalikov, the former chief of the medical directorate of the Kremlin, who would come to Vienna specially for this purpose.

Question: What tasks did Engler give you after your recruitment?

Answer: Above all Engler gave me the task of rendering any cooperation I could towards the quickest resolution of the question of his invitation to Moscow. I promised Engler to take all the measures that I could to speed up this question.

Question: Did you fulfill this demand of Engler's?

/ 55 /

Answer: Upon my return to Moscow I immediately talked with Metalikov and recommended that he put this question before the Council of People's Commissars of the USSR for resolution.

After a little time Metalikov informed me that the CPC had rejected this proposal. Then I advised Metalikov to put the question to the Central Committee of the ACP(b).

The Politburo of the CC ACP(b) decided not to invite Engler and instead to send a team of Soviet doctors to Norden to work, and after that to select specialists from among them for the position of chief doctor for the "Barvikh" sanatorium, which would be founded anew along Norden's line.

This is why Engler's arrival in Moscow did not take place.

Question: Did you pass to Engler for German intelligence any information that constituted specially guarded state secrets of the Soviet Union?

Answer: During the time of my direct contact with Engler in Vienna and then in Bad Gastein (a spa of radioactive waters in Austria) where he came twice to contact me I informed Engler only about the general situation in the Soviet Union and the Red Army, in which he was especially interested.

Question: You are avoiding a direct answer. The investigation is interested in the question of what information of an espionage character was given by you to Engler?

Answer: Within the limits of what I knew by memory I told Engler everything about the situation of armament and military preparedness of the Red Army, especially emphasizing the weakest places in the military preparedness of the RKKA [Workers' and Peasants' Red Army, the full name for the Red Army at that time — GF]. I told Engler that the Red Army was very backward in artillery, both in the quality of artillery weapons and in their quantity, and was significantly behind the artillery armament of the leading capitalist countries.

In touching upon the general economic situation in the USSR I told Engler about the difficulties of building the kolkhozes and about the great problems in the country's industrialization, stopping especially upon the slow assimilation of the newly constructed enterprises. I illustrated this with the example of the Stalingrad tractor factory, where at the moment that production was under way a significant part of its valuable equipment had already broken down. Consequently, as I told Engler, success in the area of industrialization of the USSR is doubtful.

Further I informed Engler of the immense disproportion in the growth of different sectors of industry which had a strong effect on the general economic situation in the country. I especially stressed the backward condition in the group of nonferrous metals and special alloys that was holding back the development of the military preparedness of the Red Army.

Question: You have confessed that you were not successful in arranging for Engler's entry into the USSR. How did you carry out your communication with German intelligence after your return to the USSR?

Answer: I have already confessed that there was a decision about sending a group of Soviet doctors to work with Norden. Upon their return from Vienna one of the doctors who had worked with Norden, Taitz by name, established espionage relations with me on Engler's direction.

Question: When and under what circumstances was your espionage connection with this doctor established?

Answer: That was approximately at the beginning of 1935. Doctor Taitz was always present at the consultations of high-ranking employees who were sick, so I already knew him well. The first conversation, during which he established espionage relations with me in Engler's name, took place in my apartment, to which he came under the pretense of a regular examination. After the usual questions about my health he began to tell me about his trip to Vienna. After he told me about his stay at Norden's sanatorium he informed me that he had become well acquainted with doctor Engler who asked him to give me his regards, since we were well acquainted.

/ 56 /

In our conversation about Engler Tait's carefully told me about the incident that had taken place in Vienna involving me and the nurse. In a joking tone I referred to my own carelessness and asked him whether any of the other doctors who went to practice with Norden knew about this incident. He quieted my anxiety and told me that no one besides Engler and himself knew about this incident and added that he was aware of the "good" relations that had been established between Engler and myself. It was clear to me that he knew everything and I directly asked him what assignments doctor Engler had asked him to give me. Tait's told me that Engler had assigned me to establish contact with him in espionage work and to maintain this contact until there was no longer a need for it, and to transmit through him all information that interested Engler.

Question: Where is this Tait's at present?

Answer: He was arrested in 1937 and, as far as I remember, was shot.

Question: How long did your ties with him last?

Answer: Roughly throughout the year 1935.

Question: Where did your conspiratorial meetings take place?

Answer: On all the occasions when I had to transmit one or another bit of espionage information our meetings took place in my apartment. Tait's would come to me under pretense of checking up on my health.

Question: What assignments for espionage work did you receive from Tait's?

Answer: According to Tait's, Engler was interested most of all in secret information about the armament of the Red Army and in all the facts about the defense capabilities of the USSR. At that time I headed the industrial division of the CC ACP(b) and was at the same time the vice-chairman of the Party Control Commission, which in practice I led.

In the PCC there was a military group headed by N. Kuibyshev. The work of the group and its materials were of an especially secret nature and therefore the group was under my direction. The materials that were assembled by the military group of the PCC concerning questions of the condition or investigation of one or another kind about the armies and their armament were sent only to the Defense Committee and to me. As a rule I would take all these documents periodically to my apartment and during Taits' visit would give them to him for a short time, after which he would return them to me.

I know that Taits photographed most of these notes and passed them on to the proper party.

Question: Did he tell you about this?

Answer: Yes, once I was interested in how and where he transmitted the information he received from me. Taits told me that he transmitted this information in photographed form to a certain person in the German embassy who then would transmit these photographs to German intelligence.

Question: How did he get into the German embassy?

Answer: Besides his basic work in the medical directorate of the Kremlin doctor Taits also cared for the workers in the German embassy in Moscow.

Question: Do you remember the nature of the information that you passed to Taits?

Answer: Yes, I remember.

Question: Please be specific.

/ 57 /

Answer: During the time of my relations with doctor Taits I passed on a large quantity of reports and notes on questions of armament, of the materiel and food acquirement, of the moral and political condition and military preparedness of the Red Army. These materials contained exhaustive numerical and factual information of various military forces, types of armament, and condition of military districts.

During this same time I passed on to Tait's information about the course and the insufficiencies in military aviation, about the slow penetration of new and more perfected types of aviation engines, about the rates of accidents of military aircraft, about the plan for training aviation cadres and about tactical and technical information that characterized the quality and quantity of the aviation motors and airplanes that we produced.

Besides that I passed through Tait's to German intelligence information that the PCC had about the condition of tank armaments of the Red Army. I drew the German's attention to the poor quality of Soviet armor and the failures to integrate the tanks with diesel motors instead of the aviation motors that were used at that time.

Further, I passed on to Tait's exhaustive information about the great insufficiencies in the area of material and food acquirement and quartermaster management of the RKKA. On these questions, by the way, there was a special session of the CC ACP(b), the decision of which I also passed on for the information of German intelligence.

The materials I communicated gave a clear picture of the situation in this important branch of the military. From them it was clear that at the very beginning of a war the Red Army would face serious difficulties.

I passed analogous materials to Tait's about the condition of the chemical, light arms, and engineering equipment of the RKKA, and in addition some materials that characterized the condition of military preparedness and political and morale condition of units of the Leningrad, Belorussian, Privolga, and Central Asian military districts, which were supervised by the PCC.

Question: In what did your further collaboration with German intelligence consist?

Answer: At the beginning of 1936 upon the recommendation of the medical directorate of the Kremlin Norden was invited to Moscow for consultation with a number of high-ranking workers. He stayed in the USSR for 10-15 days.

Of the large number of persons whom Norden consulted I specifically remember Gamarnik, Iakir, Chubar', Petrovsky, Kosior, Veinberg, and Metalikov. Norden also consulted me.

Question: Did you establish relations with Norden in your espionage work?

Answer: Yes, I established ties with Norden.

Question: Under what conditions?

Answer: In order to continue special clinical examination I was sent to Barvikh where I was assigned a separate apartment where I remained for 8-10 days.

On one of those days Norden came to me and gave me greetings from Engler. He said: "Engler is satisfied with your attention and is very sorry that he was not able to go to the USSR. You must go abroad again to finish your course of treatment."

I told Norden that I was healthy and saw no need for any special trip abroad. Then Norden gave me directly to understand that it was the Germans who required my trip abroad and that it was not so much a matter of what I wanted than of the demands of German intelligence.

/ 58 /

Then I asked Norden to give me an appropriate conclusion about the condition of my health, which he did later saying that it was essential that I follow a course of treatment in his Vienna sanatorium and consult again with a series of specialists abroad. On the basis of this statement it was decided to send me abroad for treatment again.

Question: Does Norden speak Russian?

Answer: No.

Question: So how did you communicate with each other?

Answer: I communicated with him through my wife Evgeniia Solomonovich Ezhov, who knows German, English and French.

Question: Did you take that trip abroad?

Answer: In the summer of 1936 I travelled to Vienna and settled into Norden's sanatorium.

However there was nothing for me to do there, since in fact I did not need any treatment. I asked Norden what I should do. He recommended that I go to the spa in Merano (Italy).

Before my trip to Merano Engler said that there a man to whom Engler himself was subordinate in intelligence work would have a talk with me.

Three or four days after I arrived in Merano there arrived Kandelaki, the former trade representative to German, who suffered from diabetes.

Question: Did Kandelaki come to Merano for treatment?

Answer: Merano is a spa where one is treated with grapes which, of course, is contraindicated for Kandelaki's disease.

Question: Then what was the cause of Kandelaki's arrival?

Answer: As I came to learn later Kandelaki's arrival in Merano, like my own, was connected with espionage matters about which I will confess below.

Question: Continue with your confession?

Answer: Soon after Kandelaki Litvinov arrived in Merano, and then Shtein, the political representative of the USSR in Italy who stayed a few days and departed, leaving his automobile to Litvinov.

On the fifth or sixth day of my stay in Merano Kandelaki informed me that the prominent German general Hammerstein had arrived at our sanatorium in the company of the Polish minister of trade whose name I cannot now recall.

After Hammerstein Engler also came to Merano.

Here I consider it necessary to note the following: once when I was walking through the park of the sanatorium I noticed that Kandelaki greeted Hammerstein and entered into a conversation with him.

One evening Litvinov dropped in on me and invited me to go with him to the café. Litvinov addressed himself in German to Hammerstein, who was seated at the table next to us, and exchanged greetings with him. The next day Engler introduced me to Hammerstein.

Question: How did this take place?

Answer: Engler came to my room and said: "I want to examine you", and then and there informed me that Hammerstein had to meet with me.

My meeting with Hammerstein was organized by Engler under the guise of a joint walk with Engler in the park of Merano. During one of our talks, as it were by chance, we met Hammerstein to whom Engler introduced me, after which we continued our walk as a group of three.

/ 59 /

At the beginning of our talk Hammerstein declared: "We are very grateful for all the services you have rendered us." He declared that he was satisfied with the information that the Germans had received from me. But, declared Hammerstein, it was all trivial stuff! The position in the USSR that you occupy is such that we cannot be satisfied with the information that you are giving us. Before you stand other assignments of a political order."

Question: What kind of "political" assignments?

Answer: Hammerstein, knowing that I had already been elected secretary of the Central Committee of the ACP(b), declared: "You have the possibility not just to inform us but also to influence the policy of Soviet power."

Further Hammerstein made known to me the very serious, in his words, relations that the Germans had in the circles of the high command of the Red Army, and informed me of the existence in the Soviet Union of several military-conspiratorial groups.

Hammerstein told me that a number of high-ranking military workers were dissatisfied with the situation in the USSR and had set as their goal to change the internal and international policies of the Soviet Union.

The Soviet government's present policies, continued Hammerstein, will inevitably bring the USSR into military confrontation with the capitalist states, but that this could be completely avoided if the Soviet Union were to make concessions and "accommodate itself" to the European system.

Since Hammerstein did not know Russian I asked him, with Engler serving as interpreter, how serious the relations of leading circles in Germany were with the representatives of the high command of the Red Army.

Hammerstein answered: "We have relations with different circles among your military. Their goal is the same but, evidently, their points of view are different, and they cannot reach any agreement amongst themselves even though we have categorically demanded it."

Question: What assignments did Hammerstein give you?

Answer: Hammerstein proposed that I contact these military circles, and with Egorov first of all. He declared that he knew Egorov very well as one of the most important and influential figures among that part of the military conspirators who understood that without the German army, without a solid agreement with Germany it would not be possible to change the political order in the USSR in the desired direction.

Hammerstein proposed to me that through Egorov I should be current with all the conspiratorial matters and influence the conspiratorial groups that existed in the Red Army in the direction of bringing them close to Germany while at the same time taking every step towards their "unification." "Your position as secretary of the CC ACP(b) will help you in this", declared Hammerstein.

At this Hammerstein departed after notifying me that he would have several more meetings with me.

Question: In whose name did Hammerstein speak with you?

Answer: In that of Reichswehr circles of Germany. The situation is this: even before Hitler's coming to power Hammerstein had the reputation as a supporter of a rapprochement between the German and Red Armies. In 1936-1937 Hammerstein was removed from direct work in the Reichswehr, but since he had more contacts than other German generals among Soviet military workers, he was assigned to lead the so called "Russian business."

Question: Did your further meetings with Hammerstein take place?

Answer: Yes, I had three more meetings with Hammerstein. At the second meeting Hammerstein expressed interest in the details related to the murder of S.M. Kirov, and about how serious the influence of Trotskyites, Zinovievites and Rights in the ACP(b) was.

/ 60 /

I gave him exhaustive information, and specifically noted the fact that there was at that time a sense of despair among Chekists and that Iagoda's position in connection with Kirov 's murder had been shaken. Then Hammerstein said: "It would be very good if you managed to occupy Iagoda's post."

I smiled and answered that "that does not depend upon me."

My third conversation with the German general concerned the conspiratorial work of the military men in the USSR, since civilian matters did not interest Hammerstein as much.

My fourth, and last, meeting with Hammerstein took place in the café.

Question: Give a detailed account of your last meeting with Hammerstein.

Answer: Once Kandelaki suggested that we go to a typical German café. I agreed. Into that café soon came Hammerstein, with whom Kandelaki exchanged greetings and then invited him to sit with us at our table.

Kandelaki talked about something in German with Hammerstein, and then said: "It seems that you are already acquainted with the general?" After my affirmative answer Hammerstein declared that he often met with Kandelaki in Berlin and "would be happy to send me all his best wishes through him."

Before he left, while saying his goodbyes, Hammerstein asked me to "send a hearty greeting to Alexander Il'ich" (Egorov).

Question: What did you understand by "best wishes" that Hammerstein decided to pass on to you through Kandelaki?

Answer: I understood that Kandelaki, like I, was in contact with Hammerstein on espionage work and would serve in the future as one of the channels of my contacts with German intelligence, all the more since a few days later after Hammerstein had departed Kandelaki too left for Berlin, and during his whole stay at the spa he had never received any treatment at all.

After Kandelaki's departure Litvinov began to look in on me frequently and invite me for walks or to the café.

Once, while sitting in the café, Litvinov asked me: "What impression did Hammerstein make on you?" I, somewhat embarrassed, answered: "The impression of an intelligent man." "Yes", said Litvinov, "Hammerstein is one of the most intelligent and farsighted generals of the Reichswehr. The military circles of Germany count on him a great deal. Hammerstein enjoys much influence in the army."

I remember that the conversation with Litvinov took place in the presence of my wife — Evgenia Solomonovna.

Litvinov danced the foxtrot and then carried on with me a rather strange conversation. He declared: "Here we are relaxing, going to restaurants, dancing, and if they knew about this in the USSR, they'd raise a scandal."

When I doubted this Litvinov answered: "There's nothing strange in this, but you see, we have no culture, our political leaders have absolutely no culture of any kind."

"Here you have made the acquaintance of general Hammerstein," continued Litvinov, "and what can come from this acquaintance except usefulness to the Soviet Union? If our political leaders had relations with European political figures, many sharp corners in our relations with foreign countries would be smoothed over. And here you are returning to Moscow, and they could put you through the mill for your acquaintance with Hammerstein."

/ 61 /

At this point the conversation with Litvinov ended. Soon I left Merano for Paris, and from there I went by car to Rome and returned to Vienna by train.

Question: Was this trip related to your espionage work?

Answer: No.

Question: Did you confide in your wife about the espionage character of your meetings with Hammerstein?

Answer: No, I did not say anything to her at that time, I told her about the nature of my ties with Hammerstein later.

Question: You will tell us about that when you touch upon the espionage activities of your wife Evgenia Solomonovna Ezhova, but for now pass on to your practical work in carrying out Hammerstein's assignments.

Answer: In the conversation with Hammerstein it was agreed that I would maintain communications with him through Egorov and Kandelaki, during the latter's trips to Moscow.

Soon after my return to Moscow I invited Egorov to my dacha and began to feel him out about whether he knew about my ties with Hammerstein. But, since Egorov did not report anything concrete, I did not disclose myself to him this time.

On a non-workday he came to my dacha and the first conversation took place in which Egorov told me that he already knew about my meeting with Hammerstein, with whom he himself had long had ties.

Our conversation was interrupted by the unexpected appearance at my dacha of guests, in view of which Egorov and I arranged to continue the conversation we had begun in the next few days.

Question: Did this following meeting with Egorov take place?

Answer: Yes. After three or four days Egorov came to my place against and this time told me in detail about the existence in the RKKA of a group of conspirators consisting of important military men and headed by himself, Egorov.

Egorov further gave me the names of the participants of the conspiratorial group that he led: Budiennyi, Dybenko, Shaposhnikov, Kashirin, Fed'ko, the commander of the Transbaikal military district, and a number of other important commanders whose names I will remember and give in a supplement.

Further Egorov said that in the RKKA there exist two more groups competing with each other: the Trotskyist group of Gamarnik, Iakir and Uborevich, and the officer-Bonapartist group of Tukhachevsky.

Question: You will tell us later in detail about the nature and makeup of each group in particular. For now, please discuss in detail your further conversation with Egorov about Hammerstein.

Answer: In my conversation with Egorov I told him in detail about all my meetings and conversations with Hammerstein and notified him that I already knew from Hammerstein about the existence in the RKKA of several conspiratorial groups.

Then I communicated to Egorov that Hammerstein saw as one of our fundamental tasks to unify all the military conspiratorial groups into one powerful organization for a more successful realization of the plans for an anti-Soviet conspiracy. I said that I would do everything I could to carry out Hammerstein's task.

/ 62 /

Egorov told me that he too was in contact with Hammerstein on espionage work, that he maintained this contact through Köstring, the military attaché at the German embassy in Moscow. Then Egorov promised to put me too into contact with Köstring, which happened in that same year, 1936.

On the day we had agreed Egorov together with Köstring, who was dressed in civilian clothes, arrived at my dacha and parked not far away as for an emergency. As though I had by chance noticed Egorov by his automobile I invited him together with Köstring to look over my new dacha. Egorov and Köstring agreed, and we proceeded to the dacha.

After breakfast the following conversation took place between Köstring and myself. Köstring, having presented himself, declared: "I have received the assignment of talking with you personally and establishing a full mutual understanding of our common tasks."

Question: Does Köstring speak Russian?

Answer: Yes, he speaks Russian fluently. Then Köstring informed me that my appointment as People's Commissar of Internal Affairs opened up the perspective "of uniting all those dissatisfied with the existing political leadership and that, at the head of this movement, I would be able to create a considerable force."

Köstring said: "We military men think like this: for us the decisive factor is military strength. Therefore the first task which, as it seems to us, presents itself is the unite the military forces in the interests of the common task. We must strengthen in every way our influence in the Red Army, so as to direct the Russian army at the decisive moment in a manner corresponding to the interests of Germany."

Köstring especially emphasized the necessity of orientation towards the Egorov group. He said that "Alexander Il'ich is the worthiest figure who is suitable to us, and by its aims his group completely corresponds to the interests of Germany."

That is why afterwards, in my practical work in the NKVD I tried in every way to keep Egorov's group from failing, and Egorov and his group were only uncovered thanks to the involvement of the Central Committee of the ACP(b).

Question: Did your conversation with Egorov end with this?

Answer: No, Köstring touched on the NKVD. He said: "In the general plan of the tasks we face, the People's Commissar for Internal Affairs must play a determining role. Therefore for the success of the coup d'état and our seizure of power you must create in the NKVD a broad organization of those who agree with you, and it must be united with the military men." Köstring declared that these organizations, in the army and in the NKVD, must be prepared in such a way as to guarantee united actions at the outbreak of war towards the goal of seizing power.

Question: And what was Egorov doing at this time?

/ 63 /

Answer: Egorov listened to Köstring and he and I together agreed with his proposals.

The conversation lasted one and one-half to two hours, after which Egorov took Köstring with him and went off.

Question: Did you realize your contact with German intelligence through Köstring alone?

Answer: No, I also realized my contact with German intelligence through Kandelaki.

Question: Tell us in detail about your meetings with Kandelaki.

Answer: In the spring of 1936 Kandelaki arrived in Moscow from Germany. When he met with me he gave me greetings from Hammerstein and immediately began a conversation with me about how he was closely in contact with German governmental circles in the person of Göring and had heard from authoritative sources that great significance was given to my political collaboration, as he called it, with the Germans and that the ruling circles in Germany had placed great hopes on my collaboration.

Question: What concrete tasks did German intelligence put before you via Kandelaki?

Answer: Kandelaki oriented me in detail about the subversive work that he was leading as trade representative of the USSR in Berlin by means of concluding negotiations with the German government that were harmful for the USSR.

Question: We are not asking you about this. Do not sidestep the question, answer directly: did you establish espionage contact with German intelligence through Kandelaki?

Answer: Yes, Kandelaki was, as it were, the control contact of German intelligence with me. He would ask me about the pace of fulfillment of the tasks presented to me by Hammerstein, and upon his return to Berlin, according to his own words he would give the information he had received from me to Hammerstein and Göring.

Question: What did Kandelaki say to you concretely about his contacts with Göring?

Answer: At one of his meetings with me, at the end of 1936 or the beginning of 1937, Kandelaki informed me that he had made contact with Göring through Hammerstein.

Göring had directed Kandelaki upon his arrival in the Soviet Union to inform the Soviet government that he, Kandelaki, had succeeded in pressuring the German government in the sense of offering the USSR a loan and that Economic Minister Schacht, under pressure from German business circles, was ready to make several concessions and offer the Soviet Union credit.

Kandelaki said further that Göring had informed Hammerstein about my collaboration with German intelligence and asked me to work in concert with the conclusion of a credit agreement between the USSR and Germany.

Question: Why was your help needed to conclude this agreement?

Answer: Because it corresponded entirely to the interests of Germany alone and was directed towards strengthening the export from the USSR of primary products essential for Germany's war industries.

Question: What did you undertake to do in order to accomplish the Germans' task?

Answer: I promised Kandelaki my support and in fact I did negotiate with Rozengol'ts about the desirability of concluding such an agreement. As a result the People's Commissariat for Foreign Trade rendered a positive decision concerning this agreement.

/ 64 /

Question: How did your espionage work proceed further?

Answer: In the summer of 1937, after the trial of Tukhachevsky, Egorov in the name of German intelligence set before me the question of the necessity to build all the espionage work in the army and the NKVD in such a way as to organize, under certain conditions, the seizure of power without waiting for a war, as we had agreed according to the preliminary plan.

Egorov said that the Germans explained this alteration by the fear lest the destruction which had begun of the anti-Soviet formations in the army reach us, i.e. me and Egorov.

According to Egorov the Germans proposed that we communicate to them our concrete ideas about this question as soon as possible.

We discussed this new situation with Egorov and arrived at the conclusion that the Party and the popular masses were behind the leadership of the ACP(b) and that the soil for this coup d'état had not been prepared. Therefore we decided that it was necessary to get rid of Stalin or Molotov under the flag of some other kind of anti-Soviet organization in order to create the conditions for my further advancement towards political power. After that, once I occupied a more leading position, the possibility would be created for further, more decisive, changes in the politics of the Party and the Soviet Union that corresponded to the interests of Germany.

I asked Egorov to transmit to the Germans through Köstring our ideas and to request the opinion of governmental circles in Germany about this question.

Question: What answer did you receive?

Answer: Soon after that, according to the words of Köstring, Egorov informed me that the government circles of Germany agreed with our proposal.

Question: What measures did you undertake to realize your traitorous designs?

Answer: I decided to organize a conspiracy within the NKVD and to attract to it people through whom I could carry out terrorist acts against the leaders of the Party and government.

Question: Can it be that it was only after your talk with Egorov that you decided to form a conspiratorial organization within the NKVD?

Answer: No. In reality the situation was as follows: long before this conversation with Egorov, at the time of my appointment as People's Commissar for Internal Affairs, I took a group of workers with me into the NKVD who were closely tied to me in counterrevolutionary work. In that way my confession that I began to organize a conspiracy should be understood only in the sense that in connection with my negotiations with Hammerstein and the establishment of contact with the military conspirators it was necessary in the NKVD to develop more broadly, to force, the patching together of the conspiratorial organizations in the NKVD itself.

Question: Give the names of those persons who were tied with you in counterrevolutionary work whom you took with you into the NKVD?

Answer: Litvin, Tsesarsky, Shapiro, Zhukovsky and Ryzhov.

Question: Who from among the old NKVD workers was drawn by you into the anti-Soviet conspiracy?

Answer: Once I was People's Commissar for Internal Affairs after a certain space of time I drew closer some from among the NKVD workers, and many former members of the conspiratorial organization in the NKVD, both Iagodists and North Caucasus men, were moved into responsible positions.

All these three groups were headed by me.

/ 65 /

Question: Name the participants of these conspiratorial groups in the NKVD.

Answer: 1. Members of the group which I personally formed were: Litvin, Tsesarsky, Shapiro, Zhukovsky and Ryzhov;

2. Among the members of the conspiratorial group of "North Caucasus men" were: Frinovsky, Dagin, Evdokimov (although Evdokimov was not an NKVD worker, but I will give exhaustive confessions about him and his group of NKVD workers separately);

3. The third group of conspirators consisted of Bel'sky, Uspensky, Zhurbenko, Reikhman, Liushkov, Passova, Gendin, and Iartsev.

These persons were in the conspiratorial organization headed by Iagoda and Balitsky even before I drew them into anti-Soviet work.

I kept these cadre of conspirators and at different times drew them into anti-Soviet work in the NKVD that was carried out under my leadership.

I will give exhaustive confessions separately about all of these members of this group.

Question: Did you bring those whom you have mentioned above up to date?

Answer: Yes, I made known to each of these persons to one degree or another the organization of the conspiracy, the goals and tasks that we were pursuing. In sum, all of them knew about the existence of the conspiracy and carried out the orders given to them in the course of anti-Soviet conspiratorial work. Each of them was given by me the task of broadening our organization by means of attracting people who were capable of carrying out without question all our directives concerning anti-Soviet work.

As for Evdokimov and Frinovsky, they were fully brought up to date by me about the conspiracy, knew absolutely everything, including about my contacts with the group of military conspirators in the RKKA and with military circles of Germany.

Question: The investigation is letting you know in advance that you will be specially interrogated about the conditions of the recruitment of each of the participants of the conspiracy whom you have named. But now confess how your contact with German intelligence was carried out after this?

Answer: Contact with German intelligence I continued to carry out through Köstring.

Question: Where did your conspiratorial meetings with Köstring take place?

Answer: In the conspiratorial apartment of the NKVD on Gogolevsk boulevard (Balitsky's former villa).

Question: How many conspiratorial meetings did you have with Köstring and how were they organized?

Answer: I had two conspiratorial meetings with Köstring at this apartment. As previously arranged between us Köstring appeared at this apartment under the name "Ivanov." The persons who took care of the apartment were informed well in advance by me to let Ivanov through unhindered.

Question: And did the personnel who took care of the apartment know who "Ivanov" was?

Answer: No, no one knew about my meetings with Köstring.

Question: Tell us Köstring's external characteristics.

Answer: Köstring is taller than average height, of normal build, with a typical German face, an even nose, prominent chin, shaves his beard, has a moustache.

Question: Summarize the contents of your talks with Köstring.

/ 66 /

Answer: The fact is that not long before my second meeting with Köstring there appeared the accusation against Egorov to the Central Committee exposing Egorov in anti-Soviet conversations.

As a result of a verification that was carried out specially about this accusation Egorov was freed from the post he occupied and transferred to work in the Transcaucasus military district.

Egorov took his removal from the office of first assistant to the Commissar of Defense very hard and regarded this fact as the beginning of his exposure.

In a conversation with Köstring I informed him about the removal of Egorov from the post he occupied, to which Köstring urged me to preserve Egorov from exposure at any cost.

I also informed Köstring that I had formed a conspiratorial organization in the NKVD of the USSR, which was successfully carrying out its subversive work. Köstring approved of my measures, after which we began to negotiate about the manner and form of our further contacts.

Question: About what did you negotiate?

Answer: Köstring proposed to me that, in the event of emergency, to contact him through Fed'ko, who had also been drawn into espionage work and to whom Köstring had official access since he was the Vice-commissar for Defense.

Question: Why was it necessary for you to maintain contact with Köstring through yet another intermediate link, if you were in contact with him directly? There is something missing in your account.

The investigation demands that you stop trying to avoid answering and give a truthful confession.

Answer: This proposal did not come from me but from Köstring, and here is why. According to my agreement with Köstring I maintained permanent contact with him through Egorov, and only in extraordinary cases could a direct meeting with me be arranged.

This arrangement of contact was dictated by the needs of conspiracy.

After Egorov left for work in the Transcaucasus Köstring wanted for contact with me instead of Egorov to use Fed'ko, who because of the position he occupied was able to meet with Köstring without fear. But since I had never even met Fed'ko, even though I agreed in principle to have an intermediary person for contact with the Germans, I still rejected Fed'ko's candidacy.

Question: Whom did you decide on?

Answer: I personally did not propose anyone and asked for a chance to think over the question before our next meeting and come up with an appropriate person.

Question: Whom did you name?

Answer: I personally did not name anyone. At my next meeting with Köstring which took place approximately in July 1938 Köstring gave me the names of several persons through whom he considered it possible to maintain contact with me.

As contact persons Köstring proposed: Zakhar Belen'ky, Zhukovsky (my former assistant) and Khoziainov, the assistant to the chief of the Naval Directorate of the People's Commissariat for Water Transportation.

Question: Which of these did you use for contact with Köstring?

Answer: I decided upon Khoziainov.

Question: Why?

Answer: Because I knew Belen'ky as a talkative, unorganized person, and Zhukovsky was famous for his former ties to Trotskyists. I preferred Khoziainov to them because I had the ability to meet with him at any time in the People's Commissariat of Water Transportation under the cover of work relations.

/ 67 /

Question: Is this how your conversation with Köstring ended?

Answer: No, I informed Köstring about further arrests among military workers and declared to him that I did not have the power to prevent these arrests, and in particular I reported about the arrest of Egorov, which had the possibility of causing the ruin of the whole conspiracy.

Köstring was extremely upset by all these events. He sharply put to me the question that either we immediately take some kind of measures to seize power, or we will be destroyed one at a time.

Köstring again returned to our old plan of a so-called "short blow" and demanded that it be executed immediately.

Question: You will be interrogated about your villainous plans, but for now continue you confessions about your further espionage contacts with Khoziainov. Did you establish contact with Khoziainov?

Answer: Yes, I established contact with Khoziainov. During one of the frequent working meetings with him, in my work office in the People's Commissariat for Water Transport, I asked Khoziainov whether he had been abroad. He replied in the affirmative and declared that in his capacity at the People's Commissariat for Foreign Trade he worked in the London and then in the Berlin trade representative offices. Since Khoziainov did not say anything more to me I understood that he had not yet been notified by Köstring.

A few days later when he was in my office for a report Khoziainov asked about the reasons for my interest in his work abroad. It was during this conversation that Khoziainov informed me that he had instructions from the Germans to get into contact with me. I agreed.

Question: Did Khoziainov name Köstring to you?

Answer: No, as far as I remember Köstring, when he listed the names of Belen'ky, Zhukovsky, and Khoziainov, these last were in contact with German intelligence through another worker at the embassy but not through Köstring, who carried out intelligence work only along military lines, while the persons named were utilized along the lines of general espionage.

Question: Did you have any more meetings with Köstring?

Answer: I did not meet personally with Köstring any more. After that contact between us took place through Khoziainov.

Question: Did Khoziainov know about the terrorist acts which you were preparing against the leadership of the Party and government?

Answer: Yes, he knew. Khoziainov had been made aware of that not only by me but by German intelligence, since during the first meeting after we had established contact between us Khoziainov transmitted to me a directive of the Germans: to speed up at all costs the carrying out of terrorist acts.

Besides that Khoziainov transmitted to me the directives of German intelligence that in connection with my dismissal from work in the NKVD and the naming of Beria as People's Commissar for Internal Affairs German intelligence considered it essential to assassinate someone among the Politburo members and by this means to provoke a new leadership in the NKVD.

In this same period in the NKVD itself there began arrests of the active members of the conspiracy which I headed, and then we concluded that it was essential to organize a mass action on November 7, 1938.

Question: Who is "we"?

Answer: I, Ezhov, Frinovsky, Dagin, and Evdokimov.

/ 68 /

Question: What was your mass action of November 7, 1938 supposed to consist in?

Answer: In a putsch.

Question: Please be precise. What kind of putsch?

Answer: The hopelessness of the situation had brought me to despair and pushed me to any adventure that might prevent the full collapse of our conspiracy and my exposure.

Frinovsky, Evdokimov, Dagin and I agreed that on November 7, 1938 at the end of the parade, during the demonstration, when the military forces were going away, we would create a "cork" in Red Square by means of an appropriate arrangement of columns. We would take advantage of the panic and confusion in the columns of demonstrators and planned to throw bombs around and kill some of the members of the government.

Question: How did you apportion the roles amongst yourselves?

Answer: The organization and direction of the putsch was undertaken by me, Ezhov, Frinovsky, and Evdokimov. As for the terrorist acts, their practical execution was given to Dagin. Here I must add in advance that I reached agreements with each of them separately.

Question: Who was supposed to do the shooting?

Answer: Dagin told me that for these purposes he had trained Popashenko, Zarifov and Ushaev, secretary to Evdokimov, a former Chekist of the "North Caucasus group" about whom Dagin said he was a militant young man fully capable of carrying out a terrorist act.

According to my agreement with Dagin, on the eve of November 7 he was supposed to inform me about the concrete plan and those who would directly carry out the terrorist acts. However on the 5th of November Dagin and the other conspirators from the Okhrana division, including Popashenko and Zarifov, were arrested. All our plans collapsed. Here I consider it essential to mention that when on November 5 L. Beria presented the question of arresting the conspirators from the Okhrana division of the NKVD to the CC of the ACP(b), including Dagin, Popashenko, and Zarifov, I tried in every possible way to defend these men and delay their arrest, giving as my reasons that, supposedly, Dagin and the other conspirators from the Okhrana division were needed to guarantee order during the days of the October celebrations. Paying no heed to that the CC of the ACP(b) proposed the arrest of the conspirators. Thus all our plans collapsed.

Question: Remember that the investigation will demand that you give up all conspirators and terrorists. You will not succeed in hiding even one of these traitors.

Answer now, what measures did you undertake to carry out terrorist acts after the failure of your perfidious plans?

Answer: In the last days of November 1938 I was dismissed from work in the NKVD. Then I finally understood that the Party did not trust me and the moment of my exposure was approaching. I started to seek a way out of the situation I had created and decided not to stop at anything in order to either carry out the assignment of German intelligence, to kill one of the members of the Politburo, or to flee abroad myself and save my skin.

Question: How did you plan to accomplish these plans of yours?

Answer: Now I decided to personally train a person who would be capable of carrying out a terrorist act.

Question: Whom did you recruit for these purposes?

Answer: Lazebny, a former Chekist, chief of the port directorate of the People's Commissariat for Water Transport.

/ 69 /

I knew that in the NKVD there were confessions against Lazebny about his participation in anti-Soviet work, and decided to use this circumstance to recruit Lazebny.

In one of the meetings in my work office in the People's Commissariat for Water Transport I informed Lazebny that there were materials in the NKVD that compromised him, and that either today or tomorrow he would be arrested and that ruin threatened him.

I told Lazebny: "There is no way out for you, you are going to be destroyed in any case, but by sacrificing yourself you might save a large group of people." When Lazebny questioned me about this I informed him that the murder of Stalin would save the situation in the country. Lazebny agreed.

Question: What basis did you have to hold such a frank conversation with Lazebny?

Answer: In general Lazebny had gone around recently like someone half-drowned, was in a state of hopelessness and more than once expressed the desire to kill himself. Therefore he accepted my proposal without hesitation. Lazebny even agreed that after carrying out the terrorist act he would commit suicide at the site of the crime.

Question: Who else besides Lazebny did you recruit as a terrorist?

Answer: Besides Lazebny I prepared as terrorists my old friends Konstantinov Vladimir Konstantinovich chief of Military Trade for the Leningrad Military District, and Dement'ev Ivan Nikolaevich, assistant to the chief of the guard of the Leningrad factory "Svetoch". They gave me their full agreement to carry out a terrorist act upon my direction.

Question: Why did you fix your choice as terrorists precisely upon Dement'ev and Konstantinov?

Answer: In addition to my long personal friendship with Konstantinov and Dement'ev, I was tied to them by physical propinquity. As I have already communicated in my declaration in the name of the investigation, I was tied to Konstantinov and Dement'ev by depraved relations, i.e. homosexuality.

Question: You will be interrogated separately concerning the circumstances of recruitment of Konstantinov and Dement'ev and the specific tasks you gave them. Now tell by what means you planned to accomplish your flight abroad?

Answer: With the goal of avoiding my inexorable arrest I instructed Khoziainov to put the question to the Germans of organizing my flight abroad. After a few days Khoziainov informed me that the Germans did not agree to transfer me to Germany and proposed that I remain in the USSR and continue my anti-Soviet work.

Question: What then, did you agree with the instructions of German intelligence?

Answer: No, I did not agree, and determined to go abroad at any cost I considered turning to the British for help.

Question: What have the British to do with this? Were you connected with British intelligence?

Answer: It was not I who was connected with British intelligence but my wife, Evgenia Solomonovna Ezhova.

Question: How did you know this?

Answer: In the Spring of 1938 I was asked in the CC of the ACP(b) about the nature of my relations with Konar. From this fact I concluded that they were checking up on me, and I began to get nervous and because of this, to get drunk. My wife Evgenia Solomonovna Ezhova asked me many times why I was getting drunk. I was certain about her devotion to me and determined at last to open up to her and tell her about my anti-Soviet work and connections with Polish and German intelligence.

/ 70 /

Evgenia Solomonovna Ezhova soothed me and informed me that she too was connected with the British intelligence services, that she had been drawn into espionage work for the English by her former husband Gladun already in 1926, when they were in England because of their work.

Question: Where is Gladun at the present time?

Answer: As far as I recall in 1937 Gladun was the chief of construction for one of the factories in Khar'kov.

Question: That means Gladun is also an English spy?

Answer: Yes, Gladun, according to the words of Evgenia Ezhova, is an old English spy and, as I confessed above, drew her into espionage work in the service of English intelligence.

Question: What did Ezhova tell you about her ties with British intelligence?

Answer: Ezhova told me that she was tied with the intelligence service of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of England and gave information about the situation in the USSR and the political attitudes of the Russian intelligentsia. In her espionage aims Ezhova used me as well, as I freely shared with her all the secret materials that I had.

Question: You are lying. You were aware of your wife's, E.S. Ezhova's, connections with English intelligence long before 1938, and you not only knew about this but actively collaborated with your wife in the service of the English. For this reason you must answer before the investigation.

State frankly with whom else was Ezhova connected in her espionage work in the USSR?

Answer: With Zinaida Glikina and Mikhail Kol'tsov.

Question: The investigation will return to the question of the nature of the espionage connections of Ezhova, Glikina, and Kol'tsov, but now confess how you wished to have recourse to the aid of English intelligence to organize your flight abroad?

Answer: Since my wife died in December 1938, and the Germans refused to convey me to Germany, I myself undertook measures to establish contact with the English.

Question: What measures did you undertake to establish ties with the English?

Answer: From the materials of the NKVD I knew that the chief of the Baltic steamships in Leningrad Mel'nikov was tied in espionage work with a British agent, the former chief of the port of Leningrad, Bronshtein, now convicted.

I informed Evdokimov about these materials and proposed that he recruit Mel'nikov into our conspiratorial organization.

Soon Evdokimov informed me that he had been able to recruit Mel'nikov and the latter agreed to participate in the anti-Soviet conspiracy.

In about the end of January or the beginning of February of this year Mel'nikov turned to me with a declaration about permitting him to go to England on matters related to his work.

I decided to make use of this pretext and tell Mel'nikov about the materials I was aware of about his espionage work with the English spy Bronshtein.

Further, I decided to say to him that I knew from Evdokimov about Mel'nikov's participation in an anti-Soviet conspiracy, and to give him the task upon his trip to England to contact English governmental circles and ask in my name for help in getting me to England, reminding them that my wife E.S. Ezhova had been a collaborator with English intelligence.

Question: Did you have such a conversation with Mel'nikov?

/ 71 /

Answer: No, that conversation did not take place, since at about that time the Party conferences began. I postponed Mel'nikov's work trip to England till the end of the 18th Party Congress, to which Mel'nikov was a delegate.

After the congress I was arrested.

Question: Your confessions about Mel'nikov are unconvincing. You are attempting, completely in vain, to hide your real connections with English intelligence.

Answer: I have no intention whatsoever to hide anything from the investigation. I ask that you give me the possibility to remember everything that I know about this question, and at one of the next interrogations I will give truthful confessions about them.

Question: The investigation is aware that the poisoning of your wife E.S. Ezhova, as a result of which her death followed, was an affair of your hands.

Do you confess yourself guilty of this?

Answer: Yes, I do confess.

Question: For what purpose did you poison your wife?

Answer: I feared her arrest and that in the investigation she would give up everything that she knew about my conspiratorial and espionage work.

Question: How did you accomplish this poisoning?

Answer: After it had been suggested to me to divorce E.S. Ezhova and I informed her of this she became depressed and often stated her intention to commit suicide. I arranged for her to be admitted to a psychiatric sanatorium and attached to her, on her request, Zinaida Glikina and a doctor of the VIEM [All-Union Institute of Experimental Medicine — GF] Ekaterina Gol'ts.

Soon Zinaida Ordzhonikidze, having visited my wife, brought me a note in which Ezhova informed me that she had firmly decided to take all steps necessary to end her own life and asked me to bring her some sleep-inducing medicine.

Question: Did you fulfill Ezhova's request?

Answer: Through Dement'ev, whom I mentioned in this present transcript, I sent her fruit, a statuette of a gnome, and a large quantity of luminal, which Dement'ev personally gave to E.S. Ezhova in turn, after he had received from her a note for me.

Question: What answer did Dement'ev bring you from Ezhova?

Answer: Dement'ev brought me a note from Ezhova in which she said goodbye to me.

Besides that; I received a second letter through Zinaida Ordzhonikidze in which E.S. Ezhova again said goodbye to me.

When I received this letter Ezhova was already dead, having poisoned herself with the great quantity of luminal that I had sent her.

Question: Consequently, you are a primary culprit in the death of E.S. Ezhova?

Answer: Yes, I confess that I am guilty of this.

Question: The investigation affirms that you continue your hostile position and conduct yourself insincerely. That is expressed in that you

1. Remain silent about your ties with Polish intelligence after 1937;
2. Do not tell everything concerning the question of your espionage work for Germany;
3. As persons who took part in your conspiratorial and espionage work you name either the dead or official collaborators of foreign embassies;
4. You hide the persons who together with you led the treasonous work of organizing a counterrevolutionary coup in the USSR.

/ 72 /

Consider that you will be questioned again about all these questions tomorrow and you will have to give exhaustive confessions. This interrogation has ceased.

Written down from my works accurately, read through by me.

N. EZHOV

Interrogators:

Chief of the investigative division Kobulov

Aide to the chief of the investigative division Shvartsman

Senior investigator Sergienko

AP RF F. 3 Op. 24. D. 375. L. 122-164. Original. Typewritten.

Ezhov interrogation 04.30.39

Ezhov interrogation, Pavliukov 525-6 & n. 489 p. 564. Short Q from interrogation on 525-6.

According to Pavliukov 526, Ezhov named 66 names of fellow conspirators in this one interrogation.

Summary:

"The first stage of the investigation was completed on April 30, 1939. In the course of the interrogation that took place on that day Ezhov told about the method of recruiting his subordinates in the Cheka into the anti-Soviet conspiracy and about the basic direction of the sabotage work in the NKVD. This sabotage consisted in massive arrests without any basis, falsification of investigative materials, forgeries, and reprisals against undesirable elements."

Quotation (Pavliukov 525-6)

"All this was done in order to cause widespread dissatisfaction in the population with the leadership of the Party and the Soviet government and in that way to create the most favorable base for carrying out our conspiratorial plans."

Ezhov interrogation 05.05.1939

Pavliukov summarizes it 526. No QQ, no note.

Summary:

"...at his interrogation of May 5 1939 Ezhov recounted the work of the 'conspirators' in the Commissariat of Foreign Affairs. Here at that same time took place the beginning of the large-scale purge (after the removal of M.M. Litvinov, the director of the division of foreign political affairs). Therefore the theme of subversive activity in the Commissariat of Foreign Affairs was especially timely in those days.

Ezhov stated that the goal of this activity was the creation of conditions for the victory of Germany and Japan in the inevitable war with the USSR. Specifically, they undertook attempts to create disagreements between the Chinese government of Chiang Kai-shek and the Soviet authorities, for the purpose, in the last analysis, of facilitating Japanese seizure of the Soviet Far East.

At the beginning of May 1939 confessions were obtained from several arrested NKVD employees concerning the fabrication, at Ezhov's instruction, of the so-called mercury poisoning. Interrogated on this point Ezhov confirmed the fact of the falsification and explained that this initiative was undertaken with the goal of raising his authority even higher in the eyes of the country's leadership."

Ezhov interrogation May 11 1939 by Kobulov

Long quotes in Polianskii 222-226. According to Polianskii, this is where Kuz'min's report of Dec. 12 1938 about Sholokhov and Ezhova is located.

"It is not altogether clear why the closeness of these persons to Ezhova [Ezhov's wife — GF] appeared suspicious to you.

Ezhova's closeness to these people was suspicious insofar as Babel, for example, as I knew, had written almost nothing during the past few years, circulating all the time in a suspicious Trotskyist milieu and, besides that, had close ties to a series of French writers who could by no means be considered among those who were sympathetic to the Soviet Union. Not to mention the fact that Babel demonstratively refused to write off his wife, who had been living in Paris for many years, but preferred to go to see her. Ezhova had a special friendship with Babel. I suspect — in truth, just on the basis of my personal observations — that there must have been ties of espionage between my wife and Babel.

On what factual basis do you make this statement?

I know from my wife's own words that she had been acquainted with Babel since 1925. She always insisted that she had never had intimate relations with him. Their ties were limited to her desire to maintain an acquaintance with a talented, singular writer. Babel visited us at home a few times at her invitation, where, of course, I also made his acquaintance.

I observed that in his relationship with my wife Babel was demanding and rude. I saw that my wife was simply afraid of him. I understood that this was not a question of my wife's literary interests, but of something more serious. I excluded any intimate relations because I thought that Babel would hardly treat my wife with such rudeness when he knew what social position I occupied. To my questions to my wife whether she had the same kind of relations with Babel as she had with Kol'tsov she either remained silent or weakly denied it. I always supposed that with this indefinite answer she simply wished to hide from me her espionage ties with Babel, evidently not wishing to confide the numerous channels of this kind of relationship with me...

What you have said about Babel is not a sufficient basis for suspecting him of taking part in espionage for England. Aren't you just slandering Babel?

I am not slandering him. Ezhova definitely never said that she was linked with Babel in her work for English intelligence. In this case I am only expressing that supposition, based upon my observation of the nature of the mutual relations between my wife and the writer Babel.

What do you think in general about, shall we say, Ezhova's friendship with cultural figures?

This whole specific milieu of people who were tied with the interests of the Soviet people with very thin threads, could not fail to arouse my suspicions.

What can you tell us about her relations with the writer Sholokhov?

I seem to recall that, I think last spring, my wife told me that she had meet Sholokhov, who had come to Moscow and dropped in at the journal "SSSR na stroike". There was nothing surprising in this, Ezhova always tried to meet writers and never missed an opportunity to do so. I was very well informed about this.

Good. And what did you do when you found out about the intimate relations between Ezhova and Sholokhov?

I did not know anything about such relations; this is the first time I have heard about them.

Don't lie, Ezhov. In June and August of last year upon your instructions Alekhin arranged to monitor the letter "N" at the phone number of the Hotel "Nationale", where Sholokhov was staying.

For Alekhin see <http://www.memo.ru/history/NKVD/kto/biogr/gb13.htm>.

I issued no such instructions. Ezhova may have showed up under the letter "N" solely by chance.

But you did know that the intimate relations of Sholokhov with your wife were recorded. Here, take a look at this.

[Here reads Kuz'min report of Dec. 12 1938, acc. to Polianskii 224-5]

Do you admit that a few days after you received the transcript you brought it home and showed the document to your wife, and then berated her for betraying you?

No such event happened. No one ever gave me this transcript of the intimate relations between Ezhov and Sholokhov, and in general I never showed my wife documents from my work and never told her what they contained.

Of course you can deny this, Ezhov. But we have the confessions of Glikina, Ezhova's close friend and a German spy, who is now arrested and is under investigation. Glikina confesses that Ezhova was beaten by you and complained to her and told her about everything. Therefore let me remind you that lying will not help you!"

The following short extract from Ezhov's interrogation-confession of May 11, 1939 is printed in Viktor Fradkin, Delo Kol'tsova. Moscow: Vagrius / Mezhdunarodnyi Fond "Demokratiia", 2002. Published under the auspices of the "Memorial" society, there is every reason to believe that the documents reproduced in this volume are genuine.

Question: Besides Zinaida Glikina, whom you have already named, was anyone else connected with your wife Ezhova E.S. [Evgeniia Solomonovna — GF] in espionage work?

Answer: I can only reply with more or less precise suppositions. After the journalist M. Kol'tsov arrived from Spain his friendship with my wife grew much stronger. This friendship was so close that my wife even visited him in the hospital when he was ill.

Kol'tsov also worked in the commission — or committee — on foreign literature, that is, where Glikina also worked and, as far as I know, Kol'tsov obtained this job for Glikina upon Ezhova's recommendation.

I became interested in the reasons for my wife's closeness with Kol'tsov and once asked her about this. My wife at first put me off with general phrases, but then said that this closeness was connected with her work. I asked her, with which work, the literary or the other, and she answered: "With both the first and the second."

I understood that Ezhova was connected with Kol'tsov in her espionage work for England.

Ezhov interrogation 05.17.39

Interrogation re: murder of Slutsky, organized by Ezhov. Pavliukov 527. No QQ, no note. See Pavliukov 531-2 on Frinovskii's testimony at Ezhov's trial on February 3, 1940, where Frinovskii discussed Slutsky's murder.

Summary:

"The interrogation of May 17 1939 was devoted to the circumstances surrounding the death of the former head of the Foreign division of the GUGB of the NKVD M. M. Slutsky. Ezhov informed us that the murder of Slutskii was organized according to his instructions, and was done because of the fear that Slutsky, whose arrest had become inevitable, might reveal during his interrogation the facts he knew about the criminal activity of the conspirators."

Ezhov interrogation 06.16.39 by Rodos, selections — Polianskii 230-233

"Do you confirm Kosior's confessions about your collaboration in working for Polish intelligence? Where, when and what secret information did you transmit to Kosior, and whom else did you recruit for this work?"

...

Perhaps you did not know Radek and Piatakov well and did not receive any instructions from Trotsky through them?

I never received any instructions from Trotsky from anybody. I knew Radek very poorly, I met him at Piatakov's apartment a few times, but that was about ten years ago!

Were you friends with Piatakov?

Never. Mar'iasin, the president of the Gosbank, introduced us. We would get together for a drinking bout sometimes at his place, sometimes at Piatakov's. And then I always got angry with Piatakov.

All right, then. When was this?

In 1930 or 1931, I can't remember now.

And what did you do with him?

When he was drunk Piatakov often played the hooligan, made fun of those present. Once I was sitting next to him at the table. Piatakov quietly stuck me with a pin and then pretended that it was not he who had done it. A little while later he did it again even harder. I did not hold back and hit Piatakov in the face and split his lip. That evening I went away angry with him and never made it up with him and never had any doings with him at all.

...

You lie well, you bastard. Only I am not Piatakov, I won't stick you with a pin, but I will force you to tell the truth.

...

I'll tell you everything, don't beat me. My guilt before the party and the people is so great that it's senseless to justify myself."

Ezhov interrogation June 19 1939

No QQ. Re: nephews Viktor and Anatolii, and Mikhail Blinov, husband of his niece.

Pavliukov 528; 537.

Pavliukov 528:

"In particular, during the course of the interrogation of June 19 1939 Ezhov told about his conversations of a counterrevolutionary nature, which he supposedly had with his nephews Viktor and Anatolii, and also with the husband of his niece Mikhail Blinov. They supposedly agreed completely with his anti-Soviet views, and Viktor also shared, in Ezhov's words, even his terrorist intentions, although he [Ezhov] never gave him any assignments of that nature."

Pavliukov, 537:

"As has already been mentioned earlier, during the course of the interrogation of June 19 1939 confessions were beaten out of Ezhov according to which Anatolii and Viktor shared his anti-Soviet views and even sympathized with his terrorist orientation. After that they went after his nephews in a serious way. They succeeded in breaking Anatolii first. He not only 'confessed' that he knew about Ezhov's terrorist orientations but also stated that together with his brother Viktor he was read to do anything to help bring about these criminal plans."

[There is NO evidence that Ezhov beaten or tortured to get these confessions — only "supposed" by Pavliukov, 527 bot. — GF]

"As concerns confessions of a personal nature, to obtain some of them the investigators, probably, had to have recourse to the practice of interrogation "with partiality" [i.e. to beat Ezhov — GF]. Otherwise it is hard to understand now, for example, they were able to obtain from Ezhov confessions compromising his nearest relations."

Ezhov interrogation 06.21.39 by Rodos, fm Polianskii 235-238

- summarized by Pavliukov 527 bot.

"If you intend to lie again and make fun of the investigation, then we will not waste our time. I'd prefer to send you back to prison for a week or so to think it over."

Ezhov had already thought about the beginning of his dialog with the investigator and began to talk quickly:

"I admit that I was connected with Zhukovskii in espionage work for Germany since 1932. The fact that I tried to conceal that circumstance from the investigation can be explained only by my cowardice, which I showed at the beginning of the investigation when I tried to minimize my personal guilt, and since my espionage link with Zhukovskii concealed my even earlier ties with German intelligence, it was hard for me to speak [about them] at the first interrogation."

For Zhukovskii see

<http://www.memo.ru/history/NKVD/kto/biogr/gb169.htm>.

"When did you become a German spy?"

I was recruited in 1930. In Germany, in Königsberg.

How did you happen to be there?

I was sent to Germany by the People's Commissariat of Agriculture. In Germany I was well treated and shown every attention. The most assiduous attention I received from the prominent official of the Economic Ministry of Germany Artnau. Having been invited to his estate near Königsberg I spent the time happily enough, partaking excessively of alcoholic drinks. In Königsberg Artnau often paid the restaurant bills for me. I did not protest. All these circumstances made me feel close to Artnau and often without holding back I blurted out to him all kinds of secrets about the situation in the Soviet Union. Sometimes, when I was drunk, I was even more frank with Artnau and gave him to understand that I personally was not wholly in agreement with the Party's line and with the existing Party leadership. Things got to the point that during one of the conversations I directly promised Arttau to discuss a series of questions in the government of the USSR concerning the purchase of livestock and agricultural machinery, in which Germany and Arttau were very much interested.

And how did German intelligence recruit Zhukovsky? Did his recruitment take place through you?

I established espionage ties with Zhukovskii in 1932 under the following circumstances. Zhukovskii was then working as assistant trade representative of the USSR in Germany. At that time I was the chairman of the Raspredotdel of the Central Committee of the Party. When he somehow found himself in Moscow Zhukovskii applied to me with the request to take him along to the negotiations. Before this I had not been acquainted with Zhukovskii and saw him for the first time in my office at the CC. I was astonished that Zhukovskii began to report to me about the situation in the Berlin trade representative office of the USSR concerning questions which had nothing to do with my position. I understood that the basic reason for Zhukovsky's visiting me was, obviously, not to initiate me into the situation of the affairs of the office of the Soviet trade representative in Berlin but in something else entirely, about which he preferred to remain silent for the time being, awaiting my initiative. Not long before Zhukovsky's arrival there arrived at the office of foreign groups, which at that time was also a part of the Raspredotdel of the CC of the Party and was under my supervision, there had arrived materials that characterized Zhukovskii in an extremely negative way. From these materials it was obvious that Zhukovskii had carried out a number of trade operations that had been unprofitable for the Commissariat of Foreign Trade. From these materials it was also obvious that in Berlin Zhukovskii was involved with the Trotskyists and spoke in their defense even at official Party gatherings of the Soviet colony. On that basis the Party organization of the Soviet colony insisted that Zhukovskii be recalled from Berlin. Knowing that these materials would have to come before me Zhukovskii obviously expected that I would be first to begin a talk with him concerning his further work abroad. After Zhukovskii had finished his report I reminded him about the failures in his work. Zhukovskii gave me his explanations and at the end of the conversation asked me my opinion as to whether he might continue his work in the office of the Soviet trade representative or be recalled to Moscow. I avoided any answer and promised to deal with the materials and report the results. At the same time I decided to transmit all the compromising materials on Zhukovskii to Berlin so that Artnau might be able to use them and to recruit Zhukovskii to collaboration with German intelligence. I considered Zhukovskii my man, and he unhesitatingly fulfilled all my assignments concerning espionage for Germany. Zhukovskii had the essential conditions of free access to all materials of the Commission of Party Control, and he made use of them whenever German intelligence demanded from him materials on this or that question. I also created for him in the NKVD such conditions that he was able to use for espionage work information through the secretariat of the NKVD on any questions.*

* Senior major of State Security Semion Borisovich Zhukovskii was shot on January 24, 1940. He has been rehabilitated (Polianskii, p. 393).

Ezhov confession 06.25.39 Rodos regarding poisons

- fm perpetrator2004 Yezhov1.doc; Soima; Polianskii 241-245.

FROM THE TRANSCRIPT OF THE INTERROGATION OF N.I.
EZHOV BY INVESTIGATOR RODOS ON JUNE 25 1939:

"How did you use this NKVD laboratory in your espionage and conspiratorial activities?" asked Rodos, glancing at Kobulov who was sitting beside him.

"ANSWER: I knew that such a laboratory existed and that Iagoda made use of it in his conspiratorial activities. But when I came to the NKVD Frinovskii explained to me that we could not do without the activities of this laboratory, and that it was necessary for our intelligence activities in the Foreign Division abroad. But I did not know anything about what they were doing. I did not even hear about all these experiments about which Zhukovskii spoke, probably Frinovskii allowed him all this. True, once — I don't remember when — Frinovskii told me that Alekhin had in the laboratory some substance which, if a person ingested it, would cause death like that from a heart attack. Such a substance is essential when it's necessary to eliminate enemies abroad. But it had to be tested to see whether it would leave traces on the organism that could be discovered by experts upon autopsy. Frinovskii said that they had a doctor who for this purpose needed to carry out research on the corps of a person who had died from this substance. The doctor needed to carry out experiments on three or four persons. What's the difference how they die, poison is even easier than a bullet in the back of the head. Therefore I agreed, but I never heard anything more about this laboratory and about what they were doing there.

QUESTION: Once again your answer is not to the point. Name the persons whom you liquidated in your espionage and conspiratorial activities by the use of the poisons which you received from this laboratory.

ANSWER: I have no idea about these poisons, I have never seen them.

KOBULOV: Ezhov is lying again, he thinks that somebody will believe him. We remind him that he gave the directive to poison Slutsky. Both Frinovskii and Alekhin have given testimony about this.

Did you hear what we are asking you about? How did you organize the poisoning of Slutsky? — asked Rodos.

Frinovskii actively spoke against Slutsky. He said that this was Iagoda's man and that we could never trust him under any circumstances.

But here Frinovskii does not view Slutskii at all in the way you do — Kobulov suddenly said. Slutskii head the INO (International section) and could have had access to information from abroad about your espionage links. You feared that and poisoned Slutskii after putting your own agent Shpigel'glas in his place. But you didn't manage to cover your tracks. Shpigel'glas figured everything out, uncovered your whole band of spies. You had to take care of your agents in the INO and abroad in the most meticulous manner.

Tell us in detail how you organized the murder of your wife Evgeniia Solomonovna Ezhova by means of poisoning.

I did not organize such a poisoning. She died from a sedative, she drank a large dose.

And here your chauffer confessed in the investigation that a day before Ezhova's death you asked him to take chocolate candies and fruit to her in the hospital. You poisoned these products. Who gave you the poison? Zhukovsky? Alekhin?

My wife died November 21. At that time both of them had already been arrested. And then, I don't remember that I sent my chauffer to her with a present.

KOBULOV: Don't play the fool, Ezhov, we are not children here, and we will not believe that such a hardened bandit and spy as you are did not keep poison and did not know how to use it.

I do not recall the exact date when I saw my wife in the hospital for the last time. Probably it was the 17th or 18th. She told me that she did not want to live, that in any case they would soon arrest her, that she felt there were serious crimes on her account. She asked me that I bring her some kind of poison the next time...

Did you arrange your wife's suicide?

Yes. She knew a lot about my subversive activities, my accomplices, and my criminal plans. But I decided not to give her poison. I did not have any special poison. Normal poison I could of course obtain, but such a poisoning could have brought suspicion upon me, that I had put her to death myself or through accomplices, or simply had given her poison for suicide. I knew that a large dose of sedative could cause death. I told her that I did not have any poison, but I did have a very great deal of sedative. She understood everything.

On the 20th I took a box of chocolate candies and put a packet of Luminal in it. Then I put the box into a basket with grapes and apples and told my chauffer to take all this to the hospital. Of course I committed a serious crime, but she herself asked me about this. She wanted to end her life."

[Soima: "Earlier he had confirmed to Rodos that with the aid of poison Ezhov had put his wife to death.]

Ezhov interrogation 06.29.39 by Rodos re Kedrov's report

- fm Polianskii 250-252

Tell us about your espionage connections with the agent of German intelligence Mnatsakanov.

I never had such connections with him.

And if you think about it the right way. When did you become acquainted with him?

That was, it seems, in 1935. I was going to Vienna for treatment together with my wife. Then I was already a secretary of the Central Committee and Slutskii had the task of security for our trip abroad. He, so to speak, attached this Mnatsakanov to me. He had been a consul or a vice-consul, had an automobile, and drove us around the town.

Yee-es. And he drove you around so well that once you were Commissar you immediately dragged this villain to a leading post in the INO knowing that he was a German spy, that his wife was linked to Polish intelligence, and that his brother was an experienced Trotskyist provocateur!

I didn't know any of this. Slutskii had simply worked with him in Vienna, had a high opinion of him, and decided to take him into the INO apparatus. I supported Slutsky, not because I knew Mnatsakanov a bit. I did not spend much time on INO matters and completely relied on Slutskii in matters of cadre.

So it turns out that it was Slutskii who is to blame. He foisted a German agent onto you, and you knew nothing about him. Is that the way things were?

I do not wish to blame Slutskii for anything. He did not foist Mnatsakanov onto me. In my opinion I did not see this Mnatsakanov in the NKVD even once. In the INO at that time I only met with Slutskii about the work, sometimes with Shpigel'glas, and with Boris Berman.

Why then did Mnatsakanov call you and ask you to intercede for him when they unmasked him and began to expel him from the Party?

He could not have called me. I had a direct connection only with the heads of departments and their assistants. Who among them would even let Mnatsakanov near such a telephone, much less since they wanted to expel him from the Party. That is impossible.

I remind you that he called at that time from Kedrov's office.

About Kedrov I know that he was just a simple worker in the INO. From his telephone it was also impossible to reach me.

...

That's all, we are finished with lying. You have two days to think hard about your espionage work with Mnatsakanov, to remember all the details. And especially how you warned him in Duilov's office not to give any confessions. If you continue to lie and mock me, I'll have your head.

Ezhov interrogation 07.02.39 by Rodos regarding Mnatsakanov

- fm Polianskii 252-260

When and how did Mnatsakanov enter into espionage relations with you?

This was in 1935 when I went to Vienna for the second time to get treatment for my lung disease.

You had been there before, when?

In 1934, I was alone then, and the next time I went with my wife. I was treated the whole time by the famous Professor Norden.

German intelligence summoned you to him, he was an agent of theirs?

Not. The Kremlin medical directorate sent me to him. Many important workers and their wives were treated by him. He had been in Moscow several times, already in the 1920s. And Norden could hardly have been connected with German intelligence. I was told while still in Moscow that this professor was a monarchist and supporter of Franz-Josef and no lover of Hitler, that's why he moved from Berlin to Vienna, so the fascists could not persecute him. And also, he is very old.

Tell us about your first trip to Vienna, with whom did you meet there?

In Vienna Slutskii met me. He had received a special directive about this from Iagoda.

From Iagoda? That is interesting. Did you yourself ask Iagoda to do this?

No. I did not talk with Iagoda about this. At that time I was an assistant department head in the CC and traveled to Austria under a false name. Therefore the CC gave a directive to Iagoda that he should take care of guaranteeing my security.

Well, and who was it who took care of your security then, Mnatsakanov?

No, then Mnatsakanov was not yet working in Vienna, I think. It was Slutskii himself who brought me to Norden at first, and then, twice, some collaborator of his. To be honest I do not remember his name and never met him again.

And when did Mnatsakanov approach you?

In 1935. He met Evgeniia Solomonovna and myself at the station and drove us to the plenipotentiary's office to Slutsky. Then he took us to Norden and showed us the city. He was very polite and kind to us.

I'll bet. Did he connect with you by some code word in the name of German intelligence?

No. He gave me a greeting from Artnau and I understood everything. Thereupon I communicated secret political information to him.

What kind of information?

I don't remember exactly now, but in my opinion Mnatsakanov was interested in information about industry and about the weaponry of the Red Army. Not long before this I headed the industrial division of the CC, and I was very familiar with this information. Probably that's why the Germans asked me such questions.

He gave you tasks of a subversive and sabotage character?

Yes, he did. But in general.

What do you mean "in general"?

At that time I had already become a secretary of the CC, head of the department of leading Party organs, chairman of the Party Control Commission, and chairman of the Commission on Foreign Assignments. German intelligence knew this very well, and I received from Mnatsakanov the task of performing sabotage while in these positions, of subverting Party work.

Be more concrete.

Well, how shall I say it? In my hands at that time was in fact all the work of reassigning of leading cadres. Choosing their activities, punishments, directing them for work abroad. So I did everything that a saboteur could do in such positions. I directed to leading positions people who were weak in professional, political, and moral sense, people who could ruin production, undermine the fulfillment of the Five-Year Plan. To compromise the Party. In the Party Control Commission I managed things so as to cover-up and not disclose elements hostile to the Party, and to deprive of Party membership and shut out in every way those who were loyal to the Party. Abroad I tried to send those who would probably become spies or non-returnees.

What a scoundrel you were anyway, Ezhov — hissed Rodos with pleasure through his teeth. Why, after that there is no place for you on this earth.

I understand that I caused enormous harm to the Party and the country, I repent fully of my crimes and am ready to bear the punishment I deserve for them, — said Ezhov, as if by rote, glancing in fear at the investigator.

Were you familiar with Mnatsakanov's wife, Erna Boshkovich?

Yes, he introduced us to her in Vienna.

Did you know that her first husband was a Polish spy and that she herself works for Polish intelligence?

No. I did not even know that she had been married before Mnatsakanov.

Did your wife meet with her alone?

I seem to remember that not long before our departure Mnatsakanov and Boshkovich took her shopping, and at that time I was in the office of the trade representative.

What do you think? Could Ezhova have established espionage connections with Boshkovich in Vienna? What information do you have about that?

I have no information about that. Evgeniia and I never spoke about Boshkovich. She never told me anything about espionage connections either with her or with Mnatsakanov.

That doesn't mean that there were no such connections. It is already proven now that Ezhova was an English spy and you even confirmed this to the investigation. Tell us honestly, do you know about any meetings with Boshkovich after her arrival in Moscow?

My wife told me almost nothing about her espionage work. But I concede that she might have had espionage connections with Boshkovich in Moscow, since the English and Polish intelligence services often work together.

You called Mnatsakanov to Moscow specially in order through him to get into contact with the Gestapo. Did he ask you about this?

Yes. Before my own departure from Vienna he expressed such a wish and I ordered Slutskii to have him recalled for work in the NKVD as soon as I became the Commissar.

Did you conduct your conspiratorial contact with him in the NKVD building?

Yes, we had that kind of contact right up until his exposure and arrest.

...

What tasks did Mnatsakanov give you? Did you hand over to him secret NKVD information?

He was not interested in secret NKVD information. In the leadership of the Commissariat on the level of heads of departments and their assistants were Gestapo agents. Then many of them were exposed, as was Mnatsakanov himself. These agents knew more detailed information than I did. So I told him about Politburo sessions, CC plenums, conversations with Stalin, Molotov, Kaganovich and other leaders, related to him the contents of secret letters and telegrams of the Central Committee and the Council of People's Commissars.

You did good work. And why didn't you rescue him when he fell? For he asked you to help him.

There was nothing I could do because he was completely exposed and confessed his espionage work.

Were you afraid that he would give you up?

No. No one would have believed him.

You are lying, Ezhov! We have evidence against you. When investigator Dulov was interrogating Mnatsakanov you went specially to his office and told your collaborator: "You are writing? Well, write, write." This meant you were warning him in this way that he should keep silent about you, and then arranged it so that he would be shot as quickly as possible. Wasn't it like that?

Yes, I remember what happened. I was afraid that Mnatsakanov would expose me as a German spy. I wanted him to be shot as quickly as possible, and I achieved that.

On this occasion Rodos was satisfied with his suspect. His confessions fit into the plan that had been thought out in advance and covered many unclear points. He nodded to Ezhov, who had deserved a cigarette, to the packet lying on the table. While the former Commissar lit up Rodos took a copy of a typewritten text from a file.

This was some kind of unrelated and unidentified communication from either a suspect or an interrogator, and perhaps just an excerpt from an anonymous denunciation. In the NKVD it was considered impermissible to take an interest in the source of operational information and, having received this paper from Kobulov, Rodos did not add any details to it.

Someone had informed about an amorous contact between Ezhov and a certain Stefforn, a Czech and German female spy, that had taken place in 1934. Before this Rodos had read the text about three times but still did not understand who this Stefforn was — an NKVD collaborator, the wife of a colleague in the INO in Berlin, or both at the same time. Supposedly Ezhov had asked her to marry him but she had refused, and then regretted it. But soon she found herself a new husband, one Petrushev. When Stefforn was imprisoned for espionage Petrushev had asked Evgeniia Ezhova to intercede for her with her husband, but that did not help. That was all the information.

Rodos thought. Ezhov had already named about ten German spies with whom he was working in Moscow, therefore the Czech woman Stefforn was hardly essential here. But she might have played a role in Ezhov's moral dissolution, which was now very important.

Did you know a woman named Stefforn?

Perhaps. Remind me who she is.

I will. She was your lover, a Czech whom you even wanted to marry, but she preferred somebody named Petrushev to you.

Maybe that's Elena Petrusheva, a friend of Evgeniia, they had met in Germany at the end of the 1930s. But...

Tell me about her in detail.

My wife told me that Lena's father was a German Jew from Prague and her mother was either a Czech or a Pole. She was married to a Soviet citizen working abroad and lived with him for some time in Germany.

Was this husband an employee of the INO of the OGPU?

I don't know, that wasn't mentioned in the conversation. Sometime in 1930 she left him and went to Moscow. I don't know the husband's last name. Then she married Petrushev. I met them a couple of times, a respectable-looking man. He said that his father had been a well-known pre-Revolutionary photographer, the best one in Russia, and very rich. And Petrushev himself worked in some publishing house or other either as a photographer or, maybe, as an artist. The wife told me that he could draw very well, his pictures were hanging in their home.

Don't go off on me about pictures, stay with the main point of the question. Petrushev asked your wife to get you to help his wife Stefforn when she was arrested for espionage on behalf of Germany.

Evgeniia Solomonovna never said anything about that to me. In general she and I agreed that she would not ask me about government employees and saboteurs who were under arrest. Once she did ask me to help the husband of a friend, who had been seized for sabotage in a factory, and I told her that I could not do that because my real activities might be uncovered and then we would both burn. Since that time she did not trouble me with such questions.

Be that as it may, Ezhov. But you are avoiding the question about your amorous relations with this Stefforn, or Petrusheva. Tell me now about that.

Elena was an interesting woman and she pleased me. She came to our apartment a few times — that was, it seems, at the end of 1934. With her there was another woman. We drank. When she and I were smoking together in another room I began to embrace her and wanted to arrange to meet at her apartment since she had said that her husband Petrushev was resting at a spa in Kislovodsk. I asked for her telephone number so I could call her the next day. But she said that they had no telephone. I remembered that my wife had called her at home. That meant that she did not want to get together with me.

What, she didn't work and sat at home all the time?

As I remember she was a typist at home, but I might be mistaken.

And what, you didn't meet with her again. Was it really that hard to get her to go to bed?

I didn't try to do that again. After 1934 I didn't see her again. Zhenia [= Evgeniia] did not invite her to our place any more.

How so?

Elena had unpleasant conversations with her, anti-Party, politically harmful. About the hunger in the Ukraine, where some of her relatives lived. No doubt she was trying to see how my wife would react to that. In addition Evgeniia heard from one of her friends that Petrusheva had gotten a little drunk and hinted to her that she was collaborating with the NKVD.

Ezhov, there is no point in lying. We have information and evidence that you lived for a long time with this woman, wanted to leave your wife for her, gave her expensive gifts and told her state secrets when you were drunk. I don't have the time to drag every word out of you. Today in this room you'll be given a pencil and paper, and you write in detail about your grimy ties with this slut. And don't forget to tell had your complete moral degeneration led to your becoming a spy and traitor.

OK.

And something else. For a long time you have been hiding your attraction to men, what's called homosexuality. But this became known after you agreed to the shameful affair of citizen V. from the Commissariat of Water Transport in your apartment, and before that in V's presence you amused yourself with his wife in bed. Do you understand how far you have fallen? You are simply a monster, Ezhov, a filthy person and a pervert. I'm disgusted to look at you.

At that time I was very drunk...

What's that, justification?

No, but I don't remember anything, I woke up in the morning and they were no longer there. The chauffeur then told me that he took them away at 3 a.m. I could have done anything at all then...

I'm not interested in that. But we know that you told V. about your passion for homosexuality since childhood and that men could completely replace women for you. You should write in detailed when you became a homosexual and with whom you then became involved in this filthy business...

Ezhov interrogation 07.08.39 by Rodos

- fm Polianskii 262-268

"Tell us how and when you recruited Uspenskii in the espionage-sabotage organization in the NKVD that you had created.

I turned my attention to Uspenskii already at the beginning of 1936.

That was when he was still the assistant commandant of the Moscow Kremlin for internal security?

Yes.

Where did you find out about Uspenskii's hostile anti-Soviet views. Did he express them to you himself?

No. Veinshtok and Frinovskii told me about that. They knew him well and believed that he'd be very suitable for espionage work.

Did you recruit Uspenskii personally?

Yes. That was right after my arrival in the Commissariat. He quickly agreed and I told him that we needed our own men in the provinces. That was why I sent him to Western Siberia.

What kinds of assignments did you give him then?

He was supposed to recruit agents into our organization from among the Chekist cadre and to promote them to leading positions so that they could seize power in the event of war or a coup.

In November 1937 you sent Uspenskii a coded message with the following content: "If you think you are going to sit in Orenburg for five years, you are mistaken. Very soon, it seems, I will have to promote you to a more responsible post. What is the meaning of this message?"

At that time the leadership of our organization decided to move to active measures. There was a lot of evidence against Leplevskii and Zakovskii showing that they were spies and enemies of the people. It was impossible to hide such matters, and we had to get rid of these people, we couldn't use them, they could cause everything to fail. We decided to replace them with Uspenskii and Litvin. I gave Uspenskii a coded message so that he would find out about his forthcoming departure from Orenburg and would switch all the sabotage-espionage work over to other people whom he had been able to recruit there.

OK. And now tell us how you warned Uspenskii about the fact that they wanted to arrest him.

Did Dagin tell you about the fact of Uspenskii's forthcoming arrest?

Yes, I think it was he. He came to my office and told me about that.

And didn't he tell you that he had listened in on the telephone conversation between comrades Stalin and Khrushchev about Uspenskii?

Yes, I remember that he told me about the telephone conversation about Uspenskii which he had listened in on, but he did not say that that was Stalin's conversation. Dagin, on my instructions, listened in on all telephone conversations of the Politburo and immediately told me about them so that I would be up to date.

After that you called Kiev and warned Uspenskii. What did you tell him?

I said: 'You are being recalled, your situation is bad.' Something like that. I was afraid to send him a coded message, they could intercept it, since I had already lost trust and was under suspicion among the Party [leaders] as a hostile element.

Did Dagin also tell you about the recall of Litvin from Leningrad?

I did not know anything about the recall of Litvin to Moscow and did not warn him. There was no need to do so.

Why was that?

I had an agreement with him that in the event he was exposed he would commit suicide.

Was that your order?

No. In September of that year Litvin was in Moscow and used to come to my dacha. He told me that the arrival of Beria at the NKVD was the beginning of the end and soon we would all be arrested, since the Party was most likely aware about our plot. And he also said that he would not give himself up alive and that if they unexpectedly recalled him to Moscow he would shoot himself. That's what happened.

Did you support him in this intention?

No. But I didn't try to dissuade him either.

That means that you admit that you de-facto gave your accomplice an order to commit suicide in the event of failure?

Yes, that was de-facto the case.

When did you include Litvin in your espionage work?

That was in 1931, when I transferred him to Moscow.

Why did he agree to become a spy?

Already in the 1920s when I was getting together with Litvin I noticed his inexplicable relationship to Trotskyism. Openly he was not a supporter of Trotsky, but in his circle at that time there were many exposed Trotskyists and I think that in his inner being he had always been a Trotskyist.

You wish to say that even then Litvin was a double-dealer?

Yes. He was a double-dealer and, as later turned out, was a supporter of the Trotskyist-Zinovievist line. Therefore he willingly agreed to my proposal to become a German spy. I think because at that time the Left opposition had already suffered its final failure and Trotsky had been driven out of the USSR altogether.

In 1933 Litvin upon your recommendation was named the chief of the cadre section of the Central Committee of the Communist Party of the Ukraine. Was that done on the instruction of German intelligence?

Yes, I received that instruction from Artnau.

What directives about espionage did Litvin receive from you?

These directives were of a subversive and sabotage nature. I asked him to appoint to leading positions people who could by their actions cause arouse the dissatisfaction of the population of the Ukraine, people who would carry out sabotage, ruin foodstuff and livestock, disrupt the fulfillment of industrial plans. These were hidden Right and Left Oppositionist, who also carried out assignments for Zinoviev, Bukharin, Rykov and other enemies.

Litvin was included by you in the basic plan for sabotage that German intelligence gave you? Did you also take him into the NKVD upon the assignment of the fascists in order to organize there the espionage-conspiratorial organization?

Yes, that's how it was.

When you came to work in the NKVD you also brought with you there another of your collaborators, Isaac Shapiro.* When was he recruited by you?

* For Shapiro see

<http://www.memo.ru/history/NKVD/kto/biogr/gb537.htm>.

I had known Shapiro since 1930. He worked in the cadre section of the Commissariat of Agriculture in which I was a chief. He and I had a good friendship and I valued his zeal and literacy. And when Artnau recruited me and asked me to find people for espionage work I thought right away about Shapiro, who was personally devoted to me and it had always seemed to me that he did not like Soviet power very much and disapproved of the political line of the Party.

Did Shapiro carry out sabotage activity in the Commissariat of Agriculture on your instruction?

Yes, he did. But for a short time only. I decided to take him into the Central Committee, since there I needed people for subversive work.

He knew that you were a German spy?

Yes, I told him that together we would work for German intelligence, so as later to overthrow the government and come to power if there were a war with Germany.

What assignments of yours did Shapiro carry out in the NKVD?

He was de-facto my main assistant. Indeed I first appointed him the chief of the secretariat, and then made him also chief of the first special section. He had a lot of possibilities for sabotage in the NKVD and he carried out all my assignments of an espionage-subversive nature, both mine and Frinovskii's. And when Beria arrived at the NKVD he immediately found out that Shapiro was an enemy and arrested him in November of '38.

I know that. It would be better for you to tell me how you recruited Liushkov and how you helped him escape to Japan.

I recruited Liushkov right after his return from Leningrad from the investigation of Kirov's murder. At that time I was already secretary of the Central Committee and Liushkov knew that I was beginning to oversee the NKVD. Therefore, when I called him to my office and hinted that I had information about his ties with the Petliurovists during the civil war in the Ukraine and other incriminating facts, he was frightened and immediately agreed to work for me as a German-Japanese intelligence man.

Did you really have that kind of information?

No, I did not have. I made it all up in order to recruit Liushkov. But I guessed that he was a hostile element with a foul past, and turned out to be correct. Liushkov agreed to become a spy.

How did you order Liushkov to flee to the Japanese?

Ezhov thought for a few seconds. He could not think of a reason why Frinovskii, one of the leaders of the conspiratorial group in the NKVD, had suggested arresting his colleague Liushkov. But then he found a solution.

Frinovskii often told me that he did not like Liushkov. He was cowardly and could betray us all at any moment. Upon our orders he was carrying out important espionage tasks for Japanese intelligence and knew a great deal about our subversive and sabotage work. Frinovskii said that we had to get rid of him, that means, kill him. And he told me that he would take care of that himself. I decided not to hinder him.

Did Frinovskii say how he wanted to kill Liushkov?

No. But I think that he wanted to arrest him first, and then in the inner prison to poison him or put him to death somehow.

What a gang! And who warned Liushkov anyway about the danger?

I don't know. But Frinovskii wanted to appoint Gorbach from Novosibirsk to Liushkov's place and recall the latter to Moscow, supposedly for a new job, but in reality to arrest him. Liushkov, most likely, found out that Gorbach was already on route to Khabarovsk, and fled across the border.

Ezhov ochnaia stavka with Zhukovskii 07.21.39 — Rodos & Esaulov present

["ochnaia stavka" = "face-to-face confrontation"]

- Polianskii 269-272; B&S 138-139.

Do you know this man?

Yes.

Who is it?

Nikolai Ivanovich Ezhov.

And you? Rodos asked Ezhov.

Yes, that is Semion Borisovich Zhukovsky.

Suspect Ezhov. Confirm your confessions concerning the conspiratorial, sabotage, and terrorist activities of the former assistant Commissar of the NKVD Zhukovsky, that you gave at the interrogation of July 17 of this year.

Investigator: When did you become a German spy?

Ezhov: I was recruited in 1930 in Germany, in Königsberg.

Here Ezhov repeats word for word the confession included above in the section ["Ezhov interrogation 06.21.39 by Rodos, fm Polianskii 235-238".]

In Germany I was well treated and shown every attention. The most assiduous attention I received from the prominent official of the Economic Ministry of Germany Artnau. Having been invited to his estate near Königsberg I spent the time happily enough, partaking excessively of alcoholic drinks... (In Königsberg Artnau) often paid the restaurant bills for me... I did not protest... All these circumstances made me feel close to Artnau and often without holding back I blurted out to him all kinds of secrets about the situation in the Soviet Union... Sometimes, when I was drunk, I was even more frank with Artnau and gave him to understand that I personally was not wholly in agreement with the Party's line and with the existing Party leadership. Things got to the point that during one of the conversations I directly promised Artnau to discuss a series of questions in the government of the USSR concerning the purchase of livestock and agricultural machinery, in which Germany and Artnau were very much interested....

[Here the source continues with new material, not printed earlier as a part of this confession.]

Since I knew about Zhukovsky's cowardice and stubbornness I did not consider it necessary to keep him up to date about conspiratorial matters. I only introduced him fully to these matters in the Spring of 1938. Then he was appointed my assistant and headed the whole accounting of the NKVD and the GULAG. We conspirators had special plans about the GULAG about which I have given detailed confessions, and I decided to bring Zhukovskii up to date. By this time the people who could have exposed Zhukovskii along the lines of his Trotskyist and espionage connections were already condemned and the danger of Zhukovsky's arrest had passed. I told Zhukovskii about the existence of the conspiracy in the NKVD, that the conspiratorial organization is connected with governmental circles of Germany, Poland, and Japan. I don't remember exactly now, but I think that I told him about our desire to get into contact with the English. Then I told him about the leading members of the conspiratorial organization and about our plans, specifically about our terrorist plans...

What assignments did you give Zhukovskii concerning the GULAG?

The conspiratorial assignments concerning the GULAG that I gave to Zhukovskii consisted in this: we sent to work the GULAG a very great quantity of compromised people. We could not leave them in the operational work, but we kept them in the GULAG for the purpose of forming a sort of reserve for conspiracies in the case of a coup in the country. I assigned Zhukovskii to maintain these people, but not to connect himself with them along conspiratorial lines, but to carry out all conspiratorial assignments that came to the GULAG through these people...

Investigator: Did you give these terrorist assignments to Zhukovskii at the time of his work in the section of operational technology? Did you talk with him about the terrorist tasks of the conspiracy?

Ezhov: Yes, I talked to him. There were two variants of our plans. The first variant: in the case of war, when we proposed to carry out the arrests of the members of the government and their physical removal. And the second variant: if there were no war in the immediate future, then to get rid of the leadership of the Party and the government, especially Stalin and Molotov, by carrying out terrorist acts against them. I firmly remember that I told Zhukovskii about this after I had entrusted him with the existence of the conspiracy.

Investigator: Suspect Zhukovsky, did you receive from Ezhov the criminal assignments about which he has just spoken?

Zhukovsky: I did not receive any such criminal assignments and am hearing about terrorist tasks for the first time at this face-to-face confrontation.

You have nothing else that you want to tell the investigation? [asked Rodos to Zhukovskii and, having received a negative answer, pushed the button to call the guards to take them away.]

Ezhov interrogation 07.24.39 by Rodos, including a quotation from a Frinovskii interrogation

- Polianskii 272-275

Recently Frinovskii gave confessions about your terrorist activity. Now I shall read them to you: "When Zhukovskii was chief of the 12th section, Ezhov gave him an assignment to develop poisons with the aim of using them in carrying out terrorist acts. Ezhov, speaking with Zhukovskii in my presence, said that it was necessary to work on the question of poisons that would work instantaneously, which could be used on people but without [leaving] visible traces of poisoning. Ezhov also clearly said that we needed these poisons for use within the country."

Do you confirm his confession, Ezhov?

I cannot confirm that. At one of the interrogations I said that I had no relation to this laboratory. Frinovskii and Zhukovskii took care of it. I did not give them any tasks concerning poisons and did not have any conversations about these poisons.

Stop lying! You are incriminated not only by Frinovskii but by Zhukovsky, Alekhin and Dagin. You stood at the head of the conspiracy and gave directions to prepare poisons for the villainous murder of leaders of the Party and government. Here is some more of what Frinovskii confessed about this:

"I must say that the open use of servants for a terrorist act was not essential, servants could be used secretly, because the laboratory and the preparation of products were in the hands of Barkan and Dagin, they could poison the products in advance, and the servant, not knowing the products were poisoned, could give them to the members of the Politburo.

Ezhov gave Zhukovskii directives about the preparation of poisons, after he left the 12th department Zhukovskii transmitted these directives to Alekhin, and I and Ezhov confirmed these directives more than once. In 1937 and 1938 there were several joint conversations in Ezhov's office between myself, Ezhov, and Alekhin. We were constantly concerned with how to carry out this work in the laboratory. The point is that those poisons that were being developed in the laboratory had had some kind of taste or left traces of their use in the human organism. We set the task of developing in the laboratory poisons that would be without any taste, so that they could be used in wine, drink and food, without changing the taste and color of the food and the drink. We proposed to invent separately poisons of instantaneous and of delayed action, and also whose use would not cause any visible destruction in the human organizing so that it could not be determined by autopsy of the body of the person killed by poison that poisons had been used to murder him.

What do you say to this?

I seem to remember a few conversations with Frinovskii about poisons. But I do not remember that I gave him any directives about their preparation and use.

But you will remember, think about it. I am convinced that the memory of traitors and scoundrels such as yourself is quickly restored in punitive cells and isolation cells. Everybody remembers after a few days.

The use of poisons for the purpose of terror against the government was discussed by use, when our original plan of a coup d'état and seizure of power fell apart.

Tell us about this in more detail.

Already in the summer of last year [1938 — GF] our organization took the decision to organize a military coup on the 7th of November.

Who was present at this assembly and where did it take place?

It took place at my dacha. Present were Frinovskii, Evdokimov, Dagin, Zhurbenko, Zhukovsky, and Nikolaev-Zhurid. That was, so to speak, the general staff of our subversive organization. Oh, I forgot, Litvin was also there, he was coming to Moscow at that time on official business.

Did you call together this meeting specially so that your general staff of bandits could take part?

Yes. The staff's presence was essential, as the coup was to take place also in Leningrad and the staff was supposed to guarantee everything.

It was for this purpose that you also moved Zhurbenko to be the head of the UNKVD for Moscow and Moscow oblast', so that he could be there to guarantee your treasonous conspiracy?

Yes, that is so. I specially appointed Zhurbenko to this position before Beria's arrival in the NKVD.

Continue. What did you discuss there at the dacha?

We decided that the interior troops [of the NKVD — GF] that were in Moscow and were under the command of Frinovskii as first assistant to the Commissar would carry out the coup. As for him, he should prepare a fighting group that would annihilate the members of the government in attendance at the parade. Then we decided to confirm a final plan for the coup in September or October and to send around directive to our people in the republics and oblasts' about what they should do on the seventh of November.

And this meeting took place, who was present at it?

There were only three of us: Frinovskii, Zhukovsky, and I. Either the end of September or the beginning of October we met in my office.

And what did you discuss?

At that time the possibilities of our organization had been seriously disrupted by the arrival of Beria in the NKVD. He replaced Frinovskii, and we could no longer use the internal troops.

But why, he must have had his agents there?

Yes, he did have his agents, but obviously Beria already had information about our conspiracy and arrested almost all of them in September. I could not prevent these arrests or I would have exposed myself. Then Frinovskii proposed that we put off the coup and take power by means of poisoning the members of the government and in the first place Stalin, Molotov and Voroshilov. Their deaths would have immediately caused confusion in the country and we would have taken advantage of this and seized power. We calculated that we could then arrest all the people in the government and the NKVD who were unsuitable for us, and to claim that they were conspirators guilty in the deaths of the leaders.

What low-lives! What could have stopped you hoodlums?

Frinovskii then said that Dagin would carry out the poisoning, and that Alekhin and Zhukovskii would give him the poisons. But it would be necessary to prepare the poisons, and we decided to carry out this terrorist act when the requisite poisons were collected. We agreed to meet when Dagin had the poisons and to put together a detailed plan for the coup. But Zhukovskii was unexpectedly arrested, a few days after this meeting, and after him Alekhin and Dagin, and I do not know whether or not Dagin received the poisons.

Ezhov interrogation 08.02.39 by Rodos

- Polianskii 275-280 (plain text); Briukhanov & Shoshkov 139-142 (italics); in both of them (underlined).

/ 275 /

Tell us in detail about the sabotage activities that were carried out by you and your colleagues on the economic properties of the NKVD — said Rodos, preparing to write down the confessions.

In addition to the large quantity of economic properties that had been under the direction of the NKVD under Iagoda and which had developed greatly during the years 1937-1938, that is Kolyma, Indigirka, Norilstroi and others, I succeeded in significantly increasing the economic activity of the NKVD by means of new properties.

During these years I succeeded in carrying forth in the government the question about the transfer to the direction of the NKVD of many forest regions of the Commissariat of Forests, in connection with which the production program of the forest camps of the NKVD in the preparation and export of wood products in 1938 comprised almost half of the whole program of the Commissariat of Forests.

Into the direction of the NKVD were transferred the construction of railroad lines that had the most important defense significance, such as the Baikal-Amur railway, the line from Ulan-Ude to Naushi, the Soroka-Pliassetskaia, the Ukhto-Pecherskaia line, and others.

Among the purely defense-oriented properties I achieved the transfer under the direction of the NKVD of the construction of the Archangel shipbuilding factory and almost all the powder cellulose factories in Archangel, Solikamsk and other places, at the same time having organized the construction of ten smaller cellulose factories. On the initiative of the NKVD, on top of the programs confirmed by the government, the NKVD was given the construction of the world's largest hydroelectric station — the Kuibyshev hydro network.

/ 140 /

Sabotage and mismanagement in the construction sites flourished with complete impunity. We managed to go over completely to questions of defense construction, achieving practical control over a significant part of it. This gave us the possibility in case of need in our conspiratorial goals to vary and carry out different subversive measures which could help accomplish the defeat of the USSR in wartime and our coming to power.

... The greatest population of prisoners was the border regions of the far Eastern borders. Here it was very easy for us to take over different economic tasks of a defense nature because of the lack of workers. However the camps of the Far Eastern Region were situated not only near to the borders but we sent there mostly prisoners sentenced for espionage, diversion, terror and other more serious crimes, and we sent almost no so-called "ordinary" prisoners.

In this way along the borders of the FER, in the direct rear of the Red Army was prepared the most active and embittered counterrevolutionary force, which we planned to use in the widest possible manner in case of complication or of war with the Japanese... A significant quantity of prisoners were concentrated on our western borders of Ukraine, Belorussia, the Leningrad oblast', and the Karelian ASSR, especially in road construction.

... The whole conspiratorial plan of the regime we created for the prisoners consisted in that the most privileged conditions were created for the prisoners sentenced for the most serious crimes (espionage and terrorism), since that was the qualified force that would often be used for directing the administrative and economic work in the camps. In their hands was concentrated also all the cultural and educational work of the prisoners. It is clear in what spirit they were educated. Finally the regime created in the camps often permitted the counterrevolutionary activity of the prisoners to continue with complete impunity.

In the camps the work of the so-called 3rd sections was so badly organized and the camps were guarded so poorly, that the prisoners had the possibility of creating their own counterrevolutionary groups in the camps and to associate with each other at will. Facts like this were many. The guard of the camps was extremely small, made up of unreliable people, the material situation of the soldiers and the command staff was very poor, and, finally, the prisoners themselves were used in many cases in the capacity of guards. As a result of a security organized like this there were many cases of mass escapes from the camps. We fought against this evil poorly and did so consciously, in the hopes that the escapees from the camps would continue their counterrevolutionary activity and would become a force that would spread all kinds of anti-Soviet agitation and rumors.

/ 276 /

I achieved the transfer under the direction of the NKVD a series of working factors of the defense industry. The reason for that could not have been the use of the labor of prisoners, since among them were the Pavshinskii factory, the Tushinskii factory of aviation motor construction, and others. Besides that, the NKVD organized a series of new factories on its own initiative, which carried out defense production...

What, do you think we called you here to report on behalf of the NKVD about the successful fulfillment of the Five-Year Plan! You are a bandit, a conspirator, a saboteur, a terrorist, and a traitor. Answer the question asked you to the point.

Sabotage and mismanagement in the construction sites flourished with complete impunity.

I'll bet, with a Commissar like that. — said Rodos with a grimace, not stopping his note-taking.

We managed to go over completely to questions of defense construction, achieving practical control over a significant part of it...

Who is this "we"?

Well, our conspiratorial organization. Myself, Zhukovsky, Frinovskii, and others. I have already named them all earlier.

This gave our organization the possibility in case of need in our conspiratorial goals to vary and carry out different subversive measures which could help accomplish the defeat of the USSR in wartime and our coming to power.

In which areas was the subversive activity of your organization mainly distributed?

The greatest population of prisoners was the border regions of the far Eastern borders. Here it was very easy for us to take over different economic tasks of a defense nature because of the lack of workers. However the camps of the Far Eastern Region were situated not only near to the borders but we sent there mostly prisoners sentenced for espionage, diversion, terror and other more serious crimes, and we sent almost no so-called "ordinary" prisoners.

In this way along the borders of the FER, in the direct rear of the Red Army was prepared the most active and embittered counterrevolutionary force, which we planned to use in the widest possible manner in case of complication or of war with the Japanese.

Did you send Liushkov there specially? What assignments did you give him?

At the beginning of 1937 Frinovskii and I conferred with each other and decided that we had to have our own man in the Far East, through whom we could maintain contact with Japanese intelligence. In the event of an attack by the Japanese he was to let the counterrevolutionaries out of the camps, seize with their help the stores of arms and military supplies, and then head terrorist-diversionist work in the rear of the Red Army. We thought about this and chose Liushkov for these purposes, whom I had already recruited to our organization in 1936. Then I transferred him from the Azovo-Chernomorskii region and made him the head of the NKVD in the Far Eastern Region.

In which other areas did you create the same kind of espionage-diversionist centers?

We also did this in the western borders of the USSR. A significant quantity of prisoners were concentrated on our western borders of Ukraine, Belorussia, the Leningrad oblast', and the Karelian ASSR.

In Leningrad oblast and Karelia Litvin was in charge for you, of course?

Yes. I sent him there specially at the beginning of 1938 instead of Zakovskii, whom I could not fully trust.

And in the Ukraine?

There Uspenskii all the assignments, including contact with Polish and German intelligence. That is why I made him Commissar of Internal Affairs of the Ukraine.

When was he recruited by you?

At the beginning of 1937. He came to Moscow from Novosibirsk before he was appointed to the position of chief of the UNKVD for the Orenburg oblast. I knew that Uspenskii was anti-Soviet, anti-party, and for that reason he immediately agreed to work in our organization.

In Belorussia you sent Boris Berman? Did you know that he was an old German agent?

Yes. Artnau told me that Berman was working for German intelligence as soon as I became Commissar of Internal Affairs. He had been recruited at the beginning of the 'thirties, when he was

/ 279 /

[Soviet] resident in Germany. I immediately established espionage contact with him, then he was the assistant chief of the INO. In 1937 I specially sent him from our organization to Belorussia and made him

Commissar of Internal Affairs. There he met with German agents and received assignments and instructions.

That means your widespread espionage organization in the case of an attack on the USSR by Japan and Germany could seize power not only in Moscow but in border areas, opening the road to the invaders. Do I understand this correctly from your confessions?

Yes. That was exactly what we had planned. It's useless to deny such things.

Tell me, was counterrevolutionary work carried on by your confederates in the camps for the purpose of establishing there bases for sabotage and anti-Soviet activity?

In the camps the work of the so-called 3rd sections was so badly organized and the camps were guarded so poorly, that the prisoners had the possibility of creating their own counterrevolutionary groups in the camps and to associate with each other at will. Facts like this were many. The guard of the camps was extremely small, made up of unreliable people, the material situation of the soldiers and the command staff was very poor, and, finally, the prisoners themselves were used in many cases in the capacity of guards. As a result of a security organized like this there were many cases of mass escapes from the camps. We fought against this evil poorly and did so consciously, in the hopes that the escapees from the camps would continue their counterrevolutionary activity and would become a force that would spread all kinds of anti-Soviet agitation and rumors...

[At that moment the telephone on Rodos's table started to ring.]

/ 280 /

I am leaving right away, I will be back at four o'clock for sure.

We shall continue the interrogation tomorrow, and you remember what concretely sabotage work you carried out with your confederates in the economic properties of the NKVD.

Ezhov interrogation 08.03.39 by Rodos

Polianskii 280-284

"The overwhelming majority of the prisoners were so-called vicious "refusers", as a rule people who had not fulfilled the assigned norm of work, in connection with which these latter were deliberately extremely poorly provided, something we also did for sabotage purposes. This circumstance, and a series of other subversive measures of the conspiratorial organization caused the necessity of more and more prisoners being brought to Kolyma. The government every year devoted enormous expenses to the development of Kolyma, spending hundreds of millions of rubles. If these means had been rationally spent, the mining at the rich Kolyma sites could have been significantly mechanized. Mechanization would not only have reduced the necessity of holding a large quantity of prisoners in Kolyma and of bringing to them a huge amount of foodstuffs and other supplies, but would have increased the yield of metal and sharply lowered its cost. Meanwhile mechanization was slowed down by sabotage and all the extraction was based on muscle power alone. As a result already in 1938 more than 100,000 prisoners were brought to Kolyma. The whole area of Kolyma is rich not only in gold, but in many other ores. Specifically, in Kolyma there are huge supplies of coal and other forms of fuel. With any kind of careful economic approach to the matter it would have been possible without any difficulty to satisfy the demands of Kolyma with coal and even with oil without the costly transporting of them from the European part of the USSR. However the coal deposits of Kolyma are not exploited at all. In Kolyma it would unquestionably be possible to wholly cease the importation even of explosive materials and of the simplest equipment, which also is brought in every year in great quantities. For this purposes it would be necessary to build in Kolyma a very simple mechanical factory of modest size or, even better, workshops that could manufacture the simplest equipment and spare parts. Just as easily and quickly could and should be built in Kolyma an explosives factory of modest size, since almost all raw materials necessary for this exist there. Finally, in Kolyma the importation of foodstuffs could be significantly reduced. Such a possibility is completely obtainable for Kolyma, where meat, fish and even vegetable production could be developed. All this was deliberately ignored by us, and the supply of Kolyma was wholly laid upon the shoulders of the state. I have already said that the region of Kolyma together with the gold-bearing regions are rich also in a whole series of other rare ores. So, for example, there are rich industrial supplies of tin, antimony, copper, micas, and other ores. These extremely valuable ores that have enormous economic and defense significance are not worked at all or are extracted in tiny quantities, like tin, while in Kolyma there are all the possibilities of setting up the extraction of these ores at the same time as that of gold, the more so since the regions with these ores are nearby.

It is clear that the parallel extraction of gold and of other valuable ores that are so territorially adjacent where, consequently, it would be possible to set up a unified, energetic, mechanical economic unit, and to reduce to a significant extent the cost of gold and of other rare metals. These questions we deliberately and as an act of sabotage ignored, and did not even present to the government.

What role in this was played by the foreign intelligence services with which you were collaborating?

They, of course, knew what we were doing and encouraged and supported our subversive work in every way. But as far as I know they did not specially give any assignments either to me or to their other agents, since, no doubt, they were certain that we ourselves knew where we should best carry out the sabotage.

Name the concrete properties where sabotage was carried out according to your instructions.

The construction of the Ukhto-Pechersk road has a decisive meaning for the development of the extraction of coal, oil, and other valuable products, without which the economic development of the Northern region as a whole is impossible. Meanwhile the construction of this road was retarded by us deliberately and in every way, under various pretexts and the resources allotted to it were spread over a large area of work and did not have any effect. The retardation in the construction of the Ukhto-Pechersk railroad is explained in the main by the lack of a satisfactory plan, which the Commissariat of Roads and Rails should present. The saboteurs in the GULAG and in the Commissariat of Roads and Rails with our support organized a never-ending dispute about the choice of the direction of the roads, which has been going on for a long time now, and the planning and even the exploratory works in many sectors have not been begun to this day. Finally, it was essential not to spread out our resources over a broad front of works, but to concentrate on the decisive sections for the export of production. And precisely the construction of the Ukhto-Pechersk line should have been strictly divided into several stages. In the first part should have been concentrated all the forces and resources to finish the construction of the Vorkuta-Abez' section, for the purpose of exporting coal. But we hindered that, insofar as all decisions were mine. Further, the construction of the section from the oil-bearing areas of Ukhta to Kotel'nich should have been organized, and these works could have been fully developed from two directions, both from Kotel'nich and from Ukhta. Only in the final stage could have been finished those sections that unite the coal-rich Vorkuta areas with the oil-bearing Ukhta areas and that give in this way an outlet for coal and oil in two directions. But nothing of this was done because of our sabotage.

What subversive, espionage and sabotage activity did you carry out in the GULAG itself?

* We understood, that the expansion of the economic functions of the NKVD must express themselves in the worsening of our basic operative work. We proposed to widely use the system of camps so as to send there the compromised part of NKVD workers. There are not only drunkards, idlers and wastrels. Among them were people with a Trotskyist past, Rights who sympathized with Bukharin, and Iagoda's people. De-facto they were all recruited by us since, in sending them to the GULAG, we were hinting to them that we had evidence against them that could be investigated at any moment. In this manner we created a special reserve of people read to carry out any conspiratorial task.

But there were many anti-Soviet elements in the GULAG even without this. The conspiratorial leadership of the GULAG remained, for all practical purposes, unreplaced. At the time of my arrival in the NKVD the GULAG was headed by the conspirator of Iagoda's group Matvei Berman, Boris Berman's older brother. He had put together a large anti-Soviet group of people who occupied more or less responsible posts in the GULAG. Among these people were a great many Trotskyists, Zinovievists, Rights, and it was easy to attract them to our side after Berman left when the GULAG was headed by Ryzhov, a participant of the conspiracy recruited by men, who was sent to this work on my initiative in order to carry out sabotage assignments. And after his departure for the Commissariat of Forests, the GULAG was headed by the conspirator and spy Zhukovsky, who was connected with me and who was at the same time my assistant.

In the summer of 1938 the Central Committee of the Party more than once pointed my attention to the fact that I was surrounded by suspicious people who had come with me to work in the NKVD. In the Central Committee the question of removing Tsesarskii was raised, it was proposed to me that I remove Shapiro, Zhukovsky, and Litvin from the work. That put me on my guard, inasmuch as all these men were my confederates, and that meant that something might be known to the Party about the conspiracy. In order to somehow conceal my anti-government activity I had to agree with the demands of the Central Committee and I decided to send Zhukovskii packing without any fuss, away to the countryside. I carried out this attempt but it did not succeed, since about that time Beria began to work and Zhukovsky, instead of going to the place I had assigned him as director of the Ridder polymetallic combine, was arrested."

* From this point on the text given in Polianskii here is given in B&S but attributed to Ezhov's August 2 1939 interrogation.

Source: Nikita Petrov, Mark Jansen. "Stalinskii pitomets" — Nikolai Ezhov. Moscow: ROSSPEN, 2008, pp. 367-379.

No. 21. From the transcript of the interrogation of the accused Ezhov
Nikolai Ivanovich

"4" August 1939

Ezhov N.I., year of birth 1895

Former member of the ACP(b) since 1917

Before arrest: People's Commissar

Of Water Transportation of the Union of SSR

Question: The investigation is aware that you used the mass operations carried about by the organs of the NKVD of the USSR in 1937-1938 of former kulaks, counter-revolutionary clergy, criminals, and refugees from different countries neighboring on the USSR to further an anti-Soviet conspiracy.

To what extent does this correspond to the truth?

Answer: Yes, that corresponds completely to the truth.

[...]

[NOTE: The reactionary editor of this interrogation Nikita Petrov, a senior researcher at the "Memorial" society in Russia, a super right-wing anticommunist group of liars, has omitted about 8 pages in which Ezhov details his NKVD conspiracy. Petrov does not 'believe' in such conspiracies, so he omits it! — GF]

Question: Did you achieve your provocational, conspiratorial aims in carrying out these mass operations?

Answer: The first results of the mass operation were completely unexpected by us conspirators. Not only did they not create dissatisfaction among the population with the punitive policy of Soviet power, but on the contrary they resulted in a large political upsurge, especially in the countryside. We observed a great many cases in which the kolkhoz workers themselves came to the UNKVD and the regional sections of the UNKVD with the demand that we arrest one or another fugitive kulak, White Guardist, trader, and so on.

In the towns the levels of robbery, knife-fighting, and hooliganism, from which working-class regions suffered especially, were sharply reduced.

It was completely obvious that the Central Committee of the All-Union Communist Party (Bolshevik) was correct and timely in deciding to carry out these measures. Despite the provocational measures with which we undertook to carry out the mass operation it met with friendly approval by the working people.

Question: Did this cause you to abandon your heinous aims?

Answer: I don't want to say that. On the contrary, we conspirators used this situation to expand the mass operations in every possible way. In the final analysis we succeeded in intensifying the provocational methods of carrying it out and realizing our treasonous conspiratorial schemes.

Question: How did you manage to use the working people's sympathy with repression against kulaks, counter-revolutionary clerics, and criminals, in order to attain the goals set by the conspiratorial organization?

Answer: In the provinces, when the so-called "limits" that had been set of the numbers of former kulaks, White Guards, counter-revolutionary clerics, and criminals to be repressed had been exhausted, we the conspirators and I in particular again set before the government the question of the need to prolong the mass operations and increase the number of those to be repressed.

As evidence of the need to prolong the mass operations we alleged that the kolkhozes in the countryside and the factories in the towns had been heavily infested by these elements, and stressed the interest and sympathy of the working people of town and country for these measures.

Question: Did you succeed in obtaining a government decision to prolong the mass operations?

Answer: Yes. We did obtain the decision of the government to prolong the mass operation and to increase the number of those to be repressed.

Question: What did you do, deceive the government?

Answer: It was unquestionably essential for us to prolong the mass operation and increase the number of persons repressed.

However, it was necessary to extend the time period for these measures and to set up a real and accurate account so that once we had prepared ourselves, we could strike our blow directly on the most dangerous part, the organizational leadership of the counterrevolutionary elements.

The government, understandably, had no conception of our conspiratorial plans and in the present case proceeded solely on the basis of the necessity to prolong the operation without going into the essence of how it was carried out.

In this sense, of course, we were deceiving the government in the most blatant manner.

Question: Were there any warnings from local NKVD workers and from the population about the distortion that existed in the conduct of the mass operation?

Answer: There were a great many warnings concerning these distortions from among the rank and file workers of the local UNKVDs. There were even more warnings of this sort from the population. However, we stifled these warnings both in the UNKVDs and in the Central headquarters of the People's Commissar for Internal Affairs, and often arrested the workers who sent those warnings for doing so.

Question: How did you manage to stifle the warnings about these excesses that came from the local workers and from the population?

Answer: We managed to stifle these warnings with relative ease, in view of the fact that all leadership positions were concentrated in the hands of the conspirators. In the center the whole affair concerning the mass operations was concentrated entirely in the hands of the conspirators. Many [local] directorates of the NKVD were also headed by conspirators who were fully conversant with our conspiratorial plans.

/ 369 /

Concerning these questions we from the center dispatched such "concrete" leadership that we pushed all the heads of the UNKVDs to broaden the mass repressions and their provocational conduct.

In the end they became accustomed to the fact that the mass operations were the easiest form of operational work, all the more so since these operations were in fact carried out without any supervision, without recourse to the courts.

Question: After you succeeded in prolonging the mass operations, did you achieve the set aims of the conspiratorial organization to cause dissatisfaction among the population with the punitive policy of Soviet power?

Answer: Yes, once we had prolonged the mass operations over many months we finally succeeded, in a number of areas, in causing incomprehension and dissatisfaction with the punitive policy of Soviet power among specific sectors of the population.

Question: In which areas specifically did you succeed in attaining your conspiratorial plans and how was this manifested?

Answer: This relates mainly to the following regions: the Ukraine, Belorussia, the Central Asian republics, the Sverdlovsk, Chelyabinsk, Western Siberian, Leningrad, Western, Rostov, and Ordzhonikidze oblasts and the Far Eastern Region. That may be explained, in the first place, because our attention was concentrated on these areas most of all, and secondly, because almost all the heads of the UNKVDs of these oblasts were conspirators.

In all of these oblasts there were more gross anti-Soviet acts of repression against people who were basically innocent, which caused legitimate dissatisfaction among the working people.

Question: Give more detailed information about each oblast separately, and report to the investigation those facts known to you about provocational methods of repression that were deliberately carried out.

Answer: I'll begin with the Ukraine. The People's Commissariat of Internal Affairs of the UkSSR was headed at the beginning by Leplevski, a member of the anti-Soviet organization of Rightists, and then by Uspensky, a conspirator whom I had recruited. The mass operation had been begun under Leplevsky, but Uspensky's share of repressed persons was no smaller.

Question: Was Leplevsky aware of your conspiratorial plans?

Answer: No, Leplevsky could hardly have known about our real conspiratorial plans. In any case I myself did not recruit him to our conspiratorial organization and did not inform him of our plan to conduct the operation in a provocational manner. None of the leading conspirators told me that he was connected to Leplevsky in the conspiracy.

In carrying out the mass operation Leplevsky, like most of the other chiefs of the UNKVDs who were not conspirators, spread them out over a broad front while leaving the most bitter and active of the organizers from among the kulaks, White Guardists, Petliurovists, counter-revolutionary clergy, etc., almost untouched. At the same time he concentrated the whole force of his blow against the less active elements and in part among that part of the population that was close to Soviet power.

Question: Was Uspensky aware of your conspiratorial plans to carry out the mass operations in a provocational manner?

Answer: Yes, Uspensky was completely informed about our conspiratorial plans and I informed him about them personally. I personally also gave him concrete assignments concerning this matter. The result was that Uspensky not only continued Leplevsky's practice of sabotage but increased it significantly.

Uspensky received additional "limits" after my arrival in the Ukraine and, on my direction, he did not limit himself only to repression of former kulaks, clerics, and criminals, but broadened the category of those subject to repression to include nationalists, former prisoners of war, and others.

He even urged in my presence that we extend the category of those subject to repression to all former Party members. However I forbade him to arrest people on that basis alone, since that was too obvious and blatant a provocation.

Question: What was the result of the sabotage and provocational practice in conducting the mass operation?

Answer: I have to say that the whole blow of the mass operation in the oblasts of the Ukraine was in many respects carried out in a provocational manner and affected a significant part of those sectors of the population close to Soviet power.

All of this caused bewilderment and dissatisfaction among the working people in many regions of the Ukraine. This dissatisfaction was especially strong in the regions near the border, where there remained families of those who were repressed.

The NKVD of the USSR and the Procuracy received many warnings about this from the oblasts of the Ukraine. However no one reacted to them in any way. These warnings were hidden from the Central Committee of the Party and from the government.

Question: Are you aware of the facts concerning how the dissatisfaction of the population was concretely expressed?

Answer: Of course I don't know all these facts. I knew about them only from information given me by Uspensky.

From what Uspensky said I know that flights through the border posts into Poland increased as a result of the provocational conduct of the mass operations, especially in the border regions of the Ukraine. The families of those repressed began to be expelled from kolkhozes, and in connection with that, robberies, arson, and thefts began. There were even a few examples of terrorist acts against workers of the village soviets and kolkhozes. Not only families of the repressed, but rank-and-file kolkhoz members and even Party members began to write complaints.

Dissatisfaction with the punitive policy was so great that local party organizations began to insist that all the family members of persons who had been repressed be resettled from the Ukraine to other regions.

Such in general terms were the results of the provocational conduct of the mass operations in the Ukraine.

We were successful in achieving about the same results in Belorussia too.

At the time the mass operations were taking place B. Berman was in charge of the NKVD of Belorussia.

Question: Was Berman a member of the conspiratorial organization in the NKVD?

Answer: Berman was not a member of our conspiratorial organization. However, Frinovsky, Bel'sky, and I knew by the beginning of 1938 that he was an active member of Yagoda's anti-Soviet conspiratorial group.

We did not plan to draw Berman into our conspiratorial organization. Already at that time he was sufficiently compromised and was subject to arrest. However, we delayed his arrest. In turn Berman, who feared arrest, worked very hard. I only had to give him general directives that Belorussia was badly infested and that it was necessary to purge it in a thoroughgoing way, and he carried out the mass operations with the same result as Uspensky.

Question: With what result specifically?

Answer: He incessantly demanded an increase of "limits" and, following Uspensky's example, put "nationalists" into the category of persons subject to repression, carried out completely unfounded arrests, created exactly the same kind of dissatisfaction in the border regions of Belorussia, and left the families of those repressed where they were.

There were even more warnings sent to the NKVD and the Procuracy concerning dissatisfaction among the population of the border regions of Belorussia than in the Ukraine. We left all these too without investigating them and hid them from the Central Committee of the Party and the government.

Question: How did things stand in the other oblasts that you enumerated?

Answer: In the other oblasts I enumerated in my confession we achieved analogous results and also succeeded in creating dissatisfaction among certain sectors of the population.

These results were different only in the conduct of the mass nationalist operations, about which I will confess below.

I need only to select some results of the mass operations in the Far Eastern Region, the Donbass, and the Central Asian republics.

Question: Why specifically do you consider it essential to separately select the results of the provocational conduct of the mass operations in the Far Eastern Region, the Donbass, and the Central Asian republics?

Answer: We attributed a very great importance to these regions in the sense of possibilities for sabotage and the provocational conduct of the mass operations.

We assumed that in these areas, far from the center and with weak Party organizations, we would be able to apply our provocational methods with more determination and without any special precautions, and that we would be able at the same time to achieve more tangible results in accomplishing the tasks we had set for our conspiratorial organization. We said directly that if we were bold in carrying out the operation we would be able to lower the output of coal in the Donbass, to curtail the sowing and harvest of cotton in Central Asia, and on top of that here it would be easiest of all to evoke the dissatisfaction of the population.

These were the sole considerations, for example, upon which my vice-commissar in the NKVD and conspirator Bel'sky, to whom was assigned the leadership in the conduct of the mass operation, was specially sent to the Donbass and Central Asia.

Q: What was the result of Bel'sky's trip?

A: Bel'sky instructed the Narkoms of Internal Affairs of the Central Asian republics along these lines and he himself carried out the mass operations in the republics of Central Asia and in the Donbass in such a way that he carried out our conspiratorial tasks completely and fully.

So, for example, as a result of the operation that he conducted he achieved dissatisfaction with the punitive policy of Soviet power among the workers of the Donbass, an enormous instability of the work force, and a decrease in the extraction of coal. In the Central Asian republics and especially in Turkmenia the NKVD, which was led by a conspirator recruited by Bel'sky — Kondakov, I think (I don't remember his name exactly right now) caused great dissatisfaction and ferment in the population, in connection with which the desire to emigrate was strengthened and there occurred many instances of organized illegal border crossings of large groups of persons.

Q: In what you said above you named the Far Eastern Region [FER] as among the group of areas upon which you thought it essential to concentrate specially. Give your confession as to what were the results of the provocational conduct of the mass operations in the FER?

A: I considered it essential to give special attention to the conduct of the mass operation in the FER not only because of the importance of this region but also in connection with those conspiratorial tasks that Frinovsky received at the time of his trip to the FER in June 1938.

Q: What specifically were the conspiratorial tasks given to Frinovsky that you have in mind?

A: I mean only the task of conducting the mass operation of repressing former kulaks, counter-revolutionary clergy, White Guardists, et al. in a provocational manner.

Q: But can it be that in June 1938 this operation had still not been completed in the FER?

A: It had already been completed in the FER. However, we had arranged with Frinovsky that after he had arrived in the Far East he would send a telegram with the request to increase the "limits" of the numbers of persons to be repressed, giving as the reason for this measure that the FER was heavily infested with counter-revolutionary elements who remained almost untouched.

Frinovsky did this. He arrived in the FER and after a few days asked that the limits be increased by 15,000 persons, for which he received permission. For the FER with its small population this was a significant figure.

Q: Why did you find it necessary to renew the mass operation in the FER?

A: We considered it to be the most convenient and most effective form of sabotage, capable of very quickly evoking dissatisfaction among the population. Since the situation in the FER at that time was rather tense we therefore decided to exacerbate it even further through the provocational prolongation of the mass operation.

Q: What were the results of the provocational conduct of the mass operation in the FER?

A: Upon his arrival from the FER Frinovsky reported to me that he had been completely successful in carrying out this operation according to the provocational plans of the conspirators, taking into account the complex and sharp condition of the conflict with the Japanese.

Q: The investigation is interested in concrete facts. What precisely was Frinovsky reporting to you concerning the provocational conduct of the operation in the FER?

A: According to Frinovsky's words the mass operation prolonged by us came in very handy indeed. He created the impression that he had thoroughly routed the anti-Soviet elements in the FER and in fact was successful in using the mass operation in order to preserve the more leading and active cadre of the counterrevolution and of the conspirators. Frinovsky concentrated the whole blow of the mass operation on those sectors of the population closest to us and on passive, declassed elements and was able on the one hand to stir up legitimate dissatisfaction among the population of many areas of the FER, and on the other hand to preserve the organized and active cadre of the counterrevolution. He especially boasted that from a formal point of view you could not find fault with his conduct of the operation. He routed Kolchak supporters, Kapelev supporters, and Semenov supporters who, however, were mostly old men, many of whom for this reason alone had not emigrated to China, Manchuria and Japan when they could. Frinovsky jokingly called the operation in the FER the "Starikov" operation ["starik" = old man].

Q: You are talking about the mass operations conducted in those areas in which you had concentrated your attention. But were matters really better in other oblasts and yet you did not apply your sabotage and provocational practices?

A: It was no better in other oblasts. However, there the contingent of repressed was smaller and so the results of our provocation on the population were not as strongly expressed.

At this time I have, in general terms, told everything on the question of the provocational conduct of the mass operation of the repression of former kulaks, counter-revolutionary clerics, and criminals. I can only make it more concrete and amplify it with some of the many facts that I have, which however will not change the general picture.

Q: Above you have touched on the question that you also utilized the mass operations concerned with the repression of persons of foreign origin from the capitalist countries neighboring with us (refugees, political emigrants, and others) in a provocational manner in the interests of realizing your conspiratorial plans.

Give detailed confessions on this question.

A: The mass operations concerning the repression of persons of foreign origin from neighboring capitalist countries had as their goal to destroy the base of foreign intelligence services within the USSR. They took place at the same time as the mass operations against kulaks, criminals, et al.

We conspirators naturally could not carry out these operations without trying to use them for our conspiratorial ends.

We conspirators decided to conduct these operations too on a broad front and strike as great a number of persons as possible, all the more so since there were no definite limits assigned to these operations and, accordingly, we were able to broaden them at will according to our judgment.

Q: What were your aims in carrying out these operations?

A: The aims that we pursued in the provocational conduct of these operations also consisted in causing dissatisfaction and ferment within the Soviet population who belonged to these nationalities. Besides that we hoped, by the provocational conduct of these operations, to create the public opinion in European states that people in the USSR are being repressed solely according to the criterion of nationality, and to stimulate protests by some of these states.

I must say that all this also coincided with our conspiratorial plans of orienting ourselves towards the seizure of power during wartime, insofar as it created the prerequisite conditions for this. These conditions in the present case were expressed in creating a condition of dissatisfaction not just with the punitive but also with the national policies of Soviet power.

Question: Did you succeed in attaining the treasonous aims that you mentioned by means of conducting these operations?

Answer: Yes, we were successful, and to a considerable extent with greater effect for us conspirators than in the conduct of the mass operation against kulaks, counter-revolutionary clergy and criminals. As a result of the provocational conduct of this kind of mass operations we succeeded in achieving the result that among the Soviet population of nationalities under repression we created a great sense of alarm, incomprehension concerning the purpose of these repressions, dissatisfaction with Soviet power, talk about the approach of war, and strong a orientation towards emigration.

All these things took place everywhere, however they were especially developed — in the Ukraine, Belorussia, and the Central Asian republics, that is, those areas to which we paid special attention.

Besides that, as a result of the provocational conduct of these operations there were many protests on the part of the government of Germany, Poland, Persia, Greece, and other states, and articles of protest appeared in a number of newspapers of European countries.

Question: Precisely which were the protests you mean? Give more detailed confessions.

Answer: The most energetic protests were from the Iranian government. It protested the repressions being carried out against Persian citizens and their banishment from the USSR to Iran, and against the confiscation of their property. They even presented this question to diplomatic representatives of other countries with a proposal for a joint protest.

Besides that in Iran a series of corresponding repressions against Soviet citizens were taken.

The government of Greece protested against the repressions and deportation of Greek citizens, and demonstratively refused visas for entry into Greece to Greeks who wanted to go there.

The Finnish government also protested against arrests of Finns and demanded their release and deportation to Finland.

The governments of England, Germany, Poland, and France protested the arrests of individual foreign nationals.

Besides that, as I have already said, in the European press a number of articles of protest appeared, which succeeded in evoking incomprehension and protests even among friends of the Soviet Union.

Question: And namely?

Answer: I have in mind in the first place Romain Rolland. He sent a special letter in which he asked that he be told whether it were true that repressions against foreigners had begun in the USSR that took place purely on the basis of nationality without regard to their attitude towards the Soviet Union. He explained this request by the fact that a number of protest articles had appeared in the foreign press, and then many prominent figures in Europe had turned to him to ask about this, knowing that he was a friend of the Soviet Union.

Besides that Romain Rolland had already asked about certain persons under arrest whom he knew personally and whom he recommended because of their sympathy with Soviet power.

Question: By means of what provocational methods of conducting these mass operations were you able to achieve the conspiratorial aims you had set for yourselves?

Answer: As I have already said, we had decided to carry out these mass operations on a broad front and to encompass in the repressions the greatest number of people possible.

Our main pressure on the heads of the UNKVDs, whether they were conspirators or not, was precisely along these lines with the aim of forcing them all the time to expand the operation.

As a result of this pressure the practice of repressions without any incriminating evidence whatsoever on the sole basis of one criterion alone, that the person repressed belonged to such-and-such a nationality (Pole, German, Latvian, Greek, etc.), was broadly expanded.

However, that was not enough. The practice of including Russians, Ukrainians, Byelorussians, et al. in the category of Poles, Finns, Germans, et al., became a rather mass phenomenon, especially in certain oblasts.

Of those who especially distinguished themselves in this manner were the People's Commissars of Internal Affairs of such republics as: the Ukraine, Belorussia, Turkmenia, and the heads of the UNKVDs of such oblasts as the Sverdlovsk, Leningrad, and Moscow.

So for example Dmitriev, former head of the NKVD of the Sverdlovsk oblast included a great many Ukrainians, Byelorussians, and even Russians under the category of repressed Polish refugees. In any case for every arrested Pole there were no fewer than ten Russians, Ukrainians, and Byelorussians.

There were many cases in which Russians, Ukrainians, and Byelorussians generally were made into Poles with falsified documents.

The practice in Leningrad was the same. Instead of Finns Zakovsky arrested many native inhabitants of the USSR — Karelians, and "transformed" them into Finns.

Uspensky, under the appearance of Poles arrested many Ukrainian Uniates, that is, selected them not on the basis of national origin but according to their religion. I could multiply many times examples of this kind. They are characteristic for the majority of oblasts.

Question: How did you manage to realize such obvious and crude criminal activities?

Answer: The judicial system of review of this kind of case was simplified to the extreme. It was simpler and in this sense even more unsupervised than the system of review of cases in the mass operation against former kulaks and criminals. There at least judicial troikas existed, in whose membership the secretaries of the oblast committees were included. But in these national, or so-called "album operations" even this simplified judicial procedure did not exist. The list of those to be repressed, with a short explanation of the case in an "album" and with the measure of punishment noted, was signed by the chief of the UNKVD and Procuror of the oblast, and was then transferred to Moscow for confirmation to the NKVD of the USSR and the Procuracy. In Moscow the case was decided only on the basis of the short album report. The protocol (list) would be signed by me or by Frinovsky from the NKVD and by Vyshinsky from the Procuracy, after which the sentence would take effect and was reported to the chief of the UNKVD and the Procuror of the oblast in question, to be carried out.

This simplified judicial system of review of cases completely guaranteed us against supervision and permitted us to realize in full measure our sabotage and provocational conspiratorial plans.

Question: Was it only the simplified judicial procedure that permitted you to realize your provocational plans?

Answer: Basically, of course, it permitted us to carry out sabotage with impunity.

As a result of such an extremely simplified judicial procedure in the oblasts, for example, the practice of falsifying investigative facts, forgery, and deception was widely developed.

In particular this characterized once again the Ukraine, Belorussia, Turkmenia, Sverdlovsk, Moscow, and Leningrad, the heads of the UNKVDs of which were to a man either members of our conspiratorial organization or members of Yagoda's anti-Soviet group.

The heads of those UNKVDs, conspirators Uspensky and Zakovsky, and the members of Yagoda's anti-Soviet group Dmitriev and Berman committed forgeries and falsified investigative results and repressed many innocent persons who had no connection with counterrevolutionary crimes, and created a base of discontent among specific sectors of the population.

Question: Confess in what manner you managed to deceive the organs of prosecutorial oversight in implementing this clear, obvious, and criminal practice of repression?

Answer: I can't say that we had any special thought-out plan to consciously deceive the organs of the Procuracy.

The procurors of the oblasts, krais, and republics, and also the Procuracy of the USSR could not have been unaware of such a blatant criminal practice of mass provocational arrests and falsification of investigative facts, since they bore responsibility, together with the NKVD, for the review of such cases.

This inactivity of prosecutorial supervision can only be explained by the fact that in charge of the Procuracy in many oblasts, krais, and republics were members of various anti-Soviet organizations who often practiced even more widespread provocational repressions among the population.

Another part of the procurors those who were not involved in participation in anti-Soviet groupings simply feared to argue with the heads of the UNKVDs on these questions, all the more so since they did not have any directives on these matters from the center, where all the falsified investigative reports that had been mechanically signed by themselves, i.e. the procurors, went through without any kind of restraint or remarks.

Question: You are talking about the local organs of the Procuracy. But didn't they see these criminal machinations in the Procuracy of the USSR?

Answer: The Procuracy of the USSR could not, of course, have failed to notice all these perversions.

I explain the behavior of the Procuracy of the USSR and, in particular, of Procuror of the USSR Vyshinsky by that same fear of quarreling with the NKVD and by [the desire] to prove themselves no less "revolutionary" in the sense of conducting mass repressions.

I have come to this conclusion also because Vyshinsky often spoke to me personally about the tens of thousands of complaints coming in to the Procuracy and to which he was paying no attention. Likewise, during the whole period of the conduct of the operations I do not recall a single instance of a protest by Vyshinsky concerning the mass operations, while there were instances when he insisted on more severe sentences in relation to some persons or other.

This is the only way I can explain the virtual absence of any procuratorial supervision at all during the mass operations and the absence of any protests from them to the government against the acts of the NKVD. I repeat, we the conspirators and specifically, I myself did not have any kind of thought-out plans to fool the Procuracy.

Question: It is well known that a large number of those persons repressed in all the mass operations were sentenced to terms of imprisonment in the camps.

How is it that you did not fear the exposure of your criminal practices, since you knew that many of these people were convicted on the basis of falsified materials?

Answer: We, and specifically I, had no fears that our criminal machinations might be exposed by those imprisoned in the camps. All the camps were not only under the command of the NKVD but were also commanded from the GULAG by conspirators. Under these conditions we could always take the appropriate preventative measures.

Most important, we had our own special consideration when we sent this contingent to the camps.

These considerations and plans were as follows: when we sent repressed persons to the camps on the basis of materials that had no sufficient basis we planned to use their dissatisfaction during wartime and, in particular, upon our seizure of power.

Question: What else can you add to your confessions about your hostile work in the mass operations?

Answer: I have basically told you everything. It's possible that I did not point out a few minor details of our hostile work in the mass operations, but they do not change the general picture of our criminal activities.

Confessions are truthful, read through by me — (Ezhov)

Interrogator: Senior investigator of the investigative section of the NKVD USSR Senior lieutenant of state security: (Esaulov)

TsA FSB [Central Archive of the Federal Security Service [[successor to the NKVD — MGB
— KGB]]]. Archival investigative file of Frinovsky M.P. No. N-15301. Vol. 10. P. 241, 249-275. Certified copy.

Ezhov ochnaia stavka with Bulatov 09.20.39

Pavliukov 528 — very brief discussion plus the two sentences quoted below.

Discussion: "There were also those who continued to offer resistance [to the investigation — GF]. For example, in the course of the face-to-face confrontation held on September 20 1939 with his former associate in the Central Committee apparatus D.A. Bulatov, the latter rejected all accusations directed against him and left the interrogation unbroken."

Ezhov interrogation 10.25.39 by Esaulov

Polianskii 285; 286-289.

"Listen", implored Ezhov, "What kind of spy am I? I have a 'tail' behind me at all times, my chauffer or a guard. What kind of a resident could I meet with? And no one recruited me in Germany in 1930. I have been lying a lot. And I lied about Slutsky. I did not give Frinovskii the assignment to poison him, and Alekhin and Zakovskii have nothing to do with it. Slutskii died by himself, from his heart.
And lied about everything.

You should not lie...

...

In various documents you stated contradictory and untrue information about yourself. The verification has proven this. Did you do this out of espionage and sabotage motives?

Yes. I deliberately distorted my biography. I did this for careerist purposes, to be promoted in the Party.

You thought up another biography for yourself not out of careerist, but out of provocateurist motives, in order to deceive the Party, to insinuate yourself into its leadership, and corrupt it from within by means of sabotage and espionage. Was that so?

Yes. I did this out of sabotage and prevocational motives in order to struggle against the Party.

Now let us move on to an explanation of those facts that you have deliberately distorted. In official documents you lied that you were born in Petrograd. No information about your birth in that city have been found. Where were you born in reality?

...

I only know about the place I was born from my mother's words, from memories of my early childhood. Mother said that I was born in the city of Mariampol, in the former Suval'sk guberniia of Lithuania. Afterwards I went to Petrograd. By means of the facts about my birth in Petrograd I wanted to portray myself in the guise of a deeply-rooted proletarian and old revolutionary.

Did you also lie when you said your father was a worker?

Yes, I also lied about this for the same reason.

Who was your father in reality?

My father, Ivan Ezhov, from near Tula by birth, was from a peasant family.

Were they well-off?

Yes. He served in the army, in a musical unit, as a senior musician in Mariampol. There he also married the servant girl of a choirmaster.

What did your father do after demobilization?

He was a forester and a switchman on the railroad.

In a prerevolutionary Peterburg handbook an Ivan Ezhov is mentioned who was owner of a saloon. Was that your father?

For a time my father owned a tea house.

We have information that this tea house also served as a front for criminal activities. Is that so?

Yes. It was in reality a house of assignation...

A bordello.

It was a bordello, and my father lived on the proceeds. When they shut down the tea house, he became a painter.

Did he hire other workers?

I don't deny that in later years father had one or two hired workers and was something like a contractor.

Did you also lie deliberately about working as a mechanic in Petrograd factories?

I did this to pretty up my background. I worked very little as a mechanic, my main work was always the trade of tailor.

And now tell us what your real nationality is.

I have always considered myself a Russian and identify myself as such on official documents. I was born into a Russian peasant family.

Aren't you concealing your real nationality? After all, your mother was from Lithuania.

In official documents my nationality is recorded more or less correctly.

What does "more or less" mean?

That means that my mother was born in Lithuania and therefore was a Lithuanian by nationality.

In one of your [biographical] forms you wrote that you know both the Lithuanian and the Polish languages. Did your mother teach them to you?

No. My mother and father knew Lithuanian, but never spoke it at home. I served in Vitebsk in the Tsarist army, and there were many Poles and Lithuanians. That's where I learned a few words and sentences. But I do not know how to speak these languages and wrote on the form that I know them for prevocational purposes.

The investigation possesses information that you know Yiddish. Why do you conceal this?

I do not know Yiddish, if you do not count a few words and expressions that I learned from my acquaintances who were Jews.

And here we have information that you often spoke Yiddish with your wife.

That is some kind of mistake. I cannot speak Yiddish. Even my wife, in my opinion, knew Yiddish poorly and never spoke it with any Jewish people.

Ezhov protocol of end of investigation 02.01.40

Pavliukov, 529, Polianskii 290, say this was presented by Esaulov.

B&S 144-145, and Soima says it was Sergienko.

Text identical in Polianskii & Soima; very close to this in B&S.

No text in Pavliukov.

1. Was the leader of an anti-Soviet conspiratorial organization in the armed forces and the organs of the NKVD.
2. Betrayed his fatherland by carrying out espionage work in the service of Polish, German, Japanese, and English intelligence services.
3. Toward the goal of seizing power in the USSR prepared an armed uprising and the commission of terrorist acts against leaders of the Party and the government.
4. Undertook subversive, sabotage work in Soviet and Party apparatuses.
5. For adventurist and careerist goals created a case about an imaginary "mercury" poisoning of himself, organized the murder of a series of persons who were inconvenient to him and who could have exposed his treasonous work, and had sexual relations with men (homosexuality).

Pavliukov 529:

"The last interrogation took place on January 31 [1940], and on the very next day the assistant chief of the investigative section of the NKVD of the USSR A.A. Esaulov composed a protocol of the conclusion of the investigation. Ezhov was given for his perusal 12 volumes of his criminal case. He read through it and declared that he confirmed all the confessions given by him at the preliminary investigation, and that he had no additions to make."

Nikolai Ezhov's Concluding Statement at Trial February 3 1940

(This version July 31 2010)

- Poliansky, 298-305. He cites the text in Moskovskie novosti January 30 — February 6 1994.

- Briukhanov and Shoshkov 146-152.

- Pavliukov cites this text not from a printed source but from the following archival source (notes 490, 491 and 492, p. 564):

ЦА ФСБ РФ Следственное дело № Н-15302. Т.7. Лл. 176-177; 180-184; 184-186.

This means: Central Archive of the FSB, Investigative case Number N-15302. Volume 7. Pages 176-177; 180-184; 184-186.

("FSB" means "Federal Security Service". It is the successor to the Soviet-era KGB, MVD-MGB, and NKVD-NKGB.)

Assuming these archival attributes are correct, we do not have the complete text of Ezhov's "final words" at trial. Neither of the other two sources, Briukhanov and Shoshkov, or Polianski, give the text that Pavliukov summarizes in his first passage below.

In Note 492, p. 564 Pavliukov states in parentheses:

(Excerpts from N.I. Ezhov's final words to the court were first published in the newspaper Sovershenno sekretno in issue No. 4 for 1992).

"Excerpts" means that this publication did not publish the whole text either.

What follows is all of the text that we now have, translated into English for the first time. Getty & Naumov, pp. 561-2, translate only excerpts from it.

"For a long time I have thought about what it will feel like to go to trial, how I should behave at the trial, and I have come to the conclusion that the only way I could hang on to life is by telling everything honestly and truthfully.

Only yesterday, in a conversation with me, Beria said to me: "Don't assume that you will necessarily be executed. If you will confess and tell everything honestly, your life will be spared."

After this conversation with Beria I decided: it is better to die, but to leave this earth as an honorable man and to tell nothing but the truth at the trial. At the preliminary investigation I said that I was not a spy, that I was not a terrorist, but they didn't believe me and applied to me the strongest beating. During the 25 years of my party work I have fought honorably against enemies and have exterminated them. I have committed crimes for which I might well be executed and I will talk about them later. But those crimes which are imputed to me by the indictment in my case I did not commit and I am not guilty of ...

[At this point both Briukhanov and Shoshkov (p. 147) and Poliansky (p. 299) indicate an ellipsis with the three dots. Pavliukov, who cites the paragraphs above from an archival sources, does not indicate an ellipsis here but instead begins to summarize what follows. Pavliukov omits some of the text published by the first two sources but summarizes text which they do not mention.

Here is Pavliukov's summary of what is missing at this point from the texts of Briukhanov and Shoshkov, and of Poliansky:

"Then Ezhov continued with concrete examples to refute his confessions that he gave at the preliminary investigation. Of course, the greater part of these refutations were of an unsubstantiated nature but there were also some that could have been checked with the aid of objective facts. So, denying his ties with the German military attache general E. Kostring, Ezhov stated that upon his own order all Germans and their automobiles were under observation, and if he had met with Kostring then he would have had to stop the observation temporarily for that time, and that was not done, which could be checked by documents kept in the Security Section of the GUGB of the NKVD.

No such employee of the German economic ministry named Artnau, who had supposedly recruited him at the time of the Soviet delegation's presence at the agricultural exposition in Königsberg in 1930 ever existed, continued Ezhov. This could be easily verified through the appropriate handbooks."

Pavliukov then omits the next seven paragraphs and begins the text with "I did not organize any conspiracy against the party and the government."]

Kosior was never in my office and likewise I never had any connection with him in espionage. I also invented this story. I confessed against Doctor Taits simply because he is already dead and nothing can be verified. I knew Taits simply because once when I called the Medical Department a Dr. Taits came to the phone and spoke his name. I remembered that name at the preliminary investigation and simply invented confessions against him.

At the preliminary investigation the investigator suggested to me that I confess about my supposed sympathy with the one-time "Workers' Opposition." Yes, in its day I did sympathize with the "Workers' Opposition" and I never concealed this fact, but I never took part in the opposition itself and never joined it. When Lenin's theses "On the Workers' Opposition" were published I acquainted myself with the theses, understood the opposition's dishonesty, and since that time I have been an honest Leninist.

I first met Shliapnikov in 1922 when I went to him on the grain-gathering campaign. After that I never met Shliapnikov.

I have already told the investigation about my enmity with Piatakov. In 1931 Mar'iasin tried to make peace between us, but I refused to do it.

In 1933-1934 when Piatakov was travelling abroad he there gave Sedov an article to be printed in Sotsialisticheskii Vestnik. In this article there was a lot of filth poured over me and others. I myself established the fact that this article was handed in specifically by Piatakov.

Therefore, given these incidents with Piatakov, I could never have held any contact with them, and my confessions about establishing anti-Soviet ties with Piatakov are also imagined.

With Mar'iasin I had personal, everyday ties for a long time. I knew Mar'iasin as a businesslike person, and Kaganovich recommended him to me, but then I broke off relations with him. When he had been arrested, for a long time Mar'iasin did not confess about his espionage and provocations in relation to the members of the Politburo. That is why I gave the order to "beat up" Mar'iasin. I had no anti-Soviet ties with any groups and organizations of Trotskyites, Rights, and "Workers' Opposition", or with Piatakov, Mar'iasin, or others.

I did not organize any conspiracy against the party and the government. On the contrary, I used everything at my disposal to expose conspiracies. In 1934, when I began to lead the case "the Kirov events" I was not afraid to report about Iagoda and other traitors in the Cheka to the Central Committee. These enemies sitting in the Central Committee like Agranov and others misled us, claiming that this was the work of Latvian Intelligence. We did not believe these chekists and forced them to reveal to us the truth about the participation in this affair of the pro-Trotskyist organization. I was in Leningrad at the time of the investigation into the murder of S. M. Kirov; I saw how the chekists tried to hush up the case. Upon my arrival in Moscow, I wrote a detailed report concerning all this personally to Stalin, who immediately after this called for a meeting.

In the course of the verification of documents through the Party Control Commission and the Central Committee of the Party we exposed many enemies and spies of various types and intelligence services. We reported this to the Cheka but there for some reason they did not carry out the arrests. Then I reported to Stalin, who called Iagoda to him and ordered him to take care of these matters immediately. Iagoda was very unhappy with this but was forced to carry out arrests of those persons on whom we gave him evidence.

One may wonder why I would repeatedly place the question of the Cheka's sloppy work before Stalin if I was a part of an anti-Soviet conspiracy.

[At this point Pavliukov indicates an ellipsis and his text skips one paragraph, beginning again at "Coming to the NKVD, at first I was alone."]

Now they say to me that you did all this for careerist reasons, with the goal of being promoted into the organs of the Cheka myself. I consider that this accusation is completely unfounded. In reality, having begun to uncover the poor work of the Cheka organs I continued immediately after that to expose concrete individuals. First I exposed Sosnovsky — a Polish spy. Both Iagoda and Menzhinski raised a scandal about this and instead of arresting him sent him to work in the provinces. At the first opportunity I arrested Sosnovsky. I did not expose Mironov and others at that time, but Iagoda was hindering me. That's how it was even before my arrival to work in the organs of the Cheka.

Coming to the NKVD, at first I was alone. I didn't have an assistant. At first, I acquainted myself with the work, and only then did I begin my work by crushing the Polish spies who had infiltrated all departments of the organs of the Cheka. Soviet intelligence was in their hands. In this way, I, "a Polish spy," began my work by routing the Polish spies. After destroying Polish espionage I immediately set out to purge the group of defectors. That's how I began my work in the organs of the NKVD.

[Here Pavliukov indicates another ellipsis and omits the following two sentences.]

I personally exposed Molchanov and, along with him, also other enemies of the people who had infiltrated the organs of the NKVD and who were occupying important positions. I had intended to arrest Liushkov, but he slipped out of my hands and fled abroad.

I purged 14,000 chekists. But my guilt lies in the fact that I did not purge enough of them. My practice was as follows: I would assign the task of interrogating the person under arrest to one or another department chief while at the same time thinking to myself: "You are interrogating him today, and tomorrow I will arrest you." All around me were enemies of the people, my enemies. I purged chekists everywhere. It was only in Moscow, Leningrad, and the Northern Caucasus that I did not purge them. I thought they were honest, but in fact it turned out, in fact, that I had been harboring under my wing diversionists, saboteurs, spies, and other kinds of enemies of the people.

[Here Pavliukov indicates another ellipsis and omits the next seven paragraphs, beginning again with "I am charged with corruption as pertaining to my morals and my private life..."]

My mutual relations with Frinovsky. I have always considered him a "straightforward lad." But on the job I had run-ins with him more than once, when I cursed him out and called him a fool to his face because as soon as one of his colleagues in the NKVD was arrested he right away ran to me and cried that this was all "fabrications.", the person was arrested unjustly, etc. And that is why during the preliminary investigation in my confessions I linked Frinovsky with the arrested former NKVD workers whom he used to defend. In the end my eyes were opened in relation to Frinovsky after one assignment from the Kremlin to Frinovsky was unsuccessful, about which I immediately reported to Stalin.

The confessions of Frinovsky which were given by him at the preliminary investigation were sabotage from beginning to end. I don't doubt that he was the spawn of Iagoda, just as I don't doubt his participation in the anti-Soviet conspiracy, which is obvious from the following: Iagoda and his henchmen called every Trotskyist case a "fabrication", they shouted about things being well now, about the attenuation of the class struggle. Once I became the head of the NKVD I immediately turned my attention to this "well-being", and directed all my fire towards the liquidation of this situation. And there in the light of this "fabrication" Frinovsky appeared like a Iagoda man, in connection with which I expressed even to him my lack of political trust.

My relations with Evdokimov. I have known Evdokimov, I think, since 1934. I considered him a Party man, one who is proven. I have been to his apartment and he to my dacha. If I had been a participant in a conspiracy then, naturally, I should have been interested in keeping him as a participant in the conspiracy. But documents exist that speak of the fact that I, as much as I could, took part in exposing him. It was upon my own denunciation to the Central Committee of the Party that he was dismissed from work...

If you take my confessions given at the preliminary investigation, the two principal conspirators — Frinovsky and Evdokimov — seemed to have been more really my collaborators than the rest of the persons who were exposed by me personally.

But among them there are also persons whom I trusted and considered honest, like Shapiro, whom I consider honest even now, Tsesarskii, Passov, Zhurbenko and Fedorov. To the rest of the persons I always related with distrust. In particular, I reported to the Central Committee about Nikolaev-Zhurid, that he was a venal mug and that he could be bribed.

I have never taken part in the anti-Soviet conspiracy. If all the testimonies of the members of the conspiracy are carefully read, it will become obvious that they were slandering not only me but also the CC and the government.

At the preliminary investigation I was forced to confirm Frinovsky's confession that, supposedly upon my instructions, the mercury poisoning was fabricated. Soon after my transfer to work in the NKVD of the USSR I felt poorly. After some time my teeth began to fall out and I felt some kind of lethargy. The doctors examined me and diagnosed the flu. One time Blagonravov dropped in to my office and in a conversation with me said, among other things, that I should be careful about eating at the Commissariat, since I could be poisoned here. I didn't pay any attention to that remark at the time. After some time Zakovsky dropped by my office and seeing me, said, "I think you have probably been poisoned, you look very lousy." On this question I exchanged views with Frinovsky, and he ordered Nikolaev-Zhurid to immediately carry out an examination of the air in the building where my office was. After the investigation it was discovered that fumes of mercury were found in the air, and I had been poisoned by them. One should ask himself: Who in the world would go so far as to try to raise his authority for careerist purposes at the cost of his health? This is all lies.

I am charged with corruption as pertaining to my morals and my private life. But where are the facts? I have been in the eye of the party for 25 years. During these 25 years everyone saw me, everyone loved me for my modesty and honesty. I do not deny that I drank heavily, but I worked like an ox. Where then is my corruption?

[Here Pavliukov cites the archival source again.]

I understand and honestly declare [Here Pavliukov indicates an ellipsis and omits the words "and honestly declare"] that the only means of saving my life would be for me to admit that I am guilty of the accusations against me, to repent before the party and to beg it to spare my life. Perhaps the party would spare my life after taking my services into account. But the party has never had any need of lies, and I am once again declaring to you, that I was not a Polish spy, and I do not want to admit guilt to that charge because such an admission would only be a gift to the Polish landowners, just as admitting guilt to espionage activity for England and Japan would only be a gift to the English lords and Japanese samurai. I refuse to present such gifts to these gentlemen.

When during the preliminary investigation I wrote about my supposed terrorist activity, my heart was in anguish. I insist that I was not a terrorist. Besides that, if I had wanted to carry out a terrorist act against anyone of the members of the government, I would not have recruited anyone for that purpose but, using the technical means at my disposal, I would have committed that base act at any time I wanted.

Everything that I said and wrote myself concerning terror during the preliminary investigation — is a "fabrication."

I am finishing my final speech. I ask the Military collegium to grant me the following requests:

[The following five points are given numbers 1 through 5 by Pavliukov and by Briukhanov and Shoshkov, but not by Poliansky.]

My fate is obvious. My life, naturally, will not be spared since I myself have contributed to this at my preliminary investigation. I ask only one thing: shoot me quietly, without tortures.

Neither the court nor the CC will believe that I am not guilty. I ask that, if my mother is alive, she be provided for in her old age, and that my daughter be taken care of.

I ask that my relations — my nephews — not be repressed, since they are completely not guilty of anything.

I ask that the court investigate thoroughly the case of Zhurbenko whom I considered and still consider to be an honest man devoted to the Leninist-Stalinist cause.

I request that Stalin be informed that I have never in my life deceived the party politically, a fact known to thousands of persons who know my honesty and modesty. I request that Stalin be informed that everything that has happened with me is simply the confluence of circumstances and the possibility cannot be excluded that enemies whom I have overlooked may have had a hand in this too. Tell Stalin that I shall die with his name on my lips."

The following is from Pavliukov, 531-532:

"Then the protocol concerning the conclusion of the investigation was announced, in which Ezhov had confirmed the truth of his confessions with his own signature. Ezhov stated that at that moment he had not retracted these confessions, but that he was retracting them now. He had no connections with any intelligence services, had not planned any terrorist act on Red Square on November 7 1938, and had never taken part in any conspiratorial activity.

It was necessary for the court, setting aside its preliminary intention to do without witnesses, to call into the courtroom one of them, Ezhov's former assistant M. P. Frinovskii. That same day he too was supposed to appear in court and probably was somewhere nearby.

Frinovskii stated that soon after his appointment as Commissar of Internal Affairs Ezhov had recruited him into the conspiratorial organization in the NKVD organized by himself. At first they prevented the exposure of the participants of the Right-Trotskyite bloc as much as possible, and at the end of 1937 they set to the creation of a terrorist group within the NKVD.

/ 532 /

Besides that Frinovskii discussed the falsification, in accordance with Ezhov's directives, of the so-called mercury poisoning, the murder on Ezhov's order of the chief of the Foreign Division of the GUGB of the NKVD A. A. Slutsky, and of the poisoning by Ezhov of his own wife.

In answer to the questions of the chairman V.V. Ul'rikh Ezhov called everything Frinovskii said to be vicious slander. He did not poison his wife and did not send her luminal, and in relation to Slutskii had had a directive from "directive organs" not to arrest him but to get rid of him by another means, "as otherwise our whole foreign intelligence service would have fled". The need to get rid of Slutskii was dictated, in Ezhov's words, by the fact that there were very weighty confessions of the former assistant commissar for internal affairs Ia. S. Agranov.

Ezhov continued that he did not take part in the anti-Soviet conspiracy together with Frinovskii. Evdokimov, Dagin, and the other persons whom he had named in his confessions as participants in the conspiracy were in fact not such, or in any case he did not know anything about that."

Comments on Ezhov's last words from Briukhanov & Shoshkov, 153:

"Reading 'the Last word' it is impossible not to notice that Ezhov said nothing about the essence of the accusations leveled against him. He rejected them all, but spoke mainly about his services in exposing "enemies and spies of various types and intelligence services" while stating at the same time he had "such crimes for which I could be shot", promising to discuss them, but admitted guilt only in that he "did not purge enough" enemies.

Ezhov denied his participation in a secret organization directed against the Party and the government, saying that, on the contrary, he had taken all measures to expose the conspirators who had murdered S.M. Kirov. But was there a conspiracy in the organs of the NKVD? Or did those 14 thousand NKVD men whom Ezhov purged act individually — each one on his own?

Judging from the transcript [of Ezhov's trial] such a question was not raised at the trial: Everything was clear to the court as it was. The "sincere confessions" in his "Last word" did not ring true. Ezhov was careful to avoid any sharp corners. He even distorted the episode that had already figured in the trial of Bukharin, Rykov and the others, concerning the falsification of a terrorist act against himself. As it turned out the "terrorist act" was planned and executed — if we can even use that word in this case — by Ezhov and by the former chief of the counter-revolutionary section Nikolaev in order to increase the authority of the "iron commissar." Having consulted with specialists about the conditions for mercury poisoning Nikolaev had rubbed mercury into the upholstery of the soft furniture in Ezhov's office and submitted a piece of cloth for laboratory analysis. In the "terrorist act" they blamed NKVD man Savolainen, on whom a vial of mercury was planted. After the necessary "working over" Savolainen confessed to everything.

And Ezhov's attempt to deny the accusation about dissolution in his morals and private life, to convince the court that he was supposedly loved for his modesty and honesty.

As a whole the 'Last word' creates an impression of something not thought through, rambling, incomplete, and dishonest. And yet Ezhov, in essence, had nothing to lose. He could have spoken more frankly."

Bukharin's appeals for clemency — March 13, 1938

Text from Izvestiia 09.02.92, p.3. I have checked them against the photographic facsimiles from the Volkogonov Archive, Library of Congress, Washington, DC

Bukharin wrote two appeals, one much longer than the other. We do not know why this was. Both are translated here. I have added the boldface.

Grover Furr, August 1 2010

To the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet

Appeal of N.I. Bukharin, sentenced to be shot

I ask the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet for clemency. I am deeply guilty before my socialist homeland, and my crimes are beyond measure. I acknowledge all their profundity, and all their shame. If I presume to ask the highest organ of government of the USSR for clemency it is only because I know well that I can use my knowledge and abilities for the benefit of the USSR. My year-long imprisonment has served me as a school in such a way that I have the right to inform the Presidium of my full reorientation. On my knees before my homeland, my party, my people and its government I ask the Presidium for clemency.

Nikolai Bukharin

March 13 1938

To the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet of the USSR

Appeal of N.I. Bukharin, sentenced to be shot.

I ask the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet for clemency. I consider the sentence of the court to be just punishment for the very serious crimes that I have committed against my socialist homeland, her people, the party, and the government. In my soul there is not a single word of protest. For my crimes I should be shot ten times overI should be shot ten times over. The proletarian court has rendered a verdict which I earned through my criminal activity, and I am prepared to bear the punishment I have earned and to die amidst the just indignation, hatred, and contempt of the great, heroic people of the USSR, whom I have so basely betrayed.

If I permit myself to turn to the highest organ of government of our country, before which I am on my knees, it is only because in the case of clemency I can be useful to the country. I do not say, and would not dare to say, that I could atone for my guilt. The crimes I have committed are so monstrous, so enormous, that I could not atone for that guilt no matter what I did in the rest of my life. But I assure the presidium of the Supreme Soviet, that my more than year-long imprisonment has forced me to change my thinking and my outlook to such a degree that of my criminal past, which I myself regard with indignation and contempt, there remains in my head nothing. Not out of fear of death, on the threshold of which I stand as before a just retribution, do I ask the presidium of the Supreme Soviet for mercy and clemency. If there remains in my soul even a drop of hostility against the party and the government I would not have turned to you with a petition for mercy and clemency. I have disarmed myself from within and have rearmed myself in a new, socialist frame of mind. I have rethought every question, beginning with my theoretical errors, which in my personal case lay at the foundation of, first, my deviations, and then of my more and more frightful crimes. Step by step I have reviewed anew my past life. The former BUKHARIN has already died, he no longer exists on the face of the earth. If physical life were to be granted to me, it would be spent in benefiting my socialist homeland, no matter in which conditions I had to work: in a solitary prison cell, in a concentration camp, at the North pole, in Kolyma, wherever, in any situation and under any conditions. I retain knowledge and abilities, my whole cerebral machine, whose activity was previously directed in a criminal direction. Now this machine is retooled towards a new frame of mind. I can work in the most varied fields and in any situation. In prison I have written a series of works that give witness of my complete rearming of myself. But I can also work in areas other than the purely scientific. Therefore I presume to call upon you, as upon the highest organ of government, for clemency, and justify that by my ability to work hard and appealing to revolutionary expediency. If I were already unable to work hard, then I would not make this petition and I would expect only the swiftest execution of the death sentence, for then there would be nothing to justify this petition. If I were a disarmed, but useless enemy, no longer able to do hard work, I would be good only in that my death could serve as a lesson to others. But precisely because I can work hard, I have permitted myself to turn to the presidium with a petition for mercy and clemency. The counterrevolution has been crushed and rendered impotent. In heroic march the homeland of socialism is stepping forth into the area of the greatest victorious war in the history of the world. Inside our country, on the basis of the Stalin constitution, a broad socialist democracy is developing. A great creative and prolific life is in bloom. Allow me the possibility, if only through prison bars, to take what part I can in this life. Allow me — I ask, and beg, you — to contribute even a little to this life. Allow a new, second BUKHARIN — let him be PETROV — have the possibility to grow, this new person will be the complete opposition of the one that has already died. He has already been born — allow him the possibility of any kind of work. This is what I request of the presidium of the Supreme Soviet. The old within me has died forever and irrevocably. I am glad that the proletarian power has smashed all the criminal business that saw in me its leader and the leader of which I was in reality. I am firmly convinced: the years will past, great historic frontiers will be crossed under the leadership of STALIN and you will not regret the act of charity and mercy which I now ask of you: I will strive with all my strength to prove to you that this gesture of proletarian generosity was justified.

Nikolai Bukharin

Moscow, March 13* 1938

Inner prison of the NKVD

[* Izvestiia printed March 14. The correct date, according to the photocopy in the Volkogonov Archive, is March 13. Volkogonov's book Lenin also has March 13; see the online version at http://www.imwerden.info/belousenko/books/publicism/volkogonov_lenin_2.htm at page 88. — GF]

Frinovsky's Confession — April 11, 1939

Lubianka. Stalin I NKVD — NKGB — GUKR "SMERSH". 1939 — mart 1946. Moscow, 2006, pp. 33-50.

TO THE PEOPLE'S COMMISSAR FOR INTERNAL AFFAIRS OF THE UNION

OF SOVIET SOC. REPUBLICS — COMMISSAR

OF STATE SECURITY 1ST DEGREE

BERIA L.P.

From the arrested suspect FRINOVSKY M.P.

STATEMENT

The accusation of anti-Soviet conspiratorial work has been presented to me by the investigation. The thought of the necessity of admitting my criminal activity long fought within me in the period when I was at liberty, but the pitiable condition of cowardice took the upper hand. Having the possibility to tell everything honestly to you and to the leaders of the party, a member of which I have unworthily been during the past years, deceiving the party — I did not do this. Only after my arrest, after the presentation of the accusation and a talk personally with you did I start on the road of repentance and I promise to tell the investigation all the truth to the end, both about my criminal — hostile work and about the persons who were my collaborators and leaders in this criminal hostile work.

I became a criminal because of my blind trust in the authority of my leaders Yagoda, Evdokimov, and Ezhov, and once having become a criminal, I together with them committed revolting counterrevolutionary things against the party.

In 1928, soon after my appointment as commander and military commissar of the Division of Special Assignment attached to the College of the OGPU, at the regional party conference, I was elected to the plenum, and by the plenum to the bureau of the party organization of the Sokol'nichesky raion.

While still at the conference I established contact with the former OGPU worker (in 1937 he committed suicide in connection with the arrest of Yagoda) — Pogrebinsky, who informed me about the existence of a struggle between groups among the members of the raikom (regional committee). Following that I attached myself to the majority in the bureau, which turned out to be the Rights, and conducted work together with this group of members of the bureau until its exposure in the regional party organization.

At the next party conference in 1929 this majority bureau, including myself, and other OGPU workers: Mironov, Lizerson, and Pogrebinsky, were thoroughly exposed. I and Mironov gave speeches of repentance at the conference, however we did not break completely with the Rightist group in the region.

After the conference there took place in the OGPU a meeting of the leading members in connection with the directive of the Central Committee condemning the entanglement of the party organization of the OGPU into group struggle in the Sokol'nichesk region.

After the regional party conference I hesitated and decided to take the correct party road and break with this group. However, soon after that I was called by Yagoda for an official report on the business of the division. After the report Yagoda came over to me for a talk about the business of the party organization. He began to curse me in every way saying: "How could you, a commander and a military commissar, be such a coward, you began to repent at the conference, how can anyone have any confidence in the division after that? And then he said: "Bear in mind that there are still a few sins in your account." I asked, in confusion, what they were? Yagoda answered: "You made attempts to politically discredit Rykov." I said, "When was that?" "Long ago, the documents about your attempt to discredit Rykov are in my hands, bear that in mind." When I asked Yagoda what this was all about, he said that in 1920 in Khar'kov, at the time of Rykov's arrival with a group of workers, in the villa where he was staying I performed a search. Then Yagoda said to me: "Have in mind, Rykov will have his own." And he added: "Try to orient yourself completely towards me in political matters and ask advice more often, especially of Pogrebinsky. And in political work in the division you should consult Mironov; he is a politically literate man and will show you what to do in the matter."

In that same year 1929 Evdokimov arrived in Moscow in connection with his transfer there as head of the Secret-Operative Directorate (SOU) of the OGPU. I was in his room at the "Selekt" hotel. At first Evdokimov was asking me how things were going in Moscow and then he told me that he would be transferred to Moscow and that the Central Committee had proposed that he take care of the operative work of the OGPU.

During this conversation I confided in Evdokimov and told him that I had fallen in with the Rights in my work.

At that time there was already a complicated situation in the countryside in connection with the collectivization of agriculture. I asked Evdokimov: How are things going with you in the North Caucasus? He said: "Things are complicated, the kolkhozes in the Cossack and national regions are having difficulty in getting established, there is a great deal of opposition", and he expressed himself thus: "The devil knows whether anything will come of this?"

In 1930 after the decisive offensive of the party and government against the kulaks, as a result of the excesses in certain places uprisings began, and these uprisings took an especially complex form in the national oblasts of the North Caucasus, especially in Dagestan. I was called to the Collegium of the OGPU and sent to Dagestan. I did not have the chance to speak with Evdokimov before my departure.

My next meeting with Evdokimov took place when he arrived in Transcaucasia in 1930, when he was making a tour of the regions in which we were conducting operations in the struggle against the uprisings.

After official talks I had a private talk with Evdokimov during which he told me that you can't establish kolkhozes by force, like the CC believes. There, he said, in Dagestan the population says that the kolkhozes are kaput, and that's not the case just in the national regions, that the situation is very complicated in central Russia too. It might turn out, said Evdokimov, that we defeat and physically annihilate this kulak, but still have many complications in the country and the party will not be able to establish the economy in the countryside.

On this point my talk with him ended. Evdokimov spent a few days there and left.

My next meeting with Evdokimov was in 1930 before my departure for work in Azerbaijan. We met in Evdokimov's office. I asked for his instructions. Along with operational and official instructions he stated to me that he, Evdokimov, did not believe in the success of the operation we had begun to liquidate the kulak class, even though he was the one charged with carrying out this operation. He also did not believe in the expediency of the operation he was leading according to the decision of the CC and considered that it might lead to the impoverishment of the countryside and the degradation of agriculture.

During that time in Azerbaijan I did not carry out any anti-Soviet work.

/ 36 /

In 1933, soon after my appointment as chief of the Central Directorate of Frontier and Internal Security (GUPVO) of the OGPU and my arrival in Moscow I met with Evdokimov at his apartment. He had arrived from Rostov.

In our talk Evdokimov said that the situation in the country remained extremely complicated, despite the fact that, as it appeared, there was some improvement of the situation in the countryside with industrial goods and food in the towns. And then Evdokimov began to talk frankly with me. He asked: "What about you, those Rightist views that you used to have, have you outlived them or not?" I said: "The devil only knows whether I have outlived them, I don't know, and so what?" "You see, sooner or later the Rights will succeed in proving to the Central Committee the incorrectness of the CC's line and the correctness of the line of the Rights." I tried to object and stated that the situation in the kolkhozes was becoming strong. He replied: "Just wait, those kolkhozes have begun to exist, but that's only the beginning and we don't know what will happen in the future. The cadres of the Rights are many, the Rights are carrying out large-scale underground work both in recruiting cadres and in creating dissatisfaction against the government and the Central Committee."

Continuing, Evdokimov asked: "Have you taken charge of the GUPVO or not?" After I had replied in the affirmative he said: "You ought to be interested in the question of the armed forces. The armed forces will play a large role in case of any kind of complications inside the country, and you ought to take the armed forces into your hands."

Evdokimov knew that my assistants in the GUPVO were Kruchinkin, Lepin, and Roshal', and touched on them briefly, stating: "Kruchinkin is obviously a Yagoda man, but that's not important. Yagoda is paying attention to the military himself, but there's nothing to fear in that either." Then Evdokimov informed me that Yagoda was also a Rightist and recommended: "All the same, do not go too far in your relations with Yagoda and do not confide fully in him and, especially, in those around him, since these are men capable of criminal activity. They will fail because of these crimes and might give you up, but take Kruchinkin in your hands." And then Evdokimov told me that when Kruchinkin had been at work in Central Asia during the time Evdokimov had been there, during the conduct of an operation the operation failed because of Kruchinkin's cowardice. I put the question to Yagoda, said Evdokimov, whether I should prosecute Kruchinkin but for some reason they remained silent. You should draw him to yourself, but carefully, but you should also bring your own cadre as well into the armed forces of the OGPU."

I asked what specifically should be done with the armed forces? In the first place, said Evdokimov, concern yourself with your completely reliable people and take charge of them in such a way that in case of complications they would do whatever you want.

In the same year, 1933, Yagoda, after I had clashed with him on an official question, began once again to bring me closer to him with the help of Bulanov. Bulanov would often call me to his dacha in the guise of going fishing and playing billiards. During one of these trips to Bulanov's on a free day at his dacha Yagoda arrived, who after dinner and drinks had a conversation with me in a separate room.

Yagoda began the conversation by saying I was not correct in opposing him and that here, obviously, the hand of Evdokimov was in play, and then he said to me: "Keep this in mind: I know that you remain a Rightist, that you are leading work, that I also know, and would it not be better for you to come to terms with the situation that exists with us in the central apparatus, to get off your high horse and obey me." And then, continuing the conversation, Yagoda asked me: "How are things in the GUPVO, you have a lot of assistants there, wouldn't it be better to get rid of somebody? What do you think — who would it be best to keep, Kruchinkin or Lepin?"

/ 37 /

Without waiting for my answer Yagoda said that Kruchinkin was a reliable man. I understood that Kruchinkin was connected with him in some criminal activity.

With respect to Lepin Yagoda said that he hesitated, orienting himself to Akulov and Balitsky when they worked in the OGPU. "Maybe you should present him to Balitsky, — he said, — let him to him. You should cut off Roshal' and take Kraft or Rymshan into the division of military preparedness." After this Yagoda began to invite me to go with him to his dacha, but because it was late I refused. When he said his goodbyes Yagoda said: "Now, peaceful and complete contact."

In carrying out the assignments I had received from Evdokimov and after my conversation with Yagoda I began to bring Kruchinkin closer to me in every way I could, and soon had a frank talk with him. I asked Kruchinkin what work he was doing in the armed forces on Yagoda's orders. At first Kruchinkin gave me a puzzled look, but then he began to say that he had not received any special assignments and, for the most part, was conducting work along the lines of selecting people and educating them in a spirit of endless devotion to Yagoda personally.

Concerning the work he had done and the people who had been recruited by him and who were doing work within the armed forces of the OGPU Kruchinkin finally told me upon his return from Xinjiang in 1934.

Kruchinkin laid out the full picture of his anti-Soviet work and named the following persons: Kraft, Rymshan, who at that time had already been transferred out of the GUPVO to the Red Army (RKKA), Rotermel', Lepin, Zarin, Barkov, Kondrat'ev, who commanded at this time a division of special assignment, and then told me that Yagoda and Bulanov had direct ties to Kondrat'ev and that Kondrat'ev had his own people in this division.

Lepin at this time was already working in the Ukraine as a chief of the Directorate of Frontier and Internal Security (UPVO). But regardless of the fact that Balitsky had agreed to accept him, his relations with Balitsky had not turned out to be completely normal, and Yagoda could not forgive him for his past orientation towards Akulov and Balitsky.

In his next regular visit to Moscow in 1934 Lepin greeted me. I called Kruchinkin and with him we told Lepin that I had learned about Lepin's participation in enemy work under Kruchinkin's leadership. Lepin first showed amazement but then, having learned that I too was taking part in the work and had begun to give it leadership in Border Security, we disclosed ourselves to each other. After that Lepin asked me to settle the question of his mutual relations with Yagoda and Balitsky. We succeeded in doing that by a direct talk with Yagoda about the fact that Lepin was our man and shouldn't be put in this position, especially in the Ukraine, where in our interests he ought to establish ties to Ukrainian people and to find out what was going on in the Ukraine. I spoke to Balitsky myself and told him not to insult Lepin.

From Lepin I learned that he had gotten the impression that in the Ukraine as well the work of the Rightists was going on within the organs and armed forces of the OGPU. I and Kruchinkin gave Lepin the task of establishing ties with the Ukrainians while not disclosing to them his own ties in Moscow and without saying anything about Yagoda, me, or Kruchinkin; to insinuate himself into Balitsky's circle and, if they should try to recruit him, to agree.

In approximately the first months of 1935 Lepin, during his regular visit to Moscow, told me that he had established ties to Balitsky and that Balitsky had put him in touch with a number of people from the Border Security, specifically with the commander of the Political Department of the UPVO Sarotsky, the chief of the Border Troops in Odessa, Kulesh, and the assistant chief of the UPVO of the Ukraine, Semenov.

/ 38 /

At that same time, 1934, I had several meetings with Evdokimov when he came to Moscow. At these meetings he gradually disclosed to me his practical work and spoke about the work of the center of the Rights and around the USSR. In particular he told me that he had a number of people inside the apparatus of the GPU, and named Rud', Dagin, Raev, Kursky, Dement'ev, Gorbach, and others. He said that he was beginning to have contacts in the national oblasts: in Dagestan, though Mamedbekov, in Chechnya — Gorsheev or Gorshenin, and then said that the only person he had trouble with was Kalmykov, who had his own line of work, and Evdokimov couldn't cut him off in any way, but he characterized Kalmykov as a man wholly "ours", a Rightist, but evidently one who had his own line of work.

I asked him what was being done generally in the USSR? Evdokimov said that large-scale work was going on, a whole number of people who had important positions in a number of other oblasts of the USSR, had crossed over to the Rights. And here he stated: "You see how we must now conduct the struggle with the Central Committee: at one time we fought against the movement of uprisings, and now we ourselves must seek out the threads, ties to this movement and, in order to organize it, we must go down to its base. This is very complicated and dangerous work but without the base — the secretaries of the regional committees, the chairmen of the regional executive committees (RIKs) or men who have contacts with the countryside — we will not be able to lead the movement of uprisings, and that is one of the fundamental tasks that presents itself to us."

Evdokimov asked me what I was doing with respect to the armed forces. I told him fully about everything, in particular about my meeting with Yagoda and my talk with him. Evdokimov again gave me the instruction not to break this contact with Yagoda, but not to go all the way either and, most important, not to tell Yagoda anything about my contact with him, Evdokimov.

At one of our meetings Evdokimov suggested that I contact with the former vice-commissar of internal affairs Prokof'ev and feel out his attitude. When I asked what the purpose was he answered that he would tell me later.

To accomplish Evdokimov's assignment I became close to Prokof'ev. Afterwards I learned that Evdokimov was seeking contact with Prokof'ev with the aim of getting in touch with him personally himself, which in essence he was able to do through me. Their first meeting was at my dacha, and after that during their visits to Moscow he started to drop by Prokof'ev's place. After a little while Evdokimov told me that in getting close to Prokof'ev he was trying to ascertain whether Kalmykov was in contact with the OGPU.

In the same year, 1934, as the work in the GUPVO was developing, Kruchinkin and I tried to get more closely in contact with Kondrat'ev, the former commander of the division of special assignment of the OGPU, since Kondrat'ev was receiving his assignments directly from Yagoda and Bulanov. We wanted to know what specifically were his assignments with respect to this division. However Kruchinkin's talk with Kondrat'ev did not yield any results, and only after the inspection of the division, which we managed to carry out while Yagoda was on leave, and the disclosure of a number of facts about the disgraceful condition of the units of the division did we succeed in forcing Kondrat'ev in telling about the conspiratorial work he was carrying on in the division.

Kondrat'ev said that the majority of commanders of the companies in the division, and also many of the workers in the political apparatus, had been recruited by him. Kondrat'ev said also that Gol'khov, the chief of the political department of the division (he had come with Kondrat'ev from the Far East) had been drawn into the conspiracy.

Further Kondrat'ev said that Yagoda had given him the task (and this was being developed by him) that the members of the command who had been recruited and drawn into the work should work out a plan of possible actions for the division in the conditions of Moscow. This plan basically consisted in securing and isolating the Kremlin from the other part of the city. Besides that he said that in case of complications they had a military group from the members of the division which would immediately act according to Yagoda's instructions. And finally he informed us that the commanders who had been named to the team on watch within the OGPU in armored cars were separate, in the main, from the group of members of the conspiracy. After he said that Kondrat'ev suddenly became fearful and began to say that he did not want Yagoda to know about his talks with us until he had settled this question with him. At the same time Kondrat'ev said that he knew from Bulanov that Kruchinkin and I were carrying out work.

In 1935 Evdokimov began to ask me whether Yagoda's hand were in the assassination of Kirov and whether I had any facts about this? At the same time he indicated that if Yagoda had participated in this affair it was a bad move, not from the viewpoint of sympathy about the loss of Kirov, but from the viewpoint of complicating the position and of the repressions which began soon after Kirov's murder.

During this talk Iakov Lifshits dropped by the apartment, the former vice-commissar of the People's Commissariat of Transportation. He greeted me and said "We live in the same city and yet we do not get together." Evdokimov then said that you ought to meet, it would be useful for us both. This was on the eve of a free day and Lifshits invited us to his dacha on the free day.

After Lifshits had left Evdokimov's I asked him whether Lifshits had been honest when he had recanted. Evdokimov answered: "People like Iashka do not honestly repent" — and added that Lifshits was carrying out corresponding work.

Two days later I and Evdokimov were at Lifshits' dacha. We had no conspiratorial conversations but Evdokimov was always underscoring the importance of close contact with Lifshits, which we established in further meetings.

At one of these meetings during horseback riding Lifshits said to me: I heard about you from Evdokimov. Frankly, I did not suspect that you were also with us. Good for you!" I began to speak with Lifshits — and how about you? He answered: "Evdokimov has already told you that I am doing work." I asked him again — are you doing important work? He said that he was doing important work, he had contact with the conspiratorial center through Pyatakov, had a large number of people and was not breaking his contacts with the Ukrainians.

At our next meeting in connection with the arrests which were beginning of a number of Trotskyites Lifshits gave me the task, though I was working in the GUPVO and had no direct relation to operative work — to listen in on what kind of confessions the arrested Trotskyites were giving, and to inform him.

In 1935, in the autumn, the race of the wives of Ukrainian border guards to Moscow took place. Yagoda permitted me to organize the welcoming for them at my dacha, and on the morning of the same day I went on a horseback ride with Lifshits and told him about this welcoming. Lifshits asked me who would be there? I said that I had invited the chiefs of the departments. Then he said — ask Molchanov too, and I myself should not be at that welcoming. I asked that there'd be nothing special to it, he should just drop by as though by chance. In fact Lifshits did come to my dacha towards evening. Molchanov came too. After dinner Lifshits and Molchanov sat side by side, they had a drink, and after that they went for a walk into the garden. Lifshits left when the rest of the invited guests had not yet departed, and only after about ten days did I ask Lifshits what he and Molchanov had been talking about and whether Molchanov had said anything to him about me? He answered that he had spoken with him about the Trotskyites. "You see, Molchanov is not a completely clean person, but he was playing the big man with me. We did not have a straightforward talk but I was feeling him about what kind of confessions the Trotskyites were giving.

/ 40 /

At one of my meetings in 1935 Evdokimov at his apartment told me about a number of men whom he had been drawn into the work in Pyatigorsk. He named Pivovarov and a large group of Chekists: Boiar, Diatkin, and Shatsky. Here too he told me about his contacts with Khataevich, and also praised him in every way as a man who knew the countryside; with Eikhe, about part of the Leningrad group — Chudov, Zhukov, and also warned me — bear in mind that you should not meet with them separately because the Leningraders drink a lot and in general they have the reputation in the Central Committee of people who are drunkards, who are dissolute because of their drinking.

On that same trip Evdokimov said: Can't you somehow, through Yagoda, get Dagin on at the operative department? "Although Pauker is a Yagoda man, he is a fool and if anyone gives him anything serious to do he inevitably fails", said Evdokimov. He added, warning, that if you want to try to get Dagin into the first department, then it must be done very carefully, considering the situation.

Evdokimov also said that in a number of regions of the North Caucasus his people had succeeded in leading some groups of rebels, and that the purge of the party that was taking place at that time might help in the sense of recruitment of people.

At the time of the trial of Zinoviev, Kamenev and others, when the testimony about Bukharin was published in the press, Evdokimov was in Moscow. He became very upset and in a conversation with me, said: "The devil only knows how he will be able to extract himself from this whole affair. I just don't understand Yagoda at all, what he is doing, why he is broadening the circle of persons for repression, or maybe the nerves of these people are weak — they will give out. But it could have been possible to direct the course of the investigation in such a manner as to leave oneself safe in any case."

Then he asked me about Lifshits: whether there was any mention of Lifshits in any Chekist material? Lifshits was not in Moscow at that time, he was on leave. I told Evdokimov that I had taken part in one of the operational meetings where Molchanov had reported on confessions against Lifshits, and that these confessions had come from the Ukraine. At this Evdokimov said: "Lifshits will soon return from leave, do not meet with him openly." At this time I was already about to go on official business to the Far East, and during one of my horseback outings with Lifshits before his leave we had spoken somehow about the possibility of a trip together to the Far East.

I said to Evdokimov that Lifshits and I were preparing to go together to the Far East. He said that, you can, it would be better in these circumstances to travel alone. Evdokimov was interested in the question of who among the Chekists was conducting the investigation and the agent work on the Trotskyites and Rights. He himself was very downcast.

Before my departure for the Far East Lifshits returned from his leave but I stopped meeting with him, considering the fact that there were confessions against him and my own possible compromise.

/ 41 /

When I was leaving for the Far East Yagoda gave me a letter for Deribas, the contents of which I do not know, and besides that asked me orally to tell Deribas that the Central Committee was not completely satisfied with Deribas' work, that the situation with combating the Trotskyites in his area was not very good, and added: "You tell him that, whether he wants to or not, he has to do it, he will understand." I asked Yagoda what if he asked me about my relationship with you and with your activities? Yagoda answered me: Deribas is an intelligent man and I think that he will not do that, tell him what we went through here after Kirov's murder."

I had that conversation with Deribas, and Deribas was interested, in the main, in the names of the people who had already been repressed and the people who were mentioned in the [investigative] materials. I told him about Lifshits and Pyatakov who were on the point of being exposed.

On the way from the Far East to Moscow, this was already after my appointment as vice-commissar, at one of the railroad stations an agent came up to me in the train car and said that at the next station vice-commissar of transportation Lifshits wanted to speak with me. And in fact I met Lifshits at the next station. I consciously exited the train car so as not to speak with him in the car, as a number of coworkers were travelling with me. Lifshits approached me together with Rutenburg, chief of the [rail]road. Lifshits asked my permission to travel with me one station. He told me that he had been dismissed as vice-commissar and that in Moscow he had had face-to-face confrontations with some arrested persons. He cursed in every way the people who had given him up, was very nervous, and asked me, since I was already vice-commissar, somehow to arrange things so that he could extract himself from this matter. I, in turn, asked: "If you have already been taken, since things have already gone this far, behave yourself properly."

At the next station he got off. Having met with Lifshits I became a little timid myself, lest there might be some unpleasantness on these grounds, and determined on a plan that upon my arrival in Moscow I would tell Ezhov about this, and would tell him in such a context that Lifshits swore up and down that he was not guilty, was terribly nervous, and through practical work was trying to prove his dedication to the Central Committee. Upon returning to Moscow I did this.

Soon after starting work in my new position as vice-commissar Ezhov began to bring me close to himself, to select me from among the remaining vice-commissars, to hold franker conversations with me in the evaluation of the other vice-commissars, to express some dissatisfaction with Agranov. Before the division of duties among the vice-commissars, besides the fact that I continued to be the chief of the GUPVO, Ezhov proposed that I become involved in operative questions also, and in 1937, after Yagoda's arrest, he began to hold talks with me in relation to my possible appointment as first vice-commissar. During one of these talks Ezhov told me: "I have decided this question, but I want to talk it over with you, only look — be honest, there are some sins on your account."

At first I was completely taken aback. I thought — I'm done for. When he saw my dismay Ezhov began to speak: "Don't be afraid, speak honestly." Then I told him about the story with the Sokol'nichesky affair, about my ties with Yagoda, ties with Evdokimov, and through him with Lifshits. Then Ezhov said: "There are so many sins to your name that we could throw you in prison right now, but never mind, you will keep working, you will be my man 100%." I looked at him in dismay and tried to refuse the appointment to the position of first vicecommissar, but he said: "Sit down, get to work, we'll work together and take the responsibility together."

/ 42 /

Before the arrest of Bukharin and Rykov Ezhov, speaking with me openly, started to talk about the plans for Chekist work in connection with the current situation and the imminent arrests of Bukharin and Rykov. Ezhov said that this would be a great loss to the Rights, after that regardless of our own wishes, upon the instructions of the Central Committee large-scale measures might be taken against the cadres of the Right, and that in connection with this his and my main task must be to direct the investigation in such a way so that, as much as possible, to preserve the Rightist cadre. Then he outlined his plan for this matter. Basically this plan consisted of the following: "We must put our own men, in the main, in the apparatus of the Secret Political department (SPO) and to select as investigators those who might be either completely tied to us or in whose records there are some kind of sins and they would know that they had these sins in their records, and on the basis of these sins we can hold them completely in our hands. We must connect them ourselves to the investigation and direct them." "And this consists in the following", said Ezhov, "not to write down everything that a person under arrest says, but the investigator must bring all the outlines, the rough drafts to the chief of the department, and in relation to those arrested persons who in the past occupied an important position and those who occupy a leading position in the organization of the Rights, it is necessary to write these people down in a special list and to report to him each time. It would be good, said Ezhov, to take into the apparatus people who have already been tied to the organization. "Here, for example, Evdokimov spoke to you about people, and I know some of them. It will be necessary in the first place to draw them into the central apparatus. In general it will be necessary to familiarize ourselves with capable people and from a businesslike point of view among those who are already working in the central apparatus, to somehow bring them close to ourselves and then to recruit them, because without these people it will be impossible for us to arrange our work, and it is necessary to somehow show the Central Committee some work."

In carrying out this suggestion of Ezhov's we chose a firm course in preserving Yagoda's cadres in leading posts in the NKVD. It is essential to mention that we only managed to do this with difficulty, since in various local organs [of the NKVD] there were materials on the majority of these people about their participation in the conspiracy and in anti-Soviet work generally.

To preserve these cadre and their formal rehabilitation the arrested persons who gave such confessions were called to Moscow where by means of re-interrogations we brought them to recant the confessions they had already given (the case of Zirnits, the case of Glebov and others).

At the same time, in replacement of arrested Yagoda men (whom we did not succeed in preserving) on Ezhov's direction we made a push to draw in and appoint North Caucasus cadres of Chekists to leadership work.

A significant number of these men, who had made up Evdokimov's cadre, were taken also into the work in the department of security of the NKVD. As I pointed out above, these cadre were used by Dugin for preparing, upon Ezhov's direction, to carry out terrorist acts at the necessary moment against leaders of the party and government.

After the arrest of Pauker Ezhov posed the question about the selection of the chief of the first department and he himself proposed Kursky, who was appointed to the position of chief of the first department. Soon after Kursky's appointment Evdokimov came to Moscow. Evdokimov was asking me what was happening.

I told him about my establishing ties with Ezhov. Evdokimov then at once raised the subject of the first department and said that Kursky was an unfortunate choice for the first department, although this man is ours, he said, he is a neurasthenic and rather cowardly; I told you that you should appoint Dagin.

I told him about Kursky's attitude already in the process of working, that he wanted in any way possible to be let go from the position of chief of the first department. Evdokimov proposed to take advantage of this attitude and at any cost to appoint Dagin in Kursky's place. Kursky was let go and Dagin was appointed.

At this same meeting with Evdokimov he said: "Are you going to continue the Yagoda line; we will destroy ourselves. How long is this going to continue?"

I told him about the conversation I had had with Ezhov and pointed out that we were now taking measures to preserve our cadre as far as possible.

Evdokimov advised me to carry out as soon as possible the cases against the Chekists who had been arrested and who were about to be arrested. "You see," he said, "you can't hide Yagoda's cadres, they are known to everybody, each of them will be thrown out if not today then tomorrow, the collective from the bottom is simply rising against them, so that here we must rush through these cases as soon as possible."

Further he said that we had to be especially careful with Yagoda. Yagoda is the kind of person that will start to blurt out outlandish things in the investigation, and he advised that Kursky conduct the investigation on Yagoda's case.

I told Ezhov about this conversation with Evdokimov. Ezhov said — it's good that you tell me, but it was not good that you tell Evdokimov that you and I had spoken, let's arrange things better — you will say to Evdokimov only what I tell you.

After the October 1937 Central Committee Plenum I and Evdokimov met for the first time at Ezhov's dacha. At that time Evdokimov started the conversation. Turning to Ezhov he asked: "What's the matter with you, you promised to straighten out Yagoda's position and instead the case is getting more and more serious and now is coming very close to us. Obviously, you are leading this affair poorly." Ezhov was silent at first, and then stated that "really, the situation is difficult, so now we will take steps to reduce the scope of the operations, but obviously, we have to deal with the head of the Rights." Evdokimov swore, spit, and said: "Can't you get me into the NKVD, I'll be able to help more than the rest." Ezhov said: "It would be good, but the Central Committee will scarcely agree to transfer you to the NKVD. I think that the situation is not altogether hopeless, but you need to have a talk with Dagin, you have influence on him, it's necessary for him to develop the work in the operations department, and we need to be prepared to carry out terrorist acts."

I don't remember — either Ezhov or Evdokimov said that we need to see how the cadre were assigned under Pauker and Yagoda, and take them away. Once people remain without direction they can do stupid things, undertake independent actions. Here Evdokimov said that it would not be bad to introduce into the armed security force, directly at the dachas, people from the nationalities of the North Caucasus, these people will serve honestly, in fact the Ingush served as security for the tsar. After this Ezhov again began to say that in no case should we limit or curtail our work, but that it was necessary to pass more into the underground and in no case should he (Evdokimov) develop more contacts around the country. "If you have people, let them quietly verify and recruit people themselves."

/ 44 /

Returning from Mongolia I found out that the question had arisen of my transfer from the NKVD to the Commissariat of Defense as vice-commissar.

The day the plenum opened I asked Ezhov about this. He said that the question had not yet been decided. On my question — whether the talk in the apparatus was true about the transfer of Vakovsky to Moscow to the post of first vice-commissar, Ezhov answered: We want to take Zakovsky into the apparatus as chief of the department with the right of vice-commissar. This man, he said, is ours completely, but he is a man who must be supervised, and then we must get him out of the situation in Leningrad, because there are serious discussions in relation to his ties to Chudov and Kodatsky. In the Central Committee they are also talking about Zakovsky's dissipation.

After one of the sessions of the plenum, in the evening, Evdokimov, Ezhov and I were at Ezhov's dacha. When we arrived Eikhe was there, but Eikhe did not have any conversation with us. What happened before our arrival at Ezhov's with Eikhe — Ezhov did not tell me. After dinner Eikhe left and we remained and talked almost until morning. Evdokimov, for the most part, emphasized that they were gathering information on us, specifically he began to talk about himself and expressed dissatisfaction that Ezhov had sent Deich, who was gathering material on him, to his region.

During this same plenum I had one more meeting with Evdokimov. He constantly pressed the point that it was necessary always to keep a tight hold on Nikolai Ezhov, that "you can't fix this situation, pick your own cadre and shoot", and then Evdokimov proposed "I would advise you not to send the Leningraders who have been arrested (Chudov, Kodatsky, Struppe) to Leningrad because, although Zakovsky is our man completely, but those who work with him, the devil knows they might start to shake." Evdokimov continued: "I consider that you have started to give awards too early. After all, its not just our people who are receiving awards, but also others, a burst of struggle will appear, and that we should restrain, for awards are a stimulus to people who are organically with us and organizationally not tied and therefore might broaden the operation." And here Evdokimov and Ezhov together talks about the possible limiting of the operations but, as this was considered impossible, they agreed to deflect the blow from their own cadre and to try to direct to against honest cadres who were devoted to the Central Committee. That was Ezhov's instruction.

I forgot to mention one incident that has a substantive meaning for this matter.

In the autumn of 1935 at Lifshits' dacha a meeting between Evdokimov, myself, Dagin, and Lifshits took place, at which Evdokimov in an extremely irritated condition began to say that he did not have confidence at all in the success of the terrorist acts that were under preparation by Trotskyites and Rights against Stalin. Evdokimov then directly stated that a terrorist act against Stalin could only be realistically carried out by the forces of the security department of the NKVD.

Evdokimov strongly regretted that he had not succeeded in getting Dagin appointed head of the security department when he was still at his work as the chief of the Secret-Operative Directorate of the OGPU, and suggested that I carefully recommend Dagin instead of Pauker at a propitious moment.

Soon Evdokimov was transferred to work to Moscow. Our meetings took place more often, both Ezhov's directly with Evdokimov, and among the three of us.

/ 45 /

Here I consider it essential to mention the following:

After the arrests of the members of the center of Rights Ezhov and Evdokimov in essence became the center, and organized:

- 1) the preservation, as far as possible, of the anti-Soviet cadre of the Rights from destruction; 2) the direction of the blows against honest party cadre who were dedicated to the Central Committee of the ACP(b); 3) preservation of the rebel cadre in the North Caucasus and in other kraia and oblasts of the USSR, with the plan to use them at the time of international complications; 4) a reinforced preparation of terrorist acts against the leaders of the party and government; 5) the assumption of power of the Rights with Ezhov at their head.

Upon my return from the Far East at Ezhov's request I went to the Commissariat without going home first. I had never before seen Ezhov in such a despondent condition. He said: "The business is garbage" — and immediately introduced the matter that Beria had been named to the NKVD despite his wishes. This is going to be a lousy business, he said. I am afraid that everything will be discovered and ruin our plans.

August 27–28 1938 Evdokimov phoned me and asked me to drop in to see him at his apartment. Evdokimov led our whole conversation to the point that if there is any unfinished business according to which our participation in criminal doings could begin to be developed, they must be finished before Beria's arrival, and then Evdokimov said to me: "You must check to see whether Zakovsky has been shot, and whether all Yagoda's men have been shot, because when Beria arrives the investigation of these cases might be reopened and these cases will turn back against us." I checked and established that Zakovsky, Mironov, and a group of other Chekists had been shot August 26–27.

I move now to the practical hostile work which was led by Ezhov, myself, and other conspirators in the NKVD.

Investigative work

The investigative apparatus in all departments of the NKVD was divided into "investigator-bonebreakers", "bonebreakers", and "ordinary" investigators.

What did these groups represent and who were they?

"Investigator-bonebreakers" were chosen basically from among the conspirators or persons who were compromised. They had unsupervised recourse to beating arrested persons and in a very short time obtained "confessions" and knew how to write up transcripts in a grammatical and elegant fashion.

In this category belong: Nikolayev, Agas, Ushakov, Listengurt, Evgen'ev, Zhupakhin, Minaev, Davydov, Al'tman, Geiman, Litvin, Leplevsky, Karelin, Kerzon, Iamnitsky, and others.

Since the quantity of those under arrest who confessed due to such methods grew daily and there was a great need for investigators who knew how to compose interrogations, the so-called "investigator-bonebreakers" began, each on his own, to create groups of simple "bonebreakers."

The group of "bonebreakers" consisted of technical workers. These men did not know the evidence concerning the suspect, but were sent to the Lefortovo [prison in Moscow], summoned the accused, and set to beating him. The beatings continued up to the moment that the accused agreed to give a confession.

The remaining group of investigators took care of interrogations of those accused of less serious crimes and were left to themselves, without leadership from anyone.

The further process of investigation was as follows: the investigator conducted the interrogation and instead of a transcript put together notes. After several such interrogations a draft transcript was put together by the investigator. The draft went for "correction" to the chief of the appropriate department, and from him, still unsigned, for "review" to former People's Commissar Ezhov and in rare cases to myself. Ezhov looked through the transcript, made changes and additions. In most cases those under arrest did not agree with the editing of the transcript and stated that they had not said that during the investigation and refused to sign it.

/ 46 /

Then the investigators would remind the arrested party about the "bonebreakers", and the person under investigation would sign the transcript. Ezhov produced the "correction" and "editing" of transcripts, in most cases, never having seen with his own eyes the person under arrest and if he did see him, then only during a momentary inspection of the cells or investigative rooms.

With such methods the investigations supplied the names.

In my opinion I would speak the truth if I declared, in general, that very often the confessions were given by the investigators, and not by those under investigation.

Did the leadership of the People's Commissariat, that is I and Ezhov, know about this? We knew.

How did we react? Honestly speaking — not at all, and Ezhov even encouraged it. No one bothered to find out to which of the accused physical pressure was applied. And since the majority of the persons who were employing these methods were themselves enemies of the people and conspirators, then clearly false accusations too place, we took false accusations and arrested and shot innocent people who had been slandered by enemies of the people from among those under arrest and by enemies of the people among the investigators. Real investigation was wiped out.

Mar'iasin was arrested, the former chairman of the State Bank, with whom Ezhov had been in close relations before his arrest. Ezhov exhibited an exceptionally great interest in the investigation of his case. He led the investigation on his case personally and was often present at the interrogations. Mar'iasin was held the entire time in the Lefortovo prison. He was beaten ferociously and continually. If other persons under arrest were beaten only up to the moment they confessed, Mar'iasin was beaten even after the investigation had ended and no more confessions were being taken from him.

Once, as I walked around the interrogation rooms with Ezhov (and Ezhov was drunk) we dropped in on an interrogation of Mar'iasin and Ezhov spoke for a long time with Mar'iasin, told him that he had still not said everything and, in particular, made a remark to Mar'iasin about terror in general and a terror act against himself, Ezhov, and then stated that "we will beat, beat, beat you."

Another example: from the arrested Yakovlev at the first or second interrogation after his arrest Ezhov, drunk, obtained confessions about the preparation by Yakovlev of a terrorist act against Ezhov. Yakovlev said that that was not true, but he was beaten by Ezhov and by those present, and after that Ezhov left without having obtained a confession. After a few days there appeared confessions about a terrorist act prepared against Ezhov — by Yakovlev.

The uncamouflaged line carried out by Ezhov of falsifying investigative materials about preparation of terrorist acts against himself went so far that the agreeable investigators from among the "bonebreakers" were continually obtaining "confessions" of those under arrest about the imaginary preparation of terrorist acts against Ezhov.

The arrested suspect Kruglikov (former chairman of the State Bank) also gave confessions about a terrorist group preparing the murder of Ezhov. I was present at a pre-interrogation meeting between Kruglikov and Ezhov. Kruglikov stated that he had lied in the matter of a terrorist act against Ezhov. Ezhov after that remark got up, said nothing to Kruglikov, and went out. After him went the investigator who was interrogating Kruglikov and went up to Ezhov. The latter said something to him, and then Ezhov and I left for the People's Commissariat. What he said to the investigator I do not know, but I know that in the morning we had a statement from Kruglikov in which he explained his retraction by saying that when he saw Ezhov he "became confused" and did not wish to confirm his confessions in Ezhov's presence.

/ 47 /

They forced Kruglikov to confirm these confessions, and after that Ezhov never once was interested in the question of what the truth was.

In carrying out the investigation of the case of Yagoda and the Chekist conspirators, and also in those of other arrested persons, especially the Rights, the system of "correction" of the transcripts set up by Ezhov pursued the goal of preserving the cadres of conspirators and preventing any possibility of the failure of our participation in the anti-Soviet conspiracy.

I can cite dozens and hundreds of examples when the defendants under arrest did not give up the persons who were tied to them in anti-Soviet work.

The most glaring examples were the conspirators Yagoda, Bulanov, Zakovsky, Kruchinkin and others, who knew about my participation in the conspiracy and did not confess about it.

How were those under arrest prepared for the face-to-face confrontations, and especially for those that were conducted in the presence of members of the government?

At first the investigator, then the chief of the department, prepared the suspects in a special way. The preparation consisted in the reading of the confessions that the suspect had given against the person with whom the face-to-face confrontation was about to be conducted, they explained how the face-to-face confrontation would be conducted, what unexpected questions might be presented to the suspect and how he should answer. In essence what happened was an agreement and a rehearsal for the upcoming face-to-face confrontation. After that Ezhov would call the suspect to himself, or pretending that he had by chance dropped in to the investigator's room where the suspect was sitting he would speak to him about the upcoming confrontation, and would ask whether he felt himself strong, would he confirm his confessions, and by the way, would mention that members of the government would be present at the face-to-face confrontation.

Usually Ezhov was nervous before such face-to-face confrontations, even after he had had a talk with the suspect. There were cases when the suspect would state, during the conversation with Ezhov, that his confessions were not true, that he had been falsely accused.

In cases like this Ezhov would go away and the investigator or the chief of the department would be given the order to "restore" the suspect, since the face-to-face confrontation had already been set. As an example I can cite the preparation for the face-to-face confrontation between Uritsky (chief of the Razvedupr [???????????????????? ?????????????????????], intelligence directorate of the staff of the Red Army) with Belov (commander of the Belorussian military district). Uritsky had recanted his confessions against Belov when Ezhov had interrogated him. Ezhov did not talk with him about anything and left, and after a few minutes Uritsky through Nikolayev [his interrogator and a famous "investigator-bonebreaker"] excused himself to Ezhov and said that he had "had a fit of faint-heartedness."

The preparation of the trial of Rykov, Bukharin, Krestinsky, Yagoda and others

An active participant in investigations generally, Ezhov kept himself aloof from the preparation of this trial. Before the trial the face-to-face confrontations of the suspects, interrogations, and refining, in which Ezhov did not participate. He spoke for a long time with Yagoda, and that talk concerned, in the main, of assuring Yagoda that he would not be shot.

Ezhov had conversations several times with Bukharin and Rykov and also in order to calm them assured them that under no circumstances would they be shot.

Ezhov had one conversation with Bulanov, and began this conversation in the presence of the investigator and myself, and finished the conversation one on one, having asked us to leave.

/ 48 /

At that moment Bulanov had begun talking about the poisoning of Ezhov. What the conversation was about Ezhov did not say. When he asked us to enter again he said: "Behave yourself well at the trial — I will ask that you not be shot." After the trial Ezhov always expressed regret about Bulanov. At the time of the executions Ezhov suggested shooting Bulanov first and he himself did not enter the building where the shootings took place.

Here Ezhov unquestionably was ruled by the necessity of covering up his own ties with the arrested leaders of the Right who were going into the public trial.

The truth of the matter about Ezhov's poisoning. The idea about his poisoning came from Ezhov himself — from one day to the next he kept stating to his vice-commissars and to the heads of departments that he felt poorly and that as soon as he would enter his office he would feel some kind of metallic taste and odor in his mouth. After that he began to complain that blood began to come out of his gums and his teeth became loose. Ezhov began to insist that he was being poisoned in his office, and by doing so inspired the investigation to obtain corresponding confessions, which was done by the use of the Lefortovo prison and recourse to beatings.

Mass operations

Concerning the mass operations at the very beginning a directive was sent out by Ezhov that fully corresponded to the decision of the government, and during the first months the operations proceeded normally.

Soon it was established that in a number of krais and oblasts, and especially in the Ordzhonikidze krai there were cases of killings of suspects during interrogations, and from then on the cases on suspects were handled through a troika like on those who had been sentenced to death. At about this time facts began to appear about disgraceful acts from other oblasts as well, specifically from the Urals, Belorussia, Orenburg, Leningrad, and the Ukraine.

The disgraceful acts grew in number especially when in addition to the mass operations that were being carried out in the krais and oblasts a directive was issued about the repression of people of minority nationalities suspected of espionage and of ties to the embassies of foreign governments, and of refugees. In the Leningrad and Sverdlovsk oblasts, in the Belorussian republic, in the Ukraine there were cases when there were no facts of any kind about such ties. The case files on these operations were reviewed in Moscow by a troika specially formed for this purpose. The chairman of this troika was at first Tsesarsky, and then Shapiro.

The decision taken by Ezhov, myself, and Evdokimov about the necessity to head off and deflect the blow away from our own anti-Soviet rebellion-organizing cadre and the necessity of directing the blow against honest cadre who were devoted to the country and party found its expression in practice in the criminal conduct of punitive policy, which was supposed to have been directed against traitors to the country and the agents of foreign intelligence. Honest NKVD workers in the localities, not suspecting treason from the leadership of the NKVD of the USSR and many of the leaders of the UNKVDs who were participants in the anti-Soviet conspiracy, accepted our hostile directives as directives of the party and government and objectively became participants in the extermination of completely innocent, honest citizens.

The huge number of warnings about so called "excesses" that were coming in and were, in essence, exposing our hostile work, by Ezhov's order were left without any reaction. In those cases in which it was not possible because of involvement by the Central Committee to hide or stifle one or another warning exposing these excesses, we had recourse to direct forgery and falsification.

/ 49 /

So for example in 1938 by order of the CC of the ACP(b) Shkiriakov travelled to the Ordzhonikidze krai to investigate the materials that had come in concerning criminal deformation in the mass operations being carried out by the NKVD in this krai.

Ezhov, with the aim of proving to the CC of the ACP(b) that he had already reacted in good time to these warnings, gave Shkiriakov a copy of an "order" that he had supposedly issued to the NKVD. In reality he had never issued such an order.

In other cases, in order to cover up the hostile work of the conspirators, we brought rank and file NKVD workers to trial.

Deceiving the party and government

When Ezhov arrived in the NKVD, in all meetings, in conversations with operational workers, he rightly criticized the institutional narrow-mindedness and isolation from the party, stressed that he would instill a party spirit into the workers, that he did not hide and would never hide anything, ever from the party and from Stalin. In reality he was deceiving the party both in serious, major matters and in small things. Ezhov had these talks for no other purpose than to put to sleep any sense of watchfulness in the honest NKVD workers.

Ezhov himself, and afterwards his closest aides, beginning with myself, created an aura of praise, of the best of the best, the most watchful of the watchful. Ezhov would often say that if were not for him there would be a coup in the country, that as a result of his work and the cases uncovered war had been postponed, etc. He was critical in a hostile manner and discredited individual members of the Politburo. He spoke openly of them as unreliable, wavering people. Often, in the presence of a number of subordinate workers, he would throw out high-sounding phrases about the close ties of certain members of the Politburo with conspirators who had been exposed and repressed. He referred to some of them as blind, not seeing what was happening around them, closing their eyes to the enemies of the people in their own midst. These were all phrases to cover up his own deception of the party and the Central Committee and his own criminal activities. The facts that I have laid out earlier would probably be sufficient, but I would like to cite several more examples.

The former chief of the Razvedupr of the Red Army Uritsky started to give confessions against the commander of the BVO [Belorussian Military District] Belov, who had been summoned to Moscow where a face-to-face confrontation between Belov and Uritsky was proposed. The face-to-face confrontation was scheduled for the evening. Ezhov was summoned to the Kremlin to Stalin's apartment and after a little while he called on the telephone to me in my office and said: "You must immediately find Belov and ask him to go to the NKVD." To my question as to where he might be Ezhov answered in a loud voice: "Didn't I already give you the instructions to put a watch on Belov?" I tried to tell Ezhov that he had not given me any such instructions, but without hearing me out Ezhov hung up the phone.

We checked and determined that there had been no arrangement to observe Belov and that Ezhov deceived the CC.

A second fact about which I became aware after I left the NKVD. Ezhov hid from the CC and from Stalin confessions that were sent from the Georgian NKVD on Liushkov and other conspirators at the time of Liushkov's appointment as chief of the directorate of the NKVD in the DVK [Far Eastern Region].

Upon Ezhov's instructions I conducted a "verification" of these confessions against Liushkov by means of interrogating Yagoda. The interrogation was deliberately carried out in such a way that Yagoda did not confirm these confessions against Liushkov, at a time when Liushkov had been one of the men closest to him. Liushkov, as is well known, fled abroad.

A third fact. About the group of conspirators and terrorists in the Kremlin (Briukanov, Tabolin, Kalmykov, Vinogradova).

I don't know whether there's any point in writing this, citizen People's Commissar, since you know this already, but I still consider it essential to inform you that the transcript of confessions against Briukhanov and the others was sent as soon as it had been received to Ezhov and kept by him supposedly for a report to Stalin and Molotov. And it was essential to do this, since Briukhanov was the husband of Vinogradova, and the latter worked in caring for Stalin and his secretariat. However, Ezhov, as I learned upon my return from the Far East, hid these materials from the party and government for seven months.

The present statement does not by a long shot exhaust the whole sum of facts concerning my criminal work.

In my succeeding confessions I will relate to the investigation in exhaustive detail what I know, and I will not hide even one enemy of the communist party and Soviet power that I know of, and I will name all the persons who have taken part in anti-Soviet conspiratorial work regardless of whether they have been arrested by now or not.

M. FRINOVSKY

April 11, 1939

AP RF F. 3 Op. 24. D. 373. L. 3-44. Original. Typescript.

Articles

1985: Review of The Star's Lieutenant: The Soviet Marshal

by Thomas G. Butson. New York: Praeger, 1984. vii, 281 pp.

Source: The Russian Review, Vol. 44, No. 4 (Oct., 1985), pp. 427-428.

This work is a popular biography of M. N. Tukhachevsky. Butson has stitched together a narrative that is readable and, at times, exciting. A student of Tukhachevsky's career is, however, confronted with an abundance of sources of doubtful trustworthiness, a problem to which Butson devotes little attention. As a result, the value of his account is fatally compromised.

Some of Butson's favored sources, such as the works by Lidia Nord and "A. Aralov," are the most worthless. These are farragoes of rumor and outright fabrication, replete with "confidential conversations" of Stalin, Tukhachevsky, and others. Moreover, Nord vehemently attacked Uralov in 1951 (see Chasovoi [Brussels] for March 1951). At that time she did not know whether Tukhachevsky was guilty of plotting against the Soviet government. By 1957, Nord not only "knew" there was no plot, but quoted at length from the transcript of Tukhachevsky trial! A large part of Butson's book consists of citations from such material.

Central to any interpretation of Tukhachevsky's life is the question of its end. The "Tukhachevsky Affair" has never received the meticulous study it warrants. The German accounts of the purported SD-NKVD plot to frame Tukhachevsky (Hagen/Hoettl, Schellenberg, Naujocks) are both mutually and self-contradictory. Butson does not even refer to them, relying upon summaries by Robert Conquest and John Erickson, neither of whom was able to resolve the problem (Erickson admits as much). Krivitsky's book, upon which the German versions draw, has been devastatingly criticized by Elizabeth Poretzky and Gordon Brook-Shepherd.

Thus the very existence of the frame-up plot may be doubted. A careful study of the best scholarship, such as Erickson or George Castellan, would have shown the author that little about Tukhachevsky's end can be affirmed with certainty.

Butson notes only a few of the numerous reports of suspect behavior on Tukhachevsky's part and fails to examine these. He scarcely notices Czech President Beneš' account, perhaps because it contradicts his own view in suggesting that Tukhachevsky was guilty after all. When he states (p. 238) "there is no strong evidence to support the plot thesis," Butson reveals that he knows some evidence does exist, but the reader never learns what it is.

The author relies heavily upon Khrushchev-era works, which glorify Tukhachevsky to serve Khrushchev's own political interests. Nikulin's book, which Butson often cites, is an admittedly fictionalized account (povestvovanie). Its treatment of the "plot," like Khrushchev's own, is plagiarized from Western sources, distorting them to remove any hint Tukhachevsky might have been guilty.

Often Butson fails to use the most recent and best scholarship. More than one-third of the book is devoted to the Civil War, but Kenez's books are not cited. In his long chapter on the Warsaw campaign, Butson fails to consult Norman Davies' careful study. While Remy Roure's reminiscences are cited, Butson omits the dramatic account of the young Lieutenant Tukhachevsky's anti-semitism and cynical, opportunistic attitude towards Bolshevism, which are significant in light of later suspicions.

Butson should have done better. His book, though an entertaining tale, is unsatisfactory scholarship.

Grover C. Furr

Montclair State College

1986: New Light on Old Stories about Marshal Tukhachevskii: Some Documents Reconsidered*

Russian History/Histoire Russe, 31, Nos. 2-3 (Summer-Fall 1986), 293-308.

Grover C. Furr III (Montclair, N.J., U.S.A.)

The innocence of Marshal Tukhachevskii and the other military commanders condemned with him in 1937 has become firmly accepted by both Soviet and Western historians.¹ The current scholarly consensus also includes the view that "the Nazi secret archives contain no sort of evidence of anything" like a plot between the Soviet military and Germany, that "not a jot of evidence has emerged from the German archives."² The present article re-examines some of the material bearing upon the Tukhachevskii case which has come to light so far from the captured German Foreign Office files, and concludes that it suggests a plot of some kind involving Tukhachevskii and the German High Command may, in fact, have existed.

* I would like to thank Professor J. Arch Getty, of the University of California at Riverside, and Professor S. G. Wheatcroft, of the University of Melbourne, who read and commented upon earlier versions of this article. Naturally they are not responsible for any shortcomings it still contains.

¹ Khrushchev's "secret speech" to the Twentieth Congress of the CPSU (February, 1956) attacked Stalin for his "annihilation of many military commanders" after 1937, but did not mention any of the executed officers. Marshal Tukhachevskii was first "rehabilitated" in 1958. See Robert Conquest, "De-Stalinization and the Heritage of Terror," in Alexander Dallin and Alan F. Weston, et al., eds., Politics in the Soviet Union: 7 Cases (New York: Harcourt, Brace and World, 1966), pp. 57-58. Virtually all Western scholars today accept Khrushchev's story; e.g. Robert Conquest, The Great Terror: Stalin's Purge of the Thirties, rev. ed. (New York: Collier Books, 1973), pp. 300-02.

² Conquest, Great Terror, p. 285; Leonard Shapiro, "The Great Purge," chapter 6 of Basil Henry Liddel-Hart, ed., The Red Army (Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1956), p. 70 Professor John Erickson, in his authoritative work The Soviet High Command (London: Macmillan; New York: St Martin's Press, 1962), p. 464 and note, states that "not a single item of evidence has emerged to justify the charge of treasonable contact with the Germans," and "no post-war evidence has come to light to disprove this."

In 1974 a newly-discovered document from these files was examined by British historian Frederick L. Carsten.³ It is a report concerning high-level rumors current in Munich in early 1937, which ended up in the Vienna Bureau of the Austrian Chancellor. Among other matters it deals with relations between the German and Soviet military commanders, about which it makes four points: 1) It claims that the top men in the German General Staff, including Generaloberst Freiherr Werner von Fritsch, Chief of Staff of the German Army (Chef der Heeresleitung), were at that time involved in trying to form an alliance with the Soviet military. 2) It claims that Marshal Tukhachevskii had been present at the German army's autumn maneuvers in the past year (den vorjährigen deutschen Herbstmanoevern). 3) At that time Tukhachevskii is said to have proposed a toast to the German Army "as the champion (Vorkämpferin) against world Jewry," and to Goring. 4) It claims that the German military was closely following the "power struggle presently taking place in Russia," in hopes that Stalin would be overthrown in favor of a military dictatorship.⁴

³ Frederick Ludwig Carsten, "New 'Evidence' against Marshal Tukhachevsky," Slavonic and East European Review, 52 (1974), 272-73. The document itself is in N(ational) A(rchives) microfilm series T-120, Roll No: 1448, pages D567 772-D 567 778; page D 567 771 is the cover letter.

⁴ Page D 567 777; see the Appendix for a translation of this part of the document.

Carsten denies the validity of the first three of these points on several grounds: 1) He claims that the last time any Russian officers attended German maneuvers was the autumn of 1933. 2) Though admitting that Tukhachevskii congratulated General Ernst Köstring, German military attache in Moscow, upon the German army's successful occupation of the Rhineland in March, 1936, Carsten avers that "this is a far cry from being a declared anti-semite and a sympathizer with the Nazi ideology. Even Karl Radek congratulated General Köstring on the same occasion in Moscow."⁵ 3) For Carsten, the existence of this document is explained by the story that Reinhardt Heydrich's Sicherheitsdienst (SD, the intelligence division of the SS) was busy fabricating a dossier of forged materials to incriminate Tukhachevskii and decapitate the Soviet military. No doubt, then, the SD would have been "spreading this kind of 'news' about Tukhachevskii, his sympathies with Naziism and his allegedly intimate relations with leading German officers."⁶

⁵ According to Köstring; see Herman Teske, ed., Profile bedeutender Soldaten. Band I. General Ernst Köstring. Der militärische Mittler zwischen dem Deutschen Reich und der Sowjetunion. 1921-1941. (Frankfurt/M.: Mittler, 1965), pp. 125-26.

⁶ Carsten, "New Evidence'," p. 273.

The present article uses an analysis of this report from the Austrian Bundeskanzleramt (BKA) as a framework within which other documents, including those from the German Foreign Office files which bear on the Tukhachevskii case, are re-examined. It examines each of the assertions (one through four) in the document, and each of Professor Carsten's objections (1 through 3).

General Ernst Köstring, former German military attache in Moscow, stated in memoirs published in 1965 that "Autumn 1933 was the last instance of Russian officers participating (Teilnahme) in our maneuvers."⁷ Evidently Carsten has misinterpreted this passage, for Köstring says nothing to rule out Soviet attendance at, as opposed to participation in, German maneuvers in later years. In letters to Paris at the time General Renondeau, French military attache to Berlin, reported that Soviet officers attended German army maneuvers in both 1936 and 1937.⁸ Apparently either Komkor (corps commander) Orlov (according to Renondeau) or Kamandarm (army commander) Uborevich (as Walter Görlitz has it) were present at German maneuvers in autumn 1936.⁹ Tukhachevskii, Uborevich, and Orlov were closely associated with the Soviet military cooperation with Germany under the Treaty of Rapallo. This association might account for the rumor, reported in the Austrian BKA document, that it was Tukhachevskii who had attended the 1936 German maneuvers (point one)—particularly since the marshal had visited Berlin at least once in 1936.¹⁰ Thus the rumor is perhaps not very wide of the mark.

⁷ Ibid., citing Teske, Profile bedeutender Soldaten, p. 69. These words were written by Köstring for this volume, more than thirty years after the fact.

⁸ Georges Castellan, "Reichswehr et Armee Rouge, 1920-1939," in J.-B. Buroselle, ed., Les relations germano-sovietiques de 1933 a 1939 (Paris: Colin, 1954), pp. 218-19 and n. 97, p. 218.

⁹ Ibid., nn. 97 and 98, citing Gen. Renondeau's letter to Paris of 5 October and 28 September, 1937. For Uborevich, see Walter Görlitz, History of the German General Staff, 1657-1945 (New York: Praeger, 1962), p. 307 (German edition 1953); the whole affair is omitted, however, from Görlitz' Kleine Geschichte des Deutschen Generalstabes (Berlin: Haude & Spener, 1967). Since the Austrian BKA report was compiled in December 1936-January 1937, it is impossible to be certain whether it refers to maneuvers in autumn 1935 or in autumn 1936.

¹⁰ On the question of this visit (or visits) see Castellan, "Reichswehr et Armee Rouge," pp. 217-18, 224; also Pierre Dominique, "L'affaire Toukhatchevski et l'opinion française," L'Europe nouvelle, 19 June, 1937, p. 590; Ian Colvin, Chief of Intelligence (London: Gollancz, 1951), pp. 39-40; Erickson, Soviet High Command, pp. 411-13, and 729, n. 27. Disagreement exists about what Tukhachevskii did during this visit or visits, but it is sufficient for our purposes to note that all agree he did visit Berlin in 1936.

Carsten would have it (2) that it is hard to believe Tukhachevskii could have made such a pro-Nazi and anti-semitic toast as the document recounts. In fact, the opposite is true: such a statement would have been entirely consistent with what was widely reputed to be Tukhachevskii's attitude.

In 1928 a former French officer published a short biography of Tukhachevskii. "Pierre Fervacque"—nom de plume of the French journalist Remy Roure—had been Tukhachevskii's fellow prisoner-of-war in 1917 in the German officers' camp at Ingolstadt, Bavaria. In his biographical sketch he set down the contents of several conversations he had had with the young Russian lieutenant during their captivity, among them the following:

—You are an anti-semite, then, I said to him. Why?

—The Jews brought us Christianity. That's reason enough to hate them. But then they are a low race. I don't even speak of the dangers they create in my country. You cannot understand that, you French, for you equality is a dogma. The Jew is a dog, son of a dog, which spreads his fleas in every land. It is he who has done the most to inoculate us with the plague of civilization, and who would like to give us his morality also, the morality of money, of capital.

—You are now a socialist, then?

—A socialist? Not at all! What a need you have for classifying! Besides the great socialists are Jews and socialist doctrine is a branch of universal Christianity.... No, I detest socialists, Jews and Christians.¹¹

Tukhachevskii never protested the contents of this well-known book. On the contrary, until shortly before his execution Tukhachevskii maintained friendly relations with Roure. He spoke with the French journalist at a banquet in Paris in 1936, and then three days later held another, private, conversation with him. Roure recalled in July 1937 that, in his book, he had portrayed the young Tukhachevskii as expressing horror and disgust for Western civilization and a juvenile love of "barbarism" in hair-raising tones (which, we note, could have come from the most radical Nazis). Twenty years later Tukhachevskii had mellowed, had become an admirer of French culture, but remained a "patriotic" pan-slavic nationalist and imperialist who felt that, by serving Bolshevism, he had served his country.¹²

¹¹ Pierre Fervacque, Le Chef de l'Armee Rouge: Mikhail Toukatchevski (Paris: Fasquelle, 1928), pp. 24-45. Remy Roure was one of the most prominent journalists and newspapermen in France in his day, a founder of Le Monde and its political editor from 1945 to 1952, when he let it for the conservative Le Figaro. See the necrology by Louis Martin-Chauffier, "L'Honneur de Notre Profession," Le Figaro, 9 Nov., 1966, pp. 1, 32; also "La Carriere de Remy Roure," ibid., p. 32.

¹² Pierre Fervacque, "Le Julien Sorel du bolchevisme," Le Temps (Paris), 24 July, 1937, p. 3. Julien Sorel, the protagonist of Stendhal's novel Le rouge et le noir, assumes holy orders out of cold-blooded careerism; Fervacque implies this was also Tukhachevskii's motive for adhering to Bolshevism.

We have examined and rejected Carsten's first two objections to the Austrian BKA report, and in so doing have determined that the second and third points made in that report accord well with facts attested elsewhere. We turn now to points four and one of the Austrian document. The fourth point is the claim that the German military was watching the "power struggle" (meaning the Moscow trials) in the USSR in hopes that a military dictatorship might replace Stalin. In December 1936 the Soviet government assigned David Kandelaki, head of the Soviet Trade Delegation to Germany, the task of "feeling out" the German government concerning the possibility of opening secret talks. By early 1937 Hitler had turned the USSR down,¹³ as is illustrated in an interesting document, noted by Erickson, from the German Foreign Office files whose significance for the Tukhachevskii Affair has not yet been appreciated. This is a letter to Dr. Hjalmar Schacht (head of the Reichsbank and the person whom Kandelaki had approached concerning the Soviet Government's desire for formal secret talks) from the German Foreign Minister, Baron Constantine von Neurath.¹⁴ In this letter Neurath summarizes Hitler's view, with which Neurath also declares his agreement. This is expressed as follows:

As concerning the eventual acceptance of talks with the Russian government, I am, in agreement with the Fuehrer, of the view that they could not lead to any result at this time, would rather be made great use of by the Russians to achieve the goal they seek of a closer military alliance with France and, if possible, to achieve as well a further rapprochement with England. A declaration by the Russian government that it dissociates itself from Comintern agitation, after the experience with these declarations in England and France, would be of no practical use whatever and therefore be unsatisfactory.

¹³ Erickson, Soviet High Command, pp. 432 and 453.

¹⁴ N(ational) A(rchives) Series T-120, Roll No. 1057, pp. 429 296-7.

Neurath adds an interesting qualification: "It would be another thing if matters in Russia should develop in the direction of an absolute despotism propped up by the military. In this event we should not let the opportunity pass us by to involve ourselves in Russia again." The Neurath-Schacht letter is dated 11 February, 1937, while the cover letter to the Austrian BKA document, on BKA stationery, is dated four days later, and the report itself deals with the previous month. Thus the letter proves that the rumor set down in the report does, in fact, reflect the real views of the Nazi hierarchy at precisely the time it claims: in other words, the Neurath-Schacht letter strikingly verifies point four of the Austrian BKA report.

In early 1937 there were two leading military figures in the Soviet Union: Tukhachevskii and the Commissar for Defense, Marshal Kliment Voroshilov. It was well known that tensions within the top leadership of the Soviet military were profound.¹⁵ Too much should not be made of an argument e silentio. But later in the same letter Neurath may be tacitly letting Schacht know which one of the two Soviet military leaders he means: "In this connection should also note, for your personal information, that, according to reliable information reaching us concerning the events in Russia, there is nothing to any split between Stalin and Voroshilov. So far as can be determined, this rumor, which is being spread by our press as well, originated in interested circles in Warsaw." Perhaps this passage suggests that, with Voroshilov still a staunch Stalinist, Germany would only be interested in talks with Russian in the event of a military dictatorship under Tukhachevskii.

¹⁵ For tensions within the Soviet military leadership, see John Erickson, The Road to Stalingrad: Stalin's War with Germany. Vol. I (New York: Harper & Row, 1975), p. 3, and idem, Soviet High Command, passim.

There remains the first point in the Austrian BKA report, the supposed attempt by the German General Staff to form an alliance with the Soviet Army. To begin with, we note that Neurath was very close to Fritsch and to General Blomberg, worked with them behind Hitler's back on several occasions, and was replaced as foreign minister by Ribbentrop on February, 1938, the same day that Fritsch and Blomberg resigned and dozens of other generals and officials were dismissed to be replaced by officers more compliant with Hitler's desire for war.¹⁶ If Fritsch were in secret touch with Tukhachevskii, Neurath might well have been informed. But there is other evidence of a Tukhachevskii-Fritsch connection.

¹⁶ There is no evidence that these dismissals (the famous "Fritsch Affair") had anything to do with Tukhachevskii. What linked Neurath with Fritsch and Blomberg was opposition to Hitler's plan to move swiftly against Austria and Czechoslovakia. See Harold C. Deutsch, Hitler and His Generals: The Hidden Crisis, January-June, 1938 (Minneapolis: Univ. of Minnesota Press, 1974), pp. 64, 70-71, 258-66.

In his famous book I Paid Hitler, Fritz Thyssen, the former German steel magnate, one of the immensely influential "Schlotbarone," the Ruhr heavy industry magnates, and an early member of the Nazi party explicitly associated Tukhachevskii with Fritsch: "Fritsch always advocated an alliance with Russia, though not with a Communist Russia. Attempts were made to establish relations between Fritsch and the Russian generalissimo, Tukhachevskii. The two had one point in common: each desired to overthrow the dictator in his own country."¹⁷

¹⁷ Fritz Thyssen, I Paid Hitler (New York: Cooperative Pub., 1941), p. 163. According to Henry Ashby Turner, Jr., "Fritz Thyssen und das Buch 'I Paid Hitler'," in Turner, Faschismus und Kapitalismus in Deutschland (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1973), p. 95. n. 20, the Tukhachevskii-Fritsch passage occurs in one of the few chapters in German in the original manuscript of the book and so probably reflects Thyssen's personal work (Emery Reeves, Thyssen's ghost-writer, conducted his interviews with Thyssen in French).

Thyssen was certainly in a position to know of the kind of secret liaisons he alleges here, and may have been in on it too, since by 1936 or 1937 he himself was deeply disillusioned with Hitler. Professor Erickson, who cites this passage but would clearly like to dismiss it, confidently states in the text of his book that "not a single item of evidence has emerged to justify the charge of treasonable contact with the Germans." However, in a footnote on the same page he refers to the Thyssen passage quoted above, and adds the following remark: "It is difficult to know where the support for this statement comes from, although there was a contemporary Polish newspaper report that a letter or note from Fritsch had been seized from Tukhachevskii."¹⁸

¹⁸ Erickson, Soviet High Command, p. 464. According to Professor Alvin T. Coox, the Japanese considered Polish intelligence to be "the best anti-Soviet service in the world at the time." See his "L'Affaire Lyushkov: Anatomy of a Soviet Defector," Soviet Studies, 20 (Jan. 1968), 406.

There is yet more evidence from the German Foreign Office files hinting at a link between Tukhachevskii and the German General Staff. This is the set of documents referred to on page 435 of Erickson's study, The Soviet High Command. These documents record the loan, between February and November, 1937, of military court papers concerning Tukhachevskii when he was a prisoner-of-war in Germany during World War I (the court papers themselves are not extant). A study of the four loan request documents reveals that the Tukhachevskii files were requested from the Potsdam branch of the Heeresarchiv (army archives) by the Wehrmachtamt, Aus. (Ausland) VI, the section which dealt with foreigners. Wehrmachtamt requested it on behalf of the "GZ." This is the abbreviation for Generalstab-Zentralstellung, the main headquarters of the German General Staff.¹⁹ GZ was of course in Berlin, and was headed by General von Fritsch.

¹⁹ N. A. Series T-78, Roll No. 10.

It is noteworthy that someone in Fritsch's Berlin HQ was apparently showing some considerable interest in Tukhachevskii at precisely the same time that: 1) the report to the Austrian BKA told of Fritsch's interest in an alliance with the Soviet military—a report backed up by Thyssen's testimony; and 2) both that report and Neurath speak of an interest in a military coup in the USSR.

Our examination of the Austrian BKA report shows that, as regards German-Soviet military relations, it is highly consistent with other evidence available. Points one, three, and four are fully consistent with this other evidence, while point two may simply be due to a confusion (or may even be correct as well). We have also disposed of the first two of Professor Carsten's objections to it. However, there remains his third point; that the documents might have been related to the well-known German SD plot to forge a dossier incriminating Tukhachevskii as a traitor. The whole matter of this alleged forgery is very complex, and cannot be unraveled in this article. In addition, it is in principle impossible to prove a negative—in this case, that no German forgery attempt was made. One can merely examine the evidence cited to support the existence of such a forgery attempt and see how it holds up. This said, several considerations are relevant to the matter at hand.

First, the crucial sources for the "SD-NKVD forgery" story are untrustworthy. In his introduction to the English edition of Walter Schellenberg's memoirs, Alan Bullock concludes: "Nor would it be wise to accept Schellenberg as a trustworthy witness where his evidence cannot be corroborated." Erickson also points out several important passages of Schellenberg's which he recognizes cannot be true.²⁰ The account by Alfried Naujocks, the SS man who claimed to have been personally responsible for organizing the forgery and who is usually taken at his word, is even more patently false.²¹ because "it certainly took longer than four days to prepare the dossier" (Soviet High Command, p. 735, n. 25); what then can be said of the later Naujocks accounts, which states that the forgery took place in one night? Finally, Naujocks' account of the Polish border incident (the "Gleiwitz transmitter" affair) set up by Hitler as a cause de guerre, has been proven heavily falsified; see Juergen Runzheimer, "Der Uberfall auf den Sender Gleiwitz im Jahre 1939," Vierteljahreshefte für Zeitgeschichte, 10 (1962), 408-26.

²⁰ Alan Bullock, "Introduction," in The Labyrinth: Memoires of Walter Schellenberg (New York: Harper, 1956), p. xix; Erickson, Soviet High Command, pp. 731, n. 84 and 735, nn. 25 and 27.

²¹ Naujock's story is in Gunter Peis, The Man Who Started the War (London: Oldham Press, n.d. [1960], pp. 76-103. The names of the printing establishments Naujocks claimed to have visited in trying to find a forger do not occur in the very complete lists in the Berliner Adressbuch of 1932, 1936, or 1938. Erickson rejects Schellenberg's account of the forgery

Second, according to all the accounts of the "forgery plot," Hitler and Himmler were both a party to it. But nothing of the kind could be inferred from their later references to the military purges. For example, Himmler is reported to have discussed the Tukhachevskii Affair in a conversation with the renegade Soviet General A. A. Vlasov on 16 September, 1944, in a manner which makes it clear he believed Tukhachevskii had been guilty of some plotting: "Himmler asked Vlasov about the Tukhachevskii Affair. Why this had gone awry. Vlasov gave a frank answer: 'Tukhachevskii made the same mistake that your people made on 20 July. He did not know the law of masses.'"²² In an important speech in Posen on 4 October, 1943, Himmler stated:

When—I believe it was in 1937 or 1938—the great show trials took place in Moscow, and the former czarist military cadet, later Bolshevik general, Tukhachevskii, and other generals were executed, all of us in Europe, including us in the [Nazi] Party and in the SS, were of the opinion that here the Bolshevik system and Stalin had committed one of their greatest mistakes. In making this judgment of the situation we greatly deceived ourselves. We can truthfully and confidently state that. I believe that Russia would never have lasted through these two years of war—and she is now in the third year of war—if she had retained the former czarist generals.²³

²² Archiv des Instituts für Zeitgeschichte (Munich), Signatur ZS 2, Bd. I, page 55. This document contains the notes of conversation between Günter d'Alquen, an SS officer present at the Himmler-Vlasov interview, and a co-worker of Jürgen Thorwald, the German author. The ambiguous (perhaps deliberately so) phrase "das Gesetz der Masse" could refer either to the law of inertia or to the behavior of the masses. In either case, it means about the same thing. Thorwald cited the phrase in Wen Sie Verderben Wollen (Stuttgart: Steingrüben-Verlag, 1952), p. 394.

²³ Trial of the Major War Criminals before the International Military Tribunal [Nuremberg, 1949], Vol. 29, p. 111 (Document 1919-PS).

This probably reflected Hitler's assessment as well, for according to Goebbels (diary entry of 8 May, 1943): "The conference of the Reichsleiters and Gauleiters followed.... The Fuehrer recalled the case of Tukhachevskii and expressed the opinion that we were entirely wrong then in believing that Stalin would ruin the Red Army by the way he handled it. The opposite was true: Stalin got rid of all opposition in the Red Army and thereby brought an end to defeatism."²⁴

²⁴ Joseph Goebbels, The Goebbels Diaries: 1942-1943, ed. & tr. Louis P. Lochner (Garden City, N. Y.: Doubleday, 1948), p. 355.

Finally, the German forgery—if indeed there was one—does not exclude the existence of a real military plot. In fact, all of the German SD sources for the forgery story leave open the possibility that the marshal was in fact plotting with the German General Staff.²⁵

²⁵ Peis, Man Who Started the War, 79; Walter Schellenberg: Memoiren (Köln: Politik und Wirtschaft, 1959), pp. 48-49; Walter Hagen [pseudonym of Wilhelm Höttl], Die Geheime Front: Organization, Personen und Aktionen des Deutschen Geheimdienstes (Linz und Wien: Nibelungen-Verlag, 1956), p. 63. A close study of these accounts reveals, however, that they are mutually contradictory more often than not and that, in general, they cannot be trusted.

Thus the story of the "SD-NKVD forgery" is very problematic. Based purely on hearsay, it abounds in contradictions and outright lies. If it were nonetheless consistent with the other evidence concerning the Tukhachevskii Affair, it might merit consideration despite it all, But the opposite is true.

The only pre-war account of any plot to frame Tukhachevskii is that of Walter Krivitsky, which concludes that the NKVD possessed its own evidence against Tukhachevskii quite independent of any forged dossier.²⁶ This coincides with the opinion of Heinz Höhne, the most recent study of the forgery plot from the German and SD side.²⁷

²⁶ Walter G. Krivitsky, I was Stalin's Agent (London: Right Book Club, 1940), pp. 257-58. But Krivitsky's book is harshly condemned as untrustworthy by his friend of many years and wife of his assassinated friend Ignace Reiss; see Elizabeth Poretsky, in Our Own People: A Memoire of 'Ignace Reiss' and His Friends (Ann Arbor, Mich.: Univ. of Michigan Press, 1970), pp. 71; 75, n. 2; 124; 146; 204, n. 1; 211, n. 1; 269-70. See also Castellan, "Reichswehr et Armee Rouge," pp. 223, 234 & nn.; 257, n. 194, for criticisms of Krivitsky.

²⁷ Heinz Höhne, The Order of the Death's Head: The Story of Hitler's S. S., tr. Richard Barry (New York: Coward-McCann, 1970), p. 233; similarly, idem, Canaris, tr. J. Maxwell Brownjohn (Garden City, N. Y.: Doubleday, 1979), p. 248. Höhne interviewed other German sources and also studied the SD survivors' accounts; while accepting their story of the forgery plot, he believes it was not the cause of the arrests of Tukhachevskii and the others.

Important testimony asserting the existence of a real conspiracy including Tukhachevskii and other military leaders comes from Nikolai N. Likhachyov, better known as Andrei V. Svetlanin. A lecturer in Russian at Cambridge, then journalist and finally editor (1955-65) of the emigre Russian journal Posev, Svetlanin claimed second-hand knowledge of the conspiracy as a member, during the mid-1930s, of the staff of the Far Eastern Army (later the Red Banner Far Eastern Front) commanded by Marshal Bliukher.

In this account, the military and party leaders executed during 1937 as part of the "Tukhachevskii Affair" were in fact part of a wider conspiracy, the central figure in which was Yan Gamarnik.²⁸ Chief of the Political Directorate in the Army, Gamarnik had probably begun the plot, together with Tukhachevskii, as early as 1932. By the time of the Seventeenth Party Congress in 1934, it was well developed. the plotters, motivated by the disastrous consequences of collectivization, were said to have considered two distinct plans. Plan "A," originating with Tukhachevskii and the young commanders around him, centered on a coup in the Kremlin, to be supported by party and military leaders in some of the provinces. Plan "B," envisaging independent revolts in different border areas of the USSR, originated with Gamarnik and the state and party officials in the plot, and was the version finally approved by the conspiratorial center. The Far Eastern Region was to have been the site of the initial revolt.

²⁸ A. Avetlanin, Dal'nevostochnyi zagovor (Frankfurt/M.: Possev-Verlag, 1953). Details about Likhachyov/Svetlanin's life are given in the necrology by N. Tarasova, Grani, No. 61 (1966), pp. 82-97. A very intelligent discussion, from an emigre viewpoint, of Svetlanin's account of the conspiracy took place in the pages of the journal Posev in 1949-50; for a complete list of the articles, see ibid., No. 32 (1950), p. 10, n. I am indebted to the late Professor Nikolai Andreyev, of Cambridge, England, for additional information about his colleague and personal friend, Mr. Likhachyov, alias Svetlanin.

Svetlanin never claims to have been a part of the conspiracy himself which, he insists, was limited to men of the highest rank. Apparently no one of acquaintance in the Far Eastern Army believe the Tukhachevskii Affair to have been a frame-up against innocent men. His story can be partially checked from independent sources, the main one of which is the account by Genrikh S. Liushkov given to the Japanese interrogators after his defection to them in June, 1938 (Liushkov, head of the Far Eastern Region NKVD, had been sent there to help the 1938 purge). Liushkov disclosed to the Japanese the existence of a plot in the Far East, and his account of the plot confirms Svetlanin's in several minor respects.²⁹ the Kharkov trial, in November, 1969, of the engineer Genrikh Altunian (Khronika tekushchikh sobytii, No. 11, pp. 312-13), states the following: "IRKHA, witness for the prosecution and party organizer of the military academy at which ALTUNIAN taught, stated at the court that it was still not certain whether Komandarm I. Iakir's rehabilitation was correct ('eshche neizvestno, pravil'no li reabilitirovan komandarm I. IAKIR')," Robert Conquest also cites this quotation, though without identifying his source, in the introduction to Pyotr Yakir, A Childhood in Prison (New York: Coward, McCann & Geoghegan, 1973), p. 17. Altunian was involved in dissident activities with Pyotr Iakir, son of the general condemned with Tukhachevskii. According to Victor Krasin, Iakir and he were tried in 1973 for collaborating with "the old Russian emigre organization, the National Labor Union (N.T.S.)." (Victor Krasin, "How I Was Broken by the K.G.B.," The New York Times Magazine, 18 March 1984, pp. 71, 75). Founded in the 1930s as a fascist-type organization, the N.T.S. collaborated closely with the Germans during their invasion of the U.S.S.R. George Fischer, ed., Russian Emigre Politics (New York: Free Russia Fund, 1951), p. 72. Iakir had thus been working with a fascist group whose "ultimate goal" is "the armed overthrow of the Soviet regime" (Krasin, p. 71). Almost precisely these activities constituted the most dramatic charges against Iakir's own father, condemned with Tukhachevskii—charges which Iakir believed were false. In a further irony, it was the N.T.S. publishing house, "Possev-Verlag," that published Svetlanin/Likhachev's 1952 book in which the author claimed direct knowledge of a plot against the Soviet government by Iakir, Tukhachevskii, and the others (Svetlanin/Likhachyov went on to edit Posev, the N.T.S.'s main journal, from 1955 until his death in 1965).

²⁹ See the article by Coox cited in n. 18 above. The post-war Soviet defector Grigory Tokaev also claimed first-hand knowledge of high-level military opposition to the Stalin government which survived even the military purges; he knows nothing of any Tukhachevskii involvement, however. See his Betrayal of an Ideal (London: Harville Press, 1954), and Comrade X (London: Harville Press, 1956). A Soviet dissident account of

Curiously, none of the post-1956 Soviet accounts have revealed any information other than that which was already available in the West, and draw principally upon the German SD accounts of the forged dossier. Even the Western sources used by Nikulin, the "official" Khrushchev-era biographer of Tukhachevskii, are carefully pruned of evidence they contain that suggests some real conspiracy in fact occurred. There is, strictly speaking, no Soviet post-Stalin historical account of the Tukhachevskii Affair at all, since Nikulin's work, upon which all others rely, is filled out with dramatic dialog and frankly termed fictionalized (povestvovanie).³⁰

³⁰ Lev Nikulin, Tukhachevskii: Biograficheskii ocherk (Moscow: Voenizdat, 1964), pp. 192-93, uses the account of the forgery plot and President Benes' involvement taken from Colvin and Churchill, but omits all their evidence for the marshal's guilt. The Soviet reader would never suspect that Colvin, Benes, Churchill, and the German SD agents all believed there really had been a Tukhachevskii conspiracy (Nikulin also leaves out Colvin's name, making the source harder to identify). Cf. Colvin, Chief of Intelligence, pp. 39-40, and 42; Winston Churchill, The Gathering Storm (Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1948), pp. 288-89; Memoires of Dr. Eduard Benes: From Munich to New War and New Victory (Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1949), pp. 19-20, 47.

Taken singly, none of these bits of evidence is very significant in itself. But when considered as a whole, they constitute at least a prima facie case that some real military conspiracy involving Tukhachevskii may have actually existed. Nor is it difficult to understand why Khrushchev might have wanted to rehabilitate real conspirators. Khrushchev used the rehabilitations of the Tukhachevskii group as a stick with which to beat Stalin and, more importantly, remaining "Stalinists" in high places—that is, in order to hold power and support certain policy decisions. The Soviet military elite regards Marshal Tukhachevskii and those associated with him as the fathers of the contemporary armed forces.³¹ To accuse Stalin of having wrongly killed them was at once to make of the military a firm ally and to blacken any policies associated with Stalin's name.

³¹ For examples, see Col. M. P. Skirido, The People, the Army, the Commander (Washington, D.C. n.d.; orig. ed., Moscow: Voenizdat, 1970), p. 141; V. Savost'ianov and N. Egorov, Komandarm pervogo ranga (I. N. Uborevich) (Moscow: Voenizdat, 1966), pp. 212-13; Soviet Life (June 1981).

In conclusion, each of the points concerning Tukhachevskii mentioned in the Austrian BKA document is consistent with other, independent evidence. The "German SD forgery plot" story, and the Khrushchev-era versions of the Tukhachevskii Affair, have been accorded a degree of scholarly acceptance that is not justified by the contradictions and inconsistencies which abound in them. Any new study should examine them far more skeptically than has hitherto been the case. The present scholarly consensus notwithstanding, there is little about the Tukhachevskii Affair, including the very basic matter of Tukhachevskii's guilt or innocence, about which we can be certain.

Montclair State University

Appendix

—N. A. Series T-120, Roll NO. 1448, page D 567 777.

Now, as always there are efforts under way within the Wehrmacht which aim at the possibility of an alliance with the Russian army. The argument is simple: the Russian army cannot be taken care of by force; therefore it should happen in friendship. Fritsch, Admiral Raeder, and even General von Reichnau are rumored to be proponents of this plan. Blomberg is seen as a mere accessory (Figurant). But the proponents of these efforts are found chiefly among the younger school of the General Staff. When he was in Berlin on the occasion of last year's German autumn maneuvers, Marshal Tukhachevskii offered, in return for Colonel-General Fritsch's toast to the Russian army in Würzburg, a toast to the German army as the champion against world Jewry, and to General Göring. The power struggle presently taking place in Russia, which might possibly end with Stalin's fall and the establishment of a military dictatorship, is being followed by the Wehrmacht with closest attention, and with unconcealed sympathy for a solution of that kind.

1998: Review of Life and Terror in Stalin's Russia, 1934-1941 by Robert Thurston

(London and New Haven: Yale University Press, 1996). $30.00.

Using History to Fight Anti-Communism

Anti-Stalinism Hurts Workers, Builds Fascism

Billions of workers all over the world are exploited, murdered, tortured, oppressed by capitalism. The greatest historical events in the twentieth century — in fact, in all of human history — have been the overthrow of capitalism and establishment of societies run by and for the working class in the two great communist revolutions in Russia and China.

The Russian Revolution was the first of them, blazing the trail for all revolutionaries to come. Its history — its successes and failures — are the essential textbook for all workers and others who recognize the need to get rid of exploitation and build a better world run by those who toil.

Naturally the world's capitalists do not want this learning process to happen! So the ruling class try to spread anti-Communist lies, the purpose of which is to demoralize potential revolutionaries and make us passive. These wrong ideas — wrong both in the sense that they are incorrect AND in that they serve the exploiters' interests, not the interest of workers — include racism, religion, sexism, and anti-communism.

The main form anti-communism has taken for the past several decades has been anti-Stalinism. If workers and others can be convinced that any attempt to build a communist society — one based upon need, without exploitation, run by and for the working class — will end up "as bad as or worse than" Nazi Germany, then we will never really make the attempt. This means we will be reduced to struggling only for reforms under capitalism. This reformism is ultimately acceptable to the capitalists since it leaves them in control forever.

A second way the bosses use anti-Stalinism is to justify fascist repression and murder of any workers' attempts to rebel against capitalism. After all, if "Stalinism" is "worse than Nazi Germany", and if any attempt to build communism can lead only to "Stalinism", then any and all repressive measures to suppress revolution are justified, including torture, mass murder, and fascism itself. This anti-communism has been the main justification for imperialist slaughter in the period since World War II, as indeed it had been for the Nazis' aggression and atrocities. Because it is the main ideological form of anti-communism, fighting anti-Stalinism is therefore a vital, life-and-death issue for the world's workers — for all of us. This review essay will show how a new (1996) book can be useful in doing just that, and it also outlines some of the limitations of that book.

Strengths of Thurston's Work

Thurston's main points are as follows:

- The mass arrests and executions of 1936-38 in the USSR were not planned, but were panicked reactions to plots against the Soviet government.
- These events were not intended to, and did not in fact, spread "fear and terror" throughout the Soviet population, but rather were carried out against perceived enemies with the support and often the active participation of the Soviet population.
- They occurred at a time when the USSR was under enormous threat from hostile nations. (In addition, communists the world over were being imprisoned, tortured and murdered by capitalist regimes, though Thurston does not refer to these facts.)
- The numbers imprisoned and executed were far less than the inflated estimates claimed by anti-Communist sources.
- Rather than being cowed and demoralized by mass arrests and police activity, the growing Soviet industrial working class enjoyed an active voice inside the factories, encouraged by Soviet leaders to speak out about conditions in the plants and outside.
- The "acid test" of whether the workers and peasants supported Soviet socialism or were alienated from and hostile to it came with the Nazi invasion. Thurston shows that the Soviet people determinedly repulsed this massive onslaught by rushing either to join the Red Army or the factories to increase military production, while the Red Army fought with a dedication, effectiveness and morale utterly unmatched by the best Western capitalist armies.

Thurston's introduction outlines what he calls the "standard version" (xiv) or "orthodox view" (xvi) of Stalin and the USSR in the '30s, invoking the name of Robert Conquest — which he will then prove wrong. (Conquest, a former British Secret Service agent, is the foremost anti-communist liar about the Stalin years.) He also points out also how the present capitalist rulers of Russia have every motive to build anti-Stalinism.

This chapter also demonstrates that the Soviet legal system was evolving along recognizably capitalist lines in terms of its judicial process during the early '30s. On the one hand, this contradicts the view of the Cold Warriors that the USSR was "totalitarian", and this is Thurston's main point: that the USSR was becoming more "liberal", giving citizens protection against arbitrary police action, for example.

It reveals, however, how much the Bolsheviks relied on Western capitalist models, in the judicial system and elsewhere (education, culture, industry), for models of how to build a communist society. Here, the Bolsheviks' view of communism was, as we can see now in hindsight, in many respects a "reformed" version of capitalist relationships. Learning from the Bolsheviks' shortcomings as well as from their own experience, left forces within the Chinese Communist Party later challenged reliance on police and courts with reliance on the working class and poor peasants through political struggle, public trials, and an emphasis on self-criticism and being held accountable to the masses — a process that eventually reached its high point during the Cultural Revolution before it was finally defeated.

Chapter Two disposes of some ancient anti-Communist lies. Thurston shows there's no evidence Stalin murdered either his second wife in 1932 or Politburo colleague Sergei Kirov in 1934. Both of these fairy-tales have been refuted by other scholars before Thurston but are still accepted without question as true by anti-Stalinists. Concerning the three big "Show Trials" of 1936-38, Thurston highlights the evidence that the basic charges against the defendants were in fact true. This was generally accepted even by keen Western observers at the time, like Joseph Davies, sent by President Roosevelt to check out the Soviet government (see his book Mission to Moscow), and confirmed long ago too by staunch anti-Communist scholars like Robert V. Daniels (see his Conscience of the Revolution, 1960).

Thurston shows that there was "wrecking" — industrial sabotage — in the economy under Yuri Pyatakov, whose confession to this effect is also shown to have been voluntary, not coerced (46). Even the charges against Nikolai Bukharin, main defendant in the 1938 trial, are shown to have been true in the main, as documents from Bolshevnik archives prove (35-42). Thurston also states that some accusations against the defendants were "fabrications", but he never gives any evidence to support this charge. In fact — though Thurston does not discuss this — it is quite likely that suspicions of "wrecking" were exaggerated by the recklessness built into the industrialization campaign, caused by the emphasis on "increasing productive forces" by sharpening wage differentials, privileges, and therefore class antagonisms: in short, by socialism, the mixture of communist and capitalist elements which communists since the days of Marx's Critique of the Gotha Program had believed was a necessary interim stage between capitalism and a classless society.

Finally, Chapter Two also reaffirms that the massive arrests did not take place until after the arrests and executions in June 1937 of the military commanders led by Marshal Tukhachevsky. Stalin and the Bolshevnik leadership clearly believed there was a real conspiracy, and there's much, though not conclusive, evidence that such a conspiracy indeed existed. Chapter Three demonstrates that the Soviet government reacted in panic to the disclosure of such high-placed treason. There's no evidence at all that Stalin was out to "terrorize the country".

Nikolai Ezhov, the leader of the political police (or NKVD), was the person most directly responsible for the massive arrests and executions. Usually demonized by Cold War historians, Ezhov was a long-time Communist with an honorable record, a worker since the age of 14, before being entrusted by the Politburo with the task of directly overseeing the repression of what all believed to be a massive counter-revolutionary plot.

Ezhov set high quotas for executions, which the police felt had to be met. There were many examples of police arresting and executing people either to "meet quotas" or from outright corruption. Recent research by Thurston's colleagues suggests that between six and seven hundred thousand persons were executed during 1937-38. (See the article by Getty, Rittersporn, and Zemskov in American Historical Review, October 1993).

A few comments are in order here. First, the concept of "quotas" for executions appears to come from Lenin's practice during the Civil War, although Thurston does not say so. After the Bolsheviks revolution privileged and propertied people throughout Russia opposed the Bolsheviks and Red Army, and White (anti-Communist) forces routinely executed Communists, workers who supported them, and all Jews. Under Lenin's urging the Bolsheviks would take hostages from among the upper classes, threatening to execute them if the Whites opposed them.

It should be clear that such "quotas for execution" were completely inappropriate in a situation in which the Bolsheviks held state power and could confine anyone suspected of anti-Communist activity until their cases could be investigated. Such executions, whether of the guilty or, as was inevitable, of the innocent as well, serve no mass political function, as would public trials, investigations, and a concept of justice based upon the direct participation of the working class — an issue noted by Vyshinsky himself.

Anti-Communist "scholars" have repeatedly produced fantastically high figures for Soviet executions and jailings during the "purges". Thurston challenges those inflated numbers with strong archival evidence. On page 137 he explicitly states that the inflated estimates are too high. On page 11 Thurston has a chart showing there were 1,196,439 camp inmates in 1937, a slight decline from the previous year (this included criminals as well as those arrested for political crimes, but does not include prison inmates). For purposes of comparison, we should note that this is much smaller than the US prison population today! While it seems clear to us now that many of those prisoners charged with political crimes (104,826, or 12.8% of the total) were not in fact guilty, that prison population is a long way from the Cold-War anti-Communist "guesstimates" of between 7 and 15 million prisoners — and some guess much higher still, 20 or 30 million!

Thurston shows there were, in fact, other real anti-Soviet plots in addition to the "Tukhachevsky Affair" (mass arrests and executions of military officers), including some spies within the NKVD itself. He also provides overwhelming evidence to show that the arrests targeted elite sectors — managers, specialists, intellectuals, party officials, and not "workers or poor peasants, the favored children of the new regime" (76). Naturally communists should not support unjust accusations against anyone, regardless of their class background. What this fact shows is that socialism — the continuation of capitalist relations of production and a capitalist notion of economic development — involved the continuation of class antagonisms under somewhat different forms, class antagonisms that found expression in the mass arrests and executions.

Thurston puts these events squarely in the context of the aftermath of the extremely violent years of 1914-21 (the beginning of World War I to the end of the very bloody Civil War) and, more immediately, of the sharpening international situation of the late '30s, when Nazi Germany and all the imperialist countries were unmistakably bent upon surrounding and destroying the USSR.

However, even at that Thurston underplays the danger facing the Communist movement. On pages 34-5, he mentions the German reoccupation of the Rhineland in March 1936, unchallenged by the French who wanted Hitler to rearm, so as to pit him against the USSR. He mentions the start of the Spanish Civil War in July 1936, but not the huge military support given to Franco, leader of the Spanish fascists, by Nazi Germany and fascist Italy, nor the phony "neutrality" of England, France, and the USA which cut the Spanish Republic off from international aid. He mentions fascist Italy's invasion of Ethiopia in December 1935, unchallenged by the other imperialists, but never the Japanese fascists' seizure of Manchuria in 1931 or the Anti-Comintern Pact between Germany, Japan and Italy (1936-37), or the Japanese invasion of China (1937). Stalin would later express the Soviet view that the other imperialists were encouraging the Germans to attack and destroy the Soviet union:

"They kept on urging the Germans to go farther and farther east: 'You just start a war against the Bolsheviks, and all will be well'" (quoted in Alexander Werth, Russia at War, p. 39).

Also left out is the Nazi decimation of the German Communist Party, the largest in Europe, beginning in 1934. In 1936, when the Soviet "purges" began, German Communists were being tortured and murdered by the thousands in German concentration camps, and similar treatment was being meted out to Communists and workers in dozens of other capitalist lands — as, in fact, it still is. Little wonder that the Soviets weren't prone to treat too kindly those it considered to be German spies and agents!

And Thurston repeats, time and again, what his sources show him: the Soviet government favored workers and poor peasants over all others in the population, while they were being exploited, killed, etc., in every other country in the world! Thurston's own evidence shows that the USSR was a "dictatorship of the working class".

Some police agencies treated evidence as very important, though many did not. Conditions in the labor and punishment camps, the so-called "Gulag", Thurston argues, were bearable both before and after the period 1937 to 1938, but very bad during this period, reflecting the fact that most police, and even prisoners, were convinced those arrested during this time were traitorous conspirators who deserved the worst treatment.

By January 1938, Thurston shows, complaints of unjustified repression were flooding the Central Committee, and the Plenum began to demand that expulsions from the Party be reviewed for unfairness. The next month Andrei Vyshinsky, formerly the head prosecutor at the "Show Trials", complained about conditions in the labor camps and demanded punishment of camp officials who permitted bad conditions. He also insisted that those who fabricated evidence be arrested. In fact a number of trials of such fabricators did take place this year and the next, often with great publicity.

The need to pay greater attention to physical evidence, as opposed to confession, was re-emphasized. By the middle of 1938 the great period of panic, mass arrests, and executions was over. Police procedures were regularized; conditions in the camps improved; many of those falsely arrested were released and exonerated. Trials of NKVD men who had tortured and framed people were held, and the NKVD purged of such people.

Certainly the Soviet state was justified in acting to arrest preemptively, in times of crisis, anyone suspected of treason. But there was no reason for executing people on the same flimsy basis; they could certainly have been imprisoned pending a serious review of their cases. Had this been done, many or most executions would not have taken place. What is more, well-publicized trials of those who were guilty, with evidence publicly given, would have raised political consciousness, as did the Chinese Communist Party's public trials of landlords in the period after their seizure of power, in which peasants openly accused those who had exploited and murdered them.

Chapter Six, "Life in the Factories", shows that the Stakhanovite movement was, in fact, a mass movement which gave all workers the opportunity to gain recognition for improving production and technique, rather than a cynical way of "speeding-up" the workers, as it has been described by anti-Communists. Thurston argues that, in fact, Stakhanovism gave workers more power. Workers' views and criticisms were respected; supervisors and foremen ignored them at their peril.

But here too we see that "socialist" relations of production were basically a reformed version of capitalist relations of production. While acknowledging the communist, collective aspects of the Stakhanov movement, we can see in retrospect how it inevitably became associated with speed-up, given the retention of a wage system. Thurston's book neglects this aspect of the movement.

Thurston quotes some American workers who had also worked in the USSR as saying that conditions of work, and the atmosphere in the factories, were better for Soviet workers in the 1930s than for workers in the US (192). But he then undercuts their view — far more informed than his own — in the next sentence, where he writes that "Soviet workers were hardly better off or freer than their American counterparts".

Ironically, he has already cited evidence on page 170 that at least some Soviet workers had shorter working hours than US workers. At the time, many people thought Soviet workers were, in fact, better off than were American workers. One of them was Walter Reuther, later the anti-Communist president of the United Auto Workers, who worked in a Soviet auto factory in the 1930s. In a passage not cited by Thurston, Reuther wrote home:

Here are no bosses to drive fear into the workers. No one to drive them in mad speed-ups. Here the workers are in control. Even the shop superintendent had no more right in these meetings than any other worker. I have witnessed many times already when the superintendent spoke too long. The workers in the hall decided he had already consumed enough time and the floor was given to a lathe hand to who told of his problems and offered suggestions. Imagine this at Ford or Briggs. This is what the outside world calls the "ruthless dictatorship in Russia". I tell you ... in all countries we have thus far been in we have never found such genuine proletarian democracy... (quoted from Phillip Bonosky, Brother Bill McKie: Building the Union at Ford [New York: International Publishers, 1953]).

Thurston says nothing about free medical care, cited in many studies of and novels about the Soviet Union in the 1930s. And much of his chapter shows how Soviet workers had a tremendous amount of input and right to criticize. Thurston also doesn't mention that millions of US workers were unemployed in the '30s, while the Soviets had a labor shortage. He omits the fact that US workers trying to unionize for better conditions were being violently attacked, and often killed, by the police, the military, and employer-hired goons. Conditions for the working class in Europe generally were even worse, with fascist or virtually fascist regimes, all viciously anti-working class, in most countries.

The final chapter deals with the response of the Soviet population to World War II. Here too Thurston concludes that the Soviet regime retained much loyalty and enthusiasm among the population. Soviet soldiers fought against the Japanese in Mongolia with high morale in 1938, where their military leadership was excellent, and against Finland and then the German Wehrmacht in 1940 and 1941, where both political and military leadership was initially poor and led to larger casualties than necessary. In the opening days of WWII, the Red Army fought well, counterattacking against far superior Axis forces, often fighting to the last man, rarely surrendering unless surrounded or demoralized by huge casualties and a hopeless situation. German officers uniformly remarked that the Soviets fought far better than any Western army (215).

Civilian morale was generally high in June 1941, even in Soviet-occupied Eastern Poland. The Polish fascist state had been racist towards Jews and Ukrainians in Eastern Poland, and therefore many of the Ukrainian population were supportive when the Soviets marched in, especially since the Soviets mainly repressed the enemies of the workers and peasants — landowners, Polish officers, and police — and did not collectivize the peasantry. But Ukrainian nationalists in Poland had already basically turned towards the Nazis, so many "Western" Ukrainians welcomed the Nazi invasion. German officers recognized that the Ukrainians in Soviet territory were very different, much more loyal to the USSR and often very hostile to the pro-Nazi West Ukrainians, as Thurston shows.

Shortcomings

The research reported in this book because it will help to combat anti-communism and lies against Stalin and the USSR generally during his time. However, Thurston's work also suffers from serious shortcomings. First, while he combats many anti-Communist lies with good evidence, Thurston also makes many statements critical of the Bolsheviks without any evidence. There are many instances of this.

Even more serious are Thurston's historiographical shortcomings. Not a Marxist of any kind, Thurston frames his analysis entirely in bourgeois historical terms. Therefore, Thurston's book is valuable when, and only when, he bases his conclusions on primary source evidence. Even when he does, this evidence must be put into an historical materialist, scientific framework in order for important lessons to emerge clearly.

Like all the other works of the anti-Cold War researchers — called "revisionists" or "Young Turks" — who have helped to refute anti-Stalin and anti-Communist lies, this is a work of bourgeois history. These works of research take capitalism for granted, and so have a capitalist bias from the outset. Though they come up with important evidence, and often use it well, they do so from an academic perspective. They may refute egregious Cold-War lies, but they never reject anti-communism, the fundamental premise of capitalist scholarship.

Most important for our purposes, the "revisionists" do not ask the questions which Marxists, and all those convinced that capitalism must be overthrown, need answers to: namely, What can we learn, positively and negatively, from the history of the USSR? What were the Bolsheviks' successes? Why did these dedicated communists fail?

Although it can't provide answers to the questions revolutionaries need to ask, Thurston's work, like those of other more objective, though bourgeois, researchers, can help us if we use them according to historical materialism, the scientific method of Marxism or communism.

After all, to learn the correct lessons, both positive and negative, from the Bolsheviks' experience, the history of the dictatorship of the proletariat in the Soviet Union and why it eventually turned into its opposite, we need something in addition to the Marxist method of understanding history, or dialectical and historical materialism. We also need an accurate account of what, in fact, happened, not a farrago of anti-Communist lies and horror stories.

It is here, in refuting anti-Communist lies, as well as in discovering what did happen in reality, that Thurston's work, and that of other honest bourgeois historians, can be very helpful. Let me give two brief examples.

1. Capitalist Relations and Class Antagonisms within the USSR:

Thurston shows time and again that those most likely to have been arrested and executed during the panic of 1937-38 were officials, leaders, managers, officers, and "higher-ups" in general. This fact shows that there was a considerable divorce between "leaders" and ordinary workers and other citizens. How could this be?

Marx recognized that "all history is the history of class struggle". The Bolsheviks believed that everything must be subordinated to the fight for industrialization and production. After the early '30s they used "material incentives" to reward workers and managers, developing large wage differentials and, therefore, differences in living standards among workers and between workers and managers, Party leaders and rank-and-file members, and in every other aspect of society. Believing too that productive technique was "class-neutral", they kept capitalist production relationships in the factories and capitalist relationships of hierarchy and inequality generally in society. Women still did all the housework as well as their jobs, putting real limits on the extent — real, also — to which sexism could be fought.

In short, social relationships in the USSR were "reformed" capitalist relationships more than they were truly communist egalitarian relationships. This had to give rise to new class antagonisms and create resistance to the disappearance of old ones.

Thurston's research can help us see that the mass arrests and executions of 1937-38, which were "concentrated among the country's elite" (232), reflected these class antagonisms at the same time Stalin and the Soviet leadership believed they had abolished class struggle. Without these capitalist relations the "panic" of the late '30s and, in fact, the future evolution of the Soviet Union towards, first, state capitalism and, as now, "free-market" capitalism, would not have been possible.

2. Elitist Relations within the Party:

In 1938 and thereafter specific cases of police corruption, neglect of evidence, frame-ups, and other negligence were publicized and those guilty punished. Many cases of rehabilitation, both of the living and of those unjustly executed, took place. Nevertheless the Bolshevik leadership under Stalin never really underwent a thorough, public self-critical review of how any injustice could have happened, in order to get to the bottom of it.

There is also the question of why people like Zinoviev, Bukharin and others were in important positions of power to begin with. They had demonstrated rotten politics for years. Zinoviev had quit the party in fear rather than take part in the October Revolution. Bukharin had lied many times — Thurston documents this — and had even plotted with the Socialist Revolutionaries against Lenin during the Civil War. (The S-R's then plotted to overthrow Lenin, and very likely tried to kill him.) They had been expelled from the Party.

What was the point of handing them major leadership posts? The Bolsheviks should have trained other members to do their jobs and not relied on these particular intellectuals. Perhaps the concept of a party of "professional revolutionaries", a "cadre" party — Zinoviev, Kamenev, Bukharin and others had worked for the Party all their lives — had not yet been entirely abandoned for the better concept of a mass party of the working class.

Conclusion: Fight Capitalist Lies

Thurston's work is useful in debunking anti-Communist lies. And his work is only one of a growing body of what has been called "revisionist" research on the history of the USSR. These works use the same kind of bourgeois historical methodology, rules of evidence, logic, and documentation, commonly used in less contentious fields of history, but hardly ever in the study of the communist movement.

For the first time, an outline of the major events in the USSR during the Stalin years is beginning to emerge, although the anti-Communist "Cold Warriors" — often joined by enthusiasts for Leon Trotsky — are still actively spreading their lies and contesting every bit of research which contradicts their preconceived ideas, what is virtually a "Cold-War Party Line". This is exciting, and heady, material!

But it is for revolutionaries and workers of today to use research like Thurston's towards this end. Neither this work nor any others like it can provide the historical materialist framework without which human history will not reveal its truths.

Revisionists' Research on Soviet History: A Brief Bibliographical Note

(Note: It is a daunting task to keep abreast of the exciting research into the history of the Soviet Union during Stalin's leadership. The "revisionists", of which Thurston is a leading representative, have split the field of bourgeois Soviet history, and there is much animosity on both sides. In addition, it's very helpful to be able to read Russian, both in order to look at original sources, and to follow the research now being published in Russia that Getty is publishing there, for example. What follows is only a brief introduction.)

There are a number of strands in the "new" history of the Soviet Union during the Stalin years. The work of the late E. H. Carr, and of his successors at the University of Birmingham's Centre for Russian and East European Studies, led by R. W. Davies, and represented heavily in the journal Soviet Studies (since volume 45, 1993 retitled Europe-Asia Studies); the research of Jerry Hough, Sheila Fitzpatrick, and Roberta Manning, the inspiration and, in some cases, the teachers of the younger "revisionists"; and the younger cohort themselves. I will concentrate on this third group.

The book under review is an excellent place to begin. But, to my mind, the first and groundbreaking work of this school is John Arch Getty, Origins of the Great Purges: The Soviet Communist Party Reconsidered, 1933-1938 (Cambridge University Press, 1985). A much revised version of his Ph.D. dissertation at Boston College, 1979, under Roberta Manning, this work is fundamental. One has to read it to get a feel for how completely the "accepted" version (Conquest-Solzhenitsyn, et al. — what Thurston calls the "standard version" or "orthodox view") of this period must be rejected, how completely dishonest their "scholarship", how poor their use of evidence. After Thurston, begin with Getty, and a careful reading of his footnotes.

The year after Getty's book was published, the revisionists achieved recognition as a distinct school within Soviet history with Sheila Fitzpatrick's article "New Perspectives on Stalinism", The Russian Review 45, 4 (October 1986), 357-373, which the editors published together with four criticisms by established Cold-War historians, and a reply by Fitzpatrick, "Afterword: Revisionism Revisited". A year later the same journal published eleven responses to Fitzpatrick's article, including five by the leading younger scholars (William Chase, J. Arch Getty, Hiroaki Kuromiya, Gábor Rittersporn, and Lynne Viola), two supportive articles (by Jerry Hough and Roberta Manning), and an explicit attack by Conquest.

Robert Conquest's voluminous work is the target, acknowledged or not, of much of the research on this period of Soviet history. Getty leads off his book with a brief exposé of Conquest's irresponsible methods (Origins, p. 5 and note 12, p.222). The work of Steven G. Wheatcroft on the size of Soviet forced labor camps and number of deaths has developed as a refutation of Conquest and those whose research resembles his, like Steven Rosefielde. This debate continues today, and was launched by Wheatcroft's article "On Assessing the Size of Forced Concentration Camp Labour in the Soviet Union, 1929-1956", Soviet Studies 33 (April, 1981), 265-95. Conquest's typically weak reply, with argument "from authority", is in Soviet Studies 34 (July 1982), 434-39.

Wheatcroft and Conquest continue to criticize each other's studies vigorously. For Wheatcroft's research, begin with what appears in Europe-Asia Studies. For example, in "The Scale and Nature of German and Soviet Repression and Mass Killings, 1930-1945", EAS 48 (December 1996), 1319-1353, Wheatcroft attacks the facile, anti-Communist comparison of Stalin with Hitler. The abstract reads:

Repression and mass killings carried out by German and Soviet leaderships during the period 1930-45 differed in several respects. It appears that the German leader Adolf Hitler put to death at least five million innocent people mainly because of his antipathy towards Jews and communists. In contrast, Soviet leader Josef Stalin ordered the murder of some one million people because he apparently believed them to be guilty of crimes against the state. He was careful about documenting these executions whereas Hitler did not bother about making any pretence at legality.

A few other works which base themselves on recently-published Soviet archival documents and give the lie to Conquest-type horror-stories include: Nicolas Werth, "Goulag: Les Vrais Chiffres," L'Histoire no. 169 (Septembre, 1993), 38-51; J. Arch Getty, Gábor T. Rittersporn, and Viktor N. Zemskov, "Victims of the Soviet Penal System in the Pre-war Years: A First Approach on the Basis of Archival Evidence", American Historical Review 98 (December, 1993), 1017-49; R.W. Davies, "Forced Labour Under Stalin: The Archive Revelations", New Left Review, 214 (November-December 1995), 62-80.

Other works explicitly critical of Conquest include: Jeff Coplon, "In Search of a Soviet Holocaust: A 55-Year-Old Famine Feeds the Right", Village Voice, Jan. 12, 1988 (on the web at <https://msuweb.montclair.edu/~furg/vv.html>). Coplon interviewed many of the foremost historians of the USSR, including many "Cold Warriors" as well as some "revisionists"; all rejected Conquest's phony research on the Ukrainian famine, Harvest of Sorrow (Oxford, 1986), incidentally showing how Conquest was paid by Ukrainian nationalist groups which had collaborated with the Nazis.

Thurston was, I think, the first and (to date) the only historian of the Soviet Union to dare to attack Conquest in an academic journal: see Thurston, "On Desk-Bound Parochialism, Commonsense Perspectives, and Lousy Evidence: A Reply to Robert Conquest", Slavic Review 45 (Summer 1986), 238-244.

A six-part series exposing the Nazi origins of the Ukrainian famine myth while remaining critical of Soviet actions from a communist viewpoint, can be found at the Progressive Labor Party website at http://www.plp.org/cd_sup/ukfam1.html ; read its notes for scholarly references to that time. Another PLP series, this time in four parts, of Stalin, the PBS television series, and the accompanying book Stalin: A Time for Judgment, by Jonathan Lewis and Phillip Whitehead (New York: Pantheon, 1990), begins at http://www.plp.org/cd_sup/pbsstal1.html. These articles contain yet more references to "revisionist" scholarship, and end with a brief bibliography of suggested further readings, at <http://www.plp.org/books/biblio.html>. An appreciative but critical review of Getty's Ph.D. dissertation, the basis of his 1985 book, is at http://www.plp.org/pl_magazine/purges.html.

This should be enough for anyone interested in studying the latest critiques of the Cold-War lies about Stalin and Bolshevik history, the wars within the field of Soviet history, and the best results of bourgeois historiography, to sink their teeth into.

Finally: there is an important theoretical issue which I deal with briefly towards the end of my review, and which is not apparent in any of the social-historical and empirical research of the past twenty years or so. That question is: How can the method of dialectical and historical materialism be brought to bear on the "facts" as we are coming to know them, in order to draw valid conclusions from the Bolsheviks' successes and errors, so that future communists may build upon the past without repeating its mistakes?

These works can help us learn something about what did happen, and help us refute anti-Communist lies. But the task of learning from the past to build towards a communist future is up to us.

2003: Anatomy of a Fraudulent Scholarly Work:
Ronald Radosh's *Spain Betrayed

2003: Review of Spain Betrayed: The Soviet Union in the Spanish Civil War by Ronald Radosh (Editor), Mary Radosh Habeck (Editor), Grigory Sevostianov (Editor). Annals of Communism series. Yale University Press, June 2001.

SPAIN BETRAYED

The Soviet Union in the Spanish Civil War

Long awaited and published to rave reviews — albeit predictably by Cold War conservatives (Arnold Beichman) and anti-communist liberals (Christopher Hitchens) — Radosh's commentary on the 81 documents from the Comintern archives in Moscow concerning its involvement in the Spanish Civil War turns out to be notable for quite another reason: it is an utterly fraudulent work.¹

¹ There is absolutely no question that Radosh is lying in some places — e.g., in Document 62 where, as I discuss in the text, he attributes to Togliatti the views that, in the document itself, which any reader can study a few pages later, Togliatti explicitly criticizes. Radosh does this kind of thing many times.

The book is also an example of incompetence. Radosh simply does a poor job at what a commentator should do: summarizing the documents, isolating the most important aspects of them, putting them into an overall historical context, and so on.

These kinds of faults should have been red flags to any editor. But there is a long history of anti-communist works getting published even though filled with errors that would doom any other kind of research. The uncritical praise of so many reviewers suggests that one purpose of Radosh's book is to influence those who will not read it carefully. Perhaps someone made the estimation that few people will read such a book anyway, and most of those who do will probably rely on the commentary, rather than study the documents themselves. Again, this is no excuse for the kind of mendacity displayed in Spain Betrayed, but rather a grasping after some kind of explanation for so poor a work.

Finally, the book is a failure. Radosh had boasted for years — in some ways, since the '80s, when he began publishing stuff about the Spanish Civil War, but explicitly since he began working on this book — that it would "prove" the USSR ("Stalin") betrayed Spain. In the event it not only fails to "prove" any betrayal; it fails to come up with a single example of anything devious, dishonest, anything at all to make the communist side or the USSR specifically look bad.

In the course of this review-essay I'll present a lot of evidence to substantiate this serious charge. I'll also discuss, though briefly, the major positive reviews of the book. They are full of the same stuff. In several instances, an innocent reader might think that the reviewers had not actually read the documents themselves, but only Radosh's commentary. For how could anyone compare what the Comintern documents state with what Radosh says about them, without noticing the enormous discrepancies between the two?

I won't say much in this report about the documents themselves. Many of them are fascinating and valuable, though Radosh, in his zeal to arraign the communists, basically neglects them.

But one conclusion is so striking that it cannot be left unstated. Far from showing Soviet "betrayal," these 81 documents make the Comintern, the International Brigades, and the massive Soviet aid to Spain appear in an extremely positive light. Reading the documents alone, and ignoring Radosh's "commentary," any objective person will come away with tremendous respect for the communist effort in the Spanish Civil War, not only by the Comintern and the justly famed International Brigades, but of the Soviet Union — or, as Radosh says it, in his crude demonizing synecdoche, of "Moscow" and "Stalin."

Despite itself, Radosh's book represents something valuable: an object lesson in the rhetorical strategies of anti-communism. Perhaps the biggest question of all — "Why lie, if the truth is on your side?" — will require a few remarks about the uses of anti-Stalinism in foreclosing any objective understanding of the successes and failures of the communist movement.

Radosh's book contains so many errors and distortions that even a much longer review could not discuss them all. Therefore, I examine the documents in which the major "revelations" are supposedly to be found. To identify those, I've used (a) the four-page publicity handout from Yale University Press that accompanies the book, and (b) a number of the major reviews favorable to this volume, from leading publications (all are listed at the end). A few other documents were chosen because they seem to me particularly interesting. This close examination constitutes the bulk of the review.

I'll also point out some examples of simple editorial incompetence. Radosh could have provided useful summaries of long and significant documents, or helpful and specific references to other scholarly work — surely the duty of a competent commentator — but scarcely ever does.

At the end of the review I've included some remarks of a more general nature about the issues raised both by these documents themselves and by Radosh's commentary. There's a good deal that can be said by Marxists in criticism of the Bolsheviks and the Comintern during the Stalin period — or of any political group, communist or not, at any period — and in conclusion I'll allude to one or two things with special reference to Spain. But any and all criticism should be based on what actually happened as that can be deduced from the best evidence available, rather than on fabrications or demonization, as with Radosh and many other Cold-War writers, either from the Right or, not infrequently, the so-called Left.

What follows is a short outline of the main ideological frameworks for interpreting the Spanish Civil War. Some knowledge of them is essential to an appreciation of Radosh's interpretation, the documents themselves, and the present review. Considerations of space preclude any more detailed discussion of the foundational texts of these frameworks. (I am planning a critique of Orwell's influential book at a future time.)

The Spanish Civil War has always posed a special problem for the kind of anti-communist who is determined to argue that the leadership of the international Communist movement never acted out of any idealistic motives. Such people are convinced — at any rate, they are determined to convince others — that all communist struggles, no matter how noble in appearance, were in reality aimed at manipulative, cynical, authoritarian goals, ultimately far worse than those of the capitalist exploiters they professed to oppose. Khrushchev's portrayal of a malevolent, virtually demonic Stalin after 1956, while it differed little from Trotsky's, was far more influential, and except in China and Albania quickly became widely accepted within the Communist movement itself. It was essential in smoothing the path for Trotskyist and, in terms of Spain, Anarchist narratives, hitherto current only among tiny, marginalized groups.

George Orwell's Homage to Catalonia is basically such an account, though Orwell's superior literary ability, British patriotism during World War II, and subsequent endorsement of mainstream Cold War ideology, gave his work the status of a somewhat independent authority. Orwell's book remains the main representative of these anti-communist paradigms, the only book about the Spanish Civil War that most people ever encounter.

According to this interpretation, further popularized in British director Ken Loach's film Land and Freedom (1995), Trotskyists and, especially, Anarchists are the true revolutionaries, collectivizing the land, ceding control of factories to the workers, and promoting egalitarian relations generally. The Communists are portrayed as counter-revolutionaries, whose rank-and-file think they are fighting to defeat the fascists in order that, in the victorious bourgeois-democratic Spanish Republic, they can then initiate a struggle for working-class revolution, but whose leadership — Stalin — aims in reality at a bleak authoritarian dictatorship of the kind Trotskyists, Anarchists, conventional capitalist anti-communists and even fascists, claimed was the state of affairs in the USSR itself. This creates a certain tension within the otherwise "united front" of anti-communist versions of the Spanish Civil War, since capitalist anti-communism is normally aimed at the radical, not the putatively conservative, nature of the communist movement.

The Communist version, on the other hand — the version by far the best supported by the evidence — is that the "United Front Against Fascism" and for a liberal, bourgeois-democratic (and therefore capitalist) society was the only way to unite as many social forces as possible, including nationalists, urban capitalists, and wealthier peasants, to defeat the fascists. According to this view, upon victory a Spanish Republic would have a strong, organized working class which would continue the fight for progressive social reforms and, ultimately, socialist revolution. The Communists held that to begin a revolutionary struggle in the midst of the war against the fascist armies would guarantee the defeat of the Republic — a defeat which, in fact, happened.

A critique of the Communist view from the Left is certainly warranted — indeed, essential. But what passes for a "left" critique, the Anarchist-Trotskyist version outlined above, accepts the basic premises of the reactionary Cold War critique, to the point that it can be cited in service to the latter, as Radosh does here. To clear the ground for a real Left critique, it is first necessary to recover the historical truth of what did, in fact, happen, both in the Spanish Civil War and in the Soviet Union itself. A real Left critique of the Comintern's politics which both fully and correctly appreciates its successes and goes beyond it to identify the main roots of its failures, is yet to be made, despite a few promising starts which have long been available, albeit little known (see below, and note 6).

Radosh's own view, as represented in his commentary in Spain Betrayed, is contradictory. In places Radosh argues, according to the fashion of conservative capitalist anti-communists, that the Comintern was hiding its truly revolutionary intentions. In other passages, however, he endorses the Orwell-Trotskyist-Anarchist view that the Communists were a conservative force that "betrayed" the revolutionary potential in Spain. Radosh seems untroubled by, indeed unaware of, this basic contradiction, as in the case of the many passages in which he — in the most generous description of his practice — makes flagrant and egregious errors in reading the very texts upon which he is "commenting."

Document 5

Document 5, a report by Georgi Dimitrov, head of the Comintern, to the Secretariat of the ECCI (Executive Committee, Communist International) of July 23, 1936, contains the following lines:

We should not, at the present stage, assign the task of creating soviets and try to establish a dictatorship of the proletariat in Spain. That would be a fatal mistake.

Radosh claims that this statement (a statement repeated in the press release)

. . . supports the contention of some scholars that the Communists purposely disguised their true objective, social revolution. (5-6)

But it does not. It clearly states that there are "stages," the present one being the stage of "maintaining unity with the petty bourgeoisie and the peasants and the radical intelligentsia . . ." (11). Radosh's claim could only be true if he gave evidence that the Communists were denying what everyone would have expected of them — to wish to move to another "stage," once the fascists were defeated. Radosh gives no evidence that the Communists were making any such claims to have abandoned the ultimate goal of a Soviet-style revolution in Spain. So there can be no question of "disguising their true objective."

It ought also to be noted that Radosh also wants it "both ways." Sometimes he criticizes the Communists for opposing social revolution, which the Anarchists supposedly stood for. This is Ken Loach's main contention in Land and Freedom. But other times, as here, Radosh criticizes the Communists for wanting social revolution but supposedly "disguising" their intentions.

Document 5 also offers an obvious mistranslation from the Russian. Immediately after the lines quoted above, Radosh et al. allege that Dimitrov wrote the following:

Therefore we must say: act in the guise of defending the Republic. . . .
(p. 11; emphasis added)

In his commentary Radosh states:

The very careful use of these terms, as well as the injunction to "act under the semblance of defending the republic," supports the contention of some scholars that the Communists purposely disguised their true objective, social revolution. (pp. 5-6; emphasis added)

Evidently Radosh is referring to a different translation of the document than that which finally ended up in the volume, although arguably "in the guise of" and "under the semblance of" convey much the same thing: duplicity, dishonesty. However, there is an interesting footnote in the text of Document 5 attached to the phrase "in the guise." That note, number 11 on page 515, reads thus: "Literally, 'under the banner.'" In other words, what Dimitrov actually said is this:

Therefore we must say: act under the banner of defense of the Republic. . . .

The question is: What does "under the banner" — in Russian, "pod znamenem" — mean in Russian? The answer is: it means the opposite of what Radosh says it means. Rather than "under the semblance" or "in the guise," it means "in service to" or "in defense of." At exactly this time, one of the foremost Soviet philosophical journals was titled "Pod Znamenem Marksisma": literally, "Under the Banner of Marxism," often translated as "In Defense of Marxism." No one would even think of translating that title as "In the Guise of," or "Under the Semblance of," Marxism! "Under the banner of" is a military metaphor, meaning "In the ranks of."

In other words, what Dimitrov actually said was:

. . . act in defense of the Republic. . . .

There must be an interesting story behind that footnote. Whoever translated Document 5 — Radosh tells us (p. xxxi) that there were two translators for the Russian documents — that person evidently knew that "in the guise" was not the correct translation, and wanted to tell the world, even if by a footnote, that he or she was not responsible for this particular mistranslation.

This is the only mistranslation from the Russian that can be discerned in this collection, because Radosh et al. don't give us the documents in the original languages (mostly Russian, but a few in Spanish, German and French). This would have been easy to do — on a book-related web page, for example. But the way this mistranslation is treated makes one wonder whether there may be more.

Document 42

Radosh spends a lot of words on Documents 42 through 44 because one of the central points of his book is that in these documents, especially Document 42, is to be found the proof that the Communists instigated the Barcelona uprising of May, 1937 as a pretext for violently suppressing their Anarchist opposition.

Briefly, the context for Radosh's comments is as follows, in the words of Helen Graham, who has written authoritatively and most recently on this event (Graham 1999, p. 485):

On the afternoon of Monday 3 May 1937 a detachment of police attempted to seize control of Barcelona's central telephone exchange (Telefónica) in order to remove the anarchist militia forces present therein. . . . Those days of social protest and rebellion have been represented in many accounts, of which the single best known is still George Orwell's contemporary diary account, Homage to Catalonia, recently given cinematic form in Ken Loach's Land and Freedom. It is paradoxical, then, that the May events remain among the least understood in the history of the civil war.

Radosh takes Document 42 to be directly related to this event:

. . . we have the proof that the view held by the Communists' opponents was essentially correct. The Spanish Communist Party, with the support and knowledge of the Comintern and Moscow, had decided to provoke a clash, in the full understanding that the outcome would give them precisely the opportunity they had long been seeking. (174)

Radosh does not bother to tell us what would have been wrong with the communists' seizing the telephone exchange from the anarchists. After all, the government, not one of the various parties, should have been in control of the exchange. And the assault was led by the Police Chief of Barcelona who, though a communist, was also a government official.

The anarchists had clearly been prepared for such an attack for a long time — after all, they had a machine-gun nest in the first floor which prevented the police from seizing the building at once. What justification did the anarchists — not the government, but one of the political parties in Barcelona — have controlling the telephone exchange in the first place?

The words that Radosh takes as "proof" that "the view held by the Communists' opponents was essentially correct" — I emphasize "essentially" because even Radosh feels he has to qualify this statement, evidently realizing he is on weak grounds here — are as follows:

. . . the author of the report noted that the Communists had decided not to wait for a crisis, but to "hasten it and, if necessary, to provoke it" (emphasis added).

But Document 42 says nothing whatsoever about the attack on the telephone exchange, or about any plan for confrontation with the anarchists. The sentence quoted in part by Radosh in his commentary reads this way in full:

In a word, to go decisively and consciously to battle against Caballero and his entire circle, consisting of some leaders of the UGT. This means not to wait passively for a "natural" unleashing of the hidden government crisis, but to hasten it and, if necessary, provoke it, in order to obtain a solution for these problems. . . . The leadership of the party is more and more coming to the conviction that with Caballero and his circle the Republic will be defeated, despite all the conditions guaranteeing victory. (194)

These lines do not refer at all to the attempt by the Communist Chief of Police to take possession for the Republican government of the telephone exchange that had been unlawfully seized and held by the anarchists, the event that precipitated the "May Days" in Barcelona and to which Radosh tries to tie this statement, or to any plan to incite any actions against the anarchists. Instead, the paragraph quoted just above refers to the previous points 8 through 14 of Document 42, in which the unnamed communist author says that the PCE has decided to take action against the Caballero government. There is nothing whatsoever in this document that connects it with the attempt to retake the telephone exchange.

Radosh's allegation — one of the "bombshell" findings Radosh claims to have found — is a lie. This whole "discovery" is a complete swindle on the unsuspecting reader. I stress this point because Radosh's supposed "discovery" here has been so widely touted as one of the major "revelations" of these Soviet documents. For example, the Press Release from Yale University Press that accompanied the books publication lists seven documents and summarizes what Radosh says they contain. The blurb on Document 42 reads:

Barcelona — the civil war within the Civil War. The five-day street battle in Barcelona was portrayed by Orwell in Homage to Catalonia and by Ken Loach in the film Land and Freedom. The historical dispute has always been: Was the anarchist reaction deliberately provoked? Document 42 shows that the view held by the Communists' opponents was essentially correct. The Spanish Communist Party, with the support and knowledge of the Comintern, decided to provoke the clash. (emphasis added)

We should also note, in passing, the esteem in which Loach and Orwell are held by establishment anti-Communist ideologues like Radosh, and the way in which the echo-chamber of the "big lie" functions in the blurb above by pairing these supposed "authorities" with the specious "facts" that Radosh is creating here.

Richard Bernstein, whose very positive review of Radosh's book appeared in the New York Times, tacitly recognizes that Document 42 did not prove what Radosh says it proves:

Two weeks later, the Communists, in the view of this book's editors, did provoke the desired crisis, unleashing the Barcelona street battles that essentially eliminated the anarchist leadership and led to the replacement of Largo Caballero by a more malleable premier.
[emphasis added]

(Bernstein makes it sound like Caballero was the leader of the anarchists; in fact, he was head of the government and a Socialist.)

In the interest of good sense, I would like to make a few additional remarks at this point.

1. The assumption, in Radosh's Commentary and in other anti-communist accounts Radosh quotes, is that, by taking the Telephone exchange

- away from the anarchists and returning it to government control, the Communists were "provoking" the anarchists.
2. The anarchists had no business whatsoever holding the telephone exchange. The Police Chief, besides being a communist, was also a government officer. If removing an armed group of occupiers who have taken control of the telephone exchange is not a legitimate matter for the police, what is?
 3. Imagine if the Communists had occupied the telephone exchange, fortified it with a machine-gun nest, interrupted government phone calls whenever they wanted to, and then a non-Communist police chief had tried to oust them? Would Radosh not take that as evidence that the Communists wanted to take over?

Document 43

One of Radosh's statements about Document 43 has been cited in several favorable reviews of his book:

As the Comintern document cited earlier revealed, Stalin had in mind a Spanish version of the Moscow purge trials most likely to be held in Barcelona. (209)²

² Radosh betrays his ignorance of Soviet history. "Purge trials" is a term no longer used even by anti-communist Sovietologists. The chistki, or "purges," were expulsion of Communist Party members for many reasons, most commonly drunkenness, neglect of duty, etc., though sometimes for political deviations. They were completely separate from the three famous Moscow Trials of 1936-8, of persons who confessed to plotting to overthrow the Soviet government. The best, and classic discussion of this is J. Arch Getty, Origins of the great purges: the Soviet Communist Party reconsidered, 1933-1938. Cambridge [Cambridgeshire]; New York: Cambridge University Press, 1985.

The document in question, No. 43, is a report from an anonymous source, presumably to the Comintern. In it the informant states:

The immediate political consequences of the putsch [the anarchist attempt to seize power — this is the way this writer interprets the "May Days" in Barcelona] are very great. Above all, the following one: the Trotskyist-POUMists revealed themselves to the nation as people who belong totally to Franco's fifth column. The people are nourishing unbelievable animosity toward the Trotskyists. The masses are demanding energetic and merciless repression. This is what is demanded by the masses of people of all of Spain, Catalonia, and Barcelona. They demand complete disarmament, arrest of the leaders, the creation of a special military tribunal for the Trotskyists! This is what the masses demand. (196-197)

In his discussion of this document on p. 176, Radosh wrote:

In other words, the call was out for the creation in Spain of the equivalent of the Moscow purge trials. . . .

"In other words" (why not use the same words?) "the call was out for" can only mean one thing: Radosh assumes that our unnamed informant, writing to the Comintern in Moscow, is speaking for someone other than himself. But this assumption is invalid. This document does not mean that any "call is out." So far as we know, it's the opinion of the writer alone. After all, he's reporting to the Comintern. If the PCE, or Soviet advisers, had "put out the call" for a Moscow-style purge trial, he would have said so, for why hide it to the Comintern? And if Stalin had expressed interest in a Spanish "purge trial," surely this writer would have said so as well.

Document 44

Document 44 is a report to the Comintern sent to Marshal Voroshilov, Commissar (Minister) of Defense of the USSR and the man whose office oversaw military equipment and material aid for the Spanish Republic, by a certain "Goratsy," whom Radosh, in another failure of his editorial responsibility, does not further identify. Radosh accuses the Comintern of lying to itself, in that it states the communist belief that the "uprising" carried out by "the extremist wing [of the anarchists] in the block with the POUM" was prepared in advance over a "long period of time." (177) [This refers to the "May Days" in Barcelona — GF].

A few considerations are in order:

1. How does Radosh know that this is false? He has not proven it.
2. Furthermore, Radosh has already claimed that, in Document 42, he has evidence that the Comintern itself planned the Barcelona uprising, whereas here the Comintern reporter blames the uprising on the Anarchists. Why would the Comintern lie to itself? If the Comintern had successfully provoked this confrontation, as Radosh claims, why wouldn't they be gloating over their success? Instead, they blame it on the anarchists, even in private communications within the Comintern. (206)
3. The document itself claims that the uprising was unexpected by the Communists. Once again: if it had been not only expected, but in fact "provoked," as Radosh would have it, why would this not be noted, with pride, as a successful operation?

Document 1

Here a Spanish Communist in Moscow is writing to the Communist Party in Spain.

Radosh: ". . . the imperative tone taken by Moscow made it clear that there was little room for argument or maneuver by the small and relatively powerless PCE . . . (1-2).

Doc. 1: "After considering the alarming situation in connection with the Fascist conspiracy in SPAIN, we advise you: — . . . Please let us know your opinions on our proposals." (7, 9; emphasis added)

Conclusion: This document is not "imperative" in tone. Radosh is simply trying to make "Moscow" appear dictatorial and high-handed. The text will not support that interpretation, so he simply puts it into his commentary.

I put "Moscow" in quotation marks because this message, while certainly sent from the city of Moscow, was sent by a Spanish Communist, "Dios Major," who signed the document. Why doesn't Radosh mention this, saying only that "Moscow" sent it? Perhaps because to say that one Spanish Communist is "advising" other Spanish Communists does not support the impression — which Radosh evidently wants to give — that the Bolsheviks, Stalin, the Politburo, or whatever "Moscow" usually conveys, was trying to say anything to anybody. It appears that through metonymy, a linguistic trope in which "Moscow" represents any Communist leader, anywhere, allows Radosh to reduce all Communist leaders to "Moscow," and "Moscow" to "Stalin." Demonize Stalin, then, and all Communist leadership is automatically demonized as well.

Radosh gives other invidious readings of Document 1, but is rather vague about it. I'll mention only one more example.

Document 1 reads, in part:

It is necessary to take preventative measures with the greatest urgency against the putchist attempts of the anarchists, behind which the hand of the Fascists is hidden.

The worst one could say about this piece of analysis — given, we recall, by one Spanish Communist to others, all of whom had extensive experience with the Spanish anarchists and hated them just as the anarchists, in turn, hated the communists — is that it was rhetorical over-statement to say that "the hand of the Fascists is hidden behind" the anarchists' attempts at seizing power.

But here is what Radosh himself says about the anarchists:

Throughout the conflict, Soviet and Comintern advisers would decry the 'subversive' activities of the anarchists, and particularly their refusal to curtail revolutionary activities or to allow the formation of a regular, disciplined army. (3, emphasis added)

Radosh admits that the anarchists took this attitude towards the army. Yet how could the Fascists — who certainly had "a regular, disciplined army"

— ever be defeated unless the Republic had one too? Guerrilla warfare — what Mao Tse-tung and Vo Nguyen Giap later refined into the doctrine of "People's War" — is very important. But no theoretician of guerrilla or people's war ever suggested that a war could be won without "a regular, disciplined army."

In refusing to form such an army the anarchists played directly into the hands of the Fascists. Yet even while admitting this, Radosh attacks the Communists for stating the obvious: that this played into the Fascists' hands. Elsewhere, in passages Radosh does not comment on, the Communists expressed the view that Fascist agents chose to infiltrate the Anarchists precisely for this reason.

Radosh's Commentary continues:

The demand to establish a single union also stemmed from a new understanding of how to construct a socialist state: not through open revolution, but through the absorption of independent unions or parties into a single entity controlled by the Communists.

Radosh gives no evidence to support this statement at all. He certainly can't cite Document 1, the document he is supposedly elucidating, because in it Dios Mayor proposes that the C.G.T. (U.) [the Communist-led union movement] ought to propose to C.N.T. [the Socialist-led union movement] the immediately construction in the center and locally of joint committees to fight against the Fascist insurgents and to prepare the unification of the syndicates.

. . . At the same time you must establish broad social legislation, with extensive rights reserved in the unified C.G.T. . . .

Dios Mayor is proposing that the Communists call for unified action and a unified trade union organization. Radosh suggests that there is something underhanded about calling for unification: the Communists want to "absorb independent unions into a single entity controlled by the Communists." But there is no suggestion of this in the document itself. I would note also Radosh's concept of "absorption" here is standard anticommunist rhetoric. Other parties might "win a political struggle" for leadership of an organization, but communists only "control" — never "lead" — and "absorb," with connotations of "suffocation," "snuffing out independence."³

³ See the excellent typology of anti-communist rhetoric in James R. Prickett, "Anti-Communism and Labor History," Industrial Relations 13 (October, 1974), 219-227."

One might say, "Well, Radosh hates Communism, so for Radosh the communists can never do anything right." But it's more than that. For Radosh, if a non-communist makes a good proposal — say, trade union unity — that is good; whereas when Communists do the same thing, it's bad. That's because, for Radosh, communists never do anything honestly; their "dishonesty" is a given.

The interesting thing is that Radosh, using the documents his collaborators have selected, cannot demonstrate "dishonesty" on the part of the communists. An honest researcher would consider the possibility that, if the evidence at hand did not suggest the communists were "dishonest," it just may possibly be because the communists were not dishonest.

Document 79

Radosh confesses that the previous document, no. 78, "suggests that he [Negrín] enjoyed a degree of autonomy from Communist control" (497). Radosh further acknowledges that even some anti-communist scholars of the SCW believe Negrín was "a more independent figure." Radosh stresses that Document 79, a report by Marchenko, a Soviet and a Comintern representative, to Litvinov (Soviet Foreign Minister) and Voroshilov,

. . . makes it clear that the Spaniard's views of politics closely coincided with the Soviets', while the similarities between his vision for postwar Spain and that of the Soviet Union are striking. This document suggests that if the Republicans had won the Civil War, Spain would have been very different from the nation that existed before 18 July 1936 and very close to the post-World War II "people's democracies" of Europe.

This is false. Document 79 itself reveals that Marchenko was not supportive at all of Negrín's outline of what a post-war Spanish Republic might look like:

I reacted in a very reserved way to Negrín's idea and drew his attention to the difficulties and complications that the organization of a new party would cause. . . . If there are military successes, he can begin the formation of "his" united-Spanish political party, with the participation of the Communists if they will allow it, and without the Communists (and that means against them) if they refuse. (499; emphasis added).

The post-WWII "people's democracies" of Eastern Europe were (a) propped up by the presence of the Red Army; (b) directly on the borders of the USSR; and (c) governed by Communist Parties (or communist-socialist united parties) run frankly by pro-Soviet communists. Negrín's conception of a post-war Spanish Republic is very different from the post-war pro-Soviet regimes of Eastern Europe, sharing no essential similarity with them at all. Yet the allegation that a post-war Republic would have been forced into the mould of the post-WWII Eastern European regimes is, supposedly, one of the major "discoveries" of this collection of documents. This document alone shows that this claim of Radosh's is without foundation.

Document 62

This is an important report by Palmiro Togliatti, head Comintern representative in Spain, to Dimitrov in Moscow. It is of great interest, and Radosh can find nothing to say about it that is at all negative. He makes false statements about its contents, however.

For example, Radosh writes:

Togliatti's reports of are special importance. It is clear that, unlike other apparatchiks, Togliatti was extremely candid and forthright in his observations. (370, emphasis added)

But Radosh gives not a single example of these "other apparatchiks," supposedly not-candid and not-forthright. Since Togliatti was later the head of the Italian Communist Party and a major leader of the Comintern, it does not seem to have hurt his reputation to have been "extremely candid and forthright."

Note, too, Radosh's use of a Russian term for an official of the Italian Communist Party. Radosh would never refer to an official of the Spanish Socialist party as an "apparatchik." The point here is to give the impression, by whatever means possible, that "Moscow" controls everything.

Radosh's discussion of this report contains several outright lies, including one that is very blatant — always provided that one actually reads the document itself. Radosh states:

At the same time, in Catalonia, Togliatti called for a policy of reinforcing the moderation of the Popular Front, rather than demagogic appeals to a revolution-minded populace. If the anarchists tried to move toward open revolt and stage a coup, he advised one solution only: "We will finally do away with them." (emphasis added)

Here is the passage (390):

As for the anarchists, on this question, in my opinion, we have not merely hesitated, but made absolutely real mistakes in our tactics [Togliatti is referring to methods of political struggle — GF.] On the role from Barcelona to Valencia, I posed the question to the comrades accompanying me. Their opinion was very simple: the anarchists have lost all influence, in Barcelona (!) there is not even one anarchist worker, we are waiting until they organize a second putsch, and we will finally do away with them [emphasis added].

So this attitude is not that of Togliatti, but of some "comrades." Here is what Togliatti wrote about this attitude; this passage begins immediately after that above:

This opinion is very widespread in the party, in particular in Catalonia, and when we stick to such an idea, it is impossible to carry out a policy of rapprochement with the anarchist masses and differentiation of their leaders. (390; emphasis added)

Radosh attributed to Togliatti the very views that Togliatti cites in order to strongly oppose them!

Again, Radosh writes:

While publicly advocating attempts at cooperation with opposition anarchists, Togliatti noted that their leaders were "scum, closely tied to Caballero," and had to be fought via "large-scale action from below." (371)

It is clear from the context of p. 390 — see the emphasis in the quotation above — that the "large-scale action from below" that Togliatti hoped for was action by the "anarchist masses," as he stated in the passage quoted above, which alone can lead to "differentiation of their leaders." In other words, Togliatti proposed relying on a democratic plan — winning over the anarchist masses to replace or repudiate their own leadership. Communist authors show appreciation for the political instincts of the anarchist rank-and-file many times in these documents; it is the anarchist leadership they see as the stumbling blocks to effective unity against Franco.

In addition to Togliatti, another Soviet adviser, Antonov-Ovseenko comes across very well in these documents. Radosh seriously distorts Document 22. Antonov-Ovseenko wrote:

The PSUC repeatedly proposed to the government that weapons at the rear [i.e. in areas not involved in battle] be seized and put at the disposal of the government. (p. 80)

Radosh calls this "Communist attempts to seize all the weapons at the rear (and thus to disarm the anarchists)" (p. 71). In reality, the PSUC (the Unified Socialist Party) — not just the communists, who were only a part of the PSUC — was proposing that armed men should be at the front fighting the war, and that arms were needed at the front, not in the rear. Orwell himself complains time and again about the obsolete, broken, and useless arms available to his own unit at the front, and that even these arms were in short supply. If, as Radosh suggests here, the armed anarchists were all in the rear, what were they doing there? If armed communists had been "all in the rear," would Radosh not think this sinister?

In Document 21 Antonov-Ovseenko quotes an informant, "X," who told him that the anarchists were carrying out mass executions in Catalonia and that they had executed 40 priests.

told me . . . [t]hree days ago, the government seriously clashed with the anarchists: the CNT seized a priest. . . . The priest pointed out another 101 members of his order who had hidden themselves in different places. They [the anarchists] agreed to free all 102 men for three hundred thousand francs. All 102 appeared, but when the money had been handed over, the anarchists shot forty of them. (76-7; emphasis added).

Radosh does not condemn the anarchists at this point for shooting the priests. Nor does he suggest that this charge against the anarchists is false (p. 71). Imagine if the communists had been executing up to 50 people a day, as "X" told Antonov-Ovseenko — would Radosh have let this pass without criticism? Rather, such a document would have been featured as a major find, one of the most important documents in the book. Yet when anarchists are alleged to be committing mass murder, and Communists are opposed to it, Radosh scarcely mentions the matter, and certainly does not praise the Communists for stopping such massacres. This illustrates one of the central weaknesses in Radosh's commentary: he is, in fact, not much interested in these documents except insofar as they can be used to show the communists as "bad."

A strongly positive review of the Radosh book in First Things states baldly: "Although leftist atrocities against the Church, including the execution of thousands of nuns and priests, were widespread, they are nowhere mentioned in these documents." In his rush to provide Radosh with another positive review, this anonymous reviewer in a right-wing, "pro-religion" journal clearly never read even Radosh's own commentary, much less the documents themselves.

Document 46

This is a report by Dimitrov, head of the Comintern, to Marshal Voroshilov. Radosh makes many false statements about the contents of this 14-page report. For example, Radosh states that "the writer [of the report] came to the stunning conclusion that the war and revolution "cannot end successfully if the Communist party does not take power into its own hands." (212). In fact, Dimitrov explicitly refuses to endorse the idea that the only way to victory is if the Communist party takes power.

The influence of the party is growing more and more among the masses, and chiefly among the soldiers; the conviction is growing among them that the war and the popular revolution cannot end successfully if the Communist party does not take power into its own hands. Who knows, that idea may indeed be correct. (232; emphasis added)

Arnold Beichman's review makes the same inaccurate statement: "It is sad to read these Soviet archives and read the words of a Soviet agent to the Comintern's Georgi Dimitrov: 'The war cannot end successfully if the Communist Party does not take power in its own hands.'"

In fact, this is a very interesting statement, especially coming from Dimitrov, famous since the Seventh Comintern Congress in 1935 for championing the concept of the Communist International's abandoning its independent advocacy of socialist revolution in order to make possible "united fronts" with all anti-fascist parties, as in Spain. The Spanish Communists, with the support of the Comintern, were struggling hard to make the United Front in Spain work. Here Dimitrov shows that he himself has doubts about it. The documents published in this volume could indeed provide much evidence for an argument that it was precisely the insistence on a United Front with the Spanish socialists and Anarchists that doomed the Republic. A competent commentary should have discussed this issue.

Document 70

This long report by General Walter (a Polish communist general whose real name was Karol Svershevsky) is of special interest since it includes the longest discussion of the International Brigades among the documents in this volume. These pages give Radosh a chance to slander not only the Soviets, but the members of the International Brigades as well, and he tries his best to do so by ignoring positive statements made about the Brigadistas in the documents at hand, while emphasizing the criticisms made about some of them.

Radosh begins with the following statement:

By early 1938, the international units were important to the Soviets and the Comintern only as a means of scoring points in the propaganda war and as bargaining chips in negotiations with the other great powers. (431)

Radosh continues immediately with the words, "Nowhere is this more clearly shown than in the series of documents that follow." However, nowhere in these documents is the statement above documented in the least.

Walter shows admirable frankness in discussing both strengths and weaknesses within the Brigades. Radosh ignores the strengths and distorts Walter's words about the weaknesses.

For example, Radosh generalizes Walter's criticism of some Brigadistas, that they thought themselves superior to the Spanish, and implies Walter said it was true of all Brigadistas. (431)

In Sverchevsky's words, they [the international soldiers] believed they had come to Spain to save it from the fascists. This viewpoint had led directly to their superior attitude toward the Spanish, whom they treated like second-class citizens. (431)

In reality, Walter's remark is a general one, critical of an ideological attitude to be found in the Brigades (438). The words "second-class citizens" are never used. Rather, Walter's incisive political criticism is directed towards a shallow understanding of internationalism among many Brigadistas, as illustrated in the following passage:

It seems to me that the fundamental reason for, and primary source of, our troubles lies, first and foremost, in a deeply rooted conviction which stubbornly refuses to die that we, the internationalists, are only "helping," that we "save" and "are saving" Spain, which, they say, without us would not have escaped the fate of Abyssinia. This harmful theory prevents the German and Italian comrades from seeing the silhouettes of "Junkers" and "Fiats" in the fascist air force; they forget that here, on Spanish soil, they are fighting with arms in hand, that is, in the most effective and revolutionary way, first and foremost against their own enemy, which has already oppressed their own countries and peoples for many years. French "volunteers" do not always notice the direct connection between Franco, De la Roque, and Doriot; they forget . . . that their vital interests lie in preventing a fascist sentinel from looming on the last border, the Pyrenees. The Poles do not completely comprehend that every one of their victories here is a direct blow against the Pilsudski gang, which has turned their country into a prison for the people. . . . (438)

Walter is unsparingly frank in his criticisms of the shortcomings of the Brigades. His analysis appears to be a model of honest criticism, including much criticism of the performance of communists. But Walter's report also contains the highest praise for the Brigades (for example, see the first three paragraphs, p. 436). Typically, Radosh's commentary is utterly one-sided; he mentions many of Walter's critical comments, but not a single one of the positive ones.

In his extremely positive review, Schwartz is more shameless yet in quoting some of Walter's frank criticisms of the political problems in the Brigades as though they were characteristic. Radosh and Schwartz are of the same kidney; see Radosh's praise of Schwartz on p. xxv.

Schwartz: "Anti-Semitism was a serious problem among these "progressive" fighters."

Document 70: "It is true that even then there were more than enough petty squabbling and strong antagonisms in the international units. The francophobia was most transparently obvious . . . anti-Semitism flourished (and indeed it still has not been completely extinguished). . .

. (448)

Schwartz: "Above all, the International Brigades possessed transport, food, and other supplies far in excess of their Spanish counterparts, with whom they resolutely refused to 'share their wealth.'"

Document 70: "The English and American soldiers not long ago were smoking 'Lucky Strikes,' not paying attention to the Spanish fighters next to them, who had spent days looking for a few shreds of tobacco. The internationalists receive frequent packages from home but are very rarely willing to share them with their Spanish comrades." (453)

Schwartz: "International Brigade officers accounted exactly for the numbers of foreigners killed and wounded in battle, but 'never knew of the casualties of the Spanish personnel.'" [emphasis added]

Document 70: "Richard, the commander of the 11th Brigade, reporting on the casualties suffered by the brigade at Brunete and Saragossa, always gave the exact number of dead and wounded and frequently even the names of the internationalists. But he never knew the casualties of the Spanish personnel." (454)

In this case, Schwartz transformed the behavior of one commander, in one battle — behavior that the Communist general Walter was holding up for criticism — as typical of "International Brigade officers" generally. (Schwartz gives no page numbers, so verifying his dishonest quotations is a tedious job.)

Neither Radosh nor Schwartz put Walter's criticisms of the Brigades into context. But Walter does. In addition to high praise for the International Brigades' heroism and importance in the war (see pp. 436 and 459) Walter explains the difficult problems of overcoming national chauvinism, racism and distrust among nationalities:

The International Brigades and units were created literally within the course of one or two days from those volunteers who were on hand at the time . . . there were subunits that contains dozens of nationalities all of these were people who were absolutely unacquainted, not accustomed to one another, and right off found themselves in a battle. If you add to this the extremely acute shortage of political workers, the lack of qualified military cadres, and a whole number of other needs, then the weaknesses and the solution to this problem (adequate at that time) are not surprising. (448)

Schwartz: "According to Walter, the International Brigades, inspired by slogans of worldwide unity against Fascism, were plagued by a 'petty, disgusting, foul squabble about the superiority of one nationality over another. . . . Everyone was superior to the French, but even they were superior to the Spanish, who were receiving our aid and allowing us to fight against our own national and class enemies on their soil.'"

Immediately preceding the passage quoted by Schwartz (449) occurs the following passage (Document 70):

The great, very exalted, and revolutionary objective, armed struggle with fascism, united everyone, and for its sake Germans, Italians, Poles, Jews, and representatives of the world's numerous nationalities, including blacks, Japanese, and Chinese, had to agree among themselves, found a common language, suffered the same adversities, sacrificed their lives, died heroes, and were filled with the very same hatred for the common enemy.

But at the very same time as the volunteers were unifying, this petty, disgusting, foul squabble about the superiority of one nationality over another was going on. . . ." (448-9)

At a time when every army in the world except communist-led armies were organized along officially racist lines (and some, like the Israeli army, are officially racist even today), this struggle for internationalism inspired millions around the world. Yet the venomous Schwartz sees the racist attitudes among Brigadistas as "the most shocking element of the picture, especially for those who for sixty years have witnessed the Lincoln veterans preening themselves for their antifascist virtue" (emphasis added). The International Brigades set a standard for anti-racism and internationalism that has never been equaled before or since. Schwartz's insult is simply a measure of his contempt for such values.

Conclusion: Why Lie If You Have the Truth On Your Side?

The flagrant inadequacy of Radosh's discussion of these very important and fascinating documents itself would fatally mar any work with scholarly pretensions. But there is a deeper problem with Radosh's work. It is not merely that Radosh fails to comment accurately on the documents he publishes (Habeck did most of the translations; Sevostianov did the archival work in Moscow). More than that: Radosh actually lies, time and again, about the contents of documents which readers can study themselves a few pages after his commentary.

Radosh is one of a small number of former Communist Party members who, once they realized that the Soviet-led world Communist movement no longer championed an egalitarian, non-exploitative world and was not the answer to human liberation, simply decided that the other side must, therefore, have been right all along and became uncritical supporters of American capitalism and imperialism. Anyone familiar with Radosh's history — any reader of his autobiography, Commies and the many reviews of it — might expect to find a lot of anti-communist prejudice — for example, giving a document the most anti-communist possible interpretation whenever there was any ambiguity.

But even a wary reader would also expect at least a couple of real "revelations" of communist deviousness, dishonesty, double-dealing, some kind of "betrayal" — something that would at least partially substantiate the claims of Radosh, and of those who reviewed his book positively. Even the wary reader would be unprepared for the extent of Radosh's dishonesty. Not a single of Radosh's allegations of Comintern or Soviet treachery is born out by the documents he himself publishes and comments on.

Is Radosh deliberately lying about the documents on which he's commenting? Is he hoping that his only readers will be like-mindedly anti-communist drones that will simply take his word at face value? Or that those who notice his mendacity will be ignored or marginalized? Some of the distortions in the commentary are so blatant that one cannot account for them in any other way.

Yet I think that dishonesty and incompetence cannot provide the whole answer. On a deeper level, Radosh's anti-communism, and specifically his allegiance to the demonization of Stalin, seems to produce a kind of tunnel vision that imposes a systematic distortion on everything he sees or reads.

Radosh mentions the name of Stalin dozens of times, although none of his documents were written by Stalin or are under his name, and only a few were sent to him. For Radosh, the word "Stalin" no longer denotes an individual, but is a synecdochal signifier for — depending on the circumstance — the Comintern, the Soviet political leadership, or even any Communist, anywhere. Like a kind of mirror-image of the "cult of personality" that existed from about 1930 until Stalin's death in 1953, Radosh too attributes all the initiative and agency of all communists to Stalin alone. A more radical reductionism can scarcely be imagined, and is all the more noteworthy since Radosh seems entirely oblivious to his own practice here. It never occurs to him to justify it theoretically, historically, or in any way at all.

This ideological distortion is more serious because more pervasive. Many who think of themselves as "liberal" or even "left" share with Radosh a kind of reflexive assumption that, whenever "Stalin" — read, the Comintern — seems to have been acting according to its professed motives of supporting the exploited and oppressed around the world, it must really have been acting out of selfish motives which, if not obvious, are simply cleverly disguised.⁴

⁴ For example, Stalin stated that "The cause of Spain is the cause of all humanity." The USSR sent huge amounts of aid, in materiel and men, to the Republic both itself and through the Comintern, much of which was not, in fact, repaid. Yet Cary Nelson, a staunch supporter of the American veterans of the Spanish Civil War and a prominent left-liberal, still feels compelled to explain Soviet aid in this way: "Stalin's motivations, no doubt, were pragmatic. He probably hoped, for example, to use an alliance to help the Spanish Republic as a way of building a general antifascist alliance with the Western democracies." ("The Spanish Civil War: An Overview," accessed at <<http://www.english.uiuc.edu/maps/scw/overview.htm>> on 20 February 2003). "Pragmatic" in this context explains nothing; the Soviets knew very well that the antifascist alliance they aimed at was jeopardized by their aid to the Republic, but did it anyway. For Nelson, the International Brigade volunteers can, and did, have idealistic motives, but Stalin cannot, even though the whole effort could hardly have taken place without his strong support at every step.

I hope that readers of this review will be inspired to read Radosh's book and see for themselves. In view, however, of the inaccurate and misleading nature of Radosh's commentary there is only one way to read this book:

- First, ignore Radosh's commentary entirely. Read the documents themselves, and only them, very carefully.
- Only after doing that should you read Radosh's commentary. But every time Radosh makes any kind of assertion about any document, go to that document, find the relevant passage, and note what the document really says.

Often this is not easy to do. Radosh does not include page numbers to the passages of the documents when he gives his comments or summaries. Often he will write things like "As we have seen . . ." (p. 502); "Nowhere is this more clearly shown than in the series of documents that follow . . ." (p. 431); "The documentary evidence, as we have shown . . ." (p. 372). Here the job of finding the passage in question can take quite a long time. It's always worth taking the time, though, because what one usually discovers is that that NO previous document has shown anything of the kind.

Radosh reminds us that one of the main stumbling blocks for Marxists is the figure of Stalin. Stalin has been demonized — by Trotsky and those who have relied on Trotsky; by some Soviet émigrés, also imitators of Trotsky, in the main; and by Khrushchev and those who have been accustomed to believe that Khrushchev's so-called "revelations" about Stalin were true. As Robert Thurston has written, the demonized "Stalin" is "a powerful cultural construct in scholarship, film, popular works, etc. The difficulty is to try to get past that construction as best we can." (Thurston, 2000). Radosh has not even tried.

As Roger Pethybridge, a well-known British Sovietologist, commented long ago:

If one considers all the well-known biographies of Stalin, a common feature emerges: the volumes are a quite accurate reflection of biographical method current at the end of the nineteenth and the beginning of the twentieth centuries, when historical biographies dwelt on so-called "good" and "bad" kings. The personality who reigned appeared to dominate not only the political but the social and economic life of his kingdom, so that by a sneeze or a yawn he could magically change the whole socioeconomic pattern of his reign. This method of historical biography has long been discounted in the treatment of authoritarian rule in earlier history. It has also been discarded with regard to the study of Nazi Germany. Unfortunately, it still remains as a specter from the past in the study of Soviet personalities in high politics. (Pethybridge, 1976).

Since the end of the Soviet Union, many formerly secret Comintern and Bolshevik documents have been published, with more coming out all the time. Like the Comintern documents in Radosh's book, most of them contradict the widely-propagated, and widely-believed, horror stories about the history of the Communist movement during the Stalin years.⁵

⁵ For example, the interrogations and confessions by such major figures as NKVD chief Genrikh Yagoda and Marshal Mikhail Tukhachevsky have been published, making it clear that the accusations leveled against them by the Soviet government in the late '30s were substantially accurate. There is also some additional evidence of Leon Trotsky's contacts with oppositionists in the USSR who were plotting the overthrow of the government, as well as the first evidence of Trotsky's contact with the Japanese fascist government, both central claims of the Communist movement in the '30s but both strongly denied by Trotsky's followers.

It's up to us all of us who recognize the desperate need for a truly classless, egalitarian society to learn from the successes and failures of our predecessors, including, especially, the Bolsheviks during the time of Stalin's leadership. But in order to do this, we must first convince ourselves that we do not already know these things.

For example, many of the Comintern documents in this collection support the suggestion made by some on the Left that the United Front Against Fascism was doomed from the outset, even as a tactic in fighting fascism.⁶ For no matter how devotedly the communists supported only bourgeois democratic goals, many capitalist forces refused to co-operate with them, in effect preferring to risk a fascist victory rather than take their chances in a liberal capitalist state with a strongly organized working class and peasantry under communist leadership. The subsequent fate of the communist parties of Western Europe and the USA after World War II, who were viciously attacked by the capitalists despite their adherence to a reform-oriented, non-revolutionary program, further suggests that the united front strategy was wishful thinking.

That is, we have to be ready and willing to question the Cold-War, Trotskyist, and Khrushchevite versions of this history, and "do it all again," so we can actually begin to understand what really happened.⁷

If that's what we're about — and I think we should be — then Radosh's book can help us, by reminding us not to be like him.

⁶ See, for example, "Lessons of People's War in Spain 1936-1939," Progressive Labor, Vol. 9, No. 5 (Oct.-Nov. 1974), 106-116, cited at http://www.plp.org/pl_magazine/pws.html (February 22, 2003). For more on a left critique of the consequences of the Popular Front strategy upon the world communist movement, see "Road to Revolution III: The Continuing Struggle Against Revisionism" (1970), at http://www.plp.org/pl_magazine/rr3.html#RTFToC5.

⁷ J. Arch Getty, the dean of the younger generations of American historians of the USSR, is quoted by the prominent (and very anti-communist) Russian historian Yuri Zhukov as having said Soviet history is poisoned by Cold War "propaganda," and has to be done all over again. See Aleksandr Sabov, "Zhupel Stalina" ("Stalin's Boogeyman"), Komsomolskaya Pravda, Nov. 5, 2001.

Reviews used in this essay

Beichman, Arnold. "Deceit in the Spanish Civil War." The Washington Times, Op-Ed, July 17, 2001, p. A21.

Bernstein, Richard. "Aiding Dictatorship, Not Democracy." The New York Times, July 23, 2001. Cited at <<http://www.nytimes.com/2001/07/23/books/23BERN.html>>.

Review of Spain Betrayed in First Things 116 (October 2001). Cited at <<http://www.firstthings.com/ftissues/ft0110/reviews/briefly.html#spain>>

Hitchens, Christopher. "Who Lost Spain?" Wilson Quarterly, Summer 2001. Cited at <<http://wwics.si.edu/OUTREACH/WQ/WQCURR/WQBKPER/BOOK-1.HTM>>

Hitchens, Christopher. "The Unfolded Lie." Los Angeles Times, July 15, 2001. Cited at <<http://www.calendarlive.com/top/1,1419,L-LATimes-Books-X!ArticleDetail-38407,00.html>>

Schwartz, Steven. "The Red and the Black. The end of the myth of the Spanish Civil War." Weekly Standard, July 16, 2001. Cited at <http://www.weeklystandard.com/magazine/mag_6_41_01/schwartz_bkart_6_41_01.asp>

Other materials

Graham, Helen. "'Against the State': A Genealogy of the Barcelona May Days (1937)." European History Quarterly 29(4), 485-542.

Pethybridge, Roger. 1976. Review of Ronald Hingley, Joseph Stalin: Man and Legend (New York, 1974), in Slavic Review 35 (March 1976): 136.

Thurston, Robert W. Post to H-RUSSIA list, August 24, 2000.

2005: Stalin and the Struggle for Democratic Reform

By Grover Furr

Part One

Introduction

1. This article outlines Joseph Stalin's attempts, from the 1930s until his death, to democratize the government of the Soviet Union.
2. This statement, and the article, will astonish many, and outrage some. In fact, my own amazement at the results of the research I'm reporting on led me to write this article. I had suspected for a long time that the Cold War version of Soviet history had serious flaws. Still, I was unprepared for the extent of the falsehoods I had been taught as fact.
3. This story is well known in Russia, where respect for, and even admiration of, Stalin is common. Yuri Zhukov, the main Russian historian who sets forth the paradigm of 'Stalin as Democrat' and whose works are the most important single source, though far from the only one, for this article, is a mainstream figure associated with the Academy of Sciences. His works are widely read.

4. However, this story and the facts that sustain it are virtually unknown outside Russia, where the Cold War paradigm of 'Stalin as Villain' so controls what is published that the works cited here are still scarcely noted. Therefore, many of the secondary sources used in this article, as well as all the primary sources of course, are only available in Russian.¹

¹ Leon Trotsky's version of Soviet history preceded Khrushchev's, and has dovetailed into it as a kind of "left" version of the latter, though little credited outside Trotskyist circles. Both Khrushchevite and Trotskyist accounts portray Stalin in an extremely negative light; the word "demonize" would scarcely be an exaggeration. On Trotsky, see McNeal.

5. This article does not simply inform readers of new facts about, and interpretations of, the history of the USSR. Rather, it is an attempt to bring to a non-Russian readership the results of new research, based on Soviet archives, on the Stalin period and Stalin himself. The facts discussed herein are compatible with a range of paradigms of Soviet history, just as they help to disprove a number of other interpretations. They will be utterly unacceptable — in fact, outrageous — to those whose political and historical perspectives have been based upon erroneous and ideologically motivated "Cold-War" notions of Soviet "totalitarianism" and "Stalinist terror."²

² The widespread use of the term "terror" to characterize the period of Soviet history from roughly mid-1937 to 1939-40 can be attributed to an uncritical acceptance of Robert Conquest's highly tendentious and unreliable 1973 work The Great Terror. The term is both inaccurate and polemical. See Robert W. Thurston, "Fear and Belief in the USSR's 'Great Terror': Response To Arrest, 1935-1939." Slavic Review 45 (1986), 213-234. Thurston responded to, and critiqued, Conquest's attempt to defend the term in "On Desk-Bound Parochialism, Commonsense Perspectives, and Lousy Evidence: A Reply to Robert Conquest." Slavic Review 45 (1986), 238-244. See also Thurston, "Social Dimensions of Stalinist Rule: Humor and Terror in the USSR, 1935-1941." Journal of Social History 24, No. 3 (1991) 541-562; Life and Terror Ch. 5, 137-163.

6. The Khrushchevite interpretation of Stalin as power-hungry dictator, betrayer of Lenin's legacy, was created to fit the needs of the Communist Party's nomenklatura in the 1950s. But it shows close similarities, and shares many assumptions, with the canonical discourse on Stalin inherited from the Cold War, which served the desire of capitalist elites to argue that communist struggles, or indeed any struggles for working-class power, must inevitably lead to some kind of horror.

7. It also suits the Trotskyists' need to argue that the defeat of Trotsky, the "true revolutionary," could only have come at the hands of a dictator who, it is assumed, violated every principle for which the revolution had been fought. Khrushchevite, Cold-War anti-communist, and Trotskyist paradigms of Soviet history are similar in their dependence on a virtual demonization of Stalin, his leadership, and the USSR during his time.

8. The view of Stalin outlined in this essay is compatible with a number of otherwise contradictory historical paradigms. Anti-revisionist and post-Maoist communist interpretations of Soviet history see Stalin as a creative and logical, if in some respects flawed, heir to Lenin's legacy. Meanwhile, many Russian nationalists, while hardly approving of Stalin's achievements as a Communist, respect Stalin as the figure most responsible for the establishment of Russia as a major industrial and military world power. Stalin is a foundational figure for both, albeit in very different ways.

9. This article is no attempt to "rehabilitate" Stalin. I agree with Yuri Zhukov when he writes: "I can honestly tell you that I oppose the rehabilitation of Stalin, because I oppose rehabilitations in general. Nothing and no one in history should be rehabilitated — but we must uncover the truth and speak the truth. However, since Khrushchev's time the only victims of Stalin's repressions you hear from are those who took part in them themselves, or who facilitated them or who failed to oppose them." (Zhukov, KP Nov. 21 02) Nor do I wish to suggest that, if only Stalin had had his way, the manifold problems of building socialism or communism in the USSR would have been solved.

10. During the period with which this essay is concerned, the Stalin leadership was concerned not only to promote democracy in the governance of the state, but to foster inner-party democracy as well. This important and related topic requires a separate study, and this essay does not centrally address it. However, where the concept of 'democracy' is concerned, it would have to have a different meaning in the context of a democratic-centralist party of voluntary members than in a huge state of citizens where no basis of political agreement can be presupposed.³

³ Marxist-Leninist political thought rejects capitalist "representative democracy" as essentially a smokescreen for elite control. Many non-Marxist political thinkers agree. For one example, see Lewis H. Lapham (editor of Harper's Magazine), "Lights, Camera, Democracy! On the conventions of a make-believe republic," Harper's Magazine, August 1996, 33-38.

11. This article draws upon primary sources whenever possible. But it relies most heavily upon scholarly works by Russian historians who have access to unpublished or recently published documents from Soviet archives. Many Soviet documents of great importance are available only to scholars with privileged access. A great many others remain completely sequestered and "classified," including much of Stalin's personal archive, the pre-trial, investigative materials in the Moscow Trials of 1936-38, the investigative materials relating to the military purges or "Tukhachevsky Affair" of 1937, and many others.

12. Yuri Zhukov describes the archival situation this way:

"With the beginning of perestroika, one of the slogans of which was 'glasnost' ... the Kremlin archive, formerly closed to researchers, was liquidated. Its holdings began to be relocated in [various public archives — GF]. This process began but was not completed. Without any publicity or explanation of any kind in 1996 the most important, pivotal materials were again reclassified, hidden away in the archive of the President of the Russian Federation. Soon the reasons for this secretive operation became clear; it permitted the resurrection of one of the two old and very shabby myths." (6)

By these myths Zhukov means 'Stalin the Villain' and 'Stalin the Great Leader'. Only the first of these myths is familiar to readers of Western and anti-communist historiography. But both schools are well represented in Russia and the Commonwealth of Independent States.

13. One of Zhukov's books, and the basis of much of this article, is titled Inoy Stalin — A Different Stalin, 'different' from either myth, closer to the truth, based upon recently declassified archival documents. Its cover shows a photograph of Stalin and, facing it, the same photograph in negative: its opposite. Only rarely does Zhukov use secondary sources. For the most part he cites unpublished archival material, or archival documents only recently declassified and published. The picture he draws of Politburo politics from 1934 to 1938 is very different from anything consistent with either of the myths he rejects.

14. Zhukov ends his Introduction with these words: "I make no claim to finality or incontrovertibility. I attempt only one task: to avoid both preconceived points of view, both myths; to try to reconstruct the past, once well known, but now intentionally forgotten, deliberately unmentionable, ignored by all." Following Zhukov, this article also attempts to steer clear of both myths.

15. Under such conditions all conclusions must remain tentative. I've tried to use all materials judiciously, whether primary or secondary. In order to avoid interrupting the text I have put source references at the end of each paragraph. I have employed traditional numbered footnotes only where I think longer, more explanatory notes are needed.

16. The research this article summarizes has important consequences for those of us concerned to carry forward a class analysis of history, including the history of the Soviet Union.

17. One of the very best American researchers of the Stalin period in the USSR, J. Arch Getty, has called the historical research done during the period of the Cold War "products of propaganda" — "research" which it makes no sense to criticize or try to correct in its individual parts, but which must be done all over again from the beginning.⁴ I agree with Getty, but would add that this tendentious, politically-charged, and dishonest "research" is still being produced today.

⁴ Quoted by Yuri Zhukov, "Zhupel Stalina," Komsomolskaia Pravda Nov. 5 2002. Prof. Getty confirmed this in an email to me.

18. The Cold War-Khrushchevite paradigm has been the prevailing view of the history of the "Stalin years." The research reported on here can contribute towards a "clearing of the ground," a "beginning all over again from the beginning." The truth that finally emerges will also have great meaning for the Marxist project of understanding the world in order to change it, of building a classless society of social and economic justice.

19. In the concluding section of the essay I have outlined some areas for further research that are suggested by the results of this article.

A New Constitution

20. In December 1936 the Extraordinary 8th Congress of Soviets approved the draft of the new Soviet Constitution. It called for secret ballot and contested elections. (Zhukov, Inoy 307-9)

21. Candidates were to be allowed not only from the Bolshevik Party — called the All-Union Communist Party (Bolshevik) at that time⁵ — but from other citizens' groups as well, based on residence, affiliation (such as religious groups), or workplace organizations. This last provision was never put into effect. Contested elections were never held.

⁵ The Party's name was changed to Communist Party of the Soviet Union in 1952.

22. The democratic aspects of the Constitution were inserted at the express insistence of Joseph Stalin. Together with his closest supporters in the Politburo of the Bolshevik Party, Stalin fought tenaciously to keep these provisions. (Getty, "State") He, and they, yielded only when confronted by the complete refusal by the Party's Central Committee, and by the panic surrounding the discovery of serious conspiracies, in collaboration with Japanese and German fascism, to overthrow the Soviet government.

23. In January 1935, the Politburo assigned the task of outlining the contents of a new Constitution to Avel' Yenukidze⁶ who, some months later, returned with a suggestion for open, uncontested elections. Almost immediately, on January 25, 1935, Stalin expressed his disagreement with Yenukidze's proposal, insisting upon secret elections. (Zhukov, Inoy 116-21)

⁶ Yenukidze, an old revolutionary, fellow Georgian, and friend of Stalin's, had long occupied a high position in the Soviet government and never been associated with any of the Opposition groups of the '20s. At this time he was also in charge of the Kremlin Guard. Within a few months he was one of the first to be exposed as a member of the plan for a "palace coup" against the Stalin leadership. Zhukov (KP 14 Nov. 02) notes that this must have been especially upsetting to Stalin.

24. Stalin made this disagreement public in a dramatic manner in a March 1936 interview with American newspaper magnate Roy Howard. Stalin declared that the Soviet constitution would guarantee that all voting would be by secret ballot. Voting would be on an equal basis, with a peasant vote counting as much as that of a worker;⁷ on a territorial basis, as in the West, rather than according to status (as during Czarist times) or place of employment; and direct — all Soviets would be elected by the citizens themselves, not indirectly by representatives. (Stalin-Howard Interview; Zhukov, "Repressii" 5-6) Stalin: "We shall probably adopt our new constitution at the end of this year. The commission appointed to draw up the constitution is working and should finish its labors soon. As has been announced already, according to the new constitution, the suffrage will be universal, equal, direct, and secret." (Stalin-Howard Interview 13)

⁷ Part II, Chapter 3, Article 9 of The Soviet Constitution of 1924, the one in force at this time, gave urban dwellers a far greater influence in society — one Soviet delegate to 25,000 city and town voters, and one delegate to 125,000 country voters. This was in conformity to the far greater degree of support for socialism among workers, and with the Marxist concept of the state as the dictatorship of the proletariat.

25. Most important, Stalin declared that all elections would be contested:

"You are puzzled by the fact that only one party will come forward at elections. You cannot see how election contests can take place under these conditions. Evidently, candidates will be put forward not only by the Communist Party, but by all sorts of public, non-Party organizations. And we have hundreds of them. We have no contending parties any more than we have a capitalist class contending against a working class which is exploited by the capitalists. Our society consists exclusively of free toilers of town and country — workers, peasants, intellectuals. Each of these strata may have its special interests and express them by means of the numerous public organizations that exist." (13-14)

Different citizens' organizations would be able to set forth candidates to run against the Communist Party's candidates. Stalin told Howard that citizens would cross off the names of all candidates except those they wished to vote for.

26. He also stressed the importance of contested elections in fighting bureaucracy.

"You think that there will be no election contests. But there will be, and I foresee very lively election campaigns. There are not a few institutions in our country which work badly. Cases occur when this or that local government body fails to satisfy certain of the multifarious and growing requirements of the toilers of town and country. Have you built a good school or not? Have you improved housing conditions? Are you a bureaucrat? Have you helped to make our labor more effective and our lives more cultured? Such will be the criteria with which millions of electors will measure the fitness of candidates, reject the unsuitable, expunge their names from candidates' lists, and promote and nominate the best. Yes, election campaigns will be lively, they will be conducted around numerous, very acute problems, principally of a practical nature, of first-class importance for the people. Our new electoral system will tighten up all institutions and organizations and compel them to improve their work. Universal, equal, direct and secret suffrage in the U.S.S.R. will be a whip in the hands of the population against the organs of government which work badly. In my opinion our new Soviet constitution will be the most democratic constitution in the world." (15)

27. From this point on, Stalin and his closest Politburo associates Vyacheslav Molotov and Andrei Zhdanov spoke up for secret, contested elections in all discussions within the Party leadership. (Zhukov, Inoy 207-10; Stalin-Howard Interview)

28. Stalin also insisted that many Soviet citizens who had been deprived of the franchise have it restored. These included members of former exploiting classes such as former landlords, and those who had fought against the Bolsheviks during the Civil War of 1918-1921, known as "White Guardists", as well as those convicted of certain crimes (as in the USA today). Most important, and probably most numerous, among the lishentsy ("deprived") were two groups: "kulaks," the main targets during the Collectivization movement of a few years before; and those who had violated the 1932 "law of three ears"⁸ — who had stolen state property, often grain, sometimes simply to avoid starvation. (Zhukov, Inoy 187)

⁸ This is actually not a law but a "decision of the Central Executive Committee and the Council of People's Commissars" — i.e. of the legislative and executive branches of government. The fact that it is commonly called a "law" even in scholarship simply shows that most of those who refer to it have not actually read it at all. It is printed in Tragediia Sovetskoy Derevni. Kollektivizatsiia i Raskulachivanie. Dokumenty i Materialy. 1927-1939. Tom 3. Konets 1930-1933 (Moscow: ROSSPEN, 2001), No. 160, pp. 453-4, and in Sobranie zakonov i rasporiazhenii Raboche-Krest'ianskogo Pravitel'stva SSSR, chast' I, 1932, pp. 583-584. My thanks to Dr. Gábor T. Rittersporn for this last citation.

29. These electoral reforms would have been unnecessary unless the Stalin leadership wanted to change the way the Soviet Union was governed. They wanted to get the Communist Party out of the business of directly running the Soviet Union.

30. During the Russian Revolution and the critical years that followed, the USSR had been legally governed by an elected hierarchy of soviets ("councils"), from local to national level, with the Supreme Soviet as the national legislative body, the Council (= soviet) of People's Commissars as the executive body, and the Chairman of this Council as the head of state.

But in reality, at every level, choice of these officials had always been in the hands of the Bolshevik Party. Elections were held, but direct nomination by Party leaders, called "cooptation," was also common. Even the elections were controlled by the Party, since no one could run for office unless Party leaders agreed.

31. To the Bolsheviks, this had made sense. It was the form that the dictatorship of the proletariat took in the specific historical conditions of the revolutionary and post-revolutionary Soviet Union. Under the New Economic Policy, or NEP,⁹ the labor and skills of former and current exploiters were needed. But they had to be used only in service to the working-class dictatorship — to socialism. They were not to be permitted to rebuild capitalist relationships beyond certain limits, nor to regain political power.

⁹ To build up the economy as quickly as possible after the devastation of the Civil War and subsequent famine, the Bolsheviks permitted capitalism to flourish and encouraged profit-seeking businessmen, though under government scrutiny. This was called the New Economic Policy.

32. Throughout the 1920s and early 1930s the Bolshevik Party recruited aggressively among the working class. By the end of the 1920s most Party members were workers and a high percentage of workers were in the Party. This massive recruitment and huge attempts at political education took place at the same time as the tremendous upheavals of the first Five-Year Plan, crash industrialization, and largely forced collectivization of individual farms into collective (kolkhoz) or soviet farms (sovkhoz). The Bolshevik leadership was both sincere in its attempt to "proletarianize" their Party, and successful in the result. (Rigby, 167-8; 184; 199)

33. Stalin and his supporters on the Politburo gave a number of reasons for wanting to democratize the Soviet Union. These reasons reflected the Stalin leadership's belief that a new state of socialism had been reached.

34. Most peasants were in collective farms. With fewer individual peasant farms every month, the Stalin leadership believed that, objectively, the peasants no longer constituted a separate socio-economic class. Peasants were more like workers than different from them.

35. Stalin argued that, with the rapid growth of Soviet industry, and especially with the working class holding political power through the Bolshevik Party, the word "proletariat" was no longer accurate. "Proletariat," Stalin averred, referred to the working class under capitalist exploitation, or working under capitalist-type relations of production, such as existed during the first dozen years of the Soviet Union, especially under the NEP. But with direct exploitation of workers by capitalists for profit now abolished, the working class should no longer be called the "proletariat."

36. According to this view, exploiters of labor no longer existed. Workers, now running the country in their own interest through the Bolshevik Party, were no longer like the classic "proletariat." Therefore, the "dictatorship of the proletariat" was no longer an adequate concept. These new conditions called for a new kind of state. (Zhukov, Inoy 231; 292; Stalin, "Draft" 800-1)

The Anti-Bureaucracy Struggle

37. The Stalin leadership was also concerned about the Party's role in this new stage of socialism. Stalin himself raised the fight against "bureaucratism" with great vigor as early as his Report to the 17th Party Congress in January 1934.¹⁰ Stalin, Molotov and others called the new electoral system a "weapon against bureaucratization."

¹⁰ Stalin, "Report to 17th P.C.," 704, 705, 706, 716, 728, 733, 752, 753, 754, 756, 758.

38. Party leaders controlled the government both by determining who entered the Soviets and by exercising various forms of oversight or review over what the government ministries did. Speaking at the 7th Congress of Soviets on February 6, 1935, Molotov said that secret elections "will strike with great force against bureaucratic elements and provide them a useful shock." Yenukidze's report had not recommended, or even mentioned, secret elections and the widening of the franchise. (Stalin, Report to 17th P.C.; Zhukov, Inoy 124)

39. Government ministers and their staffs had to know something about the affairs over which they were in charge, if they were to be effective in production. This meant education, usually technical education, in their fields. But Party leaders often made their careers by advancement through Party positions alone. No technical expertise was needed for this kind of advancement. Rather, political criteria were required. These Party officials exercised control, but they themselves often lacked the technical knowledge that could in theory make them skilled at supervision. (Stalin-Howard Interview; Zhukov, Inoy 305; Zhukov, "Repressii" 6)

40. This is, apparently, what the Stalin leadership meant by the term "bureaucratism." Though they viewed it as a danger — as, indeed, all Marxists did — they believed it was not inevitable. Rather, they thought that it could be overcome by changing the role of the Party in socialist society.

41. The concept of democracy that Stalin and his supporters in the Party leadership wished to inaugurate in the Soviet Union would necessarily involve a qualitative change in the societal role of the Bolshevik Party: "Those documents that were accessible to researchers did allow us to understand ... that already by the end of the 1930s determined attempts were being undertaken to separate the Party from the state and to limit in a substantive manner the Party's role in the life of the country." (Zhukov, Tayny 8) Stalin and supporters continued this struggle against opposition from other elements in the Bolshevik Party, resolutely but with diminishing chances for success, until Stalin died in March 1953. Lavrenty Beria's determination to continue this same struggle seems to be the real reason Khrushchev and others murdered him, either judicially, by trial on trumped-up charges in December 1953, or — as much evidence suggests — through literal murder, the previous June.

42. Article 3 of the 1936 Constitution reads, "In the U.S.S.R. all power belongs to the working people of town and country as represented by the Soviets of Working People's Deputies." The Communist Party is mentioned in Article 126 as "the vanguard of the working people in their struggle to strengthen and develop the socialist system and is the leading core of all organizations of the working people, both public and state." That is, the Party was to lead organizations, but not the legislative or executive organs of the state. (1936 Constitution; Zhukov, Tayny 29-30)

43. Stalin seems to have believed that, once the Party was out of direct control over society, its role should be confined to agitation and propaganda, and participation in the selection of cadres. What would this have meant? Perhaps something like this:

- The Party would revert to its essential function of winning people to the ideals of communism as they understood it.
- This would mean the end of cushy sinecure-type jobs, and a reversion to the style of hard work and selfless dedication that characterized the Bolsheviks during the Tsarist period, the Revolution and Civil War, the period of NEP, and the very hard period of crash industrialization and collectivization. During these periods Party membership, for most, meant hard work and sacrifice, often among non-Party members, many of whom were hostile to the Bolsheviks. It meant the need for a real base among the masses. (Zhukov, KP Nov. 13 02; Mukhin, Ubiystvo)

44. Stalin insisted that Communists should be hard-working, educated people, able to make a real contribution to production and to the creation of a communist society. Stalin himself was an indefatigable student.¹¹

¹¹ This is not widely known, nor its significance understood. Our view of Stalin has been largely shaped by those who hated him (McNeal 87). Stalin had been an excellent student at the seminary in Tblisi, Georgia, to which his mother had sent him. Devoting his life from his teenage years to the working-class revolutionary movement, he had never had the opportunity for higher education. But he was highly intelligent, and a voracious reader whose learning ranged from philosophy to technical subjects like metallurgy. Contemporary records attest to his attention to details and thorough knowledge of many technical areas. A Russian scholar who has studied Stalin's library gives impressive figures: 20,000 volumes at Stalin's dacha after the war; many of the 5,500 taken to the Institute of Marxism-Leninism after his death are annotated and underlined. (Ilizarov). Roy

Medvedev, who hates Stalin, grudgingly admits Stalin's considerable reading. (Medvedev, "Lichnaia")

Many of the people whom he picked as his closest associates reflected this same dedication to self-improvement. Sergei Kirov, Leningrad Party leader and close ally of Stalin's who was assassinated in 1934, was noted for his wide reading in literature. (Kirilina 175). "When Kirov was killed, experts from the investigation photographed everything that could aid the investigation including the top of Kirov's work desk. To the right lay Hütte's engineering manual, on the left a pile of scientific and technical journals, the top title of which was 'Combustible Shale.' Wide indeed was the sphere of interests of this party worker — as Stalin's was." (Mukhin Ubiystvo 625)

In 1924 Lavrenty Beria, fresh from several years of very dangerous underground revolutionary work, some of it as a Bolshevik infiltrator in violent anti-communist Caucasian nationalist groups, wrote his Party autobiography. His purpose in listing his deeds — he had been awarded the rank of general at the age of 20 — was to plead, not for a cushy job, as most "Old Bolsheviks" demanded and usually got, but to be allowed to return to his engineering studies, so he could make a contribution to the building of a communist society. (Beria: Konets Kar'ery, 320-325)

45. To summarize, the evidence suggests that Stalin intended the new electoral system to accomplish the following goals:

- Make sure that only technically trained people led, in production and in Soviet society at large;
- Stop the degeneration of the Bolshevik Party, and return Party members, especially leaders, to their primary function: giving political and moral leadership, by example and persuasion, to the rest of society;
- Strengthen the Party's mass work;
- Win the support of the country's citizens behind the government;
- Create the basis for a classless, communist society.

Stalin's Defeat

46. During 1935, under the aegis of Andrei Vyshinsky, Chief Prosecutor of the USSR, many citizens who had been exiled, imprisoned, and — most significantly for our present purposes — deprived of the franchise, were restored. Hundreds of thousands of former kulaks, richer farmers who were the main target of collectivization, and of those who had been imprisoned or exiled for resisting collectivization in some way, were freed. Vyshinsky severely criticized the NKVD (People's Commissariat for Internal Affairs, including internal security) for "a series of the crudest errors and miscalculations" in deporting almost 12,000 people from Leningrad after the December 1934 assassination of Kirov. He declared that from then on, the NKVD could not arrest anyone without prior consent of the prosecutor. The enfranchised population was expanded by at least hundreds of thousands of people who had reason to feel that State and Party had treated them unfairly. (Thurston 6-9; Zhukov, KP Nov. 14 & Nov. 19 02; Zhukov, Inoy 187; Zhukov, "Repressii" 7)

47. Stalin's original proposal for the new constitution had not included contested elections. He first announced it in his interview with Roy Howard on March 1, 1936. At the June 1937 Central Committee Plenum, Yakovlev — one of the CC members who, together with Stalin, worked most closely on the draft of the new constitution (cf. Zhukov, Inoy 223) — said that the suggestion for contested elections was made by Stalin himself. This suggestion seems to have met with widespread, albeit tacit, opposition from the regional Party leaders, the First Secretaries, or "partocracy," as Zhukov calls them. After the Howard interview there was not even the nominal praise or support for Stalin's statement about contested elections in the central newspapers — those most under the direct control of the Politburo. Pravda carried one article only, on March 10, and it did not mention contested elections.

48. From this Zhukov concludes:

"This could mean only one thing. Not only the 'broad leadership' [the regional First Secretaries], but at least a part of the Central Committee apparatus, Agitprop under Stetsky and Tal', did not accept Stalin's innovation, did not want to approve, even in a purely formal manner, contested elections, dangerous to many, which, as followed from those of Stalin's words that Pravda did underscore, directly threatened the positions and real power of the First Secretaries — the Central Committees of the national communist parties, the regional, oblast, city, and area committees." (Inoy 211)

49. The Party First Secretaries held Party offices, from which they could not be removed by defeat in any elections to the Soviets they might enter. But the immense local power they held stemmed mainly from the Party's control over every aspect of the economy and state apparatus — kolkhoz, factory, education, military. The new electoral system would deprive the First Secretaries of their automatic positions as delegates to the Soviets, and of their ability to simply choose the other delegates. Defeat of themselves or of "their" candidates (the Party candidates) in elections to the soviets would be, in effect, a referendum on their work. A First Secretary whose candidates were defeated at the polls by non-Party candidates would be exposed as someone with weak ties to the masses. During the campaigns, opposition candidates were sure to make campaign issues out of any corruption, authoritarianism, or incompetence they observed among Party officials. Defeated candidates would be shown up to have serious weaknesses as communists, and this would probably lead to their being replaced. (Zhukov KP Nov. 13 02; Inoy 226; cf. Getty, "Excesses" 122-3)

50. Senior Party leaders were usually Party members of many years' standing, veterans of the really dangerous days of Tsarist times, the Revolution, the Civil War, and collectivization, when to be a communist was fraught with peril and difficulty. Many had little formal education. Unlike Stalin, Kirov or Beria, it seems that most of them were unwilling or unable to "remake themselves" through self-education. (Mukhin, Ubiystvo 37; Dimitrov 33-4; Stalin, Zastol'nye 235-6).

51. All these men were long-time supporters of Stalin's policies. They had implemented the harsh collectivization of the peasantry, during which hundreds of thousands had been deported. During 1932-33 many people, perhaps as many as three million, had died by a famine that had been real rather than "man-made," but one made more severe for the peasantry by collectivization and expropriation of grain to feed the workers in the cities, or in armed peasant rebellions (which had also killed many Bolsheviks).

These Party leaders had overseen crash industrialization, again under harsh conditions of poor housing, insufficient food and medical care, low pay and few goods to buy with it. (Tauger; Anderson & Silver; Zhukov, KP Nov. 13 02).

52. Now they faced elections in which those formerly deprived of the franchise because they had been on the wrong side of these Soviet policies would suddenly have the right to vote restored. It's likely that they feared many would vote against their candidates, or against any Bolshevik candidate. If so, they stood to be demoted, or worse. They would still get some Party position, or — at worst — some kind of job. The new "Stalin" Constitution guaranteed every Soviet citizen a job as a right, along with medical care, pensions, education, etc. But these men (virtually all were men) were used to power and privilege, all of which was threatened by defeat of their candidates at the polls. (Zhukov, KP Nov. 13 02; 1936 Const., Ch. X; cf. Getty, "Excesses" 125, on the importance of religious feeling in the country).

Trials, Conspiracies, Repression

53. Plans for the new constitution and elections had been outlined during the June 1936 Plenum of the Central Committee. The delegates unanimously approved the draft Constitution. But none of them spoke up in favor of it. This failure to give at least lip service to a Stalin proposal certainly indicated "latent opposition from the broad leadership," a demonstrative lack of concern." (Zhukov, Inoy 232, 236; "Repressii" 10-11)

54. During the 8th All-Russian Congress of Soviets meeting in November-December 1936 Stalin and Molotov again stressed the value of widening the franchise and of secret and contested elections. In the spirit of Stalin's interview with Howard, Molotov again stressed the beneficial effect, for the Party, of permitting non-communist candidates for the Soviets:

"This system ... cannot but strike against those who have become bureaucratized, alienated from the masses. ... will facilitate the promotion of new forces... that must come forth to replace backward or bureaucratized [ochinovnivshimsya] elements. Under the new form of elections, the election of enemy elements is possible. But even this danger, in the last analysis, must serve to help us, insofar as it will serve as a lash to those organizations that need it, and to [Party] workers who have fallen asleep. (Zhukov, "Repressii" 15).

55. Stalin himself put it even more strongly:

"Some say that this is dangerous, since elements hostile to Soviet power could sneak into the highest offices, some of the former White Guardists, kulaks, priests, and so on. But really, what is there to fear? 'If you're afraid of wolves, don't walk in the forest.' For one thing, not all former kulaks, White Guardists, and priests are hostile to Soviet power. For another, if the people here and there elected hostile forces, this will mean that our agitational work is poorly organized, and that we have fully deserved this disgrace." (Zhukov, Inoy 293; Stalin, "Draft").

56. Once again the First Secretaries showed tacit hostility. The December 1936 Central Committee Plenum, whose session overlapped with the Congress, met on December 4th. But there was virtually no discussion of the first agenda item, the draft Constitution. Yezhov's report, "On Trotskyite and Right Anti-Soviet Organizations," was far more central to the C.C. members' concerns. ("Fragmenty" 4-5; Zhukov, Inoy 310-11).

57. On December 5, 1936, the Congress approved the draft of the new Constitution. But there had been little real discussion. Instead, the delegates — Party leaders — had emphasized the threats from enemies foreign and domestic. Rather than giving speeches of approval for the Constitution, which was the main topic reported on by Stalin, Molotov, Zhdanov, Litvinov, and Vyshinsky, the delegates virtually ignored it. A Commission was set up for further study of the draft Constitution, with nothing fixed about contested elections. (Zhukov, Inoy 294; 298; 309)

58. The international situation was indeed tense. Victory for fascism in the Spanish Civil War was only a question of time. The Soviet Union was surrounded by hostile powers. By the second half of the 1930s, all these countries were fiercely authoritarian, militaristic, anti-communist and anti-Soviet regimes. In October 1936 Finland had fired across the Soviet frontier. That same month the "Berlin-Rome Axis" was formed by Hitler and Mussolini. A month later, Japan joined Nazi Germany and fascist Italy to form the "Anti-Comintern Pact." Soviet efforts at military alliances against Nazi Germany met with rejection in the capitals of the West. (Zhukov, Inoy 285-309).

59. While the Congress was attending to the new Constitution, the Soviet leadership was between the first two large-scale Moscow Trials. Zinoviev and Kamenev had gone on trial along with some others in August 1936. The second trial, in January 1937, involved some of the major followers of Trotsky, led by Yuri Piatakov, until recently the deputy Commissar of Heavy Industry.¹²

¹² Thurston, Chapters 2 through 4, is the best single summary, as of the early '90s, of the evidence concerning the Moscow Trials. This article will not deal directly with these trials, the trial and execution of Marshal Tukhachevsky and other top-ranking military leaders in June 1937, or the interrelationship among all the anti-Soviet conspiracies alleged in them. As documents from the Soviet archives make clear, Stalin and other top Soviet leaders were convinced that the conspiracies existed, and the charges at the Moscow Trials, plus those against the military leaders, were, at least in large part, accurate.

60. The February-March 1937 Central Committee Plenum dramatized the contradiction within the Party leadership: the struggle against internal enemies, and the need to prepare for secret, contested elections under the new Constitution by year's end. The gradual discovery of more and more groups conspiring to overthrow the Soviet government demanded police action. But preparing for truly democratic elections to the government, and to improve inner-party democracy — a theme stressed over and over by those closest to Stalin in the Politburo — required the opposite: openness to criticism and self-criticism, secret elections of leaders by rank-and-file Party members, and an end to "cooptation" by First Secretaries.

61. This Plenum, the longest ever held in the history of the USSR, dragged on for two weeks. Yet almost nothing was known about it until 1992, when the Plenum's huge transcript began to be published in Voprosy Istorii — a process that took the journal almost four years to complete.

62. Yezhov's report about the continuing investigations into conspiracies within the country was overshadowed by Nikolai Bukharin, who, in loquacious attempts to confess past misdeeds, distance himself from onetime associates, and assure every one of his current loyalty, managed only to incriminate himself further. (Thurston, 40-42; Getty and Naumov agree, 563)

63. After three whole days of this, Zhdanov spoke about the need for greater democracy both in the country and in the Party, invoking the struggle against bureaucracy and the need for closer ties to the masses, both party and non-party:

"The new electoral system will give a powerful push towards the improvement of the work of Soviet bodies, the liquidation of bureaucratic bodies, the liquidation of bureaucratic shortcomings, and deformations in the work of our Soviet organizations. And these shortcomings, as you know, are very substantial. Our Party bodies must be ready for the electoral struggle. In the elections we will have to deal with hostile agitation and hostile candidates." (Zhukov, Inoy 343)

64. There can be no doubt that Zhdanov, speaking for the Stalin leadership, foresaw real electoral contests with non-party candidates that seriously opposed developments in the Soviet Union. This fact alone is utterly incompatible with Cold-War and Khrushchevite accounts.

65. Zhdanov also emphasized, at length, the need to develop democratic norms within the Bolshevik Party itself: "If we want to win the respect of our Soviet and Party workers to our laws, and the masses — to the Soviet constitution, then we must guarantee the restructuring [perestroika] of Party work on the basis of an indubitable and full implementation of the bases of inner-party democracy, which is outlined in the bylaws of our Party." And he enumerated the essential measures, already contained in the draft resolution to his report: the elimination of co-optation; a ban on voting by slates; a guarantee "of the unlimited right for members of the Party to set aside the nominated candidates and of the unlimited right to criticize these candidates." (Zhukov, Inoy 345)

66. But Zhdanov's report was drowned in the discussions of other agenda items, mainly discussions about "enemies." A number of First Secretaries responded with alarm that those who were, or might be expected to be, preparing most assiduously for the Soviet elections were opponents of Soviet power: Social-Revolutionaries, the priesthood, and other "enemies."¹³

¹³ Getty notes that CC members pointedly refused to respond to Zhdanov's speech, putting the Chair, Andreev, into confusion ("Excesses"124). Zhukov places less emphasis on this, as Eikhe and other First Secretaries did reply at the next session, while emphasizing the struggle against "enemies." (Inoy 345)

67. Molotov replied with a report stressing, once again, "the development and strengthening of self-criticism," and directly opposed the search for "enemies":

"There's no point in searching for people to blame, comrades. If you prefer, all of us here are to blame, beginning with the Party's central institutions and ending with the lowest Party organizations." (Zhukov, Inoy 349)

68. But those who followed Molotov to the podium ignored his report and continued to harp on the necessity of "searching out 'enemies,' of exposing 'wreckers,' and the struggle against 'wrecking.'" (352) When he spoke again, Molotov marveled that there had been almost no attention paid to the substance of his report, which he repeated, after first summarizing what was being done against internal enemies.

69. Stalin's speech of March 3 was likewise divided, returning at the end to the need for improving Party work and of weeding out incapable Party members and replacing them with new ones. Like Molotov's, Stalin's report was virtually ignored.

"From the beginning of the discussions Stalin's fears were understandable. It seemed he had run into a deaf wall of incomprehension, of the unwillingness of the CC members, who heard in the report just what they wanted to hear, to discuss what he wanted them to discuss. Of the 24 persons who took part in the discussions, 15 spoke mainly about "enemies of the people," that is, Trotskyists. They spoke with conviction, aggressively, just as they had after the reports by Zhdanov and Molotov. They reduced all the problems to one — the necessity of searching out "enemies". And practically none of them recalled Stalin's main point — about the shortcomings in the work of Party organizations, about preparation for the elections to the Supreme Soviet." (Zhukov, Inoy 357)

70. The Stalin leadership stepped up the attack on the First Secretaries. Yakovlev criticized Moscow Party leader Khrushchev, among others, for unjustified expulsions of Party members; Malenkov seconded his criticism of Party secretaries for their indifference to rank-and-file members. This seems to have stimulated the C.C. members to stop speaking temporarily about enemies, but only in order to begin defending themselves. There was still no response to Stalin's report. (Zhukov, Inoy 358-60)

71. In his final speech on March 5, the concluding day of the Plenum, Stalin minimized the need to hunt enemies, even Trotskyists, many of whom, he said, had turned towards the Party. His main theme was the need to remove Party officials from running every aspect of the economy, to fight bureaucracy, and to raise the political level of Party officials. In other words, Stalin upped the ante in the criticism of the First Secretaries.

"Some comrades among us think that, if they are a Narkom (= People's Commissar), then they know everything. They believe that rank, in and of itself, grants very great, almost inexhaustible knowledge. Or they think: If I am a Central Committee member, then I am not one by accident, then I must know everything. This is not the case." (Stalin, Zakliuchitel'noe; Zhukov, Inoy 360-1)

72. Most ominously for all Party officials, including First Secretaries, Stalin stated that each of them should choose two cadre to take their places while they attended six-month political education courses that would soon be established. With replacement officials in their stead, Party secretaries might well have feared that they could easily be reassigned during this period, breaking the back of their "families" (officials subservient to them), a major cause of bureaucracy. (Zhukov, Inoy 362)

73. Thurston characterizes Stalin's speech as "considerably milder," stressing "the need to learn from the masses and pay attention to criticism from below." Even the resolution passed based on Stalin's report touched on "enemies" only briefly, and dealt mainly with failings in party organizations and their leaderships. According to Zhukov, who quotes from this unpublished resolution, not even one of its 25 points was mainly concerned with "enemies." (Thurston, 48-9; Zhukov, Inoy 362-4)¹⁴

¹⁴ For the Resolution, see Zhukov, Inoy 362-3; Stalin, Zakliuchitel'noe. Like the resolution (which remains unpublished), Stalin's speech touches only very briefly on the subject of "enemies," and even then to warn the CC against "beating" everyone who had once been a Trotskyist. Stalin insists that there are "remarkable people" among former Trotskyists, specifically naming Feliks Dzerzhinsky.

74. After the Plenum the First Secretaries staged a virtual rebellion. First Stalin, and then the Politburo, sent out messages re-emphasizing the need to conduct secret Party elections, opposition to co-optation rather than election, and the need for inner-Party democracy generally. The First Secretaries were doing things in the old way, regardless of the resolutions of the Plenum.

75. During the next few months Stalin and his closest associates tried to turn the focus away from a hunt for internal enemies — the largest concern of the CC members — and back towards fighting bureaucracy in the Party, and preparing for the Soviet elections. Meanwhile, "local party leaders did everything they could within the limits of party discipline (and sometimes outside it) to stall or change the elections." (Getty, "Excesses" 126; Zhukov, Inoy 367-71)

76. The sudden uncovering in April, May and early June 1937 of what appeared to be a broadly-based military and police conspiracy caused the Stalin government to react in a panic. Genrikh Yagoda, head of the security police and Minister of Internal Affairs, was arrested in late March 1937, and began to confess in April. In May and early June 1937 high-ranking military commanders confessed to conspiring with the German General Staff to defeat the Red Army in the case of an invasion by Germany and its allies, and also to being linked to conspiracies by political figures, including many who still occupied high positions. (Getty, "Excesses" 115, 135; Thurston, 70, 90, 101-2; Genrikh Yagoda)¹⁵

¹⁵ This volume (Genrikh Yagoda) consists mainly of investigators' interrogations of Yagoda and a few of his associates, and Yagoda's confessions of involvement in the conspiracy to carry out a coup against the Soviet government; Trotsky's leadership of the conspiracy; and, in general, all that Yagoda confessed to in the 1938 Trial. There is no indication that these confessions were other than genuine. The volume's editors deny that any of the facts cited in the interrogations are accurate, and declare the interrogations themselves "falsified." But they do not give any evidence that this is the case. Jansen and Petrov, p. 226 n. 9, though very anti-Stalin, cite this volume as evidence and without comment. Furthermore, there is good evidence that this was so in fact — that these conspiracies did exist, that the confessions given at the public trials were genuine rather than coerced, and that the major charges against the defendants were true. Another large volume of primary documents published in 2004 contains a great many NKVD reports of conspiracies and texts of interrogations (see Lubyanka B). The most plausible explanation for the existence of all this evidence is that some of it, at least, is true.

77. This situation was far more serious than any the Soviet government had faced before. In the case of the 1936 and 1937 Moscow Trials, the government took its time to prepare the case and organize a public trial for maximum publicity. But the Military conspiracy was handled far differently. A little more than three weeks passed from the date of Marshal Mikhail Tukhachevsky's arrest in late May to the trial and execution of Tukhachevsky and seven other high-ranking military commanders on June 11-12. During that time hundreds of high-ranking military commanders were recalled to Moscow to read the evidence against their colleagues — for most of them, their superiors — and to listen to alarmed analyses by Stalin and Marshal Voroshilov, People's Commissar for Defense and the highest ranking military figure in the country.

78. At the time of the February-March Plenum, neither Yagoda nor Tukhachevsky had yet been arrested. Stalin and the Politburo intended that the Constitution be the main agenda item and were set on the defensive by the fact that most of the CC members ignored this topic, preferring to stress the battle against "enemies." The Politburo planned that the Constitutional reforms be the central agenda item at the upcoming June 1937 Plenum also. But by June the situation was different. The discovery of plots by the head of the NKVD and most prominent military leaders to overthrow the government and kill its leading members, entirely changed the political atmosphere.

79. Stalin was on the defensive. In his June 2 speech to the expanded session of the Military Soviet (which met June 1-4) he portrayed the series of recently uncovered¹⁶ conspiracies as limited, and largely successfully dealt with. At the February-March Plenum too, he and his Politburo supporters had minimized the First Secretaries' overriding concern with internal enemies. But, as Zhukov notes, the situation was "slowly, but decisively, getting out of his [Stalin's] control." (Stalin, "Vystuplenie"; Zhukov, Inoy Ch. 16, passim; 411).

¹⁶ Called the klubok, or "tangle," by the NKVD investigators at the time and by Russian historians today.

80. The June 1937 Central Committee Plenum¹⁷ began with proposals to exclude, first, seven sitting C.C. members and candidates for "lack of political trustworthiness," then a further 19 members and candidates for "treason and active counterrevolutionary activity." These last 19 were to be arrested by the NKVD. Including the ten members expelled on similar charges before the Plenum by a poll of the C.C. members (including those military commanders already tried, convicted, and executed), this meant that 36 of the 120 C.C. members and candidates as of May 1 had been removed.

¹⁷ No transcript of the June 1937 Plenum has ever been published. Some authors have claimed that no transcript was kept. However, Zhukov quotes extensively from some archival transcript unavailable to others.

81. Yakovlev and Molotov criticized the failure of Party leaders to organize for independent Soviet elections. Molotov stressed the need to move even honored revolutionaries out of the way if they were unprepared for the tasks of the day. He emphasized that Soviet officials were not "second-class workers." Evidently Party leaders were treating them as such.

82. Yakovlev exposed and criticized the failure of First Secretaries to hold secret elections for Party posts, relying instead on appointment ("cooptation"). He emphasized that Party members who were elected delegates to the Soviets were not to be placed under the discipline of Party groups outside the Soviets and told how to vote. They were not to be told how to vote by their Party superiors, such as the First Secretaries. They were to be independent of them. And Yakovlev referred in the strongest terms to the need to "recruit from the very rich reserve of new cadre to replace those who had become rotten or bureaucratized." All these statements constituted an explicit attack on the First Secretaries. (Zhukov, Inoy 424-7; Tayny, 39-40, quoting from archival documents)

83. The Constitution was finally outlined and the date of the first elections was set for December 12, 1937. The Stalin leadership again urged the benefits of fighting bureaucracy and building ties to the masses. However — to repeat — all this followed the equally unprecedented, summary expulsion from the C.C. of 26 members, nineteen of whom were directly charged with treason and counter-revolutionary activity. (Zhukov, Inoy 430)

84. Perhaps most revealing is the following remark by Stalin, as quoted by Zhukov:

"At the end of the discussion, when the subject was the search for a more dispassionate method of counting ballots, [Stalin] remarked that in the West, thanks to a multiparty system, this problem did not exist. Immediately thereafter he suddenly uttered a phrase that sounded very strange in a meeting of this kind: "We do not have different political parties. Fortunately, or unfortunately, we have only one party." [Zhukov's emphasis] And then he proposed, but only as a temporary measure, to use for the purpose of dispassionate supervision of elections representatives of all existing societal organizations except for the Bolshevik Party... The challenge to the Party autocracy had been issued." (Zhukov, Inoy 430-1; emphasis added; Tayny 38)

85. The Bolshevik Party was in severe crisis, and it was impossible to expect that events would unroll smoothly. It was the worst possible atmosphere during which to prepare for the adoption of democratic — secret, universal and contested — elections. Stalin's plan to reform the Soviet government and the role within it of the Bolshevik Party was doomed.

86. At the end of the Plenum Robert Eikhe, First Secretary of the West Siberian Krai (region of the Russian republic) met privately with Stalin. Then several other First Secretaries met with him. They probably demanded the awful powers that they were granted shortly afterward: the authority to form "troikas," or groups of three officials, to combat widespread conspiracies against the Soviet government in their area.¹⁸ These troikas were given the power of execution without appeal. Numerical limits for those to be shot and others to be imprisoned on the sole power of these troikas were demanded and given. When those were exhausted, the First Secretaries asked for, and received, higher limits. Zhukov thinks that Eikhe may have been acting on behalf of an informal group of First Secretaries. (Getty, "Excesses" 129; Zhukov, Inoy 435)

¹⁸ The order for setting up a "troika" in Eikhe's Western Siberian region exists. Eikhe's request has not been found, but he must have made such a request, either in writing or orally. See Zhukov, "Repressii" 23, n. 60; Getty, "Excesses" 127, n. 64.

87. Who were the targets of these draconian trials-by-troika? Zhukov believes they must have been the lishentsy, the very people whose citizenship rights, including franchise, had recently been restored and whose votes potentially posed the greatest danger to the First Secretaries' continuance in power. Zhukov largely discounts the existence of real conspiracies. But archival documents recently published in Russia make it clear that, at the very least, the central leadership was constantly receiving very credible police accounts of conspiracies, including transcripts of confessions. Certainly, Stalin and others in Moscow believed these conspiracies existed. My guess at this point, pace Zhukov, is that some, at least, of the conspiracies alleged actually existed, and that the First

Secretaries believed in them. (Zhukov, KP Nov. 13 02; Inoy, Ch. 18; "Repressii" 23; Lubyanka B)

88. A further hypothesis is that anyone who was currently, or had ever been, involved in any kind of opposition movement was likely to be viewed as an "enemy," and subject to arrest and interrogation by the NKVD, one of whose members always made up part of the troika. Another group were those who openly expressed distrust or hatred towards the Soviet system as a whole. Thurston cites evidence that such people were often arrested immediately. However, those who simply expressed criticisms of local Party leaders, especially at criticism meetings called for this purpose, were not arrested, while those whom they criticized, including Party leaders, sometimes were. (Thurston, 94-5)

89. Contrary, then, to those who argue that the conspiracies were phantoms of Stalin's paranoid mind — or worse still, lies concocted to strengthen Stalin's megalomaniac hold on power — there is a lot of evidence that real conspiracies existed. Accounts of conspirators who were later able to get out of the USSR agree. The sheer volume of police documentation concerning such conspiracies, only a little of which has yet been published, argues strongly against any notion that all of it could have been fabricated. Furthermore, Stalin's annotations on these documents make it clear that he believed they were accurate. (Getty, "Excesses" 131-4; Lubyanka B)

90. Getty summarizes the hopeless contradiction in this way:

"Stalin was not yet willing to retreat from contested elections, and on 2 July 1937 Pravda no doubt disappointed the regional secretaries by publishing the first installment of the new electoral rules, enacting and enforcing contested, universal, secret ballot elections. But Stalin offered a compromise. The very same day the electoral law was published, the Politburo approved the launching of a mass operation against precisely the elements the local leaders had complained about, and hours later Stalin sent his telegram to provincial party leaders ordering the kulak operation [vs. the lishentsy — GF]. It is hard to avoid the conclusion that in return for forcing the local party leaders to conduct an election, Stalin chose to help them win it by giving them license to kill or deport hundreds or thousands of 'dangerous elements.'" ("Excesses" 126)

91. Whatever the history of these purges, extra-judicial executions, and deportations, Stalin appears to have believed that they were creating preconditions for contested elections. Yet all this activity really sabotaged any possibility for such elections.

92. The Politburo at first tried to limit the campaign of repression by ordering that it be completed within five days. Something convinced, or compelled, them to permit the NKVD to extend the period for four months — August 5-15 to December 5-15. Was it the large numbers of those arrested? The conviction that the Party faced a widespread set of conspiracies and a huge internal threat? We don't know the details of how, and why, this mass repression unfolded as it did.

93. This was exactly the period during which the electoral campaign was to take place. Even though the Politburo continued preparation for the contested elections, with rules about how voters were to indicate their choices, and how officials should handle runoff elections, local officials actually controlled the repression. They could determine what opposition, if any, to the Party — which meant, in great part, to themselves — would be considered "loyal," and what would lead to repression and imprisonment or death (Getty, "Excesses," passim.; Zhukov, Inoy 435)

94. Primary documents show that Stalin and the central Politburo leadership were convinced that anti-Soviet conspirators were active and had to be dealt with. This is what the regional Party leaders had asserted during the February-March Plenum. At that time the Stalin leadership had minimized this danger and had kept focusing attention back to the Constitution, and the need to prepare for new elections and the replacement of "bureaucratized" and old leadership with new.

95. By the June Plenum, the First Secretaries were in a position to say, in effect: "We told you so. We were right, and you were wrong. Furthermore, we are still right — dangerous conspirators are still active, ready to use the electoral campaign in their attempt to raise revolt against the Soviet government." Was this how it happened? It seems plausible. But we can't be certain.

96. Stalin and the central leadership had no idea how deep these conspiracies extended. They did not know what Nazi Germany or fascist Japan would do. On June 2 Stalin had told the expanded Military Soviet meeting that the Tukhachevsky group had given the Red Army's operational plan to the German General Staff. This meant that the Japanese, who were bound in a military alliance (the "Axis") and an anti-communist political alliance (the "Anti-Comintern Pact" — really, an anti-Soviet pact) with fascist Italy and Nazi Germany, would no doubt have it too.

97. Stalin had told the military leaders that the plotters wanted to make the USSR into "another Spain" — meaning, a Fifth Column within coordinated with an invading fascist army. Given this horrendous danger, the Soviet leadership was determined to react with brutal decisiveness. (Stalin, "Vystuplenie")

98. At the same time much evidence suggests that the central (Stalin) leadership wanted both to restrain the "troika" repressions demanded by the First Secretaries, and to continue to implement the new Constitution's secret and contested elections. From July 5 to 11 most First Secretaries followed Eikhe's lead in sending in precise figures of those whom they wanted to suppress — by execution (category 1) or imprisonment (category 2). Then, suddenly on 12 July, Deputy NKVD Commissar M.P. Frinovsky sent an urgent telegram to all local police agencies: "Do not begin the operation to repress former kulaks. I repeat, do not begin." (Getty, "Excesses" 127-8)

99. Local NKVD chiefs were recalled to Moscow for conferences, after which was issued Order No. 00447. This very long and detailed instruction both expanded the kinds of people subject to repression (basically including priests, those who had previously opposed Soviet power, and criminals), and — usually — lowered the "limits" or numbers requested by the provincial secretaries.¹⁹ All this vacillation suggested disagreements and struggles between the "center" — Stalin and the central Politburo leadership — and the First Secretaries in the provincial areas. Stalin was clearly not in charge. (Order No. 00447; Getty, "Excesses" 126-9).

¹⁹ Getty, Excesses 131-134 discusses some statistics about this. See Order No.00447.

100. The Central Committee Plenum of October 1937 saw the final cancellation of the plan for contested elections. A sample ballot, showing several candidates, had already been drawn up; several of them have survived in various archives.²⁰ Instead, the Soviet elections of December 1937 were implemented on the basis that the Party candidates would run on slates with 20-25% of nonparty candidates — in other words, an "alliance" of sorts, but without a contest. Originally the elections were planned without slates; voting was to be only for individuals — a far more democratic method. Zhukov has managed to locate in the archives the very document that Molotov signed, on October 11 at 6 p.m., canceling contested elections. This represented a huge but inevitable retreat for Stalin and his supporters in the Politburo. (Zhukov, KP 19 Nov. 02; Zhukov, Tayny. 41; Inoy 443)

²⁰ The sample ballot is reproduced in Zhukov; Inoy, 6th illustration.

101. It was also at the October C.C. Plenum that the first protest against the mass repressions was uttered by Kursk First Secretary Peskarov:

"They [the NKVD? The troika? — GF] condemned people for petty stuff... illegally, and when we... put the question to the C.C., comrades Stalin and Molotov strongly supported us and sent a brigade of workers from the Supreme Court and Prosecutor's office to review these cases... And it turned out that for three weeks' work of this brigade, 56% of the sentences in 16 raiony were set aside by the brigade as illegal. What's more, in 45% of the sentences there was no evidence that a crime had been committed." (Zhukov, Tayny, 43; emphasis added)

102. At the January 1938 Plenum, Malenkov delivered a blistering criticism of the huge numbers of Party members expelled and citizens sentenced, often without even submitting a list of names, but only of the numbers sentenced! Postyshev, First Secretary of Kuybyshev, was removed as candidate member of the Politburo for insisting that there was "scarcely a single honest man" among all the Party officials.

103. It seems that the NKVD was out of control, at least in many local areas. No doubt the First Secretaries were too. (Zhukov, KP 19 Nov. 02; Tayny, pp. 47-51; Thurston 101-2; 112) However, the Politburo leadership was still concerned that there were real conspirators that had to be dealt with. The full extent of NKVD abuses was not recognized. As Zhukov notes, Malenkov's report, blaming careerists within the Party for massive expulsions and arrests, was followed by Kaganovich and Zhdanov, who stressed the struggle against enemies and gave only slight attention to "naiveté and ignorance" in the work of "honest Bolsheviks."

104. Pravda, under the direct control of the Stalin leadership, was still calling for removing the Party from direct control over economic affairs and for the need to promote non-party people into leading roles. (Zhukov, Tayny 51-2) Meanwhile Nikita Khrushchev, who had in 1937 called for power to execute 20,000 unnamed people when Party head in Moscow, was transferred to the Ukraine from where, within a month, he asked for authority to repress 30,000 people. (Zhukov, Tayny 64, and see n. 23 below)

105. Nikolai Yezhov, who had taken over the NKVD from Genrikh Yagoda in 1936, seems to have been in close alliance with the First Secretaries.²¹ The mass repression of 1937-38 has become so associated with his name that it is still called the "Yezhovshchina." Yezhov was talked into resigning on September 23, 1938²² and in November 1938 was succeeded by Lavrenty Beria.

²¹ As late as February 1, 1956, less than four weeks before his "Secret Speech" to the XX Party Congress, Khrushchev was still referring to Yezhov as "undoubtedly not to blame, an honest man." Reabilitatsia: Kak Eto Bylo. Mart 1953-Febral' 1956 (Moscow, 2000), p. 308.

²² His resignation was not formally accepted until November 25, 1938; see Lubyanka B Nos. 344 and 364.

106. Under Beria, many of the NKVD officers and First Secretaries responsible for thousands of executions and deportations were tried and often executed themselves for executing innocent people and using torture against those arrested. Transcripts of the trials of some of these policemen who used torture have been published. Many people convicted and either imprisoned, deported, or sent to the camps were freed. Beria reportedly said later that he had been called on to "liquidate the Yezhovshchina." Stalin told aircraft designer Yakovlev that Yezhov had been executed for killing many innocent people. (Lubianka B, Nos. 344; 363; 375; Mukhin, Ubiystvo 637; Yakovlev)

107. Incalculable damage had been done to Soviet society, the Soviet government, and the Bolshevik Party. This, of course, has been long known. What has not been understood until now is that the setting up of the troikas, and large quotas for executions and deportations, was initiated at the insistence of the First Secretaries, not of Stalin. Zhukov believes that the close connection between this and the threat of secret, contested elections, and the fact that the Central Committee succeeded in forcing the Stalin leadership to cancel contested elections, suggests that getting rid of the "threat" of contested elections may have been a major reason for the mass arrests and executions of the "Yezhovshchina."²³ (Zhukov, KP)

²³ Khrushchev requested "to execute 20,000 people", Zhukov, KP 3 Dec. 02. Yakovlev's criticism of Khrushchev's massive expulsions is quoted above. Eikhe was arrested in October 1938, tried, convicted, and executed in February 1940. According to Khrushchev, Eikhe repudiated his confession, saying he had given it after being beaten (i.e. tortured). Zhukov's analysis suggests that the real reason for Eikhe's fate may have been his leading role in the mass executions of 1937-38. See Jansen and Petrov, 91-2. The Politburo and January 1938 Plenum began to attack party secretaries who victimized rank-and-file members (Getty, Origins 187-8). The full record of Eikhe's investigation and trial is still classified. A desire to deflect attention and blame away from himself and his fellow First Secretaries of the time is one of the bases of Khrushchev's lies in his "secret speech."

108. Nothing can absolve Stalin and his supporters of a large measure of responsibility for the executions — evidently, several hundred thousand²⁴ — that ensued. If these people had been imprisoned rather than executed, almost all would have lived. Many would have had their cases reviewed and been released. For our purposes here, however, the key question is: Why did Stalin give in to the First Secretaries' demands that they be given the life-and-death "troika" powers? Though there are no excuses, there were certainly reasons.

²⁴ Getty ("Excesses" 132) cites evidence that 236,000 executions were authorized by "Moscow," meaning the Stalin leadership, but that over 160% of that number, or 387,000 people, were in fact executed by local authorities.

109. No government can ever be prepared against simultaneous treason by the highest-ranking military commanders, high-ranking figures in both the national and important regional governments, and the head of the secret and border police.

110. A serious set of conspiracies, involving both current and former high-level party leaders who had ties all over the vast country, had just been uncovered. Most ominous was the involvement of military figures at the very highest levels, with the disclosure of secret military plans to the fascist enemy. The military conspirators had had contacts all over the USSR. The conspiracy also involved the very highest levels of the NKVD, including Genrikh Yagoda, who had headed it from 1934 till 1936 and had been second-in-command for some years before 1934. It simply could not be known how widespread the conspiracy was, and how many people were involved. The prudent course was to suspect the worst.²⁵

²⁵ At the 1938 Moscow Trial Yagoda confessed to involvement in the plot for a coup d'État against the Soviet government, to the murders of Maxim Gorky and his son, and other heinous crimes, but vigorously rejected the prosecution's accusation that he was guilty of espionage. The fact that the charge of espionage was still raised over a year after Yagoda had been arrested shows, at least, that the Soviet government thought he might have given such information to a foreign enemy (Germany, Japan, Poland). As the head of the Ministry of the Interior, including the secret police and border police, Yagoda would have been able to do incalculable harm to Soviet security if he had given information to foreign governments.

111. The Politburo and Stalin himself were at the apex of two large hierarchies, of both the Bolshevik Party and the Soviet government. What they knew about the state of affairs in the country reflected what their subordinates told them. Over the course of the next twelve months they repressed many of the First Secretaries, over half of whom were arrested.

For the most part, the precise charges against most of these men, and the dossiers of their interrogations and trials, have yet to be declassified, even in post-Soviet, anti-communist Russia. But we now have enough of the investigative evidence that reached Stalin and the Politburo to get some idea of the alarming situation they faced. (Lubianka B)

112. The Bolshevik Party was set up in a democratic centralist fashion. Despite his status and popularity in the country, Stalin (like any Party leader) could be voted out by a majority of the Central Committee. He was in no position to ignore urgent appeals by a large number of C.C. members.

113. To illustrate Stalin's inability to stop the First Secretaries from flouting the principles of democratic election Zhukov quotes one incident from the still unpublished transcript of the October 1937 C.C. Plenum.

"I.A. Kravtsov, First Secretary of the Krasnodar kraikom [regional committee — GF] was the only one to acknowledge, and in detail, what his colleagues had been doing on the sly for some weeks already. He outlined the selection of only those candidates for deputy to the Supreme Soviet of the USSR who suited the interests of the 'broad leadership'. "We put forth our candidates to the Supreme Soviet," Kravtsov stated frankly. "Who are these comrades? Eight are members of the Party; two are non-Party members or members of the Komsomol [Communist Youth Organization]. That way we held to the per centage of non-Party members indicated in the draft decision of the CC. By occupation these comrades are divided in this way: four Party employees, two Soviet employees, one kolkhoz chairman, one combine driver, one tractor driver, one oil worker..."

Stalin: Who else, aside from the combine drivers?

Kravtsov: Among the ten is Yakovlev, the First Secretary of the kraikom, [and] the chairman of the krai executive committee.

Stalin: Who advised you to do this?

Kravtsov: I must say, comrade Stalin, that they advised me here, in the CC apparatus.

Stalin: Who?

Kravtsov: We in the C.C. assigned our krai executive committee chairman, comrade Simochkin, and he got the approval in the C.C. apparatus.

Stalin: Who?

Kravtsov: I can't say, I don't know.

Stalin: A pity that you don't say, you were told wrong." (Zhukov, Inoy 486-7)

114. Evidently all the First Secretaries were doing what only Kravtsov openly stated — ignoring the principle of secret Soviet elections, a principle they themselves had voted for at previous Plenums, but clearly never agreed to. This marks Stalin's final defeat on this issue, the Constitutional and electoral system reforms he and his central leadership had been championing for over two years.

115. Democratic reform was defeated. The old political system remained in place. Stalin's plan for contested elections was gone for good. "Thus the attempt of Stalin and his group to reform the political system of the Soviet Union ended in total failure." (Zhukov, Inoy 491)

116. Zhukov believes that, if Stalin had refused the appeals of the First Secretaries for the extraordinary "troika" powers, he — Stalin — would have most likely been voted out, arrested as a counter-revolutionary and executed. "... [T]oday Stalin might be numbered among the victims of the repression of 1937 and 'Memorial' and the commission of A.N. Yakovlev would have long since been petitioning for his rehabilitation." (Zhukov, KP 16 Nov. 02)

117. In November 1938 Lavrenty Beria effectively replaced Yezhov as head of the NKVD. The "troikas" were abolished. Extra-judicial executions stopped, and those responsible for many of the terrible excesses were themselves tried and executed or imprisoned.²⁶ But war was approaching. The French government refused to continue even the very weak version of the Franco-Soviet alliance they had agreed to (the Soviet Union wanted a much stronger one). The Allies yielded Czechoslovakia to Hitler and the Polish fascists piecemeal, without a struggle. Nazi Germany had a military alliance with fascist Poland aimed at an invasion of the USSR. The Spanish Civil War, which the Soviets had done so much to support, was lost. Italy invaded Ethiopia, and the League of Nations did nothing. France and Britain were clearly encouraging Hitler, with most of Eastern Europe behind him, to invade the USSR. (Lubianka B, No. 365; Leibowitz)

²⁶ Thurston has the best discussion in English of this in Life and Terror 128 ff.

118. Japan, Italy and Germany had a mutual defense treaty and an "Anti-Comintern" pact, both directed expressly against the USSR. All the European border countries — Poland, Rumania, Bulgaria, Hungary, Finland, Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania — were fascist-style military dictatorships. A 1938 Japanese attack at Lake Khasan cost the Red Army about 1,000 dead. The next year a far more serious Japanese assault was repelled by the Red Army at Khalkin-Gol. Soviet casualties were about 17,000, including almost 5,500 killed — no small war. As it turned out, this war was decisive, and the Japanese never messed with the Soviets again. But the Soviet government could not know this in advance. (Rossiia I SSSR v Voynakh)

119. After 1938 the Stalin government did not try again to implement the democratic electoral system of the 1936 Constitution. Did this failure reflect a continued stalemate between the Stalin leadership and the First Secretaries on the Central Committee? Or an estimate that, with war rapidly approaching, further efforts towards democracy would have to await more peaceful times? The evidence available so far does not permit a firm conclusion.

120. However, once Beria had replaced Yezhov as head of the NKVD (formally, in December 1938; in practice, perhaps a few weeks earlier) a continuous stream of rehabilitations took place. Beria liberated over 100,000 prisoners from camps and prisons. Trials followed of NKVD men accused of torture and extra-judicial executions. (Thurston 128-9)

Part Two

"Famous People of the Land of Soviets" by Vasilii Efanov

During the War

1. Toward the end of the Second World War, Stalin and his supporters on the Politburo made one more attempt to get the Bolshevik Party out of direct control over the Soviet government. Here is how Yuri Zhukov describes this incident:

"In January 1944 ... for the first time during the war there was a joint convocation of both the [Central Committee] Plenum and a session of the Supreme Soviet of the USSR. Molotov and Malenkov prepared a draft of a Central Committee decree according to which the Party would be legally distanced from power. It would retain only agitation and propaganda; no one would deprive it of these normal party matters, and participation in the selection of cadres, which was also completely natural. But it simply forbade the Party from interfering in economics and the working of the organs of the state. Stalin read the draft, changed six words in it, and wrote "Agreed" on it. What happened next remains a mystery... This was a new attempt to lead the Party into the State stable, retaining for it only those functions it really fulfilled during the war. The draft has five signatures: Molotov, Malenkov, Stalin, Khrushchev, Andreev. There was no stenographic record, and we can only guess how others voted. Alas, even the all-powerful State Committee for Defense, with all four members in the Politburo of the Central Committee, could not shatter the old order of things. This proves yet one more time that Stalin never had the power that both anti-Stalinists and Stalinists attribute to him." (Zhukov, Kul'tovaia; emphasis added)²⁷

²⁷ Full text of the resolution is in Zhukov, Stalin. See also Zhukov's earlier treatment in Tayny 270-276, where the text is also reproduced.

2. We do not know how this "distancing" of the Party from economics and the state was to have been effected. Presumably, though, some other method of staffing the state organs would have been envisaged. Would this have meant a return to elections as specified in the 1936 Constitution?

3. Whatever the answers to these questions, it seems likely that the Central Committee, made up largely of Party First Secretaries, once again rebuffed the Stalin leadership's plans for fundamental change in the Soviet system. In his "Secret Speech", Khrushchev denied that any such Plenum had taken place at all! Since most of the C.C. members in the audience had to have known this was a lie, it may be that the purpose of this lie was to tacitly signal them that this dangerous move against their power was now formally "buried."

After the War

4. As we've seen, Stalin believed an important problem for both the USSR and the Bolshevik Party was the situation of "dual power." The Party, not the government, really ruled society. Increasingly, the Party officials exercised control by oversight, or supervision, rather than as managers of production.

5. Getting the party out of direct control of the state would serve a number of purposes:

- It would institute the 1936 Constitution and strengthen the ties of the Soviet population to the Soviet state.
- It would return the running of state institutions to those who were really qualified.
- It would save the Party from degenerating — in its upper levels — into a caste of parasitical and corrupt careerists.

6. Until the war, the Politburo had met at least twice a week. In May 1941 Stalin became the official head of the Soviet state, replacing Molotov as Chairman of the Council of People's Commissars, or Sovnarkom, the official executive body of the government of the USSR.

7. But during the war the USSR was, in reality, run neither by this body nor by the Party, but by the State Committee for Defense composed of Stalin and three of his closest associates. During the war the Central Committee held only one Plenum, while not only during the war, but also after it, the Politburo met rarely. According to Pyzhikov, "the Politburo, for all practical purposes, did not function." Soviet dissident Zhores Medvedev believes that the Politburo met only 6 times in 1950, 5 times in 1951, and 4 times in 1952.²⁸ That is, Stalin took the Politburo out of the running of the state (Pyzhikov, 100; Medvedev, Sekretnyi).

²⁸ Another reading of the archives suggests the numbers might be 6, 6 and 5. See Khlevniuk O., et al. eds, Politburo TsK VKP(b) i Sovet Ministrov SSSR 1945-1953. Moscow: ROSSPEN, 2002, 428-431.

8. Stalin seems to have neglected his role as head of the Party. CC Plenums became rare. No Party Congress was held for the thirteen years between 1939 and 1952. After the war Stalin signed joint decisions of the Party and government simply as Chairman of the Council of Ministers (the renamed Council of Peoples' Commissars), leaving one of the other Party secretaries, Zhdanov or Malenkov, to sign on behalf of the Party (Pyzhikov 100)

9. The Party's authority remained high. But perhaps this was so only because Stalin was still General Secretary of the Party. He was the only Allied leader to remain in office after the war: Roosevelt had died, and Churchill was voted out of office in 1945. It is no exaggeration to say that, among working people, Stalin was the most famous, and most respected, person in the world. The communist movement he headed was the hope of hundreds of millions of people. It had expanded tremendously as a result of the victory over fascism. Stalin's great prestige as head of state gave authority to the Party apparatus (Mukhin, Ubiystvo 622; Ch. 13 passim).

10. Stalin's actions suggest that he was still trying to remove the Party from direct rule over the state. However, if this was so he went about it cautiously. Perhaps we can infer some reasons for this caution:

- Showing an unwarranted lack of trust in the Party would be a bad example to the other countries of the world, where the Communist Parties had not seized power yet.
- The Central Committee and nomenklatura would oppose it, as they had before the war. Therefore, this would have to be done quietly, with as little disruption as possible. (Mukhin, Ubyistvo 611)

The 1947 Draft of the Party Program

11. There is probably more to the Stalin leadership's plans for democratization than we know about today. Aleksandr Pyzhikov, a very anti-communist and anti-Stalin historian, has quoted tantalizing selections of a 1947 draft of a Party program to promote further democracy and egalitarianism in the USSR. This fascinating and hitherto utterly unknown plan has never been published and is, evidently, not yet available to other researchers.

12. Here is the section quoted verbatim by Pyzhikov:

"The development of socialist democracy on the basis of the completion of the construction of a classless socialist society will increasingly convert the dictatorship of the proletariat into the dictatorship of the Soviet people. As each member of the whole population is gradually drawn into the day to day management of state affairs, the growth of the population's communist consciousness and culture, and the development of socialist democracy will lead to the progressive dying out of forms of compulsion in the dictatorship of the Soviet people, and to a progressive replacement of measures of compulsion by the influence of public opinion, to a progressive narrowing of the political functions of the state, and to the conversion of the state into, in the main, an organ of the management of the economic life of society."

Pyzhikov summarizes other sections of this unpublished document as follows:

"In particular [the draft] concerned the development of the democratization of the Soviet order. This plan recognized as essential a universal process of drawing workers into the running of the state, into daily active state and social activity on the basis of a steady development of the cultural level of the masses and a maximal simplification of the functions of state management. It proposed in practice to proceed to the unification of productive work with participation in the management of state affairs, with the transition to the successive carrying out of the functions of [state] management by all working people. It also expatiated upon the idea of the introduction of direct legislative activity by the people, for which the following were considered essential:

a) to implement universal voting and decision-making on the majority of the most important questions of governmental life in both the social and economic spheres, as well as in questions of living conditions and cultural development;

b) to widely develop legislative initiative from below, by means of granting to social organizations the rights to submit to the Supreme Soviet proposals for new legislation;

c) to confirm the right of citizens and social organizations to directly submit proposals to the Supreme Soviet on the most important questions of international and internal policy.

Nor was the principle of election of managers ignored. The plan of the Party program raised the issue of the realization, according to the degree of development towards communism, of the selection of all responsible members of the state apparatus by election, of changes in the functioning of a series of state organs in the direction of converting them increasingly into institutions in charge of accounting and supervision of the economy as a whole. For this the maximum possible development of independent voluntary organizations was seen as important. Attention was paid to the strengthening of the significance of social opinion in the realization of the communist transformation of the population's consciousness, of the development, on the basis of socialist democracy among the broad popular masses, of 'socialist citizenship,' 'the heroism of work,' and 'valor of the Red Army.'" [emphasis added, GF]

13. Again according to Pyzhikov, Zhdanov reported on the work of the planning commission at the February 1947 Central Committee Plenum. He proposed convening the 19th Party Congress at the end of 1947 or 1948. He also set forth a plan for a simplified order of convocations of party conferences once a year, with "compulsory renewal" of not less than one-sixth of the membership of the Central Committee per year. If put into effect, and if "renewal" actually resulted in more turnover of C.C. members, this would have meant that First Secretaries and other Party leaders in the C.C. would have been less entrenched in their positions, making room for new blood in the Party's leading body, facilitating rank-and-file criticism of Party leaders (Pyzhikov 96).

14. This bold plan echoes many of the ideas of the "withering away of the state" envisaged in Lenin's seminal work The State and Revolution, which in its turn develops ideas Lenin found in Marx and Engels. In proposing direct democratic participation in all vital state decisions by the Soviet people and their popular organizations, and "renewal" — with at least the possibility of replacement — of no less than 1/6 of the Central Committee every year through a Party Conference, this Party plan envisaged the development of democracy from below in both the state and in the Party itself.

15. But this plan came to nothing. As with the previous proposals for democratization of the Soviet state and Party outlined previously, we don't know the details of how this happened. Probably it was rejected at the Central Committee Plenum. The 19th Party Congress was postponed until 1952. Again, we do not know why. The nature of the draft Party plan suggests that opposition from the Central Committee — the First Secretaries — may have been responsible.²⁹

²⁹ Pyzhikov attributes this democratic strain to Leningraders, especially to Voznesensky. (See also his article "N.A. Voznesenski" at <http://www.akdi.ru/id/new/ek5.htm>). This would imply Zhdanov's support for it too, although Zhdanov's sponsorship would not "fit" Pyzhikov's theory about the most pro-capitalist forces — Voznesenskii and his fellow "Leningraders" — being the most "democratic." Nor, since the "Leningraders" remained strong through 1947, does it explain why the draft was not adopted. Nor does it indicate, much less prove, any necessary connection between the pro-capitalist and "consumer-goods" orientation Voznesensky was famous for, and political democracy. Finally, it certainly does not indicate that Stalin did not support it.

The Nineteenth Party Congress

16. It appears that the Stalin leadership made one last effort at separating the Party from direct control over the State at the 19th Party Congress in 1952 and the Central Committee Plenum immediately following it. Beginning with Khrushchev, the Party nomenklatura tried to destroy any memory of this Congress and moved immediately to eradicate what was done at it. Under Brezhnev, the transcripts of all the Party Congresses up through the 18th were published. That of the 19th Congress has never been published to this day. Stalin gave only a short speech at the Congress — which was published. But he gave a 90-minute speech at the Central Committee Plenum that followed it immediately. That speech has never been published, except for very short extracts, and neither has the transcript of this Plenum.³⁰

³⁰ According to Zhores Medvedev, Stalin's personal archive was destroyed immediately after his death (Medvedev, Sekretnyi). If so, it's reasonable to assume, as Mukhin does (Ubiystvo 612) that some of his ideas must have been thought very dangerous, and among them, the ideas expressed at these two meetings. My analysis here and below mainly follows Mukhin, Ch. 13 and Medvedev, op. cit.

17. Stalin called the Congress to change the status of the Party and its organizational structure. Among those changes:

- The Party's name was officially changed from "All-Union Communist Party (Bolshevik) to "Communist Party of the Soviet Union." This mirrored the names of most other communist parties in the world, tying the Party to the state.³¹
- A "Presidium" replaced the Politburo of the Central Committee. This name denoted the representatives of another representative organ (the C.C.) — like, for example, the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet. It also got the "political" out of the name — after all, the whole Party was political, not just the leading body.

³¹ It was surely meant as a unifying measure. Each of the constituent Republics in the USSR retained its own Party: the Communist Party of the Ukraine, of Georgia, etc. This had led some Party leaders to think that Russia, the largest of the Republics but the one that had no Party "of its own," was at a disadvantage. Apparently one of the most serious charges against the Party leaders tried and executed in the postwar "Leningrad Affair" was that they were planning to set up a Russian Party and moving the capital of the Russian Republic (not the USSR itself) to Leningrad. Arguably this might have made Russia even more powerful and exacerbated Great Russian chauvinism, when what was needed was to cement the various Soviet nationalities closer together. See David Brandenberger, "Stalin, the Leningrad Affair, and the Limits of Postwar Russocentrism," Russian Review 63 (2004), 241-255.

18. No doubt it also better suggested a body that rules the Party only, not party and state. The Politburo had been a body of mixed membership. It had included the Chairman of the Council of Ministers (the head of the executive body of the state — that is, head of state); the Chairman of the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet (head of the legislative body); the General Secretary of the Party (Stalin); one or two more Party secretaries; and one or two government ministers. Decisions of the Politburo were effective for both government and party.

19. Therefore, in comparison to the Politburo's virtually supreme position in the country, the role of the Presidium was greatly reduced. Since the head of state and head of the Supreme Soviet did not have reserved seats in it, the Presidium was to be the leading body of the Communist Party only.

20. Other changes were made:

- The post of General Secretary — Stalin's own post — was abolished. Now Stalin was only one of 10 Party secretaries,³² all of whom were in the new Presidium, which now contained 25 members and 11 candidate-members. This was much larger than 9-11 members of the former Politburo. Its large size would make it more of a deliberative, interim body, rather than one in which many executive decisions could be routinely and swiftly made.
- Most of these Presidium members seem to have been government officials, not top Party leaders. Khrushchev and Malenkov later wondered how Stalin could even have heard of the people whom he suggested for the first Presidium, since they were not well-known Party leaders (i.e. not First Secretaries). Presumably, Stalin nominated them because of their positions in the State — as opposed to the Party — leadership.³³

³² The post of "First Secretary" was only created after Stalin's death, for Khrushchev.

³³ Cited in Mukhin, Ubiystvo 617.

21. Stalin followed up his resignation as General Secretary of the Party, which took place at the 19th Congress, with his proposal, at the CC Plenum right after it, to resign from the Central Committee altogether, remaining only as Head of State (Chairman of the Council of Ministers).

22. If Stalin were not in the Central Committee, but were only Head of State, government officials would no longer feel they had to report to the Presidium, the Party's highest body. Stalin's act would remove authority from the Party's officials, whose "oversight" role in the State was unnecessary, in terms of production. Without Stalin as the head of the Party the Party leadership, the nomenklatura, would have less prestige. Rank-and-file Party members would no longer feel compelled to "elect" — that is, to merely confirm — the candidates recommended by the First Secretaries and the Central Committee.

23. Viewed in this light, Stalin's resignation from the Central Committee might be a disaster for the nomenklatura. They might have felt that they were protected from merciless criticism by rank-and-file communists only by "Stalin's shadow." It would mean that, in future, only intelligent and capable people would survive in the Party nomenklatura, as in the State apparatus (Mukhin, Ubiystvo 618-23).

24. The lack of a published transcript suggests that things occurred at this Plenum, and Stalin said things in his speech, that the nomenklatura did not wish to make public. It also indicates — and it's important to stress this — that Stalin was not "all-powerful. For example, Stalin's serious criticism of Molotov and Mikoian at this Plenum was not published till long after his death.³⁴

³⁴ The earliest publication I have found is in the leftwing newspaper Sovetskaia Rossiia of January 13, 2000, at <http://www.kprf.ru/analytics/10828.shtml>; in English, at <http://www.northstarcompass.org/nsc0004/stal1952.htm>.

25. The famous Soviet writer Konstantin Simonov was present as a C.C. member. He recorded Malenkov's shocked and panicked reaction when Stalin proposed a vote on freeing him from the post of secretary of the Central Committee. (Simonov, 244-5) Faced with vociferous opposition, Stalin didn't insist.³⁵

³⁵ Mukhin believes this was a fatal mistake. He argues that it was in the interest of the Party nomenklatura that Stalin die while still both a secretary of the Central Committee (though he was no longer "General Secretary") and Head of State — in other words, while he still united, in one person, head of the Party and head of the whole country. Then his successor as secretary of the C.C. would most likely be accepted by the country and the government as head of state as well. If that happened, the movement to get the Party nomenklatura out of running the country would be at an end (Mukhin, Ubiystvo, 604 & Ch. 13 passim).

26. As soon as they possibly could do so, the Party leadership took steps to annul the decisions of the 19th Party Congress. At its meeting of March 2, with Stalin still alive though unconscious, an abbreviated Presidium — essentially, the old Politburo members — met at Stalin's dacha. There they made the decision to reduce the Presidium back to 10 members, instead of 25. This was, basically, the old Politburo again. The number of Party secretaries was reduced once again to five. Khrushchev was made the "coordinator" of the secretariat, and then, five months later, "first secretary." Finally, in 1966, the name 'Presidium' was changed back to 'Politburo'.

27. During the rest of the history of the USSR, the Party continued to rule Soviet society, its upper ranks becoming a corrupt, self-selected, self-aggrandizing stratum of privileged elitists. Under Gorbachev, this ruling group abolished the USSR, giving itself the economic wealth and political leadership of the new capitalist society. At the same time, it destroyed the savings of, and stole the social benefits from, the Soviet working class and peasants, whose labor had built everything, while it appropriated the immense publicly created wealth of the USSR. This same former nomenklatura continues to run the post-Soviet states today.

Lavrenty Beria³⁶

³⁶ I have drawn on the longer treatments of Beria's reforms, both those effected and those he proposed, in Kokurin and Pozhalov, Starkov, Knight, and Mukhin, Ubiystvo. All the recent books on Beria cited in the Bibliography discuss them as well.

28. Beria is the most calumniated figure in Soviet history. Therefore, the reversal of historical judgment about Beria's career that began abruptly after the end of the Soviet Union has been even more dramatic than the scholarly re-evaluation of Stalin's role that is the main subject of these articles.

29. Beria's "Hundred Days" — really, 112 days, from Stalin's death on March 5, 1953 to Beria's removal on June 26 — witnessed the inception of a large number of dramatic reforms. Had the Soviet leadership permitted these reforms to fully develop, the history of the Soviet Union, the international communist movement, the Cold War — in short, of the last half of the 20th century — would have been dramatically different.

30. Beria's reform initiatives included at least the following, all of which merit, and some of which are now receiving, special study even while the Russian government keeps most vital primary sources about them closed even to trusted researchers:

- The reunification of Germany as a non-socialist, neutralist state, a step that would have been wildly popular among Germans, and one distinctly unwelcome to the NATO allies, including the USA.
- Normalization of relations with Yugoslavia, which promised to pull it back from its tacit alliance with the West towards the Cominform.
- A nationalities policy that opposed "russification" in the recently-annexed areas of Western Ukraine and the Baltic states, together with the goal of reaching out to some, at least, of the nationalist émigré groups. A reformed nationalities policy in other non-Russian areas including Georgia and Belorussia.
- Rehabilitations and compensation for those unjustly convicted by special judicial bodies (troikas and the NKVD "Special Commissions") during the 1930s and 1940s. Under Beria this process would have been done very differently from the way it was later carried out under Khrushchev, who "rehabilitated" many who were unquestionably guilty.

31. Some of Beria's other reforms were largely carried out, including

- Amnesty for a million of those imprisoned for crimes against the state.
- An end to the investigation of the "Doctors' Plot" together with admission that the accusations had been unjust and punishment of the NKVD officials involved, including the removal of Kruglov, former NKVD head, from the Central Committee altogether.³⁷
- Curbing the authority of the "Special Commission" of the NKVD to sentence people to death or long prison terms.
- In a move not only against the Stalin "cult" but against "cults" of leaders generally, forbidding the display of portraits of leaders at holiday rallies. This was rescinded by the Party leadership shortly after Beria's removal.

³⁷ In his "Secret Speech" Khrushchev also denounced the "Doctors' Plot" as a frameup. But he had the effrontery to put the blame on — Beria, who had in fact liquidated the investigation, while praising Kruglov, the NKVD head in charge of this frameup, whom Khrushchev restored to C.C. membership and who was seated in the audience as Khrushchev spoke.

Beria's Moves towards Democratic Reform

32. Officially, Beria was arrested by his fellow Politburo members plus some generals on June 26, 1953. But the details of this supposed arrest are murky, and contradictory versions exist.³⁸ In any event, during the July 1953 CC Plenum devoted to accusing Beria of various crimes, Mikoyan said:

"When he [Beria] made his presentation on Red Square over the grave of Comrade Stalin, after his speech I said: 'In your speech there is a place in which you guarantee each citizen the rights and freedoms foreseen in the Constitution. Even in the speech of a simple orator that is no empty phrase, and in the speech of a minister of internal affairs — that is a program of action, you must fulfill it.' He answered me: 'And I will fulfill it.'" (Beria 308-9; Mukhin 178)

³⁸ There is much evidence to suggest that Beria was in fact murdered on the day of his arrest. His son Sergo Beria, in his own memoirs, states he was told by officials at the "trial" that his father was not present. Mukhin says that Baybakov, the last living C.C. member from 1953, told him Beria was already dead at the time of the July 1953 Plenum, but the members did not know it at the time (Sergo Beria; Mukhin, Ubiystvo 375). Amy Knight, p. 220, reports that Khrushchev himself twice stated Beria had been killed on June 26, 1953, but later changed his story. Meanwhile, the Beria trial documents are said to have been "stolen" from their archive, so even their existence cannot be verified (Khinshtein 2003). However, some researchers, like Andrei Sukhomlinov (pp. 61-2), continue to find the evidence for Beria's murder unconvincing.

33. Beria had said something that had alarmed Mikoyan. Apparently, it was the fact that, at this crucial place in his Red Square speech and with reference to the Constitution, Beria omitted any reference to the Communist Party, and spoke only about the Soviet government. Beria spoke second after Malenkov, a public sign that he was now the second-ranking person in the Soviet state. He had said:

"The workers, the kolkhoz peasants, the intelligentsia of our country can work peacefully and with confidence, knowing that the Soviet Government will diligently and untiringly guarantee their rights as written in the Stalin Constitution... And henceforth the foreign policy of the Soviet Government will be that of the Leninist-Stalinist policy of the retention and strengthening of peace..." (Beria, Speech).

34. Mukhin suggests the following plausible understanding of this passage:

"The simple people hardly understood the meaning of what Beria said, but for the Party nomenklatura this was a sharp blow. Beria intended to lead the country ahead without the Party, i.e. without them; he promised the people to guard their rights, which were not given them by the Party, but by some Constitution!" (Mukhin, 179)

35. At this same June 1953 Plenum, Khrushchev said:

"Remember, then Rakosi [Hungarian Communist leader] said: "I'd like to know what is decided in the Council of Ministers and what in the Central Committee, what kind of division there should be..." Beria then carelessly said: "What Central Committee? Let the Council of Ministers decide, and let the Central Committee concern itself with cadre and propaganda." (Beria 91)

36. Later at this same Plenum, Lazar Kaganovich expanded on Khrushchev's point:

"The Party for us is the highest thing. No one is permitted to speak as that scoundrel [Beria] said: "The Central Committee [for] cadres and propaganda, not political leadership, not the leadership of all life as we, Bolsheviks, understand it."" (Beria 138)

37. These men seem to have believed that Beria intended to get the Party out of the process of directly running the country. This was very similar to what Stalin and his associates had struggled for during the Constitutional discussions of 1935-37. One can discern it again in the 1947 draft Party program and in Stalin's restructuring of the Bolshevik Party during the 19th Party Congress and succeeding Central Committee Plenum only a few months before.

38. Beria's son Sergo asserts that his father and Stalin agreed about the need to get the Party out of direct management of Soviet society.

"My father's relations with the Party organs were complicated... [H]e never hid his relations with the Party apparatus. For example, he told Khrushchev and Malenkov directly that the Party apparatus corrupts people. It was all appropriate for earlier times, when the Soviet state had just been formed. But, my father asked them, who needs these controllers today? He had the same kind of frank talks with directors of industries and factories who, naturally, did not care at all for the do-nothings from the Central Committee. Father was just as frank to Stalin too. Joseph Vissarionovich agreed that the Party apparatus had removed itself from responsibility for concrete matters and had nothing to do but talk. I know that a year before his death, when Stalin presented the new makeup of the Presidium of the Central Committee, he gave a speech in which the main point was that it was necessary to find new forms of running the country, that the old ways were not the best. A serious discussion took place at that time about the Party's activity." (Sergo Beria, Moy Otets Lavrentii Beria)

39. Beria's planned restructuring of the State-Party relationship would have probably been very popular with rank-and-file communists, to say nothing of the majority of non-party Soviet citizens. But to the nomenklatura it was very threatening.

40. Mukhin puts it this way:

"Beria did not hold back in putting into people's minds the idea that the country ought to be ruled, in the center and in the localities, by the Soviets, as the Constitution provided, and the party ought to be an ideological organ that would, through propaganda, guarantee that by its aid the deputies of the Soviets at all levels would be communists. Beria proposed to resurrect the functioning of the Constitution in its full sense, its slogan — "All Power to the Soviets!" While Beria was operating exclusively in the sphere of ideas, this might have been unpleasant for the nomenklatura, but hardly frightening. Since they had power, they would have selected delegates to the Supreme Soviet and instruct them in such a way that Beria's ideas could not be put into effect. But, if Beria did not permit the secretaries and the Central Committee to direct the elections and the session of the Supreme Soviet, then what kind of decisions would the deputies reach?" (Ubiystvo 363-4)

41. Logically this would have seriously alienated Beria from most of the Party nomenklatura. (Ubiystvo 380) Khrushchev led, and represented the interests of, this group or, at the very least, of a large and activist part of it. And Khrushchev had quite a different concept of "democracy." Famous film director Mikhail Romm recorded Khrushchev's words at a meeting with intellectuals: "Of course all of us here have listened to you, spoken with you. But who will decide? In our country the people must decide. And the people — who is that? That is the Party. And who is the Party? That is us. We are the Party. That means that we will decide. I will decide. Understand?" (Alikhanov)

42. As Mukhin puts it: "The Party, as an organization of millions of communists, was at an end. The group of people at its summit became the Party." (Mukhin, Ubiystvo 494)

Deaths of Stalin and Beria... and Others?

43. In addition to the mysterious circumstances of Beria's death there is considerable evidence that Stalin was either left to die on the floor of the office in his dacha after suffering a stroke or, perhaps, even poisoned. We don't have time or space to summarize this question here.

44. However, for our present purposes it is not necessary. The wide circulation and credence given to these stories among Russians of all political camps show that many Russians believe Stalin's and Beria's deaths were all too convenient for the nomenklatura. The evidence that Beria, like

Stalin, wanted a communist perestroika — a "restructuring," albeit of political, not economic, power, instead of the capitalist super-exploitation and fleecing of the country that has gone under that name since the late 1980s — is quite independent of any evidence that they may have been murdered.

45. The immediate result of Stalin's and Beria's failures at democratization was to leave the USSR in the hands of the Party leadership. No workers' democracy came to pass in the Soviet Union. Top Party leaders continued to monopolize all important positions, including those in the state and the economy, and developed into a fully parasitical, exploitative stratum with strong similarities to their counterparts in frankly capitalist countries.

46. In a real sense this stratum is still in power today. Gorbachev, Yeltsin, Putin, and the rest of the leaders of Russia and of the post-Soviet states are all former members of the Party leadership. They long milked the Soviet Union's citizens as super-privileged functionaries. Then, under Gorbachev's leadership, they presided over the privatization of all the collectively-produced property that belonged to the working class of the USSR, impoverishing not only the workers, but the large middle class in the process. This has been called the greatest expropriation in the history of the world.³⁹ The Party nomenklatura destroyed the Soviet Union. (Bivens & Bernstein; O'Meara; Williamson)

³⁹ This term, "the greatest theft in history," is widely used to describe the "privatization" of the collectively-created and, formerly, collectively-owned, state property of the USSR. For a few examples only, see "The Russian Oligarchy: Welcome to the Real World," The Russian Journal March 17 2003, at <<http://www.russiajournal.com/news/cnews-article.shtml?nd=36013>>; Raymond Baker, Centre for International Policy, "A Clear and Present Danger," Australian Broadcasting Corp, 2003, at <<http://www.abc.net.au/4corners/stories/s296563.htm>>.

47. To cover up their own roles in the massive executions of the 1930s, their successes in frustrating Stalin's attempts at democratization, their refusals to implement Stalin's and Beria's reforms — in short, to cover up their refusal to democratize the Soviet Union — Khrushchev and the top party leaders blamed Stalin for everything, lying about the existence of serious conspiracies in the USSR in the 1930s, and covering up their own roles in the mass executions that ensued.

48. Khrushchev's "secret speech" of 1956 was the single greatest blow to the world communist movement in history. It gave encouragement to anti-communists everywhere, who decided that for once here was a communist leader they could believe. Documents released since the end of the USSR make it clear that virtually every accusation Khrushchev leveled at Stalin in this speech was a lie. This realization, in turn, compels us to inquire into Khrushchev's real reasons for attacking Stalin the way he did.⁴⁰ Russian researchers have already shown that the "official" charges against Beria cited by Khrushchev and his cohorts in the Soviet leadership are either false, or wholly lacking in evidence. Beria was judicially murdered for reasons that his murderers never revealed. The "bodyguard of lies" surrounding both of these events compel us to ask: What was really going on? The present essay suggests one answer.

⁴⁰ As of November 2005 I am preparing an article documenting Khrushchev's lies in the "Secret Speech," with publication planned for February 2006, the 50th anniversary of Khrushchev's speech.

Conclusions and Future Research

49. Given that Stalin explicitly ruled out competing political parties in his plan for contested elections, it is fair to ask: How "democratic" would the result have been, if Stalin had had his way? Answers to questions about democracy have to begin with another question: "What do you mean by 'democracy'?"

50. In the industrial capitalist world, it means a system where political parties compete in elections, but in which all the political parties are controlled by elite, extremely wealthy, and highly authoritarian, people and groups. Nor does "democracy" mean that capitalism itself could ever be "voted out" of power. This "democracy" is a form and a technique of capitalist class rule — in short, of "lack of democracy."

51. Could contested elections among citizens and citizen groups, within the limits of acceptance of working-class rule, have worked in the USSR? Could they work in some future socialist society? What is the role of "representative democracy," that is, of elections, in a society that aims at classlessness? Because these provisions of the 1936 Constitution were never put into effect in the USSR, we can never know what the strengths and weaknesses of this proposal would have been. Marx and Engels made important deductions about the nature of proletarian democracy based upon their study of the practice of the Paris Commune. It is a tragedy that we do not have a parallel experience of contested elections in the Soviet Union in Stalin's time. No doubt there would have been both strengths and weaknesses, from which we could have learned much.

52. Scholars motivated by political anti-communism will continue to breathe life into the old and false, but not yet sufficiently discredited, Khrushchev / Cold War "anti-Stalin" paradigm. But the process of re-interpreting the history of the Soviet Union in the light of the flood of formerly secret Soviet documents has long since begun in Russia. It will soon take hold elsewhere. A primary purpose of this essay is to introduce others to this development.

53. One point will strike almost every reader right away. According to the "cult of personality" of adulation that surrounded Stalin, we have been conditioned to think of Stalin as an "all-powerful dictator." This foundational falsehood of the Cold War / Khrushchevite historical paradigm, exploded by the research reported here, has fatally distorted our understanding of Soviet history. In fact, Stalin was never "all-powerful." He was stymied by the combined efforts of other Party leaders. He was never able to attain his goal of constitutional reforms. Nor was he able to control the First Secretaries and the local NKVD.

54. The "cult" disguised these political struggles. Transcripts of Central Committee Plena show that, though at times Bolshevik leaders did directly disagree with Stalin, this occurred rarely. Political disputes could not be brought out into the open and resolved. Instead they were dealt with in other venues. Some of these venues were informal, as evidently in the case of the First Secretaries in July 1937. Some were dealt with by police methods, political disagreement being interpreted as hostile opposition.

55. Whatever the mechanism, the effect of the "cult" was authoritarian, and deeply anti-democratic. Stalin seems to be one of the few Soviet leaders to have understood this to a degree. Throughout his life he condemned the "cult" many times.⁴¹ Clearly, though, he never fully recognized how harmful it would inevitably be.

⁴¹ Roy Medvedev, Let History Judge: The Origins and Consequences of Stalinism, quotes a number of passages in which Stalin does this. See pp. 150, 507, 512, 538, 547 of the 1971 Knopf edition. Still others have come to light since the end of the USSR. For an example, see The Diary of Georgi Dimitrov 1933-1949, ed. & intro. Ivo Banac (New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 2003), 66-67.

56. The conclusions reached here, almost entirely on the basis of others' research, suggest a few important areas for further exploration.

- What form can "democracy" take in a socialist society with a goal of developing towards a classless society? Would the implementation of the 1936 Constitution as envisaged by Stalin have worked, both to democratize the Soviet Union, and to restore the Bolshevik Party to its original role, as an organization of dedicated revolutionaries whose primary job was to lead the country towards communism? Or did this model already incorporate so many aspects of bourgeois capitalist concepts of democracy that it might have hastened, rather than impeded, the evolution of the USSR towards capitalism?
- What is the proper role of a communist party in such a society? What are the specific forms of political leadership that are compatible with democratic empowerment of the working class? What forms of political (and economic) leadership are in contradiction with these goals?

57. Once we question the idea that elections and "representative" government are sufficient to make the state express the interests of the workers and peasants, it follows that the 1936 Constitution, even if implemented, would not have accomplished this either. This might suggest that the "solution" is not to make the state stronger and the Party weaker — as it appears Stalin and Beria thought. Marxists believe that the state will be run by some class or other, so if a new ruling class arises from the top stratum of the Party, or from any other part of society, it will rule, and will change the state to make that rule more effective. This in turn suggests that the Party — State distinction is artificial and deceptive and should be done away with. The term "bureaucratism" / "bureaucracy," while it points to one kind of problem, conceals others. I suggest that the two questions above — democracy and the role of the party — indicate more fruitful, and more materialist, ways of thinking about the problem of the relationship between the organized, politically conscious part of the population of a socialist or communist society, and the less organized and politically conscious, but still economically productive majority. The Bolsheviks generally and Stalin specifically made a big distinction between politics and technical skill or education. But they never dealt adequately with the contradiction between "Red" and "expert," as this dilemma was termed during the Chinese Cultural Revolution. The idea shared by virtually all socialists that political "oversight" or "supervision" could be separated from technical knowledge and production reflected, in part, the mistaken notion that "technique" — science — was politically neutral, and that if done efficiently, economic production itself was politically "left" or "communist." The dilemma of the State — Party contradiction followed from this. What does "inner-party democracy" mean in the context of a communist party? In the USSR, many of the oppositional forces whose views were defeated at the Party Conferences and Congresses of the 1920s developed into conspiracies, ultimately aiming at assassination of the Party leadership, a coup d'état, and collaboration with and espionage for hostile capitalist powers. At the same time, local Party leaders developed dictatorial habits, which alienated them from the Party rank-and-file (and of course from the much more numerous non-communist population as well), while guaranteeing them material privileges.

58. The material benefits of high Party office must have played an important, even a decisive, role in the development of the stratum called the nomenklatura. Likewise, Stalin's evident goal of removing the Party from direct rule and returning it to "agitation and propaganda" might suggest some awareness of this contradiction by Stalin himself, and perhaps by others too. To what extent were large pay differentials essential to stimulate industrialization in the USSR? If they were essential, was it an error to permit Party members access to material privileges — high pay, better housing, special stores, etc.? The political context in which these decisions were made, in the late '20s and early '30s, needs to be more fully explored. The discussions, now unavailable, around ending the "Party Maximum" wage sometime in the early '30s, need to be discovered and studied.

59. Zhukov and Mukhin seem to believe that the tactic they perceive, and attribute to Stalin and Beria — that of getting the party leaders out of the business of running the state — was indeed the best chance of preventing the Party from degenerating. As I suggest above, perhaps the real cause of degeneration is the defense of their own privileges, rather than the "Red vs expert" contradiction in itself.

60. Of course, material incentives had been thought necessary, first, to recruit skilled but bourgeois, anti-communist and anti-working-class intellectuals into helping build the USSR's industrial base. From there it could be argued that higher pay was necessary to encourage technically-skilled people (including skilled workers) to join the Bolshevik Party; or, to work hard under adverse living and working conditions, often at danger to one's health and at the cost of sacrificing one's family life. From there the whole panoply of capitalist-like inequalities could be, and were, justified.

61. Maybe Stalin and Beria believed that returning the Party alone to a "purely political" function could have prevented its degeneration. Since this plan — if it was theirs — was never put into effect, we can't really know. But I suspect that the issue of "material incentives," i.e. economic inequality, is the fundamental one. In conversations with Felix Chuev the aged Molotov mused about the need for more and more "equalization," and worried about the future of socialism in the USSR as he saw inequality increasing. Molotov did not trace the roots of this development back into Stalin's or Lenin's day. In fact Molotov, like Stalin, was unable to look at Lenin's legacy critically, though the need to preserve and expand inequalities in order to stimulate production can be traced at least to Lenin, if not to the Marx of the Critique of the Gotha Program.

62. The questions one asks inevitably reflect and expose one's own political concerns, and mine are no exception. I believe that the history of the Bolshevik Party during Stalin's years — a history obfuscated by anti-communist lies and as yet to be written — has a lot to teach future generations. Political activists who look to the past for guidance, and politically-conscious scholars who believe their greatest contributions towards a better world can be made through study of such struggles in the past, have a great deal to learn from the legacy of the Soviet Union.

63. Like medieval mariners whose maps were more imagination than fact, we have been misled by canonical histories of the USSR that are mainly false. The process of discovering the real history of the world's first socialist experiment has scarcely begun. As any reader of this essay will realize, I believe this is of immense importance for our future.

Additional Notes

Note on Yuri Zhukov's work:

To date there has been one extended scholarly attack on Zhukov's thesis — that by Prof. Irina V. Pavlova, "1937: Vybory kak mistifikatsiia, terror kak real'nost'," Voprosy Istorii 10, 2003 19-36. Pavlova is a strident anti-communist of the "totalitarianism" school whose ideological hostility to communism undermines her historical research. For example, she has lied about Getty's research in order to try to discredit him. Pavlova is writing propaganda, not history.

Pavlova refers only to Zhukov's articles in KP; she wrote it before the publication of Inoy Stalin. Pavlova's criticism relies on the assumption that the Moscow Trials and that of Tukhachevskii et al. were frame-ups, and the whole constitutional and electoral campaigns a deliberate "cover" for this repression.

Pavlova also asserts that, because the Supreme Soviet did not have real political power in 1936, contested elections for it would not have given it any power either. If by "power" Pavlova means the ability to unseat the Bolshevik Party from its dominant position in the USSR and to undo socialism, she is undoubtedly right: surely Stalin had no intention of allowing a counter-revolution through constitutional means. Nor is this permitted in any bourgeois democratic country. But if she means "power" to influence state policies and exert pressure, within limits, on the specific social policies and on the Bolshevik Party itself — that is, the kind of powers determined by elections in bourgeois democracies — then she cannot possibly be right.

Note on Iuri Mukhin, Ubiystvo Stalina i Beriia:

This book of Mukhin's is often dismissed by those unsympathetic to his conclusions on the grounds that he has made remarks that can be construed as anti-semitic. It should be noted that Mukhin makes remarks opposing anti-semitism in this same book. This paper does not draw upon any of the passages in which anti-semitic statements can be alleged.

Mukhin has also taken eccentric positions on some subjects not dealt with in this book. I do not draw upon any of those works either.

The same thing could, and should, be said when anti-communist scholars are cited — the fact of their anti-communist prejudices does not mean that they cannot, on occasion, have some valuable insights. And, of course, anti-communism is normally closely aligned with anti-semitism. Neither a communist nor Jewish, Mukhin shows some hostility to both, but is neither a conventional anti-communist nor a conventional anti-semite.

Mukhin's analysis of primary and secondary sources is often very sharp, and I use, and cite, it where I find it helpful. Naturally, citation of those of Mukhin's analyses that the author thinks are useful does not imply agreement to parts of his analysis which are not cited. Nor is Mukhin responsible for any use I have made of his research. I have checked every reference made by Mukhin and all other scholars cited here, except in the case of primary sources available only to those who work in the archives.

Bibliography

(I have included URLs to online versions of the texts cited whenever I have been able to locate them — GF.)

Alikhanov, Sergei. "Bagazh na brichke." Kontinent. At http://www.kontinent.org/art_view.asp?id=2020.

Beria: Konets Kar'ery. Moscow: Izd. Politicheskoy Literatury, 1991.

Beria, Lavrentii. Speech, at Stalin's funeral. At <http://leader.h1.ru/beria.htm>. Mukhin cites the original published version in Komsomolskaya Pravda, No. 59, 1953, pp. 1-3 (Ubiystvo, 282). I have not been able to see this version, but the passages Mukhin quotes from it are identical to the online version cited here). Cited as "Beria, Speech."

Beria, Sergo. Moy Otets Lavrentii Beria. Orig. ed. Moscow: Sovremennik, 1994. At <http://www.duel.ru/publish/beria/beria.html>.

Bivens, Matt, and Jonas Bernstein. "Part 2: The Russia You Never Met." Johnson's Russia List #3068, 24 February 1999. At <http://www.cdi.org/russia/johnson/3068.html>.

Brandenberger, David. "Stalin, the Leningrad Affair, and the Limits of Postwar Russocentrism," Russian Review 63 (2004), 241-255.

Chilachava, Raul'. Syn Lavrentiia Beria rasskazyvaet Kiev: Inkopress, 1992.

Constitution of 1924: in Russian, <http://www.hist.msu.ru/ER/Etext/cnst1924.htm>. In English: in Rex A. Wade ed., Documents of Soviet History, vol. 3 Lenin's Heirs 1923-1925. Gulf Breeze, FL: Academic International Press, 1995; at <http://users.cyberone.com.au/myers/ussr1924.html> (many scanning errors).

Constitution of 1936: in Russian, <http://www.hist.msu.ru/ER/Etext/cnst1936.htm>. In English, <http://www.departments.bucknell.edu/russian/const/1936toc.html>.

Chuev, Feliks. Molotov. Poluderkhzhavniy Vlastelin. Moscow: OLMA-Press, 2000.

Dimitrov, Georgi. The Diary of Georgi Dimitrov 1933-1949, ed. & intro. Ivo Banac. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 2003.

Dobriukha, Nikolai. "Otsy I otchimy 'ottepeli'." Argumenty I Fakty, June 18 2003. At <http://www.aif.ru/online/air/1182/10_01>.

Dobriukha, Nikolai. "Za Chto Lavrentiy Beria Vyshel iz Doveria." Izvestia Nauka. February 26, 2004. At <<http://www.inauka.ru/history/article38205.html>>.

"Fragmenty stenogramy dekabrskogo plenuma TsK VKP(b) 1936 goda" (Fragments of the Transcript of the December 1936 Plenum of the Central Committee of the All-Union Communist Party (Bolshevik), 1936), in Voprosy Istorii No. 1, 1995, 3-22.

Genrikh IAgoda. Narkom Vnutrennikh Del SSSR. Sbornik dokumentov. Kazan', 1997.

Getty, J. Arch. "'Excesses are not permitted': Mass Terror and Stalinist Governance in the Late 1930s." The Russian Review 61 (January 2002), 113-138.

Getty, J. Arch. Origins of the Great Purges. The Soviet Communist Party Reconsidered, 1933-1938. London & New York: Cambridge Univ. Press, 1985.

Getty, J. Arch. "State and Society Under Stalin: Constitutions and Elections in the 1930s." Slavic Review 50, 1 (Spring 1991), 18-35.

Getty, J. Arch, and Oleg V. Naumov. The Road to Terror: Stalin and the Self-Destruction of the Bolsheviks, 1932-1939. New Haven: Yale U.P., 1999.

Ilizarov, B.C. "Stalin. Shtrikhi k portretu na fone ego biblioteki i arkhiva." Novaia i Noveyshaia Istorii, N. 3-4, 2000. At <<http://vivovoco.nns.ru/VV/PAPERS/ECCE/STALIB.HTM>>.

Jansen, Mark, and Nikita Petrov, Stalin's Loyal Executioner: People's Commissar Nikolai Ezhov 1895-1940. Stanford: Stanford U.P., 2002. At <<http://www.hoover.stanford.edu/publications/books/ezhov.html>>.

Khaustov, V.N, V.P. Naumov, N.C. Plotnikova, eds., Lubianka: Stalin i Glavnoe Upravlenie Gosbezopasnosti NKVD. 1937-1938. Moscow: "Materik", 2004. (Cited as "Lubianka.")

Khinshtein, Aleksandr. "Proshchai, Beria!" ('theft' of Beria trial materials from archive) Moskovskii Komsomolets Jan. 9, 2003. Retrieved at <<http://nadzor.pk.ru/articles/showart.php?id=8579>>; verified with original at <<http://www.mk.ru/newshop/bask.asp?artid=59319>>.

Khlystalov, Eduard. "Predateli s marshal'skimi zvezdami," Literaturnaia Rossia, No. 12, 28 March 2003 and No. 13, 4 April 2003. At <http://www.litrossia.ru/litrossia/viewitem?item_id=18376> and <http://www.litrossia.ru/litrossia/viewitem?item_id=18394>. Reprinted at <http://www.hrono.ru/text/2003/hly_predat.html>.

Khrushchev's 'Secret Speech' has been printed many times; I used the edition in Izvestiia TsK. KPSS No.3, 1989. At <<http://www.zvenigorod.ru/library/history/cccpsun/1989/3/128.htm>>.

Kirilina, Alla. Neizvestnyi Kirov. StP & Moscow: "Neva" / OLMA-Press, 2001. (Includes text of her earlier book Rikoshet.)

Kokurin, A.I and Pozhalov, A.I. "'Novyi Kurs' L.P. Beria", Istoricheskiy Arkhiv 4 (1996), 132-164.

Koshliakov, Sergei. "Lavrentiia Beria rasstreliali zadolgo do prigovora." Vesti Nedeli June 29, 2003. At <<http://www.vesti7.ru/archive/news?id=2728>>.

Knight, Amy. Beria: Stalin's First Lieutenant. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1993.

Lavrentiy Beria. 1953. Stenograma iul'skogo plenuma TsK KPSS I drugie dokumenty. Eds. V. Naumov, Iu. Sigachov. Moscow: Mezhdunarodniy Fond "Demokratiia," 1999. Cited as "Beria."

Leibowitz, Clement. The Chamberlain-Hitler Deal. Edmonton: Editions Duval, 1993.

Lubianka. Stalin I VChK GPU OGPU NKVD. Ianvar' 1922-dekabr' 1936. Documenty. Moscow: 'Materik', 2003. (Cited as "Lubianka A")

Lubianka. Stalin I Glavnoe Upravlenie Gosbezopasnosti NKVD 1937-1938. Moscow: 'Materik', 2004. (Cited as "Lubianka B").

McNeal, Robert. "Trotsky's Interpretation of Stalin." Canadian Slavonic Papers 3 (1961), 87-97.

Medvedev, Roy. Medvedev, Let History Judge: The Origins and Consequences of Stalinism. New York: Knopf, 1971.

Medvedev, Roy. "Lichnaia biblioteka 'Korifeia vseh nauk'." Vestnik RAN. No. 3 (2001), 264-7. At <<http://russcience.euro.ru/biblio/med01vr.htm>>.

Medvedev, Zhores. "Sekretnyy naslednik Stalina." Ural (Yekaterinburg). 1999, No. 7. At <http://www.art.uralinfo.ru/LITERAT/Ural/Ural_7_99/Ural_07_99_09.htm>.

Mukhin, Iu. Ubiystvo Stalina i Beria. Moscow: Krymskii Most-9D, 2003.

Nekrasov, V.F. Beriia: Konets Kar'ery. Moscow: Politizdat, 1991.

Nevezhin, V. A. Zastol'nye Rechi Stalina. Dokumenty i Materialy. [Stalin's Table Talk] Moscow: AIRO-XX; St. Petersburg: Bulanin, 2003.

O'Meara, Kelly Patricia. "Looting Russia's Free Market." Insight, 2002. At <http://www.findarticles.com/p/articles/mi_m1571/is_32_18/ai_91210681>

.

Order No. 00447: in Lubyanka B, No. 151, 273-281; also at <http://www.memorial.krsk.ru/DOKUMENT/USSR/370730.htm>.

Pavlova, Irina V. "1937: vybory kak mistifikatsiia, terror kak real'nost'." Voprosy Istorii. No. 10, 2003, pp. 19-37.

Politburo TsK VKP(b) i Sovet Ministrov SSSR 1945-1953. Ed. Khlevniuk, O., et al. Moscow: ROSSPEN, 2002.

Prudnikova, Elena. Beria. Prestupleniia, kororykh ne bylo. St. Petersburg: Neva, 2005.

Prudnikova, Elena. Stalin. Vtoroe Ubiystvo. St.Petersburg: Neva, 2003.

Pyzhikov, Aleksandr. "Leningradskaia gruppy: put' vo vlasti (1946-1949)", Svobodnaia Mysl' 3 (2001), 89-104.

Pyzhikov, A. "N.A. Voznesenskii o perspektivakh poselvoennogo obnovleniia obshchestva." At <http://www.akdi.ru/id/new/ek5.htm>.

Rossiiia I SSSR v voynakh XX veka. Potery vooruzhennykh sil. Statisticheskoe issledovanie. Moscow, 'OLMA-Press', 2001. Also at <http://www.soldat.ru/doc/casualties/book/>.

Rubin, Nikolai. Lavrentii Beria. Mif I Rea'nost'. Moscow: Olimp; Smolensk: Rusich, 1998.

Simonov, Konstantin. Glazami cheloveka moego pokoleniia. Razmyshleniia o I.V. Staline. Moscow: Novosti, 1988.

Service, Robert. Stalin. A Biography. Cambridge, MA: Belknap Press, 2004.

Smirtiukhov, Mikhail. Interview, Kommersant-Vlast' February 8, 2000. At <http://www.nns.ru/interv/arch/2000/02/08/int977.html>.

Stalin, Joseph. "Vystuplenie I.V. Stalina na Rasshirennom Zasedanii Voennogo Soveta pri Narkome Oborony," Istochnik 3 (1994), 72-88. A slightly different version is in Lubyanka, No. 92, 202-209.

Stalin, Joseph. "On the Draft of the Constitution of the USSR." In Russian: Collected Works, vol. 14. At <<http://stalin1.boom.ru/14-21.txt>>; in English, in J.V. Stalin, Problems of Leninism. Foreign Languages Press, Peking 1976, 795-834, at <<http://ptb.lashout.net/marx2mao/Stalin/SC36.html>>.

Stalin, Joseph. The Stalin-Howard Interview. NY: International Publishers, 1936. At <<http://stalin1.boom.ru/14-2.htm>> (in Russian).

Stalin, Joseph. Report to 17th Party Congress, January 26, 1934. At <<http://www.geocities.com/CapitolHill/Parliament/7345/stalin/13-27.htm>> (in Russian); English edition in J.V. Stalin, Problems of Leninism. Foreign Languages Press, Peking 1976, 671-765; also at <<http://ptb.lashout.net/marx2mao/Stalin/SPC34.html>>.

Stalin, Joseph. Zakluchitel'noe slovo na plenumе tsentral'nogo komiteta VKP(b) 5 marta 1937 goda (stenograficheskii variant). At <<http://www.geocities.com/CapitolHill/Parliament/7345/stalin/14-9.htm>>.

Stalin, Joseph. Zastol'nye Rechi Stalina. Dokumenty i Materialy. [Stalin's Table Talk] Moscow: AIRO-XX; St. Petersburg: Bulanin, 2003.

Stalin, Joseph. Rech' I.V. Stalina Na Plenumе TsK KPSS 16 Oktiabria 1952 goda. (Speech at Plenum of the Central Committee of the KPSU October 16 1952). Unofficial publication at <<http://www.kprf.ru/analytics/10828.shtml>>.

Starkov, Boris. "Sto Dney 'Lubyanskogo Marshala,'" Istochnik 4 (1993), 82-90.

Sukhomlinov, Andrei. Kto vy, Lavrentii Beria? Neizvestnye stranitsy ugolovnogo dela. Moscow: Detektiv-Press, 2004.

Sul'ianov, Anatolii. Beria: Arestovat' v Kremle. Minsk: Kharvest, 2004.

Thurston, Robert W. "Fear and Belief in the USSR's 'Great Terror': Response To Arrest, 1935-1939." Slavic Review 45 (1986), 213-234.

Thurston, Robert W. "On Desk-Bound Parochialism, Commonsense Perspectives, and Lousy Evidence: A Reply to Robert Conquest." Slavic Review 45 (1986), 238-244.

Thurston, Robert W. "Social Dimensions of Stalinist Rule: Humor and Terror in the USSR, 1935-1941." Journal of Social History 24, No. 3 (1991) 541-562.

Thurston, Robert W. Life and Terror in Stalin's Russia. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1996.

Toptygin, Aleksei. Lavrentii Beria. Moscow: Yauza, Eksmo, 2005.

Tragediia Sovetskoy Derevni. Kollektivizatsiia I Raskulachivanie. Documenty I Materialy. 1927-1939. Tom 3. Konets 1930-1933. Moscow: ROSSPEN, 2001.

Williamson, Anne. "The Rape of Russia." Testimony before the Committee on Banking and Financial Services of the U.S. House of Representatives, September 21, 1999. At <http://www.russians.org/williamson_testimony.htm>.

Yakovlev, A.S. Tsel' Zhizni. Zapiski Aviakonstruktora. M. 1973. Chapter 20, "Moskva v oborone," <<http://militera.lib.ru/memo/russian/yakovlev-as/20.html>>.

Zakharov, Aleksandr. "'Prigovor privedion v ispolnenie.'" Krasnay Zvezda Dec. 20, 2003. At <http://www.redstar.ru/2003/12/20_12/6_01.html>.

Zhukov, Iurii. Inoy Stalin. Politicheskie reformy v SSSR v 1933-1937 gg. Moscow: "Vagrius," 2003.

Zhukov, Iurii. "Iosif Stalin: diktator ili liberal?" Komsomolskaya Pravda, Dec. 3, 2002. Transcript of telephone Q&A based on series "Zhupel Stalina." At <<http://www.kp.ru/daily/22927/9/print/>>. See below.

Zhukov, Iurii. "Kul'tovaia mekhanika," Literaturnaya Gazeta No. 9, March 5-11 2003. At http://www.lgz.ru/archives/html_arch/lg092003/Polosy/art15_1.htm.

Zhukov, Iurii. "Stalin ne nuzhdalsia v partii vlasti," Politicheskiy Zhurnal, Arkhiv No 15 (18) 26 April 2004. At <http://www.politjournal.ru/index.php?action=Articles&dirid=50&tek=1114&issue=31>.

Zhukov, Iurii. "Repressii I Konstitutsiia SSSR 1936 goda." Voprosy Istorii. 2002, No. 1, pp. 3-26.

Zhukov, Iurii. Tayny Kremliia: Stalin, Molotov, Beria, Malenkov. Moscow: Terra-Knizhnyy Klub, 2000.

Zhukov, Iurii. "Zhupel Stalina", Komsomolskaya Pravda, November 5, 6, 12, 13, 14, 15, 19, 20, 2002. Also widely available on the Internet, e.g. at http://www.x-libri.ru/elib/smi__958/.

Contents copyright © 2005 by Grover Furr.

Format copyright © 2005 by Cultural Logic, ISSN 1097-3087.

2007: Nikolai Bukharin's First Statement of Confession in the Lubianka¹

¹ Editor's note: This essay was originally written in Russian and published in the journal, Klio (St. Petersburg), No. 1 (36), 2007, pp. 38-52. The Russian version is available at the following:
https://msuweb.montclair.edu/~furrgr/research/furrnbobrov_klio0107.pdf. N. Bukharin's "Personal Confession," translated by Grover Furr, appears immediately after the present essay (p. 19). Bukharin's original Russian version of the "Confession" may be accessed at the following:
https://msuweb.montclair.edu/~furrgr/research/bukhconfession_klio0107.pdf
.

Nikolai Ivanovich Bukharin (1888-1938) remains one of the most puzzling figures of Soviet history. Although his rehabilitation took place in 1988 to this day not a single piece of historical evidence supporting this verdict has ever been published. All the documents published during the period of the "Bukharin Boom" of the 1990s in one way or another touch on the question of the accusations against him. But only in a single case — his letter to Joseph Stalin of December 10, 1937 — did Bukharin utter a determined "Not Guilty" to the crimes of which he was accused. All the remaining documents, including other letters of his, provide evidence supporting the opposite conclusion.

A significant number of primary sources related to the last period of Bukharin's life remain unavailable to historians.² In the present publication we offer to the reader's attention a document which relates precisely to this little-known and, in essence, little researched stage of Bukharin's life, that stage that still holds many secrets and unsolved mysteries. This is Bukharin's first statement of confession, written by him on June 2 1937, after he had been in the Lubianka for three months. In our opinion this document permits us to view certain facts of Bukharin's life, thought to be well known, in a somewhat different light.

² See Stephen F. Cohen, "Bukharin na Lubianke." Svobodnaia Mysl' 3 (2003), 59.

Part One: External Critique of the Document

What Is the "Volkogonov Archive"?

The archive of General-Colonel Dmitry A. Volkogonov (1928-1995), military historian, writer, Deputy to the Supreme Soviet of the USSR and counselor to the President of the Russian Federation, was assembled during the time he was working on a series of biographical books concerning Soviet political figures. He made use of his privileged access to former Soviet archives and in the course of a lengthy period assembled a collection of photocopies of documents many of which remain little known to researchers to this day. Not long before his death Volkogonov managed to send photocopies from his collection to the Library of Congress, to which they were finally donated by members of his family in two stages, in 1996 and 2000.

At the present time the "Volkogonov Archive" (31 boxes with photocopies and 20 microfilms) is kept in the Manuscript Division of the Library of Congress 3 and is open to researchers. The documents embrace the time period 1763-1995, but are mainly related to the Soviet period. They are arranged into sixteen series, of which thirteen correspond to the archival institutions from which they were at some time copied. Three more series comprise Volkogonov's personal papers, documents in large format, and other materials.

³ For a general description of the "Volkogonov Archive" see <http://www.loc.gov/rr/mss/text/volkogon.html>. More complete information about the archive was posted in July 1998 on the H-RUSSIA list: see <http://tinyurl.com/37pvoo>.

In the words of Patricia Grimsted access to the archive was limited until the year 2000. But even after its opening several inconvenient features remain. The researcher has to contend with the fact that to this day there is no detailed description of the documents in the archive. As previously stated the entire archive consists of photocopies and microfilms of photocopies, far from all of which were originally of the necessary quality. For this reason in many cases one has to deal with the illegibility of texts, especially in cases of marks on the documents, inscriptions, and handwritten additions.

Perhaps these conditions help to explain the fact that historians on both sides of the ocean rarely use the collection, although archival access to the originals of those same documents in the Central Archive of the Federal Security Service (TsA FSB) or the Archive of the President of the Russian Federation (AP RF) is either limited or completely forbidden.

The document we present here was discovered in the course of a systematic study of the contents of specific sections of the archive among the documents concerning the "Bukharin delo" (case) in Box 21, Microfilms 13 and 14.

Evidence the Document Is Genuine

The structure of the Volkogonov Archive presupposes that all the photocopies in it have been made from documents whose originals remain in the archival collections of the Russian Federation. But is this so? This is no idle question. In recent years not a few "documents from nowhere" have appeared — sources of highly doubtful origins that are unquestionably false. One example is the well-known history of the exposure of forged "decrees of the Politburo of the ACP(b)" and photocopies of them in the Hoover Institution.⁴

⁴ V.P. Kozlov, Obmanutaia, no torzhestvennaia Klio. Podloga pis'mennykh istochnikov po rossiiskoi istorii v XX veke. Moscow: ROSSPEN, 2001, 49-81. O.V. Vishlev, "O podlinnosti 'Postanovlenii Politburo VKP(b)', khraniashchikhsia v zarubezhnykh arkhivakh." Novaia i Noveishaia Istorii, 6 (1993), 51-55; Mihai Reiman and Ingmar Sütterlin, "Sowjetische 'Politbüro-Beschlüsse' der Jahre 1931-1937 in staatlichen deutschen Archiven." Jahrbücher für die Geschichte Osteuropas (JfGO) 37 (1989), 196-216.

Therefore, strictly speaking, any valid use of the Volkogonov copies must be preceded by a search for evidence that the document in question is genuine. In the case of some documents this could present a considerable problem.

In our case it is simple enough to dispel any doubt. Bukharin's confession of June 2, 1937 is mentioned in the works of a number of researchers such as Stephen F. Cohen and Boris A. Starkov,⁵ in each case without any connection to the Volkogonov Archive.

⁵ B.A. Starkov. "Delo Riutina." Oni ne molchali. Ed. A.V. Afanas'ev. Moscow: Politizdat, 1991, p.175; Stephen F. Cohen, "To Be Preserved Forever." The Nation. November 27, 1995, 673. We must point out that both of these articles were published before the Volkogonov Archive had been turned over to the Library of Congress. J. Arch Getty and Oleg V. Naumov refer to information about the document that concerns us here from Starkov's article; see Getty and Naumov, The Road to Terror: Stalin and the Self-Destruction of the Bolsheviks, 1932-1939. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1999, 447.

It is true that Volkogonov did not mention Bukharin's June confession in his biography of Stalin. However, in this case there is no contradiction because according to Volkogonov himself work on his biography of Stalin was completed in 1985,⁶ when many of the primary sources were as yet unavailable to him and only came into his personal archive some years later.⁷

⁶ Dmitri A. Volkogonov, Stalin. Politicheskii portret. V 2 kn. Moscow: Novosti, 1992. Kn. See the section "Vmesto zakliucheniia. Verdikt istorii." http://militera.lib.ru/bio/volkogonov_dv/index.html.

⁷ The archives used by Volkogonov are discussed in Patricia K. Grimsted, "Archives of Russia Seven Years After: 'Purveyors of Sensation' or 'Shadows cast to the Past'?" Washington, DC: Cold War International History Project. 1998 Working Paper No. 20, n. 12, p. 22. At <http://www.wilsoncenter.org/topics/pubs/ACF518.pdf> and <http://www.wilsoncenter.org/topics/pubs/ACF51B.pdf>.

But the most convincing argument in support of its genuineness may be found in the transcript of the Trial of the Bloc of Rights and Trotskyites published in 1938. There, on the one hand, Bukharin himself stated that "For three months I refused to say anything"⁸ and, on the other hand, A.I.A. Vyshinsky, the State Prosecutor, twice quoted this same document. In both cases the quotation and the present text agree word for word. Additionally, in one of these two instances the quotation from Bukharin's confession is cited without any reference at all to its source. If someone had wanted to forge the document he would have had no reason to include in the text a quotation of unknown origin.

We propose these arguments are irrefutable proof of the genuineness of the document in question here.⁹

⁸ "'Moe poslednee slovo na suda, veroiatno, budet moim poslednim slovom voobshche.' Kto i kak pravil rech' N.I. Bukharina." Istochnik 4, 1996, 89. For this statement in the official English translation see The great purge trial. Edited, and with notes, by Robert C. Tucker and Stephen F. Cohen. With an introd. by Robert C. Tucker. NY: Grosset & Dunlap, 1965, p. 666.

⁹ In the same archival folder with Bukharin's confession are also to be found Bukharin's appeals for clemency, the texts of which have been published (Izvestiia, Sept. 2, 1992, 3).

Part Two: Internal Critique of the Document

Bukharin's Confession in the Light of the Rehabilitation Commission of the Central Committee of the CPSU of 1988

The question of evaluating Bukharin's confession of guilt cannot be viewed in isolation from the materials related to his rehabilitation in 1988. For a discussion of all the aspects of this matter we refer the interested reader to the fuller treatment in Marc Junge's monograph. Here we will simply note that, in the opinion of the German scholar, "Rehabilitation in the Soviet Union remains an act of political and administrative caprice determined, above all, by political expediency and not by juridical and legal correctness."¹⁰ This observation is also true for the rehabilitations of the period of Gorbachev's "perestroika" and "glasnost."

¹⁰ Marc Junge. Strakh pered proshlym. Reabilitatsia N.I. Bukharina ot Khrushcheva do Gorbacheva. Moscow: AIRO-XX, 2003, 269. Cf. the German language original: Marc Junge, Bucharins Rehabilitierung. Historisches Gedächtnis in der Sowjetunion 1953-1991. Berlin: BasisDruck Vlg, 1999, 266: "In Übereinstimmung zu von Goudoever kann abschließend festgestellt wurden, daß Rehabilitierung in der Sowjetunion ein politisch-administrativer Willkürakt blieb, der vor allem von der politischen Zweckmäßigkeit der Maßnahmen bestimmt wurde, nicht aber von der strafrechtlichen Korrektheit."

In reality the decision concerning the juridical and Party rehabilitation of Bukharin were the direct result of the new course and of the political decisions formulated by General Secretary of the Central Committee of the CPSU Mikhail S. Gorbachev at the October 1987 Plenum of the CC CPSU and in the speech he gave on the occasion of the seventieth anniversary of the October revolution, long before any study of any historical or juridical-criminal materials.¹¹ From the transcript of the sessions of the Commission of the Politburo of the CC CPSU for the additional study of the materials related to the repressions of the 30s-40s and the beginning of the 1950s, chaired by M.S. Solomentsev, it may be seen that its members meticulously adhered not only to the spirit, but to the letter of these reports, even consulting Gorbachev's personal opinion on this question.¹²

¹¹ Reabilitatsia: kak eto bylo. Dokumenty Politbiuro TsK KPSS, stenogrammy zasedanii Komis. Politbiuro TsK KPSS pod op. izuch. Materialov, sviazan. s repressiiami, imevshimi mesto v period 30-40 I nachalo 50-kh gg. i drugie materially. T. III, Seredina 80-kh gg. Moscow: MFD, 2004, 17-27 (hereafter RKEB).

¹² RKEB 31-34, 36, 39, 54, 55, 57.

Despite the lack of objectivity and the preconceived nature of their decisions the Rehabilitation Commission in its work confronted, in essence, the same complex of questions that are of import for us — namely, how should we evaluate the trustworthiness of Bukharin's confession of guilt? A major reason for our interest in the materials of the Commission is related to the fact that the document we publish below — Bukharin's confession of June 2, 1937 — was also considered by them.

It is not without interest that inter alia the question of the authenticity of this document was also addressed by the Commission because "when this material was reviewed in 1961 it turned out that this first confession was not in the file. Later it was located and inserted into the file." The Commission also laid attention on the fact that "his [Bukharin's] first confession was written in his own handwriting. He denied everything. Later he began to confess. And from the moment he began to confess we have typed material."¹³ But in view of the fact that every typed page of Bukharin's confession was certified by his own signature,¹⁴ the rehabilitation Commission dropped the question of authorship. The fact that, judging from the documentation, the genuineness of the confessions did not elicit any doubt in 1961 may have played a role here.

¹³ RKEB 55.

¹⁴ According to Solomentsev every page was certified not only by Bukharin but by the NKVD investigator (ibid.). This is obviously an error since only Bukharin's signature is on the photocopies of the confession. As he was chairing the session of the Commission Solomentsev probably did not have the document in front of him and was citing it from memory.

For one reason or another Solomentsev considered it essential to pay detailed attention to the contents of Bukharin's first confession. About it he said:

In it he [Bukharin] begins to expose himself fully. He outlines the history of the origin of his deviation from a Leninist course, when that happened, why it happened. And he continues to the period when they began to make a bloc with the Trotskyites. How does he explain this? At one time the situation in the country was very difficult. Many persons in the ranks of the Party were dissatisfied. And then they believed that they could change the leadership by resolving this question at a plenum by democratic means or by some other means without recourse to terror. Then after a certain time they saw that the situation in the country was improving, Stalin's position was becoming more solid, the majority in the Party, among the people, supported him. He was winning authority. Now they said that they could not deal with him through such methods. The only method was terror. In this connection they began at that time to seek contacts with the Trotskyites. The main person conducting this business was Tomsky. Then both Bukharin and Rykov participated in these meetings, though to a lesser extent. Then they began to negotiate about this form of struggle and at some stage proceeded to contacts.¹⁵

¹⁵ Ibid.

Unfortunately the interpretation offered by Solomentsev does not accurately reflect the contents of the document, since in addition to his confession about the evolution of his views Bukharin made a series of other very important confessions. Specifically he confirmed the existence of an underground network or secret oppositional "bloc" of highly-placed conspirators against the Soviet government, their ties with Trotsky in exile, and with high-level military commanders including Marshal Tukhachevsky, and the existence of contacts between Trotsky and the military group with Nazi Germany. Bukharin also testified that as a political program the bloc accepted the "Riutin platform" and worked out a plan for a "palace coup" with the goal of removing Stalin and his closest associates from power, and not hesitating before such extreme measures of political struggle as murder (terror).

Despite Solomentsev's distorted exposition of this material it is very indicative that Bukharin's evolution from a proponent of Bolshevik democracy to a politician that supported the most extreme methods of struggle with Stalin, prepared for the sake of this struggle to enter into an alliance with political forces such as the Trotskyites, appeared logical and justified to such an experienced political apparatchik. We should note that even in the language of "glasnost" this last signified an alliance with dedicated antagonists of the ACP(b) and with enemies of the USSR.

We also wish to point out that in the present case Solomentsev retreated from the viewpoint that had remained unchallenged since the time of Khrushchev's "Secret Speech" (1956), according to which no forces or tendencies within the ACP(b) oppositional to Stalin existed. Obviously in confirming the contrary position Solomentsev did not proceed from official theories but from the experience of his own Party-apparatus work in the CC CPSU, among which was his own role as witness and one of the passive participants in the coup against Khrushchev in 1964.

The next question that attracted the attention of members of the Commission was connected with Bukharin's confessions of his guilt during the various stages of the preliminary investigation and at the trial.

If we consider the historical materials available today it is easy to see how Bukharin admitted his guilt first at the preliminary investigation by the NKVD, then during interrogation by the Prosecutor of the USSR Vyshinsky, and then — three more times at a minimum — during the course of the trial sessions. Each of these three occasions were cited by Bukharin in his closing speech at the trial (which has recently been published without editorial excisions in the journal Istochnik).¹⁶ In the absence of any doubts to the contrary — and that is the situation we face with this document — a confession made by a suspect in the course of the investigation and repeated at trial is considered valid in juridical practice anywhere in the world. Consequently the crimes to which the accused has confessed and which he has repeatedly confirmed, including at trial, are considered to have been actually committed by him.

¹⁶ See Istochnik 4 (1996), 78-92.

It is important to note that the list of accusations leveled against Bukharin at trial and the list of those to which he confessed guilt do not correspond. Vyshinsky tried to get Bukharin to confess to a far larger number of accusations. But Bukharin remained constantly active, arguing with the State prosecutor, time and again striving to deny many of these accusations as unjust or simply unproven.

This gets to the heart of the matter. In some cases Bukharin firmly and decisively asserted his innocence, while in other cases he did not make even the most timid attempts to refute anything. The question remains: Why?

According to one very popular explanation Bukharin's confession should be viewed as a veiled attempt to reject the accusations leveled against him by means of "Aesopian language."¹⁷ But those charges to which he actually confessed were more than sufficient to justify a death sentence. In addition a comparison of, for example, Bukharin's very first confessions of guilt with those that he wrote down or orally stated during subsequent stages of the investigation and at trial, shows a consistency in the sense of his assertions, their close correspondence to one another.

¹⁷ S. Koen [Cohen]. Bukharin. Politicheskaia biografiia. 1888-1938. Moscow: Progress, 1988, pp. 444-449. For the corresponding pages in the original English-language edition, Stephen F. Cohen, Bukharin and the Bolshevik Revolution (NY: Oxford University Press, 1980), pp. 375-80. Roy A. Medvedev, O Staline i stalinizme. Moscow: Progress, 1990, 334-5. Cf. George Katkov, The Trial of Bukharin. NY: Stein & Day, 1969, 107, 129, 160, 163, 166.

Specifically this is the case with Bukharin's confession to his membership in an underground anti-Soviet organization of "Rights," "in the preparation of a conspiracy for a 'palace coup,' in the preparation of a "coup d'état" and in plans to murder Stalin.¹⁸

¹⁸ The text in quotation marks is from Bukharin's statement to Ezhov. Volkogonov Archive, Box 21, Microfilm 13-14.

Minor inconsistencies in the confession and the lack therein of certain details can be explained most probably not by any internal contradictions, but by the fact that the investigation was still at a preliminary stage. As we have already stated, Bukharin's confession of guilt of June 2, 1937 was the very first since his arrest on February 27 of the same year.

The impression is unmistakable that Bukharin really wished to reject and deny only those crimes which he had not committed but that he felt compelled to confess when he felt responsible for what he had in fact done.

It must be said that the rehabilitation commission did not scrutinize in any depth the nuances of meaning in Bukharin's confession. Instead it proposed a clever way out of this ticklish situation: to declare the transcript of the trial "unreliable and inaccurate" and the investigative and trial materials falsified, "lacking in juridical and moral force."¹⁹

¹⁹ From the conversation of M.S. Solomentsev with correspondents of Pravda, August 19, 1988, in RKEB 110-111. For the sake of the Party rehabilitation of Bukharin the Commission also found it necessary to "deny the February-March 1937 Plenum and its truthfulness." RKEB 88.

Bukharin's Confessions: Other Arguments "Against"

Juridical and investigative materials are among the most complicated of historical sources. Their use in scientific research always runs the risk of committing the error of accepting as truthful information whose truthfulness still remains to be proven or, on the contrary, of excluding certain facts that have already been established as true simply on the basis that they have been taken from juridical or investigative materials.

In our present case the problem of authenticity has another significant aspect: whether this confession was really written by Bukharin. To put it another way: are there any traces of evidence that force was used to compel Bukharin to write (or even just to confirm with his signature) the "necessary" admissions of guilt?

In contemporary historiography the arguments most commonly brought forward to impugn the genuineness of a person's confession are: (1) torture or other forms of physical compulsion; (2) threats against the accused's family; (3) "cooperation" obtained from a defendant who hopes thereby to save his life. We will consider below some documentary evidence concerning Bukharin's period of imprisonment at the Lubyanka, with the help of which we may be able to evaluate these deductions. In addition we have to touch on the question of any efforts at "staging" through which the NKVD investigators may have prepared Bukharin for the trial of the bloc of Rights and Trotskyites.

While reporting that the torture of prisoners was deeply rooted in the practice of the NKVD Stephen Cohen, Roi Medvedev, and even Robert Conquest note almost unanimously that no means of physical pressure were applied to Bukharin in the Lubyanka.²⁰ Likewise in 1988 when the same question was raised by the rehabilitation commission, the KGB confirmed that no materials had been found in the state security archives that could be considered as evidence that impermissible methods of investigation had been used against Bukharin. In addition the chairman of the commission himself expressed doubts that any investigator of lesser intellect would have been able to manipulate a person like Bukharin.

²⁰ Koen, Bukharin 444. Zhores A. Medvedev and Roi A. Medvedev, Neizvestnyi Stalin. Moscow: Folio, 2004, 374-5. Until the beginning of the 1990s Robert Conquest, like other authors, relying on an interview of Anastas Mikoian with Louis Fisher, believed Bukharin had not been tortured. But in the last edition of The Great Terror Conquest writes that his previous opinion had been mistaken, for "recent Soviet articles have made it clear that this is not true." However, Conquest does not indicate what publications he has in mind. Cf. Conquest, The Great Terror: A Reassessment. NY: Oxford University Press, 1990, 364.

In reality, what we know about the months that Bukharin spent in prison corresponds very poorly to the stories about "the bloody dungeons of the NKVD." It is no secret that in the Lubyanka Bukharin worked long and productively on scientific and literary projects. The overall volume of materials that he wrote in his prison cell comprises more than one thousand typed pages and includes the theoretical works "Philosophical Arabesques" and "Socialism and Culture," the first part of his autobiographical novel "Times," a book of poetry, and a number of other works of lesser significance.

So there is no evidence, either direct or indirect, to sustain any theory that Bukharin may have been tortured. Instead, both Cohen and Medvedev suggest the hypothesis that Bukharin was forced to confess from fear for what might happen to his wife, young son, and other relatives.

We must point out that this theory originally came from the pen of the refugee Alexander Orlov in 1953,²¹ and that all contemporary authors seized upon it in hopes that some day the requisite evidence would be uncovered. But to date none of the known sources, including Bukharin's prison letters and the memoirs of his wife Anna Larina, confirm this story. As for Orlov, all his "information" was gleaned from corridor rumors he heard from a few of his colleagues in the NKVD during his short visits to Moscow from war-torn Spain, where Orlov almost continuously spent the years of the "great purges."²²

21 See the chapter "Nikolai Bukharin" in Alexander Orlov, Tainaia istoriia stalinskikh prestuplenii. SPb: Vsemir. Slovo, 1991.

22 J. Arch Getty, The Origins of the 'Great Purges'. The Soviet Communist Party Reconsidered, 1933-1938. NY: Cambridge University Press, 1986, 211-2.

Strictly speaking, we could halt this investigation at this point since, aside from Orlov's, there are no other accounts confirming the truth of his story. However the present authors think it is of interest to see what other known facts either confirm or disprove "Orlov's theory."

After the publication of Orlov's book the theory that gained the most common acceptance was that his wife and child were the main leverage by means of which the NKVD investigators succeeded in extracting from Bukharin a confession to crimes against the state — in other words, that the "necessary" confessions were obtained from Bukharin only under a guarantee that his relatives would remain unharmed.

According to published information Bukharin's expulsion from the Party and arrest did in fact have a negative impact on the fate of his family. But none of them was subject to persecution until the death sentence had been carried out on their famous relative in March 1938.²³

²³ Junge, 89-91. Cf. also Koen (Cohen), "Bukharin na Lubianke", 61; W. Hedeler, "Ezhov's scenario for the Great Terror and the Falsified Record of the Third Moscow Show Trial." In Barry McLoughlin and Kevin McDermott, eds., Stalin's Terror. High Politics and Mass Repression in the Soviet Union. NY: Palgrave Macmillan, 2003, 50.

The first among them to be arrested was Bukharin's first wife, N.M. Lukina. This occurred on April 30, 1938, a month and a half after the execution of her former husband. Of all Bukharin's relatives she alone was sentenced to be executed in 1940. Bukharin's younger brother Vladimir was taken into custody in November 1939, and his second wife, E.I. Gurvich, and daughter Svetlana were arrested in 1949. His father Ivan Gavrilovich was not arrested, but was refused a pension shortly after the February-March (1937) CC plenum. He died of natural causes in 1940.

Bukharin's last wife, Anna Larina, suffered more than the others. However, as late as three months after her husband's arrest she still retained her apartment in the Kremlin, where she dwelt as a close relative of one of the representatives of the Party elite. Only after Bukharin's first confession of guilt in June 1937 was she at last required to leave Moscow and move to one of five cities in the Soviet Union (she chose Astrakhan'). In December 1937 Larina arrived in a camp in Tomsk and there found out about her husband's fate. Nine months later she appeared in an NKVD investigative room in the Lubyanka.²⁴ Larina spent many years in camps and in exile, but lived into old age and even survived to witness her husband's posthumous rehabilitation.

²⁴ Lavrentii P. Beria believed that Bukharin was unconditionally guilty (A.M. Larina, Nezabyvaemoe. Moscow: Izd-vo APN, 1989, 181), but he concluded that Larina was not implicated in the conspiratorial activities of her husband. In Larina's opinion it was Beria who saved her life; without his intervention she would have received a more severe sentence. Be that as it may, it was Beria who sent fruit and money for the prison store to Larina's room (ibid., 191 ff.).

It turns out that the more Bukharin confessed, the harsher the repressive measures taken with respect to his relatives. While knowing nothing about the fate of those close to him it seems that Bukharin himself was one of the causes of their moral and physical suffering. The greater the crimes to which he confessed, the greater the torment and misfortune befell his family — and not vice versa. There is no indication that as Bukharin progressively confessed to more and more crimes, these confessions were wrung from him in hopes of saving members of his family from repression.

In short our attempt to check "Orlov's version" instead confirms what we already know: it is without foundation in every respect. There remains only to say that the rumor set forth in Orlov's book represents one variety of the "history" of a more general nature, according to which Bukharin supposedly engaged in desperate attempts to "trade" something with Stalin and the NKVD. The different versions of this story come down to the objects of the supposed "trade." In one case it was, supposedly, the safety of members of Bukharin's family if, of course, the investigation received the "necessary" confessions. In the other, it was the sparing of his own life provided that Bukharin play his role in the trial as required.

In reality the documents Bukharin wrote immediately preceding his death, while permeated with a touching hope that his life will be spared, contain not even a breath of a hint that he, Bukharin, had acted as had been required of him and therefore was supposedly counting on being spared.²⁵ This includes, for example, evidence such as his last letter to his wife ("I am writing you on the eve of the trial. . .") and his official appeal, or request for leniency. These documents give no reason to think that any of the Lubyanka confessions were obtained from Bukharin as a result of "trading" or any such unequal "agreement."

²⁵ In the confession of Mikhail P. Frinovsky, the former first vice-commissar of the NKVD, we read something quite different: "Ezhov talked with Bukharin and Rykov several times and in order to calm them assured them that they would not be shot under any circumstances." Lubyanka. Stalin i NKVD-NKGB-GUKR "Smersh". 1939-mart 1946. Moscow: MFD, 2006, 47.

(For the same reasons Arthur Koestler's account in his novel Darkness at Noon which is cited from time to time in order to explain the motives for Bukharin's behavior at trial, must be recognized as mistaken. Aside from the question of the inappropriateness of using a work of literary artistry in historical research we note that in this case the author's conjecture is contradicted by documents stemming directly from Bukharin himself.)

Finally, a few words about the supposed "staging" of the Bukharin-Rykov trial. In the historical literature it is common to read that the idea of a show trial of Bukharin was born in the fall of 1936 or even earlier.²⁶ But in light of documents that have recently become accessible to historians these statements demand substantive correction.

²⁶ Oleg V. Khlevniuk. Politbiuro. Mekhanizmy politicheskoi vlasti v 30-e gody. Moscow: ROSSPEN, 1996, 205-6; Hedeler, 35.

As we know from materials published by the "Memorial" society, in June 1937 two-thirds of the future defendants at the March 1938 trial, including such key figures as Grin'ko, Rozengol'ts, Sharangovich, Ikramov, and Khodzhaev, were still at liberty.²⁷ It is especially curious that the names of fifteen of the accused (out of a total of twenty-one),²⁸ including Bukharin and Rykov, are mentioned in the so-called "Stalin shooting lists" which were compiled for reviewing cases in a secret and accelerated manner.²⁹ The greater part of the future defendants in the case of the bloc of Rights and Trotskyites were entered in the list of "former members and candidate members of the CC ACP(b)" of November 1, 1937 and were struck from it by the hand of some unknown editor. A few of them figure in various lists twice (like Rakovsky) or three times (like Zubarev), or twice in one and the same list (like Sharangovich).

²⁷ According to the information on the compact disk Zhertvy politicheskogo terrora v SSSR. Na 2-kh diskakh. Disk 2. Baza dannykh o zhertvakh politicheskogo terrora v SSSR. Moscow: Zven'ia, 2004. The same information is available on the Internet at the site of the International "Memorial" Society: <http://www.memo.ru/memory/spiski.htm>.

²⁸ Ibid., "Stalinskie rasstrel'nye spiski." See also <http://stalin.memo.ru/images/intro.htm>

²⁹ Ibid., note 11.

All this speaks to the conclusion that no such "staging" of the future trial had been prepared in 1935-36, or even by November 1, 1937 when the long list of former Party and state workers was transmitted to Molotov, Stalin, Voroshilov, Kaganovich, and Zhdanov for confirmation as "subject to trial by the Military Collegium of the Supreme Court of the USSR." It follows that when Bukharin was giving his confession in June 1937 the NKVD had no "setup plan" for a trial prepared in advance. Consequently there was no intention to obtain confessions from him that might correspond to the supposed "stage-managing" of a legal proceeding.

Setting aside any consideration of the conditions which might demand a somewhat different view of the preparation of the last of the large Moscow show trials, we can say with a very high degree of certainty that everything Bukharin wrote in his confession of guilt originated with him alone.

Bukharin's Letter to Stalin of December 10, 1937

Until the present publication Bukharin's pretrial confessions of guilt had not attracted the attention of the scholarly community and were not available in print in the historical literature. But at the beginning of 1993 two Russian historical journals published, at about the same time, the "sensational" letter of December 10, 1937 to Stalin in which Bukharin firmly insisted on the falsehood of the accusations leveled against him. Bukharin unsparingly and directly cast into doubt everything he had confessed to earlier: "Standing on the edge of a precipice, from which there is no return, I tell you on my word of honor, as I await my death, that I am innocent of those crimes which I admitted at the investigation."

Since this letter of December 10, 1937 is the only evidence that supports Bukharin's absolute innocence, we must consider it more closely. The fact is that, regardless of the categorical nature of this letter, Bukharin did not only recant all his previous confessions but, unable to restrain himself, confessed to several other old "sins." He'd have done better to have restrained himself.

As Getty and Naumov have noted, in this letter of December 10, 1937 Bukharin strayed somewhat beyond the limits of what he had already admitted at the February-March 1937 Plenum of the CC ACP(b). Thus at the beginning of page two of the letter he says that at the Plenum he had indeed failed to tell his comrades about some things, and ends the same page with the words: "Thus at the plenum I spoke the pure truth, but no one believed me." (Bukharin's emphasis — GF, VB). In other words Bukharin was trying to say that, although he had not told the whole truth at Plenum, he was saying it only now. But in the opinion of Getty and Naumov this tactic would have simply strengthened any suspicion that Bukharin was continuing to be insincere, and would have destroyed the last remnants of trust in him, if any had still remained.³⁰

³⁰ Getty & Naumov, 563.

We can also find traces of similar insincerity in other parts of the letter. Thus on page seven of his "touching" missive Bukharin writes: "I know that N[atasha] S[ergeevna Allilueva] would never believe that I had plotted anything evil against you. . . ." Read literally, this has to be considered the truth, for Bukharin was not saying that he had not taken part in the preparation to kill Stalin. He was only writing that Stalin's wife (dead by this time) would not have believed he was a part of any such plot! The difference in meaning between these two statements is obvious.

(In general Bukharin was very evasive by nature and constantly engaged in wordplay. This manner of behavior struck Vyshinsky. And not him alone: many of those who spoke up at the February-March Plenum noted Bukharin's lack of sincerity, his "slipperiness" in his dealings with his colleagues on the Central Committee.)

In the letter to Stalin Bukharin wrote of his innocence with respect to those crimes to the commission of which he had confessed during the investigation. But exactly which confessions did Bukharin "confirm" earlier?

The phrase is unambiguous: it implies that some of Bukharin's confessions were pressed onto him by the investigators. But even Solomentsev, who headed the rehabilitation commission that, in the last analysis, did issue a verdict of innocence in Bukharin's case, noted that during the course of three months "he denied everything, even in his personal handwriting," "after each face-to-face confrontation with those who accused him he would say: no matter what they did to him, he would never agree to confess to the false accusations that had been hurled at him by these liars, these scoundrels."³¹

³¹ RKEB 54. See also Koen, "Bukharin na Lubianke," 60.

But then there came a sudden change, and without any protest (and in his own handwriting, as Solomentsev stated) Bukharin wrote a statement to Ezhov in which he admits that he had been, as he put it, "a participant in the organization of the Rights up to the present, that he was a member of the center of the organization together with Rykov and Tomsky, that this organization had set as its goal the forcible overthrow of Soviet power (uprising, coup d'etat, terror), that it had entered into a bloc with the Trotskyite-Zinovievite organization." In other words in his very first statement to Ezhov Bukharin confessed to precisely those crimes which he confirmed at the close of the investigation, and then again at trial.

Cohen and Hedeler note that a possible cause of Bukharin's confession might have been the arrests of Marshal Tukhachevsky and other prominent military commanders.³² If it were a coincidence, it would be a very strange one, for Bukharin in his very first confession named Tukhachevsky, Kork, and Primakov as participants in the group of conspirators within the Red Army. As we have shown above, no methods of physical compulsion were applied to Bukharin. Consequently, we may presume that it was Tukhachevsky's arrest that became the main cause of the great shock that Bukharin experienced in connection with the collapse of his last hope at rescue.³³

³² Koen, "Bukharin na Lubianke," 60. Hedeler also points out the connection between the "Tukhachevsky Affair" and Bukharin's confession, but adds Rykov here, who also at first refused to confess but then began to do so after the military men had been arrested (Hedeler, 41). See also "Pokazaniia Tukhachevskogo M.N. ot 1 iunია 1937 g." Molodaia gvardiia 9 (1994), 135.

³³ In confirmation of this proposition we recall the words of Matusov, who during the investigation in 1939 once stated to Larina: "You thought that Iakir and Tukhachevsky would save your Bukharin. But we work well. That's why they didn't succeed!" (Larina, Nezabyvaemoe, 27). For the plans for an armed seizure of the Kremlin we have the testimony of KGB veteran I.M Orlov who asserts that a special force, in which he was assigned to serve, had been prepared especially to arrest Stalin (see A.T. Rybin, Stalin predvidel: (Zapiski telokhranitelia). Moscow, 1992; on the web at http://vlastitel.com.ru/stalin/itog/st_predv.html#10 See also Rybin, Riadom so Stalinym: Zapiski telokhranitelia. Moscow: Veteran, 1992, Chapter 14, n.23; available at <http://stalinism.ru/books/rybin.zip>

A final point: Bukharin's letter of December 10, 1937 cannot be considered truthful because at least one of its assertions is unquestionably false. This is Bukharin's assurance that he had never participated in any plans to murder Stalin. But we now know that Bukharin had in fact acted precisely to the contrary of what he wrote in the December 10, 1937 letter. We know this from the memoirs, published in 1971, of one of Bukharin's closest colleagues — the Swiss communist and member of the Executive Committee of the Comintern, Jules Humbert-Droz.³⁴

³⁴ Jules Humbert-Droz, De Lénine à Staline. Dix ans au service de l'Internationale communiste 1921-1931. Neuchâtel: A la Baconnière, 1971, 379-80. Humbert-Droz wrote without any pressure from the NKVD. He was Bukharin's friend and hated Stalin. He had no reason to lie or to exaggerate what he knew. And these are not "rumors," since Humbert-Droz wrote that he heard of the plans to murder Stalin from Bukharin's own lips.

Conclusion

We have tried to demonstrate that Bukharin's confession of June 2, 1937 is an unquestionably genuine and authentic document (that is, that it was in fact written by the author), and that we may consider the information it contains to be truthful with a very high degree of probability.

Personal Confession of N. Bukharin

(Translated by Grover Furr)

In the present confession I wish to give the historical development of the counterrevolutionary organization of the Rights, beginning with its embryonic forms and including in the analysis its intellectual (ideinye) and organizational sources and premises

I. My general theoretical anti-Leninist views

I first of all wish to concentrate on my own theoretical anti-Leninist and anti-Marxist errors, in order to give a clear, general theoretical basis for the following exposition and in order not to repeat myself in my consideration of individual questions.

1. Lack of understanding of dialectics and substitution of Marxist dialects with the so-called theory of equilibrium.

It is well known that Lenin's "Testament" points out that I did not understand dialectics and had not studied it seriously. This was completely true. In the purely philosophical area I proceeded from the study of so-called "latest positivism" and was under the influence of A. BOGDANOV, whom I wished to interpret only in a materialist way, which unavoidably led to a peculiar eclecticism, simply put, theoretical confusion, where mechanical materialism united with empty schemas and abstractions. Abstract schematism pursues "final generalizations", wrenching them from the multi-formedness of rapidly-flowing life, and in this dead approach to the processes of history and of historical life lies the root of my immense political errors, which grew under definite conditions into political crimes. I could give many examples of this side of the matter. When at the VI Congress of the Party I underestimated the role of the peasantry, and still earlier of the national question, that signified a failure to understand the concrete historical situation and concrete stages of development; when at the time of the Brest treaty I struggled against Lenin, I did not understand the most concrete of concrete questions about "the peasant" and that the question was precisely to give the masses a "breathing space", and substituted for the living demands of the moment some general literary considerations about the fact that the proletarian fatherland must be defended; when in the trade union discussion I occupied an anti-Leninist position and joined with Trotsky, I did not understand that through the trade union question the question of NEP in one of its concrete aspects was also decided; and on the contrary, much later that same anti-dialectical position led to Rightist errors; when the period of sharpened class struggle was already beginning, out of the general schema of movement to a classless society I drew a deduction about the impossibility in that given stage of the sharpening of class struggle, etc. etc.

The substitution of dialectical flexibility and of the greatest degree of concreteness by abstract schemas of a renovated "theory of equilibrium", with all assurances of mobile equilibrium, in reality meant a fixation on dead abstraction and stasis that hindered me from seeing the concrete changes in all of their multifarious and complex interweaving of appearances.

2. Theory of the state and theory of proletarian dictatorship.

It's well known that V.I. Lenin accused me of concentrating all my attention on the destruction of the bourgeois state on one side, and on classless society on the other, without giving enough attention to the transitional period of proletarian dictatorship. This completely accurate remark of Lenin's seemed to me to be a flagrant injustice because, I believed, I did not at all suffer from this sin. However it is perfectly obvious that one of the roots of the much later ideology of the Rights lay precisely here. In fact at the origins of our ideology lies an underestimation of the organizational possibilities of the proletarian dictatorship, and overestimate of the market element and its characteristic "economic laws": all our views on the market, price formation, forms of state intervention, proportions of the national economy, relations between industry and agriculture, the question of the individual peasant household, etc. etc. — all rested theoretically on this very question, the question of the organizational possibilities of changing "the economic laws" by the application of proletarian dictatorship. That which was appropriate in the first phases of NEP we carried over in an antidialectical manner to other conditions, and this transfer rested on an underestimate of the power of the state apparatus of the mature and strengthened dictatorship of the proletariat.

3. Theory of class struggle under conditions of proletarian dictatorship.

Here I made committed the following fundamental error: from a general conception of the movement to a classless society I drew the deduction that after the landowners and capitalists had been crushed would come the stage of "equilibrium" between the proletariat and the peasantry, a "two-class society", in which the class struggle would gradually die down. I relied here on the anti-dialectical and anti-Leninist interpretation of all those passages in Lenin when he speaks of the peaceful and reformist, cultural character of our work generally and in the countryside in particular and especially. I therefore "overlooked" both the growing resistance of the kulaks and the wavering, inevitable under such conditions, of a part of the middle peasantry, that is, the situation of the developing dialectical contradictions of NEP, and the fact that the development of socialism, ever narrowing the base of its class enemies, leads to the sharpening of the methods of their struggle against socialism. This objective and inevitable development I laid to the fault of the Party leadership, when the problem was really to overcome this opposition by all means. The essence and theoretical basis of my views in this area was the notion of peaceful evolution with the extinction of class struggle. This, in connection with my position of overestimating the market element that I elaborated above, led to an anti-Leninist treatment of the Leninist "plan of cooperation" that played a large role in the later ideology of the Rights. According to this notion the main road, the highway to the development of socialism in the countryside lay not through the productive unification of peasant households, but through a process of management, through attracting them by the market, by cooperation in trade, credit, the banking system, etc., during which the "kulak nests" would peacefully grow into socialism. In this way the most important question of the relationship between the proletariat and the peasantry was treated by me in a fundamentally incorrect manner. Instead of state activity, drift; instead of the sharpening of class struggle — its extinction; instead of the theoretical base for cooperation in production, the market; instead of the crushing of the kulak class, the perspective of its peaceful transformation and the slogan "Enrich yourselves." Here were combined the preconditions of my most recent direct struggle with the Party and of my counterrevolutionary deductions in both the ideological and the practical-political sphere.

4. The theory of organized capitalism.

A somewhat special case (but an outgrowth of the same anti-dialecticalism of thought and abstract scholasticism) is the so-called theory of organized capitalism. According to this theory capitalism within its own framework overcomes the anarchy of production and of market relationships. The fact that capitalist monopoly exists side by side with free competition and makes all relationships more entangled; the fact that even within the capitalist monopolies themselves a fierce competitive struggle is going on; finally, the fact that state-capitalist forms can never completely cover over all the productive relationships of capitalism — all this fell beyond the field of vision of my theory of organized capitalism, which coincides with the theoretical views of the theorists of social-democracy.

II. The origins of the "Bukharin School"

The origins of the so-called "Bukharin School" go back to 1919-1920. I was then giving a course of lectures (together with individual lectures) at the Sverdlovsk University and among my listeners a circle gradually formed itself with which I led seminar work. At this time I also formed close personal relations with a number of the participants in these seminars. I would drop into their apartments (for example, in the dormitory of the Strastny monastery, where A. SLEPKOV and others lived), helped them when they were in need, etc.

Among the persons closest to me at that time I can name A. SLEPKOV, D. MARETSKII, and D. ROSIT.

In these studies and also in conversations at home, which then bore an ordinary theoretical character, I developed to them my anti-Leninist views, proceeding fundamentally along the lines of problems of philosophy, the theory of historical materialism, and economics.

In those years (I think in 1919 or 1920) I was writing a large book with the title "Theory of Historical Materialism" and I used to read each of the chapters as I wrote it in my circle, where these chapters were hotly discussed. Here was both developed and fully formulated the anti-Marxist theory of equilibrium that I mentioned above, in which the dialectical triad was interpreted as equilibrium, its destruction, and its reconstitution; all social processes were viewed from that same point of view.

Here also was developed the anti-dialectical conception of mechanical materialism, which reduced all processes of nature and society to a mechanical movement of matter. But since these fundamentally false theoretical arrangements were accompanied by the drawing into the discussion and exposition of a large quantity of literature, including foreign literature, the listeners were impressed by my "erudition", and I was delighted at having found such grateful "students." Thus was created the exaltation of my person, the well-known closed nature of the circle as "mine", on the basis of anti-Leninist and anti-Marxist theoretical arrangements, and the discussion of all theoretical questions in this, as we called it at the time, "laboratory of thought" developed in this way on the basis of anti-Leninist views.

Ties among the persons grew, and so did a special loyalty to the circle. Of course the matter was not limited to the book mentioned above; the discussion of different theoretical questions proceeded on a wide front and little by little began to interweave itself with the discussion of questions of the politics of the day.

In 1921-1923 a nucleus of the participants in the circle entered the IRP [Institute of the Red Professoriate — G.F.], where I continued to visit them at home (in the dormitory of the IRP).

The composition of the group was at that time approximately this: A. SLEPKOV, D. MARETSKII, G. MARETSKII, D. ROZIT, I. KRAVAL', A. TROITSKII, A. GUSEV, F. BOGDANOV, A. ZAITSEV, N. STREMOUKHOV; near them stood MONOSOV and RADIN. I don't remember when A. STETSKII, P. PETROVSKII, K. ROZENTAL', T. LEVIN, V. MEZH LAUK, and then IA. STEN appeared.

It is necessary to note that at about this time a group of IRPists had already turned into an organized fraction and had entered elections to organizations of the IRP, nominating their candidates and supporting them at the elections.

III. Transition of the "Bukharin School" to political activity

From the above it may be understood that the group would sooner or later make the transition to political activity and become a special fraction of "ideologists" within the party. That is what occurred. I personally considered that one of the reasons for my previous defeats in the struggle against Lenin was the lack of cadres who agreed with and were devoted to me, and therefore out of this "school" I recruited for myself cadres who by their education would guarantee such devotion.

At the outset of the struggle with Trotskyism I wrote a so called "memorandum" that was read out loud to a small part of the group (this memorandum was not given to the Politburo of the CC of the ACP(b) [CC = Central Committee; ACP(b) = All-Russian Communist Party (Bolshevik), the formal name of the Party, changed in October 1952 to Communist Party of the Soviet Union]. I must stop to deal with it since it contained a series of completely anti-Party and anti-Leninist arrangements.

Its basic ideas, if my memory does not fail me, boil down to the following.

In the "memorandum" the following questions were posed: After Lenin's death a crisis in the leadership of the Party would begin and a well-known part of the leadership would be cut off. This would bring about a further deepening of the crisis and a new cutting off. The result would be a group in the leadership itself where each leader would have his people, like the staffs of the White army, in which there was no unity. Is it not imaginable that we could have in our system of proletarian dictatorship two parties replacing one another like the Republicans and Democrats in the USA where they, remaining parties in essence of one class, periodically change places? Or, is it not imaginable that we could have an ACP(b) organization along the lines of the "Workers' Party" (or "Party of Labor") with a broad base?

I wrote this memorandum when Trotsky, after Lenin's death, came out against the CC of the ACP(b).

The sense of the memorandum thus consisted in this: that we must carry out the struggle with Trotskyism in such a way as not to cut Trotsky off from the leadership, and this found its expression in a definite phrase in the memorandum that related to Trotsky: we must "get along with each other while we fight."

I acted accordingly.

In the struggle that developed with Trotsky my group took part, but the struggle was carried out in relaxed ("gentlemanly") forms and had special arrangements as its basis.

To put it briefly, we carried out the struggle with Trotskyism as a fraction within the ACP(b), acting — if I can put it this way — in a bloc with the Party. At about this time my group added to its numbers. Into it came: AIKHENVAL'D, E. GOL'DENBERG, A. ALEKSANDROV, V. KUZ'MIN, P. SAPOZHNIKOV (TSETLIN appeared, I think, only in 1926).

Thus I was already beginning to create for myself cadres for the following struggle with the Party leadership headed by Stalin. In place were special ideological formulations, people, and their consolidation. The sense of closedness, fractional loyalty, conceitedness, anti-Party talks about Stalin's supposedly low theoretical level, petty criticism, gossip and anecdotes about the leadership of the Party were made more serious by the fact that I, in a criminal manner, initiated the nucleus of this fraction to all the most intimate affairs of the Party leadership, acquainted this nucleus with secret Party documents of the CC, Politburo, Executive Committee and Presidium of the Comintern; I praised these young people and thereby corrupted them politically, sowed the seeds that would bring their own criminal fruit.

I pretended to the role of a leader of the Party under Lenin, actively struggled in the Party against Lenin and was defeated. Lenin's death untied my hands and I began to prepare the cadre who were devoted to me and on whom I could rely in a struggle to seize the leadership in the Party. The participants in the fraction, the "school" I had founded, were precisely those cadres who had already achieved a certain influence in the Party. Afterwards they became activists in the anti-Party and anti-Soviet struggle against the leadership of the Party, against Stalin.

IV. Formation of the counterrevolutionary Right organization

Approximately around 1928 in the land of proletarian dictatorship there appeared well-known elements of crisis in the relationship between the proletariat and peasantry and the leadership of the Party, with J.V. Stalin at its head, began to lay out the road to overcoming these elements on the basis of the further victorious movement forward towards socialism.

I was in opposition to a series of measures proposed by J.V. Stalin, and this anti-Party arrangement quickly transformed in the given historical situation, given the ever sharpening class struggle — into an anti-Soviet and, in essence, a counterrevolutionary arrangement.

It is superfluous to repeat here that the anti-Leninist theoretical views I have outlined above played a significant role in the formulation of the ideology of the Rights. In 1928 I, together with E.V. TSETLIN, at that time for all practical purposes my secretary, I visited IAGODA in his office in the OGPU. I began to ask him about the mood among the peasantry. IAGODA called the corresponding employee (I seem to remember it was ALEKSEEV) who gave me a detailed report, with figures and facts, laying emphasis on the kulak rebellions in a series of regions, on terrorist acts against Soviet workers in the countryside. I asked IAGODA: "Why do you not report about all this in the Politburo?" At which point he then replied: "That is your job, N.I. — you do the reporting, and I will always help you with materials." I remember that after that I went to the Revvoensoviet [= Revolutionary Military Council, the organ of supreme military power from 1918 to 1934] to K.E. Voroshilov, where Bubnov was present at the time (I think he was then the head of the PUR [Political Directorate of the former body]) and emotionally began to recount what I had just heard.

Voroshilov cursed me out, saying that I was falling into a panic and hysterics, and then, as later became obvious to me, reported my views to Stalin.

After that I got into ever sharper conflicts with the leadership of the Party, that is, I took more and more anti-Party paths, paths of active struggle with the Party. Thence too the gradual rapprochement with RYKOV and TOMSKY, from whose statements at closed sessions of the Politburo I saw that they too held, more or less, the same views that I did, though without any clear theoretical formulation.

At the same time I systematically kept my group current with all the intimate business of the Politburo, told them about all the conflicts and in this way educated them on anti-Party arrangements.

At about this same time there began the illegal meetings of a number of the members of the CC, among those I have mentioned RYKOV, TOMSKY and myself. If I am not mistaken, the first such meeting was at TOMSKY'S dacha, where I presented theses in which I had formulated my own views. Present were myself, TOMSKY, I cannot recall whether RYKOV was there, a few members of the CC who were trade unionists (I remember UGAROV), I think SMIRNOV ("Foma") was also present, V. POLONSKI, N. ANTIPOV, DOGADOV, and possibly UGLANOV (V. POLONSKI soon left).

These meetings continued, usually concentrated chronologically before the plenums of the CC or any important party meetings, and had as their immediate goal the organization of fractional presentations at these plenums. An important role in these meetings was played by the so-called "Muscovites": UGLANOV, KOTOV, KULIKOV, V. MIKHAILOV, RIUTIN, IAKOVLEV (the former secretary of the Khamovnicheskii raion in Moscow city).

At these meetings there were many so-called Rykovite "learned secretaries" (S. RADIN, NESTEROV, <illegible>) and my supporters: SLEPKOV, MARETSKII, E. TSETLIN and others, where they played the role of an auxiliary apparatus (in gathering materials for speeches, in the formulation of these or those positions, etc.). These meetings usually took place in the Kremlin, in TOMSKY'S, RYKOV'S, or my own apartment.

Along with these meetings I must mention the almost two-day vigil of trade unionists at TOMSKY'S during the well-known congress of trade unions, to which I also went. Here there was a great crowd of people, but I cannot remember which ones with full certainty: UGAROV, DOGADOV, UDAROV, V. SHMIDT, MEL'NICHANSKY, IAGLOM (one of the most important figures of the Right trade unionists), I think, KOZELEV, FIGATNER. In general, among the personnel who formed the basis of the Right organization as it was put together, the following basic forces must be noted:

1. M.I. TOMSKY and a group of trade unionists;
2. A.I. RYKOV, his secretaries and connections with the people of the Soviet apparatus;
3. N.I. BUKHARIN and his pupils;
4. The "Muscovites" with UGLANOV at their head (mentioned above, plus the group in the Promakademiia [Industrial Academy], plus the group of youth with MATVEEV at their head).

In general at that time the organization of Rights that was in the process of formation was more or less that which the Germans in old times called a "lose Organisation", but little by little a characteristic, though not formally fixed, organizational hierarchy formed itself:

1. Opposition members of the CC.
2. Above them a de facto leadership of the "troika" (BUKHARIN, RYKOV, TOMSKY), one that stood out both thanks to its specific gravity and thanks to its position, which became the Rightist center. Nearest to it stood N.A. UGLANOV who, having earlier been secretary of the Moscow Committee, had the "Muscovites" behind him.

For a full picture I must say a few words about the Comintern. Naturally the so-called "Russian question" had its reflection here as well. Of the Russian workers of the Communist International the viewpoint of the Rights was shared by E. TSETLIN, GROL'MAN, IDEL'SON, SLEPKOV (A.), who had ties, above all, with the so called German "conciliators" (the group of Ewert-Gerhardt); a part of the Americans sympathized with it (Lovestone & Co.), a part of the Swedes (Chilbum [Bukharin means Karl Kilbom]) and a few others.

The most prominent figure at that time of these circles was EWERT, with whom I also met personally, at which meetings the conversation had a clear "anti-Stalin," that is, anti-Party orientation.

Such was the formation of the counterrevolutionary Right organization.

Its ideological formation developed in step with speeches above all at Plenums of the CC, discussed beforehand at the illegal meetings cited above, where the plan of speeches, arrangement of speakers, and order of speeches, was worked out.

The specially sharp and counterrevolutionary <illegible> in these speeches found its expression in the thesis of the military-feudal exploitation of the peasantry, that in the political situation then existing generalized the anti-Soviet opposition of the capitalist classes. These speeches are generally known, and it's not worthwhile to discuss them now. It is, however, essential to note the fact that I wrote a large and detailed platform of the Rights, which was discussed at a meeting of the Rightist members of the CC plus a few from my "school": here a sharp and anti-Soviet critic of the political line of the party and government was given across the front of all questions of a general political nature, from economics to the politics of the Comintern, from inner-party politics to the problems of Party leadership.

I must especially note the vicious criticism of the so-called "Party regime". I think it's not necessary to discuss this topic further because I am aware that the text itself of the platform is in the possession of the investigators.

V. Search for a bloc with KAMENEV-ZINOVIEV

Since we, the Rights, in our struggle against the Party did not rest our hopes on our own forces alone, we began to seek allies among other anti-Soviet groups and organizations and, first of all, with the group of Kamenev-Zinoviev, behind whom there had been at one time a fairly significant number of adherents in the Leningrad organization.

Among the facts relevant here are the following:

1. My meeting with Kamenev at KAMENEV'S apartment.
2. My meeting with PIATAKOV in the Kremlin hospital, where KAMENEV was also present.
3. My and TOMSKY'S meeting with KAMENEV at V. SHMIDT'S dacha.

For the investigation, of course, the various "psychological experiences" which these meetings elicited, are of no interest, but what is important is the political sense and meaning of these facts, as attempts even at that time to establish a political bloc between the counterrevolutionary organization of the Rights and the counterrevolutionary group of KAMENEV-ZINOVIEV, and also with the Trotskyites through PIATAKOV.

The meeting at KAMENEV'S apartment was the most significant, it seems to me. The factual side of this case is as follows: SOKOL'NIKOV whom I knew as a Rightist among the Zinovievites dropped in on me and accompanied me to KAMENEV, from whom he quickly withdrew. I was in a very excited condition and in extremely sharp phrases I criticized the politics of the Party, the politics of Stalin, characterizing it as the politics of civil war, the politics of the organization of famine, the politics of the removal of the old activists of the Party, etc.

KAMENEV waited expectantly, let me "talk myself out" and restricted himself to brief replies, as they say, "twisted his moustache" over my anti-Party outbursts. As is well known he later gave a memorandum of the conversation to the Trotskyites, and they issued a corresponding proclamation. Although this meeting did not lead at that time to any direct political results, it was the first attempt at the establishment of political contact between the counterrevolutionary organization of the Rights as represented by myself and the counterrevolutionary organization of the Zinoviev-Kamenev kind.

The second meeting was the meeting in the Kremlin hospital, where PIATAKOV lay (before that I used to drop in on him in his apartment in the Nirnsee building [the 'dom Nirenze' was a tall fashionable building built in 1912 according to the design of the engineer E.N. Nirnsee], but those were 'household' conversations and PIATAKOV even sent his daughter to accompany me: "See Kolya out.").

I arrived at the hospital with the platform of the Rights, which I mentioned above. In the hospital with PIATAKOV was KAMENEV, I read aloud the economic part of the platform and asked those present their opinions about the corresponding positions of the platform. On this occasion too both of them were careful and did not say anything of substance, although they listened to the document I read out to them with obvious attentiveness.

At last, the third meeting was the meeting at SHMIDT's dacha (near TOMSKY'S dacha). SHMIDT himself was not present. The initiative for this meeting was TOMSKY'S (here I'd like to state that I do not remember the chronology of the two last meetings).

I went there together with E. TSETLIN. Thus there were present KAMENEV, TOMSKY, I myself, and TSETLIN. That was before one of the plenums of the CC and, as I seem to remember, KAMENEV'S efforts (rather leisurely, it is true) were aimed at finding out whether we, i.e. the Rights, would speak up at the CC Plenum and to ward off the possibility that we would not speak out.

VI. Transition to dishonest tactics

Towards 1930-31 the political situation in the country became extremely sharp because of the desperate opposition by the kulaks and their allies in the cities (a part of the old bourgeois intelligentsia et al.). Difficulties grew, and a part of the Rights began political speculation on these difficulties.

We gathered all possible information about the opposition to collectivization, about the various manifestations of peasant dissatisfaction, about the slaughter of farm animals, about the lack of bread, about the growth of price inflation, about various economic paradoxes (this was called "the economy rearing up"), we carefully gathered together facts such as that wagon-drivers were feeding their horses with baked bread because that was cheaper, etc. without end. The fact that we were counting on the use of these difficulties became the main theme of the corresponding conversations and discussions among the members of the Right counterrevolutionary organization at RYKOV'S, my own, and TOMSKY'S apartments in conversation with the members of the Rightist group at the apartments of SLEPKOV, of ASTROV, and others.

But here I must first say a few words about the so-called "capitulation" of the Rights that took place in several ways.

It was completely obvious to us that the further continuation of open struggle would lead to the full defeat of the whole cadre staff of the organization, to the loss of all the authority of its leaders, to a series of repressive measures, etc. We, the Rights, in open speeches — at the plenums of the CC and at a few meetings of party organizations — were beaten in ideas: there was no chance at all of any winning over of a majority. In the trade unions where, it would seem, TOMSKY'S authority would have been undeniable, in the Moscow organization (even earlier) which had been ruled by UGLANOV, in the Soviet apparatus where RYKOV had connections, even in the Comintern, where I worked — everywhere the Party was victorious, and our supporters were isolated clusters. At this point we arrived at the idea of the necessity of "capitulation" and about the transition to the tactics of deception.

At this point it is interesting to note that even earlier than this the <illegible> of our (Rightist) milieu of the so-called "non-fractional fraction" <illegible> such methods of spreading our views, methods which would at the same time prevent the Rights from defeat (and this was our deduction from the experience of the struggle of the Trotskyites and Zinovievites against the Party) — [and] serve as the basis for the formulation of our tactics of deception.

This was the transition to "keeping two sets of books," that is, to disguising, i.e. illegality as a principle of work, that is the violation not only of Party, but of Soviet, constitutional, state legality generally.

This transition to illegal methods of struggle inevitably led, with the force of the logic of continuing the struggle, to extremely serious consequences and to all the escalating harmfulness of the organization of the Rights. Above all, the "troika", which had formally capitulated, was turned now into the illegal center of the Right opposition.

Near to this center also stood A.S. ENUKIDZE. ENUKIDZE was well known as a man of a liberal-philistine kind and at the same time as a man who had sympathized with the Rights. TOMSKY often talked with him and reported to him <illegible> of the corresponding attitudes in relation to economic policy and in relation to questions of the "inner Party regime." I also had meetings with ENUKIDZE, during which he expressed a lively sympathy towards me, RYKOV and TOMSKY, as persons who had been "insulted." TOMSKY recommended him as "his" man who could prove helpful by virtue of his position, contacts and possibilities. In this way ENUKIDZE was drawn into the orbit of attention of the Right center and through TOMSKY came into close relations with it.

Further. Around this time during the course of Party repression many participants of the organization were dispersed around various cities: in Voronezh, Samara, Leningrad, Novosibirsk, etc. etc. In preparation, before their departures a discussion of this matter occurred among the members of the center of the Rights and we decided that "there is no evil without some good", and the fact that these people were sent around to those places could be used for various purposes, in the first place, along the lines of collecting information about the situation in those places (because we already did not believe the official statistical data at all), and then — and this is the main point — to gather new cadres in the periphery, to recruit new supporters with the aim of continuing the struggle with the party and widening < illegible > of the cadres of the counterrevolutionary organization of the Rights.

So this work was carried out in the local areas. In addition from time to time people visited Moscow, reported about the mood in their local area, about local workers, about their "successes" in the matter of selection of cadres for the counterrevolutionary organization of the Rights. Usually this information was transmitted not at the meetings of the center but in other ways; these people would arrive and drop in on me or on TOMSKY or RYKOV and would report about the situation and the person who received this information, when he met with the others, would tell about them in turn. I personally continued to visit the apartments of SLEPKOV, MARETSKY, and ASTROV and sometimes received information that way too. I can't remember whether there was a meeting of all of the "troika" with a report by anyone of those who had arrived, but I can't exclude that possibility. In our turn we, that is the members of the Rightist center, wholly approved of this activity, gave advice, recommended redoubled carefulness and a meticulous selection of people, warned against failures, spoke about the collection of information of special interest to us, gave new impetus to the continuation of anti-Soviet work in the local areas.

The recruitment of people went on without interruption in this way. Among the questions that had especial significance I must mention RYKOV'S information about IAGODA. RYKOV, who was in his time connected to IAGODA (or rather, the other way around) once reported that IAGODA had declared that he was a supporter of ours but that he, IAGODA, wanted to maintain himself in an especially conspiratorial position due to the nature of his job, and that it was necessary to protect this specially conspiratorial position in the most careful way.

VII. Transition to the tactic of forcible overthrow of the leadership

At the beginning of 1932 the question of the platform of the Rights was raised again. The platform of 1929 was outdated: since then much had already changed in the country, and this required a political stock-taking.

At a meeting of the center of the Rights at, if I am not mistaken, TOMSKY'S dacha it was decided to begin work on a new platform. In addition we agreed that for this new platform those parts of the 1929 platform could be used that were not outdated and had retained their force. There the criticism of the Party regime, "Stalin's dictatorship", the transition to methods of forcible overthrow of the leadership became the order of the day.

At this meeting of the troika, which UGLANOV also attended, it was decided that UGLANOV'S "boys" would work out the platform. UGLANOV accepted this commission, and after a little while the platform was worked out. At its basis lay the arrangements I indicated above. It became known under the name of the Riutin platform, however it was the platform of the whole Rightist counterrevolutionary organization taken together, its ideological foundation — the critique of the economic policy of the Party and government, the critique of the inner-Party regime, etc. Its theoretical premises, — <illegible> this presented only a further historical development of our views.

The Riutin group was supposed to conceal the fact that the platform was the platform of the whole Rightist organization taken together: this was a pseudonym under which the organization of the Rights presented itself, a pseudonym that protected the center and the organization as a whole from attack.

This platform was issued under the leadership of UGLANOV. The technical side of this job is not known to me, and I did not have the chance to get acquainted with it in its final form, since around the moment it was issued I went on leave, but I was aware of the main issues in it, as can be seen from the preceding exposition.

I went away on vacation after I had given my agreement to the calling of a meeting of workers of the counterrevolutionary organization of the Rights in the outlying areas. Initiative for the calling of the meeting belonged, if I'm not mistaken, to A. SLEPKOV who had arrived in Moscow from Samara in the summer of 1932 and who was the main organizational force of my so-called "school."

This conference did take place at the end of the summer of 1932 in my absence, and contact between it and the center of the Rights was maintained through M.P. TOMSKY, who was connected with SLEPKOV and others through one of SLEPKOV'S closest friends, ZHIROV, who worked in OGIZ [Association of State Journal and Book Publishers], which was headed by TOMSKY.

At this same time the Riutin platform was discussed at a meeting at TOMSKY'S where, as TOMSKY or RYKOV told me afterwards, TOMSKY himself, RYKOV, UGLANOV and, I think, V. SHMIDT were present. The Riutin platform was discussed as the platform of all the counterrevolutionary organization of the Rights as a whole. Here it received in this way its official sanction in the name of the leadership of the Rights. The center also confirmed the decisions of the conference where, aside from reports from the local areas and information, the Riutin platform was also discussed with all that it implied, namely the course towards a "palace coup", terror, and a bloc with the Trotskyite-Zinovievite organization.

When I arrived back from my vacation the majority of the participants of the conference had already been arrested.

Here it is appropriate to pause with more detail on several questions connected with the conference. Above all, on the idea of a "palace coup." This thought had also flared up much earlier, at first from TOMSKY, who was connected with ENUKIDZE and, obviously had stumbled onto the idea of the possibility of using this person's position, as in his hands were concentrated the Kremlin guard, including the school of students of the TsIK [Central Executive Committee, the legislative branch of the Soviet government]. In addition while RYKOV was chairman of the Sovnarkom [Council of People's Commissars, the executive branch of the Soviet government, we could discuss the use of his position too.

At first this idea bore a rather theoretical character. I can't remember who, when and where spoke about the palace coup then, but I do not exclude the possibility that I myself had such conversations with someone of the participants of my group.

However the logic of struggle, the closing off of the ways for legally obtaining a majority in the Party, our complete defeat in open struggle, the transition to the tactics of duplicity and to illegal methods of struggle, did their work, and this idea was already been seriously considered. The connection of TOMSKY to ENUKIDZE and the connection of RYKOV to IAGODA, about which I have spoken above, served as the practical basis for the corresponding practical conclusions.

TOMSKY once told me, after I had already arrived, that ENUKIDZE had agreed to head this coup, that IAGODA would also take part in it, and that ENUKIDZE had even recruited for this matter the commandant of the Kremlin, PETERSON, who had earlier been, as is well known, the commander of the so-called train of TROTSKY. Thus the plan for the coup d'état ripened.

Further. The preliminary attempts to establish a bloc with other counterrevolutionary organizations (the Zinovievites and Trotskyites) had not ceased. From the information reported to us by local area workers of the counterrevolutionary organization of the Rights I, like other members of the center, knew that in the local areas there was a strong pull to establish contact between the Rights, Trotskyites, and Zinovievites. SLEPKOV was saying this about Samara, MARETSKY — about Leningrad, AIKHENVAL'D was saying this about Moscow, etc. In addition, if I am not mistaken, they were talking mainly about the youth. Also, everyone knew about the so-called "Right-Leftist bloc" of SYRTSOV-LOMINADZE, a bloc that had shown essentially the same tendency.

In this manner the search for allies on the part of the Rights in the local areas served to a certain extent as a new base for the search for contacts and agreements at the top.

In the course of these agreements, ties and contacts in the local areas at that time the tendency was almost evident that the Zinovievites, and especially the Trotskyites, were oriented towards terror and saw in it the Alpha and Omega of tactics, while the participants in the Right counterrevolutionary organization, while recognizing terror as a method of struggle with the Party, nevertheless saw the center of gravity in mass actions, (peasant uprisings), in serious political demonstrations. The very idea of a coup d'état at first did not have any mass dissemination for understandable reasons and was discussed in the center of the organization and in circles close to it.

This connection of the counterrevolutionary groupings in the local areas served as an additional stimulus of a very strong kind for agreement among the leaderships as well. It, this agreement, took place not in the guise of any single, formal document, but in the form of a series of contact conversations between representatives of various counterrevolutionary groupings.

I spoke with PIATAKOV and TOMSKY and RYKOV spoke with SOKOL'NIKOV and KAMENEV. With PIATAKOV I had a conversation in the PCHI [People's Commissariat of Heavy Industry] (approximately in the summer of 1932). It began with an exchange of opinions about the general situation in the country. PIATAKOV reported to me about his meeting in Berlin with SEDOV concerning the fact that TROTSKY was insisting on the transition to terrorist methods of struggle against the Stalin leadership and about the necessity of consolidating all the anti-Soviet forces in the struggle for the overthrow of the "Stalinist bureaucracy." I told PIATAKOV that consolidation is all very well, but that a general basis for such unity was necessary. PIATAKOV emphasized terror but my attitude towards this method of struggle was very skeptical since I considered it to be a specific product of Trotskyite fury and antagonism that made little political sense. But in general and on the whole we agreed that coordination of activities was essential, assuming that disagreements would be overcome one way or the other in the process of cooperative struggle and as the "old cadres" became closer.

TOMSKY and RYKOV were reaching an agreement with KAMENEV and SOKOL'NIKOV, I don't recall any more in which combinations and who with whom; only the names have stuck in my memory. I recall that TOMSKY defended the idea of a bloc with especial energy, spoke out even more decisively for the necessity of overthrowing Soviet power and was trying to prove the necessity of that bloc, arguing, among other things, that in order to accomplish the coup d'état a concentration of all serious forces was necessary. In this context he once again cited the roles of ENUKIDZE and IAGODA, of which RYKOV also spoke.

In this way we were discussing the overthrow of the government and the creation of our own government, the makeup of which at that time was not further defined.

Therefore, towards the end of 1932 a bloc between the counterrevolutionary organizations of the Rights, the Zinovievites, and the Trotskyites generally was put together on the basis of the so-called Riutin platform, with all its arrangements that ran along the lines of terror, uprising, coup d'état.

Among the participants of the counterrevolutionary organization of the Rights at about that time (1932) there were terrorist attitudes: they broke out both in the "school" (KUZ'MIN, SAPOZHNIKOV) and in the group of MATVEEV (the Uglanovists), and among the supporters of RYKOV (RADIN, NESTEROV), and among the trade unionists (KOZELEV). These attitudes received their formulation on the basis of the so-called Riutin platform. It seems to me that the organization of the Rights ought not to be imagined as terrorist in the strict sense of the word, because the center of gravity of the counterrevolutionary tactics of the Rights did not lie here. But within the organization there grew up terrorist groups that laid a firm base in the basic arrangements of the "Riutin platform", which had been sanctioned by the center of the Rights.

To this period of time we must also attribute the creation of another group of conspirators in the Red Army. I know about this from two sources: from TOMSKY and ENUKIDZE, who told me that in the Red Army at the head of the command staff a union between Trotskyite-Zinovievite elements with the Rights had taken place. Among the persons who were named by them I remember TUKHACHEVSKY, KORK, PRIMAKOV, and PUTNA.

The contact of the military organization with our center took place through ENUKIDZE.

Among the most important facts of the counterrevolutionary and conspiratorial activity towards the end of 1932 and the beginning of 1933 we must pause at the creation of a general center comprised of the Rights TOMSKY and RYKOV, the Zinovievites KAMENEV and SOKOL'NIKOV, the Trotskyite PIATAKOV, the military TUKHACHEVSKY, and KORK, and IAGODA. Concerning the formation of such a center TOMSKY informed me at one time. He was very closely connected to ENUKIDZE and knew more about all the corresponding circles than I did.

With great internal hesitation I agreed that the Rights should send their representatives to it. I don't concretely remember the circumstances under which the corresponding decision of the center of the Rights took place and I can't say whether this unified center ever actually met: the members of this center spoke separately with one another and contact between them was sporadic. This center set as its task the unification of all the anti-Soviet forces in the country for the overthrow of the government. With these goals the group of ENUKIDZE in the Kremlin was created, and the military organization with the participation of the Trotskyites and the Rights.

Before the 17th Party Congress in the center of the Rights stood, on TOMSKY'S initiative, the question of the possibility of the arrest of Stalin and the scheduling of the coup d'état for that moment. I determinedly protested against that. The question was not brought for discussion to the general center and, as TOMSKY told me, the Trotskyites and Zinovievites protested this. Here we must pause on the relations with the Mensheviks and the SRs [Socialist-Revolutionaries]. First of all I must note that RYKOV had age-old connections with the Mensheviks through NIKOLAEVSKY, a prominent Russian Menshevik whose brother V. NIKOLAEVSKY was married to A.I. Rykov's sister. Through NIKOLAEVSKY RYKOV maintained contact with the Mensheviks abroad and kept them informed about Soviet affairs generally and about the counterrevolutionary activity of the organization of Rights specifically and especially. In my last trip abroad (the spring of 1936) I managed to meet and spend a long time with NIKOLAEVSKY, with whom I and V.V. ADORATSKY (in whose service on the business of the Institute of Marx and Engels NIKOLAEVSKY was active) were traveling from Paris to Holland and Denmark. In addition in Copenhagen we all lived in the same hotel. Here I, on Rykov's instruction before his contact with NIKOLAEVSKY, told the latter about the "Riutin" platform and the bloc with the Trotskyites and Zinovievites, at which time it turned out that NIKOLAEVSKY already knew about this, and that the Mensheviks agreed to be in contact on the specified basis with the unified counterrevolutionary groupings.

Much earlier, before the summer of 1932 I had tried to establish contact with the SRs in the USSR through SEMENOV, an SR with whom I had established good relations. At that time we — the Rights — assumed that in the event of kulak movements it would be essential to make use of the contacts that the SRs undoubtedly had among this group, that the bloc with the SRs was permissible as it had been permissible at the time the Party had entered a bloc with the Left SRs on the basis of the peasant question.

Therefore to SEMENOV were given by me instructions on setting up contact with the important SRs and SR groups in the local areas.

I must also note that contacts with the SRs were also maintained by Foma SMIRNOV, who had them, these ties, among the workers of the People's Commissariat of Agriculture.

At last I must confess that in May 1934 S. B. CHLENOV dropped in on me. I knew him from very old times (1905-1906-1907), and then in my work at the Sverdlovsk University where he gave lectures. In recent times I had rarely met him, since in addition he was almost always working abroad. At the end of our talk I told him about the unification of anti-Soviet forces, and then began to ask him whether he might ever manage to bump into the leaders of the parties, Mensheviks and SRs, and whether he could feel out their attitude on the subject of setting up contact with their organizations.

CHLENOV promised to carry out this work. But at his next arrival he only managed to vaguely say that the SRs demanded some kind of formalities, but in principle did not object to contact.

After the murder of S.M. Kirov, in connection with the fact that the CC turned serious attention to the work of the NKVD, there appeared the danger of the general defeat of all counterrevolutionary organizations. However IAGODA even so managed to direct the blow only against the Trotskyites and Zinovievites (although not thoroughly), and sheltered the organization of the Rights. ENUKIDZE'S fall (1935) transferred his role in the preparation of the coup in the Kremlin to IAGODA himself, in whose hands the direct security of the Kremlin then fell.

During the past few years (1934-1935) TOMSKY had maintained direct contact with PIATAKOV and SOKOL'NIKOV, as members of the parallel center, with whom M. TOMSKY found himself in contact, while I had been in touch with K. RADEK.

I had numerous meetings with RADEK. These meetings were easily explained by our work together on the editorial staff of "Izvestiia" and in view of the fact that we were neighbors at our dachas.

In the summer of 1934 I was at RADEK'S apartment when RADEK informed me about TROTSKY'S external political arrangements. RADEK said that Trotsky, stressing terror, all the same considered the main chance for the arrival in power of the bloc to be the defeat of the USSR in war with Germany and Japan, and in connection to this was promoting the idea of an agreement with Germany and Japan at the cost of territorial concessions (Ukraine to the Germans, the Far East to the Japanese). I did not object to the idea of an agreement with Germany and Japan, but I did not agree with Trotsky on the question of the extent and nature of the concessions.

I said that in the most extreme case we might talk about concessions in territory or trade agreements, but that there could be no question of territorial concessions. I asserted that Trotsky's impulsive nature might lead to complete compromise of his organization and also of all the Trotskyite allies, including the Rights, since he does not understand the massive growth of patriotism of the peoples of the USSR.

I don't remember in which month in 1934 I dropped in on RADEK at his apartment to read to him an article I had written. There I unexpectedly found a man who RADEK said was MRACHKOVSKY.

MRACHKOVSKY, who knew about my role in the bloc, immediately raised the question of terror and started to try to find out what was being done in that regard by the Rights, but I declined this conversation in its concrete aspects and only told him that he knew about the so-called Riutin platform and, consequently, about the general arrangements of the Rights. Soon after that I left.

In the summer of 1935 I was sitting on the veranda of RADEK'S dacha when suddenly three Germans drove up to him in a car. RADEK introduced them to me as German Fascist professors. For my part the conversation consisted in attacks on the so-called "race theory", and RADEK made a very sharp attack on Hitler, soon after which I left. Afterwards RADEK told me that one of the Germans was BAUM, that he had had business with him earlier, on behalf of Trotsky, that he, RADEK, had informed BAUM about the Trotskyite-Zinovievite bloc and about the Rights, but that he did not want to converse with BAUM in the presence of other persons and that therefore, he said, he had broken off the conversation with his attack against Hitler, letting the other know by this means that under such conditions he did not want to have any conversation at all.

Then at my place with RADEK there was a large conversation at Skhodnia (at the dacha) [Skhodnia is a town northwest of Moscow] on questions of international politics, where I said that many in the USSR, frightened by the theory of organized capitalism, do not see the real measures, in the first place, of an economic character, that went along the lines of state capitalism (in Italy and Germany above all), and that these measures should not be underestimated. The political conclusion I was making here consisted in this, to set a course very decisively towards the satisfaction of the needs of the masses [i.e. consumer goods] and I again repeated that there could be no question of any territorial concessions, but it was possible to speak of trade concessions, and that the possibility of concessions in the area of raw materials were not to be excluded.

I remember yet another important conversation in which RADEK vaguely related that some kind of new directives on both internal and external politics had been received from Trotsky. I remember that I was angered by this way of generally treating any commands by Trotsky, to whom the Trotskyites related as almost to the military commands of a unitary command center. RADEK hinted to me that this was a question of some sort of new negotiations of Trotsky's with Germany or with England, but limited himself to this, having told me about Trotsky's directive concerning sabotage.

After my arrival from abroad I also had a number of meetings with RADEK. I told RADEK that I had seen "that Dan", and also about my conversations with NIKOLAEVSKY, about which I confessed earlier. RADEK declared that he fully approved of contact with the Mensheviks and that this could also come in handy in the case of any failures. I informed him at this that NIKOLAEVSKY had said about corresponding company abroad in the case of our failure.

Soon after the plenum of the CC where IAGODA make the report about the arrests of Trotskyites and Zinovievites, I informed RADEK in detail about the Plenum and IAGODA'S report and also said that a number of persons — including BUSYGIN and KOSHELEV — had never, as far as I knew, been Trotskyites, but had been Rightists.

I also mentioned that in IAGODA'S report not a word had been said about the Rights, from which I concluded that this time IAGODA had managed to ward off any blow against our organization, i.e. the Rights.

Aside from these, as it were, concentrated conversations, we had shorter and more chance meetings, where short exchanges of opinion took place. From these conversations the most substantive moments, as far as I remember, were the following:

1. RADEK informed me that TROTSKY was always urging the use of terror;

2. RADEK said that he had contact with the military men (PRIMAKOV and PUTNA, as far as I remember);
3. RADEK said that from PIATAKOV and SOKOL'NIKOV he knew about the existence of the unified center and of the military organization;
4. RADEK also told me about his trips to Tula and Gor'kii, where he had connections with the local Trotskyite circles, and that reports on the international situation served as his ostensible reason for these trips. In particular RADEK used to travel to Gor'kii to meet with SHMIT, a participant in a Trotskyite organization who worked, if I am not mistaken, as the kul'tprop [division of culture and propaganda, a Party organization] of the Obkom [Party city committee].

The present confession gives a general picture of the development of the counterrevolutionary activity of the Rights and their allies, and ~~also if it is necessary these confessions may be given more detail and the more precise confessions will <...> detailed, made more precise and filled out~~ <illegible>.

N.I. BUKHARIN (signature)

2 June 1937

2009: Evidence of Leon Trotsky's Collaboration with Germany and Japan

Figure 1. Gen. Kurt von Hammerstein-Equord, Leon Trotsky, Gen. Hajime Sugiyama

"If an objective research project on the events of those years were to be done, free of ideological dogmas, then a great deal could change in our attitude towards those years and towards the personalities of that epoch. And so it would be a "bomb" that would cause some problems. . . ."

– Col. Viktor Alksnis, 2000.

". . . it is essential for historians to defend the foundation of their discipline: the supremacy of evidence. If their texts are fictions, as in some sense they are, being literary compositions, the raw material of these fictions is verifiable fact. Whether the Nazi gas ovens existed or not can be established by evidence. Because it has been so established, those who deny their existence are not writing history, whatever their narrative techniques."

– Eric Hobsbawm, 1994, p. 57.

". . . we can demolish a myth only insofar as it rests on propositions which can be shown to be mistaken."

– ibid., p. 60.

This essay is an inquiry into the evidence that Leon Trotsky may have collaborated with German and/or Japanese officials, whether governmental or military, during the 1930s.

Trotsky was charged with and convicted in absentia of such collaboration at the three Moscow "Show," or public, Trials of 1936, 1937 and 1938.¹

Trotsky and his son Leon Sedov² were absent defendants and central figures in all these trials. Trotsky himself proclaimed the charges false, but they were widely though not universally credited until 1956. In February of that year Nikita Khrushchev delivered his famous "Secret Speech" to the 20th Congress of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union (CPSU). Aside from much other matter that will not concern us here Khrushchev hinted, without expressly affirming, that at least some of the defendants in these trials were punished unjustly.

¹ These trials are often called the "Show Trials." Often too they are identified by the names of the one or two most famous defendants. Thus the trial of August 19-24, 1936 is often called the "Zinoviev-Kamenev Trial"; that of January 23-30, 1937, the Piatakov-Radek Trial"; that of March 2-13, 1938 the "Bukharin-Rykov" Trial. The formal names for these trials are as follows: August 1936: "The Case of the Trotskyite-Zinovievite Terrorist Centre"; January 1937: "The Case of the Anti-Soviet Trotskyite Centre"; March 1938: "The Case of the Anti-Soviet 'Bloc of Rights and Trotskyites.'"

² Leon Sedov died on February 16 1938, shortly before the third Moscow Trial. He continued to figure prominently in the confessions of some of the defendants, as did his father.

In succeeding years most of the defendants, along with thousands of others, were "rehabilitated" and declared to have been innocent. Under Khrushchev's successors between 1965 and 1985 the wave of "rehabilitations" almost ceased. Subsequently, during Mikhail Gorbachev's tenure between 1985 and the end of the USSR in 1991, an even larger flood of "rehabilitations" took place. Later in the present essay we will discuss the essentially political, rather than juridical, nature of "rehabilitation."

By the late 1980s almost all the defendants at all the Moscow Trials, plus the defendants in the "Tukhachevsky Affair" of May-June 1937 and a great many others had been declared to have been innocent of all charges. The chief exceptions were figures like Genrikh Yagoda and Nikolai Ezhov, two heads of the NKVD³ who were certainly responsible for massive repressions, and many of their subordinates.

³ People's Commissariat (= Ministry) of Internal Affairs, which included national security and political police functions.

Virtually alone among the non-NKVD oppositionists Trotsky and Sedov have never been "rehabilitated." But the dismissal of charges against their codefendants and the declarations that all the conspiracies were fabrications means that they too have been declared innocent in fact though not "rehabilitated" legally.

Meanwhile there is a scholarly consensus that the Moscow Trials were fabrications, the defendants all innocent victims of frame-ups, and all the conspiracies inventions either of the NKVD or of Stalin himself. This consensus is a constituent part of the model, or paradigm, of Soviet history that is dominant within Russia itself and beyond its borders. However, no significant evidence that the trials were fabricated and the confessions faked has ever been published, while the vast majority of investigative materials relating to the trials is still top-secret in Russia, unavailable even to trusted scholars.

The Soviet Archives "Speak"

During the existence of the USSR and especially since Khrushchev's accession to power in 1953 few if any documents concerning the Moscow Trials and repressions of the late 1930s were published in the USSR or made available in the archives to researchers. Khrushchev and authorized historians and writers made a great many assertions about this period of history but never gave anyone access to any evidence about it.

Here is one example. At an historians' conference in December 1962, after many presentations by speakers promoting the official Khrushchev position about questions of Soviet history the convener, Presidium member Piotr Pospelov, spoke the following words:

Students are asking whether Bukharin and the rest were spies for foreign governments, and what you advise us to read. I can declare that it is sufficient to study carefully the documents of the 22nd Congress of the CPSU to say that neither Bukharin, nor Rykov, of course, were spies or terrorists. (Vsesoiuznoe soveshchanie 298).

While Pospelov's words are literally correct, they create a false impression. In the 1938 Trial Bukharin and Rykov were not convicted of carrying out espionage themselves, but of being leaders in the "bloc of Rights and Trotskyites" that did engage in espionage activities. Likewise both Bukharin and Rykov were convicted of recruiting others to engage in acts of violence against others — the best Russian translation here of the word "terror," which means something quite different in English — but not of engaging in it themselves. So Pospelov's words are correct in the sense most readers will understand — that a "spy" is someone who himself spies, and a terrorist someone who himself commits acts of violence.

But Pospelov is incorrect insofar as he wishes his audience to understand that their confessions and the verdict against them were wrong. Furthermore, the question was about "Bukharin and the rest" — presumably, all the other defendants in the 1938 Trial, whereas Pospelov restricted his answer to Bukharin and Rykov only.

In the passage that immediately follows the quotation above Pospelov clearly told his audience that the only materials historians should read are the official speeches made at the 22nd Congress:

"Why is it not possible to create normal conditions for working in the Central Party archive? They do not give out materials concerning the activity of the CPSU." I have already given you the answer.

In effect Pospelov was saying: "We are not going to give you access to any primary sources."

That situation continued until the USSR was dissolved. Thanks to documents published since the end of the USSR we can now see that some of the speeches at the 22nd Party Congress contained blatant lies about the oppositionists of the 1930s — a fact that fully explains Pospelov's refusal to let anyone see the evidence.

As one example of the degree of falsification at the 22nd Party Congress and under Khrushchev generally we cite Aleksandr Shelepin's⁴ quotation from a letter to Stalin by Komandarm 1 st rank (= Full General, the rank just below Marshal) Iona E. Iakir, accused of collaboration with Nazi Germany. In Shelepin's quotation from Iakir's letter to Stalin of June 9, 1937, the text read by Shelepin is in boldface. The text in the original letter (published in 1994) but omitted by Shelepin is in italics.

⁴ Head of the KGB (= State Security Committee), the successor to the security and political police functions of the former NKVD.

"A series of cynical resolutions by Stalin, Kaganovich, Molotov, Malenkov and Voroshilov on the letters and declarations made by those imprisoned testifies to the cruel treatment of people, of leading comrades, who found themselves under investigation. For example when it was his turn Iakir — the former commander of a military region — appealed to Stalin in a letter in which he swore his own complete innocence.

Here is what he wrote:

"Dear, close comrade Stalin. I dare address you in this manner because I have said everything, given everything up, and it seems to me that I am a noble warrior, devoted to the Party, the state and the people, as I was for many years. My whole conscious life has been passed in selfless, honest work in the sight of the Party and of its leaders — then the fall into the nightmare, into the irreparable horror of betrayal. . . . The investigation is completed. I have been formally accused of treason to the state, I have admitted my guilt, I have fully repented. I have unlimited faith in the justice and propriety of the decision of the court and the state. . . . Now I am honest in my every word, I will die with words of love for you, the Party, and the country, with an unlimited faith in the victory of communism."⁵

⁵ Shelepin's remarks are from his speech to the 22nd Party Congress of the CPSU, Pravda, October 27, 1961, p. 10, cols. 3-4. XXII S"ezd Kommunisticheskoi Partii Sovetskogo Soiuza. 17-31 oktiabria 1961 goda. Stenograficheskii Otchet (Moscow, 1962). II, 403. The parts Shelepin omitted, here in bold text, are in the fuller version in the "Spravka" of the Shvernik Report of 1963-4 first published in Voенно-Istoricheskii Arkhiv 1 (1993), p. 194, now normally cited from the volume Reabilitatsia. Kak Eto Bylo ["Rehabilitation. How It Happened"] vol. 2 (2003), p. 688.

As Shelepin read it the letter is from an honest, loyal man protesting his innocence. In reality Iakir fully admitted his guilt.

(There is also the matter of the two ellipses. Some of Iakir's text has been omitted even in this published version. Since Iakir confessed to treason to the state it is possible that he refers to collaboration with Germany, with Trotsky, or perhaps with other intelligence services. This is suggested in a tantalizing quotation in the case of Uritsky which we discuss briefly later in this essay. Iakir was one of the military figures involved both with collaboration with Germany and with Trotsky.)

The falsification goes far beyond the speeches at the 22nd Congress. Archival evidence now available permits us to see that Khrushchev, then later Gorbachev, and the historians who wrote under their direction, lied consistently about the events of the Stalin years to an extent that is scarcely imaginable.

A large number of documents from formerly secret Soviet archives have been published since the end of the USSR. This is a very small proportion of what we know exists. Especially as regards the oppositions of the 1930s, the Moscow Trials, the military "purges," and the massive repressions of 1937-38, the vast majority of the documents are still top-secret, hidden away even from privileged, official researchers. Yet no system of censorship is without its failures. Many documents have been published. Even this small number enables us to see that the contours of Soviet history in the 1930s are very different from the "official" version.

The Question of Trotsky And Collaboration With Germany and Japan

During the past decade a lot of documentary evidence has emerged from the former Soviet archives to contradict the viewpoint, canonical since at least Khrushchev's time, that the defendants in the Moscow Trials and the "Tukhachevsky Affair" military conspiracy were innocent victims forced to make false confessions. We have written a number of works either published or in the process of publication pointing out that we now have strong evidence that the confessions were not false and Moscow Trial defendants appear to have been truthful in confessing to conspiracies against the Soviet government. That work has led us to the present study.

Hypothesis

Leon Trotsky and his son Leon Sedov were indicted but absent defendants at each of the three Moscow Trials. If the charges against and the confessions of other defendants were basically accurate, as our research has suggested so far, that has implications for the charges voiced at those trials that Trotsky was in league with fascist Germany and militarist Japan. Such considerations led us to form the hypothesis for the present study: that a thorough search of published documents from the former Soviet archives would turn up more evidence of Trotsky's collaboration with Germany and Japan other than that given at the three Moscow Trials.

We came to adopt this hypothesis in much the same way Stephen Jay Gould describes how his colleague Peter Ward decided to test the "Alvarez hypothesis," the so-called Cretaceous-Tertiary catastrophic extinction that contradicted the hitherto widely accepted theory of the gradual dying out of so many life-forms about 60 million years ago.⁶ In the course of reading many documents from the former Soviet archives for other research projects we had identified several that appeared to provide additional evidence that Trotsky had indeed collaborated with Germany.

⁶ Stephen Jay Gould. Dinosaurs in the Haystack. Natural History 101 (March 1992): 2-13. Online at <http://www.stephenjaygould.org/library/gould_dinosaurs-haystack.html> and <<http://www.sjgarchive.org/library/text/b16/p0393.htm>>.

It seemed to us that more such documentary evidence might well be found if we actually set out to look for it. We also realized that, if no one ever set about looking for it, it would probably never be found and we would never know.

The fact that we have formed this hypothesis does not at all mean that we have predetermined the result of our research. Some hypothesis or "theory" is a necessary precondition to any inquiry. Gould reminds us of Darwin's perceptive statement made to Henry Fawcett in 1861:

How odd it is that anyone should not see that all observation must be for or against some view if it is to be of any service!⁷

⁷ Letter 3257 — Darwin, C. R. to Fawcett, Henry, 18 Sept [1861]. At <<http://www.darwinproject.ac.uk/entry-3257>>.

The present study is a "test" in Gould's sense: "a fine example of theory" — Gould means "hypothesis" here — confirmed by data that no one ever thought of collecting before the theory itself demanded such a test.

We have also been mindful of Gould's caution that a test does not prejudice the inquiry itself:

Please note the fundamental difference between demanding a test and guaranteeing the result. The test might just as well have failed, thus dooming the theory. Good theories invite a challenge but do not bias the outcome.

It is in principle impossible to prove a negative. If Trotsky did not collaborate with the Germans and/or Japanese there would be no evidence of his having done so. Unlike the situation with natural history, however, with human history there arises the possibility for fabricated or faked evidence. In the present essay we devote a lot of attention to this problem.

We set out to see whether we could find more evidence that Trotsky had collaborated with the Germans and Japanese. At a certain point in our research, when we had gathered a quantity of such evidence, we decided to study it and see what it amounted to. The present article is the result.

There exists a good deal of evidence concerning clandestine involvement on Trotsky's part with oppositional activities within the USSR during the 1930s quite aside from any collaboration with Germany and Japan. In addition to the testimony by defendants at the Moscow Trials, we also have archival evidence in the form of investigative interrogations to confirm such activity. To review all of it is far beyond the scope of this or any article. The present work concentrates solely on evidence of Trotsky's collaboration with German or Japanese governmental or military officials. We leave the other charges leveled against Trotsky unexamined. The charges of German and/or Japanese collaboration were the most shocking. They have always been regarded with far more skepticism.

For the most part we only cite and analyze direct evidence concerning Trotsky and the Germans or Japanese. This is a very narrow approach that excludes a great deal of other, corroborating evidence which tends to add credence to the direct evidence of Trotsky's guilt in collaborating with the fascists. For example, Nikolai Bukharin heard details from Karl Radek about Trotsky's negotiations and agreements with Germany and Japan. Bukharin never directly communicated with Trotsky or Sedov about this. However, there is no reason whatever to doubt that Radek did tell him about Trotsky's collaboration. By corroborating Radek's testimony on this point — Bukharin agrees that Radek did tell him this, as Radek himself had testified, so Bukharin attests to Radek's truthfulness here — Bukharin also tends to indirectly corroborate what Radek said about Trotsky and what Radek claimed to have gotten at first hand, from Trotsky himself. That is, Bukharin's testimony confirms that Radek was telling the truth in one instance, and that increases the credibility of Radek's testimony on other matters, including of his contacts with Trotsky and what Trotsky communicated to him. But here we will examine only Radek's, not Bukharin's testimony. We refer the interested reader to our previous study of Bukharin (Furr and Bobrov 2007). In a few places we do cite some corroborating evidence, mainly for the sake of providing context for the direct evidence.

Objectivity And Persuasion

Political prejudice still predominates in the study of Soviet history. Conclusions that contradict the dominant paradigm are routinely dismissed as the result of bias or incompetence. Conclusions that cast doubt upon accusations against Stalin or whose implications tend to make him look either "good" or even less "evil" than the predominant paradigm holds him to have been, are called "Stalinist." Any objective study of the evidence now available is bound to be called "Stalinist" simply because it reaches conclusions that are politically unacceptable to those who have a strong political bias, be it anticommunist generally or Trotskyist specifically.

The aim of the present study is to examine the allegations made in the USSR during the 1930s that Leon Trotsky collaborated with Germany and Japan against the USSR in the light of the evidence now available. This study is not a "prosecutor's brief" against Trotsky. It is not an attempt to prove Trotsky "guilty" of conspiring with the Germans and Japanese. Nor is it an attempt to "defend" Trotsky against such charges.

We have tried hard to do what an investigator does in the case of a crime in which he has no parti pris but only wishes to solve the crime. This is what historians who investigate the more distant past, or the history of countries other than the Soviet Union, do all the time.

We do wish to persuade the fair-minded, objective reader that we have carried out a competent, honest investigation. Namely: That we have done the following:

- collected all the evidence we could find supporting the contention that Trotsky collaborated with the Germans and Japanese;
- collected all the "negative" evidence — any "alibi" Trotsky or his son and chief political aide Leon Sedov may have had. We have done this chiefly by paying serious attention to Trotsky's testimony at the Dewey Commission hearings in 1937, where he himself laid out his defense;

- studied all this evidence carefully and honestly; and
- drawn our conclusions on the basis of that evidence.

We wish to persuade the objective reader that we have reached our conclusions on the basis of evidence and its analysis and not on any other basis, such as political bias. We are NOT out to arraign or "convict" Trotsky. We remain ready to be convinced that Trotsky did not collaborate with Germany and Japan if, in the future, further evidence is disclosed indicating that those charges are false.

The Role of Appropriate Skepticism

Throughout this essay we have tried to anticipate the objections of a skeptical critic. This is no more than any careful, objective researcher should do, and exactly what both the prosecution and the defense in any criminal investigation do with the evidence and interpretation.

We have a lengthy discussion of evidence at the beginning of the essay. In the body of the essay we follow each presentation of evidence with a critical examination. In the final section subtitled "Conclusion" the reader will find a review and refutation of the objections a sharp but fair-minded critic might have.

We are aware that there is a subset of readers for whom evidence is irrelevant, for whom — to put it politely — this is not a matter of evidence but one of belief or loyalty. We discuss the arguments normally raised from this quarter in the subsection titled "Objectivity and Denial." In any historical inquiry as in any criminal case "belief" and "loyalty" are irrelevant to the truth or falsehood of the hypothesis. By definition, a belief that is not rationally founded on evidence can't be dispelled by a sound argument and evidence.

However, those who cannot bring themselves to question their preconceived ideas may nevertheless be provoked by those same prejudices to look especially critically at the evidence and to find weaknesses in its interpretation that might escape other readers for whom there is less at stake. This sometimes makes objections from such quarters worthy of attention. We have tried hard both to anticipate and to deal with such objections in a satisfactory manner.

Evidence

Before proceeding to cite and study the new archival documents we need to discuss the question of evidence itself. Whereas "documents" are material objects — in our case, writing on paper — "evidence" is a relational concept. We are concerned with investigating an allegation: that Trotsky conspired with German and/or Japanese officials. We aim to gather and study the evidence that suggests Trotsky acted as alleged.

There is no such thing as absolute evidence. All evidence can be faked. Any statement — a confession of guilt, a denial of guilt, a claim one has been tortured, a claim one has not been coerced in any way — may be true or false, an attempt to state the truth as the speaker (or writer) remembers it, or a deliberate lie. Documents can be forged and, in the case of Soviet history, often have been. False documents have on occasion been inserted into archives in order to be "discovered." Or, it may be alleged that a given document was found in an archive when it was not. Photographs can be faked. Eyewitnesses can lie, and in any case eyewitnesses are so often in error that such evidence is among the least reliable kind. In principle there is no such thing as a "smoking gun" — evidence that is so clearly genuine and powerful that it cannot be denied.

The problems of identifying, gathering, studying, and drawing correct conclusions from evidence are similar in criminal investigation and in historical research. This is especially true when, as in our case, the research is to determine whether a kind of crime took place in the past. But there are important differences, and it's vital to be clear about them.

In a criminal trial the accused has certain rights. The trial has to be finite in length, after which the accused is either convicted or acquitted for good. The defendant ought to enjoy the presumption of innocence and the benefit of any reasonable doubt. The defendant is entitled to a qualified defender whose sole job it is to interpret all evidence in a way so as to benefit his client. Meanwhile, the judge and even the prosecution are supposed to be concerned not just about securing a conviction but also about justice. Once they are reasonably convinced that the defendant is innocent their duty is to dismiss the charges and discharge the accused even though they might be able to sway the jury to convict. These practices are intended to prevent an innocent defendant from an unjust verdict and penalty.

Historians are in quite a different situation. Dead people have no rights (or anything else) that need to be defended. Therefore the historian does not have to be concerned with any presumption of innocence, "reasonable doubt," and so on. Unlike a legal verdict no conclusion is final. The historical inquiry need never end. It can, and will, be taken up again and again as new evidence is discovered or new interpretations of old evidence are reached. This is in fact what we are doing in the present article. We are investigating the question of whether Trotsky collaborated with German and Japanese officials in the light of new evidence, while at the same time reconsidering evidence that has long been available.

Identifying, locating, gathering, and even studying and interpreting evidence are skills that can be taught to anyone. The most difficult and rarest skill in historical research is the discipline of objectivity. In order to reach true conclusions — statements that are more truthful than other possible statements about a given question — a researcher must first question and subject to doubt any preconceived ideas she may hold about the subject under investigation. It is one's own preconceived ideas and prejudices that are most likely to sway one into a subjective interpretation of the evidence. Therefore, the researcher must take special steps to make certain this does not happen.

This can be done. The techniques are known, and widely practiced in the physical and social sciences. They can be adapted to historical research as well. If such techniques are not practiced the historian will inevitably be seriously swayed from an objective understanding of the evidence by her own pre-existing preferences and biases. That will all but guarantee that her conclusions are false even if she is in possession of the best evidence and all the skills necessary to analyze it.

Nowhere is a devotion to objectivity more essential or less in evidence than in the field of Soviet history of the Stalin period. As it is impossible to discover the truth absent a dedication to objectivity, this article strives to be objective. Its conclusions will displease, even outrage, a good many persons who are dedicated not to objectivity and the truth but to protecting the legend of Trotsky as an honorable revolutionary or to defending the Cold War — anticommunist paradigm of Soviet history.

Of course we don't claim to have found all the relevant evidence there is. It is overwhelmingly likely that there is a great deal more such evidence, since the vast majority of primary source documents dealing with the Oppositions of the 1930s are still classified in Russia and the post-Russian states today and are inaccessible to any researchers. But what we have now is a lot. In our judgment there is more than sufficient evidence that Trotsky did indeed collaborate with Germany and Japan more or less as the Soviet government accused him in the 1930s. Why Trotsky may have done so is a question worthy of consideration. We have added some thoughts about this toward the end of this essay.

Trotsky's Telegram to the Soviet Leadership

The first document we want to present is one that illustrates both the promise and the problems of interpreting documentary evidence.

June 1937 was a time of tremendous crisis for the Soviet leadership. In April Genrikh Yagoda, Commissar (head) of the NKVD until the previous September, and Avel' Enukidze, until recently both a Central Committee member and high-ranking member of the Soviet government, had begun to confess about their important roles in plans for a coup d'état against the government. The month of May had begun with an internal revolt against the Spanish Republican government in which anarchists and Trotskyists participated. The Soviet leadership knew this revolt had involved some kind of collaboration between pro-Trotsky forces there and both Francoist and German — Nazi — intelligence. By the beginning of June eight military officers of the highest ranks including Mikhail Tukhachevsky, one of only five Marshals of the Red Army, had been arrested and were making confessions of conspiracy with Trotsky and Trotskyists, the Rights led by Bukharin, Yagoda and Rykov, and — most ominous of all — with Nazi Germany and Japan.

On June 2 Nikolai Bukharin suddenly reversed himself and confessed to having been one of the leaders of this same conspiracy (Furr & Bobrov). That same day Lev M. Karakhan, a leading Soviet diplomat who at one time had been closely linked to Trotsky, also confessed.⁸ Marshal Tukhachevsky and the other military leaders evidently continued to make further confessions right up until June 9. On June 11 came the trial, where they confessed once again, and then their execution. Several high-ranking Bolsheviks and Central Committee members were associated with them.

⁸ Lubianka. Stalin i Glavnoe Upravlenie Gosbezopasnosti NKVD. 1937-1938 (M.: "Materik," 2004), No. 102, p. 225. Online at <<http://www.alexanderyakovlev.org/fond/issues-doc/62056/61084>>.

Before and during the Central Committee Plenum which took place from June 23 to 29 twenty-four of its members and fourteen candidate members were expelled for conspiracy, espionage, and treasonable activities. In February and March Bukharin, Rykov and Yagoda had been likewise expelled. Never before had there had been such wholesale expulsions from the Party's leading body.

Unquestionably, there was a great deal else that has never been made public. But these events, particularly the military conspiracy, appeared to constitute the gravest threat to the security — indeed, the continued existence — of the Soviet Union since the darkest days of the Civil War.

Trotsky and his son Leon Sedov had been convicted in absentia at the first Moscow Trial in August 1936.⁹ At the second Moscow Trial of January 1937 Karl Radek had explicitly identified Leon Trotsky as the leader of an important anti-Soviet conspiracy. He had specifically mentioned Spain as a place where Trotsky's adherents were dangerous and called on them to turn away from Trotsky. When the "May Days" revolt in Barcelona broke out on May 3 Radek's warning seemed prescient. For the communists, but also for many non-communists who supported the Spanish Republic, this rebellion in the rear of the Republic appeared to be the same kind of thing the Rights, Trotskyists and military figures were allegedly plotting for the USSR.

⁹ They were convicted of "having directly prepared and personally directed the organization in the U.S.S.R. of terroristic acts against the leaders of the C.P.S.U. and the Soviet State." Report of Court Proceedings. The Case of the Trotskyite-Zinovievite Terrorist Center. Moscow: People's Commissariat of Justice of the U.S.S.R., 1936, p. 180.

On the eve of the June C.C. Plenum Trotsky chose to send a telegram from his Mexican exile not to Stalin or the Politburo but to the Central Executive Committee, the highest organ of the Soviet government. In it he directly challenged its members to reject Stalin's leadership and turn towards himself.

POLICY IS LEADING TO COMPLETE COLLAPSE INTERNAL AS WELL AS EXTERNAL STOP ONLY SALVATION IS RADICAL TURN TOWARD SOVIET DEMOCRACY BEGINNING WITH OPEN REVIEW OF THE LAST TRIALS STOP ALONG THIS ROAD I OFFER COMPLETE SUPPORT — TROTSKY¹⁰

¹⁰ We have used the original English text of the telegram from a facsimile of the telegram itself in the Volkogonov Archive, Library of Congress, Washington DC. At this time international telegrams were normally sent in English; Trotsky sent it from Mexico. The comments of Stalin and his associates are not on the telegram itself but on the Russian translation provided to them along with it. The telegram was evidently first published in Novoye Vremia № 50 (1994) C. 37. We have put this facsimile and the Russian translation with the remarks of Stalin and his associates on the internet at https://msuweb.montclair.edu/~furrgr/research/trotsky_telegram061837.pdf>

A postscript to the original publication of this telegram reads as follows:

In June 1937 in Moscow, at the address of the Central Executive Committee (CEC) which was then formally the highest organ of state power in the USSR a telegram arrived from L.D. Trotsky in Mexico: [text of telegram]. Of course this telegram ended up not in the CEC but in the NKVD, whence it was directed to Stalin as a so-called "special communication." He wrote on it the following remark: "Ugly spy.¹¹ Brazen spy of Hitler." Stalin not only signed his name under his "sentence," but gave it to V. Molotov, K. Voroshilov, A. Mikoian, and

A. Zhdanov to sign.¹²

¹¹ Shpionskaia rozha, literally "spy-face". Rogovin translates it as "mug of a spy."

¹² L.B., "Will there be no more 'Secrets of the Kremlin'?" Novoe Vremia No. 50, 1994, 37.

The late Trotskyist author Vadim Rogovin paraphrased this same article in a footnote:

Trotsky's telegram ended up not in the CEC but in the NKVD where it was translated from the English (the only way the Mexican telegraph could accept it for sending) and sent to Stalin as a so-called "special communication." Stalin read the telegram and wrote on it a remark that bears witness to the fact that he had clearly lost his self-control: "Mug of a spy. Brazen spy of Hitler!" His signature beneath these words was completed with the signatures of Molotov, Voroshilov, Mikoian and Zhdanov, which expressed their agreement with Stalin's evaluation.¹³

¹³ Vadim Rogovin. 1937. Stalin's Year of Terror. Translated by Frederick S. Choate. Oak Park MI: Mehring Books, 1998, p. 487. Chapter 50: The July Plenum of the Central Committee.

The anonymous author of the article in Novoe Vremia (see note 10 above) dismissed Trotsky's note as a fantasy on Trotsky's part.

How should we understand Trotsky's proposal? Could he have possibly supposed that they would accept his help? Or that in 1937 a turn towards "Soviet democracy" was possible? One can't call this irony; it's more like an illusion.

(As a number of scholars have shown, a "turn towards Soviet democracy" was indeed a point of struggle in 1937).¹⁴

¹⁴ For the major sources and a summary of them in English see Grover Furr, "Stalin and the Struggle for Democratic Reform", Parts One and Two, Cultural Logic 2005. At <https://ojs.library.ubc.ca/index.php/clogic/article/view/191861/188830> and <https://ojs.library.ubc.ca/index.php/clogic/article/view/191862/188831>.

In his critical 1997 study of Trotsky Evgenii Piskun wrote:

This strange document bears witness to the fact that the leader of the Fourth International hoped that the USSR was going to undergo immense changes in the near future and that he would return to power again.

But he was wrong this time too. When the June Plenum of the CC had ended the Party leadership had not changed.¹⁵

¹⁵ Evgenii E. Piskun. Termador v SSSR. Idei L.D. Trotskogo i sovetskaia deistvitel'nost' 1920-1980. Riazan': Russkoe slovo, 1997, 73.

Rogovin agreed that Trotsky must have believed he had a good chance of coming to power:

Trotsky was not a person given to taking senseless or impulsive steps. Despite the fact that the motives of his appeal remain unclear even today, it is natural to assume that Trotsky possessed information which showed that the true devotion to Stalin of the majority of Party and Soviet leaders was in inverse proportion to their official exclamations of this devotion, and that Stalin's position was extremely fragile and unstable. This might have been the source of Trotsky's hopes that, under conditions of the Great Terror which was tearing one member after another from the Party ranks, a consolidation of the leading figures in the country would be possible which would be aimed at overthrowing Stalin and his clique. (Rogovin 487)

Rogovin accepted unquestioningly the orthodox Trotskyist position that Trotsky was not involved in conspiracies with the Germans. This presented him a problem: How to explain Stalin's handwritten comment on Trotsky's telegram? Even Rogovin had to admit that, since the note was addressed only to his closest, most trusted associates, it appeared to prove that Stalin and the rest of them did genuinely believe Trotsky was guilty of conspiring with the Germans. All Rogovin could offer was the following formulation, which takes us to the heart of our matter:

The document, as well as many other documents of the Politburo, and even the personal correspondence of its members, show that Stalin and his "closest comrades-in-arms" expressed themselves in a conventional code which was designed to give the impression that they believed in the amalgams they were creating. Otherwise Stalin, who hardly believed in the existence of contacts between Trotsky and Hitler, would not have written such words in a document intended only for his most immediate circle. (Rogovin, note to p. 487; emphasis added)

We now possess additional evidence that Stalin did indeed believe that Trotsky was plotting with the Germans. Rogovin offers no evidence to the contrary. In addition we now also have evidence that Trotsky, as well as many others, actually were conspiring with Germany and Japan. The evidence concerning Trotsky is the subject of this article. Trotsky's telegram of June 18, 1937¹⁶ will serve as an introduction both to the new evidence that has come to light since the end of the USSR and to the problems of and barriers to understanding what it means.

¹⁶ The original telegram seems to be dated June 18, as that date, "18 JUN 1937," is printed or stamped at the top of the last page. That appears to be the date the telegram was sent.. «06.20 ???? 1937 ?.» is written in small print at the top of the first page of the telegram. That may be the date it was received and translated. Stalin's note, and the signatures of Molotov, Voroshilov, Mikoian, and Zhdanov appear on the translation of the telegram, to which the telegram itself is appended in the archive. Though the date on this translation, at the far upper left-hand corner, is not legible, it is probably June 20.

To our knowledge no one has bothered to put all this evidence together or to re-examine in light of this new evidence the question of Leon Trotsky's ties to Japan and Germany, ties alleged by defendants at the Moscow Trials and by the Soviet government. Why is this? We think the two very different comments by Piskun and Rogovin suggest an answer. Rather than being the subject of careful study with an eye to questioning previous knowledge, the new evidence is being marshaled in defense of old historical paradigms.

Piskun's paradigm — that Trotsky was probably preparing for some kind of coup against the Soviet leadership — has only rarely been heard for many years. Nevertheless, Piskun reads Trotsky's telegram through the "lenses" of that paradigm, for the text of the telegram itself suggests nothing about any expectation of imminent change and return to power. The most that could be said is that the text is perhaps compatible with such an expectation. But we could never deduce such an expectation from the text alone. A sober reading of Trotsky's telegram might be that it is evidence that Trotsky was hoping for a return to power in the USSR but nothing more.

Rogovin's interpretation is even more strained. According to Rogovin Stalin could not possibly have believed Trotsky was a German spy even though he wrote this on the telegram and only his closest associates would see it. Rogovin's paradigm demands that Stalin had invented the charge that Trotsky was collaborating with the Germans (and Japanese). If that paradigm is to be preserved, then Stalin must be faking here too. No objective reading of the text of Trotsky's telegram and Stalin's remarks upon it would reach Rogovin's conclusions. Furthermore, Rogovin has no evidence to support his position that Stalin invented the charges against Trotsky. He simply assumes this to be true.

Piskun and Rogovin represent antithetical poles in interpreting both this document itself and the question of Trotsky's relationship, or lack thereof, with Germany and Japan. But charges of collaborating with the intelligence services of the major Axis powers were alleged not just against Trotsky but also against many of the defendants at the second and third public Moscow trials of January 1937 and March 1937. Elsewhere we have set forth a small part of the evidence that Oppositionists did, in fact, have some kind of clandestine political relationship, aimed at the USSR, with Germany and Japan.¹⁷

¹⁷ Grover Furr and Vladimir L. Bobrov, "Nikolai Bukharin's First Statement of Confession in the Lubianka." Cultural Logic 2007. At

<https://ojs.library.ubc.ca/index.php/clogic/article/view/191745/188745>. This is the English translation of an article and text first published in Russian in the St. Petersburg journal Klio No. 36 (March 2007).

There is a great deal of such evidence concerning other Oppositionists. The present work concentrates on evidence concerning Trotsky specifically. We must look for evidence that such a relationship existed not because we are convinced a priori that one must have existed but because it is in principle impossible to find evidence of a negative — e.g. that such a relationship did not exist. If we find no evidence that the Oppositionists had such a relationship, then the only responsible conclusion would be that they did not have any — again, barring further evidence to the contrary that may turn up in the future. This is normal historical procedure in any investigation: only positive evidence "counts." This does not mean, however, that any and all "positive evidence" points to one conclusion only, or is sufficient to sustain any single conclusion.

The present study does conclude that the evidence now at our disposal strongly supports the existence of collaboration between Trotsky and the Germans and Japanese. This creates a peculiar problem for us as historians since an article based upon the evidence — the present article — directly challenges the prevailing consensus on the Moscow Trials and specifically on Trotsky.

What's At Stake?

This prevailing consensus is a constituent part of the model, or paradigm, of Soviet history that is dominant within Russia itself and beyond its borders.

Trotsky and his son Sedov were accused of involvement with the German Gestapo at the 1936 Moscow Trial and of involvement with the Germans and Japanese at both the 1937 and 1938 Moscow Trials. Numerous witnesses at each of these trials testified that they had direct knowledge of Trotsky's (Sedov's) collaboration. These charges constituted a central feature of the trials. We will examine that testimony in this article.

The allegation that these charges are false likewise constitutes a central feature of the dominant paradigm of Soviet history during the Stalin period. Confirmation of the guilt of Nikolai Bukharin in the crimes to which he confessed guilt has already seriously undermined what we may briefly term the "anti-Stalin" paradigm of Soviet history. Confirmation of Trotsky's involvement with the Germans and Japanese would corroborate the evidence we already have that the charges were true to which the Moscow trials defendants confessed themselves guilty.

On the evidence we have Trotsky did in fact collaborate with the Germans and Japanese. This is consistent with the charges made against Trotsky and his son at the Moscow trials.

It is not for us to hazard a guess as to what may be the implications of this fact for Trotskyism itself. Insofar as Trotskyism is a set of political principles that are detachable from Trotsky the politician it may have few implications. Its implications may be more far-reaching for those varieties of Trotskyism that base themselves on a cult of respect for Trotsky the man and are unable to separate him from his ideas.

Trotskyism has already survived the discovery in the early 1980s that Trotsky lied to the Dewey Commission. As the recent article by Sven-Eric Holmström demonstrates Trotsky's lies about the "Hotel Bristol" affair, both to the Dewey Commission and in his journal Bulletin of the Opposition, are more far-reaching than had previously been proven. It will be some time before we can discern what if any influence Holmström's research will have on Trotsky's followers. In any case it is for them, not for us, to decide what those implications may be.

What Do You Mean "Evidence"?

This statement focuses our attention on a central question: What kind of evidence would we accept? Unless objective criteria are established and then rigorously adhered to, the researcher will almost certainly "find" what his historical preconceptions, his historical paradigm, tells him to look for.

In doing so he will either ignore or misconstrue anything that does not fit his preconceived ideas. What a researcher agrees to accept as evidence, and to exclude as evidence, is too often a reflection of his historical paradigm. The problem of "acceptable evidence" is simply magnified in the case of a charge of secret conspiracy.

There are serious problems with any kind of evidence.

- Confessions in or out of court: They might be fabricated, for any of a number of motives, including currying favor with the prosecution or state; as evidence that one has "repented"; to shift the blame onto someone else; as a result of torture or the threat of torture, threats against one's family, and so on.
- Incrimination by associates: These are open to the same kinds of tampering as are confessions of the accused.
- Documentary evidence: Documents can be forged. Any state has the technical means to fabricate documents that will convince anyone except, possibly, an independent scientific expert who is allowed to use destructive methods of analysis to test the chemical composition of the ink, molecular analysis of paper, etc., in order to determine whether the document is genuine. As this is virtually never permitted in the case of archival documents deemed important, skilful forgery is a powerful tool.

Documentary evidence can also be destroyed. Russian researchers have told us that Khrushchev had a great many papers — perhaps amounting to thousands of pages — removed from archives during his leadership in the USSR.¹⁸ Some documents have also been removed from the "closed" Trotsky Archive at Harvard University.¹⁹ No archive is, or can be, completely secure from such manipulation.

¹⁸ E.g. M.Yunge, R. Binner. Kak terror stal "Bol'shim." Sekretnyi prikaz No.00447 i tekhnologiya ego ispolneniia. Moscow: AIRO-XX, 2003, 16.

¹⁹ This will be discussed in more detail below.

Moreover, how likely is it that agreements of espionage and conspiracy would have been written down in the first place? Anything written down at some point would surely have been hidden securely or, more likely, destroyed as soon as read. As long as such written evidence remained it would pose a terrible threat to any conspirator. We can be certain of the existence of one such conspiracy in Soviet history — that among members of the Presidium to get rid of Lavrentii Beria — because it succeeded on June 26, 1953. Yet no prior written record of that conspiracy has ever come to light, and no single, reliable account of it exists even now.

These are just examples. In general, there is no kind of evidence that cannot be forged or faked. Neither is there any kind of evidence that can, by itself, provide conclusive proof of any act.

In this essay I assume that the larger the number of individual items of evidence that are all consistent with a single interpretation the less is the chance that they, and that interpretation, are the result of some kind of "orchestration" or fabrication according to a preconceived plan. This should be especially so in the case of documents which were never intended to be public at all. When combined with evidence from documents that were never directly related to any prosecution, the likelihood of fabrication becomes very small indeed. This is similar to what is called "circumstantial evidence" in the legal system. When there is enough of it, circumstantial evidence is the most powerful evidence there is.²⁰

Such is the case, I would argue, with Trotsky's telegram of June 18 1937. As Rogovin recognized, the most significant thing about this telegram is what Stalin wrote upon it. But Rogovin's own conclusion lacks any convincing rationale. No one who was not already convinced that Trotsky was innocent of collaboration with Germany would ever suspect that Stalin did not believe the truth of what he wrote to an audience of his closest associates, remarks never intended to go any further. "Anything is possible" perhaps — but what is likely? Rogovin would have us believe that Stalin, Molotov, Mikoian and Zhdanov were "pretending" among themselves that Trotsky was working with the Germans even while knowing perfectly well that it was they themselves who had made this story up. No evidence supports such a conclusion.

If the words on this telegram were the only evidence we had that led us to suspect the accusations against Trotsky were not fabricated — not by Stalin or to his knowledge, at least — they would be highly significant. Stalin saw all investigative materials, including huge quantities of evidence that is either still classified in Russia today or has been destroyed. However, there is much more evidence that points in this same direction.

"Fabrication" Of Confessions

In discussions such as these, where any questioning of the dominant paradigm is viewed with distrust and even horror, it is difficult to distinguish the presentation of the evidence from the act of responding to the anticipated objections to this evidence coming from that same paradigm. So below we will offer a summary rebuttal to paradigmatic objections to some of the evidence we present. The details will come later.

The "canonical view" or "dominant paradigm" of Soviet history is that all defendants in the Moscow Trials were innocent of the charges to which they confessed. But there is no "canonical view" about how the faking of those confessions might have been accomplished.

The transcripts of the three Moscow Trials have been available since the 1930s. According to the dominant paradigm of Soviet history these transcripts are dishonest and the confessions of the defendants recorded in them are fabrications.

But the term "fabrication" does not have any fixed meaning. No one has cited any evidence whatsoever that the confessions were not truthful, so no one is in a position to say anything definite. The charges against the defendants are simply declared to be "absurd" and the conclusion is drawn that the defendants must have been induced to lie by some means. "Fabrication" is a word that is broad enough in its meaning to cover any kind of falsification.

The allegation that the confessions were false, like any other assertion of fact, can and must be tested in the light of all the other available evidence. Of course this is done as a matter of course in criminal cases.

Historians are under a similar obligation to verify the veracity of confessions as well as of other evidence. We undertake to discharge this responsibility in the present essay. At the outset we were prepared to find evidence that the confessions of the defendants and/or the other evidence against them is false. In fact, the opposite appears to be the case. The evidence now available strongly tends not to disprove but to confirm the truth of the confessions and other evidence we cite here.

The Issue of Torture

In this essay we devote serious attention to the hypothesis that the defendants in the Moscow Trials and others who directly or indirectly implicate Trotsky in collaboration with Germany or Japan may have been induced to make false accusations by one means or another. Most troubling is the allegation of real or threatened torture. Specifically, we discuss the "torture" hypothesis in connection with Zinoviev, Ezhov, Uritsky, and Iakovlev (see below). We examine Col. Alksnis' belief that the Tukhachevsky trial defendants were not tortured. At the end of the essay we devote yet another section of the essay to the subject of torture. We have a great deal of evidence that the defendants in the Moscow Trials were not tortured or otherwise threatened into making false confessions.

All interpretations of the Trial testimony, like all interpretations of any evidence, are hypotheses. "Torture" is one hypothesis. Like any hypothesis, evidence is required before it becomes a reasonable theory of explanation. In this case there is no such evidence.

We have adduced the appeals to the Soviet Supreme Court by ten Moscow Trials defendants. All of them insist that they are guilty. These documents were never intended to be made public.

Radek stated up front in the 2nd Moscow Trial (January 1937) that it was not the investigators that tormented him, but he who tormented his investigators. Bukharin said that "incriminating evidence" (uliki) was what induced him to begin confessing after three months of silence. Elsewhere we have cited Steven Cohen's conclusion that Bukharin was not tortured. We see no reason to repeat Cohen's reasoning here. Cohen is the world's expert on Bukharin and continues to insist that he was entirely innocent while admitting that there is no evidence to support that conclusion.

In early 2006 a confession by Mikhail Frinovsky, second-in-command to Nikolai Ezhov at the NKVD, was published.²¹ In it Frinovsky admitted that Ezhov and his co-conspirators, himself included, had tortured and fabricated false charges against a great many people. But Frinovsky explicitly said that this was not done in the case of the March 1938 Trial of the "Bloc of Rights and Trotskyites," the "Bukharin" trial.

²¹ "Spetssoobshchenie L.P. Berii I.V. Stalinu s Prilozheniem Zaiavleniia M.P. Frinovskogo. 13 aprelia 1939 g. In Lubianka. Stalin i NKVD-NKGB-GUKR "Smersh" 1939 - mart 1946. Eds. V.N. Khaustov, V.P. Naumov, N.S. Plotnika. Moscow: "Materik," 2006. No. 33, pp. 33-50. I have put the original text online at <<https://msuweb.montclair.edu/~furg/research/frinovskyr.html>> and an English translation (mine) at <<https://msuweb.montclair.edu/~furg/research/frinovskyeng.html>>.

In this same confession Frinovsky also explicitly states that Bukharin et al. were guilty, and that moreover he and Ezhov were part of this Rightist conspiracy too. Furthermore he states that Bukharin knew Ezhov was involved in this conspiracy and kept quiet about it at the trial, taking this secret to his death.

Frinovsky said:

The preparation of the trial of Rykov, Bukharin, Krestinsky, Yagoda and others. An active participant in investigations generally, Ezhov kept himself aloof from the preparation of this trial. Before the trial took place the face-to-face confrontations of the suspects, interrogations, and refining, in which Ezhov did not participate. He spoke for a long time with Yagoda, and that talk concerned, in the main, of assuring Yagoda that he would not be shot.

Ezhov had conversations several times with Bukharin and Rykov and also in order to calm them assured them that under no circumstances would they be shot. Ezhov had one conversation with Bulanov, and began this conversation in the presence of the investigator and myself, and finished the conversation one on one, having asked us to leave.

At that moment Bulanov had begun talking about the poisoning of Ezhov. What the conversation was about Ezhov did not say. When he asked us to enter again he said: "Behave yourself well at the trial — I will ask that you not be shot." After the trial Ezhov always expressed regret about Bulanov. At the time of the executions Ezhov suggested shooting Bulanov first and he himself did not enter the building where the shootings took place. Here Ezhov unquestionably was ruled by the necessity of covering up his own ties with the arrested leaders of the Right who were going into the public trial. [Emphasis added — GF]

In no way did Frinovsky deny torturing and fabricating false confessions against innocent people. Rather, he contrasted the way Ezhov handled the "Bukharin" trial defendants with the way he dealt with a great many innocent victims, whom he had tortured by his "bone-breakers" so that they would sign confessions drafted by Ezhov's NKVD men. Ezhov did not use torture against them.

To sum up: Frinovsky confessed to widespread torture, but (a) specifically exempted the defendants in the 1938 Trial; and (b) specifically stated that Bukharin was, in fact, guilty. Frinovsky's confirmation of the guilt of Bukharin and others corroborates all the other evidence we have concerning Bukharin.

Before its publication in 2006 Frinovsky's confession had been fraudulently quoted by historians and by the Soviet Supreme Court itself, suitably expurgated so that it seemed to prove the innocence, not the guilt, of the 1938 Trial defendants. This was done in the same manner as Shelepin's dishonest quotation of Iakir's letter, which we briefly examined above. (An article of ours on this subject is pending in Russia.)

No hypothesis is worth anything unless it is supported by evidence. There is no evidence to support the "torture" hypothesis, and a great deal of evidence against it. Therefore the "torture" hypothesis must fall.

Other Possible Hypotheses to Account for Bukharin's Confession

Bukharin's confessions are important for us both because they illustrate the issues involved in allegations of torture and because Bukharin explicitly implicates Trotsky. We'll discuss his testimony about Trotsky later in the present essay. Here we are concerned with the "torture" question.

In any trial there are a number of hypotheses aside from the "torture" hypothesis that may account for a false confession of guilt by a defendant:

- The defendant's family is threatened.
- The defendant wishes to "punish himself" to atone for past misdeeds.
- The "Rubashov" explanation made famous in Arthur Koestler's book Darkness At Noon — that "the Party demands it," the Party is history's instrument and so history demands it, and so on.
- The defendant has been promised favored treatment by the Prosecution in return for falsely accusing others.

In Bukharin's case there is no evidence to support any of these hypotheses.

The main reason defendants confess to crimes of which they are guilty is their belief that the prosecution has sufficient evidence to convict them of the crime(s) in question, rendering further denial useless, indeed counterproductive. A defendant decides to cooperate with the prosecution in hopes of more lenient treatment by the court — of "getting the best deal he can." It now seems beyond doubt that this was the reason for Bukharin's confession of guilt. At the second Moscow Trial of January 1937 four defendants — Radek, Sokol'nikov, Arnol'd and Stroilov — who appeared to have cooperated fully with the prosecution were sentenced to prison instead of execution. Two of these, Grigory Sokol'nikov and Karl Radek, were the principal defendants. This was a strong incentive for any defendant for whom further denial seemed hopeless to cooperate. Frinovsky's statement now corroborates Bukharin's own testimony at trial. Bukharin himself said that "the evidence" was the primary factor motivating his confessions, which began with his first one on June 2, 1937. Frinovsky testified that Ezhov promised Bukharin and others that they would not be shot as long as they did not disclose Ezhov's own involvement with the conspiracy. Frinovsky does not claim that he actually heard Ezhov say this. But he does state that Ezhov did not organize any false confessions in this trial.

Frinovsky himself stated that he knew that Bukharin was guilty. And indeed Bukharin did not mention at his trial that Ezhov was a co-conspirator.

Frinovsky also confirms Bukharin's guilt as a conspirator known to Ezhov. This corroborates a great deal of other evidence we now possess, including some confessions of Yagoda published for the first time in 1997.

Towards the end of this essay we return to the matter of torture in a different way: to consider the allegations of torture and how they have functioned in the historiography and mythology of Trotsky's role, the Moscow Trials, and the history of the Stalin period generally.

Why Did None of Trotsky's Supporters At The Moscow Trials Defend Trotsky?

None of Trotsky's longtime and devoted supporters among the Moscow Trial defendants defended Trotsky or their actions in supporting him. They not only pled guilty to various crimes, including working with Trotsky; they recanted their former longtime allegiance to him and condemned him in harsh terms. It may be asked: how is this to be explained other than by the fabrication of false testimony through torture or some other means?

In a criminal case we should not think it strange if co-conspirators "fall out" and denounce one another, as the longtime Trotskyists did during their testimony at the public Moscow trials. Moreover, we should also consider the trial from the viewpoint of the prosecution, the Stalin government. What was the purpose of having these public, or "Show," trials in the first place?

Like any criminal prosecution, of course, the trial was to deter further criminal (in this case, treasonous) activity and encourage those who suspected such activity to report it to authorities. But larger motives were doubtless at play as well.

The Soviets were terribly afraid that, if the USSR were seen to have been weakened by serious conspiracies at the top, some combination of enemy states would attack them. They also feared that the Western powers, led by France and the U.K., would not agree to "collective security," mutual defense treaties with the USSR against Nazi Germany. Given the political conjuncture of the mid-1930s it seems safe to assume that the trials were also aimed to demonstrate to the world that these high-level conspiracies had been nipped in the bud, that the Soviet government was still in charge, and that, therefore, Soviet security was not adversely affected.

That these fears were well founded is suggested by the facts that (a) Japan did indeed attack the USSR — twice, in 1938 and a larger assault in 1939; and (b) the Allies did refuse to make any mutual defense treaties with the USSR. Rather, they continued to push Hitler to attack the USSR. The late Alvin D. Coox, the leading expert on Soviet-Japanese relations during this time, concluded that the Japanese attack on the USSR at Lake Khasan in 1938 was directly motivated by the testimony of General Genrikh Liushkov, who defected to Japan in July 1938 and reported that the Red Army was seriously weakened.²²

If we assume that this was the purpose of the "Show Trials" it stands to reason that the only defendants who would appear in them would be those who would attack Trotsky and say they were wrong, the USSR was right, and so on.

²² Coox 1, 92; Coox 2, 145.

Why Is There No German or Japanese Evidence Of Trotsky's Collaboration?

"Most conspiracy theorists don't understand this. But if there really were a C.I.A. plot, no documents would exist." (Shane 2009)²³

Instructions on concrete organization questions regarding preparation for underground conditions must be given only verbally. . . . At the very least it should have been specified that these names and addresses be given strictly orally. . . .²⁴

²³ Gerald Posner, "author of an anti-conspiracy account of the Kennedy assassination, on efforts to obtain C.I.A. documents relating to the assassin."

²⁴ O. Weber. "How Not to Prepare For Underground Conditions of Revolutionary Work." The Communist International. July 1, 1932, 417.

In the course of this essay we will show that there is a large amount of mutually-corroborative evidence of Trotsky's German-Japanese collaboration from the Soviet side. In addition we have important evidence from German and Japanese sources of collaboration by members of the Soviet opposition including some who themselves claimed to have been working with Trotsky.

But no evidence of German or Japanese collaboration with Trotsky has been discovered outside the former USSR. There are a number of possible explanations:

- Trotsky never collaborated with the Germans or Japanese. All the Soviet evidence is fabricated.

If Trotsky did collaborate the following possibilities exist:

- Many of these archives were destroyed during the war.
- Nobody has looked — at least, we are not aware anybody has done so and particularly in the unpublished papers of the German generals allegedly involved.
- These archives too might have been "purged."
- There never was an archival evidence of this collaboration. In fact, conspiratorial information of this kind is typically not written down at all.

We know that the Soviet archives have been purged by Khrushchev, and perhaps by others. Even though we have had very limited experience working with other archives, we know of two cases in which archival materials have "disappeared." In addition the vast majority of Soviet archives is not open to researchers. Given the evidence that we have discovered in the relatively few archival documents that have been published to date it seems likely that further evidence implicating Trotsky may be contained in archives that are still classified. Later in this essay we briefly discuss the "purging" of the Trotsky archive at Harvard of incriminating materials.

In countries still extant it is normal to keep intelligence archives secret indefinitely. This is certainly the case in the USA. We suggest it is logical to suspect the same thing in the case of Germany and Japan.

There is a great deal of evidence that the military commanders led by Marshal Mikhail Tukhachevsky did indeed collaborate with the German General Staff. But we have only indirect confirmation of this from German Archives, and a somewhat more direct confirmation in one document from the Czech Archives.

In discussing their espionage for Germany several Soviet defendants said they had dealt directly with German General Kurt von Hammerstein-Equord. Rumor, at least, of this collaboration evidently survived in Hammerstein's family. Although to our knowledge no written record of that collaboration exists, it appears that no one has actually looked for such records.²⁵ Nor has anyone ever undertaken to survey the surviving papers of the German generals allegedly involved.

²⁵ Hans Magnus Enzensberger. Hammerstein oder der Eigensinn. Eine deutsche Geschichte. Berlin: Suhrkamp, 2008, pp. 234; 213-215.

But absence of evidence is only "evidence of absence" when evidence should indeed be present. We believe that the single most likely reason is simply that no one should expect a conspiracy like this to be documented anywhere, ever, much less "in archives." The demands of secrecy and security require that such information be exchanged only by word of mouth.

The lack of archival or in fact of any documentary evidence of the successful conspiracy against Lavrentii Beria has already been cited. This conspiracy must have involved at least half a dozen men. Accounts of it by its participants do not agree in details except in this: it was all planned and carried out through oral communication. There is no mention of any written communication. What does exist in the archives is the outline of a speech to be delivered by Malenkov at the Presidium meeting of June 26 1953. It was at this meeting, we know, that Beria was either arrested or possibly even killed. Malenkov was certainly a party to whatever occurred. Yet Malenkov's archive contains only an outline of his speech, according to which Beria was to be removed as head of the MVD (Ministry of Internal Affairs, including the internal police force) and made Minister of the Petroleum Industry.²⁶

Alleged Lack Of Non-Soviet Evidence

As Sven-Eric Holmström discusses and as we too shall discuss more fully below, the Trotsky archives at Harvard have been purged of evidence that Trotsky supporters with privileged access to this otherwise-closed archive found embarrassing to Trotsky's reputation. The materials purged included, at the very least, further evidence about the existence of the "Bloc of Rights and Trotskyites" and Trotsky's correspondence with supporters within the USSR.

The late Pierre Broué, one of the world's premier Trotskyist scholars and a person who enjoyed widespread respect from anticommunist scholars, concluded that this evidence meant little since it only demonstrated the existence of a bloc in 1932. Broué assumed that because the only evidence that was not successfully purged from the archive happened to be from 1932 that must have been the only time the "bloc" existed. That is, Broué erroneously assumed in his article that there was no bloc after 1932 because there is no evidence in Trotsky's archive for the bloc after 1932.

This ignores the fact that the archive has been purged. It is invalid to assume, as Broué did, that the "bloc" existed only in 1932 because the only evidence we have for its existence is from 1932. Had those who "purged" Trotsky's archive done an even more thorough job we would not even have this evidence. Yet that would in no way imply that no evidence of the "bloc" ever existed. Much less would it imply that no "bloc" ever existed after 1932. "Lack of evidence" — in this case, of the existence of the bloc after 1932 — "is not evidence of lack" — that such evidence never existed and/or never did exist.

If those who "purged" the Harvard Trotsky archive of incriminating documents had been more thorough they would have also taken the certified mail receipts of Trotsky's letters to oppositionists in the USSR and Trotsky's and van Heijenoort's notes about the "bloc of Rights and Trots." Then what would we now have? We'd have the Gorbachev-era "rehabilitation" document denying that there ever was such a "bloc," and Trotsky's staunch denial that there ever was such a "bloc." Plus we'd have the insistence of the Soviet Prosecutor, Vyshinsky, and the confessions of a number of Moscow Trial defendants, that there was indeed such a "bloc."

Therefore Getty's discovery in the Trotsky archive corroborates the testimony of the Moscow Trial defendants. It is evidence that they did not lie, since in the few instances where we can get independent evidence — as here — that evidence supports the trial defendants' confessions. Likewise it corroborates the statements of the Prosecutor — that is, of "Stalin," in the reductive language of anticommunist writers. Thus the testimony of the trial defendants and the Soviet prosecutor about the "bloc" and about Trotsky's correspondence turns out to have been truthful, while Trotsky's testimony and that of the Gorbachev-era Soviet government was false.

This is not direct evidence of any Trotsky collaboration with Germany or Japan. But it is consistent with such allegations, since it corroborates the testimony of the same witnesses on a related matter. Trotsky denied collaborating with Axis representatives just as he denied existence of the "bloc" and contact with his Soviet supporters. Therefore the lack of evidence in Trotsky's archive of any contact with the Axis is not evidence that such evidence was never there.

We do have a little non-Soviet evidence of such collaboration. In February 1937 the Japanese Minister of War, General Hajime Sugiyama, revealed in a meeting that Japan was in touch with oppositionists within the USSR who were providing the Japanese with military intelligence.²⁷

²⁷ "Soviet Links Tokyo With 'Trotskyism.'" New York Times March 2, 1937, p. 5.

Other examples of non-Soviet evidence attest to the real existence of the conspiracies alleged by the Stalin government. There is the "Arao telegram," extant at least in 1962-63 though never heard from since. We have direct testimony from the German ambassador to Czechoslovakia that Hitler knew that high-ranking military figures in the USSR were preparing a coup d'état. This document, in the Czech national archives, was only discovered in 1987. This document is corroborated by correspondence found in captured German archives disclosed in 1974 but not recognized until 1988.²⁸

²⁸ Our articles on these subjects are awaiting publication in Russia, but the existence of these documents has long been acknowledged by Western and Russian scholars.

General of the NKVD Genrikh S. Liushkov defected to the Japanese on June 13, 1938. At a press conference prepared by the Japanese he claimed that the alleged conspiracies in the USSR were faked. But privately Liushkov told the Japanese that Stalin was convinced there were real conspiracies, including the military conspiracy. He also confirmed that the conspirators existed and that they were linked with the Tukhachevsky group through Gamarnik. Liushkov confirmed that the conspirators wanted to join forces with the Japanese to inflict defeat upon the Soviet military, and that some of them had been conspiring directly with the Japanese military (Coox).

Therefore, despite frequent allegations to the contrary, we do possess evidence of the anti-Soviet conspiracies that could not have been fabricated by the Soviets. However, even if we had no non-Soviet evidence of collaboration between Soviet oppositionists and Axis representatives that would not mean that no such evidence ever existed. Much less would it mean that no such collaboration took place, for such collaboration might well not leave any evidence.

Soviet Evidence

No researcher today, no matter how anti-Soviet, dismisses Soviet evidence just because it is Soviet. Evidence from Soviet archives is routinely regarded as valid. For example, later in this essay we examine pretrial testimony of Genrikh Yagoda, Ezhov's immediate predecessor as head of the NKVD and defendant at the 1938 Moscow Trial, and will show that it is cited unproblematically as genuine by extremely anticommunist scholars. We'll examine Yagoda's testimony below. It includes testimony about Trotsky. The present authors have published and analyzed Bukharin's first confession of June 2, 1937. This document is still top-secret in Russia. In it Bukharin directly implicates Trotsky.

Lengthy Quotations

Much of the text of this article consists of direct quotations from primary sources. We understand that this greatly increases the size of the article and does nothing for its readability.

In an article such as this one, however, we cannot possibly do without these quotations. The primary sources constitute the evidentiary basis for the analysis and conclusions. Some quotations are from sources that are very hard to obtain, such as the English versions of the Moscow Trial transcripts. Even more of them are from documents unobtainable in English. Marshal Budennyi's letter to Marshal Voroshilov is an archival document that has never been published in any language and its contents are entirely new to the scholarly world.

In the age of the Internet there is no reason why any scholar should ever cite archival or hard-to-obtain materials without making them available to the reader. We could have put the primary source quotations onto a separate file and inserted hyperlinks when appropriate, and considered doing so. Doing so, however, would force the reader either to ignore the evidence or to click back and forth between the document and its analysis. We feared such a procedure would be distracting to a careful reader and so decided against it, a decision with which the editors of Cultural Logic agreed.

We urge the reader to study carefully the quotations from the primary sources. Like any work of scholarship this article stands or falls on the evidence and its analysis.

A Brief Overview of The Evidence

Our aim in this article is to cite and analyze all of the evidence that directly ties Trotsky to collaboration with Germany or Japan. We follow each citation of evidence with an analysis of that evidence. No evidence is left to "speak for itself" since all evidence may be interpreted in various ways. We have also striven to cite and study contextual and corroborative evidence, as all analysis of evidence requires.

That there is no "smoking gun," no absolute evidence, ought to go without saying. With the exception of the eye-witness evidence all the evidence we cite is circumstantial. What gives the complex of existing evidence its power is its mutually corroborative, or reinforcing, character, the sheer quantity of it, and the fact that it comes from different sources.

Strictly speaking eye-witness evidence is not circumstantial in the same manner as other evidence. We pay special attention to the testimony of those who claim they were told by Trotsky himself of his ties with Germany and Japan. This testimony is mutually corroborative too. Here we examine the extent to which the credibility of the eye-witnesses can be verified by cross-checking some of the statements they make with other evidence at our disposal.

By definition one cannot prove a negative. Aside from verbal denials there can be no evidence that Trotsky did not collaborate with the Germans or Japanese. Therefore any investigation must search for evidence that he did collaborate. We have tried hard to find circumstantial, corroborative, or material evidence that supports the contrary hypothesis: that the confessions of all these people, whether at the Moscow Trials or otherwise, were "fabricated" and false. This would impugn the evidence that Trotsky did collaborate, and so represent "negative" evidence. But we have been unsuccessful. We feel confident in saying that, at this point at least, no such evidence has been discovered. Given the evidentiary situation the objective conclusion must be that Trotsky collaborated with the Germans and Japanese. If evidence to the contrary should surface in the future we must be ready to review and, if necessary, change this conclusion.

Trotsky Lied

The introduction to the Report of the Dewey Commission, which was convened in 1937 to examine the charges against Trotsky, itself states:

If Leon Trotsky is guilty of the acts with which he is charged, no condemnation can be too severe.

Trotsky denied working with Germany or Japan, as charged in the 1937 and 1938 Moscow Trial by several of the defendants. But we now know he lied to the very friendly Dewey Commission in 1937 about other matters far less serious.

On the basis of his research in the Trotsky papers at Houghton Library, Harvard University, J. Arch Getty pointed out in 1986 that Trotsky had been in written contact with his followers in the USSR at least in 1932.

At the time of the Moscow show trials, Trotsky denied that he had any communications with the defendants since his exile in 1929. Yet it is now clear that in 1932 he sent secret personal letters to former leading oppositionists Karl Radek, G. Sokol'nikov, E. Preobrazhensky, and others. While the contents of these letters are unknown, it seems reasonable to believe that they involved an attempt to persuade the addressees to return to opposition.²⁹

²⁹ J. Arch Getty, "Trotsky in Exile: The Founding of the Fourth International." Soviet Studies 38, 1 (January, 1986), pp. 27-28.

Getty went on to detail another contact Trotsky had, a clandestine communication with E.S. Gol'tsman, "a former Trotskyist and current Soviet official," documented in the same papers.

Either Trotsky himself or one of his secretaries took some pains to conceal these connections. Concerning the personal letters Getty wrote:

Unlike virtually all Trotsky's other letters (including even the most sensitive) no copies of these remain in the Trotsky Papers. It seems likely that they have been removed from the Papers at some time. Only the certified mail receipts remain. At his 1937 trial, Karl Radek testified that he had received a letter from Trotsky containing 'terrorist instructions', but we do not know whether this was the letter in question.³⁰

³⁰ Getty 34, n. 18.

The noted French Trotskyist scholar Pierre Broué, who also studied these papers and acknowledged Trotsky's lies, explains them as an attempt to deny any plausibility to the "Stalinist" accusations against him at the Moscow Trials, as well as to protect any further Trotskyist supporters not yet uncovered in the USSR.³¹ From Trotsky's point of view this made perfect sense. Why give Stalin additional ammunition in their war with him?

³¹ Pierre Broué, "Trotsky et le bloc des oppositions de 1932." Cahiers Léon Trotsky 5 (Jan-Mar 1980), 29.

But for the historian it means that Trotsky's denials, not only of the existence of the bloc, but of any charge, cannot simply be taken at face value. As Getty has pointed out elsewhere:

The point here is that Trotsky lied. . . . [H]e had good reasons to lie. But what he said was not the truth. It was not "objective." Like the Stalinists, Trotsky was from the pragmatic, utilitarian Bolshevik school that put the needs of the movement above objective truth.³²

³² Getty, post to H-RUSSIA list Nov. 24 1998. See <<http://tinyurl.com/getty-trotsky-lied>>.

We cite this not to "blame" Trotsky for lying. Telling falsehoods is an essential tactic of clandestine activity. To demand that political actors in life-and-death situations must "tell the truth" out of some abstract loyalty to an idealist code of conduct would be mere cant. Rather, the fact that Trotsky lied — provably in this case, and probably in other cases where we cannot prove it — ought simply to remind us that we must set aside any denials on the part of Trotsky, or any Oppositionist.

It is to be expected that persons will lie when necessary to deflect punishment or blame from themselves. No one pays much attention to denials of guilt on the part of persons suspected of a crime. In many countries an accused person has the right to lie in his own defense, though of course at his own peril too. To any investigator and to any historian as well an accused's confession of guilt is much more significant than a claim of innocence. So Trotsky's claim of innocence means little in itself. However, Trotsky never confessed. He lied, and "got away with it," at least insofar as the Dewey Commission members and its audience were concerned.

We believe that, on the evidence, we can validly conclude that Trotsky lied about a great deal more. Specifically, we believe the evidence shows that Trotsky was guilty as charged in the Moscow Trials — that he actually did conspire with Germany and Japan. If he did so — and we believe the evidence points overwhelmingly in that direction — it is no wonder that he lied in denying it. Keeping such a thing secret would have been an elementary sine qua non of such a conspiracy. The Germany and Japanese participants, if asked about this, would also have denied it. In lying, they would have felt certain that they were being loyal to their countries and to their military oaths.

Trotsky's Archive Falsified

We also know that there has been a practice of falsifying what Trotsky did that extended to the Trotsky papers themselves. Getty has pointed out that the correspondence between Trotsky and Oppositionists in the USSR has apparently been taken out of the Trotsky Papers at Harvard at some time before they were opened to researchers in January 1980.³³ Broué and Getty both note that Trotsky secretary Jan van Heijenoort reminded Trotsky and his son Leon Sedov of his correspondence about the bloc at the time of the Dewey Commission hearings. As we noted above, Trotsky chose to lie about this. Van Heijenoort, who did not die until 1986, worked with the Trotsky Papers and was interviewed by the New York Times about them (NYT Jan. 8, 1980 p. A14). But neither there nor in his memoirs³⁴ did van Heijenoort ever reveal he had personal knowledge that Trotsky (and Sedov) had deliberately lied to the Dewey Commission.

³³ Getty 34 n.18.

³⁴ Jan van Heijenoort, With Trotsky in exile : from Prinkipo to Coyoactan. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1978.

Isaac Deutscher was also given special access to the Trotsky Papers by Trotsky's widow so he could write his famous three-volume biography of Trotsky. Deutscher did not reveal the existence of the bloc of Rights and Trotskyites nor of van Heijenoort's letter. Yet he had earlier access to the same "closed" archive that Getty studied only much later. It is logical to conclude that Deutscher saw the same evidence Getty saw and also knew that Trotsky had lied to the Dewey Commission but chose not to reveal it.

The two most likely persons to have "purged" the Trotsky archives of the correspondence with his supporters within the USSR are Deutscher and van Heijenoort. Trotsky's wife also had access. But at least one very personal letter of Trotsky's to his wife remains in the archives — something that his wife might be expected to have removed.³⁵ In any case, it is clear that van Heijenoort concealed Trotsky's contacts with his followers in the USSR. Either van Heijenoort, or Deutscher, or conceivably some other defender of Trotsky's legacy with rare privileged access has deliberately falsified his archive.

³⁵ See the dispute recorded by Felshtinsky at <http://lib.ru/HISTORY/FELSHTINSKY/f7.txt>. The letter itself is at <http://lib.ru/TROCKIJ/letter.txt>.

This makes one doubly curious as to exactly what was in those letters from Trotsky to the Oppositionists that have been removed and for which Getty found only the certified mail receipts. The question remains: What information in those letters to his followers in the USSR would have been so sensitive that persons loyal to Trotsky felt it necessary to remove them even while leaving sensitive personal materials alone? The logical answer is: sensitive political material. But this could not have been mere evidence that Trotsky was in contact with his followers in the USSR. That evidence still remains in the Archive.

As Getty says:

Sedov's address book contained the exile addresses of Trotskyists in the USSR. Trotsky Papers 15741. The Exile Correspondence section of the Trotsky Papers contains copies of such letters. (Getty-Trotsky 34 n. 16)

So those of Trotsky's followers who had access to the Trotsky Papers did not feel that this material was politically sensitive enough to remove. So what would have been? At the top of any such list would be: material that confirmed the accusations made against Trotsky at the Moscow Trials. Such evidence would have irreparably ruined Trotsky's reputation, while justifying, in the eyes of many, the repressions of the late 1930s and, therefore, Stalin. Such evidence would have threatened to cut the foundation out of Trotskyism.

The "Hotel Bristol"

Dewey Commission witnesses also testified that at least two further statements made by Moscow Trial defendants were proveably false: that of the "Hotel Bristol" and that of Piatakov's secret flight to Oslo. At the August 1936 Trial defendant E.S. Gol'tsman ("Holtzman" in the English translation) claimed that in November 1932 he had met Sedov at the Bristol Hotel in Copenhagen. Albert Goldman, Trotsky's advocate at the Dewey Commission hearings, said that the Bristol Hotel had burned down in 1917.

Now, immediately after the trial and during the trial, when the statement, which the Commissioners can check up on, was made by him, a report came from the Social-Democratic press in Denmark that there was no such hotel as the Hotel Bristol in Copenhagen; that there was at one time a hotel by the name of Hotel Bristol, but that was burned down in 1917. The guide "Baedeker" of 1917, includes the name of Hotel Bristol. That was the report of the Social-Democratic press of Denmark which went the rounds throughout the world press.

— Fifth Session

In fact this Hotel Bristol did not "burn down" in 1917 or at any other time but went out of business in 1917. The building that housed it was sold to an insurance company which converted it into offices. It is not clear why Goldman got this detail wrong, since the facts were at least as available to him in 1937 as they are to us today.

The fact that Gol'tsman identified a hotel that was no longer in existence has been widely accepted as evidence that his testimony was fabricated by the NKVD and was false in all other respects too. But a recent study by Swedish researcher Sven-Eric Holmström³⁶ has proven that in 1932 a large sign saying "Bristol" stood immediately beside the entrance to the hotel in question. The hotel's own sign, high up on a different side of the building around the corner from the entrance, was far less visible. It would have been natural to get the impression that the hotel really was named "Bristol" after the prominent sign displayed right beside its entrance. As Holmström has demonstrated, it would have been difficult to get any other impression.

³⁶ "New Evidence Concerning the 'Hotel Bristol' Question in the First Moscow Trial of 1936," Cultural Logic 2008. We are grateful to Mr. Holmström for allowing us to study a pre-publication version of his very important essay. In this section of our essay we are largely summarizing Holmström's results.

Holmström's research also provides us with the best evidence that Gol'tsman was telling the truth. The presumption in the Moscow Trial was that Gol'tsman went to the Bristol Hotel, as he testified. If the Bristol Hotel in Copenhagen had been destroyed (or simply gone out of business) in 1917 and never rebuilt then Gol'tsman could not have gone to it in 1932. This led many to the presumption has been that Gol'tsman had been instructed — more likely, forced — to say he had gone to this hotel.

Holmström convincingly demolishes this conclusion. The NKVD would never have made up the name of a hotel which had been destroyed in 1917 but by coincidence was also the name of a café — the café Bristol — that had a large sign adjoining the entrance to a hotel right across the street from the train station. But, as Holmström shows, it is just the kind of error Gol'tsman — indeed, anyone — could easily make.

The door of the Grand Hotel Copenhagen was right beside the sign to the Bristol "Konditori" (pastry shop), which a large sign reading "Bristol." Holmström has obtained photographs of this corner made in 1929 and 1931 which demonstrate this fact beyond any doubt. The only obvious sign near the hotel door was this large sign. The pastry shop and hotel also had an interior connecting door, and the pastry shop was owned by the wife of the hotel's proprietor.

By 1937, when the pastry shop had moved a few doors away, the hotel had put a prominent neon sign next to the entrance that had previously been right beside the large "Bristol" sign. As Holmström's research has shown, the hotel already had a sign — but on the opposite side of the building. Until 1936, when the pastry shop moved, the large "Bristol" sign was the only sign anywhere near the hotel entrance, and it was right beside that entrance.

It would have been natural, perhaps even inevitable, that anyone passing by would assume that the hotel was named "Bristol." This may have been acceptable as long as the pastry shop was adjacent to the hotel entrance. For one thing, both hotel and pastry shop were owned by the same man. For another, the pastry shop and hotel were connected by an internal passage. In fact it may well have been that Gol'tsman actually entered the pastry shop and met Trotsky there, rather than in the hotel lobby.

At or about the same time that the pastry shop moved to a larger space a few doors down from the hotel, the hotel put a neon sign right by its entrance. Why? The answer now seems obvious, thanks to Holmström's work. There was no longer any sign at or near the hotel entrance, and so no way of knowing where that entrance was.

Until 1931 the Grand Hotel Copenhagen was a pension for long-term residents. No sign was needed — the residents knew where the entrance was and the pension did not need to solicit customers on the street. From about 1931 to about 1936 the hotel entrance was unmarked, but immediately beside it was the large "Bristol" sign for the pastry shop, with the pastry shop entrance a few feet away. It would matter little if a hotel client entered the pastry shop, for he could walk through the interior doorway to the hotel lobby. He might even buy a pastry and coffee! Only when the pastry shop had moved to larger quarters did the hotel require some way to indicate its entrance, and that was when the neon sign went up.

Holmström has also shown that the key Dewey Commission witnesses on the "Bristol" question, the Field couple, deliberately lied in saying that they had been to the pastry shop in 1932 and that at that time it was not adjacent to the hotel. In fact it was adjacent to the hotel in 1932, but had moved by 1937 — the time of the Dewey Commission hearings.

So Gol'tsman was telling the truth about the "Hotel Bristol." The error he made — mistaking the name of the hotel for that of the pastry shop whose sign was right beside the hotel entrance and that shared an internal passageway with the hotel lobby — must have been made by a great many people during that time. Furthermore according to Gol'tsman's testimony he did not stay the night at the hotel. He only met Sedov there. If he had stayed there he would have received a bill. That would have had the hotel's name on it, and that might have served to impress upon Gol'tsman's mind that the hotel was named "Grand Hotel," not "Bristol." But by Gol'tsman's own admission at the trial he did not stay and so he never received a bill.

Like all hotel patrons during those years Gold'tsman could have used either door. He could have used the entrance to the hotel, with the large "Bristol" sign right beside it. Or he could have walked through the internal passageway between the hotel and the pastry shop and used the pastry shop door. The point is: the NKVD would never have "fabricated" such a story.

We can't verify whether Gol'tsman met Trotsky, as he testified. But Holmström has verified that Gol'tsman told the truth about the hotel. Furthermore we know that Trotsky was in fact in touch with Gol'tsman and vice versa, as Gol'tsman claimed, since Getty turned up this information in the Trotsky Papers at Harvard. (Getty 28). The fact that Gol'tsman was telling the truth about this epistolary contact with Trotsky which can now be verified, together with Holmström's research on the "Hotel Bristol" affair, makes it more likely that Gol'tsman really did meet with Trotsky. That is, if two statements by a defendant (Gol'tsman) can be independently verified, it makes his other statements that cannot be independently verified more credible. By the same token it further erodes Trotsky's credibility.

Holmström has also uncovered evidence that suggests that the matter of Piatakov's alleged flight to Oslo to meet with Trotsky should be reopened. However that may be, we now know that Esther Field, Trotsky's witness before the Dewey Commission, deliberately lied about the 1932 location of the Bristol Konditorei and the Grand Hotel Copenhagen. She would surely not have done so without Trotsky's permission. Most likely she did it at his request; otherwise how would she know exactly which lies to tell? Both the Fields were close adherents of Trotsky's.

Together with the evidence uncovered by Getty and Broué that Trotsky deliberately lied at the Dewey Commission hearings about the "block of Rights and Trotskyites," we now have an established fact. It is not the testimony at the August 1936 Moscow Trial but the testimony by Trotsky and his witnesses at the 1937 Dewey Commission hearings that has been proven to be false. Furthermore, Trotsky's denial that he was involved in conspiring with the Germans and Japanese cannot be accepted as evidence. This has always been obvious to any objective student. It's to be expected that, when accused of a crime, both the innocent and the guilty will claim innocence.

The path is now cleared for us to study the evidence that does exist.

Evidence From The Three Moscow Trials

The testimony of the defendants at the three Moscow "Show" Trials is routinely dismissed as false. The defendants are said to have been threatened, or tortured, or in some other way induced to confess to absurd crimes which they could not have committed. This is all wrong.

There is no evidence worthy of the name that the defendants were threatened, or tortured, or induced to give false confessions by promises of some kind. Under Khrushchev, again under Gorbachev and, in fact, right up to this day the official stance of both Soviet and Russian regimes has been that the defendants' confessions are false. The investigative materials, all but a small fraction of which are still classified in Russia today, have been scoured for any evidence that would discredit the Trials and prove the defendants' confessions were false. But no such evidence has been discovered. For this reason we can be reasonably confident that no such evidence exists.

In 1992 during the short-lived "glasnost" period under Eltsin the appeals to the Soviet Supreme Court of ten of Moscow Trials defendants were published in the newspaper Izvestiia. All the defendants in question had been sentenced to death on the basis of their own confessions and the accusations of other defendants. If they were ever going to retract their confessions and proclaim innocence this was their last chance to do so. Not one of them did. Every one of them reconfirmed his own guilt.³⁷

³⁷ "Rasskaz o desiati rasstrel'iannykh" ("Story of ten who were shot"), Izvestiia September 2, 1992, p. 3.

Dr. D.D. Pletnev, a minor defendant in the March 1938 Moscow Trial, has been the subject of numerous articles declaring him the innocent victim of a frameup and claiming that he proclaimed his innocence while in prison after the trial. But a study of all these articles and of the fragments of Pletnev's correspondence that they published shows this to be false. Pletnev never claimed innocence of the crime he was convicted of at trial. The articles are full of contradictions and dishonest statements. There is no basis to claim that Pletnev was framed.³⁸ In the case of a few of the more prominent defendants, Zinoviev and Bukharin, there is good evidence that they were not threatened or badly treated.

³⁸ Furr and Bobrov, Bukharin na plakhe ("Bukharin on the block"), forthcoming.

Most people who disregard the confessions of the defendants at the Moscow Trials have never studied the transcripts of these trials. They dismiss them because they have been told that the defendants' confessions were fabricated. In reality, there is no evidence that this is so. As we shall see, the evidence given in those confessions is in fact corroborated by the archival material which is the main subject of this study. And in any event the confessions of the Moscow Trials defendants must be accorded the same respect as the rest of the evidence, or as any evidence. It must be identified, collected, and studied. We have done this below.

A number of the defendants at the Moscow Trials testified that Trotsky was collaborating with Germany or Japan. Most of these witnesses said that they had been told of Trotsky's collaboration by others. But some of the defendants testified that they had been told of Trotsky's collaboration personally by Trotsky, personally by Trotsky's son Leon Sedov, or in notes or letters from Trotsky or Sedov.

The status of this testimony is, therefore, more direct. In this article we will concentrate on this first-hand testimony of Trotsky's collaboration. We will not review all the indirect or second-hand evidence in detail. We will, however, say something about this evidence at the end of the article to note how it corroborates the first-hand evidence.

The August 1936 Trial: Ol'berg

In the August 1936 trial of Zinoviev, Kamenev and others the only first-hand testimony to collaboration between Trotsky and the German government concerns collaboration with German intelligence. Defendant Valentin Ol'berg claimed that he obtained from the Gestapo a Honduran passport to get into the USSR with the help of his brother Paul, a German agent. He further testified that he was given the money to buy it from the German Trotskyite organization because Sedov had told them to provide it. Getty discovered evidence in the Trotsky Archive that Trotsky had "safe contacts in Berlin, Prague, and Istanbul" (Getty 28). Insofar as German Trotskyists did exist, therefore, the contact Ol'berg alleged could have happened. We can't say more. The alleged contacts between Trotskyists and the Gestapo were for the joint purpose of organizing assassination attempts on Stalin and Voroshilov. There is no testimony at this trial about any Trotsky contacts with Germans or Japanese for military purposes.

Ol'berg claimed there was systematic collaboration between the Gestapo and German Trotskyists with Trotsky's consent. From Prosecutor Vyshinsky's Opening Statement:

As the investigation has established, V. Olberg arrived in the U.S.S.R. with the passport of a citizen of the Republic of Honduras obtained with the aid of the German Secret Police (Gestapo).

On this point V. Olberg, during examination in the office of the State Attorney of the U.S.S.R., testified

". . . Sedov promised to help me to obtain a passport to return to the U.S.S.R. once more. But I succeeded in obtaining a passport with the help of my younger brother, Paul Olberg. Thanks to my connections with the German police and their agent in Prague, V. P. Tukalevsky, I, by means of a bribe, obtained the passport of a citizen of the Republic of Honduras. The money for the passport — 13,000 Czechoslovakian kronen — I obtained from Sedov, or rather, from the Trotskyite organization on Sedov's instructions." (Vol. XXI, p. 262)

Re-examined on the question of his connection with the Gestapo, V. Olberg on July 31 of this year testified:

"Confirming also my testimony of May 9 of this year, I emphasize that my connection with the Gestapo was not at all an exception, of which one could speak as of the fall of an individual Trotskyite. It was the line of the Trotskyites in conformity with the instructions of L. Trotsky given through Sedov. The connection with the Gestapo followed the line of organizing terrorism in the U.S.S.R. against the leaders of the C.P.S.U. and the Soviet Government."

From the trial transcript:

Then, continues Olberg, I wrote a letter to Sedov in Paris telling him about the proposal made by the agent of the Gestapo, and asked him to inform me whether L. D. Trotsky would approve of an arrangement with such an agent. After some time I received a reply sanctioning my actions, that is to say, my understanding with Tukalevsky. Sedov wrote saying that the strictest secrecy was necessary, and that none of the other members of the Trotskyite organization was to be informed about this understanding. (Pravda August 21 1936, p. 2)

Defendant Natan Lur'e confessed that he had plotted assassinations under the leadership of Franz Weitz, a Gestapo agent. Lur'e claimed that Weitz had argued that Trotskyists and the Gestapo should work together for common ends. Lur'e never claimed that Trotsky or Sedov had themselves asked him to do this. He never claimed to have met either one of them in person at all.

Archival Evidence and The 1936 Trial: The July 29, 1936 "Closed Letter"

On July 29 1936, a few weeks before the August trial, the Politburo sent a long, secret letter to Party organizations all over the USSR. This document was published only in August 1989, during Mikhail Gorbachev's short-lived and very partial period of "openness" (glasnost') that was supposed to accompany economic "reconstruction" (perestroika) along capitalist lines. Urging Party organizations to redouble their vigilance the "letter" contained many quotations from suspects under interrogation. Some of them ended up as defendants in the trial that took place a few weeks later, but others did not and were evidently tried separately.

From the interrogation quotations given in this letter we learn a bit more. Dreitser, later a trial defendant, said he had received a letter from Trotsky in 1934 about the need to assassinate Stalin and Voroshilov. This letter evidently said nothing about Germans or Japanese. V. Ol'berg, Frits-David, and K.B. Berman-Yurin testified to direct contact with Trotsky. Ol'berg claimed direct contact with Sedov as well. This contact too was about planning assassinations. E. Konstant, a Trotskyist, is quoted as saying that he had contacted Gestapo agent Weitz, but does not claim that Trotsky had urged him to do this.³⁹ Therefore there is no evidence in the "Closed Letter" about Trotsky's working with the Germans.

³⁹ The letter is available in English translation, with some omissions, in J. Arch Getty and Oleg V. Naumov, The Road to Terror. Stalin and the Self-Destruction of the Bolsheviks, 1932-1939. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1999, 250-256. Dreitser's and Konstant's remarks are translated; Berman-Yurin's and Ol'berg's are omitted.

Natan Lur'e

In 1992 Lur'e's post-trial appeal to Mikhail Kalinin for clemency dated August 24, 1936 was published for the first time from a copy in the former Soviet archives. The appeal was a secret document and thus had no propaganda value. In it N. Lur'e emphasized the truth of his trial confession.

Since this short document has not been republished since 1992 and has never been translated, we reprint the whole text here:⁴⁰

To the Chairman of the CEC of the USSR Kalinin M.I.

Declaration

By sentence of the Military Collegium of the Supreme Court I, Natan Lazarevich Lur'e, have been sentenced to be shot.

I have committed a most serious crime against the Soviet people. I wished, according to an assignment of Trotsky, leader of the terrorist center, to deprive the Soviet people and the whole world proletariat of the leader Stalin and other leaders of the great communist party. More than once I prepared terrorist acts against Voroshilov, Stalin, Ordzhonikidze, Kaganovich, and Zhdanov, having armed myself in order to carry out this plan.

I really did prepare to murder Voroshilov as ordered by Franz Weitz, a representative of the Gestapo. I wished to carry out these despicable murders because I had been infected by the poison of Trotskyism during the course of my long stay in Germany. I only arrived in the USSR for the first time in 1932 and therefore, ignorant of the immense successes that the party of Lenin and Stalin had carried out under the leadership of the C. C. of the AUCP(b) I, instructed by Trotskyist literature, nursed hatred towards the leaders of the party. At my trial I confessed my guilt in full and kept nothing back from Soviet power. I am a young surgeon. I am 34 years of age. I am prepared to redeem my very serious crimes with diligent work, for all the poison of Trotskyism has been completely rooted out of me.

I ask the CEC of the USSR to spare my life and grant me clemency.

Natan Lazarevich LUR'E

August 24 1936

⁴⁰ "Rasskaz o desiati rasstrel'nykh" ("Story of ten who were shot"), Izvestiia September 2 1992, p. 3. The ten Moscow Trial defendants whose appeals for clemency are reprinted in this article are Kamenev, Smirnov, Zinoviev, N. Lur'e, Pyatakov, Muralov, Bukharin, Rykov, Krestinsky, and Yagoda.

We will return to this confession below, but note for now a few points about it. N. Lur'e repeats that he was guilty of planning assassinations of Soviet leaders. He particularly insists that he took orders from Gestapo man Weitz. His use of the word "really" (deistvitel'no) suggests that Lur'e wanted to emphasize that his confession to "collaboration with" or "taking leadership from" the Gestapo was not a metaphor — as though, say, they were working along similar paths; that he had taken the idea for assassinations from something Weitz had reportedly said, etc. Lur'e tried to make it as clear as possible. He actually took orders from the Gestapo.

Natan Lur'e does not claim at any time that he had been directly in touch with Trotsky or Sedov. He did not receive the assignment or sanction to engage in "terror" or to collaborate with the Nazis from them. Ol'berg had claimed to be Trotsky's "emissary" in Germany, the leader of Trotskyists in Germany and their illegal contacts with the USSR. He had met frequently with Leon Sedov. He testified that Trotsky had sent a letter to Sedov, apparently in 1932, in which Trotsky approved of Sedov's entrusting the mission of assassination to Ol'berg.

Assessing The Evidence

Certainty in historical study is basically unattainable. We never have as much evidence as we would like to have. This is true in jurisprudence and in scientific inquiry generally.

The only rational, responsible procedure is to study all the evidence we have, and arrive at a conclusion based on that evidence, or the preponderance of it. If and when there is evidence "on both sides" of a given question so that it isn't possible to objectively state where the preponderance of the evidence lies, we should state as much.

In all cases, conclusions are tentative. If and when more evidence comes to light, we must be prepared to reconsider all previous evidence and include the new evidence. If that study warrants we should be prepared to revise or even reverse our previous conclusions. This is the procedure we must follow here, as in every inquiry.

Either Natan Lur'e prepared to assassinate Voroshilov or he did not. If he did prepare to assassinate Voroshilov, either he did it on instructions from the Gestapo agent, or he did it for some other reason or under some other leadership. Once again, either he did, or he didn't.

Lur'e's appeal is consistent with the testimony given at the trial as reported in the trial transcript, which we have reviewed above. The only additional evidence or testimony we have in Lur'e's case is contained in "rehabilitation" materials. The first of these documents, chronologically speaking, is the "Zapiska" of the Shvernik Commission prepared for Khrushchev between 1962 and 1963 and, according to its Russian edition, completed "not later than February 18, 1963." Aside from repeating information contained in the trial transcript it says little about Natan Lur'e. What it does say is not exculpatory.

For example we read the following:

The former members of the Communist Party of Germany M. Lur'e and N. Lur'e, who were condemned in the aforesaid case, had in the past shared the views of the Trotskyite opposition, and in 1930-1931 Ol'berg, who was living in Germany, did maintain written contact with Trotsky. Then he did arrive in the USSR under suspicious circumstances. ("Zapiska" 562; emphasis added)

Even though the Shvernik Commission was clearly instructed to find "evidence" to justify declaring the defendants innocent, in a number of cases it found evidence that contradicted this conclusion. The statement quoted above suggests that, as in other passages, those who compiled the Shvernik Report were not willing to completely suppress all evidence of suspicious activity on the part of the defendants.

The "Zapiska" reports that Stalin played a major role in outlining his theory of the role of the Trotskyist-Zinovievist bloc in planning the successful assassination of Kirov and the planned assassinations of himself, Voroshilov, and others (560). It concludes that no such bloc actually existed, but was a fabrication of the NKVD and/or Stalin. The Gorbachev-era "rehabilitation" commissions later agreed. The actual "rehabilitation" decree by the Plenum of the Soviet Supreme Court was evidently issued in June 1988.

We don't have the text of this decree, but we do have the document from the rehabilitation commission of the Politburo published in August 1989.⁴¹

⁴¹ "O Tak Nazываемom 'Antisovetskom Ob" edinennom Trotskistsko-Zinov'evskom Tsentre." Izvestiia TsK KPSS 8 (1989), pp. 78-94.

This statement contains a number of interesting features, a few of which we'll consider here. For one thing, parts of it are copied verbatim, or almost so, from the Shvernik Commission's "Zapiska" of 1963, twenty-five years earlier. No one could know this in 1988, since the text of the Shvernik Report was not published until 1993-4. But the fact of the copying suggests that probably no new study was carried out in 1987-88. We note two other features of the 1989 document that are significant for our present investigation:

1. The 1989 document concludes that no bloc or grouping of Zinovievists and Trotskyists existed.

It has been established therefore that after 1927 the former Trotskyists and Zinovievists did not carry out any organized struggle against the party, did not unite with each other either on a terrorist or any other basis, and that the case of the "United Trotskyite-Zinovievite Terrorist Center" was fabricated by the organs of the NKVD upon the direct order and with the direct participation of J.V. Stalin. (94)

We know that this is not true. Such a bloc did in fact exist, and its existence has been proven from documents in Trotsky's own archive at Harvard University. Arch Getty put it this way in his pathbreaking book published in 1985:

Although Trotsky later denied that he had any communications with former followers in the USSR since his exile in 1929, it is clear that he did. In the first three months of 1932 he sent secret letters to former oppositionists Radek, Sokolnikov, Preobrazhenskii, and others. Although the contents of these letters are unknown, it seems reasonable to believe that they involved an attempt to persuade the addressees to return to opposition.

Sometime in October of 1932, E.S. Gol'tsman (a Soviet official and former Trotskyist) met Sedov in Berlin and gave him an internal memorandum on Soviet economic output. This memorandum was published in the Biulleten' the following month under the title "The Economic Situation of the Soviet Union." It seems, though, that Gol'tsman brought Sedov something else: a proposal from Left Oppositionists in the USSR for the formation of a united opposition bloc. The proposed bloc was to include Trotskyists, Zinovievists, members of the Lominadze group, and others. The proposal came from "Kolokolnikov" — the code name of Ivan Smirnov. (Getty, Origins 119)

After further discussion of what Trotsky may have thought about the bloc as revealed in his Harvard papers Getty continues:

It is clear, then, that Trotsky did have a clandestine organization inside the USSR in this period and that he maintained communication with it. It is equally clear that a united oppositional bloc was formed in 1932. . . . From the available evidence, it seems that Trotsky envisioned no "terrorist" role for the bloc, although his call for a "new political revolution" to remove "the cadres, the bureaucracy" might well have been so interpreted in Moscow. There is also reason to believe that after the decapitation of the bloc through the removal of Zinoviev, Kamenev, Smirnov, and others the organization comprised mainly lower-level less prominent oppositionists: followers of Zinoviev, with whom Trotsky attempted to maintain direct contact.

It is equally probable that the NKVD knew about the bloc. Trotsky's and Sedov's staffs were thoroughly infiltrated, and Sedov's closest collaborator in 1936, Mark Zborowski, is said to have been an NKVD agent. In 1936, the 1932 bloc would be interpreted by the NKVD as a terrorist plot and would form the original pretext for Ezhov's campaign to destroy the former opposition. Smirnov, Gol'tsman, Zinoviev, Kamenev, and Trotsky (in absentia) would be the defendants at the 1936 show trial, and the 1932 events would form the evidential basis for their prosecution. (Getty, Origins 121)

If the existence of the bloc between Zinovievists and Trotskyists from 1932 on can be demonstrated by Trotsky's own documents and, moreover, was known as early as 1985, then we can be certain that it could have been demonstrated in 1988 with the investigative materials from the 1936 trial that were available to the Party and "rehabilitation" investigators in 1987-88. Even if, somehow, such materials were not available in Russia, the Gorbachev-era commissions could have simply concluded that the existence of such a bloc remained unproven.

And, of course, they could have referred to the research by Getty and also by famous Trotskyist scholar Pierre Broué, who had also studied the Trotsky archive at Harvard and recognized in print that the bloc really did exist, and that Trotsky, in denying this, had lied. We have shown elsewhere that both the Prosecutor's "Protest" (= appeal) and the Decree of the Plenum of the Soviet Supreme Court in the case of Bukharin, the latter document dated June 4, 1988 and still secret, deliberately falsify one of the key pieces of evidence they cite, and in the most serious manner.⁴² The fact that in the present case too the Gorbachev-era commission denied that such a bloc had existed is further proof that we cannot assume that the conclusions of these commissions are either honest or truthful.

2. In addition we have known since 1971 that Bukharin and his group were planning to assassinate Stalin in 1928 and 1929. Bukharin's close friend Jules Humbert-Droz, a Swiss communist active in the Comintern, broke with Bukharin over this and wrote about it in his memoir published in 1971. Writing in Switzerland and forty years after the event Humbert-Droz had no reason to lie about this. This memoir has been ignored by all Cold-War writers on Bukharin, beginning with Stephen Cohen's prize-winning biography published in 1973.⁴³

We are left with strong evidence that Nathan Lur'e's confession and appeal were genuine despite the Gorbachev-era "rehabilitation" report that declared all the defendants to have been falsely accused.

⁴² Furr and Bobrov, Bukharin na plakhe, forthcoming.

⁴³ Jules Humbert-Droz, De Lénin à Staline, Dix Ans Au Service de L'Internationale Communiste 1921-31 (Neuchâtel: A la Baconnière, 1971) 379-80. For further discussion see Furr and Bobrov, "Nikolai Bukharin's First Statement of Confession in the Lubianka."

Zinoviev's Letters and Appeal

The 1989 document makes the claim that "illegal methods of pressure" (nezakonnye mery vozdeistviia) were used against the defendants to obtain confessions. But nowhere does it support this serious accusation with any evidence. The document also refers to "moral pressure." In 1956 Safonova, a witness for the prosecution at the 1936 trial and wife of leading Trotsky supporter I.N. Smirnov, testified that she had agreed to give false testimony for three reasons: "Moral pressure"; threats against her family; and a desire to confess "in the interests of the Party."

She (Safonova) states that during the interrogations the NKVD workers employed methods of moral pressure, demanding confessions to criminal activities (that were) supposedly essential in the interests of the party.

(Rehabilitation I, 86)

The document never discloses what exactly "moral pressure" is. Though this sentence seems to hint that defendants were asked to confess to things they never did "for the good of the Party," this is never directly asserted. Someone who, by her own admission, gave false testimony once "for the good of the Party" may do it again. There is no way to know whether it may have been her testimony in 1956 to Khrushchev's "rehabilitators" that was the false testimony given "for the good of the Party."

The 1989 "rehabilitation" document itself gives the lie to the charge of torture — if that's what "illegal methods of pressure" means. It quotes Zinoviev himself as saying that his treatment has been good.

May 6 1935. If I could only hope that sometime I might be granted to erase my guilt, if only in a small degree. In prison I am treated humanely, I receive medical treatment, etc. But I am old, I am shaken. . . . (Rehabilitation I, 90)

Strangely, given the political tendency of the "rehabilitation" document, Zinoviev is quoted as hoping that his "guilt" will be forgiven and declares that he is "no longer an enemy" (ia bol'she ne vrag, 89). Zinoviev is quoted in this "rehabilitation" document as having written this phrase twice. These documents by Zinoviev are still secret in Russia. But it seems that Zinoviev never claimed he was innocent in them, or those passages would surely have been published. Instead, Zinoviev laments his guilt in several passages, although the only published excerpts never make it clear what acts Zinoviev is proclaiming his guilt of.

Getty is the most recent — indeed at this writing, the only — scholar to have gained access to, studied, and published concerning the pre-trial evidence against the 1936 Trial defendants. Getty summarized what he found as follows:

By 23 July [1936], Kamenev was admitting membership in a counterrevolutionary center that planned terror, but he denied being one of the organizers; he implicated Zinoviev as being closer to the matter. Three days later Zinoviev was confronted by one of his followers, Karev, who directly accused him. Zinoviev asked that the interrogation be stopped because he wanted to make a statement that, in the event, amounted to a full confession of organizing assassination and terror. Shortly thereafter, he submitted to his interrogators a 540-page manuscript he had written in prison. In "A Deserved Sentence" he wrote,

"There is no question about it . . . It is a fact. Whoever plays with the idea of 'opposition' to the socialist state plays with the idea of counterrevolutionary terror. . . . Before each who finds himself in my position this question stands in sharp relief. If tomorrow war comes — it stands yet a million times sharper and bigger. And for myself this question in prison for a long time is irreversibly decided. Rise from the dead! Be born again as a Bolshevik! Finish your human days conscious of your guilt before the part! Do everything in order to erase this guilt."⁴⁴

⁴⁴ J. Arch Getty and Oleg V. Naumov, Yezhov. The Rise of Stalin's "Iron Fist." New Haven: Yale University Press, 2008, p. 191. Zinov'ev's 540-page confession "Zasluzhennyi prigovor" in two parts has recently been declassified as a part of Ezhov's file. The archival identifiers of this document are the same as those cited by Getty. See <http://www.rusarchives.ru/secret/bul5/70.shtml>. At this writing it appears that Getty is the only scholar to mention this material.

Furthermore, we now have Zinoviev's appeal of his death sentence, published in the same issue of Izvestiia as that of Natan Lur'e. In it he makes the same statement right after a renewed confession of his guilt:

I have told the proletarian court everything about the crimes I have committed against the Party and Soviet authority. They are known to the Presidium of the CEC.

I beg that you believe me, that I am no longer an enemy. . . .

Zinoviev's insistence of his guilt and of the truth of his testimony at trial, his private communication assuring the authorities that he is being treated humanely, and Safonova's inability — it can't be called anything else — to lie convincingly to support the charge that the defendants had been tortured, plus the proof that the "rehabilitation" document of the defendants in the 1936 trial makes the demonstrably false statements as outlined above, are all consistent with the hypothesis that the charges and testimony at the 1936 Trial were not fabricated or obtained by torture. In this they serve to corroborate Ol'berg's testimony concerning Trotsky's and Sedov's approving his work with Nazi intelligence.

Archival Evidence and Sedov's Red Book

In October 1936, after the First Moscow Trial that August, Leon Sedov published The Red Book on the Moscow Trials in French. We have already discussed how Trotsky lied to the Dewey Commission; we also note that Sedov failed to tell the truth in this book. In Chapter 9 he wrote:

Of course the Russian Bolshevick-Leninists didn't enter into my kind of a bloc with a single of one these groups.

And,

The Left Opposition was always an intransigent opponent of behind-the-scenes combinations and agreements. For it, the question of a bloc could only consist of an open political act in full view of the masses, based on its political platform. The history of the 13-year struggle of the Left Opposition is proof of that. (Sedov Ch. 9 n. 41)

We have pointed out above that Getty has shown that Trotsky both knew of and approved the bloc but lied about this to the Dewey Commission. Therefore, Sedov is lying here. Trotskyist researcher Pierre Broué recognized this too. After quoting Sedov's denial that any bloc existed Broué wrote:

Ce texte, écrit au lendemain du premier procès de Moscou, est en totale contradiction avec le document à l'encre sympathique de 1932 de la main de Sedov attestant l'existence du "bloc" et des pourparlers qu'il mène avec les "trotskyists" d'U.R.S.S., avec la lettre de Trotsky approuvant la constitution du "bloc" en tant qu'alliance et non fusion, avec les commentaires de Trotsky cités plus haut (95). (Broué 29)

[This text, written right after the first Moscow trial, stands in complete contradiction to the 1932 document in secret ink in Sedov's handwriting and that attests to the existence of the "bloc" and of the negotiations he was carrying on with the "Trotskyists" in the USSR; with Trotsky's letter approving the formation of the "bloc" as an alliance, not a unification; and with the comments of Trotsky cited above.]

But Broué's objectivity deserts him when in the next paragraph he writes:

A quoi eût servi en 1936 de reconnaître l'existence d'un bloc éphémère en 1932?

[What would have been the point in 1936 of admitting the existence of an ephemeral bloc in 1932?]

ger inblick
bakom
kulisserna.

Inga förbindelser på många år mellan Trotski och de
anklagade

Trotski och hans äldste son, Leon Sedov, fotograferade vid ett tillfälle, då Trotski anlände till Paris.

Above: Trotsky with his son, Leon Sedov. The Swedish text in the upper left states, "A glimpse behind the curtains. No contact for many years between Trotsky and the accused."

In truth Broué did not know that the bloc was "ephemeral," or that it had existed only in 1932. To be sure, the only evidence of the bloc that remains in the Harvard Trotsky archive is from 1932. But the archive has been purged! Neither Broué nor anyone else has any way of knowing what evidence once existed or how long the bloc lasted. Evidently Broué was assuming, believing, even hoping, that it had been ephemeral — for the sake of Trotsky's and Sedov's reputations.

Sedov also wrote "The author of these lines keeps himself apart from active politics" (Foreword to the French Edition). We know that is false too. Sedov was assiduously aiding his father's political work long before 1936. Getty discovered materials in the Harvard Trotsky Archive indicating that while he lived in Germany Sedov helped his father maintain contact with persons passing in and out of the USSR. As Sedov had moved to Paris from Berlin just before Hitler seized power in 1933 this means his political activity dated from before that time. According to materials in the former Soviet archives Mark Zborowski, the NKVD agent who became Sedov's confidant, reported to his handlers that Sedov had proposed in June 1936 he go to the USSR to do illegal Trotskyist work (Zborowski refused). Zborowski was Sedov's assistant in the writing of The Red Book.⁴⁵

⁴⁵ J. Arch Getty, "Trotsky in Exile: The Founding of the Fourth International." Soviet Studies 38, 1 (January, 1986), 27; Victor Serge, "Obituary: Leon Sedov," originally published February 21, 1938, at <<http://www.marxists.org/archive/serge/1938/02/sedov.htm>>; Zborowski report, Volkogonov Archive; John Costello and Oleg Tsarev, Deadly Illusions (NY: Crown, 1993), 282. Tsarev, a KGB officer, obtained privileged access to Trotsky's files in former Soviet archives that have since been reclassified.

"No one lies when the truth is on his side." That Trotsky had something to hide is the inescapable conclusion. Furthermore, Trotsky's and Sedov's deliberate lying in their attempts to refute the charges made against them at the 1936 Trial not only undermine their own credibility. They are consistent with the hypothesis that the testimony at the 1936 trial was basically accurate. The archival documents analyzed above are also consistent with this hypothesis.

The January 1937 Trial: Piatakov, Radek, Sokol'nikov, Shestov, Romm

In the January 1937 Trial defendants Piatakov, Radek, Sokol'nikov, and Shestov all testified to having been given explicit instructions by Trotsky himself concerning collaboration by either Germany or Japan. We'll briefly review that here.

Piatakov

The espionage activities of the Trotskyites on behalf of the German intelligence service were covered up in a number of cases by their connections with certain German firms.

The investigation in the present case has established that an agreement was concluded between L. Trotsky and certain German / 16 / firms by virtue of which these firms financed the Trotskyites from a fund formed by raising the price of goods imported into the U.S.S.R. from Germany.

On this point the accused Pyatakov, referring to his conversation with Trotsky's son, L. L. Sedov, now in emigration, testified:

"... Sedov conveyed to me Trotsky's instructions to try and place as many orders as possible with the firms Demag and Borsig, with whose representatives Trotsky has connections.

"You, added Sedov, will have to pay higher prices, but this money will go for our work." (Vol. I, p. 227) (1937 Trial 15-16)

...

Sedov said that only one thing was required of me, namely, that I should place as many orders as possible with two German firms, Borsig and Demag, and that he, Sedov, would arrange to receive the necessary sums from them, bearing in mind that I would not be particularly exacting as to prices. If this were deciphered it was clear that the additions to prices that would be made on the Soviet orders would pass wholly or in part into Trotsky's hands for his counter-revolutionary purposes. There the second conversation ended. (26-27)

. . . I recall that Trotsky said in this directive that without the necessary support from foreign states, a government of the bloc could neither come to power nor hold power. It was therefore a question of arriving at the necessary preliminary agreement with the most aggressive foreign states, like Germany and Japan, and that he, Trotsky, on his part had already taken the necessary steps in establishing contacts both with the Japanese and the German governments. (53)

. . . In connection with the international question Trotsky very emphatically insisted on the necessity of preparing diversionist cadres. He rebuked us for not engaging energetically enough in diversive, wrecking⁴⁶ and terrorist activities.

He told me that he had come to an absolutely definite agreement with the fascist German government and with the Japanese government that they would adopt a favourable attitude in the event of the Trotskyite-Zinovievite bloc coming to power. But, he added, it went without saying that such a favourable attitude was not due to any particular love these governments cherished for the Trotskyite-Zinovievite bloc. It simply proceeded from the real interests of the fascist governments and from what we had promised to do for them if we came to power. (63-64)

. . .

Pyatakov: Here I must first make one explanation. Trotsky again said that from this standpoint, too, from the standpoint of the negotiations he was conducting and of what he had already achieved, it was extremely important to build up an active, concrete and real force. He then told me that he had conducted rather lengthy negotiations with the Vice-Chairman of the German National-Socialist Party — Hess. It is true I cannot say whether there is an agreement signed by him, or whether there is only an understanding, but Trotsky put it to me as though an agreement existed, one which it is true still had to be given definite shape by certain other persons, of whom I shall speak in camera. (64)

...

First, the German fascists promise to adopt a favourable attitude towards the Trotskyite-Zinovievite bloc and to support it if it comes to power, either in time of war, or before a war, should it succeed in doing so. But in return the fascists are to receive the following compensation: a general favourable attitude towards German interest and towards the German government on all questions of international policy; certain territorial concessions would have to be made, and these territorial concessions have been defined — in particular, mention was made of territorial concessions in a veiled form which were called "not resisting Ukrainian national-bourgeois forces in the event of their self-determination."

Vyshinsky: What does that mean?

Pyatakov: It means in a veiled form what Radek spoke about here: should the Germans set up their Ukrainian government, ruling the Ukraine not through their German Governor-General but perhaps through a hetman — at any rate, should the Germans "self-determine" the Ukraine — the Trotskyist-Zinovievite bloc will not oppose it. Actually, this meant the beginning of the dismemberment of the Soviet Union. (64)

...

Vyshinsky: And what about diversive acts in case of war?

Pyatakov: That was the last point. . . . In the event of military attack the destructive forces of the Trotskyite organizations which would act within the country must be co-ordinated with the forces from without acting under the guidance of German fascism. The diversive and sabotage activity which is being conducted by the Trotskyite-Zinovievite organization within the Soviet Union must be carried out under the instructions of Trotsky, which are to be agreed upon with the German General Staff. (65)

...

Radek: . . .The third point that emerged from Trotsky's conversation with Pyatakov was that Germany demanded complete freedom of action for the advance of Germany to the Balkan and Danube countries. This is also a very important fact.

Vyshinsky (To Pyatakov): Did you say that? Do you confirm that?

Pyatakov: Yes. Radek is relating it very exactly. It is all quite true. (445)

⁴⁶ For the word "wrecking" it's best to substitute "sabotage." "Wrecking" is a clumsy translation that makes the original sound forced. The Russian word is вредительство, from "vred" = "harm."

Radek

Radek: This was in May 1934. In the autumn of 1934, at a diplomatic reception, a diplomatic representative of a Central European country who was known to me, sat down beside me and started a conversation. He said (speaking German): ". . . Our leaders" (he said that more explicitly) "know that Mr. Trotsky is striving for a rapprochement with Germany. Our leader wants to know, what does this idea of Mr. Trotsky's signify? Perhaps it is the idea of an émigré who sleeps badly? Who is behind these ideas?"

It was clear that I was being asked about the attitude of the bloc. . . . I told him that the realist politicians in the U.S.S.R. understand the significance of a German-Soviet rapprochement and are prepared to make the necessary concessions to achieve this rapprochement. This representative understood that since I was speaking about realist politicians it meant that there were realist politicians and unrealistic politicians in the U.S.S.R.: the realist politicians were the Trotskyite-Zinovievite bloc. And he also understood that what I meant was: if the bloc comes into power it will make concessions in order to bring about a rapprochement with your government and the country which it represents. (108-109)

...

Radek: . . . Several months later, approximately, November 1935, at one of the regular diplomatic receptions, the military representative of that country. . . .

The President: Do not mention his name or the country.

Radek: . . . approached me and began to complain about the complete change of atmosphere between the two countries. After the first few words he said that during Mr. Trotsky's time the relations between the armies of the two countries were better.

He went on to say that Trotsky had remained true to his old opinion about the need for Soviet-German friendship. After speaking in this strain for a little while longer he began to press me hard as one who had formerly pursued the Rappalo⁴⁷ line. I replied to this by uttering the same formula which I had uttered when I was first sounded, namely, that the realist politicians of the U.S.S.R. appreciate the significance of Soviet-German friendship and are prepared to make the necessary concessions in order to ensure this friendship. To this he replied that we ought at last to get together somehow and jointly discuss the details, definitely, about ways of reaching a rapprochement. (444)

...

Radek: As regards Japan, we were told she must not only be given Sakhalin oil but be guaranteed oil in the event of a war with the U.S.A.

It was stated that no obstacles must be raised to the conquest of China by Japanese imperialism.

Vyshinsky: And as regards the Danube countries?

Radek: As regards the Danube and Balkan countries, Trotsky said in his letter that German fascism was expanding and we should do nothing to prevent this. The point was, of course, to sever any of our relations with Czechoslovakia which would have contributed to the defense of that country. (115-116)

...

And, finally, after receiving Trotsky's directives in 1934, I sent him the reply of the centre, and added in my own name that I agreed that the ground should be sounded, but that he should not bind himself, because the situation might change. I suggested that the negotiations should be conducted by Putna,⁴⁸ who had connections with leading Japanese and German military circles. And Trotsky replied: "We shall not bind ourselves without your knowledge, we shall make no decisions." For a whole year he was silent. And at the end of that year he confronted us with the accomplished fact of his agreement. You will understand that it was not any virtue on my part that I rebelled against this. But it is a fact for you to understand. (545)

And, finally, when Pyatakov returned from abroad, he casually remarked when speaking of the conversation with Trotsky that Trotsky had told him that cadres of people were being formed who had not been corrupted by the Stalin leadership. But when I read about Olberg and asked others whether they had known of the existence of Olberg, and none of them had heard about him, it became clear to me that in addition to the cadres who had passed through his school, Trotsky was organizing agents who had passed through the school of ⁴⁷ In 1922 Soviet Russia and Germany signed a treaty at Rapallo that provided for economic and especially for secret military collaboration.

German fascism. (548)

⁴⁸ Corps Commander Vitovt Kazimirovich Putna was the Soviet military attaché to Great Britain when he was named by one or more defendants at the August 1936 Moscow Trial, whereupon he was recalled and arrested. In 1937 he confessed to conspiring with other military leaders and was tried and executed in what has become known as the "Tukhachevsky Affair."

Shestov

During my meeting with Sedov I asked him what our leader, Trotsky, thought, what were the specific tasks he placed before us Trotskyites. Sedov began by saying that it was no use sitting and whistling for fair weather; we must proceed with all forces and means at our disposal to an active policy of discrediting Stalin's leadership and Stalin's policy.

Further, Sedov said that his father held that the only correct way, a difficult one but a sure one, was forcibly to remove Stalin and the leaders of the government by means of terrorism. . . .

Seeing that I was being influenced by his words, he switched the conversation to a new subject. He asked me whether I knew any of the directors of German firms, Dehlmann in particular. I told him that I remembered such a name, that he was a director of the firm of Fröhlich-Klüpfel-Dehlmann. This firm was rendering technical assistance, under a contract, in sinking mines in the Kuzbas. Sedov advised me to get in touch with that firm and make the acquaintance of Herr Dehlmann.

I asked him why I should get in touch with him. He said that this firm was of help in sending mail to the Soviet Union. I then said: "Are you advising me to make a deal with the firm?" He said: "What's terrible about that? You must understand that if they are doing us a favour why should not we do them a favour and furnish them with certain information."

I said: "You are simply proposing that I should become a spy." He shrugged his shoulders and said: "It is absurd to use words like that. In a fight it is unreasonable to be as squeamish as that. . . . I met Smirnov about the middle of July and he asked me bluntly: "Well, how is your mood?" I told him that I had no personal mood, but I did as our leader Trotsky taught us — stand at attention and wait for orders. . . . I detained him and ask: But Ivan Nikitich, Sedov ordered me to establish connections with the firm of Fröhlich-Klüpfel-Dehlmann . . .

that was engaged in espionage and diversive work in the Kuzbas. In that case, I said, I will be a spy and a diversionist. To this he replied: Stop slinging big words like "spy" and "diversionist" about. . . . He said: What do you find terrible in enlisting German diversionists for this work? . . . He insisted that there was no other way. After this conversation I consented to establish connection with this firm. (235-236)

Romm

Romm testified that he had met with Sedov and Trotsky personally and passed five messages to and from them and Radek. We reproduce here only his account of his face-to-face meeting with Sedov.

Vyshinsky: Tell us how you received the letter from Trotsky, what commission you were given, and how you carried out that commission.

Romm: . . . In the summer of 1931, in passing through Berlin, I met Putna who offered to put me in touch with Sedov. I met Sedov and in reply to his question as to whether I was prepared, if necessary, to serve as liaison man with Radek, I consented and gave him my addresses in Paris and Geneva.

A few days before my departure for Geneva, while in Paris, I received a letter posted in Paris, containing a short note from Sedov asking me to convey a letter enclosed in the envelope to Radek. I took this letter with me to Geneva and handed it to Radek when I met him. (137-138)

Romm seems to have functioned mainly as a courier. His talks with Trotsky and Sedov touched on Trotsky's plan for using his forces to guarantee the defeat of the USSR in a war with Germany in order to facilitate his return to power. Romm said he met with Trotsky in person in the Bois de Boulogne in Paris at the end of July 1933.

Vyshinsky: For what purpose did Trotsky meet you?

Romm: As far as I could understand, in order verbally to confirm the instructions contained in the letter I was taking to Moscow. He started the conversation with the question of creating the parallel centre. He said there was a danger in the predominance of the Zinovievites, but that the danger would be great only if the Trotskyites were not sufficiently active. He agreed with the idea of the parallel centre, but only on the imperative condition that the bloc with the Zinovievites was preserved and also on the condition that the parallel centre shall not be inactive but shall actively engage in gathering around itself the most stalwart cadres. Then he went on to say that not only terrorism, but sabotage activities in industry, and in the national economy in general, were assuming special significance. He said that, apparently, there was still wavering on this point, but it had to be understood that loss of life was inevitable in carrying out acts of sabotage, and that the main object was, by means of a number of sabotage operations, to undermine confidence in Stalin's Five-Year Plan, in the new technique, and in that way, to undermine confidence in the Party leadership. Emphasizing the necessity of extreme measures, Trotsky quoted the Latin proverb to the effect: "What medicine cannot heal, iron will heal, and what iron cannot heal, fire will heal." I remember that, somewhat perplexed, I suggested that this would undermine the defence capacity of the country at a time when, with the accession of Hitler to power, the danger of war, and particularly the danger of an attack on the U.S.S.R. by Germany, was becoming particularly acute. To this question I did not get a comprehensive reply, but Trotsky hinted that it was precisely the growing acuteness of the war danger that may place defeatism on the order of the day. (141-142)

Romm's meeting with Sedov in April 1934 in Paris touched on the same matter.

Sedov told me that in connection with my going to America Trotsky had asked to be informed in case there was anything interesting in the sphere of Soviet-American relations. When I asked why this was so interesting, Sedov told me: "This follows from Trotsky's line on the defeat of the U.S.S.R. Inasmuch as the date of the war of Germany and Japan against the U.S.S.R. depends to a certain extent on the state of Soviet-American relations, this cannot fail to be of interest to Trotsky.

(144)

Assessing the Evidence

Piatakov testified at length that he had personally spoken to Trotsky and received letters from him concerning the latter's agreements with both Germany and Japan. Likewise Radek said that Trotsky had discussed his, Trotsky's, agreements with both Germany and Japan in letters to him. Vladimir Romm, a Soviet journalist, testified that he had passed letters between Trotsky and Radek hidden in a book.

As we've seen, Getty said that Trotsky had sent letters to Radek, Sokol'nikov, Preobrazhensky "and others" in 1932. Evidently the Trotsky Archives at Harvard do not make it clear whether the "others" included Piatakov, nor whether Trotsky continued to send letters to his supporters in the USSR after 1932. Shestov said that he had received Trotsky's instructions through a face-to-face talk with Sedov.

Piatakov claimed Sedov had told him to order through German firms that would "kick back" funds to Trotsky. American engineer John Littlepage read this passage in the trial transcript and wrote that he found it credible. Littlepage claimed that in Berlin in 1931 he had learned of fraudulent orders for useless mining equipment being made by Russian émigrés acting for Soviet companies. He said that if Piatakov had made such orders the German companies would not have found it unusual, so Piatakov's story did not seem at all farfetched to him.⁴⁹

⁴⁹ John D. Littlepage with Demaree Bess, In Search of Soviet Gold. New York: Harcourt, Brace & Co, 1938, pp. 102-3. According to the late Prof. John N. Hazard of Columbia University Littlepage was an anticommunist but basically apolitical engineer who had no reason to lie to make the Soviet charges "look good." As a student of Soviet law Hazard stayed with the Littlepage family in Moscow in the mid-1930s. (Hazard interv. by Furr April 1981)

Archival Documents and The 1937 Trial Transcript: Sokol'nikov and Radek Concerning Trotsky's Relations With Japan and Germany

In the course of his indictment at the start of the 1937 Trial Soviet Prosecutor Andrei Vyshinskii said that in pretrial confessions Sokol'nikov had testified that a foreign diplomat had informed him of Trotsky's contact with his country:

The accused Sokolnikov also admitted that, taking advantage of his position as Assistant People's Commissar of Foreign Affairs, he, on L.D. Trotsky's instructions, carried on secret negotiations with representatives of a certain foreign state.

The accused Sokolnikov testified:

"At the conclusion of an official conversation held in my office, when Mr. ___ and the secretary of the embassy were about to leave, Mr. ___ stopped awhile.

"At that time both interpreters had already left my office. Taking advantage of this opportunity, Mr. ___, while I escorted him to the door, exchanged a few sentences with me. Mr. ___ asked me: 'Are you aware that Mr. Trotsky has made certain proposals to my government?'

"I replied: 'Yes, I have been informed of this.'

"Mr. ___ asked: 'How do you appraise these proposals?'

"I replied: 'I think the proposals are quite serious.'

"Then Mr. ___ asked: 'Is this only your personal opinion?'

"I replied: 'No, this is also the opinion of my friends.'"

(Vol. VIII, pp. 235, 236) (1937 Trial 9)

To this day not one of the many volumes of the preliminary investigative materials of this, of the other two Moscow Trials, and of many other such proceedings, has ever been opened to researchers. But the investigative materials pertaining to this particular passage were published in 1989 and again in 1991 a volume on the "rehabilitation" process. Its content is important for our purposes. First, because it shows that these many volumes of preliminary investigation materials do exist (or did in 1989). Second, because this passage, quoted from those preliminary materials, show clearly that the country in question was Japan.

. . . to the file was associated a copy of notes of a talk between G. Ia. Sokol'nikov, who was at that time the vice-commissar of Foreign Affairs, with the Japanese ambassador Ota of April 13, 1935 on the question of the petroleum, fishing, and anthracite concessions on Sakhalin [Island]. At the preliminary investigation and at the trial G. Ia. Sokol'nikov confirmed the fact of this talk and stated that after the talk he supposedly had a short conversation with Ota on the subject of L.D. Trotsky's proposals to the Japanese government. The contents of the conversation, as it is reflected in the transcript of the interrogation of G. Ia. Sokol'nikov of December 12, 1936, was as follows:

Sokol'nikov: . . . when Ota and the secretary of the embassy were about to leave, Ota stopped awhile. At that time both interpreters had already left my office. Taking advantage of this opportunity Ota, while I escorted him to the door, exchanged a few sentences with me.

Question: Please reproduce your conversation with Ota word for word, as far as possible.

Answer: Ota asked me: "Are you aware that Mr. Trotsky has made certain proposals to my government?" I replied: "Yes, I have been informed of this." Ota asked: "How do you appraise these proposals?" I replied: "I think the proposals are quite serious." Then Ota asked: "Is this only your personal opinion?" I replied: "No, this is also the opinion of my friends." On this point our conversation ended.

Question: Did Ota return to the question of contact between the bloc and the Japanese government after that?

Answer: No. This conversation with Ota took place at the very end of my negotiations with him. Shortly after that I stopped working in the NKVD and did not meet with Ota again.⁵⁰

⁵⁰ Reabilitatsiia. Politicheskie Protsessy 30-50-x godov. Moscow: Izdatel'stvo Politicheskoi Literatury, 2001, pp. 228-9. Originally published in Izvestiia TsK KPSS No. 9 (1989).

There is no basis to conclude that Sokol'nikov was forced to fabricate this statement, and then again forced at trial to leave out the name and any indication of what country's government was in question. It's precisely these details that strongly suggest the statement was not a fabrication. This statement was never intended to see the light of day. The text of this part of Sokol'nikov's confession is strong corroborative evidence that both it and his testimony at the Moscow trial are truthful.

The text of Radek's similar statement at a preliminary investigation has not been published, though it is briefly summarized on p. 229 on the Reabilitatsiia volume, right after the quotation from Sokol'nikov we've just reviewed. But a version of that text was reprinted in a 2004 volume of NKVD materials sent to Stalin. It occurs in a part of the draft of Vyshinsky's opening statement at the 1937 Trial. (Lubianka B 11-12) Though expurgated to remove the names of the German figures identified in the original interrogation (which is still secret) the name of the government — Germany, in this case — was left in the draft, while it was omitted in the Trial transcript. (1937 Trial 7-9)

In the following section:

- the passages that are common to both versions of Vyshinsky's remarks are in normal type.
- the passages that are only in the Trial transcript are in italics.
- those passages that are only in the pretrial draft of Vyshinsky's remarks published in 2004, but are not in the Trial transcript, are in boldface.

The most important result of this textual analysis is this: the draft version published in 2004 contains many more specific references to Germany and Japan, to German individuals, and to an outline of Trotsky's purported agreements with them.

As testified by the accused Pyatakov, L. Trotsky, in his conversation with the accused in December 1935, informed him that as a result of these negotiations he had concluded an agreement with the said leader of the National-Socialist Party HESS on the following terms:

"1) to guarantee a generally favourable attitude towards the German government and the necessary collaboration with it in the most important questions of an international character;

"2) to agree to territorial concessions;

"3) to permit German industrialists, in the form of concessions (or some other forms), to exploit enterprises in the U.S.S.R. which are essential as complements to German economy (iron ore, manganese, oil, gold, timber, etc., were meant);

"4) to create in the U.S.S.R. favourable conditions for the activities of German private enterprises;

"5) in time of war to develop extensive diversive activities in enterprises of the war industry and at the front. These diversive activities are to be carried on under Trotsky's instructions, agreed upon with the German General Staff.

These principles of the agreement, as Trotsky related, were finally elaborated and adopted during Trotsky's meeting with Hitler's deputy, Hess.

Likewise, said Trotsky, he had well-established connections with the Japanese government. (Vol. I, pp. 267, 268)

The nature of this agreement and the extent of the territorial concessions proposed were communicated by L. Trotsky in his letter to the accused Radek in December 1935.

...

On this point the accused Radek, during examination on December 4, 1936, testified:

". . . Trotsky's assertion about his communication with the representatives of the ___ government was not idle talk. I was able to convince myself of this from conversations I had had at diplomatic receptions in 1935-35 with the military attaché German Mr. General K., the naval attaché, if I am not mistaken, Mr. B and finally with the press-attaché of the German embassy, Mr. B, a very well informed representative of Germany.

"Both of them, in a cautious way, gave me to understand / 9 / that the ___ government was in communication with Trotsky.

And further:

"I told Mr K___ that it was absolutely useless expecting any concessions from the present government, but that the German government could count upon receiving concessions from "the realist politicians in the U.S.S.R.," i.e. from the bloc, when the latter came to power." (Vol. V, pp. 119, 121)

We should note that even Vyshinsky's draft has been expurgated of some details. For example in the summary of Sokol'nikov's confession Ota's name is replaced by "O." in this draft, while in the Trial transcript itself even this letter is omitted and we read "Mr. ___." Hess's name is mentioned in the Trial transcript, presumably because Hess was an official of the Nazi Party, not a member of the German government. The Soviets insisted upon making a distinction between the policies of the Soviet government that wanted good relations with capitalist countries in diplomacy, trade, etc., and the policies of the Bolshevik Party that pursued subversive ends. It is logical that they would make a similar distinction in the case of Germany.

By analogy with Sokol'nikov's interrogation we may assume that all the names were present in the still-secret transcript of Radek's interrogation. Explicit identification of German and Japanese individuals is more frequent in the draft of Vyshinsky's remarks, yet Hess's name does get into the Trial transcript, though the word "Japan" is excised, as are the ranks and initials of the German officials and, in the last quotation, the word "Germany" itself. This appears to show considerable uncertainty within the Soviet government as to how much to reveal publicly. Perhaps they did not want to "burn their bridges" to the government and military of any of the Western countries, who after all could not be blamed for espionage since every country did it and the Soviets were doing it too.

Assessing This Evidence

As in the case of the Sokol'nikov passage, these differences between the various versions of the same testimony are hard to explain unless one assumes that the original testimony was genuine. It is simply not necessary in the slightest to create multiple levels of fake confessions. But real confessions that were obtained in many interrogations over an extended time, then edited down in several versions of the indictment, and finally edited again, we must assume, in the final draft of the Trial transcript, would leave this kind of documentary trail.

Radek's and Sokol'nikov's interrogations were still in existence in 1989 when the excerpt from it was published. We have evidence that the texts of many other interrogations, as well as other vital investigative materials, still exist but are kept top secret in Russian archives. They probably have a great deal more evidence to support the existence of the conspiracies, including those with Trotsky, Germany and Japan. Since the archives have been scoured for any evidence that could support the "rehabilitations", and thus the supposed innocence, of the defendants, it seems safe to assume that most material that is still secret is of a different, inculpatory nature.

There appear to be three kinds of documents.

- The published Trial transcript has the fewest details concerning German and Japanese collaboration by Trotsky and the Trotskyists.
- Vyshinsky's draft presentation had more such details, including some that were excised before he delivered it or, at the very least, before it was published.

- Transcripts of the defendants' actual interrogations and confessions have the most detail of all.

The relatively few such pretrial confession transcripts that have been published — Bukharin's first confession, plus Frinovsky's, Ezhov's, Yagoda's, Enukidze's, Fel'dman's, and a few by defendants at the 1936 trials like Zinov'ev and Kamenev — confirm the impression that they contain primary evidence of outstanding importance. It is highly probable that a great deal of such evidence remains extant and secret.

In a famous passage in his trial testimony Radek mocked the idea that he might have been coerced into making the statements he did, saying that it was he who had "tormented" his interrogators.

When I found myself in the People's Commissariat of Internal Affairs, the chief examining official realized at once why I would not talk. He said to me: "You are not a baby. Here you have fifteen people testifying against you. You cannot get out of it, and as a sensible man you cannot think of doing so. If you do not want to testify it can only be because you want to gain time and look it over more closely. Very well, study it." For two and a half months I tormented the examining official. The question has been raised here whether we were tormented while under investigation. I must say that it was not I who was tormented, but I who tormented the examining officials and compelled them to perform a lot of useless work. For two and a half months I compelled the examining official, by interrogating me and by confronting me with the testimony of other accused, to open up all the cards to me, so that I could see who had confessed, who had not confessed, and what each had confessed. (1937 Trial 549; emphasis added)

We have no evidence that the testimony in these confessions was extracted by threat or force — that is, was false. Why go to the trouble of having a suspect concoct a detailed confession, naming names, and then take out those names for the sake of a trial? By far the most likely reason for omitting the names at trial is that they were genuine in the first place. Given the absence of any evidence that these confessions were false, and given the logical progression from more detail in the secret documents to the least detail in public ones, any objective student would conclude that we should consider these confessions genuine unless and until evidence to the contrary should be discovered. But the practice among most scholars of this period of Soviet history is to do precisely the opposite. Any evidence that tends to support the theory that Trotsky or any of those accused of espionage, sabotage, conspiracy to overthrow the government or treasonable contacts with foreign governments did in fact so conspire, is routinely dismissed. The evidence itself is not evaluated.

There is never any reason to "dismiss" — to refuse to consider — any evidence. All evidence needs to be evaluated on its own merits and in conjunction with the rest of the evidence available, as we have done here. The evidence is strong that Radek testified truthfully both in his pretrial interrogations and at the trial. That means either that Trotsky was involved with Germany and Japan or, at the least, that Trotsky told Radek he was.

The March 1938 Trial: Krestinsky, Rozengol'ts, Bessonov, Rakovsky

In this trial Nikolai Krestinsky testified that in 1922 he began collaborating with the German General von Seeckt, at Trotsky's behest and for factional Trotskyist aims. Krestinsky said that the clandestine Trotskyite organization did some kind of espionage or intelligence services for the German General Staff in return for a considerable sum of money to further their factional work within the Bolshevik Party.

KRESTINSKY: I began my illegal Trotskyite activities at the end of 1921, when on Trotsky's suggestion I consented to the formation of an illegal Trotskyite organization and to my joining its centre, which was to be made up of Trotsky, Pyatakov, Serebryakov, Preobrazhensky and myself, Krestinsky. Trotsky made this proposal to me immediately after the Tenth Congress. . . . (1938 Trial 262) A year later I committed a crime — I refer to the one I spoke about during the examination of the accused Rosengoltz — the agreement I concluded on Trotsky's instructions with General Seeckt, with the Reichswehr in his person, about financing the Trotskyite organization in exchange for services of an espionage nature which we undertook in this connection to render the Reichswehr. . . . (262)

VYSHINSKY: Will you tell us how much money you received?

KRESTINSKY: Beginning with 1923 until 1930 we received annually 250,000 German marks in gold.

VYSHINSKY: This makes approximately two million gold marks altogether during these years?

KRESTINSKY: Yes, approximately two million gold marks. (265)

Krestinsky made a point of stressing that he had contacted von Seeckt as early as the previous year, 1921, but that his illegal, criminal contacts with von Seeckt dated only from 1922.

VYSHINSKY: Inasmuch as you are winding up the story of this period of your criminal activities, I want to get more precise information on one question. You said that in the winter of 1921-22 you evolved your calculations on the German Reichswehr.

KRESTINSKY: The plans to utilize the German Reichswehr for criminal Trotskyite purposes appeared in the spring of 1922.

VYSHINSKY: Did your Trotskyite organization maintain contact with Seeckt even before 1921?

KRESTINSKY: There was a contact with him of which I do not want to speak at an open session. It was a contact established by a member of our organization who at that time was not yet a member of our organization, and it was not a contact of a Trotskyite nature. (267-268)

...

VYSHINSKY: The question of money for Trotskyite purposes from the German Reichswehr — is that an official aspect or not?

KRESTINSKY: This was the secret Trotskyite aspect, a criminal thing.

VYSHINSKY: Which refers to 1921-22?

KRESTINSKY: To 1922. (269)

It is hard to see why he would have insisted upon such precision over an insubstantial matter unless he were telling the truth.

Krestinsky also claimed that he had met personally with Trotsky in Meran,⁵¹ Italy in October 1933, where Trotsky told him that collaboration with Japan was also essential.

KRESTINSKY: When I told him [Bessonov, another of the defendants — GF] that I wanted to meet Trotsky he said that there was a possibility of arranging it. At the same time I said that I would stay in Kissingen to the end of September, and that I would spend the rest of the time up to the 10th of October in Meran, and I gave him the address of the Kissingen sanatorium in which I always stopped, and also my address in Meran. . . .

Trotsky arrived in Meran around the 10th of October together with Sedov . . . Trotsky, as he told me, arrived with somebody else's French passport and he travelled by the route of which Bessonov spoke, that is to say, over the Franco-Italian border, and not through Switzerland and Germany. For Trotsky, the questions which bothered us in Moscow were irrevocably settled and he himself proceeded to expound his instructions with regard to this. He said that as since 1929 we had developed into an organization of a conspiratorial type, it was natural that the seizure of power could be consummated only by force. . . . (275-6)

⁵¹ The city is called "Meran" in German and Russian, and "Merano" in Italian. We use "Meran" here because this is the spelling in the English translation of the 1938 Trial transcript.

Krestinsky said that Trotsky personally informed him that he was continuing to work personally with the Germans, and with the Japanese through Sokol'nikov.

He undertook to carry on the negotiations with the Germans. As for the Japanese, of whom he spoke as a force with which it was also necessary to come to terms, he said that, for the time being, it was difficult for him to establish direct connections with them, that it would be necessary to carry on conversations with them in Moscow, that it was necessary in this connection to use Sokolnikov, who was working in the People's Commissariat of Foreign Affairs and, as it happened, was in charge of eastern affairs. And inasmuch as this conversation would be held only with an official person, and the preliminary conversation would only be in the nature of soundings, it would be sufficient to confine ourselves at first to general statements to the effect that if a government of a bloc of the opposition groups assumed power in the Soviet Union, it would display a favourable attitude towards the Japanese and take into consideration the wishes of the Japanese during the discussion and settlement of the controversies existing between the Soviet government and the Japanese government. (277-278)

Rozengol'ts testified that he had contacted von Seeckt and Chief of the German General Staff Haase in 1923 when ordered by Trotsky and for Trotskyist purposes. (Krestinsky too had confessed to meeting with von Seeckt and Haase.)

My espionage activities began as far back as 1923, when, on TROTSKY'S instructions, I handed various secret information to the Command-in-Chief of the Reichswehr, SEECKT, and to the Chief of the German General Staff, HASSE. Subsequently, direct connections with me were established by the ___ Ambassador in the U.S.S.R., Mr. N, to whom I periodically gave information of an espionage character. After Mr. N's departure I continued my espionage connections with the new Ambassador, Mr. N." (Vol VI, p. 131 reverse) (9)

He insisted that this is when his conspiratorial work began — that is, that this contact was not work for the USSR, which had trade and military agreements with Weimar Germany at the time.

VYSHINSKY: . . . So you, Rosengoltz, established connections with the German intelligence service already in 1923?

ROSENGOLTZ: With Seeckt directly.

VYSHINSKY: Do you draw a line between the two?

ROSENGOLTZ: I am saying it merely for the sake of exactitude.

VYSHINSKY: So since 1923 you, accused Rosengoltz, began to supply espionage information to foreign states?

ROSENGOLTZ: That is right. (261)

Rozengol'ts' distinction here is correct. Contact with the German General Staff is not the same as contact with German intelligence, even though espionage for both would be equally illegal. Here too it is hard to imagine why Rozengol'ts would have taken the trouble to be so precise unless he were telling the truth. Liars can feign precision, but in this case there seems to be no reason to fabricate this kind of distinction.

He testified to working with both Germany and Japan on Trotsky's instructions.

In addition to instructions I received from TROTSKY through KRESTINSKY and SEDOV to carry on sabotage activities in the sphere of foreign trade with the object of rendering direct assistance to Germany and Japan, the character of my sabotage activities was also determined by instructions I received from the ___ Ambassadors in the U.S.S.R., Mr. N and Mr. N, connections with whom played an important part in this matter, as I had to be guided in my work by their definite instructions.

After I had established contact with TUKHACHEVSKY and RYKOV, I informed the former through KRESTINSKY, and the latter I myself informed, of TROTSKY'S instructions regarding sabotage activities, and both approved of the work I had done.

As a result of all this, sabotage activities in foreign trade proceeded mainly along the following three lines: first — economic assistance to Germany and Japan at the expense of the U.S.S.R.; second — causing economic loss and damage to the U.S.S.R.; third — causing political damage to the U.S.S.R. (Vol. VI, p. 49) (15-16)

ROSENGOLTZ: I shall enumerate the main points. Sedov also conveyed directions from Trotsky about the organization of terrorism, stating that at that period these instructions about terrorism should have no direct practical bearing on Krestinsky and myself from motives of secrecy, since special instructions were being given on this score to the terrorist organization of Ivan Nikitich Smirnov. In 1933 directions and instructions were received with regard to sabotage in the sphere of foreign trade. As Sedov had told me that Trotsky had an agreement with certain German circles, from this standpoint sabotage was of very essential importance to Trotsky for the maintenance of his prestige and the preservation of the agreement. The principal line in sabotage was to further the interests of Germany and Japan in the sphere of foreign trade. (246)

Rozengol'ts said that he met personally with Sedov in both 1933 and 1934.

In so far as TROTSKY had an agreement with Germany and Japan, of which I had been informed (both during the negotiations — at my meeting with Sedov in 1933; and of the agreement that had been reached — at my meeting with him in 1934), I received corresponding instructions from TROTSKY, and my sabotage activities in the sphere of foreign trade served the same purpose. (Vol. VI, p. 48) (18)

Bessonov said that he had received a letter from Trotsky in 1934, and also met Trotsky in Paris in that year.

BESSONOV: I received a short letter through Johannson, a note from Trotsky, in which he wrote about arranging a meeting with one of the Trotskyites in Germany to inform him about the events of June 30 in Germany. I was the only person who could go. At the end of July 1934 I arrived in Paris by the day train and also left by the day train. The whole talk took place in a hotel at which Johannson always stayed. Trotsky said that he knew me very well from Pyatakov's letters and from Krestinsky's accounts. (63)

Here Trotsky urged him to pressure the Germans to come to some official agreement with the Opposition, saying:

VYSHINSKY: What did you and Trotsky say about your underground Trotskyite tasks?

BESSONOV: He imposed on his followers working in the diplomatic field the task of adopting the line of sabotaging official agreements in order to stimulate the interest of the Germans in unofficial agreements with opposition groups. "They will come to us yet," said Trotsky, referring to Hess and Rosenberg. He said that we must not be squeamish in this matter, and that we might be ensured real and important help from Hess and Rosenberg. He said we must not stop short at consenting to big cessions of territory. (63)

Khristian Rakovsky testified that in September 1934 an important Japanese official had spoken to him directly concerning an agreement with the opposition.

RAKOVSKY: . . . In September 1934 I was sent to Tokyo at the head of the Soviet Red Cross Delegation to an international conference of Red Cross Societies, which was to take place there in October. The day after I arrived in Tokyo, I was stopped in the corridor of the Japanese Red Cross building by a certain prominent public man of Japan. I can mention his name.

THE PRESIDENT: No, there is no need.

RAKOVSKY: Very well, I will name him at the session in camera. He invited me to tea. I made his acquaintance. He held a position which had some relation to my mission — I want to say, not my mission as one who belonged to the opposition, but my governmental mission. I accepted his amiable invitation. During the conversation this person (here I omit various compliments, commonplaces, flattering remarks) said that the interests of the political trend to which I belonged in the U.S.S.R. and the interests of a certain government fully coincided, and that he personally welcomed my arrival in Tokyo because it would give him the opportunity to discuss certain questions concerning both sides, . . . (289-290)

Rakovsky then said that during 1935 and the first half of 1936 he had had five communications with Naida, a Japanese agent. Naida gave him to understand that the Japanese had relations with Trotsky. Rakovsky communicated with Trotsky about this.

During the second and third meeting with the public man who headed a big public organization in Japan we established the nature of the information which I promised to supply to the agents of the Japanese intelligence service in Moscow and also the technique of transmitting this information. While still in Tokyo, I drew into this work Dr. Naida, secretary of the Red Cross Delegation, of whom I already knew that he was a member of the underground counter-revolutionary terrorist organization. I sent Dr. Naida with my card to the public man and he arranged with him as to how and with whom Dr. Naida was to meet in Moscow; it was he who acted as liaison agent between me and the Japanese intelligence service. In Tokyo I had yet another meeting, with a third person. . . . I was introduced to this third person by the second high personage. He asked me to take coffee with him — this was after dinner; we sat down at a table and began to talk.

I shall not reproduce the whole conversation, and it is not necessary either; I shall give it to you in substance. He started the conversation by saying: "We are aware that you are a very close friend and adherent of Mr. Trotsky. I must ask you to write to him that a certain government is dissatisfied with his articles on the Chinese question and also with the behaviour of the Chinese Trotskyites. We have a right to expect a different line of conduct on the part of Mr. Trotsky. Mr. Trotsky ought to understand what is necessary for the certain government. There is no need to go into details, but it is clear that an incident provoked in China would be a desirable pretext for intervening in China." I wrote to Trotsky about all this. . . . (293-294)

Summary: Evidence From The Moscow Trials

Of the defendants at the three public Moscow Trials nine men claimed to have heard directly from either Trotsky or his son Sedov about contacts between Trotsky and German or Japanese officials.

We noted above that many other defendants — Bukharin, for example — testified that they had heard about this at second or third hand and believed it. Bukharin said he had heard about it from Radek, whom he had every reason to believe. But if Radek had been lying Bukharin would not have known, so Bukharin's testimony on this point is evidence at second hand.

However, indirect or "second hand" evidence is still evidence. It can be used to corroborate — or, as the case may be, to contradict and so disconfirm — other more direct evidence. Therefore we will consider it briefly at the end of our discussion.

The Moscow Trial defendants provided very strong evidence of Trotsky's collaboration with Germany and Japan. This evidence has never been successfully impugned. But it has been declared false so many times — its falsity taken for granted without evidence — that its "falsehood" is constituent of the current mainstream paradigm of Soviet history. As we discuss later in the present essay, official Soviet "rehabilitations" are political documents many of which are simply frauds but nonetheless continue to be accepted as true.

Evidence From The Former Soviet Archives

The rest of this essay could be thought of as an attempt to assess — that is, to confirm or disconfirm — some of the statements made by the defendants at the three public Moscow Trials concerning Trotsky's alleged German-Japanese collaboration in the light of new documentary evidence from the former Soviet archives.

We have already considered some evidence from former Soviet archives:

- Trotsky's telegram of June 18, 1937 to the Soviet government;
- published excerpts from still secret pretrial investigative materials on Sokol'nikov and Radek.

In the rest of the essay we will examine other archival evidence implicating Trotsky that has been made public since the end of the USSR in 1991 to date.

Pavliukov

In 2007 Russian researcher Aleksei Pavliukov published the fullest account to date of Nikolai Ezhov's career.⁵² This book, and Ezhov's career and conspiracies, are of great importance to any accurate understanding of the events of the late 1930s. For our present more limited purposes it is important because Pavliukov was accorded privileged access to certain unpublished materials relating to these conspiracies from the investigative files.

52 Aleksei Pavliukov, Ezhov. Biografiya. Moscow: Zakharov, 2007.

Among those materials were some dealing with the second Moscow Trial. Here is Pavliukov's discussion of the part of a confession by Radek dated October 20, 1936 in which Radek discusses Trotsky's relations with Germany and their significance.

Radek reported that Trotsky, who had supposedly established firm contacts with German authorities, let them know that after its coming to power the Trotskyite-Zinovievite bloc was ready to make significant concessions in relation to Germany. This would be expressed in profitable conditions for the export of German goods from the USSR, in a reduction of prices for Soviet goods exported to Germany, in the permission of German capital to exploit the natural riches of the country, and also in several territorial concessions. (Pavliukov 236)

This corresponds with what Radek testified during the January 1937 Moscow Trial. Had the pretrial investigation materials, which were never intended to be made public, failed to confirm the trial testimony, we would have reason to doubt that testimony and suspect some "stage-managing" at the trial. But here the opposite is the case. Therefore, it confirms his trial testimony. The existence of such confessions argues against any idea that the Trial was "stage-managed."

In the following passage Pavliukov quotes some words of Radek's directly.

In the event of war between Germany and the Soviet Union upon which, according to Radek's words, Trotsky laid great hopes, "the Trotskyist commanders could even use certain individual defeats in battle as proof of the supposedly incorrect policy of the Central Committee of the AUCP(b) and in general of the senselessness and ruinous nature of the given war. They — Radek continued to fantasize — using such failures and the exhaustion of the Red Army soldiers, might even call upon them to abandon the front and turn their weapons against the government. That might give the German Army the possibility of occupying the abandoned areas and create a real threat of a crushing defeat of the whole front." Under these conditions the conspirators, relying upon those parts of the Army commanded by the Trotskyist commanders, might obtain a real chance to carry out a seizure of power in the country. (Pavliukov 236-7)

This passage is congruent with the testimony of some of the military figures who asserted that they were in collaboration with both Trotsky and the Germans. We will examine that testimony below. It is also broadly consistent with what Piatakov testified at the January 1937 trial (see above).

Pavliukov also summarizes a confession of Radek's in the archives and dated two days later, on December 22, 1936 that concerns Trotsky.

The ultimate completion of the story with Trotsky's sellout of his former country occurred in Radek's confession of December 22, 1936. "As it turned out," the supposed meeting between Pyatakov and Trotsky in Norway was caused by the necessity to discuss a letter that had been received the evening before from Trotsky, in which the latter set forth his plans on the questions of the activity of the Trotskyist-Zinovievist bloc on foreign matters.

This letter, according to Radek, pointed out the desirability of the seizure of power even before the start of the impending war, and for this it would be essential to activate terrorist activity against the leaders of the Soviet government. For the normalization of relations with Germany it was considered expedient to agree to permit Germany to take part in the exploitation of areas of useful ores on the territory of the USSR and to guarantee the provision of foodstuffs and fats at less than world prices. As for Japan, the letter supposedly said that it would be necessary to give it access to Sakhalin oil, and to guarantee additional access to oil in the event of war with America, and also to permit it access to the exploitation of Soviet gold-producing areas. Besides that it followed that they ought not to hinder the German seizure of the Danubian and Balkan countries and not to interfere with Japan's seizure of China.

If they did not succeed in taking power before the war this goal might be attainable, in Trotsky's opinion (in Radek's exposition), as a result of a military defeat of the USSR, for which it was essential to energetically prepare. Active sabotage activities before and during the war would, besides weakening the defensive potential of the Soviet Union, demonstrate the real strength of the Trotskyist-Zinovievist bloc and facilitate postwar negotiations with Germany, which was not of small importance, since in the event the conspirators came to power as a result of a crushing defeat of the USSR, it would not be possible to manage with the concessions of peacetime. In that case they would have to yield to the Germans obligations for the purchase of German goods for a long period of time, etc. In order that this scheme, attributed to the professional revolutionary Trotsky, would not look altogether too clumsy, Radek supplied it with arguments according to which Trotsky supposedly relied upon in developing all these defeatist plans. Afterwards, as a result of the strengthening of Germany and Japan (although at the expense of the USSR), would begin the unavoidable war between the imperialist powers, as it was supposedly set forth in Trotsky's letter, it could be possible to go once again on the counter-offensive, since the consequences of this war would facilitate the reappearance in the world of a new revolutionary situation.

This is the message supposedly received by Radek at the end of 1935 that stimulated Pyatakov to set out as soon as he could to consult with Trotsky in person. Radek confirmed Pyatakov's confession about this meeting and filled them out with new details that Pyatakov had supposedly shared with him after his return to Moscow. It turned out that Trotsky had promised the Germans that during war between Germany and the USSR the Trotskyist commanders at the front would act according to the direct orders of the German General Staff, and after the war the new government would compensate Germany for part of its military expenses by paying with goods that were essential for its military industries.

At the same time Trotsky strove to avoid too great a dependence on Germany and Japan and was supposedly carrying on negotiations with the English and French too. As a result of the meetings that had taken place with representatives of Germany, England and France an agreement had been drafted that foresaw that, in the event the Trotskyists came to power, England and France would also not lose by it, to which Germany graciously acceded. The French were promised a benevolent regard to their attempts to obtain the return of their prerevolutionary debts to Russia and their pretensions to the metallurgical industry of the Donbas, and the English — consideration of their interests in the Caucasus.

After the war, in accordance with the plans attributed to Trotsky, there would be established in the Soviet Union the same kind of social-economic system as in the other countries of Europe and, of course, the Comintern would be disbanded. (Pavliukov 239-240)

Pavliukov and The 1937 Trial Transcript Compared

This summary of Radek's confession of December 22, 1936 is consistent with Radek's testimony at the January 1937 trial. In fact Vyshinsky read a brief quotation from this very confession in his opening statement at the trial:

For example, the accused Radek, confirming Pyatakov's testimony, testified during examination on December 22, 1936, that one of the points of the agreement reached between Trotsky and the representatives of the German National-Socialist Party was the obligation

". . . during Germany's war against the U.S.S.R. . . . to adopt a defeatist position, to intensify diversive activities, particularly in enterprises of military importance ... to act on Trotsky's instructions agreed upon with the German General Staff." (Vol. V, p. 152) (1937 Trial 10-11)

Pavliukov's summary of Radek's confession also contains some details that did not come out at the trial. For instance, according to the published trial transcript Radek did not accuse Trotsky during the Trial of planning to accommodate the powerful imperialist countries by dissolving or banishing the Comintern. In this unpublished confession Radek stresses that "Trotskyist military commanders" would be working directly with the German general staff to take advantage of defeat in war with Germany. According to the transcript Radek said nothing about this at the trial.

The Russian language transcript is far shorter than the English version, which was evidently published later in the year, after the arrest and execution of Tukhachevsky and the other military conspirators. Putna and Primakov, both well-known Trotskyists, were under arrest at the time of the trial. Putna, military attaché to Great Britain, had been recalled and arrested on August 20, 1936. Primakov had been arrested a few days earlier. Putna is mentioned in the trial transcripts in a general manner, as a military commander who did have contact with the German general staff. Both the Russian and the English transcripts record the following passage in Radek's interrogations:

And, finally, after receiving Trotsky's directives in 1934, I sent him the reply of the centre, and added in my own name that I agreed that the ground should be sounded, but that he should not bind himself, because the situation might change. I suggested that the negotiations should be conducted by Putna, who had connections with leading Japanese and German military circles. And Trotsky replied [to me — Russian only, GF]: "We shall not bind ourselves without your knowledge, we shall make no decisions." For a whole year he was silent. And at the end of that year he confronted us with the accomplished fact of his agreement. You will understand that it was not any virtue on my part that I rebelled against this. But it is a fact for you to understand. (Russian transcript p. 226; English transcript p. 545)

In the English version the following passage also occurs, which is omitted altogether in the much shorter Russian version:

Radek: In 1935. But notwithstanding this, we decided to call a conference. And before this — in January, when I arrived — Vitaly Putna came to see me with some request from Tukhachevsky. I said: "This is no way for a leader [Trotsky — GF] to act. There has been no news of this man for six months. Get hold of him, dead or alive." Putna promised. But when I received no answer from Putna, . . . (105)

Vyshinsky then reprises this passage a little later, again only in the English transcript:

Vyshinsky: Accused Radek, in your testimony you said: "In 1935 . . . we resolved to call a conference, but before this, in January, when I arrived, Vitaly Putna came to me with a request from Tukhachevsky. . . ." I want to know in what connection you mention Tukhachevsky's name.

Radek: Tukhachevsky had been commissioned by the government with some task for which he could not find the necessary material. I alone was in possession of this material. He rang me up and asked if I had this material. I had it, and he accordingly sent Putnam, with whom he had to discharge this commission, to get this material from me. Of course, Tukhachevsky had no idea either of Putna's role or of my criminal role. . . .

Vyshinsky: And Putna?

Radek: He was a member of the organization. . . .

Vyshinsky: Do I understand you correctly, that Putna had dealings with the members of your Trotskyite underground organization, and that your reference to Tukhachevsky was made in connection with the fact that Putna came on official business on Tukhachevsky's orders?

Radek: I confirm that, and I say that I never had and could not have had any dealings with Tukhachevsky connected with counter-revolutionary activities, because I knew Tukhachevsky's attitude to the Party and the government to be that of an absolutely devoted man.

(146)

Assessing This Evidence

The Russian version does not mention Putna as a member of the Trotskyite organization, while the English transcript makes it clear that he was. Tukhachevsky is not even mentioned in the Russian, while in the English version Radek appears to go out of his way to declare Tukhachevsky innocent entirely. One possible explanation is that the English translation was only prepared later in 1937 after the arrests of the leading Tukhachevsky Affair defendants. The discovery of the military conspiracy was far more grave in its potential consequences than the uncovering of the continuing activities of the high-ranking Bolsheviks who testified at the January 1937 trial, serious as this was. According to this logic the shorter Russian transcript may have been prepared soon after the trial. Subsequently it was severely edited in order to give the gist of the trial testimony while not disclosing allegations against others still under investigation, including the military men. The much longer English transcript might then have been prepared later in the year, with much more detail to show the conspiratorial links to the Tukhachevsky defendants and with a view to influencing foreign opinion. The more information, the more credible the charges — so the logic of the Soviet government may have run. Such a consideration may also account for the fact that both the Russian and English transcripts of the March 1938 "Bukharin-Rykov" trial were huge, more than three times the length of the Russian version of the 1937 trial, and that the Russian transcript contained more detail than the English rather than less, as in the case of the 1937 trial transcript.

Whatever the reasons, the differences we can now discern between Radek's unpublished confessions and his testimony at the trial argue in favor of the genuineness of those confessions. Why go to all the trouble to fabricate confessions that implicate the military, and charge Trotsky with agreeing to destroy the Comintern, and then omit them at the public trial?

Of course we have no evidence that any of the trial testimony was "fabricated" in advance anyway. Pavliukov states and restates his skepticism concerning the materials he quotes. But why bother to quote them all without comment or analysis if they are all lies? Pavliukov can't bring himself to take either position consistently.

Ezhov's Confessions

Pavliukov never quite brings himself to state that Ezhov was guilty. Neither does he make any overt claim that his confessions were fraudulent — the result of torture or other compulsion. But if Ezhov were in fact guilty then his confessions were, in the main at least, accurate.

Later in his book, when he discusses how Ezhov retracted all of his many detailed confessions at his trial, Pavliukov suggests that he may have done this in order to delay his execution a day or two by complicating matters. It seems that Pavliukov also could not bring himself to accept the "canonical" viewpoint that all of Ezhov's confessions were false and that he was innocent of all the crimes to which he confessed, including collaboration with the Germans. And Ezhov's execution was in fact delayed by two days, so Pavliukov's hypothesis makes sense.

We need to pause to consider the implications of Pavliukov's position. Throughout his book Pavliukov expresses skepticism about the truth of Ezhov's confessions. He does report that Ezhov confirmed all of them when he was given the indictment and all the volumes of his investigation file:

The last interrogation took place January 31 [1940] and on the very next day A.A. Esaulov, assistant chief of the Investigative section of the NKVD of the USSR reported the conclusion of the investigation. Ezhov was presented with the 12 volumes of his criminal case file for his study. He read it through and then declared that he confirmed all the confessions that he had given during the preliminary investigation and had no additions to make. (529)

Two days later Ezhov allegedly told his successor as head of the NKVD Lavrenty Beria that all of his confessions were "imagined 100%" and denied all the charges against him. Thereupon Ezhov's former "zam" (vice-commissar) at the NKVD Mikhail Frinovsky was called to testify against Ezhov. Frinovsky confirmed everything he knew about his and Ezhov's conspiracies.

Pavliukov shows no skepticism towards Frinovsky's testimony. As we have seen, one detailed confession of Frinovsky's has now been published, and it implicates Ezhov. Pavliukov opines that Ezhov retracted all his pretrial confessions simply to postpone the inevitable trial and execution, if possible (530). His only evidence for this surmise is that Ezhov was inexplicably not executed on the day of his trial, February 4, 1940, but two days later on February 6. However that may be, for our purposes the point is as follows: Pavliukov never suggests that Ezhov's retraction and statement at trial, during which he claimed he was innocent of wrongdoing, was true. Nor, interestingly, did Ezhov claim he had been tortured into making false statements.

The implications of the confessions of Ezhov, Frinovsky, and other NKVD men are enormous. They are utterly incompatible with the present "Cold War" or "anti-Stalin" paradigm of Soviet history. To take just one example: in his "Secret Speech" at the 20th Party Congress Khrushchev blamed Ezhov for repressions — but only as Stalin's tool. Yet three weeks before, on February 1 1956, Khrushchev had said at a meeting to plan his speech "Ezhov, no doubt, was an honest man, not to blame" (RKEB 1 308). Khrushchev seems to have realized that to accept the story of Ezhov's conspiracy was to exculpate Stalin from direct responsibility for the massive repressions. Pavliukov's acceptance of Ezhov's confessions has the same effect.

Ezhov's confessions were made in secret, never intended for publication. It appears that they were genuine. Pavliukov treats them as such. He also treats Radek's secret confessions as though they too were genuine. In Ezhov's case the accused (Ezhov) confirmed his confessions right up to the moment of trial, and then retracted them all, yet he was still convicted, evidently on two bases: (a) Frinovsky's accusations against him (there may have been other testimony against him as well); and (b) the testimony of all of his previous interrogations and confessions, plus all the other testimony given against him by others during the proceedings.

Ezhov gave many detailed confessions and confirmed them all before trial, while at the trial itself he retracted everything. Pavliukov carefully reports and summarizes Ezhov's pretrial confessions. Pavliukov also reports Ezhov's recantation at trial but does not accept it as truthful. Radek, in contrast, confessed both before trial and at trial, so there is even less reason to question the truthfulness of Radek's confessions than there is to question Ezhov's.

Dimitrov's Diary

In 2003 the diary of Georgi Dimitrov, head of the Comintern after 1935 and close associate of Stalin's, was published. Dimitrov met frequently with Stalin and other Bolshevik leaders, and his diary contains many important passages and statements by Stalin and others. On December 16 1936 Dimitrov met in the Kremlin with Stalin and four of his closest associates, Molotov, Kaganovich, Voroshilov and Ordzhonikidze. During this meeting they received a report about an interrogation of Sokol'nikov of December 12, a few days before. Here is what Dimitrov wrote, with the phrases of special interest to our present investigation in boldface:

16 December 1936

– With "the Five" in the Kremlin

(Stal[in], Molot[ov], Kag[anovich], Vor[oshilov], Ordzhonikidze).

Exchange of opinions of Ch[inese] events. . . .

– On the French question: . . .

– From the investigation of Piatakov, Sokolnikov, Radek, and others:

Interrogation of Sokolnikov, 12 December 1936:

Question: Thus, the investigation concludes that Trotsky abroad and the center of the bloc within the USSR entered into negotiations with the Hitlerite and Japanese governments with the following aims: First, to provoke a war by Germany and Japan against the USSR;

Second, to promote the defeat of the USSR in that war and to take advantage of that defeat to achieve the transfer of power in the USSR to [their] government bloc;

Third, on behalf of the future bloc government to guarantee territorial and economic concessions to the Hitlerite and Japanese governments.

Do you confirm this?

Reply: Yes, I confirm it.

Question: Do you admit that this activity by the bloc is tantamount to outright treason against the motherland?

Reply: Yes, I admit it.

(Dimitrov 42-43; emphasis added)

Analysis

This meeting can be confirmed in the schedule of visitors to Stalin's office for December 16, 1936.⁵³ The four Politburo members named by Dimitrov are recorded as entering Stalin's office at 1905 hrs, fifteen minutes before Dimitrov entered along with Manuilsky, who was a Secretary of the Executive Committee of the Comintern and head of the Soviet delegation to it, while Dimitrov himself was General Secretary of the Executive Committee of the Comintern. Dimitrov and Manuilsky stayed for fifty minutes. The two Comintern leaders were obviously there to discuss Comintern — international — matters. Sokolnikov's testimony was relevant to their concerns. Dimitrov heard this at a meeting of political leaders of the highest level, including Stalin himself. There is no indication that Stalin — he would be the only person who might be able to get away with such a thing — "staged" this meeting for Dimitrov's benefit. Dimitrov, a staunch supporter of Stalin and the Soviet Union, did not need reassurance or "shoring up." And Dimitrov wrote this in his private diary, only recently published because of the demise of the Soviet bloc.

⁵³ "Posetiteli kremlevskogo kabineta I.V. Stalina." Istoricheskii Arkhiv 4 (1995), 35.

Therefore this entry is similar to the signatures of Stalin et al. on the Trotsky telegram six months later. It is an excellent gauge of what Stalin and top Soviet leaders believed at the time. This is significant because they had access to all the evidence, including a huge amount that is still secret.

Was Stalin "Lying"?

It is often asserted by Cold War historians that Stalin was a "liar" so that nothing he wrote should be "believed." Therefore — this logic might go — we should not "believe" him, in this case, in the case of the Trotsky telegram, the comments he wrote on statements and confessions — ever.

But this reasoning is all wrong. There is no reason to view Stalin as a "liar" any more than any other political figure. In the course of our research over the past decade we have found no examples of Stalin's "lying," aside from the Katyn issue — and there is a huge political dispute about that question which we will not broach here and now. For what it is worth, Katyn was a very different situation, allegedly involving lying to foreign powers, a common practice among all governments at all times.

In any case lying is a universal human trait. Everybody lies — but nobody lies all the time. Therefore, the fact that someone lied in one case or other is not evidence that they lied at another time. There's no reason to think that Stalin was lying here to Dimitrov and Manuilsky, in his words on Trotsky's telegram, or at any other time unless there is specific evidence that he was. This is, of course, true for anyone, not just for Stalin. There is no such thing as an historical figure "who can be trusted," or one "who can never be trusted."

Finally, no evidence is to be "believed" or "disbelieved" in any case. All evidence must be analyzed carefully, including in context with other evidence.

S.M. Uritsky

Only a tiny proportion of all the investigative materials from the 1930s have been made available to researchers and only a small part of that has been published. Occasionally a privileged researcher is permitted to read and quote from some investigative files to which no one else has been given access. Normally these are researchers who promote the "official" Russian government position, which corresponds to the Khrushchev, Cold War, Gorbachev, and Trotskyist positions that all those convicted in the Moscow Trials, the Military Purges, plus many others, were completely innocent.

Such a researcher is Col. Nikolai S. Cherushev, author of a number of books arguing that no military conspiracies ever existed and, by extension, no other conspiracies could have existed either. Cherushev has been permitted to see and to quote liberally from investigative files of many military men that no one else has seen — or, at least, that no one else has published about.

One of these files is that of Komkor⁵⁴ S.M. Uritsky. In Uritsky's indictment we read the following:

In the extremely exhaustive text of the sentence by the Military Collegium in the case of S.P. Uritsky of August 1, 1938 we read:

- on the order of Gamarnik, Pyatakov, Iakir and Tukhachevsky Uritsky transmitted their letters to Sedov to be passed to Trotsky;
- was connected to the Trotskyist group of Souvarine in Paris, through which he passed espionage materials from Tukhachevsky for French intelligence. (Cherushev 1937, 179)

⁵⁴ Corps Commander, equivalent to a two-star general in the US military. See Iurii Beremeev, Anatomiia Armii. Cited at <<http://army.armor.kiev.ua/index.html>>.

Analysis

We know from other evidence that these men were involved directly with Trotsky. As Gamarnik, Iakir and Tukhachevsky were also involved in military collaboration with Germany it is safe to assume that Uritsky's contact with Trotsky had something to do with at least Germany as well. However, given Cherushev's wording here we can't be sure that Uritsky did confess to direct contact with Trotsky. We can only be certain that the court found him guilty of doing so.

In a short fragment from one of Uritsky's statements to the NKVD he said that he would make a clean breast of everything. So it appears that this high-ranking military officer confessed to sending messages from Gamarnik, Piatakov, Iakir and Tukhachevsky to Trotsky via Sedov.

All Cherushev's works are devoted to the predetermined conclusion that no military conspiracy existed at all. That might explain why he has the access he does to investigative files to which no one else has been admitted: he can be trusted not to question the "canonical" viewpoint. Nevertheless Cherushev cites the following direct quotation from Uritsky's pen. On April 14, 1938 after referring to their "long-standing friendship" — a phrase not further explained — Uritsky wrote to NKVD officer Veniamin

S. Agas:

I have been feeling poorly in recent days, no bladder control, bloody vomiting, unable to think, if possible let me have a day's respite, [then] summon me, I will report to you, and then I will write everything completely. I wish to turn myself into the kind of arrestee who helps the authorities, I wish to earn the mercy of Soviet authority.

As Cherushev notes, this confirms that Uritsky was ill. But it contains no accusation of torture or mistreatment. Far from being a profession of innocence it is, on the contrary, an admission of guilt.

Personal contact with Trotsky or, as here, to claim that one had such personal contact, was highly unusual. The NKVD had no need to fabricate such a detail simply in order to frame an innocent man. On the contrary: it would have made Uritsky's confession stand out from most others, perhaps leading to an interview with a Politburo member or Stalin himself. That would put things out of Ezhov's control, because the arrestee might say that his testimony had been coerced. We know that Politburo members did interview some arrestees. So we can't just assume that Uritsky's confession was coerced. It may well have been genuine, and at this time we have no reason to doubt that it was.

Ezhov's second in command Mikhail Frinovsky identified Agas as one of Ezhov's "bone-breakers," skilled in beating defendants and in fabricating convincing confessions. But this does not mean that all defendants were beaten into false confessions either. It ought to remind us that no individual piece of evidence can by itself be decisive, because every piece of evidence is subject to multiple possible explanations or interpretations. It is only when the whole complex of circumstantial evidence is consistent with one conclusion that that conclusion becomes highly probable.

Ia. A. Iakovlev's Confession of October 1937

Among the documents from former Soviet archives that have been recently published one of the most significant for our purposes is the lengthy interrogation of Ia. A. Iakovlev. Iakovlev had been People's Commissar for Agriculture during the collectivization period of the early 1930s. In 1937 he was a prominent member of the Central Committee. Iakovlev also held a number of other very responsible posts: head of the agricultural section of the C.C., and first assistant to the chairman of the Party Control Commission but in reality its head since Ezhov, its formal head, was spending full time as Commissar of the NKVD. Since August 11, 1936 Iakovlev had been a member of the secretariat for the first draft of the program of the VKP(b), the Bolshevik Party.

Iakovlev was arrested on October 12, 1937. On October 15-18 he confessed that in 1923 Trotsky had asked him to be a Trotskyist "sleeper" in the Party — to go underground, cease all contact with any Trotskyists, and climb into responsible Party positions.

Trotsky had already at that time posed the question in this context, that he should have his own agents in the Party leadership at the necessary time who could pass information to him and collaborate in his seizure of power. (Lubianka B 388)

A few pages further in his interrogation-confession Iakovlev outlines how he was recruited by German intelligence in 1935 in Berlin. According to Iakovlev a German agent named Shmuke⁵⁵ recruited him into cooperation on two bases. First Shmuke told Iakovlev that he knew from Russian émigrés in Germany that Iakovlev had collaborated with the Russian Tsarist Okhrana, or secret police, towards the end of 1916 in Petrograd. Shmuke used this information to blackmail Iakovlev by threatening to expose his collaboration.

⁵⁵ Presumably "Schmucke" in German.

Once in the Bolshevik Party and after the Revolution a confession of collaboration, even at a vulnerable early age, would destroy one's Party career. Hiding such a connection could be much worse because it suggested that such a person was completely untrustworthy and might still be some kind of clandestine agent or other. A Party member was not supposed to have any secrets — certainly not of any kind of political relevance — from the Party. Moreover, it made one vulnerable to blackmail and so an additional security risk.

Shmuke also claimed to know about Iakovlev's participation in the Trotskyist underground from Trotsky himself. When Iakovlev pretended not to understand the German agent's hints, Shmuke persisted:

At last he told me with special emphasis: "Your main leader L. TROTSKY is acting in full contact and on the basis of mutual benefit with the new Germany." . . . Although they could inform on him to the Soviet authorities at any moment, SHMUKE said that they did not wish to do that because they were hoping to establish the same kind of contacts with me as they had with TROTSKY. . . . Faced with this fact, and realizing that the Germans were fully informed about me, I decided to agree with SHMUKE'S proposal, all the more since SHMUKE'S information about TROTSKY'S connections with Germany completely corresponded with what PIATAKOV had said to me and what TROTSKY had written. . . . Considering the matter more thoroughly, I decided that if possible I would sell my collaboration to the Germans more dearly, first of all to obtain from German intelligence corresponding possibilities for foreign connections for our organization and, in the first place, with TROTSKY, and also to increase my importance in the eyes of the German government. (Lubianka B 394-5)

Assessing Iakovlev's Confession: Stalin's Annotations

The following document in this volume is a copy of Stalin's handwritten questions.

- 1) Did he know about Vareikis' service with the Tsarist secret police (okhranke)?
- 2) His opinion about Mikhailov from Voronezh and his participation in the c.-r. org. [counter-revolutionary organization — GF].
- 3) His contact with Trotsky (did he see him personally in 1935 or in 1934).
- 4) How did he want to use MOPR? Whom in MOPR did he make use of? [MOPR = Mezhdunarodne Obshchestvo Pomoshchi Revoitsioneram, International Organization for Aid to Revolutionaries, the Soviets' organization to give help to revolutionaries in fascist countries where communist parties were illegal and subject to severe repression. — GF]
- 5) "Turn" Iakovlev's wife: he is a conspirator and she must tell us everything. Ask her about Stasova, Kirsanova,⁵⁶ and other friends — acquaintances of hers. (Lubianka B 396)⁵⁷

⁵⁶ The "Stasova" referred to must be Elena Stasova. One of the earliest Bolsheviks, having joined in 1898, the same year as Stalin, she had long been working in the Comintern. Also an Old Bolshevik and participant in the Revolution of 1917 K.I. Kirsanova, wife of famous Old Bolshevik Emelian Iaroslavskii, worked with Stasova and others in the Comintern. She published books on women under socialism. In the following photograph of 1936 Kirsanova is second from left, Stasova third from left: <http://tinyurl.com/kirsanova-stasova>. Autobiographical sketches of both are included in Zhenshchiny russkoi revoliutsii ("Women of the Russian Revolution," Moscow: Politizdat, 1982) along with materials about Inessa Armand, Lenin's wife Krupskaiia, Lenin's sisters, and others. Kirsanova died in 1947 as a lecturer in the Central Committee school (http://ru.wikipedia.org/wiki/https://ru.wikipedia.org/wiki/Ярославский,_Емельян_Михайлович). Stasova continued to hold another high Comintern position until the Comintern's dissolution in 1943. She died in 1966 (https://ru.wikipedia.org/wiki/Стасова,_Елена_Дмитриевна).

⁵⁷ Now also at the "Memorial" site at
<<http://www.alexanderyakovlev.org/fond/issues-doc/61209>>.

Stalin's handwritten comments on this confession show that he believed this confession of Iakovlev's was true and suggested further lines of investigation following from it. No reasonable reading of the evidence would suggest that Stalin had Iakovlev framed and then carried on a charade by annotating the confession and asking for Iakovlev's wife, also a Party member, to be brought in for questioning about his activities.

Stalin's remarks on Iakovlev's interrogation-confession, quoted above, are dated "no later than October 20, 1937" (Lubianka B No. 227 p. 396). Iakovlev's wife Elena Kirillovna Sokolovskaia was arrested on October 12, 1937. On October 17 she was interrogated and confessed to knowledge of her husband's Trotskyist activities (Lubianka B No. 229 pp. 398-9). But she was to face far more serious charges. By April 1938 at least one of her coworkers in Mosfilm had named her as the leader of a clandestine Trotskyist group in that organization (Lubianka B No. 323 p. 529). Sokolovskaia was convicted and shot on August 30, 1938.

Both Stasova and Kirsanova, both prominent Old Bolsheviks, must have been investigated. On November 11 1937 Stalin privately told Dimitrov:

We shall probably arrest Stasova, too. Turned out she's scum.
Kirsanova is very closely involved with Yakovlev. She's scum."
(Dimitrov 69)

On November 16 1937 Dimitrov noted "Resolution on the dismissals of Kirsanova and Stasova." In Stasova's case this meant dismissal from her post as Vice-Chairman of the Executive Committee of MOPR and Chair of the Central Committee of the Soviet MOPR.

Yet neither Stasova nor Kirsanova was arrested, much less repressed. This can only mean that Stalin's serious suspicions against them were not borne out by investigation. The investigation into their cases must have been an objective one, rather than a frameup or one that simply aimed to invent "evidence" to sustain Stalin's suspicions. And that not only suggests that the investigations of at least some prominent Bolsheviks were carried out in a proper manner. It means that whatever his suspicions Stalin wanted to know the truth.

The lists of those who met with Stalin in his office from the early 1930s until his death have been published. We now know that Iakovlev met in Stalin's office with members of Stalin's groups of supporters in the Politburo on the evening of October 11, 1937.⁵⁸ Thereafter he disappears from the political record. According to one source Iakovlev was arrested the next day, October 12.⁵⁹ According to the header of the interrogation transcript, dated October 15-18, 1937 Iakovlev had already made a statement of confession on October 14.

Iakovlev had been very close to Stalin. Together with Stalin and two others⁶⁰ Iakovlev was one of the principal authors of the new 1936 Constitution. He had worked closely with Stalin on this, Stalin's pet project. This meant that Iakovlev was one of the very highest members of the Soviet government and Bolshevik Party outside the ranks of the Politburo itself.

Stalin and his supporters wanted contested elections to the Soviet government. The Party First Secretaries opposed contested elections. Iurii

Zhukov has followed the struggle over this issue through the archival evidence. This struggle for contested elections was finally lost during the October 1937 Central Committee Plenum.⁶¹

⁵⁸ "Posetiteli kremlevskogo kabineta I.V. Stalin," Istoricheskii Arkhiv 4 (1995), 66-67. A facsimile of the archival document itself may be viewed online at <<https://msuweb.montclair.edu/~furr/research/stalinvisitors101137.pdf>>.

⁵⁹ "Iakovlev (Epshtein) Iakov Arkad'evich. Biograficheskii Ukazatel." Hrono.ru. At <http://www.hrono.ru/biograf/yakovlev_ya.html>. The CC Plenum Decree on the removal of Iakovlev and others from CC membership (Lubianka B, No. 262) is dated December 4-8 by the editors.

⁶⁰ A.I. Stetsky and B.M. Tal'.

⁶¹ For a discussion of Stalin's struggle in favor of contested elections (as stipulated in the 1936 Constitution), Stalin's final defeat, and many specific references to the research of Iurii Zhukov and others, see Grover Furr, "Stalin and the Struggle for Democratic Reform," Parts One and Two, in Cultural Logic 2005, <https://ojs.library.ubc.ca/index.php/clogic/article/view/191861/188830> and <https://ojs.library.ubc.ca/index.php/clogic/article/view/191862/188831>.

Assessing Iakovlev's Confession: The 1938 Moscow Trial

In the note to Iakovlev's confession Stalin suggested that I. M. Vareikis had also been involved with the Tsarist secret police. Like Iakovlev (born 1896), Vareikis (born 1894) was a young man during the First World War. He had been arrested on October 10, just two days before Iakovlev. Perhaps it was Vareikis who named Iakovlev. Iakovlev did name Vareikis in his own confession.

Both Vareikis and Iakovlev were named as active underground Trotskyists by defendants in the March 1938 Moscow Trial. Defendant Grin'ko testified about Iakovlev's active role in the conspiracy. He evidently regarded

Iakovlev as one of the leaders of the "terrorist" activity and suggested Iakovlev was in touch with Trotsky.⁶²

In the event of success the organization intended to set up a bourgeois Ukrainian state after the type of the fascist state.

About this character of the organization I told a prominent member of the Right and Trotskyite conspiracy, Yakovlev. In the Right and Trotskyite circles with whom I had occasion to speak, this tendency to transform our organization into a fascist type of organization undoubtedly existed. (1938 Trial 71)

By "fascist" — earlier in his testimony he had called it "national-fascist"—Grin'ko meant that the Ukrainian Nationalist organizations outside the Soviet Union had become organized in a fascist manner and under either German or Polish nationalist leadership. The fascist nature of Ukrainian nationalism during the interwar period has long been recognized.⁶³

⁶² According to a "Memorial Society" source Grin'ko and the Iakovlevs were neighbors in the apartment building at number 3 Romanov pereulok (= lane) in Moscow. Piatakov too had lived next door to the Iakovlevs. See <<http://mos.memo.ru/shot-52.htm>>.

⁶³ See Alexander J. Motyl. The Turn To The Right: The Ideological Origins And Development Of Ukrainian Nationalism, 1919-1929. Boulder, CO / New York: East European Quarterly / Columbia University Press, 1980; John A. Armstrong. Ukrainian Nationalism. New York: Columbia University Press, 1963.

GRINKO: Gradually extending my connections with the Right and Trotskyite centre, and having ascertained who belonged to it, I at the beginning of 1934 formed an opinion of what the "Right and Trotskyite centre" was.

From a number of conversations and connections, and the tasks I received from Rykov, Bukharin, Gamarnik, Rosengoltz, Yakovlev, Antipov, Rudzutak, Yagoda, Vareikis, and a number of other persons, it became clear to me that at that time the "Right and Trotskyite center" based itself mainly on the military aid of aggressors. (76)

...

VYSHINSKY: Tell us about the terrorist activities.

GRINKO: At that period terrorist activities were one of the main weapons in the common arsenal of struggle against the Soviet power.

VYSHINSKY: From whom did you learn this?

GRINKO: From Rykov, Yakovlev, Gamarnik and Pyatakov.

...

VYSHINSKY: Where did this terrorist link emanate from?

GRINKO: From Trotsky. I learned this from Gamarnik. (77)

...

In carrying out the sabotage measures and sabotage instructions in the financing of agriculture, no little assistance was rendered by Rudzutak, who was in charge of financial affairs in the Council of People's Commissars, and by Yakovlev. (80)

There would seem to be little point in "coordinating" confessions at the public March 1938 trial with a confession — Iakovlev's — that was secret and never intended to be published at all. Iakovlev's and Grin'ko's confessions corroborate each other.

Interrogations of Nikolai I. Vavilov

We have further evidence concerning Iakovlev from the investigative materials of Nikolai I. Vavilov, a prominent Soviet biologist who was arrested, tried and imprisoned in 1940 for his clandestine participation in an anti-Soviet conspiracy in the early 1930s. Best known for his feud with Trofim Lysenko and as a champion of Mendelian genetics Vavilov's reputation as a scientist was high in his own day and has increased since. It was long assumed that his arrest and conviction was really a screen for repressing his scientific view. According to archival evidence released since the end of the USSR this appears not to have been the case.

Like Iakovlev, Vavilov has long since been "rehabilitated." However, that does not mean that he was not guilty or that his confessions have been refuted. In them he implicated Iakovlev.

Question: You have been arrested as an active participant of an antisoviet organization and as an agent of foreign intelligence services. Do you admit your guilt to these charges?

Answer: I admit myself guilty in that since 1930 I have been a member of an antisoviet organization of Rightists that existed in the system of the People's Commissariat of Agriculture of the USSR. I do not confess myself guilty of espionage.

Question: Bear in mind that you will not succeed in keeping your espionage activity hidden and that the investigation will interrogate you about it, but for now confess with whom you have been connected in the antisoviet work.

Answer: In antisoviet work I have been connected with the following persons: Yakovlev, former People's Commissar for Agriculture, Chernov, former People's Commissar for Agriculture, Eikhe, former People's Commissar for Agriculture, Muralov, former vice-Commissar for Agriculture, Gaister, former vice-Commissar for Agriculture. . . . (Transcript of the interrogation of the arrestee Nikolai Ivanovich Vavilov of August 24 1940; Vavilov 269-70)

Vavilov made a differentiated confession. Accused of having spied for foreign intelligence services, he refused to admit it. But he did admit participating in a Rightist anti-Soviet organization within the People's Commissariat of Agriculture throughout the tenures of five commissars. The fact that Vavilov confessed to one capital charge while refusing to confess to another makes his confession appear more reliable. The most likely explanation for such a confession is the desire to tell the truth.

The commissars he names as Rightist conspirators include Iakovlev and Eikhe. Eikhe too was executed for massive illegal executions and repressions in collaboration with Ezhov.

Question: You have admitted your guilt in that from 1930 you have been a participant in an antisoviet organization of Rightists that has existed in the system of the People's Commissariat of Agriculture of the USSR.

Tell us by whom and under what circumstances you were recruited into the aforesaid organization.

Answer: I was recruited to the antisoviet organization by the former People's Commissar for Agriculture of the USSR YAKOVLEV Yakov Arkad'evich in 1930. The process of recruitment took place through my receiving, directly from YAKOVLEV, and also from him via GAISTER Aron Izreailovich — former vice-president of the agricultural academy and WOLF Moisei Mikhailovich — second vice-president of the agricultural academic — obvious orders for sabotage, which I carried out in the agricultural academy and in the Institute of Plant Development.⁶⁴

Question: It is not clear why YAKOVLEV recruited you to the antisoviet organization. What was his basis for doing this?

Answer: During the process of my carrying out YAKOVLEV's directives he became aware of my antisoviet sentiments which, at the beginning, were most clearly expressed in the high evaluation that I gave to American and Western European agricultural methods and my emphasizing their superiority in comparison with the development of agriculture in the Soviet Union. (Vavilov 271-2)

Unquestionably it was also the fact that I carried out every assignment given me by YAKOVLEV that facilitated my being drawn into the antisoviet organization.

Question: And in what form was your conversation with YAKOVLEV concerning your participation in the antisoviet organization of Rightists?

Answer: There was no direct conversation about this. I understood him by the obvious assignments of sabotage that I received from YAKOVLEV.

Question: Why do you conclude that it was precisely YAKOVLEV who recruited you to the antisoviet organization of Rightists?

Answer: I conclude that because it was precisely from this period — my carrying out YAKOVLEV's directives, that my obvious work of sabotage begins in the organization of science and in that of plant culture in the sense of justifying plant culture projects.

Question: You have confessed that you were recruited to the antisoviet organization of Rightists by YAKOVLEV and at the same time declare that you never had any direct conversation with YAKOVLEV about this organization. You are either confusing or simply do not wish to say that even before your introduction into the organization of Rightists — you were one of the ideologues and leaders of the antisoviet organization about which you are now remaining silent.
(Vavilov 273-4)

⁶⁴ Vavilov has long since been "rehabilitated" and this Institute, still in existence in Russia, is named in his honor.

In these passages Vavilov claims that he collaborated in Iakovlev's Rightist organization without having been specifically recruited to it. This confuses his interrogator, who does not understand how Iakovlev could have been a member without having been specifically recruited to it and also how he could state that he had been recruited (zaverbovan) by Iakovlev and yet never have spoken with Iakovlev about the organization.

The interrogator draws the obvious conclusion from this apparently contradictory assertion by Vavilov that the accused must be hiding something. Something is missing that if added would make sense of Vavilov's contradictory story. Vavilov gives fuller details in the following passage, stating that he and Iakovlev had a mutual understanding, and that Iakovlev spoke to him in hints and allusions rather than speaking directly of conspiracies and organizations.

Question: You confessed earlier that YAKOVLEV recruited you into the antisoviet organization, that, supposedly, he never had any direct conversations with you about this. We demand that you make your confession more precise.

Answer: I confirm the fact that I was recruited into the antisoviet organization of Rightists by YAKOVLEV Yakov Arkad'evich. However, YAKOVLEV never explicitly said that I should take part in an antisoviet organization, and there was no special need for him to do so, since YAKOVLEV knew my antisoviet views, about which I confessed in previous interrogations, and could confidently rely on me to carry out antisoviet work. In addition I enjoyed YAKOVLEV'S particular trust, and he himself told me many times:

"We know you well — we trust you, and for that reason I demand you carry out my directives without objection." To my frequent declarations about my desire to leave my leading administrative work in the Agricultural Academy YAKOVLEV answered: "We will not let you go, we need you, we understand each other." (Vavilov 278-84)

However, in the following passage Vavilov does give specific details about the sabotage of certain agricultural undertakings he was ordered to accomplish by Iakovlev.

Answer: One of the basic undertakings of sabotage carried out with my direct participation upon YAKOVLEV'S orders was the creation of a great superfluity of narrowly specialized scientific-research institutes that were of absolutely no vital importance, . . .

The next sabotage action of significance that was carried out with my direct participation upon YAKOVLEV'S order and whose consequences may still be felt today was the collapse of the provincial [oblast'] network of experimental pasture-farming stations, the assignment of which under conditions of socialist reconstruction and the wide variation of climate conditions and soils in our country is of great importance, . . .

Besides that I directly participated in the development of deliberately harmful plans of plant culture during the First and Second Five-Year Plans. I carried out this sabotage work according to the direct order of the former People's Commissar for Agriculture YAKOVLEV Y.A. and the former vice-presidents of the agricultural academy VOL'F M.M., GAISETER A. I. . . .

Despite this I was given a directive by YAKOVLEV, through VOL'F, of expanding the compulsory plan of area to be sown in 1937 of 150 million hectares, which, it was clear, did not correspond to the possibilities at that time. . . . (Vavilov 284-88)

Analysis of Vavilov's Confessions

These confessions of Vavilov's, at least insofar as they implicate Iakovlev, appear completely credible. There is no reason that the NKVD investigators would have wanted Vavilov to fabricate testimony against Iakovlev, who by that time had long since been executed. By 1940, when Vavilov was interrogated, Ezhov and his men too had long since been arrested, tried, and executed for fabricating false cases against a very large number of people, and Beria was now in charge of the NKVD. During Beria's tenure the cases against large numbers of people falsely accused under Ezhov were reviewed, and many of them released.

Here, as virtually everywhere in history, there is no absolute proof. But the evidence suggests that Iakovlev was not lying. Furthermore, Iakovlev's testimony is broadly consistent with the confessions of many of the Moscow Trials defendants, of the Tukhachevsky Affair defendants, and the evidence we have cited above.

According to the volume we have been citing Vavilov's interrogators claimed in a report that they had carried out 240 interrogations of Vavilov that occupied 1000 hours. Vavilov himself claimed in his own letter to Beria (NKVD head at the time) dated April 25 1942 that he had been subjected to 400 interrogations that took 1700 hours! Such time-consuming and therefore expensive investigations bespeak a genuine attempt to find out the truth. No such titanic efforts are required either to fabricate an entirely false set of confessions or to compel a middle-aged academic to fabricate them himself. Moreover, when it was all completed and Vavilov had been convicted NKVD chief Lavrentii Beria acceded to Vavilov's request for clemency. The scientist was in the process of being moved to the East ahead of the German military advance when he died on January 26 1943.

Confession of Iakovlev's Wife

In 2004 a short excerpt from just one of the interrogation-confessions of Sokolovskaia, Iakovlev's wife, was published. This corresponds exactly to the time Iakovlev himself was under interrogation.

In his own confession Iakovlev said that he had collaborated with Ian Gamarnik, head of the Political Department of the Red Army who had committed suicide on May 30, 1937 when questioned about the Tukhachevsky conspiracy. Iakovlev named his wife as a friend of Gamarnik's family. She worked in the film studio "Mosfilm." According to a report to Stalin from Ezhov of April 30 1938 Sokolovskaia headed a Trotskyist organization at her workplace that obtained weapons for a planned uprising.⁶⁵

⁶⁵ Lubianka 2 No. 323 pp. 529-30. Now online
<<http://www.alexanderyakovlev.org/fond/issues-doc/61342>>.

Evidently in an attempt to save her own life she said that she knew that her husband had been doing underground Trotskyist work within the Party since 1923. She said specifically:

During the past five years Iakovlev has been undertaking active participation in the underground anti-Soviet organization that stood on Trotskyist positions. He was in an especially secret (zakonspirirovannom) situation, dissembling in order to strengthen himself in Party work at attempting to be promoted to the leadership of the Party. (Lubianka 2 398-9)

Stalin's note complains that the interrogator did not ask the right questions of Sokolovskaia:

On the first page is a handwritten annotation: "Com. Ezhov: Which Mikhailov? They didn't even ask his name and patronymic . . . what fine investigators! What's important is not Iakovlev's and Sokolovskaia's past activity but their sabotage and espionage work during the past year and the recent months of 1937. We also need to know why both of these scoundrels were going abroad almost every year. J. Stalin." (Lubianka B 399 n.)⁶⁶

⁶⁶ Now at <<http://www.alexanderyakovlev.org/fond/issues-doc/61211>>. Stalin's remarks alone are in Vol. 18 of the new edition of Stalin's works; online at <http://grachev62.narod.ru/stalin/t18/t18_065.htm>.

Here as in the case of Iakovlev's interrogation — as in every single case we now have, in fact — Stalin has annotated the interrogation in such a way as to rule out any possibility that he had ordered it fabricated or faked. He appears to have been attempting to learn from the interrogation how deep the conspiracy ran. This is evidence that the interrogation was genuine. As such, it is also evidence that Iakovlev's interrogation was not faked, and therefore that Iakovlev's confession about Shmuke and Trotsky's contacts with the Nazis is also true.

What concerned Stalin was not the history of Iakovlev's disloyalty but recent matters. "The past year and the recent months of 1937" had seen the Tukhachevsky conspiracy of top military leaders spying for Germany, plus allegations of widespread conspiratorial activity on the side of Germany and Japan. This too is consistent with Stalin's believing that Iakovlev's conspiracy with Germany was genuine.

Iakovlev's "Rehabilitation"

Aside from the confession we cite here none of the investigative or court materials from Iakovlev's file have ever been made public. We do have the report (zapiska, or "memorandum," shorter and/or less formal than a full report) recommending Iakovlev be posthumously "rehabilitated" dated December 27, 1956 and signed by Roman Rudenko, General Procuror (Prosecutor) of the USSR.⁶⁷ It declares Iakovlev innocent but without giving any evidence whatsoever that he was, in fact, innocent. It is similar to many other such published "rehabilitation" reports from the Khrushchev and Gorbachev eras. Elsewhere we have studied a number of these seemingly fraudulent "reports." According to the "rehabilitation" memorandum Iakovlev had been named by "more than 100" other defendants. All their testimony is dismissed on the grounds that these men have previously been "rehabilitated." Once they were declared "innocent" their testimony against others was simply written off as false. This is one sign of their fraudulent nature.⁶⁸

⁶⁷ RKEB 2 (2003) No. 30, pp. 215-216; note 41 on p. 808.

⁶⁸ Furr, Antistalinskaia Podlost' (Moscow: Algoritm 2007), Chapter 10, 148-175.

The memorandum also declares that NKVD man "Kazakevich", who had taken part in the investigation of Iakovlev, had said — evidently in 1956 — that "methods of physical pressure" were used against Iakovlev. His testimony is not available. Even his name is not certain. No name and patronymic are given. An NKVD man named Kozakevich is one of two investigators who signed the confession of Iakovlev that we have examined.

"Methods of physical pressure" can mean almost anything, from real torture — beatings, for example — to the "third degree," prolonged sleeplessness, and so on. But Iakovlev confessed within a couple of days of his arrest, so there was no time for any prolonged pressure. Moreover, the fact that a suspect was subjected to some kind of "physical pressure" is not evidence of that suspect's innocence.

Ezhov could not have known in advance whether Stalin would choose to interview Iakovlev. Iakovlev had been so close to Stalin, most recently in working on the new constitution, that it's probable that Stalin would have interviewed him himself. We don't know whether he actually did so because the Russian government has not released the whole investigative case. If Stalin did insist on seeing Iakovlev, and Iakovlev had been forced to falsely incriminate himself, the danger that he would inform on Ezhov to Stalin would have been far too great. For this reason it is very doubtful that Ezhov would have dared to fabricate a false case against someone as close to Stalin as Iakovlev was. As we've noted above, Stalin's comments on the interrogations of Iakovlev and his wife are not consistent with any theory that Stalin was involved in "framing" Iakovlev for some reason.

We have no evidence that Iakovlev was tortured, beaten, etc. Even if we had evidence that some kind of real torture had been used against Iakovlev, it would not mean he was innocent. We'll discuss this issue below. Nor would it explain why Iakovlev confessed at trial. We know he did so because Rudenko's "zapiska" says he did — the full transcript of his trial has not been declassified.

Tukhachevsky and The Military Leaders

The rest of the evidence we present concerning Trotsky's collaboration with Germany and/or Japan comes from the investigative materials connected with the so-called "Tukhachevsky Affair." On June 11, 1937 Marshal Mikhail Tukhachevsky, one of only five marshals of the Red Army, and seven other very high-ranking military commanders were tried and convicted of collaboration with Trotsky, other oppositionists, Germany and/or Japan to bring about the overthrow of the Stalin government, the assassination of its leading members, the facilitation of war between the USSR and its major enemies Germany, Japan, and Poland, seizure of power, reversion to capitalism and an alliance with the Axis countries.

Budennyi's Letter to Voroshilov

One of the judges at the special military court was Marshal Semion Budennyi. On June 26, 1937 Budennyi sent a letter to Commissar for Defense Kliment Voroshilov in which he outlined his impressions of the trial and what it meant.⁶⁹

This letter has been dishonestly quoted by several Russian writers — dishonestly, because entirely out of context, as will be seen. For example, among the lines that have been quoted is this sentence:

PRIMAKOV⁷⁰ very stubbornly denied that he led a terrorist group consisting of SHMIDT, KUZ'MICHEV and others, against com. VOROSHILOV.

⁶⁹ We — Furr and Bobrov — are preparing to publish an edition of this important letter.

⁷⁰ Vitalii Primakov was one of the eight officers tried and executed in June 1937 in the "Tukhachevsky Affair."

What has always been omitted are the following passages which follow immediately after the sentence above:

He denied this on the basis that, he said, TROTSKY had entrusted him, PRIMAKOV, with a more serious task — to organize an armed uprising in Leningrad, for which purpose he, PRIMAKOV, was obliged to remain strictly secret from all terrorist groups, to break his ties with all Trotskyists and Rights and at the same time to win for himself authority and the absolute trust of the Party and the Army command.

PRIMAKOV did not, however, deny that he had indeed earlier led a terrorist group and for that purpose had recommended SHMIDT to the post of commander of the mechanized corps.

In connection with this special assignment of TROTSKY'S, PRIMAKOV worked on the 25th Cavalry Division with the divisional commander ZYBIN. According to him ZYBIN was assigned to meet TROTSKY at the border once the rebels had taken over Leningrad.

By omitting these paragraphs a passage in which Primakov confessed to a somewhat different role in the same conspiracy is made to appear to be a claim of innocence that implies Primakov was "framed." This is the same technique that we have seen employed by Shelepin in misquoting Iakir's letter to the 22nd Party Congress in 1962.

As another passage in Budennyi's letter reveals Tukhachevsky had testified that the German Luftwaffe was prepared to come to the aid of the opposition uprising in Leningrad.

Tukhachevsky received an instruction from General RUMSHTET⁷¹ that the plan for sabotaging the Red Army should take into account the most likely directions of the main blows of the German armies: one against the Ukraine — L'vov, Kiev — and the others, the seizure of Leningrad by the rebels, something that would be very beneficial to Germany as it could render help to the rebels with its rather significant air force, which ought to advertise itself as forces coming over to the rebels from the side of the Soviet forces.

⁷¹ Obviously General Gerd von Rundstedt, later a Field Marshal. See <<http://de.wikipedia.org/wiki/Rundstedt>>.

We know from another archival document, Marshal Voroshilov's address to the "Aktiv" (officers directly attached) of the Commissariat of Defense on June 9, 1937, that this information stems from Putna's confession.⁷² It concerns what he was told by German General Erhard Milch, one of the highest ranking commanders of the German Luftwaffe.⁷³ Reading from an undated confession by Putna Voroshilov stated the following:

[German Air Force General] Milch directly states — I ask you to say this to Karakhan, also a spy since 1927 who carried out the negotiations on behalf of these swine — Milch directly states: "If you can capture Leningrad, the Leningrad oblast', you can count on serious help from our side and, mainly, on help from our airforce, under the guise of forces that have gone over to you from the legal government. We will give you our air forces in significant quantities with our own crews.

And, declared Milch, we will be able to render you all this help in the Leningrad area because this area has a border with Finland with which we, he said, have excellent relations.

⁷² Some years ago we obtained a partial transcript of this address of Voroshilov's from a fellow researcher in Moscow. It is now published: Voennyi sovet pri Narodnom Komissare Oborony SSSR. 1-4 iyunia 1937 g. Dokumenty i Materialy. Moscow: ROSSPEN, 2008, pp. 367-423. Voroshilov's quotation from an as yet unpublished confession by Putna concerning General Milch is on pp. 384-5 of this published edition.

⁷³ See the article on Milch at <http://de.wikipedia.org/wiki/Erhard_Milch>.

This ties Primakov's testimony about Trotsky's role in planning an uprising in Leningrad together with the projected German role in the same uprising. A number of other defendants, both military and civilian, confessed to discussions with German generals including von Runstedt and Milch.

In a segment from an interrogation of May 21, 1937 Primakov said:

. . . The bloc of Trotskyists and Rights and the organization of the common traitorous anti-Soviet military conspiracy led to the union of all the counterrevolutionary forces within the (Workers' and Peasants') Red Army . . . This anti-Soviet political bloc and military conspiracy, personally headed by the base fascist Trotsky, . . . (Kantor, Voina 374)

(It appears that Primakov calls Trotsky a "fascist" here because, according to Primakov, Trotsky had conspired with fascist Germany against the USSR.)

Budennyi also reported that the military figures were not planning to take leadership from Trotsky or the Rights indefinitely.

. . . KORK confessed that he was aware that the leaders of the military-fascist counterrevolutionary organization regarded their ties to Trotsky and the Rights as a temporary situation. TUKHACHEVSKY had spoken to KORK to the effect that the Trotskyists, Rights et al. were only temporary fellow-travelers, and when the armed coup had been effected he, TUKHACHEVSKY would play the role of Bonaparte. And on November 29, 1934, according to KORK's confession, TUKHACHEVSKY, in Kork's apartment, had stated this unequivocally to all those present.

Colonel Viktor Alksnis and The Transcript of the Tukhachevsky Trial

The transcript of the June 11, 1937 trial of Tukhachevsky and the seven other commanders has never been made public. Its text is still so top-secret in Russia that no researcher, no matter how trusted, is allowed to read it today. But in 1990, shortly before the end of the USSR General Viktor Alksnis, military leader, member of the Duma (Soviet Parliament), and grandson of one of the judges at this 1937 military trial, was given permission by the KGB (successor to the MVD — NKVD) to read the transcript.

Perhaps the KGB thought Alksnis would be sympathetic to the story that the military men had been framed. After all his own grandfather, Komandarm 2nd rank (= Lieutenant General) Iakov I. Alksnis had been arrested in November 1937 and then tried and executed as a conspirator in July 1938, only months after he had served as one of the judges in the military panel that judged Tukhachevsky and the rest.

Instead Alksnis, interviewed in a Russian nationalist journal in 2000 and again by researcher Vladimir L. Bobrov shortly afterwards said he was convinced by the transcript that some conspiracy had in fact taken place. From the interview in the journal Elementy in 2000:

My grandfather and Tukhachevsky were friends. And grandfather was on the judicial panel that judged both Tukhachevsky and Eideman. My interest in this case became even stronger after the well-known publications of [former] procuror Viktorov, who wrote that Iakov Alksnis was very active at the trial, harassed the accused. . . .

But in the trial transcript everything was just the opposite. Grandfather only asked two or three questions during the entire trial. But the strangest thing is the behavior of the accused. Newspaper accounts [of the Gorbachev-era — GF] claim that all the defendants denied their guilt completely. But according to the transcript they fully admitted their guilt. I realize that an admission of guilt itself can be the result of torture. But in the transcript it was something else entirely: a huge amount of detail, long dialogues, accusations of one another, a mass of precision. It's simply impossible to stage-manage something like this. . . . I know nothing about the nature of the conspiracy. But of the fact that there really did exist a conspiracy within the Red Army and that Tukhachevsky participated in it I am completely convinced today.

...

It appears as though back there, in the 1930s, there stands some type of "cannon" that might be fired at us, at our times. And then everything could turn out completely differently. And in the meantime . . . in the meantime a certain conception of those events has been created, and everything is done to sustain that conception. (Alksnis)

From a followup interview of Col. Alksnis by Vladimir L. Bobrov:

Alksnis: . . . I turned the pages of the transcript and had more questions than answers. I came away with the impression that, obviously, there had really been a conspiracy. . . . But this is what struck me: in the transcript there are parts which attest to the sincerity of what the defendants said (no matter who claims that the trial was an organized show, that they worked on the defendants specially so that they would give the necessary confessions.)

Imagine this. Let's say, Tukhachevsky is telling about a meeting with the German military attaché in a dacha near Moscow . . . and at that moment Primakov interrupts him and says "Mikhail Nikolaevich, you are mistaken. This meeting did not take place in your office at the dacha, but was on the veranda." I think that it would have been impossible to "direct" things such that Tukhachevsky said precisely that and that Primakov would then make a correction like that.

Bobrov: Very well. But was there anything there that made you think that the trial had been scripted and directed anyway?

Alksnis: No, it would have been impossible to script and direct a trial such as is in the transcript.

Bobrov: That is, you wish to state that, having read the transcript, you did not find in it any traces of any kind of staging?

Alksnis: Yes, yes. On top of that all of them confessed, and when they all admitted guilt in their last words, stating that they had been participants in the conspiracy and knowing that after that execution awaited them, it is just impossible to imagine that they forced them all to make such admissions and declarations.

...

Bobrov: What was the main point of accusation of the "conspirators"?

Alksnis: Everything was there: espionage, preparation for a military coup, sabotage [wrecking]. . . .

Bobrov: And what does "espionage" mean? You were talking about the meeting at the dacha. . . .

Alksnis: Yes, yes, with the German military attaché. They were talking about arranging coordination with the German military, contacts were going on with them. . . .

Bobrov: One last question. In your interview with "Elementy" you talked about some kind of "cannon" that might shoot at our own times from back in the 30s.

What did you have in mind?

Alksnis: If an objective research project on the events of those years were to be done, free of ideological dogmas, then a great deal could change in our attitude towards those years and towards the personalities of that epoch. And so it would be a "bomb" that would cause some problems. . . . (Bobrov)

Assessing This Evidence

It is not surprising that the transcript of the Tukhachevsky trial is top-secret once again. As far as we can determine no one has been permitted to read it since Alksnis. But we do have the Budennyi letter. It is by far the most direct evidence of the testimony given at the trial that we have. Alksnis' two accounts confirm the accuracy of Budennyi's account of the trial. For example, Alksnis confirms that the defendants confessed to all the charges and in some detail, something that Budennyi's letter also states.

It would be hard to overestimate the significance of Budennyi's testimony. It is simply not credible that eight battle-hardened military men could have been forced to falsely confess at trial to such devastating charges, in such detail, and in the manner in which they did. Nor is there any evidence that they were forced to falsely confess in the first place, even before the trial.

Like the trial transcript itself the letter remains top-secret. We located it in a little-known and disorganized archive and are preparing it for publication. For Budennyi as for Col. Alksnis there is no question at all of the guilt of the generals, all of whom confessed it and gave details. This is also the case of the published commentary by General Belov, another of the judges. Belov's letter to Voroshilov was published in 1996, presumably because he makes very few substantive remarks about the specific charges. But Belov was also convinced of the generals' guilt (Belov). We do not examine it here because Belov says nothing specifically about Trotsky and the Germans or Japanese.

Significance of the Tukhachevsky Trial Evidence

The Budennyi letter to Voroshilov and Col. Alksnis' account of his reading the transcript of the "Tukhachevsky Affair" trial together constitute one of the most important discoveries in the historiography of the Soviet Union. Thanks to them we now know as certainly as we will ever know that the military defendants in this trial were, in fact, guilty of what they confessed to.

This in itself completely dismantles the canonical interpretation of Soviet history. For example, it means that the testimony at the Third Moscow "show" trial, the March 1938 "Bukharin-Rykov" trial, was truthful insofar as it confirms the testimony given by Tukhachevsky and the other military men. It also confirms testimony about Trotsky's German and Japanese collaboration that was given by those defendants at the Second Moscow Trial of January 1937, the "Piatakov-Rykov" trial, since that is also confirmed by the Tukhachevsky trial testimony.

If we had no other evidence at all to this effect the testimony of the military figures would be very strong. And of course we do have much other evidence. All of it is consistent with what we now know of the Tukhachevsky trial testimony. For our present purposes this is the strongest possible evidence that Trotsky was indeed conspiring with the Nazi government and German military.

Dreitser

The NKVD investigators of the 1930s referred to the interlocking conspiracy cases as the "klubok," or "tangle." This metaphor referred to the fact that the various separate conspiracies were intertwined with each other, at least on the leadership level. It also serves to illustrate how the NKVD "unravelling" them. Once one minor conspiracy was discovered it led by persistent investigation to others.

Efim Dreitser, a defendant at the first Moscow Trial of 1936 and a person who claimed to be in personal contact with Trotsky, named Putna at the 1936 Trial as a Trotskyist conspirator who also had direct links to Trotsky (Dreitser had been chief of Trotsky's bodyguard during the 1920s). This was evidently just one of a number of bits of evidence that led to Putna's arrest, just as Kamenev's naming Radek, Sokol'nikov, Bukharin and others provided "threads" that led to second and third trials. Dreitser's investigation file confirms his confessions at trial and close ties to Putna and Iakir, another of the later Tukhachevsky Trial defendants. A close member of Dreitser's family and his only surviving relative has confirmed that her great-uncle Efim was indeed close to high-ranking Red Army men, including Putna, well-known as a Trotskyist, named by defendants in all three Moscow Trials, tried and executed as one of the eight military leaders in the Tukhachevsky Affair.⁷⁴

⁷⁴ Personal communication from Svetlana M. Chervonnaya, daughter of Dreitser's niece. Ms Chervonnaya, an Americanist and skilled researcher on Cold-War history and Dreitser's only surviving relative, has been permitted to study Dreitser's investigative file.

Dmitry Shmidt, a military commander who was also arrested and questioned in 1936, testified to Putna's close and conspiratorial connection with Trotsky.

In 1927 when I joined the Trotskyists I learned from DREITSER, OKHOTNIKOV and PUTNA that PUTNA was one of the members of the military center of the Trotskyist organization and was carrying out important organizational work in the Red Army. He was responsible for that work to Trotsky personally. In 1927 or 1928 PUTNA was assigned by the Revolutionary Military Council to be military attaché to Japan. At that time I had a meeting with PUTNA before his departure. He told me Trotsky used to come to his apartment to give him a whole series of instructions and tasks in connection with his going abroad.⁷⁵

⁷⁵ "N.6. Z protokolu dopity D.A. Shmidta vid 31 serpnia 1936 r.," in Sergiy Kokin, Oleksandr Pshennikov, "Bez stroku davnosti," Z Arkhiviv VUChK-GPU-NKVD-KGB No. 1-2 (4/5), 1997 (In Ukrainian).

So the NKVD had other evidence, perhaps a lot of it, about Putna's activities. Concerning Shmidt's testimony specifically, it's difficult to imagine what foreign instructions, other than conspiratorial ones, Trotsky might have been giving Putna in 1927, since Trotsky had long since (January 1925) resigned from his military posts.

Kantor's Four Articles⁷⁶

In 2005 Iulia Kantor, a Russian graduate student in history and journalist, published a series of articles and a book ⁷⁷ on Marshal Tukhachevsky.

Kantor does not investigate whether Tukhachevsky was guilty or not but, like Cherushev, takes it for granted that Tukhachevsky was the innocent victim of a frameup by Stalin. It's probably no coincidence, therefore, that like Cherushev Kantor was granted access to some documentary materials others have not been permitted to see including, in Kantor's case, some of the Tukhachevsky investigative materials. Additionally she claims that she was given permission by Tukhachevsky's family to see his investigative file — something that is strictly limited in Russian to next-of-kin and normally forbidden to all others, researchers included.

⁷⁶ Kantor's four articles were published in Istoriia Gosudarstva i Prava (2006). This legal journal is very hard to obtain outside of Russia. It is intermittently available at a Russian legal website at http://law-news.ru/up/u11/post_1130954400.html. The text at this site is not often available, and is completely unformatted. For the convenience of readers able to use Russian I have reformatted and republished the text of all four articles
<https://msuweb.montclair.edu/~furrgr/research/kantor_4articles_igp06.pdf>

⁷⁷ Kantor, Iulia. Voina i mir Mikhaila Tukhachevskogo. Moscow: Izdatel'skii Dom Ogoniok "Vremia," 2005.

Kantor used these materials in her doctoral dissertation as well as her books and some articles. Anyone who studies only the texts of the primary sources that Kantor quotes without regard to her tendentious commentary will realize that these sources strongly support Tukhachevsky's guilt. Some of these quotations involve Tukhachevsky's allegations concerning Trotsky.

No complete interrogations of Vitovt Putna have been published. Only excerpts from them have been published; we will briefly examine them below. But according to what we have of Tukhachevsky's testimony Putna was in direct contact with Trotsky and passed on to Tukhachevsky the information that he, Trotsky, had direct contacts with the German government and General Staff. This is consistent with what we've seen of Radek's testimony both before and during the January 1937 trial.

Tukhachevsky claimed to have been in direct contact by letter with Sedov through Putna.

I inform the investigation that in 1935 Putna brought me a note from Sedov in which it said that Trotsky considers it very desirable that I establish closer ties with the Trotskyist commander cadres. Through Putna I orally answered with my agreement, and burned the note from Sedov. (Kantor 2006, 5; Kantor, Voina 378)

Tukhachevsky also said that in 1932 he received a "directive" from Trotsky to form a conspiratorial military organization, something he had been preparing to do in any case.

Long before the creation of the antisoviet military-Trotskyist plot I grouped around myself, over the course of a number of years, men who were hostile to Soviet authority, dissatisfied with their positions as commanders, and conspired with them against the leadership of the Party and government. Therefore, when in 1932 I received a directive from Trotsky about the creation of an antisoviet organization in the army I already virtually had devoted cadres ready on whom I could rely in this work. (Kantor 2006, 5; Kantor, Voina 378-9)

According to Tukhachevsky Putna had direct contact with Trotsky concerning the latter's ties to the German government and General Staff and passed on news of this orally to Tukhachevsky.

Putna told me orally that Trotsky had set up direct contact with the German fascist government and General Staff. (Kantor 2006, 5; Kantor, Voina 378-9)

Tukhachevsky said that Vladimir Romm had told him that Trotsky was relying on Hitler's help in his struggle against Soviet power. We know from Romm's testimony at the 1937 Trial, which we have reviewed above, that Romm claimed to have been in direct contact with Trotsky.

Romm told me that Trotsky is expecting Hitler to come to power and that he is counting on Hitler's aid in Trotsky's battle against Soviet authority. (Kantor 2006, 7; Kantor, Voina 381)

Tukhachevsky reiterated that he had indeed had contact with Trotsky, and also that he himself had collaborated with German intelligence, though in the following passage he does not explicitly say that Trotsky had told him of his own German or Japanese connections.

The transcript of the interrogation of the accused Tukhachevsky of June 9, 1937: I fully confirm my confessions given during the preliminary investigation concerning my leading participation in the military-Trotskyist plot, my ties to the Germans, my past participation in antisoviet groupings. I admit my guilt in that I transmitted to German intelligence secret information and facts concerning the defense of the USSR. I also confirm my ties with Trotsky and Dombal'. (Kantor 2006, 15; Kantor, Voina 406-7)

Assessing the Evidence: Kantor

Kantor received the permission of the Tukhachevsky family and the Russian government to gain access to some of the investigative materials for her long biography of Tukhachevsky. Though she does not admit as much it seems that she was not permitted to read everything. Specifically it appears that she was not allowed to read the transcript of the trial of Tukhachevsky and the rest. If she had read it and yet completely omitted its contents from her articles and book Kantor would be guilty not just of being guided by her own preconceived ideas, but of gross deception. She is guilty of deceiving her readers in any case, since she never tells us what she was permitted to see and what was kept from her.

Kantor takes the official position that the Marshal and all the other military figures were innocent victims of a frameup. Therefore she would surely have been given any evidence that this was so. But she is unable to cite any. This is very significant, since it suggests that no such evidence exists.

She also ignores some of the evidence that they were guilty — notably, some already well-known to researchers because it is in the Shvernik Report, which has been published (see below). The quotations from the Tukhachevsky investigation file published in Kantor's 2005 book are also contained in her four academic articles.

The passages Kantor quotes strongly support all the other evidence we have cited. We have only quoted the passages from Kantor's work that directly inculcate Trotsky with Germany. The reliability of their testimony concerning Trotsky's collaboration with the Germans is predicated upon the truthfulness of the rest of their testimony — that is, upon their guilt. Kantor is committed to asserting the innocence of all these men rather than to investigating whether they were guilty or not. But the evidence she quotes, as opposed to her tendentious commentary on it, gives strong evidence of their guilt. This is also strong evidence that they told the truth about their collaboration with Trotsky and his with Germany.

Tukhachevsky's Confessions

In 1994 the texts of two of Tukhachevsky's confessions were published in Russia. In them Tukhachevsky repeats that Romm told him Trotsky was relying on Hitler. As we saw above Romm confessed to having been a courier between Trotsky and conspirators within the USSR.⁷⁸

. . . Romm also passed on that it was Trotsky's hope that Hitler would come to power and would support him, Trotsky, in his struggle against Soviet power.

– Main 159; Molodaia Gvardiia (henceforth MG) 9 (1994), 133.
(Evidently the same passage as above)

⁷⁸ These confessions of Tukhachevsky's have been translated and published in Steven J. Main, "The Arrest and 'Testimony' of Marshal of the Soviet Union M.N. Tukhachevsky (May-June 1937)," Journal of Slavic Military Studies 10, No. 1 (March 1997), 151-195. All the passages dealing with Trotsky were published in Molodaia Gvardiia issues 9 or 10 of 1994. We have used Main's English text for the convenience of readers and made silent corrections in a few places where we disagreed with Main's translation, which we have compared with the originals.

Tukhachevsky repeats that he had told Kork (another of the eight defendants) that he had had contact with Trotsky and the Rights.

I told Kork that I had links both with Trotsky and the Rightists and tasked him to recruit new members in the Moscow military district. . . . (Main 160; MG 9, 134)

According to Tukhachevsky Putna, another of the eight defendants and as we have already seen a long-standing supporter of Trotsky's, admitted to him in 1933 that he was in touch with Trotsky as well as with Smirnov, a Trotskyist within the USSR. Putna later received an appointment as military attaché (in 1934, as attaché to Great Britain) and so was assigned to be the contact person between Trotsky and the other conspirators.

Upon Putna's and Gorbachev's return from the Far East — I believe this was in 1933 — I spoke with each of them separately. Putna quickly admitted that he was already in contact with Trotsky and with Smirnov. I suggested to him to join the ranks of the military-Trotskyite conspiracy, telling him that I had direct links with Trotsky. Putna immediately agreed [to join]. Later, following his appointment as military attaché, he was tasked to maintain the link between Trotsky and the center of the anti-Soviet military-Trotskyite conspiracy. (Main 160; MG 9, 134)

Tukhachevsky said that in 1933 or 1934 Romm had instructions from Trotsky that the "German fascists" would help the Trotskyists, and so the military conspirators should help both the German and the Japanese General Staffs in sabotage, diversions, and assassinations against members of the Soviet government. Tukhachevsky said he passed "Trotsky's instructions" to the conspiratorial leadership, implying that he himself accepted them.

Round about this time, 1933/1934, Romm visited me in Moscow and told me that he had to pass on Trotsky's new instructions. Trotsky pointed out that it was no longer feasible to restrict our activities to simply recruiting and organizing cadres, that it was necessary to adopt a more active program, that German Fascism would render the Trotskyists assistance in their struggle with Stalin's leadership and that therefore the military conspiracy must supply the German General Staff with intelligence data, as well as working hand in glove with the Japanese General Staff, carrying out disruptive activities in the army, prepare diversions and terrorist acts against members of the government. These instructions of Trotsky I communicated to the center of our conspiracy. (Main 160-161; MG 9, 134)

In another part of this published confession Tukhachevsky asserts that he got other instructions from Trotsky via Piatakov, rather than through Romm, Putna, or directly to himself.

During the winter of 1935/1936, Pyatakov told me that Trotsky had now asked us to ensure the [future] defeat of the USSR in war, even if this meant giving the Ukraine to the Germans and the Primor'ye to the Japanese. In order to prepare the USSR's defeat, all forces, both within the USSR and outside the USSR would have to be made ready; in particular, Pyatakov stated that Trotsky would carry out a decisive struggle to plant his people in the Comintern. Pyatakov stated that such conditions would mean the restoration of capitalism in the country.

As we received Trotsky's instructions on unleashing a campaign of sabotage activity, espionage, diversionary and terrorist activity, the center of the conspiracy, which included not only me, but also Feld'man, Eideman, Kamenev, Primakov, Uborevich, Iakir and those closely associated with it, Gamarnik and Kork, issued various instructions to the members of the conspiracy, based on Trotsky's directives. (Main 163; MG 10, 257)

Tukhachevsky claims that he also received direct written instructions via Putna from Sedov, who of course was passing on Trotsky's instructions. Putna assured him that Trotsky had established direct ties to the German government and General Staff.

In the autumn of 1935, Putna came to my office and handed over a note from Sedov, in Trotsky's name, insisting that I more energetically attract Trotskyite cadres to the military conspiracy and more actively use them. I told Putna to say that this would be done. In addition, Putna told me that Trotsky had established direct links with Hitler's government and the General Staff, and that the center of the anti-Soviet military Trotskyite conspiracy should task itself to prepare defeats on those fronts where the German Army would operate.

During the winter of 1935/1936, as I have already mentioned, I had a talk with Pyatakov, during which the latter passed on another directive from Trotsky [to the effect] to ensure the unconditional defeat of the USSR in war with Hitler and Japan, as well as the break-up of the Ukraine and the Primor'ye from the USSR. These instructions meant that it was necessary to establish ties with the Germans in order to define where they intended to deploy their armies and where necessary to prepare the defeats of the Soviet armies. (Main 166; MG 10, 261)

This passage in Tukhachevsky's published confession confirms what Budennyi reported to Voroshilov in his letter of June 26, 1937. Evidently Tukhachevsky restated this at the trial and inserted a comment that von Rundstedt must have known this information through Trotsky.

At the end of January 1936, I had to travel to London to attend the funeral of the British King. During the funeral procession, first by foot and then on the train, General Rundstedt — the head of the German government's military delegation — spoke to me. It was obvious that the German General Staff had already been informed by Trotsky. Rundstedt openly told me that the German General Staff was aware that I stood at the head of a military conspiracy in the Red Army and that he, Rundstedt, had been instructed to begin talks about mutually interesting matters. (Main 166; MG 10, 261)

A few pages later Tukhachevsky puts Trotsky's and Rundstedt's instructions together.

Taking into account Trotsky's directive to prepare for defeat on that front where the Germans would attack, as well as General Rundstedt's instruction to prepare for defeat on the Ukrainian front, I proposed to Iakir to make the German task easier by diversionary-sabotage tactics leading to the fall of the Letichev fortified region, the commandant of which was a member of the conspiracy, Sablin. (Main 185; MG 10, 264)

Assessing the Evidence: Tukhachevsky's Confessions

Only a few of Tukhachevsky's confessions have been made public. We are fortunate to have any of them at all. They were published in the early 1990s when the promise of glasnost ("openness") was still in the air. In 2006 one confession of Nikolai Ezhov's was published. Ezhov confirmed the existence of several groups of military conspirators including that around Tukhachevsky. Ezhov also named some, at least, of the German military figures with whom they and he himself were jointly in touch.⁷⁹ To that extent Ezhov's and Tukhachevsky's confessions mutually confirm each other. Frinovsky strongly confirmed the guilt of the Rightists, including Bukharin, some of whom, like Grin'ko, claimed direct conspiratorial contact with Trotsky while others, like Bukharin, claimed indirect knowledge of Trotsky's dealings with the Germans through Radek.

⁷⁹ Available online at

<<https://msuweb.montclair.edu/~furrgr/research/ezhovru.html>>; also now at <<http://www.alexanderyakovlev.org/fond/issues-doc/58654>>.

Other Documents of the "Tukhachevsky Affair": The "Shvernik Report"

As we have stated above, during the 22nd Party Congress in October 1961 Nikita Khrushchev and his supporters in the Soviet leadership leveled an even stronger attack against Stalin than Khrushchev's 1956 "Secret Speech" had been. After the Congress Stalin's body was removed from Lenin's tomb and a new wave of materials attacking Stalin and those closely associated with him was published. This anti-Stalin campaign — for so it may be called — ended shortly after Khrushchev was removed from office at the Central Committee meeting of October 1964 by Leonid Brezhnev and others.

In early 1962 the Presidium (formerly the Politburo, in effect Khrushchev himself) authorized a blue-ribbon commission to investigate the trials and executions of the 1930s and especially the so-called Tukhachevsky Affair.⁸⁰ This commission seems to have had total access to all the investigative and other materials concerning the repressions of the 1930s. Its purpose seems to have been to find further information for attacks on Stalin and his supporters, and justificatory materials for further "rehabilitations." In fact, it provided little exculpatory evidence but quite a bit of further evidence that the accused were guilty!

⁸⁰ There had been an earlier commission, called the "Molotov Commission."

The report was issued in two parts. The Zapiska (memorandum) devoted mainly to the Military Purges and Tukhachevsky Affair, was issued in 1963. A further part, the Spravka (= information, report) is dated 1964. Neither seems to have been used by Khrushchev or given to Soviet writers to promote Khrushchev's "line."

The Shvernik Reports were both published after the end of the USSR in a mysterious journal, Voennyi Arkhivy Rossii, dated 1993, that never had another issue. But since that time the Reports have been published several more times and it is readily available. It's fair to say that these reports constitute the largest single published collection of excerpts and quotations from investigative materials of the 1930s repressions.

We cite here all the passages from the Shvernik Commission reports that bear directly on the specific topic of this article: Trotsky's purported collaboration with Germany and Japan. There are a great many other passages, both in these reports and elsewhere in the available investigative materials, that bear on Trotsky's involvement in the general opposition conspiracies, for example to assassinate Stalin and others. Since these allegations are not the subject of our present study we will ignore them here. From the "Zapiska"⁸¹

On March 25 1936 Yagoda informed Stalin that Trotsky was giving directives through agents of the Gestapo to Trotskyists inside the USSR about carrying out terrorist activity, and that even in prisons Trotskyists were trying to create militant terrorist groups and that the leader of the Trotskyists in the USSR was I.N. Smirnov. (Zapiska 557)

...

The sentence of the court states that Tukhachevsky and the other defendants, "being leaders of an antisoviet military-fascist organization, have violated their military duty (oath), have betrayed their country, have established ties with military circles in Germany and with enemy of the people L. Trotsky and according to their directives have prepared the defeat of the Red Army in the event of an attack on the USSR by foreign aggressors, specifically, of fascist Germany, and with the goal of destroying the defensive capability of the USSR have engaged in espionage and sabotage in the units of the Red Army and in enterprises of military significance, and also have been preparing terrorist acts against the leaders of the AUCP(b) and the Soviet government." (605)

⁸¹ This long report has not been translated. We take it from RKEB 2 541-670. It is available for download at http://perpetrator2004.narod.ru/documents/Great_Terror/Shvernik_Report.rar. The Spravka alone is also available online at the Russian language Wikisource resource in nine parts at <http://tinyurl.com/spravka>.

From the "Spravka":

Already at the interrogation of May 14, 1937 Primakov named his "co-conspirators" and stated about Iakir:

"The Trotskyist organization considered that Iakir was most suitable for the post of People's Commissar [for Defense] instead of Voroshilov. . . . We considered that Iakir was the strictest example of a conspiratorial Trotskyist and admitted that he — Iakir — was personally connected with Trotsky and that it was possible that he was carrying out completely secret, independent tasks unknown to ourselves." . . . (Spravka 676)

Continuing the "processing" of Primakov, the organs of the NKVD on May 21 1937 were able to obtain from him "hand-written confessions" that Tukhachevsky, who was connected to Trotsky, was at the head of the conspiracy. In addition in this interrogation Primakov named 40 prominent military workers as members of the military-Trotskyist conspiracy in the army. On May 16 1937 Ezhov sent this interrogation transcript to Stalin, Molotov, Voroshilov, and Kaganovich. In the accompanying letter Ezhov wrote:

"I am sending you the transcript of the interrogation of Putna V.K. of May 15 of this year. Putna confesses that in 1935 he personally gave a letter from Trotsky to Tukhachevsky with a direct invitation to take part in the Trotskyist conspiracy. After familiarizing himself with this letter Tukhachevsky assigned Putna to transmit the message that Trotsky could rely upon him. Putna names as members of the military antisoviet Trotskyist organization Primakov, Kuz'michev, Shmidt, Lapin — all of whom have been arrested; Zenek, the former commander of the Leningrad military school of tank technique, Klochko, former military attaché of the USSR to Turkey; Gorodzensky, former commander of economic supply of the Prmor'ye group, Kornel', former worker of the Foreign Department of the OGPU [basically, a predecessor to the NKVD] and Adamovich, former chairman of the Council of People's Commissars of the Belorussian SSR [i.e. head of the government of the Belorussian republic]." (677)

In the indictment it is asserted that in April — May 1937 the organs of the NKVD discovered and liquidated in the city of Moscow a military-Trotskyist conspiracy, in the "center" of leadership of which were Gamarnik, Tukhachevsky, Iakir, Uborevich, Kork, Eideman and Fel'dman. The military-Trotskyist organization, which all those accused in this case were members, was formed in 1932-1933 upon the direct instructions of the German general staff and of Trotsky. It was connected with the Trotskyist center and the Bukharin-Rykov group of Rightists, was involved in sabotage, diversions, terror and was preparing the overthrow of the government and the seizure of power with the aim of restoring capitalism in the USSR. (688)

Iakir's address at the court trial in connection with the plots of the organizers, set the line for the other defendants also to expose the machinations of Trotsky and of the fascist governments against the USSR, and in addition emphasized the role of Tukhachevsky in the conspiracy in every way. (690) Tukhachevsky was also forced to confirm . . . in court: "When in 1932 Romm brought me Trotsky's proposal to gather the Trotskyist cadres, I agreed to do this. Therefore I consider the beginning of the organization of our military conspiracy to have been 1932." (695)

Putna testified about Tukhachevsky's ties with Sedov and Trotsky. Specifically, he declared during the investigation that, finding himself in London in September 1935 and learning that he was being summoned to Moscow, he reported about this to Sedov, Trotsky's son, in Paris. From Sedov he received by special delivery a package in which were a note from Sedov to Putna and a "letter of recommendation, written and signed personally by Trotsky" for Tukhachevsky. Putna carried out Sedov's task and during the first days of October 1935 supposedly handed Tukhachevsky Trotsky's letter. Tukhachevsky familiarized himself with the letter and asked Putna to "transmit orally that Trotsky could count on him."

During the investigation Tukhachevsky only mentioned Sedov's letter that Putna had supposedly transmitted to him, and never said anything about the letter from Trotsky that Putna testified about. (695)

On May 26, 1937 Tukhachevsky wrote the following statement: ". . . I state that I admit the existence of an antisoviet military-Trotskyist conspiracy and that I was at its head . . . the foundation of the conspiracy relates to the year 1932."

On May 29 1937 Ezhov interrogated Tukhachevsky. As a result of this interrogation there appeared the following confessions by Tukhachevsky:

"Already in 1928 I was brought into the Rightist organization by Enukidze. In 1934 I personally made contact with Bukharin. I established espionage ties with the Germans in 1925, when I used to travel to Germany for study and maneuvers. . . . On my trip to London in 1936 Putna arranged for me a meeting with Sedov. . . . I was connected in this conspiracy with Fel'dman, S.S. Kamenev, Iakir, Eideman, Enukidze, Bukharin, Karakhan, Pyatakov, I.N. Smirnov, Yagoda, Osepian and a number of others." (681-2)

. . . the investigation obtained their [Tukhachevsky's and Putna's] "admissions" of a personal meeting with Sedov, supposedly arranged for Tukhachevsky by Putna in 1936 in a café in Paris. Meanwhile detailed information about Tukhachevsky's stay in Paris from February 10 to 16 1936 came from Ventsov, Soviet military attaché to France, and from the organs of the NKVD, but this information contained nothing about his meeting with Sedov. In the course of the present verification Afanas'ev, a former worker of the Foreign Section of the NKVD, member of the CPSU since 1923, expatiated upon this matter:

"Between 1932 and 1938 I was continuously in illegal work abroad. I headed the illegal resident buro in Paris which mainly worked on the activities of Trotsky's son Sedov and his circle. . . . We were up to date on the most secret conspiratorial activity of Trotsky and Sedov. Therefore when you pose me the question of whether meetings between Sedov and Tukhachevsky, Putna, and other military figures of the Soviet Union could have taken place, I can assert that that could not be true . . . the agent reports and documentary materials we obtained in the process of our work on Trotsky, Sedov, Kleman and in part on the ROVS in Paris do not confirm either directly or indirectly the accusations that were brought against the military figures of the Red Army in connection with the case of Tukhachevsky, Kork, Gamarnik, Putna, and others." (695-696)

The language of the Shvernik Report makes it clear that its authors proceeded on the preconceived assumption that no such conspiracy existed. It was designed to provide "evidence" — likely-looking materials — for citation in further "rehabilitations." Soviet historians and researchers, as we have seen, were not to be permitted access to the archives themselves.

In the case of Tukhachevsky's alleged meeting with Sedov in the Paris café in 1936 the Report cites Ventsov, Soviet military attaché to France, who reported nothing about it. Ventsov-Krants had been very close to Trotsky. According to an archival document cited by Cherushev he had helped Trotsky write the book How The Revolution Armed Itself.⁸² The report also cites an undated "former worker of the Foreign division of the NKVD" named Afanas'ev — no first name or patronymic are given — who claimed that Soviet intelligence in France were closely following information about Sedov and Trotsky and knew nothing about any such meeting or any of the activities mentioned in the Tukhachevsky case.

It's worth making several points here. First, the fact that Ventsov and Afanas'ev were told nothing about such a meeting cannot prove that such a meeting never took place. It only means that they claim they did not know of it. Afanas'ev's claim that Soviet intelligence knew about "the most secret conspiratorial activities of Trotsky and Sedov," and so knew that Sedov could not have met with Tukhachevsky, is empty for another reason. At or shortly after the time of the alleged meeting — late January or early February 1936 — Soviet intelligence man Mark Zborowski became Leon Sedov's closest confidant. We have Zborowski's reports back to Moscow. But Zborowski himself was not privy to all of Sedov's secrets, and did not accompany him everywhere. Zborowski's handwritten notes and reports are in the archives and have been published, while we do not even know Afanas'ev's name. So the claim that Soviet intelligence knew about all Trotsky's and Sedov's "most secret conspiratorial activities" cannot be true.

⁸² N.S. Cherushev. 1937 god. Elita Krasnoi Armii na golgofe. Moscow: Veche, 2003 p. 208.

Rudenko's Letter to Molotov

On April 13, 1956 the Presidium of the Central Committee of the CPSU passed a decree establishing a commission to be chaired by V.M. Molotov to study the materials of the "public trials." ⁸³ The commission proved unsatisfactory to all concerned. It was sharply divided between the three men who had been closest to Stalin and others who were Khrushchev's people. On December 10 1956 it issued a compromise report exonerating Tukhachevsky and the military men but refusing to consider rehabilitating any of the defendants in the public trials. ⁸⁴ Since we know that Molotov continued to be firmly convinced of Tukhachevsky's guilt we can assume this was, indeed, a compromise. In 1957 Molotov, Malenkov and Kaganovich were dismissed from the Presidium for attempting to have Khrushchev removed from office.

The Molotov Commission did study a lot of materials, but only some of their documents have been made public. We will quote below from a report to that commission from Rudenko, the General Prosecutor of the USSR. Rudenko was a staunch supporter of Khrushchev; it was his office that would have to issue recommendations to the Soviet Supreme Court to get convictions reversed, the legal aspect of "rehabilitation." Rudenko's report has not been published. It was obtained by Krasnaia Zvezda ("Red Star"), the military daily newspaper in Russia today as it was during Soviet times. We obtained a copy of it in 2002. Once again, we will only reproduce quotations that deal with the question of Trotsky and Germany/Japan, ignoring other aspects of this important document. Passages of special interest to us are in italics.

Only on May 15, almost ten months after his arrest, after confessions about the military conspiracy had been obtained from Medvedev, were confessions also obtained from Putna about his counterrevolutionary ties with Tukhachevsky. At this interrogation Putna confessed that in September 1935 he received Trotsky's directive concerning the attraction to the Trotskyist organization of high-ranking military men. Trotsky also declared that he was aware that Tukhachevsky and S.S. Kamenev were already carrying out counterrevolutionary work in the army, and that it was essential to contact them. With this Trotsky handed a note for Tukhachevsky, in which he proposed that he unite with the Trotskyist center for mutual counterrevolutionary activity. In October 1935 he handed this note to Tukhachevsky, who accepted this proposal of Trotsky's.

In January 1936 he informed Trotsky of the existence of a Trotskyist military organization and its center consisting of Primakov, Putna and Dreitser, about the connections of this organization and about recruitment.

At his interrogation of June 2 1937 Putna had already confessed that in the spring of 1931 he had established espionage ties with the German G[eneral] S[taff] and at various times gave the Germans, through their generals Nedavmeister⁸⁵ (?), Adam, and Bokkel'berg information about the military staff of the Red army, its organizational structure and location of its forces, about armaments and the system of military readiness. It is not apparent from these interrogations precisely what information Putna transmitted.

Putna declared moreover that in 1936 at the time of his and Tukhachevsky's trip together to England Tukhachevsky compared the relationship of forces and proved to him that the defeat of the USSR in a war with Germany was inevitable. And that he, Putna, agreed with Tukhachevsky and said to him that for the swiftest defeat of Soviet forces it was essential to act together on the side of the Trotskyist organization. However Putna did not confess how Tukhachevsky reacted to this.

Fel'dman also confessed that from Tukhachevsky's words he was aware that he had an agreement with Pyatakov concerning a disruption in the supply of artillery, and also maintained a connection with Trotsky, from whom he was receiving directives concerning counterrevolutionary activity. From his own words Fel'dman learned that Egorov, commander of the VTSIK School was preparing a "palace coup," but Tukhachevsky said that Egorov was an indecisive person and unsuitable for this purpose. In addition this School was being moved out of the Kremlin and therefore a more realistic plan for the seizure of power — as Tukhachevsky averred — was defeat of the Red army in the future war, and an armed uprising.

But at this point Tukhachevsky declared that Putna and Primakov did not trust him politically very much, that during their trips to Moscow Primakov gave the military center information but avoided conversations with Tukhachevsky on this topic. That Primakov and Putna had private ties through their Trotskyist centers and were maintaining contact with Trotsky. Tukhachevsky declared that he personally did not share Trotskyist views and further admitted that in 1936 he had received a note from Sedov in which the latter in Trotsky's name proposed to proceed to join with the Trotskyist cadres in the Red army in order to prepare the seizure of power.

At the beginning of the interrogation Tukhachevsky confessed that he had not met in person with either Trotsky or Sedov after their exile from the Soviet Union. But at the end of the interrogation he declared that in 1932, when he was at the maneuvers in the German army, he had established a personal connection with Trotsky and had reached an agreement about carrying on Trotskyist work in the Red army.

On that same day, May 27 1937, Tukhachevsky signed the transcript of an interrogation in which he admitted to his leading role in the military conspiracy, but these confessions differ significantly from those he had given earlier. In these confessions Tukhachevsky said nothing about personal ties with Trotsky and affirmed that he maintained ties with Trotsky through Romm and Primakov. That it was through them that he received Trotsky's directive that it was essential to go over to terrorist methods of work, about which Tukhachevsky had not confessed earlier.

⁸⁵ This is probably German General Oskar von Niedermayer, who worked for the Reichswehr (German military) in an intelligence capacity in Moscow in the early 1930s, having formally resigned from the military. He was a General again during World War II, was captured after the War by the Soviets, tried and sentenced to 25 years in prison, and died shortly thereafter in 1948.

Iakir:

In 1933 Tukhachevsky, who knew about my waverings on questions of the Party's policy in the village, and about my ties to former Trotskyists, after first feeling me out, informed me that he was connected with Trotsky, according to whose directive he was organizing a military conspiracy and proposed that I take part in it. I gave Tukhachevsky my agreement, after which he said to me that he was at the head of the conspiracy, that there was a military center whose staff he proposed that I join. I agreed to become part of the staff of the center. In this conversation Tukhachevsky informed me that Uborevich, with whom he had recently had a conversation on this subject, was also in the center of the military conspiracy. Tukhachevsky spoke about a directive of Trotsky's that he had recently received and in which the following tasks were placed before the center of the military conspiracy:

1. The organization of a coup in Moscow, in the Ukraine, and in a number of other places in the Soviet Union with the aim of seizing power.
2. In the event that the coup d'état was unsuccessful, to organize the defeat of the Red army in a war with the Polish-German bloc and to organize the theater of military operations and the armies accordingly.
3. To organize sabotage in the RKKA in both material-technical and military preparations.
4. Independently of Trotsky's direct ties with the German General Staff and the fascist government, it was important for the military center to organize these ties independently.

Analysis of Rudenko's Letter

Rudenko summarized details from some interrogations of Putna, Tukhachevsky and Iakir that have not been made public. These passages tie Trotsky to collaboration with Germany in several ways:

- Putna, the leading Trotskyist among the military men, claimed he had been in touch with Trotsky; involved in a Trotskyist military organization, and conspiring with the German General Staff.
- Tukhachevsky confirmed that Primakov and Putna were in touch with Trotsky, as he himself was, and that he and the Trotskyist cadres were working together.
- According to Iakir, Tukhachevsky had said that the military conspiracy was being organized in coordination with Trotsky and "according to his directive."
- Iakir confirmed that the military conspirators were to work for the defeat of the Red Army in a war with Germany and Poland.
- Iakir said that Trotsky had direct ties with the German General Staff.

This material suggests that there is yet more evidence in the investigation materials of the Tukhachevsky group of Trotsky's contacts with Germany.

Voroshilov's Talk at the Commissariat of Defense

From the same source we have obtained a copy of the transcript (stenogramma) of a talk by Commissar of Defense Voroshilov to the military personnel in the Commissariat (= Ministry) of Defense on June 9, 1937.⁸⁶ Voroshilov read out quotations from interrogations and court documents of the Tukhachevsky Affair.

⁸⁶ We cited a short passage from this document above in connection with the question of General Milch.

Some of those quotations are not given in the transcript, or are given only partially. We will use what we have, and will only cite those quotations that deal directly with Trotsky and his alleged ties to either Germany or Japan or that confirm the information in Rudenko's report.

TRANSCRIPT

OF THE ACTIV OF THE PEOPLE'S COMMISSARIAT OF DEFENSE USSR

June 9 1937

BOTH PUTNA and all the rest of them tell about how they linked their work with the principal scoundrel and main gunman of counterrevolution in our country who was driven out of this country — Trotsky.

Here is what PUTNA says:

" — When I found out (he was saying this to the investigator) that I was being recalled to Moscow in the last days of September 1935 I reported about this to Sedov. (Reads PUTNA's confessions)

They [the investigators — GF] asked him this question: "Was Trotsky's letter handed to Tukhachevsky, when and under what circumstances."

Answer: "Trotsky's letter was handed to Tukhachevsky. (reads).

What Tukhachevsky says about this. They asked him this question: "when did you establish contact with Trotsky and what directives did you receive from him."

Answer: "I established contact with Trotsky through Romm in 1932. The latter brought him a note in 1935 too. Obviously this was not the first note.

"In 1932 . . . (reads). Further he relates what Romm said to him. "Everything that he reported I approved, then I met with him in 1933 and 1934. When in fact the antisoviet work in the army had already been developed by me there took place my second meeting with Romm in Moscow . . ." (reads). That's what Tukhachevsky says about his contacts with Trotsky and about those tasks which the latter set before him.

Here are you see it's not just a question of Trotsky's assigning tasks on his own account, but Trotsky at the same time has instructions also from the German General Staff. I have information that it is not only the German General Staff that has influence on Trotsky, but that the latter was connected to the Japanese General Staff as well, or in any case with its intelligence organs.

Primakov answers the question what tasks were set before him and what he did:

"Trotsky's basic directives . . . were known to me too from the words of Dreitser and Putna, they came down to this, that Trotsky was demanding to reestablish a military organization, to strengthen it in the army as well, making use of the sharpening of the class struggle . . . up to 1933."

. . .

Putna about his spying: "A few days later" (reads) . . . Then while conversations went on: "about the desirability of changing the system, the leadership in the USSR . . ." (reads).

That means that preparatory conversations were going on, and then further:

"Shleikher expressed his unequivocal readiness . . ." (reads). He brought this to Trotsky's attention through this gentleman Sedov and Sedov reports that Trotsky proposes: (reads). (Emphasis added) (Voenniy Sovet 372-373; 384)

The testimony here generally accords with what we have seen previously, no doubt because Voroshilov drew his information from the same interrogations. The "Shleikher" named here is no doubt General Kurt von Schleicher, Chancellor of Germany from June 1932 to January 1933 and previously Minister of Defense.

Colonel L.A. Shnitman

Further evidence about contacts between the military conspirators and Trotsky keeps coming to light. In a 2009 book we read the following:

In September 1937 Ezhov sent Stalin a special communication containing an assessment of the activities of Colonel L.A. Shnitman, military attaché to Czechoslovakia. There was compromising material stating that he was aide to Komandarm 2nd rank A.I. Kork, military attaché to Germany. In January 1937 a group of Soviet pilots who had served in Spain had been detained in France, and Shnitman was also blamed for this. During his interrogation he had also told the investigators about his "meetings" upon Tukhachevsky's instructions in Paris with Sedov, Trotsky's son, concerning the transmission of secret information to foreign intelligence services. (Khaustov-Samuel'son 226)

Evaluating This Evidence

As with a great many other statements in this book the authors give no citation, not even an archival source, for this information. What are we to make of this?

Both authors are extremely anticommunist and very hostile to Stalin. They reject out of hand any possibility that any of the Opposition conspiracies actually existed. Their book contains many falsifications, significant omissions, and outright lies, all in an anticommunist direction. There's no reason to think they would ever fabricate a story of a connection between Shnitman and Sedov, or between Sedov and Tukhachevsky. Moreover, Khaustov is associated with the "Memorial" organization. He is one of a few privileged researchers who has access to many archival documents.

We may conclude, therefore, that an interrogation of Shnitman's does exist in which he confesses to contacting Sedov on Tukhachevsky's behalf and discussing with him passing Soviet secrets to foreign countries. Another "Memorial" society source reports that Shnitman was convicted of "espionage [and] participation in a military conspiracy in the Red Army."⁸⁷ This is what we would expect if Shnitman did confess as Khaustov and Samuel'son affirm. Yet another source confirms that Shnitman was aide to the military attaché to Germany in 1926-1929 and again in 1934-35, was military attaché to Finland in 1929-30 and military attaché to Czechoslovakia 1936-1938.⁸⁸

⁸⁷ "Kommunarka. 1938. Avgust." At <<http://www.memo.ru/memory/communarka/Chapt10.htm>>; "Spiski zhertv" <<http://lists.memo.ru/d37/f245.htm#n43>>. These are both "Memorial Society" sources.

⁸⁸ <<http://baza.vgd.ru/1/38052/>>.

The date of Ezhov's memorandum to Stalin as given by Khaustov and Samuel'son, September 1937, is curious. There's good evidence from other sources that Shnitman was arrested on January 14, 1938 and that his trial and execution took place on August 28, 1938. ⁸⁹ One would expect that an interrogation in which Shnitman made such self-incriminating disclosures must have taken place between these two dates rather than prior to Ezhov's September 1937 communication to Stalin. Surely no one who had confessed to such crimes would have been left at large for another four months. That deduction in turn implies that Khaustov and Samuel'son saw not just Ezhov's note to Stalin but at least part of Shnitman's investigative file.

⁸⁹ O.F. Suvenirov. Tragediia RKKA 1937-1938. Institut Voennoi Istorii Ministerstva Oborony Rossiiskoi Federatsii. Moscow: "Terra," 1998, p. 441, No. 262.

The "foreign intelligence service" Sedov and, through Shnitman, Tukhachevsky were spying for is not named. But it must have been Germany. Tukhachevsky had ties with the German General Staff about which he confessed at length, as we have seen, while Shnitman had had some connection to Germany but not to any other of the great European powers.

In a book of more than 400 pages the authors devote only this single paragraph to Shnitman's case. Indeed, there is no particular reason they should have inserted this paragraph at all. The implication is that there may be more — perhaps much more — evidence of contact between Trotsky or Sedov and Germany or Japan, to say nothing of Trotsky's contacts with Soviet oppositionists.

Other Evidence From The Soviet Archives of Trotsky's Collaboration

To this point we've confined our attention to documents from the former Soviet archives containing evidence of "first-hand" contact between Trotsky and Germany or Japan. The persons whose accounts we have examined claim that they knew of Trotsky's contact with Germany or Japan either from Trotsky himself or from German or Japanese diplomats.

Although the dividing line between first- and second-hand evidence is a clear one, the evidentiary value of second-hand evidence is not necessarily less. For example we now have Nikolai Bukharin's first confession of June 2, 1937, a document still top-secret in Russia today but that turned up in an archive that was sent West sometime in the mid-1990s. We have examined this confession in detail in another study to which we refer the interested reader.

It is significant because Bukharin confirms what we have already learned from Radek's testimony, since Bukharin's knowledge of Trotsky's collaboration with Germany came only through Radek. Radek had implicated Bukharin in pretrial statements and then again at the public January 1937 Moscow trial. Bukharin had denied what Radek said over and over again, but on June 2 1937 he reversed himself and confessed.

Why did Bukharin decide to confess? It appears that one reason may have been that Bukharin had learned of Tukhachevsky's arrest, and figured "the jig was up."⁹⁰ In his final statement at the March 1938 Moscow Trial Bukharin said that "of course, the evidence" played a determining role. That must mean evidence recently obtained and shown to him, which would no doubt include the evidence of the military conspirators. If Bukharin's testimony contradicted Radek's we would be forced to conclude that on the evidence one or both were wrong. Since Bukharin's statement confirms Radek's, their statements mutually corroborate, or strengthen each other.

⁹⁰ See Grover Furr and Vladimir Bobrov, "Nikolai Bukharin's 's First Statement of Confession in the Lubyanka." Cultural Logic 2007, 17 and nn. 32 and 33. Bibliographic information of the Russian original of this article is given there.

Yagoda's Confessions 1937

There exists a good deal more such "second-hand evidence" of Trotsky's collaboration with the Germans and Japanese in recently published Soviet archival documents.

Genrikh S. Yagoda was Commissar of the NKVD (= Minister of Internal Affairs), which included the political police, from 1934 till he was dismissed in September 1936. He was arrested in early March, 1937. Subsequently he was one of the leading defendants in the third Moscow trial of March 1938.

In 1997 a number of materials from Genrikh Yagoda's investigative file were published in a very small edition of 200 copies in the provincial city of Kazan' by some researchers employed by the FSB, successor to the KGB. Since that time some of the documents published in this collection have been published elsewhere, evidently from copies held in different archives. In these interrogation transcripts Yagoda makes startling confessions. These confessions include details of his collaboration with German intelligence.

Avel' Enukidze was a high-ranking Party official and member of the Soviet government who had been arrested earlier. Only two interrogations of Enukidze's have been published: one in a collection of Yagoda materials in 1997, another in the second of the "Lubianka-Stalin" volumes in 2004. In neither does Enukidze speak much about Trotsky. In the volume of materials devoted to Yagoda, however, we find the following remark about Enukidze, Trotsky and the Germans. We have italicized passages of special interest to our investigation.

In the first place, in 1935 the prospects of a war by a strengthened Germany against the Soviet Union were growing with each day. In that connection it was necessary to move ahead swiftly and make an agreement with them. Enukidze told me that Trotsky abroad had established full contact with German governmental circles, and that Enukidze himself also had a line of contact with the Germans.
(Genrikh Yagoda 193)

According to Yagoda, Enukidze both knew of Trotsky's "full-scale contact" with "German governmental circles," and told him that he, Enukidze, had his own such contacts.

Yagoda also testified about Lev Karakhan's ties to Trotsky and the Germans.

But I am aware that in the orientation to and conspiracies with German governmental circles both the Trotskyists and Zinovievists, on the one side, and the Rights, on the other side, had their own separate lines [of contact].

Question: How did they differ and where do you know this from?

Answer: Karakhan spoke to me about this in one of our talks with him in 1935. The essence of these two lines in orientation to and contact with the Germans consists in the following: the Trotskyist-Zinovievist part of our center was carrying out negotiations with German governmental circles through Trotsky, who was in emigration, isolated from the Soviet Union, ignorant of the internal processes of the country and ready to give away everything just in order to overthrow Soviet power and return to Russia as soon as possible.

We, the Rights, had a different attitude. We were not supporters of a new partition of Russia, as Trotsky was doing. . . .

Karakhan's connection with the Germans had existed for a long time. And the center of the Rights used this line of contact, already established, as a real line, and offered to Karakhan to enter into official negotiations with the German governmental circles. I have already confessed that Karakhan was in Berlin after this and met there with Nadolny and Hess (or Goebbels) and, as he said to me, had already in 1936 achieved significant concessions from the Germans.

Question: What concessions?

Answer: Concessions of the servile conditions on the basis of which the agreement with Trotsky had been achieved. (Genrikh Yagoda 194-195)

Karakhan apparently claimed to have had his own ties to the Germans through Nadolny (presumably Rudolf Nadolny, German diplomat) and either Hess or Goebbels. Others of the Rights testified at the March 1938 Trial that Karakhan and Yagoda were very critical of Trotsky's dealings with the Germans, believing that Trotsky was cut off from the realities of life in the USSR and was yielding far too much to the Germans just in hopes of returning to power.

Assessing the Evidence: Yagoda's Confessions

Scholars with "impeccable" anticommunist credentials have cited these documents unproblematically. For example, Marc Jansen and Nikita Petrov cite this work as a primary source, without claiming that the interrogations in it were, or even might have been, faked, obtained by compulsion, etc.⁹¹ One of the documents has also been published in a semiofficial collection of documents from the Soviet archives, a fact that further attests to their genuine nature.⁹² We may therefore conclude that the documents really do come from the Yagoda investigative file and are generally conceded to be genuine.

⁹¹ E.g. Jansen & Petrov 220 n.23, 224 n. 110, 226 n. 9, 228 n.40. Petrov is a senior researcher with the highly anticommunist organization "Memorial"; Jansen is a major anticommunist researcher of the Soviet 1930s.

⁹² The documents published as Nos. 40 and 41 in Genrikh Yagoda 108-136 were also published as document No. 59, pp. 135-145 in the official collection Lubianka. Stalin i glavnoe upravlenie gosbezopasnosti NKVD 1937-1938 (Moscow: "Materik," 2004).

These documents merit a detailed analysis in and of themselves. Their contents intersect with many other materials now available such as confession statements by other individuals arrested in connection with the investigations concerning espionage and conspiracy, and the transcript of the Third Moscow trial.

At the end of each of Yagoda's confessions printed in this 1997 volume is a disclaimer, variously worded. At the end of interrogation two, Yagoda's first confession, which took place on April 26, 1937 (pp. 109-137) we read:

Information about the conspirator-employees of the NKVD is falsified. Other aforementioned statement by Yagoda are not credible.

For more information about the repression of Chekists in the middle 1930s see Palchinsky A.A. "Represii v organakh NKVD v seredine 30-kh godov," in Political persecution in Russia: Historical and contemporary. St.Petersburg: 1997, pp. 284-294.

At the end of the second confession, of May 4, 1937 (pp. 137-143):

Information about the conspirator-employees of the NKVD is falsified.

At the end of the third (May 13, 1937, pp. 144-167):

All information in the transcript concerning acts of terror and conspiracies are falsified.

V.M. Primakov and the other military men were fully rehabilitated in 1957. Izvestiia TsK KPSS No. 4 (1989), 42-73. A.I. Rykov, N.I. Bukharin and others were rehabilitated in 1988. Izvestiia TsK KPSS No. 5 (1989), 69-92.

B.I. Nikolaevsky (1887-1966), in 1903-1906 a Bolshevik, then a Menshevik, political émigré. Nikolaevsky refuted the reports that he received any packets from Rykov. Sotsialisticheskii Vestnik No. 5 (1938), 12. For more detail on P.P. Ol'berg and Shemelev see V.Z. Rogovin, 1937. Moscow, 1966.

At the end of the fourth (May 19, 1937, pp. 167-184):

All information about conspiracies and acts of terror is falsified. The case of the murder of S.M. Kirov remains open to this day. A.E. Enukidze and the other persons named in the transcript were rehabilitated in the 1960s-1980s.

The fifth (May 26, 1937, pp. 185-199):

All information in the transcript concerning conspiracy and accusations of "espionage" is falsified. L.M. Karakhan and the other persons named in the transcript have been rehabilitated.

At the end of a two-page statement by Yagoda to Ezhov concerning NKVD worker Mironov (June 4, 1937, pp. 200-202):

The information in the document is not credible.

At the end of the interrogation of December 28, 1937 (pp. 202-218):

The information is not credible. Professor L.G. Levin and other doctors were later rehabilitated because there is no evidence of any crime in their activities.

The end of the "face-to-face confrontation" (ochnaia stavka) between Yagoda and Dr. Levin of January 4, 1938, pp. 218-223:

The information cited in the transcript is not credible.

The end of the confrontation between Yagoda and Dr. Kriuchkov of January 5, 1938, pp. 223-227:

The answers are not credible. P.P. Kriuchkov was later rehabilitated because there is no evidence of any crime in his activities.

The end of the confrontation between Yagoda and Professor D.D. Pletnev of January 5, 1938, pp. 227-230:

The answers are not credible. Professor D.D. Pletnev was later rehabilitated because there is no evidence of any crime in his activities.

The end of the confrontation between Dr. Levin, also of January 5, 1938, pp. 231-233:

The "confessions" of L.G. Levin and P.P. Kriuchkov were later refuted as not credible.

At the end of the interrogation of Yagoda held on January 10, 1938, pp. 235-239:

Yagoda's answers are not credible.

There are similar remarks at the end of the interrogation — confession of Artuzov, of June 15, 1937 (pp. 487-499). We will consider Artuzov's confession below.

The information given by Artuzov is not credible. Later it was all refuted in his rehabilitation.

The same kind of comments are made at the end of other interrogation-confessions which we do not consider here, such as those of Avel' Enukidze and of NKVD men Bulanov, Prokof'ev, Radzivilovskii, and Trilisser.

Assessing These Documents: "Rehabilitations"

The comments cited above are of course not a critical analysis, or any kind of analysis, of the confessions of Yagoda's that the volume reproduces. In fact, the book has no analysis of the assertions made in the interrogation — confessions at all.

Some of the comments allude to "rehabilitations." Most such "rehabilitations" have not been made public, so we can't evaluate them. However, we know a good deal about a number of "rehabilitations" of well-known figures — enough to know that they are political, not historically accurate, documents.

Specifically, we have a good deal of the material on Bukharin's "rehabilitation." We know that it does not prove him innocent in the slightest. On the contrary, in their decree "rehabilitating" Bukharin the Plenum of the Soviet Supreme Court falsified a key document — Frinovsky's confession of April 11, 1939, which was not public in February, 1988 when Bukharin's case came before it, but has been published since. Far from proving Bukharin innocent, Frinovsky's confession in fact shows him to have been guilty. Our essay on this subject is in press at a Russian publisher.

We also have a good deal of information about the "rehabilitation" of Professor D.D. Pletnev. Pletnev features in Yagoda's file and in some of the documents printed here. Unlike the case of Bukharin, most of Pletnev's file still remains secret. But we have enough to know that it did not prove him "innocent" at all.⁹³ Earlier in the present essay we pointed out that the "rehabilitation" document of Zinoviev and his codefendants contains evidence of Zinoviev's guilt rather than his innocence.

⁹³ For a detailed study of Bukharin's and Pletnev's "rehabilitations" proving them to be falsified and, in fact, proving both Bukharin and Pletnev guilty see Grover Furr and Vladimir Bobrov, Bukharin na plakhe ("Bukharin on the block"), forthcoming.

So "rehabilitations" are not proof that the individuals "rehabilitated" were innocent, even though they are presented as though they were. Rather, they are official claims that the individuals "rehabilitated" will be considered to be innocent, and in future will be declared to have been "victims" of "Stalin's crimes." "Rehabilitations" are political acts, not exercises in the reconsideration of evidence. Marc Junge, a German researcher on the repressions of the 1930s and a determined proponent of the "anti-Stalin" paradigm put it this way:

In agreement with von Goudoever it may be definitively established that rehabilitation in the Soviet Union remained an act of political-administrative caprice that was determined above all by political usefulness, not by juridical correctness.⁹⁴

⁹⁴ "In Übereinstimmung zu von Goudoever kann abschließend festgestellt werden, daß Rehabilitierung in der Sowjetunion ein politisch-administrativer Willkürakt blieb, der vor allem von der politischen Zweckmäßigkeit der Maßnahmen bestimmt wurde, nicht aber von der strafrechtlichen Korrektheit." Bucharins Rehabilitierung. Historisches Gedächtnis in der Sowjetunion 1953-1991. Berlin: BasisDruck Vlg, 1999, 266. This is discussed in more detail in Furr and Bobrov 5 ff.

It appears that the "disclaimers" quoted above and attached to the end of every confession-statement in this volume are the same kind of thing. They indirectly inform the reader something like this: "We, the editors of this volume, do not claim that the contents of these confession-statements are true. We assert that they are 'not trustworthy' or 'falsified' but we cannot prove it and, in fact, have no evidence to that effect. If you want evidence, refer to the 'rehabilitations' of the individuals in question — which, in fact, you cannot gain access to."

The editors of the Yagoda volume are employees of the FSB, the successor to the KGB — that is, the Russian intelligence and security service. Not to state that these confessions are "false" or at least "not trustworthy" would be for them to take a position contradictory to what some important Russian (and Soviet) state institutions have taken in the past. It's not the job of the state security service to call some other state institution a liar. Whatever else it may mean this formula allows them to avoid doing so.

We can deduce something more from these brief phrases. We may assume that if there were any other kind of evidence that the statements made in the confessions and interrogations were false, that evidence would be cited. Since no such evidence is cited, in effect these notes constitute a kind of admission that the contents of the confessions cannot be shown to be false.

One could object that here too "lack of evidence is not evidence of the lack" of contradictory evidence. In reality, however, we know from the published volumes of Rehabilitation documents that during Gorbachev's time very thorough searches of the archives were carried out with a view to finding evidence that the condemned Opposition defendants of the 1930s were falsely convicted. In the case of Yagoda, the Moscow Trials defendants, and the "Tukhachevsky Affair" no such evidence was found.

As we have noted, even some Cold-War scholars who reject the validity of the Moscow Trials on principle accept these Yagoda documents at face value and have cited them as genuine without negative comment on the veracity of their contents. Arch Getty has criticized them for using such sources, claiming that, for instance, "everybody knows" that Ezhov's confessions were coerced and falsified by his interrogators (Kritika). That is simply not true. Neither Getty nor anybody else "knows" this. Evidence is not to be "believed" or "disbelieved" — much less rejected or disregarded — but considered in the context of all the other evidence. To say that Yagoda's confession may be false is also to say that they may not be false. That is, absent any information that they were false, there is no more basis for "disbelieving" than for "believing" them. In fact, not even the anticommunist scholars have rejected them as invalid.

If Yagoda's confessions were the only evidence we had of oppositionists conspiring with Germany or Japan, we would still have no grounds to discard them. On the contrary: testimony that such an illegal contact existed is, while certainly not conclusive, far more compelling than any claims to the contrary. This is a principle of investigation so self-evident it is seldom discussed. In the case of a person accused of a crime, one may expect denial in any case: by an innocent person, because he is innocent; while by a guilty person because he wishes to escape the consequences of his crime. Therefore confessions of guilt are of greater interest than professions of innocence.

But Yagoda's confessions are far from the only evidence we have that the opposition was conspiring with Germany and/or Japan. In fact they constitute just one group of a large body of evidence that suggests such conspiracy. As with any confession of guilt, the existence of this testimony is prima facie evidence that the confessions are true. They are confirmed by Yagoda's appeal for clemency published in 1992, which reads as follows:

My guilt before my country is great. It is impossible to redeem it to any extent. It is hard to die. Before the whole people and Party I stand on my knees and beg you to have mercy on me and let me live.⁹⁵

⁹⁵ "Rasskaz o desiati rasstrel'iannykh".

Every one of the ten persons whose confessions were reproduced along with Yagoda's insisted upon his guilt in his appeal. Bukharin wrote that his guilt was so great he "should be shot ten times over." As we have already noted Dr. Natan Lur'e repeated his guilt:

I really did prepare the assassination of Voroshilov upon instruction from Franz Weitz, a Gestapo representative. I wished to accomplish these disgusting murders because I had been poisoned by the poison of Trotskyism during my long stay in Germany.

No single piece of evidence is univocal, pointing towards a single conclusion only. One might perhaps imagine an example of an innocent person who nevertheless was persuaded to confess again and again in pretrial interrogations; to do so again at trial; to protest his innocence of certain capital crimes in vehement terms while at the same time confirming his guilt of other capital crimes; and then confessing his guilt again in his appeal. But we have to draw our historical conclusions not on imagination but evidence. There is no evidence to refute Yagoda's confessions, while they confirm and are consistent with a great deal of evidence we do have.

Conclusion

Based on the nature and amount of the evidence we have we must conclude that Leon Trotsky did indeed collaborate with the Germans and Japanese. The evidence we have cited cannot be accounted for by any processes of fabrication:

- There is far too much of it.
- Much of it was never intended to be made public.
- It comes from different sources.
- It is all mutually corroborative. Evidence about Trotsky's German/Japanese collaboration is part of a complex of evidence about other conspiracies by other persons. Those conspiracies are well supported by evidence too. This corroborates the part of that evidence that inculpates Trotsky.
- Some of the evidence — that of the Tukhachevsky Affair interrogation testimony and trial confessions, and Iakovlev's confession — is so strong that it would be sufficient to establish the fact of Trotsky's collaboration in and of itself, even if we did not have any additional archival or trial evidence.
- There is no evidence counteracting it.

During Khrushchev's time; during Gorbachev's tenure as head of the CPSU and then of the USSR; during Eltsin's time; and in fact until today, an enormous amount of effort has been devoted by the Soviet government and Party leaders and subsequently by the Russian government to find evidence in the archives that proves the Moscow Trials and Tukhachevsky Affair defendants were framed. All such searches have been fruitless. In principle all claims to historical truth always remain subject to revision in the light of future evidence. But in this case it seems there is nowhere for future contradictory evidence to come from. Even though they are still top-secret and only a tiny number of researchers can see them, still we know that the Soviet archives have been thoroughly searched. It seems safe to surmise that no such evidence will be discovered in future. In fact just the opposite is the case: we can be confident that much in the archives is still classified because it would confirm the guilt of the defendants of the 1930s and disconfirm the "anti-Stalin" paradigm. This would be the "cannon shot," in Col. Alksnis's words, that would destroy the anticommunist — and, of course, the Trotskyist — historiography of the Stalin era.

Objectivity and Denial

There is only one conclusion consistent with an objective assessment of the evidence we now have. We have drawn this conclusion here out of no animosity towards Trotsky or partisanship for Stalin. Like other people, scholars have preconceived ideas and prejudices. In the search for historical truth as in science, scholars are obliged to form an hypothesis and put it to the test — which means being ready to find evidence contradictory to their hypothesis. In this case the evidence confirms our hypothesis that Trotsky did collaborate with Germany and Japan.

We are confident that some people will reject this conclusion. Few subjects during the past century have so engaged the passions of so many men and women as has the communist movement. Within that movement surely one of the most contentious issues has and continues to be the "Stalin vs Trotsky" debate. There are few "Stalinists" around today — though that situation may be changing somewhat, especially within Russia. There are many more supporters of Trotsky. Trotskyists are passionately devoted to a heroic version of Trotsky's life and legacy. Anticommunists and Trotskyists are both loyal to a paradigm of Soviet history and especially of the 1930s that is utterly incompatible with the conclusions we have drawn in this essay.

We predict that regardless of the evidence neither staunch anticommunists nor Trotskyists will ever accept that Trotsky did in fact collaborate with Germany and Japan. The "Cold War" paradigm of Soviet history during Stalin's time depends upon the construction of Stalin as an evil man who was killing innocent people and destroying the communist movement. If Trotsky and, by implication, the oppositionists who worked with him were guilty of what they were charged with and to which most, though of course not Trotsky, confessed, then this "Cold War" paradigm of Soviet history is dismantled.

Trotsky's and Sedov's denials cannot be taken seriously. Someone who had access to the closed Trotsky archives at Harvard purged them. No one could expect Trotsky or Sedov, or anyone who had that archival access, to be objective about Trotsky, so we can be certain that they were not.

But no one lies if the truth is on their side. It is true generally that denials of guilt are of little interest to any investigator. The guilty as well as the innocent can be expected to proclaim their innocence. And if confessions of guilt should not be automatically assumed to be truthful, the same is true of professions of innocence.

It is certain that some readers of this essay will "deny" the results of this analysis by raising one or more of the objections we will now consider.

Torture

The issue of torture is cited very often as, supposedly, an "explanation" for the confessions by all the persons whose testimony we have cited here. In fact this is a very weak explanation.

Is it possible that all the accounts by all the witnesses we have cited could have been obtained by torturing, or otherwise forcing, the witnesses to make these statements, and then carefully co-ordinating or "scripting" them? Is it possible that all the defendants memorized "scripted" confessions to make during the investigation, when the materials were all secret; then again at the public trial; and then again in the texts of their secret appeals for clemency to the Soviet Supreme Court — and all out of fear of "torture"?

The question of torture is an important one as it goes to the heart of our study and of historical methodology generally — namely, the question of evidence. First: it is not easy to determine whether or not a given individual was, in fact, tortured.

- It should be obvious that the mere fact that a defendant claims he was tortured does not mean that he was in fact tortured. Of course the general principle is that no one should simply be assumed to be telling the truth, or assumed to be lying, without substantiating evidence. Falsely claiming one was tortured could be a way of explaining shameful behavior — naming others in one's confession, for example — while preserving some self-respect or dignity. During and after the Khrushchev period it became well known that defendants could often get their convictions vacated and rights restored by claiming they had been tortured.

- We can't conclude that an arrestee was tortured simply because an NKVD investigator later said that he was. This is true a fortiori if the NKVD man (or someone else) claims to know it at second hand, from someone else, rather than confessing to torturing the prisoner himself.
- We have to be skeptical of what NKVD men or other investigators wrote or testified during the Khrushchev years. During this time NKVD men were not simply threatened with serious penalties, including death, but some were actually executed on the grounds that they had beaten prisoners during the 1930s up to 1940-41, despite the fact that Khrushchev himself admitted this had been permitted by a Central Committee decision.
- Even less can we accept the "fruit of the poisoned tree" argument: "A was, apparently, tortured, and he named B and C, so ALL were, in fact, innocent." The "fruit of the poisoned tree" logic is a judicial — legal — principle. It means that evidence obtained in an unlawful manner should not be used in court even when that evidence discloses a crime. It does not speak to the question of guilt or innocence, and guilt (or innocence) is what we are interested in.
- We can't conclude that an arrestee was innocent of the crimes he was charged with, or to which he confessed, on the sole grounds that he, or someone else, claims he was tortured. First, those claims may be false. Second, the fact that someone has been tortured does not mean that they were innocent. Guilty persons can also be tortured.
- Repeated written complaints of torture, coupled with a retraction of confessions during the investigation, at trial, or both, make it likely that the prisoner's claims are true. If and when they are also accompanied by confessions by the torturer(s) and/or their superiors, the claims become even more credible. But we have none of these things concerning the defendants at the Moscow Trials or the Tukhachevsky Affair.

Furthermore, even if we could be reasonably assured that a defendant was tortured, that does not mean that the defendant was innocent of all crimes he was charged with. A number of defendants who claimed they were tortured made differentiated confessions, withdrawing part of their confessions on the grounds that they were false, made under duress, but not withdrawing other parts. This is strong evidence that the part of the confession not withdrawn is truthful — for otherwise, why not withdraw or deny it all?

The fact that a confession could not be used in evidence against a defendant unless it had been confirmed at trial, and that many defendants did in fact retract their confessions at trial, means that we should be hesitant to discount confessions by persons who did not retract their confessions at trial when they could have done so.

We can be confident — at least, until good evidence to the contrary should be discovered — that the torture of many defendants, though not of those whose statements we examine in this article, did take place because the evidence for it comes from a number of different sources. The chances that all that evidence could have been "orchestrated" — fabricated into a coherent pattern — become negligible.

For the same reason we can be confident that Trotsky did conspire with the Germans and Japanese. There is so much evidence of it, from so many different sources, and it is so consistent with other information we have, that the chances it has all been fabricated is vanishingly small.

The Charge of "Torture" As A Smokescreen

Could torture have been going on "behind the scenes" so that we have no knowledge of it? Or, should we simply assume that a defendant was tortured if he confessed to serious crimes, even if we have no evidence that he was?

To this objection the response has to be: No. We must always demand evidence. Without evidence that some event occurred it is illegitimate to conclude that it did. It is not scientific to assume that something is going on unseen and leaving no trace. If in fact there is no material evidence that a given witness was lying, while evidence that corroborates some of his statements does exist, we must conclude that he was not lying. Likewise, absent evidence that a person was tortured it is illegitimate to assume that he was.

We have no evidence that any of the defendants in the three Moscow Trials were tortured. In the best-documented case we know as certainly as we ever can that Bukharin was NOT tortured.⁹⁶ Steven Cohen, author of the most famous and influential book about Bukharin, has concluded that Bukharin could not have been tortured.⁹⁷ Cohen is still convinced Bukharin was innocent, but has no way of explaining why he confessed. It should be obvious that guilty persons can be tortured too. "Means of physical pressure," the usual general term (and euphemism) in the USSR at this time, could be applied to defendants to induce them to confess to what they actually had done, as well as to make false confessions of crimes they had never committed. Therefore, even if it can be proven somehow that a person actually has been tortured that does not mean he did not commit the acts he is charged with. It only means that his confession should not be used against him at trial. Therefore the issue of torture is separate from the issue of guilt or innocence.

⁹⁶ Furr and Bobrov, CL p. 10 and note.

⁹⁷ Cohen (Koen), "Bukharin na Lubianke." Svobodnaia Mysl' 21 (3) 2003, p. 61.

In a court procedure evidence that a defendant has made statements because of mistreatment or threats is sufficient to have the statements thrown out. This practice is necessary to protect the rights of the defendant. It's also necessary to guarantee that the investigators actually try to solve crimes instead of simply mistreating suspects until one of them confesses. Historians are faced with a different situation. The question of guilt or innocence is not at all the same as that of whether a defendant received a fair trial.⁹⁸

⁹⁸ Everyone agrees that the Haymarket defendants in Chicago in 1886 did not receive a fair trial, but there is debate about whether one of them, August Spies, may have fabricated the bomb or another, Louis Lingg, may have thrown it. Likewise everyone agrees that Sacco and Vanzetti did not receive a fair trial in Massachusetts in 1921, but there is some disagreement as to whether Sacco may in fact have committed the murder for which they were executed.

A guilty person may confess guilt whether tortured or not. A guilty person may claim innocence even if tortured, or if not tortured. Likewise, an innocent person may confess guilt if tortured, but innocent persons have been known to falsely confess guilt without any compulsion at all. And an innocent person may persist in proclaiming her innocence under torture or absent any mistreatment.

Among the military figures Putna and Fel'dman may have been beaten. We do not even know that for certain. It is stated in the Shvernik Report and in the "rehabilitation" document of 1989 that draws upon it. But many of these "rehabilitation" documents are falsified. As always, there is no certain evidence.

But even if they were beaten, that has no bearing at all upon whether they were guilty or innocent. The Shvernik Report contains much evidence of their guilt. So, whether they were tortured or not, we have a lot of evidence that they were guilty. And it is guilt or innocence — what happened — rather than whether proper judicial procedure was used, that concerns us here.

The idea that not only the military men in the Tukhachevsky Affair but all the defendants in all the Moscow Trials could have been made to confess to false charges by torture or the threat of it, despite the lack of evidence of either torture or threat, is as absurd as any statement we are likely to face. But that fact is never going to stop those who need to believe these men were innocent from believing it.

We have no evidence that any of the other defendants in the Tukhachevsky Affair were beaten or otherwise tortured. As we have seen above in our examination of the Budienny letter we have excellent evidence that these men confessed at their private trial. We know that Khrushchev-era and Gorbachev-era "rehabilitation" commissions lied and dissembled in a vain attempt to prove the innocence of these and many other defendants, and have discussed a number of examples of this in detail in an examination of Khrushchev's "Secret Speech" of 1956.

The charge of "torture" serves the purpose of deflecting attention away from the evidence that we do have. As invoked in the historiography of the Moscow Trials and Tukhachevsky Affair it is a smokescreen, a rhetorical, propaganda device to stop us from looking squarely at the large body of evidence we have. It is an attempt to make us disregard that evidence.

Lack of German Or Japanese Evidence

The objection will be heard: "If there had really been such a conspiracy then some documentation of it would have been found in captured German or Japanese archives." The principle "lack of evidence is not evidence of a lack" applies here. The lack of evidence in German or Japanese archives does not destroy the other evidence we do have, and which we have analyzed above. It does not mean that no conspiracy existed.

And it is not quite true either. We do have evidence from both Czech and German archives that during the period roughly from the end of 1936 through the first quarter of 1937 Hitler and the German government were awaiting a military coup against the Stalin regime. Thanks to a slip of the tongue by a Japanese military commander in a talk with Japanese journalists in early 1937 we know that Opposition figures within the USSR were sending the Japanese military information — that, is, committing espionage.⁹⁹

⁹⁹ This documentation has long since been published. To examine it is far beyond the scope of the present essay. The present author discusses these documents in a forthcoming book on the Soviet Opposition and their collaboration with Germany and Japan.

Genrikh Liushkov privately told the Japanese that real conspiracies existed among Soviet military leaders, even naming some of those against whom other evidence exists. We also have a great deal of other evidence concerning the defendants in the Moscow Trials and the Tukhachevsky Affair that points to the guilt of the defendants. This too is consistent with the results of our present investigation.

Lack of Documentary Proof

As we discussed earlier, Getty discovered that the Trotsky Archive at Harvard has been imperfectly purged of evidence that Trotsky was in contact with his followers in the USSR. Meanwhile Trotsky and Sedov lied in denying such contact. Suppose the purging had been more competent and that all trace of this contact had been successfully removed. Would that mean that no such contact had taken place? Of course it would not. By the same principle "lack of evidence" — in this case, of Trotsky's clandestine contacts with his Soviet followers — would not be "evidence of a lack" of such contact. And, as this essay has demonstrated, there is no lack of such evidence.

Thanks to Getty we know that there used to be some kind of incriminating documentation of Trotsky's activities in his own archive. Was there other such documentation aside from that we know to have existed — letters to his major supporters inside the USSR? We don't know. We can't legitimately conclude that there wasn't.

It is an error in logic and method to fetishize documentary evidence. Any kind of evidence — including documentary evidence — can be faked. In fact it would arguably have been easier to forge documents inculcating Trotsky in the alleged collaboration with Germany and Japan than to coordinate a large number of confessions, particularly public ones, and then coordinate a number of secret, written appeals for clemency, all testifying to events that never in fact happened.

In order to conclude that, despite the evidence cited in this article, Trotsky did not collaborate with Germany and Japan one would be forced to assume that the Soviet authorities orchestrated a vast network of false confessions by many individuals over many months, all of which inculcate Trotsky of German and/or Japanese collaboration, and in a more or less consistent manner. There is no evidence that this kind of orchestration actually took place.

It is tacitly supposed that it all happened "behind the scenes," out of sight of the public trials. Yet now that thanks to some archival documents we have a glimpse "behind the scenes" we can discern no such fabrication. On the contrary: the investigative materials we now have confirm the trial testimony.

The vast majority of the investigative materials remain top-secret in Russia today. We simply do not know what kind of evidence they may hold. Some of it is certainly documentary. We don't know whether any of it is documentary evidence of Trotsky's collaboration with Germany and Japan. Once again: "Lack of evidence is not evidence of lack." The fact that we do not know about any evidence in the secret Soviet archives inculcating Trotsky does not mean such evidence does not exist. It only means we do not know about any.

We know that there is other documentary evidence of some of the conspiracies. The Shvernik Report discusses a telegram from a Japanese military attaché to his superior in Japan testifying to secret contact with a representative of Marshal Tukhachevsky. The Report gives the text of this telegram. Therefore it must have still existed in 1962-64 when the report was being compiled.

Yet Kantor does not even mention it in her two supposedly authoritative books on Tukhachevsky, though of course she knew of it. Kantor wanted to support the theory that Tukhachevsky and the rest were innocent, and this telegram would not have been helpful. We don't know whether the physical document still exists or not. We can be thankful that the Shvernik Report compilers transcribed and discussed it, though we don't know why they did so — it's not what Khrushchev wanted to be told.

What kind of written documentation of a clandestine conspiracy should we expect to have ever existed? Both Radek and Tukhachevsky claim that they had notes from Trotsky which they burned. It would have been foolish in the extreme for them not to have destroyed such incriminating evidence. The Bolsheviks were experienced in working conspiratorially. They had years of practice doing so under the Tsar. They knew better than to keep written lists of fellow conspirators, written plans, and in general anything in writing that would, if discovered by the NKVD, cause disaster to the conspiracy. "Lack of evidence is not evidence of lack" of a conspiracy.

Corroborative Evidence

There are two kinds of evidence that corroborate the direct evidence of Trotsky's collaboration with Germany and Japan. The first is the testimony of those who like Nikolai Bukharin and Genrikh Yagoda admitted to participation in a bloc or alliance with others who had first-hand knowledge of Trotsky's collaboration with Germany and/or Japan but who claimed no ties with Germany or Japan themselves.

Yagoda testified that he learned of Trotsky's direct contact with the Germans from Avel' Enukidze and Lev Karakhan. We have examined Karakhan's testimony above. Most of Enukidze's investigative file is still secret. Neither of the two interrogations of Enukidze published to date mentions his contacts with Trotsky.

Concerning Nikolai Bukharin we have much more information than about any of the other defendants in the various Soviet trials. We have discovered, edited, and published his first confession of June 2, 1937 (Furr & Bobrov). This is also the only pre-trial confession of Bukharin that we have; the Russian government continues to keep all the others secret.¹⁰⁰ We have also discovered and have prepared for publication the falsified decree of the Gorbachev-era Soviet Supreme Court "rehabilitating" Bukharin on February 4, 1988. Neither of these documents was ever made accessible to researchers, much less published, before or during Gorbachev's day; both are still top-secret in Russia today. The "rehabilitation" decree cites a quotation from a document that was secret in 1988 but that we have now discovered. That document is cited as evidence that Bukharin was innocent. In fact it contains evidence that Bukharin was guilty.

¹⁰⁰ We have discovered one additional confession of Bukharin's of February 20, 1938. This confession is still secret in Russia. It does not deal with Trotsky.

Bukharin's first confession implicates Trotsky, as does his Trial testimony. Our published analysis shows that Bukharin was not tortured. Stephen Cohen, the world's expert on Bukharin, reached the same conclusion over a decade ago. We have also examined Bukharin's appeal of his death sentence to the Soviet Supreme Court, in which he reiterates his guilt and claims that for his crimes he should be "shot ten times over." There is no reason whatever to doubt that Bukharin was telling the truth in his pre-trial and trial confessions and in his post-trial appeal. But Bukharin was very clear and explicit that Radek had told him more than once about Trotsky's involvement with the Germans and Japanese.

This is corroborative evidence. Bukharin's first confession corroborates Radek's confession at the January 1937 Trial — Bukharin confirms what Radek said, meanwhile adding a bit more evidence. Bukharin's first confession also corroborates the truthfulness of his own statements at his trial in March 1938. Of course the most striking corroboration is Bukharin's two appeals after his trial, where he confirms his guilt in the strongest possible terms.

A second kind of corroborative evidence consists of evidence from persons who claimed first-hand or second-hand knowledge of Trotsky's collaboration and who themselves were working with either Germany or Japan. According to the evidence now available three of the eight figures in the Tukhachevsky Affair — Primakov, Putna, and Tukhachevsky himself — had direct contact with both Trotsky and the Germans. The other six defendants, all officers of the highest ranks, would almost certainly have known about Trotsky's involvement.

Very little of the investigative and judicial (trial) materials in the three Moscow Trials, the Tukhachevsky Affair, and the broader military conspiracy, has been made public. The rest remains top-secret in Russia today, probably for the reasons Col. Alksnis suggests. Still, enough has leaked out that we have a great deal of evidence, some of it documentary, of German and Japanese collaboration by oppositionists, including military figures. We have prepared a book-length study of this evidence.

We also have a number of transcripts of interrogation-confessions of Nikolai Ezhov, head of the NKVD between September 1936 and November 1938. In the earliest one that we have, an interrogation dated April 26 1939, Ezhov testifies to his own direct collaboration with German military and intelligence figures. Ezhov stated he too was in contact with General Hammerstein.¹⁰¹ Hammerstein asked Ezhov specifically how much influence the Trotskyists had in the Bolshevik Party. The German general's interest in this subject is consistent with the considerable evidence we have seen of Trotsky's collaboration with Germany.

What kinds of corroborative evidence might be admissible in a criminal trial is a legal question. It would be decided differently according to the time of the trial and the jurisdiction or country in which the trial took place. In some jurisdictions rules of evidence in cases of conspiracy might differ from rules in other criminal cases.

In an historical study we are interested in something else: consistency. The corroborative evidence is consistent with the direct evidence. The existence of such corroborative evidence reduces even further the possibility that all the direct evidence was fabricated — a negligible possibility by itself.

¹⁰¹ Lubyanka. Stalin i NKVD — NKGB — GUKR «SMERSH». 1939 — mart 1946. Moscow: "Materik", 2006. No. 37, 52-72. Russian original at <<https://msuweb.montclair.edu/~furr/research/ezhovru.html>> and at <<http://www.alexanderyakovlev.org/fond/issues-doc/58654>>. English translation by Grover Furr at <<https://msuweb.montclair.edu/~furr/research/ezhov042639eng.html>>.

Trotsky's Possible Motives

Our conclusions here are based not on any prejudice or animus for or against Trotsky but on the evidence. The late Pierre Broué, for decades a leading Trotskyist scholar, admitted on the basis of the evidence that Trotsky deliberately lied to the Dewey Commission, yet Broué did not believe that to admit this constituted criticism of Trotsky. The present essay concludes on the basis of massive evidence that Trotsky did conspire with the Germans and Japanese. This conclusion is in itself not a criticism of Trotsky. Whether one evaluates Trotsky's collaboration in a negative light or not depends upon one's political values.

Lenin conspired with the Imperial German government and military to go through the German lines to reach Petrograd in April 1917 on the famous "sealed train." That led to the Provisional Government's accusing Lenin and the Bolsheviks of being a "German spy," an accusation which is still occasionally voiced by anticommunists.

In 1918 Lenin insisted upon signing the Treaty of Brest-Litovsk, an agreement which gave the Germans a lot of Russian territory and ended Germany's two-front war. Lenin was called a "German agent" by some for doing this too. It is the reason that the Socialist-Revolutionary Fannie Kaplan tried to kill Lenin and other Socialist-Revolutionaries did kill Soviet diplomat Moisei Uritskii and German diplomat Wilhelm Mirbach: they wished to sabotage this "pro-German" peace in order to promote a continuation of the war. It is the reason Bukharin and other Left Communists considered arresting Lenin, Stalin, and Sverdlov at that time.¹⁰²

¹⁰² Bukharin admitted this during the 1920s. At his trial in March 1938 Bukharin vehemently denied that this plot also encompassed the possibility of murdering Lenin, Stalin, and Sverdlov, as several former S-Rs asserted in testimony against him. Whatever his subjective intent may have been, many S-Rs were ferociously anti-Bolshevik and embraced assassination — "terror" in Russian — as a political tactic, so putting Lenin, et al. at the S-Rs' mercy would certainly leave them subject to possible murder.

Trotsky had a complicated view of the USSR in the mid-30s. At times he seemed to think that it was only Stalin and a few around him who "had to go" — ubrat' was the vague term he famously used — in order for the Revolution to be saved. As we shall see below, his son Leon Sedov was much more specific about the need for Stalin's assassination.

Trotsky thought that the leading stratum of the Bolshevik Party, or Stalin at the very least, had to be removed from power in order for the revolution to be saved both in the USSR and in the rest of the world. Given this outlook he may have reasoned that what he was doing was similar to what Lenin had done: compromise with the capitalist powers in order to save the Revolution.

By the same token, the requirements of conspiracy would have prevented Trotsky from openly acknowledging such collaboration. The Germans and Japanese would not have dealt with him openly. And to do so would have put anybody associated with him at great risk. Most Trotskyists and sympathizers supported the Russian Revolution and had not necessarily decided that the only road to saving world communism was to change the leadership of the USSR at any cost. Knowledge of his collaboration with Germany and Japan would surely have cost Trotsky a large proportion of his relatively few adherents.

The evidence available to us today overwhelmingly supports the conclusion that Leon Trotsky collaborated with Germany and Japan in a conspiracy to overthrow the Soviet government and the Bolshevik Party leadership around Stalin, and to meet the demands of the fascists for partitioning the USSR, exiling the Comintern, opening the front to German and Japanese invaders, and making other economic and political concessions. Historians may alter these conclusions in future if more evidence comes to light. But these are facts that cannot be wished away.

Did Trotsky Lie Again?

We have already noted that only a small number of men — nine of the defendants at the three Moscow Trials plus at least three and perhaps as many as six of the military figures — claimed that they were told of Trotsky's collaboration with Germany or Japan at first hand, either from Trotsky himself or from his son Leon Sedov. We believe that there are no grounds for dismissing this testimony.

But none of these men claimed to have personally witnessed any meetings between Trotsky (or Sedov) and German or Japanese representatives. Perhaps Trotsky was lying to them? Is it possible that Trotsky did not in fact have such contacts with the Germans and Japanese but was only claiming to have them — to raise the hopes of his followers and his own prestige among them, perhaps?

The evidence suggests this was not the case. Radek, Sokol'nikov, and Iakovlev testified that they were approached by German and Japanese officials who told them about Trotsky's collaboration with their countries. This would seem to rule out any possibility that Trotsky was simply "bragging" to enhance his reputation among his followers and within the conspiracy generally. Nor is it just their word. From his very first confession Bukharin confirmed Radek's contact with German intelligence.

Leon Sedov

Trotsky would not have conspired with either German or Japanese officials in writing. As we have discussed above, it was Bolshevik practice that such deeply secret matters should be communicated only orally. We cannot rule out the possibility that Trotsky himself could have met with German or Japanese representatives. But it seems most likely that he would have done so either chiefly or entirely through his son Leon Sedov. Sedov had the motive, means, and opportunity to be his father's main contact with German and Japanese representatives after 1929 when Trotsky left the USSR.

There is a good deal of suggestive evidence to support this hypothesis. Many of the men whose testimony about direct collaboration with Trotsky we have cited said they did so through Sedov. It was Sedov's address book containing the addresses of Trotskyists within the USSR that Getty found in the Harvard Trotsky archives (Getty-Trotsky 34 n.16). Twelve people — Gol'tsman, Ol'berg, Berman-Yurin, Piatakov, Shestov, Romm, Krestinsky, Rozengol'ts, Uritsky, Putna, Shnitman and Tukhachevsky — claimed that they were in contact with Trotsky entirely or mainly through Sedov.¹⁰³

Something about Sedov's activity can be gleaned from the reports to the NKVD made by Mark Zborowski, a Soviet agent who managed to insinuate himself into Sedov's circle and eventually became Sedov's close collaborator. Some of the NKVD Zborowski file became public after the end of the Soviet Union.¹⁰⁴

¹⁰³ Romm, Krestinsky, and Bessonov claim to have also met Trotsky personally. Some of these men also claimed contact with Trotsky by letter.

¹⁰⁴ Zborowski archive, F.31660 d. 9067 Papka No. 28. In Volkogonov Archive, Library of Congress. Some of these same documents are confirmed by John Costello and Oleg Tsarev, Deadly Illusions (New York: Crown, 1993). Tsarev, a former KGB man, had privileged access to KGB files for a time in the early 1990s.

Zborowski was working for Sedov by February 1935. In June 1936 Sedov tried to recruit Zborowski to go to the USSR as a secret Trotskyist agent, where he would meet with other secret Trotskyists (Zborowski would not have agreed but evidently Sedov dropped the subject.)

On November 26 1936 Zborowski reported that Sedov had told he had seen Piatakov only once since leaving the USSR, in Berlin on May Day 1931 in the company of Shestov, and that Piatakov had turned away from him without speaking to him, and repeated the same thing on December 3. But in February 1937 Sedov told the correspondent of the Dutch socialist newspaper Het Volk that he and Trotsky had not had contact "as often" with Piatakov and Radek as they had with Zinoviev and Kamenev. He then corrected himself, saying "To be more precise, we had no contact with them."¹⁰⁵

¹⁰⁵ Arbejderbladet (Copenhagen) February 12, 1937, p. 5. My thanks to Sven-Eric Holmström for this citation.

Thanks to Getty we know that this was a true "slip of the tongue," an inadvertent admission of the truth. As we have seen, Getty discovered that Trotsky had indeed been in touch with Radek and other sympathizers within the USSR during the 1930s. Sedov's slip of the tongue suggests that Piatakov had also been in touch with Trotsky, as indeed would have been logical. This slip of the tongue appears to confirm that Trotsky and/or Sedov had in fact been in touch with both Piatakov and Radek, as these two men had testified at the trial just concluded in Moscow. This corroborates their trial testimony.

From this information we can conclude that Sedov trusted and relied on Zborowski yet still kept much secret from him. Sedov sometimes — we do not know how often — went out of town, during which time Zborowski did not know what Sedov was doing. As far as we know Sedov was not shadowed or followed on these trips, while Trotsky himself seems to have been under closer observation.

Sedov's denials of having met with Piatakov after leaving the USSR are hardly conclusive since he would have denied meeting him in any case. They are even less credible given his unguarded remark to the correspondent of Het Volk. In his Red Book on the First Moscow Trial Sedov admitted he had met with Gol'tsman and Smirnov. Trotsky evidently forgot about this because he told the Dewey Commission a few months later that he had never had any contact with Gol'tsman after leaving the USSR.¹⁰⁶ This just confirms what we already knew — that Trotsky's and Sedov's denials mean nothing. We repeat: this is not a "criticism" of Trotsky and Sedov. Clandestine work requires deception. It simply means that Trotsky's and Sedov's denials cannot be taken at face value.

¹⁰⁶ Sedov, Red Book Chapter 14. Sven-Eric Holmström discusses all this in detail in his pathbreaking article "New Evidence Concerning the 'Hotel Bristol' Question in the First Moscow Trial of 1936," Cultural Logic 2008.

On January 22 1937, the eve of the Piatakov-Radek trial, Sedov suddenly said to Zborowski: "Stalin must be killed!" and then immediately changed the subject. When Sedov said the same thing the next day Lilia Estrine, who was also present, told him: "Keep your mouth shut!" (Derzhi iazyk za zubami). A few weeks later Zborowski reported at greater length about Sedov's approval of "terror" — in Russian, assassination — in the case of Stalin. Sedov continued in this vein for a time, suddenly breaking off only when Estrine approached.

At the same time Zborowski reported that Sedov expounded at greater length the need to kill Stalin, as "the whole regime in the USSR is held up by Stalin, and it would be enough to kill Stalin for it all to fall apart." He went on to try to theoretically justify assassination (terror) as a tactic not only compatible with Marxism but at times essential to it. Sedov mused about the character necessary for an assassin — one "always ready to die," "for whom death must be a daily reality."¹⁰⁷

¹⁰⁷ As Costello & Tsarev note on p. 283 and n. 45, p. 469, this report bears the handwritten date "11.II.1938." But this does not appear to be in Zborowski's handwriting. The remarks about "three weeks later" suggest that the date should be February 11, 1937, three weeks after Sedov's similar remarks on January 22 and 23, 1937.

We do not know whether Sedov was reflecting his father's view here, but it seems likely. Sedov had no political organization or goals independent of his father's, whose primary and, we must assume, on very sensitive issues, sole political confidant he was.

(Lilia Estrine, later Mrs. David Dallin, was clearly a central figure in Sedov's activities and therefore in Trotsky's as well. The sharp rebuke to Sedov quoted here may suggest that she knew more about his activities than Zborowski did. Immediately after Sedov's death on February 16 1938 Zborowski reported that Lilia Estrine knew of various archives, one of which she had hidden and about which Zborowski had never been told anything. Estrine-Dallin remained on good terms with Zborowski until 1955. At that time he told her of his activities as an NKVD agent, whereupon she broke with him entirely.¹⁰⁸ Estrine remained loyal to Trotsky all her life. Getty has proven that Trotsky's secretary Jan van Heijenoort knew about Trotsky's clandestine contacts but never revealed anything of what he knew. Lilia Estrine-Dallin did the same.)

¹⁰⁸ See "Testimony of Mrs. Lilia Dallin, New York N.Y." Scope of Soviet Activity in the United States . . . March 2, 1956. Part 5. (Washington: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1956), 136-150.

By July 1937, a few months later, Sedov had become completely demoralized. According to Zborowski Sedov was now a drunkard, sometimes drinking all day, dragging Zborowski with him to bars at night. On his son's birthday Sedov dragged Zborowski around to bars in Montparnasse from 6 to 11 p.m. rather than return home where Estrine was waiting for him. Zborowski reported that when he and Sedov parted for the evening the latter visited a brothel before returning home. Sedov said that he had abandoned all faith in the Revolution in 1927 (Trotsky had been arrested in November 1927 and quickly expelled from the Bolshevik Party) and now "he did not believe in anything any longer." He told Zborowski that women and gambling were his only pleasures. On one occasion he showed Zborowski "a solid roll of thousand-frank notes." At roughly 25 francs to the U.S. dollar and in the middle of the Great Depression, this represented a large amount of money to be carrying around on one's person. Zborowski reported that Sedov had enjoyed the casinos at Monte Carlo and that his "dream" was to return.

The chronological sequence of the alterations Zborowski noted in Sedov's habits and attitude towards political work may be significant. When Zborowski met him Sedov was energetic and determined. His reaction to the First Moscow Trial of August 1936 was to immediately write the combative Red Book with which Zborowski helped him.

Sedov's outburst and then longer discussion of assassination coincide with the Piatakov-Radek Trial of January 1937. This was allegedly the "parallel center," the secondary leadership for Trotsky's conspirators within the USSR. Khristian Rakovsky, whom Trotsky considered perhaps his oldest and most loyal follower, was also named at this trial (Rakovsky was a defendant in the Third Moscow Trial of March 1938).¹⁰⁹ If, as the evidence tends to support, these charges were more or less accurate the January 1937 trial would have been a huge blow, the destruction of the main leadership of Trotsky's movement in the USSR. The stress occasioned by such a setback might explain Sedov's outburst about the need to assassinate Stalin and his slip of the tongue to Het Volk. There is much evidence to suggest that in early 1937 Hitler was expecting a pro-German military coup in the USSR.¹¹⁰ Powerful military figures would have represented the best chance of overthrowing the Soviet regime and bringing Trotsky back.

The "Tukhachevsky Affair" military men were tried and executed in June 1937. We have studied their confessions of collaboration with Trotsky above. It may have been the destruction of this last and best opportunity to return to the USSR that impelled Trotsky to send the telegram we studied at the beginning of this article. Shortly after this, in July 1937 Zborowski noted Sedov's descent into drunkenness, gambling, and womanizing, and his declaration to Zborowski that all was lost. Such behavior is consistent with the hypothesis that Sedov's behavior reflected the final collapse of his and his father's hopes. Zborowski, who worked very closely with Sedov, had not reported any such behavior at any earlier date.¹¹¹

¹¹⁰ See Grover Furr, "New Light On Old Stories About Marshal Tukhachevskii: Some Documents Reconsidered." Russian History / Histoire Russe 13, 2-3 (Summer-Fall 1986) 293-308; at <<https://msuweb.montclair.edu/~furr/tukh.html>>. Since this was published more compelling evidence has been discovered. We are preparing an article on this subject.

¹¹¹ Trotsky's followers long believed that the NKVD caused Sedov's death on February 16, 1938 in a Paris clinic where he had undergone an appendectomy. But Zborowski's reports, confirmed by Costello and Tsarev and seconded by the memoirs of Pavel Sudoplatov who later oversaw the planning of Trotsky's assassination, all suggest that the NKVD had nothing to do with Sedov's death (Costello 283-4; Sudoplatov 95-6).

Deciding On The Basis of the Evidence

Given the evidence available today there is only one objective conclusion: our hypothesis has been confirmed. On the evidence we are forced to conclude that Leon Trotsky did collaborate with Germans and Japanese officials to help him return to power in the Soviet Union. As we have seen, there is no basis to disregard this or to regard the evidence we have reviewed in this paper as faked, obtained by torture, or is fraudulent in any other respect.

Deciding according to the evidence demands that we accept the permanently contingent nature of our conclusion. Any objective assessment of the evidence for this, or any other historical conclusion, must always be provisional. If and when new evidence is produced we must be prepared to adjust or even to abandon this conclusion if warranted by that new evidence. Historical study knows no such thing as "certainty."

By the same token the evidence compels us to conclude that Trotsky did conspire with the Hitler and Japanese militarist regimes to help him overthrow the Soviet government and Communist Party leaders in order to regain power in the Soviet Union.

Bibliography

"Poslednii Polkovnik Imperii" Interv'iu "Elementov" s narodnym deputatom SSSR Viktorom Alksnisom." Elementy No.3 (2000). Also at <<http://arctogaia.org.ru/modules.php?name=News&file=article&sid=423>> (Alksnis). [check quotes?]

"Donesenie komandyiushchego voiskami Belorusskogo voennogo okruga I.P. Belova K.E. Voroshilovu o svoikh vpechatleniakh otnositel'no protsessa nad komandno-nachal'stvyiushchim sostavom RKKA. Smolensk. 14 iulia 1937 g." Kristiani, Antonella I Vera M. Mikhaileva, eds. Repressii v Krasnoi Armii (30 -3 gody). Sbornik dokumentov iz fondov Rossiiskogo Gosudarstvennogo Voennogo Arkhiva. Napoli: Istituto universitario orientale, 1996, pp. 192-198 (Belov).

"N.6. Z protokolu dopity D.A. Shmidta vid 31 serpnia 1936 r.," in Sergiy Kokin, Oleksandr Pshennikov, "Bez stroku davnosti," Z Arkhiviv VUChK-GPU-NKVD-KGB No. 1-2 (4/5), 1997 (In Ukrainian).

"O Tak Nazываемom 'Antisovetskom Ob"edinennom Trotskistsko-Zinov'evskom Tsentre." Izvestiia TsK KPSS 8 (1989), pp. 78-94 (Rehabilitation I).

"Pokazaniia Tukhachevskogo M.N. ot 1 iunia 1937 goda." Molodaia Gvardiia 9 (1994), 129-136 (MG 9).

"Pokazaniia Tukhachevsogo M.N. ot 1 iunia 1937 goda." Molodaia Gvardiia 10 (1994), 255-266 (MG 10).

"Posetiteli kremlevskogo kabineta I.V. Stalina." Istoricheskii Arkhiv 4 (1995).

"Protokol Doprosa IA.A. Iakovleva. 15-18 oktiabria 1937 g." Lubianka 2, No. 226, pp. 387-395. At <https://msuweb.montclair.edu/~furrgr/research/iakovlev_conf_1037.pdf>. Posted without pagination at <<http://www.alexanderyakovlev.org/fond/issues-doc/62056/61208>>.

"Rasskaz o desiati rasstrel'iannykh" ("Story of ten who were shot"), Izvestiia September 2 1992, p. 3.

"Spravka Komissii Prezidiuma TsK KPSS 'O Proverke Obvinenii, Pred"iavlennykh v 1937 Godu Sudebnymi i Partiinymi Organami tt. Tukhachevskomu, Iakiru, Uborevichu i Drugim Voennym Deiateliam, v Izmene Rodiny, Terrore I Voennom Zagovore." In RKEB 2, 671- 788 (Spravka).

"Telegramma L.D. Trotskogo v TsIK s osuzhdeniem politiki I.V. Stalina s rezoliutsiei I.V. Stalin i avto grafami V. Molotova, K. Voroshilova. Na 3 ll. F.3, op.24, d.163, l.179-181." Volkogonov Archive, Library of Congress. At <https://msuweb.montclair.edu/~furrgr/research/trotsky_telegram061837.pdf>.

"Zapiska Komissii Prezidiuma TsK KPSS v Prezidium TsK KPSS of Rezul'tatakh Raboty po Rassledovaniuu Prichin Repressiy I Obstoiatel'stv Politicheskikh Protssesov 30-kh Godov." In RKEB 2, 541-670 (Zapiska).

Bobrov, Vladimir L'vovich. "Rasshifrovka audiozapisi besedy s deputatom V.I. Alksnisom." ("Transcript of a recorded conversation with Deputy V.I. Alksnis"). Held on August 13, 2000 at the State Duma of the Russian Federation. Typescript, 4 pp. (Bobrov).

Broué, Pierre. "Trotsky et le bloc des oppositions de 1932." Cahiers Léon Trotsky 5 (Jan-Mar 1980), pp. 5-37.

Cherushev, N.S. 1937 god. Byl li zagovor voennykh? Moskva: Veche, 2007 (Cherushev 1937).

Costello, John, and Oleg Tsarev. Deadly Illusions. NY: Crown, 1993 (Costello).

Coox, Alvin D. "The Lesser of Two Hells: NKVD General G.S. Lyushkov's Defection to Japan, 1938-1945." Journal of Slavic Military Studies 11, 3 (1998) 145-186 (Part One) (Coox 1); 11, 4 (1998) 72-110 (Part Two). (Coox 2).

Fel'shtinskii, Iurii. "Protest protiv publikatsiia pis'ma Trotskogo Fel'shtinskim i ego otvet." At <<http://lib.ru/HISTORY/FELSHTINSKY/f7.txt>>.

Ferr, Grover (Furr). Antistalinskaia Podlost'. Moskva: Algoritm, 2007 (Antistalinskaia).

Furr, Grover and Vladimir Bobrov. "Nikolai Bukharin's 's First Statement of Confession in the Lubianka." Cultural Logic 2007. At <https://ojs.library.ubc.ca/index.php/cllogic/article/view/191745/188745> (Furr & Bobrov).

Genrikh Yagoda. Narkom vnutrennikh del SSSR, General'niy komisar gosudarstvennoi bezopasnosti. Sbornik dokumentov. Kazan', 1997 (Genrikh Yagoda).

Getty, J. Arch and Oleg V. Naumov, Yezhov. The Rise of Stalin's "Iron Fist." New Haven: Yale University Press, 2008.

Getty, J. Arch. "To The Editors." Kritika: Explorations in Russian and Eurasian History 5, 1 (Winter 2004): 233-35 (Kritika).

Getty, J. Arch. "Trotsky in Exile: the Founding of the Fourth International." Soviet Studies XXXVIII, no. 1 (January 1986), pp. 24-35. (Getty - Trotsky)

Getty, J. Arch. Origins of the Great Purges. The Soviet Communist Party Reconsidered, 1933-1938. New York and Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1985.

Getty, J. Arch and Oleg V. Naumov, The Road to Terror. Stalin and the Self-Destruction of the Bolsheviks, 1932-1939. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1999.

Getty, J. Arch. Post to H-RUSSIA list Nov. 24 1998. At <http://tinyurl.com/getty-trotsky-lied>.

Hobsbawm, E.J. "The Historian between the Quest for the Universal and the Quest for Identity." Diogenes No. 168, Vol. 42/4, Winter 1994, 51-63.

Holmström, Sven-Eric. "New Evidence Concerning the 'Hotel Bristol' Question in the First Moscow Trial of 1936," Cultural Logic 2008.

Humbert-Droz, Jules. De Lénin à Staline, Dix Ans Au Service de L' Internationale Communiste 1921-31. Neuchâtel: A la Baconnière, 1971.

IUnge M. (Junge), R. Binner. Kak terror stal "Bol'shim." Sekretnyi prikaz No.00447 i tekhnologiia ego ispolneniia. Moscow: AIRO-XX, 2003.

Jansen, Mark, and Nikita Petrov. Stalin's Loyal Executioner. People's Commissar Nikolai Ezhov 1895-1940. Stanford: Hoover Institution Press, 2002 (Jansen & Petrov).

Junge, Mark. Bucharins Rehabilitierung. Historisches Gedächtnis in der Sowjetunion 1953-1991. Berlin: BasisDruck Vlg, 1999.

Kantor, Iulia. Four articles in Istoriiia Gosudarstva i Prava (2006). At <https://msuweb.montclair.edu/~furrgr/research/kantor_4articles_igp06.pdf> (Kantor 2006).

Kantor, Iulia. Voina i mir Mikhaila Tukhachevskogo. Moscow: Izdatel'skii Dom Ogoniok "Vremia," 2005 (Kantor Voina).

Khaustov, Vladimir, and Lennart Samuel'son. Stalin, NKVD, i Repressii 1936-1938 gg. "Istoriiia Stalinizma" series. Moscow: ROSSPEN, 2009. (Khaustov-Samuel'son) Vsesoiuznoe soveshchanie o merakh uluchshenia podgotovki nauchno-pedagogicheskikh kadrov po istoricheskim naukam. 18-21 dekabria 1962 g. M: Izdatel'stvo "Nauka," 1964.

Lubianka. Stalin i Glavnoe Upravlenie Gosbezopasnosti NKVD. 1937-1938. M.: "Materik," 2004. (Lubianka B)

Lubianka. Stalin i NKVD-NKGB-GUKR "Smersh" 1939-mart 1946. Eds. V.N. Khaustov, V.P. Naumov, N.S. Plotnika. Moscow: "Materik," 2006. (Lubianka C)

Main, Steven J. "The Arrest and 'Testimony' of Marshal of the Soviet Union M.N.

Tukhachevsky (May-June 1937)." Journal of Slavic Military Studies 10, No. 1 (March 1997), 151-195 (Main).

Pavliukov, Aleksei. Ezhov. Biografia. Moscow: Zakharov, 2007.

Piskun, Evgenii E. Termador v SSSR. Idei L.D. Trotskogo i sovetskaia deistvitel'nost' 1920-1980. Riazan': Russkoe slovo, 1997.

Reabilitatsia: Kak Eto Bylo. Mart 1953-Fevral' 1956 gg. Dokumenty Prezidiuma TsK KPSS i Drugie Materialiy. Moskva: Mezhdunarodniy Fond "Demokratiia," 2000 (RKEB 1).

Reabilitatsiia. Kak Eto Bylo. Febral' 1956-nachalo 80-kh godov. Moskva: "Materik," 2003 (RKEB 2).

Report of Court Proceedings in the Case of the Anti-Soviet Trotskyite Centre. Heard Before the Military Collegium of the Supreme Court of the U.S.S.R. Moscow, January 23-30, 1937. . . Verbatim Report. Moscow: People's Commissariat of Justice of the U.S.S.R., 1937 (1937 Trial).

Report of Court Proceedings in the Case of the Anti-Soviet "Bloc of Rights and Trotskyites" Heard Before the Military Collegium of the Supreme Court of the U.S.S.R. Moscow, March 2-13, 1938 . . . Verbatim Report. Moscow: People's Commissariat of Justice of the U.S.S.R., 1938 (1938 Trial).

Report of Court Proceedings. The Case of the Trotskyite-Zinovievite Terrorist Center. Moscow: People's Commissariat of Justice of the U.S.S.R., 1936. Rogovin, Vadim. 1937. Moscow: Novosti, 1996. At <<http://trst.narod.ru/rogovin/t4/oglav.htm>>.

Rokitianskii, Iakov, et al. Sud palacha. Nikolai Vavilov v zastenkakh NKVD. Biograficheskii ocherk, dokumenty. Moscow: Academia, 1999 (Vavilov).

Sedov, Leon. The Red Book on the Moscow Trials (1936). At <<http://www.marxists.org/history/etol/writers/sedov/works/red/>>.

Shane, Scott. "C.I.A. Is Still Caggy About Oswald Mystery." The New York Times October 16 2009, A11. At <<http://www.nytimes.com/2009/10/17/us/17inquire.html>>.

Sudoplatov, Pavel. Razvedka i Kreml'. Zapiski nezhelatel'nogo svidetelia. Moscow: "Gea," 1996 (Sudoplatov).

The Diary of Georgi Dimitrov 1933-1949. Intro. & ed. Ivo Banac. New Haven: Yale University Press, 2003 (Dimitrov).

Trotsky, Leon. "Pis'mo Trotskogo Zhene." Ed. Iurii Fel'shtinskii. At <<http://lib.ru/TROCKIJ/letter.txt>>.

van Heijenoort, Jan. With Trotsky in exile: from Prinkipo to Coyoacán. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1978.

Voennyi Sovet pri Narodnom Komissare Oborony SSSR. 1-4 iunია 1937 g. Dokumenty i Materialy. Moscow: ROSSPEN, 2008 (Voennyi Sovet).

2010: Stephen Cohen's Biography of Bukharin

(A Study in the Falsehood of Khrushchev-Era "Revelations"¹)

Grover Furr and Vladimir L. Bobrov

¹ A somewhat earlier Russian-language version of this essay has been published in Grover Furr and Vladimir Bobrov, 1937. Pravosudie Stalina. Obzhalovaniiu ne podlezhit! Moscow: Iauza-Eksmo, 2010 pp. 195-333. The present essay has been revised for publication in Cultural Logic.

In 1929 Jules Humbert-Droz was a member of the Swiss communist party and a representative of the Communist International. He was also a close friend and political ally of Nikolai Bukharin, one of the most prominent Bolshevik leaders. By this time Bukharin had become a political opponent of Joseph Stalin, with whom he had recently been allied.

Humbert-Droz met and talked with Bukharin for the last time in early 1929. The Swiss communist was about to leave for a conference of Latin American communist parties. In his memoirs, published in Switzerland in 1971, Humbert-Droz recalled this incident as follows:

Before leaving I went to see Bukharin for one last time not knowing whether I would see him again upon my return. We had a long and frank conversation. He brought me up to date with the contacts made by his group with the Zinoviev-Kamenev fraction in order to coordinate the struggle against the power of Stalin. I did not hide from him that I did not approve of this liaison of the oppositions. "The struggle against Stalin is not a political programme. We had combatted with reason the programme of the Trotskyites on the essential questions, the danger of the kulaks in Russia, the struggle against the united front with the social-democrats, the Chinese problems, the very short-sighted revolutionary perspective, etc. On the morrow of a common victory against Stalin, the political problems will divide us.

This bloc is a bloc without principles which will crumble away before achieving any results."

Bukharin also told me that they had decided to utilise individual terror in order to rid themselves of Stalin. On this point as well I expressed my reservation: the introduction of individual terror into the political struggles born from the Russian Revolution would strongly risk turning against those who employed it. It had never been a revolutionary weapon. "My opinion is that we ought to continue the ideological and political struggle against Stalin. His line will lead in the near future to a catastrophe which will open the eyes of the communists and result in a changing of orientation. Fascism menaces Germany and our party of phrasemongers will be incapable of resisting it. Before the debacle of the Communist Party of Germany and the extension of fascism to Poland and to France, the International must change politics. That moment will then be our hour. It is necessary then to remain disciplined, to apply the sectarian decisions after having fought and opposed the leftist errors and measures, but to continue to struggle on the strictly political terrain."

Bukharin doubtlessly had understood that I would not bind myself blindly to his fraction whose sole programme was to make Stalin disappear. / 380 / This was our last meeting. It was clear that he did not have confidence in the tactic that I proposed. He also certainly knew better than I what crimes Stalin was capable of. In short, those who, after Lenin's death and on the basis of his testament, could have destroyed Stalin politically, sought instead to eliminate him physically, when he held firmly in his hand the Party and the police apparatus of the state. (Emphasis added.)²

² Mémoires de Jules Humbert-Droz. De Lénine à Staline. Dix ans au service de l'internationale communiste 1921-1931. Neufchâtel: A la Baconnière, 1971, pp. 379-80. The original French text is as follows:

Avant de partir, j'allai voir une dernière fois Boukharine, ne sachant si je le reverrais á mon retour. Nous eûmes une longue et franche conversation. Il me mit au courant des contacts pris par son groupe avec la fraction Zinoviev-Kamenev pour coordonner la lutte contre le pouvoir de Staline. Je ne lui cachai pas que je n'approuvais pas cette liaison des oppositions: «La lutte contre Staline n'est pas un programme politique. Nous avons combattu avec raison le programme des trotskystes sur des problèmes essentiels, le danger des koulaks en Russie, la lutte contre le front unique avec les social-démocrates, les problèmes chinois, la perspective révolutionnaire très courte, etc. Au lendemain d'une victoire commune contre Staline, ces problèmes politiques nous diviseront. Ce bloc est un bloc sans principes, qui s'effritera même avant d'aboutir.»

Boukharine me dit aussi qu'ils avaient décidé d'utiliser la terreur individuelle pour se débarrasser de Staline. Sur ce point aussi je fis d'expresses réserves: l'introduction de la terreur individuelle dans les luttes politiques nées de la Révolution russe risquait fort de se tourner contre ceux qui l'emploieraient. Elle n'a jamais été une arme révolutionnaire. «Mon opinion est que nous devons continuer la lutte idéologique et politique contre Staline. Sa ligne conduira, dans un avenir proche, à une catastrophe qui ouvrira les yeux des communistes et aboutira à un changement d'orientation. Le fascisme menace l'Allemagne et notre parti de phraseurs sera incapable de lui résister. Devant la débâcle du Parti communiste allemand et l'extension du fascisme à la Pologne, à la France, l'Internationale devra changer de politique. Ce moment-là sera notre heure. Il faut donc rester disciplinés, appliquer les décisions sectaires après les avoir combattues et s'opposer aux fautes et aux mesures gauchistes, mais continuer la lutte sur le terrain strictement politique.»

Boukharine a sans doute compris que je ne me liais pas aveuglément à sa fraction, dont le seul programme était de faire disparaître Staline. / 380 / Ce fut notre dernière entrevue. Manifestement il n'avait pas confiance dans la tactique que je proposais. Il savait aussi bien sûr, mieux que moi, de quels crimes Staline était capable. Bref, ceux qui, après la mort de Lénine, sur la base de son testament, auraient pu liquider politiquement Staline, cherchaient à l'éliminer physiquement, alors qu'il tenait fermement en main le parti et l'appareil policier de l'Etat.

Humbert-Droz published this account in 1971, written without any pressure from the NKVD. He wrote, and lived most of his life, in his native Switzerland. Moreover, he was Bukharin's friend and political ally. At the time of writing he hated Stalin, as is clear from his remark about "crimes Stalin was capable of."

Thus he had no motive that we know of to lie or to exaggerate what he knew. Furthermore, Humbert-Droz claims he heard of the plans to murder Stalin from Bukharin's own lips.

Many will consider this statement the single strongest piece of available corroborating evidence that Bukharin was guilty of what he was charged with at the third Moscow Trial of 1938. It is confirmation that Bukharin not only had no objection to forming a bloc with those who relied upon assassination (the best translation for the Russian term "individual terror") but advocated it himself. If he were capable of plotting to murder Stalin as early as early 1929, he was clearly capable of acts of that nature in later years.

In corroboration of this statement, we now have a confession statement by Valentin Astrov, one of Bukharin's students and followers, from January 1937 in which Astrov specifically accuses Bukharin of planning Stalin's assassination in 1932. When confronted by Astrov's claim, Bukharin repeatedly denied it. In his first confession, which we discovered and published in this journal a few years ago, Bukharin admits being in a bloc with Trotskyites and others who advocated terror and also admits that within his own faction, the Rights, "there grew up terrorist groups." But even then Bukharin did not admit to advocating Stalin's assassination himself. 3 Yet Humbert-Droz affirms that he did.

While imprisoned Bukharin wrote Stalin a letter on December 10, 1937 in which he retracted all the confessions he had previously made. On page seven of his "touching" missive Bukharin wrote:

I know that N[atasha] S[ergeevna Allilueva] would never believe that I had plotted anything evil against you....

Read literally, this has to be considered the truth, for Bukharin did not write that he had not taken part in the preparation to kill Stalin. He wrote only that Stalin's wife (dead by this time) would not have believed he was a part of any such plot! The difference in meaning between these two statements is obvious. Bukharin was using "weasel words" — saying one thing ("your wife would never believe I had plotted anything evil against you") while intending Stalin to understand something else ("I never plotted anything evil against you.") Again, thanks to Humbert-Droz's memoir we now have substantial evidence that Bukharin was lying.

Humbert-Droz's testimony has been available since 1971. Any scholar with an interest in historical truth would immediately recognize the importance of this passage as very strong, non-Soviet, non-"Stalinist" evidence that one of the leading defendants in the Moscow Trials, was in fact guilty. The anonymous reviewer of Humbert-Droz's book in the Times Literary Supplement drew readers' attention to this specific passage in a relatively brief review (TLS June 25 1971 p. 733).

Robert Conquest does not cite this statement by Humbert-Droz in The Great Terror: A Reassessment (1990; many reprints), though in an earlier edition he wrote

On political matters basically the best, though not infallible, source is rumour at a high political or police level. (The Great Terror, 1968, p. 569).

Humbert-Droz's testimony tends to disprove Conquest's thesis that Stalin "framed" Bukharin and all the Moscow Trial defendants. Perhaps this is the reason Conquest failed to cite it, even in his 2008 "fortieth anniversary edition", 37 years after Humbert-Droz's memoir appeared.

However, the subject of the present study is Stephen F. Cohen's biography of Bukharin, by far the most influential and best-known work on Bukharin in any language. Cohen does mention Humbert-Droz himself on twelve pages of his book. Moreover, Cohen cites this specific book, De Lénine à Staline, five times: note 16, p. 391; note 19, p. 431; note 109, page 450; note 137, p. 451; note 170, p. 453.⁴

⁴ Humbert-Droz's book is also cited in the "Selected Bibliography" on p. 491.

Yet nowhere does Cohen mention the book's most striking revelation: Humbert-Droz's claim that Bukharin had admitted in 1929 that he and his "fraction," or secret group within the Party, were already plotting to assassinate Stalin. Cohen's conspicuous silence may serve as a preface to the study that follows.

In this essay, we contend that the dominant paradigm of the political history of the Soviet Union in the 1930s is false. Documents from formerly secret Soviet archives that have been made public since the end of the USSR provide more than sufficient evidence to disprove the view of this period that has met with almost universal acceptance since Khrushchev's day. In the present essay we test this hypothesis through a close examination of one representative text: the tenth chapter of Stephen F. Cohen's 1973 book Bukharin and the Bolshevik Revolution. A Political Biography 1888-1938.

For brevity's sake we call this historical paradigm or master narrative the "anti-Stalin" paradigm. A clumsier but more accurate term would be "the Trotsky-Khrushchev-Cold War-Gorbachev-post-Soviet" paradigm. From the time of his exile in January 1929 until his murder in August 1940, Leon Trotsky blamed what he regarded as the flaws and crimes of Soviet socialism on the personality of Joseph Stalin. Nikita Khrushchev picked up this same theme in 1956, and during the period of his leadership of the USSR attacks on Stalin were vastly amplified until Khrushchev's removal from office in October 1964.

Beginning in 1987, Mikhail Gorbachev sponsored an assault on Stalin and those associated with him that outdid even the Khrushchev period. The figure of Stalin suffered a virtual "demonization," while similar treatment was given to other Stalin-era Bolsheviks and to Khrushchev himself.

In the West, this paradigm is perhaps most often associated with Robert Conquest's 1968 book The Great Terror. Stalin's Purge of the Thirties and with Roy Medvedev's Let History Judge: The Origins and Consequences of Stalinism (1971). Khrushchev-era "revelations" form the core of what passes for evidence in the works of both authors. I have used the term "revelation" in scare quotes in order to signal to the reader that these supposed disclosures are virtually all false.

A huge number of primary source documents from former Soviet archives have been published since the end of the USSR in 1991. A great many books have been written in an effort to elaborate and adjust the anti-Stalin paradigm in order to accommodate some of this archival evidence. No work has been written to rival the virtually canonical position of Conquest's and Medvedev's works of four decades ago.

Both these books are far too long — Conquest's at almost 700 pages, Medvedev's at just short of 900 — for detailed treatment in a single essay. Instead, we use the tenth chapter of Cohen's book as representative of the canonical interpretation of Soviet elite politics in the 1930s. Writing a few years later than Conquest and Medvedev, Cohen drew extensively on both of them and also relied on other works Conquest himself used — by writers such as Boris Nikolaevsky and Alexander Orlov.

Because of his much narrower focus on Bukharin alone rather than on the whole political history of the USSR, Cohen was able to present a scholarly, documented account of the period 1930-1938 in 45 pages. This chapter is short enough to permit a detailed examination of his evidence, yet well documented enough — 207 footnotes — to stand in for the "anti-Stalin paradigm" as a whole.

Brevity is not the only, or even the main, advantage that Cohen's tenth chapter presents to the critic. Cohen's book was a "classic" from the moment of its publication and remains so today. Originally published in 1973 by Alfred A. Knopf, it was reissued in 1980 by the prestigious Oxford University Press and has stayed in print ever since.

Cohen's book is important in another way. Mikhail Gorbachev chose it as the first work of Western Sovietology to be published by a Soviet publishing house.⁵ Gorbachev reportedly told Cohen that he himself had been strongly influenced by the book in the early 1980s, when he had read it in Russian translation.

⁵ "Die Bedeutung, die dieser Arbeit zugemessen wurde, läßt sich daran ablesen, daß es das erste Werk eines westlichen Sowjetologen war, das in der UdSSR erscheinen konnte." Mark Junge. Bucharins Rehabilitierung. Historisches Gedächtnis in der Sowjetunion 1953-1991 (Berlin: BasisDruck, 1999), pp. 195-96.

In late 1987, a conference on Bukharin, inspired in part by Cohen's book, was held in Moscow. Not only was Cohen invited to address it, but Gorbachev himself held a press conference with Cohen (Junge 159-60). This event and the publication of the Russian translation by the government publishing house Progress in late 1988 (Junge 193 n.77) inaugurated the "Bukharin-Boom" during which enthusiasm for Bukharin as the "real" inheritor of Lenin's mantle was promoted by the Gorbachev regime.⁶

⁶ "In den Jahren 1988/89 kam es zu einem regelrechten Bucharin-Boom." Junge, p. 192.

Gorbachev and his associates in the Soviet leadership were mainly interested in using Bukharin's support for market mechanisms in the 1920s to justify a massive increase in reliance on markets in the name of "Leninism" in the late 1980s.⁷ That is not our interest here. The tenth chapter of Cohen's book is not concerned with Bukharin's economic ideas, but rather with Bukharin's life from 1930 to his trial and execution in March 1938.

⁷ "Schließlich bezeichnen die entsprechenden Autoren Bucharins Ideen übereinstimmend als hochaktuell für die 'Perestrojka'." The authors mentioned here were all supporters of "perestroika." Junge, 206. See a similar remark on p. 196.

Nevertheless, these last eight years of Bukharin's career were central to Gorbachev's purpose of rehabilitating Bukharin's economic ideas for Gorbachev's perestroika. Finding Bukharin innocent of the charges he was convicted of at his 1938 Trial was critical in establishing the supposedly Leninist legitimacy of Bukharin's economic ideas.

If it were generally recognized that Bukharin had really been guilty of even one of the principal charges to which he had confessed his guilt: conspiring to overthrow the Soviet government and of plotting with the German General Staff to open the front to the German army in case of war — let alone being a party to a plan to assassinate Lenin in 1918, a charge he denied but of which he was convicted⁸ — he could not have been useful to Gorbachev. Furthermore, Bukharin himself had admitted at trial that the policies he stood for in the 1930s amounted to "the restoration of capitalism," and this Gorbachev could in no way admit — at least not in 1988.

⁸ Bukharin admitted repeatedly that he had conspired with the Social-Revolutionaries to arrest Lenin, Stalin, and Iakov Sverdlov but denied any plan to kill them. This issue is discussed later in the present essay.

If Bukharin's guilt had been acknowledged, then it would follow that the Soviet government — "Stalin," in the reductive synecdoche of anticommunist parlance — had been justified in executing him. What's more, since Bukharin implicated virtually all the other defendants in the three Moscow Trials and the defendants in the secret Military Trial of Marshal Tukhachevsky and others, admitting Bukharin's guilt would also tend to justify the Soviet government's repression against these figures. Portraying Stalin's policies as wrong, immoral, and un-Leninist was essential to the acceptability of Gorbachev's economic policy. So Bukharin's innocence was a cornerstone of the "rehabilitation" of both his name and the economic policies associated with him.

It has been assumed and asserted since the "Bukharin-Boom" of the late 1980s that Bukharin was compelled to confess to crimes he did not commit. This is the bedrock assumption of all mainstream discussion of Bukharin's career, of the Moscow Trials, and of the Soviet 1930s generally, reasserted over and over again until it has been taken for granted. Few voices — in the public sphere and scholarly mainstream, none at all — have subjected this assumption to any serious question.

As our previous research⁹ as well as the present essay show, there is no positive evidence that Bukharin was innocent. On the contrary: all the evidence we have is consistent with Bukharin having been guilty of the crimes he himself confessed to.

⁹ Furr and Bobrov, "Nikolai Bukharin's First Statement of Confession in the Lubianka." Cultural Logic 2007. At <https://ojs.library.ubc.ca/index.php/clogic/article/view/191745/188745>. This article was first published in Russian in the historical journal Klio (St. Petersburg) No. 1 (36), 2007, pp. 38-54. At

One problem for the Gorbachev-sponsored "Bukharin-Boom" emerged early, though we could only learn about it in 2004. The commission of the Central Committee set up to study and, in essence, to find evidence that Bukharin had been unjustly convicted at his trial in 1938 was unable to find any such evidence at all. The proceedings of this commission published in 2004 show the commission members' consternation at this failure.

The result was that the decree (Postanovlenie) of the Plenum of the Soviet Supreme Court which was issued on February 4, 1988 and which declared that Bukharin had been forced to make a false confession was never published and remains secret to this day. Its text, only recently discovered, shows that the central piece of evidence of Bukharin's innocence cited in it is, in fact, a deliberate falsification.¹⁰ In it the confession-statement of Mikhail Frinovsky, a document that provided strong evidence of Bukharin's guilt, was deliberately misquoted so it could be employed as evidence that he was innocent.¹¹ In fact Gorbachev's experts could find no evidence whatever to support their theory that Bukharin was innocent.

¹⁰ We, Furr and Bobrov, have prepared an edition of this document and an accompanying article, to be published shortly in a book to be published in Russia.

¹¹ Frinovsky's confession-statement was published in early 2006 and is available on the web at <https://msuweb.montclair.edu/~furr/research/frinovskyru.html>. I have put an English translation of it on the web here:

<<https://msuweb.montclair.edu/~furg/research/frinovskyeng.html>>. Both Russian and English web versions have the full bibliographical information of the original publication. For Frinovsky's statement of Bukharin's guilt see pp. 40; 42; 47-8, or just search for the word "Bukharin" («Бухарин»).

Evidence and Objectivity

If the final chapter of Cohen's biography of Bukharin were simply an example of poor scholarship and nothing more, it would be of little interest. Soviet history of the Stalin period is awash with books in both English and Russian whose theses and presuppositions are jerry-rigged entirely of rumors, fabrications, and outright lies.

But the rest of Cohen's book is, on the whole, far more carefully done. Though not devoid of references to dubious sources, these at least do not predominate. No doubt the reason is that the economic and political struggles of the 1920s and earlier are far better documented.

When it came to the 1930s, however, many fewer primary sources were available. With Stalin's death the publication of the primary sources documenting events of the era virtually ceased. Even Soviet historians could not gain access to them, a fact that some Party historians complained about during an historians' conference in Moscow in 1962.¹² Historians were left with the choice of either doing careful detective work with the resources that existed or accepting the so-called "revelations" of the Khrushchev era at face value.

¹² See the section "Charges at trial false?" below.

Every historian is faced with the choice between orthodoxy and objectivity. To be objective is to observe an attitude with regard to the evidence similar to that used in the physical sciences, including the following practices:

- To regard one's working hypothesis as provisional until one has gathered and carefully studied all the relevant evidence;
- To engage in the hard work of collecting and studying all the relevant evidence;

- To regard all evidence and sources with a critical eye;
- To question one's own preconceived ideas;
- To be especially skeptical of evidence that tends to support one's own preconceived ideas;
- To compensate for one's own biases by making sure to give diligent, even generous attention to evidence and theories that tend to cast doubt on one's own preconceived ideas.

The second choice — what we here call "orthodoxy" — is not to stray beyond the limits of the dominant historical paradigm, adherence to which is essential to professional acceptance and scholarly success. Once this choice is made, a logical "slippery slope" leads to the less and less critical examination of any materials that support conclusions consistent with the orthodox paradigm.

The works of Arch Getty and the so-called "Young Turk" or "revisionist" historians of the 1980s demonstrated what could be done by intelligent historians determined on being objective, unafraid to subject to critical examination the dominant historical paradigm and the evidence on which it is founded. For Getty and the other "Young Turks," this meant they had to battle against the dominant paradigm of Soviet history — what we call the "anti-Stalin paradigm," though they did not call it that. They had a hard time of it.

But for most scholars in the field of Soviet history, the anticommunist potential of the Khrushchev-era "revelations" proved to be too tempting to resist. The field itself is in the main a product of Cold-War anticommunism. It was, and remains, less concerned with uncovering the truth about the past than with providing propaganda politically useful to the sources that fund that research and the societal forces that reward the political uses of historiography.

Dedication to objectivity is the only way to write good history. A great many of the conclusions Getty reached in his 1979 dissertation and 1986 book have been borne out by research based on the evidence released from former Soviet archives since 1991. As this article will show, the same evidence shows Cohen's tenth chapter to have been fundamentally flawed, virtually all of its historical conclusions wildly wrong.

Whatever his specific reasons may have been, Cohen did not subject the orthodox, dominant paradigm of Soviet history during the Stalin years to appropriate scholarly suspicion and scrutiny. Instead Cohen simply adopted it in its entirety. It is accurate to say that Chapter Ten of his book is itself representative of this dominant paradigm. While keeping the focus on Bukharin, Cohen repeats the main features of the anti-Stalin master narrative that Conquest and Medvedev elaborated in greater detail by referring frequently to their works as well as to official Soviet Khrushchev-era "revelations" that are fraudulent, as we can now prove.

In this article we present a point-by-point refutation of the assertions made by Cohen in his tenth chapter. A close study of them, together with a careful demonstration that they are false, will serve to illustrate the bankruptcy of the "anti-Stalin" paradigm of the political history of the Soviet Union during the 1930s. It will show that evidence from the formerly secret Soviet archives refutes this paradigm in virtually every detail.

We shall see that this paradigm is beyond rescue. It is not false only in some of its details, but in total. The reader will understand that the history of the USSR during the 1930s needs to be completely reconceived along lines not simply different from but in contradiction to the "canonical" understanding.

The fine work of the "revisionist" historians proves that a devotion to objectivity — a careful, critical examination of the evidence available during the Brezhnev era, the era in which Cohen also wrote — permitted researchers as early as the 1970s, when Getty's dissertation work was done, to reach conclusions broadly compatible with those we can now obtain with far greater documentation and certainty. Given an objective approach, good research was still possible even in default of so much of the evidence we now have.

Neither Cohen nor any other researcher was compelled in any way to adopt the "anti-Stalin" paradigm of Soviet history. Nobody was forced to "believe" Khrushchev and his minions. After all, they had not "believed" Stalin and the historical claims made in his day.

So why did Cohen choose to uncritically "believe" Khrushchev and the Khrushchev-era writers who attacked Stalin? Why was he not far more skeptical of their motives? In one sense we can't know why Cohen failed to be appropriately skeptical of Khrushchev-era sources. However, no one can doubt that the road to professional success lay then, as it does today, in refusing to question what the dominant figures in one's field accept.

Did Cohen know that this "Cold War" framework was wrong? The question is a fair one because he, like everyone interested in Soviet history, certainly should have suspected it, as Getty and others did. Today, with the benefit of documents from the former Soviet archives, we can prove that Khrushchev and his supporters knew they were lying.¹³

¹³ For the evidence that all the so-called "revelations" in Khrushchev's "Secret Speech" to the 20th Party Congress of February 25, 1956 are false see Grover Furr, Khrushchev Lied (Kettering, OH: Erythrós Press and Media, 2011). This is a revised and updated version of Antistalinskaia podlost' (Moscow: Algoritm, 2007).

(We can be certain that Gorbachev and his supporters were consciously lying too. It is simply not credible that falsifications such as, for example, that of the Soviet Supreme Court decree "rehabilitating" Bukharin could have been done behind the back of the First Secretary. No one in the USSR would have dared to do that.)

To admit Bukharin's guilt would threaten, if not completely dismantle, the whole orthodox or "anti-Stalin" paradigm because Bukharin implicated by name virtually all the main figures in the Moscow Trials. It is generally assumed that Bukharin was coerced to falsify his confession. But if it can be proven that the most damning admissions of his confession were in fact true, then this would suggest that other allegations in his confession, or even his confessions as a whole, are in fact credible as evidence. It would follow from this that we have very strong evidence that the conspiracies against Stalin and the Soviet Union in the 1930s were quite real. Bukharin testified that the Soviet government — "Stalin" — stopped a fascist plot that would have put the USSR into the Axis camp, thus saving Europe and much of the rest of the world from fascist domination. Anticommunist ideology dictated then, as it does today, that this fact must be denied at any cost.

In addition anticommunism was then, and remains today, not just compatible with but obligatory for academic success in this field. Soviet studies is a branch of communist studies that has always been an intellectual adjunct to the anticommunist forces in the Cold War, and remains so to this day. The only way to achieve wide recognition, much less the fame that Cohen did in fact attain, is to "go along" — to elaborate a more nuanced version of the Soviet past that could fit comfortably inside the dominant Cold War paradigm. This essay, therefore, has in its sights not just Cohen himself, but a far larger and more important target — the false "anti-Stalin" paradigm, of Soviet history.

The Moscow Trials

If as this essay contends the "anti-Stalin" narrative of Soviet history in the Stalin period generally, and the 1930s specifically, is basically wrong and dishonest, the reader can't fail to wonder: What really happened? Where can one turn, if not for a complete and truthful account of the major events of the 1930s, then at least for a more accurate paradigm? This is a fair and, moreover, a very important question. While the present essay can't answer it with satisfaction, we'll try to briefly give the broad outlines of such a picture, at least as it concerns Bukharin, Stalin, and the Moscow Trials generally.

There is no concrete evidence whatsoever that any of the defendants in the three public Moscow Trials, or any of the military commanders in the secret trial known as the "Tukhachevsky Affair," were innocent. Moreover, there is no evidentiary basis for the widespread notion, frequently asserted, that they confessed to crimes they did not commit because of pressures of any kinds like torture, threat of torture, or threats to family. There is no evidence of any "Rubashov effect" — confession from some twisted notion of a "higher loyalty to the Party." Despite official insistence that they were innocent and the refusal of the Russian government to release all but a small fraction of the documentation we know exists, it is clear that objectively — that is, on the evidence — these defendants appear to be guilty of everything they confessed to, and perhaps of some of what the prosecution charged them with but to which they did not confess.

Concerning Bukharin specifically we now have a great deal of evidence from the formerly Secret Soviet archives — more than about any other single defendant. All of this evidence points strongly towards Bukharin's guilt. Not only do we have evidence directly concerning Bukharin himself but also concerning others — both those in one or another of the Moscow Trials and those who, like Avel' Enukidze and Marshal Mikhail Tukhachevsky, were tried secretly — who implicate Bukharin, while Bukharin's testimony also incriminates them. Further, we have a great deal of evidence that Leon Trotsky conspired with Germany and Japan as charged at the three Moscow "Show" Trials of 1936-38.

We now have a great deal of evidence of the guilt of these men. Meanwhile, we have no evidence at all that tends to suggest they were innocent. Certainly, many scholars in this field, and many opinionated persons beyond it, assert and believe the opposite. But the fact is that there is no solid evidence to support the hypothesis that they were innocent. We can be certain of one thing: any jury presented with this evidence; any scholar who examined it and who was not burdened with the preconceived idea that the "anti-Stalin" paradigm must be right, would have to conclude Bukharin and the other defendants were, in fact, guilty. Furthermore, we know that Gorbachev's rehabilitation commission examined all the several hundred volumes of investigative materials that are mentioned in the transcripts of their hearings. Yet this commission could find no evidence that supported Bukharin's acquittal. In addition, the one bit of documentary evidence of Bukharin's innocence cited by the Soviet Supreme Court is cited falsely, and that original document in fact confirms Bukharin's guilt. All this strongly suggests that even in the still-secret archives no exculpatory evidence is to be found.

We also have found no evidence to suggest that this evidence was fabricated or that it tends to exculpate Bukharin for any other reason. We know too that Stalin did not deliberately set out to construct any kind of mass "terror" by "targeting" Bukharin. In the specific case of Bukharin, much evidence shows that Stalin gave his former ally, colleague and friend the benefit of the doubt many times.

The present essay deals specifically with Cohen's chapter and the statements he makes in it. But it is really not just "Cohen's account" — it is the dominant paradigm itself upon which Cohen drew, that is in the dock here. Every aspect of this "anti-Stalin" paradigm is false — often, diametrically opposite from the truth.

The clear implication of this study's conclusions is that the history of the Soviet Union in the Stalin period must be completely reconceived on the basis of the evidence we now have. Most important, those who aim to understand the course of events in the USSR during the 1930s will have to discard the paradigm that has become so familiar and whose dominance has so fatally distorted our understanding. The real history of the great socialist experiment of the USSR during the Stalin period is still to be written.

Analysis of Cohen's Chapter

Let's start by stressing the main error of this chapter: Cohen forces everything into the Procrustean bed of the "anti-Stalin" master narrative. Cohen's sources are virtually all taken from a few sources that are "canonical" or basic to this paradigm, or from the version promoted by Conquest, which is no more than a Westernized amalgam of Khrushchev-era falsehoods and anticommunist memoirs and works of propaganda, a few of which are tricked out as "scholarship." Gorbachev's later version would simply be a more intense variation of this same paradigm.

Still a valuable examination of the reasons to be skeptical of all these works is Arch Getty's "Bibliographical essay" at the end of his 1986 work Origins of the Great Purges. The Soviet Communist Party Reconsidered, 1933-1938 (Cambridge U.P.), pp. 211-220 (hereafter Getty, Origins). Getty's discussion proves that a careful and properly skeptical scholar could discern the unreliability of most of Cohen's sources long before the end of the USSR. Getty wrote a draft of this "Bibliographical essay" in his Ph.D. dissertation finished in 1979; see Getty, The Great Purges Reconsidered. The Soviet Communist Party 1933-1939. Unpublished Ph.D. dissertation, Boston College, 1979, pp. 24-48 (hereafter Getty, Dissertation). We'll consider this too.

- Cohen "believes" — accepts at face value — Khrushchev's own statements in, for example, his 1956 "Secret Speech" to the 20th Party Congress.

We know now that virtually every single "revelation," major and minor, that Khrushchev made in this famous speech is false. Furthermore, we know that Khrushchev knew they were! But the unreliability of Khrushchev and his information has long been obvious. (Furr 2007; Getty, Origins 216-7; Getty, Dissertation 38-40)

- Cohen accepts Khrushchev-era sources as true also, even though the political origins and motivation of such assertions were obvious at the time. For example Cohen relies heavily upon Roy Medvedev's Let History Judge, a book that basically attempts to summarize Khrushchev-era "revelations" along with Medvedev's own collection of stories and rumors from unpublished memoirs. Medvedev's is a "pro-Bukharin polemic" and extremely bitter against Stalin.

As Getty points out:

Nearly all Medvedev's work is based on the post-1956 recollections of surviving party members ... [N]one of Medvedev's often anonymous informants was close enough to the center of power to tell why things were happening or indeed exactly what was happening. All his informants were on the 'outside' ... Their speculations about why this happened or about Stalin's position are little better than ours. (Getty, Origins 218; cf. Getty, Dissertation 40-42)

In this essay, we refer both to the English translation of Medvedev's book and to the 1974 Russian language edition published by Knopf and printed in Belgium.

- Cohen also leans heavily on unreliable secondary sources like Conquest's The Great Terror. This book is itself an attempt, more successful and systematic than Medvedev's, to synthesize Khrushchev-era "revelations" or claims with anticommunist works of propaganda, treating them all as though they were thoroughly verified sources.

Of Conquest's lack of source criticism Getty wrote (Origins, 5 and 222, n.12; cf. Dissertation 64, n. 57):

For no other period or topic have historians been so eager to write and accept history-by-anecdote. Grand analytical generalizations have come from secondhand bits of overheard corridor gossip. Prison camp stories ('My friend met Bukharin's wife in a camp and she said ...') have become primary sources on central political decision making. The need to generalize from isolated and unverified particulars has transformed rumors into sources and has equated repetition of stories with confirmation. Indeed, the leading expert on the Great Purges [Conquest] has written that 'truth can thus only percolate in the form of hearsay' and that 'basically the best, though not infallible, source is rumor.'

... Such statements would be astonishing in any other field of history. Of course, historians do not accept hearsay and rumor as evidence. Conquest goes on to say that the best way to check rumors is to compare them with one another. This procedure would be sound only if rumors were not repeated and if memoirists did not read each other's works.

In his dissertation Getty had been even more critical of Conquest's work:

Sometimes the "scholarship" had been more than simply careless. Recent investigations of British intelligence activities (following in the wake of U.S. post-Watergate revelations), suggest that Robert Conquest, author of the highly influential Great Terror, accepted payment from British intelligence agencies for consciously falsifying information about the Soviet Union. Consequently, the works of such an individual can hardly be considered valid scholarly works by his peers in the Western academic community. (Dissertation 48)

Getty usefully refers to the article by David Leigh, "Death of the department that never was" in The Guardian of January 27, 1978,¹⁴ which identifies Conquest as writing propaganda for the "Information Research Department," or IRD, of the British Foreign Office, and publishing it through Praeger Publishers in the USA, which also published books for the American CIA.

¹⁴ Now available at

<http://www.cambridgeclarion.org/e/fo_deceit_unit_graun_27jan1978.html>. One of the authors was told in 1980 by the late Professor John N. Hazard of Columbia University that it was widely believed in the field that much of Conquest's research was in fact done by researchers working for British intelligence, who then sent the material on to him.

But good research is good research no matter where it comes from. If Conquest's work were honest and accurate, it would be very helpful irrespective of Conquest's reactionary political orientation. It isn't. Conquest collects rumors and relies on thoroughly worthless works so long as they have an anticommunist tendency. The first and most influential edition of his magnum opus, The Great Terror, cites Alexander Orlov's book more than any other source by far.

- Cohen too relies heavily on Alexander Orlov, The Secret History of Stalin's Crimes (NY: Random House, 1953). This work was understood as a fabrication long before Orlov's KGB file was opened in the early 1990s and the full extent of his falsifications uncovered. Arch Getty carefully dissected the reasons for rejecting Orlov's clearly fabricated account of events in his book (Origins 211-2) and remarked with acerbity:

Normally, the testimony of a sometime Stalinist agent, mass murderer, and former spy would be subjected to at least a modicum of critical attention and doubt. But the question of political bias only compounds the main problem with the Orlov source — the lack of proximity to events. (212)

Costello and Tsarev (Deadly Illusions, NY: Crown, 1993) cite many specific examples of Orlov's lies, uncovered with the aid of Orlov's KGB file (e.g. pp. 287, 297, 299, 304, 308, 314, 321.)

- Again like Conquest Cohen frequently cites Boris Nikolaevsky's "Letter of an Old Bolshevik." Nikolaevsky, a Menshevik and Rykov's brother-in-law, knew Bukharin, who visited him as late as 1936. We know now that this is basically a work of fiction by Nikolaevsky, who then claimed it was based on his talks with Bukharin. But Getty recognized this in the main in 1979 or earlier:

Clearly, the "Letter" is a dubious source. (Dissertation 37; cf. discussion 33-38)

By 1985 Getty had reached a more categorical conclusion: the "Letter" is worthless.

Clearly, the "Letter" is a spurious source, and one should be at least circumspect and dubious about its claims. It represents only Nikolaevsky's collection of contradictory and unattributed rumors floating around Europe in the 1930s. (Origins 215)

The manifold contradictions and flaws in Nikolaevsky's material had been there for anyone to discern long before Getty wrote in the 1970s. They were there in the '60s, when Cohen, Conquest and others were writing. Evidently, though, like Orlov's, Nikolaevsky's utterly unreliable account was too tempting for anticommunists not to use it.

- Cohen also uses Menshevik sources like Theodore (Fyodor) Dan and publications like the Sotsialisticheskii Vestnik published in Paris, and Trotsky's Biulleten' oppozitsii. All were strongly biased and very far from the events in the USSR, though sometimes they received reports from their supporters inside the country. (Getty Origins 213-4).

As Getty had earlier suspected (Dissertation 32), Trotsky's personal communications, when opened to scholars in 1980, disclosed that Trotsky was lying when during the 1930s he denied he was in contact with his supporters within the USSR. In 2010 Sven-Eric Holmström showed that Trotsky lied several times about the "Hotel Bristol" incident, both to the Dewey Commission and in his Biulleten', and that Trotsky suborned one of his defence witnesses to lie about it as well.¹⁵ Trotsky had no incentive to be truthful; was far from events in the USSR; and frequently contradicted himself. As one who spent the last dozen years of his life excoriating Stalin, chief defendant in absentia at the Moscow Trials and, after 1937, a person demonized above all others within the USSR, Trotsky was hardly an objective observer.

¹⁵ Sven-Eric Holmström. "New Evidence Concerning the 'Hotel Bristol' Question in the First Moscow Trial of 1936." Cultural Logic 2008. At <https://ojs.library.ubc.ca/index.php/clogic/article/view/191568/188679>. See also Grover Furr. "Evidence of Leon Trotsky's Collaboration with Germany and Japan." Cultural Logic 2009, at <https://ojs.library.ubc.ca/index.php/clogic/article/view/191550/188662>.

Accusations That the Charges Were False

In addition to his uncritical use of dubious or worthless sources, Cohen makes many important assertions without evidence of any kind. For example, he simply declares that all the defendants at the three Moscow Trials, including Bukharin's, were innocent and that the charges brought against them were "false":

"... all of the criminal charges were false." (341); "false charges" (366); "false charges and bizarre confessions." (438)

He states "The confession of each [defendant], painfully extracted, was tailored to the bizarre indictment. Everything had again been rehearsed." (373) In the Russian translation Cohen's language is more forthright: "the confessions were extracted under torture" (441).

Cohen provides no evidence whatsoever for any of these sweeping statements. It would have been more forthright for him to have said something like this: "We have no evidence that these charges were false, but we are convinced that they were," and then give us his reasoning. Instead, Cohen commits the cardinal logical error of "begging the question" or "assuming that which is to be proven."

But the reason he did so is clear. Neither in the late 1960s and early 1970s when Cohen wrote, nor today with such formerly secret Soviet documents as have been released, do we have any evidence that the charges against the defendants were false. On the contrary: all the evidence now available strongly supports the hypothesis that the defendants at all the Moscow Trials were guilty of at least those crimes to which they confessed at trial. We'll return to this point below, as it is of major importance.

There's also the question of Cohen's use of the term "bizarre." This is a completely subjective description that says nothing about the charges at all. (Logically, it is the fallacy of incredulity: "I cannot believe it, therefore it must be false.") Many observers at the time did not think the charges "bizarre" at all. Cohen cites Harold Denny of The New York Times as one of them. We could add a great many more. Cohen's use of the adjective "bizarre" is a rhetorical ploy intended to justify dismissing without investigation all the testimony, including the confessions, in the transcripts of the three Moscow "Show Trials."

What kind of historical procedure is it to make claims that the charges against the defendants were "false" without any evidence that they were, or to label confessions "bizarre," as though that were some kind of objective statement about them, rather than about the person whose judgment this reflects? An utterly invalid historical method, of course.

Confessions

Confessions are important evidence in all legal systems. In American courts, most criminal cases are resolved by a "plea bargain" typically involving a confession by the accused person that he is in fact guilty of the crime to which is pleading guilty.

In the case of the Soviet Union in the 1930s writers, sometimes take the position that a confession by the accused is, somehow, prima facie evidence not of their guilt, but of their innocence, and, moreover, of the fact that they have been tortured or mistreated either to make a false confession or to sign a false confession written by the investigators. It's important to restate this obvious fact: in any jurisdiction, a confession to a crime by a suspect is prima facie evidence of guilt, not of innocence, torture, or fabrication.

By affirming this basic prima facie principle, we do not deny that false confessions are possible, or that they did not occur in the Soviet Union.

Nikolai Ezhov, head of the NKVD, and many of his assistants and investigators, were indeed accused, tried, and found guilty of fabricating confessions, torturing suspects to make false confessions, and other such abuses, and were executed for these crimes. We have letters to and from Politburo members who were horrified by such abuses and were investigating them and making appropriate arrests of investigators.

The Moscow Trials, including the March 1938 "Bukharin" Trial, proceeded mainly on the basis of confessions. Some material evidence was presented, although none of that material has been published.¹⁶ We do not know whether the prosecution had any other material evidence because the Russian government has kept all the investigative files secret to this day. We do know that, in the case of the military leaders tried and executed with Marshal Mikhail Tukhachevsky, some material evidence — a document from a Japanese military figure — did exist as late as the 1960s, because a secret report made to Nikita Khrushchev in 1964 cited some.¹⁷

¹⁶ There was some documentary evidence. For example, during the second Moscow Trial Prosecutor Andrei Vyshinskii produced a notebook with the Moscow phone number of a German agent and other incriminating annotations in it. The defendant Stroilov identified it and the phone numbers and other notation as his own. See Report of Court Proceedings in the case of the Anti-Soviet Trotskyite Centre Heard Before The Military Collegium of the Supreme Court of the U.S.S.R. Moscow, January 23-30, 1937. Verbatim Report. Moscow: People's Commissariat of Justice of the U.S.S.R., 1937, pp. 271-74. In the much shorter Russian transcript see pp. 108-9.

¹⁷ Khrushchev's investigators cited and quoted it, and then stated their belief that it had been "planted," i.e. was faked — a story that is full of contradictions and obviously itself a fabrication. We examine this document in another work under preparation.

This raises an obvious point. Material evidence can also be fabricated. So the presence, or lack, of material evidence, does not necessarily speak to the question of guilt or innocence of the accused. That is to say, even if material evidence were lacking — and in this case it is not — that fact would not itself be evidence that the accused were innocent, on the principle that "lack of evidence is not evidence of lack."¹⁸

¹⁸ "The phrase 'absence of evidence is not evidence of absence' can be used as a shorthand rebuttal to the second form of the ignorance fallacy ..."
<https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Argument_from_ignorance#Absence_of_evidence>.

In an interview with the German author Lion Feuchtwanger on January 8, 1937 Stalin spoke about the issue of the varying legal interpretations of the use of confessions, as he saw it.

Feuchtwanger. The transcript of the trial of Zinoviev and the others has been published. This account consists, in the main, of the confessions of the accused. Undoubtedly there exist other materials concerning this trial. Can't they also be published?

Stalin. What materials?

Feuchtwanger. The results of the preliminary investigation. Everything that demonstrates their guilt aside from their confessions.

Stalin. Among legal specialists there are two schools. One considers that the confession of the accused is the most significant evidence of their guilt. The Anglo-Saxon juridical school considers that material elements — knife, revolver, etc. — are insufficient to establish those guilty of a crime. The confession of the accused has greater significance.

There is also the German school. It concedes a preference to material evidence, but it also attributes importance to the confession of the accused. I don't understand why some people or writers abroad are not satisfied with the confession of the accused. Kirov was murdered — that's a fact. Zinoviev, Kamenev, and Trotsky were not present. But the people who committed this crime pointed to them as those who had instigated it. All of them are experienced conspirators — Trotsky, Zinoviev, Kamenev, et al. In such matters they do not leave documents behind. Their own people exposed them at face-to-face confrontations and then they had to admit their guilt.¹⁹

We have pointed out elsewhere that it was Bolshevik practice long before the 1930s not to write down elements of any serious conspiracy but to conduct all such conspiracy orally.²⁰

¹⁹ L. Maksimenkov. "Outlines of a 'nomenklatura' history of Soviet literature. Western pilgrims at Stalin's throne (Feuchtwanger and others)." Voprosy literatury 2 (2004).

<<http://magazines.russ.ru/voplit/2004/2/max13.html>>.

²⁰ Furr, "Evidence of Leon Trotsky's Collaboration with Germany and Japan." Cultural Logic 2009, pp. 29 ff. At <https://ojs.library.ubc.ca/index.php/clogic/article/view/191550/188662>.

"Aesopian language"

Cohen claims that Bukharin never really confessed to any crimes during his March 1938 Trial.

Briefly stated, his tactic would be to make sweeping confessions that he was "politically responsible" for everything, thereby at once saving his family and underlining his symbolic role, while at the same time flatly denying or subtly disproving his complicity in any actual crime. (376)

Cohen repeated this claim in 1996:

No less important, his prison writings confirm that — as I argued in my book and Stalin's biographer Robert C. Tucker had done earlier — Bukharin was not "broken" during his year in Lubyanka, and he did not actually "confess" at the trial. Instead, he ultimately agreed to participate in the grotesque spectacle in order to save his family and to speak publicly for the last time, in every Aesopian way available to him, about crucial, even anti-Stalinist, matters. ("To Be Preserved Forever," The Nation, Nov 27, 1995)

Cohen is perhaps more famous for this theory than for any other of his conclusions, even convincing at least one of the members of Gorbachev's "rehabilitation commission" in 1988.²¹ It is entirely false, as we shall see when we devote special study to it towards the end of this essay.

²¹ See Demichev's remark: "If one considers it carefully, in essence he denied all guilt." Reabilitatsiia. Kak Eto Bylo. Serekina 80-kh godov — 1991. Moscow: MDF, "Materik" 2004, p. 40.

The Refutation

We will examine one by one all the major factual assertions Cohen makes in his final chapter. The remarks above are intended to put our examination into context. They show the framework of which the "anti-Stalin" paradigm is composed, and the unreliability of the main sources Cohen employed in fleshing out a pseudo-history of Soviet politics and Bukharin's life during the 1930s.

Now, thanks to the partial opening of former Soviet archives to researchers, we are in a position to go further than negative criticism of Cohen's credulous and biased use of unreliable sources. We can begin to outline what really did happen.

The "Holodomor" — the Famine of 1932-33

"... the deliberately created famine of 1932-3" (339)

Cohen cites no evidence whatever, not even a footnote, to support this statement. Though due to long repetition many people still believe this story, few except pro-Nazi Ukrainian nationalists and hard-core Cold Warriors seriously argue it in print any longer.

Robert Conquest, whose 1986 book Harvest of Despair, paid for by these same Ukrainian nationalist groups, popularized the "man-made famine" fiction, now denies it was "man-made." According to Davies and Wheatcroft,

Our view of Stalin and the famine is close to that of Robert Conquest, who would earlier have been considered the champion of the argument that Stalin had intentionally caused the famine and had acted in a genocidal manner. In 2003, Dr. Conquest wrote to us explaining that he does not hold the view that 'Stalin purposely inflicted the 1933 famine. No. What I argue is that with resulting famine imminent, he could have prevented it, but put "Soviet interest" other than feeding the starving first — thus consciously abetting it'.²²

This was also true in the 1960s and 1970s, when Cohen was writing.²³

²² "Stalin and the Soviet Famine of 1932-33: A Reply to Ellman," Europe-Asia Studies 58, 4 (June 2006), p. 629.

²³ As for Conquest's charge of "abetting": Had the Soviet government ("Stalin") stopped industrialization to put all resources into famine relief, the famines would have continued every 2-3 years as they had done for a millennium. Mark Tauger of West Virginia University has done the best research on this subject. Much of this research may be downloaded at this own page: <<http://www.as.wvu.edu/history/Faculty/Tauger/soviet.htm>>. See also the October 2010 interview of Grover Furr by Georgian Times at <<http://www.geotimes.ge/index.php?home&newsid=22947>>, mirrored at <https://msuweb.montclair.edu/~furr/collectivization_geotimes1010.pdf>. The unfortunate title was added by the editors of Georgian Times.

Ten Million Peasants?

Hard upon the statement above Cohen claims that

[a]t least 10 million peasants, possibly many more, died as a direct result of collectivization, about half during the imposed famine of 1932-3. (339)

We have already dealt with the falsehood of the "imposed famine." The note to this statement informs us that the "10 million" figure comes from the following passage in Winston Churchill's Hinge of Fate. Here is the text in question:

"Tell me,' I asked, 'have the stresses of this war been as bad to you personally as carrying through the policy of the collective farms?'

"This subject immediately aroused the Marshal.

"Oh, no,' he said, 'the collective farm policy was a terrible struggle.'

"I thought you would have found it bad,' said I, 'because you were not dealing with a few score thousands of aristocrats or big landowners, but with millions of small men.'

"Ten millions,' he said, holding up his hands." "It was fearful. Four years it lasted. It was absolutely necessary for Russia, if we were to avoid periodic famines, to plough the land with tractors."²⁴

²⁴ Winston Churchill, The Hinge of Fate (Boston, 1950), p. 498.

Cohen has invidiously misconstrued this passage. Churchill said nothing at all about deaths. He spoke only of collectivization as an attempt undertaken by Stalin and his supporters to "avoid periodic famines." There is no basis to assume that the figure of ten million refers to those who died. Even a defender of the myth of the "Holodomor" like Stanislav Kul'chinskii (Ukraine) agrees:

If one reads this passage with care one finds that it is not a question only of those who perished....²⁵

²⁵ Kul'chinskii, S. "Skol'ko nas pogiblo ot golodomora 1933 goda?" ["How many of us died in the Holodomor of 1933?"]. Zerkalo nedeli, No. 45, November 23-29 2002, repr. At <<http://www.demoscope.ru/weekly/2003/0101/analit01.php>>.

Even assuming Churchill remembered this conversation accurately — and there is real uncertainty here as Churchill worked rapidly on these volumes with the aid of research assistants years after the fact — Churchill does not even claim that Stalin told him ten million peasants had died. Rather, Stalin said that there was "a terrible struggle" dealing with ten million peasants. According to V.N. Zemskov, a contemporary Russian researcher who is highly anticommunist, it seems as though the number of peasants "exiled" or sent away from their original homes did not exceed about 1,500,000 at any one time.²⁶

²⁶ V.N. Zemskov, «Sud'ba 'kulatskoi ssylki'". Otechestvennaia Istoriiia 1 (1994). At <http://www.tuad.nsk.ru/~history/Author/Russ/Z/Zemskov/Articles/kulaki2.html>.

Stalin's "Blood Purge" and "Three-Year Terror"

Stalin's blood purge of 1936-9 constituted the second, political stage of his revolution from above. The three-year terror mass arrests and executions — directed by Stalin and his personal coterie operating through the secret police, or NKVD... (340)

As we'll show in detail below, every statement here is wrong. There was no "blood purge of 1936-9." Officially speaking, "purges" (chistki) were reviews of Party membership intended to weed out the inactive, immoral, incapable, and disloyal. The different trials, arrests, and the mass repressions were something completely different. They unfolded gradually and unevenly, without any central direction and in response to the discovery of new conspiracies. To conflate the two is to confuse matters seriously.

Nor was there any "three-year terror." The really massive repressions took place from mid-1937 through almost the end of 1938, under Nikolai Ezhov, head of the NKVD. They were promoted by the First Secretaries, who claimed there were serious organized groups in their areas that needed to be dealt with in an emergency fashion, and by Ezhov himself, who was using his power to try to seize control of the state. Ezhov was clearly out of control for much of this period, and the repression ceased immediately after he was removed in late 1938. We have a large and ever-increasing number of primary sources that document this.²⁷

²⁷ See "Interrogations of Nikolai Ezhov, former People's Commissar for Internal Affairs," at <https://msuweb.montclair.edu/~furrgr/research/ezhovinterrogs.html>. For the views of one of us (Furr) in 2004-5 see Grover Furr, "Stalin and the Struggle for Democratic Reform. Part One," Cultural Logic 2005, <https://ojs.library.ubc.ca/index.php/clogic/article/view/191861/188830>, paragraphs 104 to end.

Nine Million Inmates

Prisons and remote concentration camps swelled to 9 million inmates by late 1939 (compared to 30,000 in 1928 and 5 million in 1933-5). (341)

These figures are many times too high. V.N. Zemskov, a leading anticommunist researcher of these figures, refers specifically to this passage, and has refuted them:

Here, for example, is S. Cohen (referring to the book by R. Conquest, The Great Terror, published in the USA in 1968): [sentence above quoted]... In reality, in January 1940 there were in the camps of the GULAG 1,334,408 prisoners, in the colonies of the GULAG — 314,584 and in prisons — 190,266 persons. In total, in camps, colonies and prisons there were 1,850,258 prisoners (Table 1, 2). That means that the statistics cited by R. Conquest and S. Cohen are exaggerated by almost a factor of five.²⁸

These figures are also found and discussed at more length in J. Arch Getty, Gabor T. Rittersporn, and Viktor N. Zemskov, "Victims of the Soviet Penal System in the Pre-war Years: A First Approach on the Basis of Archival Evidence."²⁹

²⁸ "GULAG (istoricheskii-sotsiologicheskii aspect). Sotsiologicheskie issledovanie 6-7 (1991). At <http://www.hrono.ru/statii/2001/zemskov.html>.

²⁹ American Historical Review 98,4 (Oct. 1993), pp. 1017-49.

How Many Party Members Executed?

Cohen claims that

[o]f its [the Party] 2.8 million full and candidate members in 1934, at least a million, anti-Stalinist and Stalinist alike, were arrested and two-thirds of them executed. (341)

This too is a gigantic exaggeration. In his 1968 book Communist Party membership in the U.S.S.R., 1917-1967 T.H. Rigby calculated that the maximum number of Party members who could have been "purged" between November 1936 and March 1939 was around 180,000 (212). This includes those who quit or were expelled for some reason — passivity, political illiteracy, etc. — as well as those who were arrested and tried.

Rigby's study had long been available when Cohen wrote his book. Cohen had a scholarly obligation to refer to it and inform his readers why he thought Rigby was wrong. This he failed to do.

Oleg Mozokhin, a researcher for the FSB, successor to the KGB, has published figures for the number of members and candidate members of the Party and of the Komsomol, the Party's youth organization, for 1937 and 1939.

| | |
|--|--------|
| 1937 | |
| Former members and candidate members arrested | 55,428 |
| Former members and candidate members of the Komsomol | 8,211 |
| Total | 63,639 |

| | |
|--|---------------------|
| 1939 | |
| Former members and candidate members arrested | 5,387 |
| Former members and candidate members of the Komsomol | 3,517 |
| Total | 8,904 ³⁰ |

³⁰ Oleg Mozokhin. "Statistika repressivnoi deiatel'nosti organov bezopasnosti SSSR na period s 1921 po 1940 gg. At http://www.rusproject.org/pages/analysis/analysis_3/statrepr1.html>;

Mozokhin, O. Pravo na repressii (Moscow-Zhukovskii: "Kuchkovo Pole," 2006) p. 338; 348.

Mozokhin has no Party breakdown for 1938. Since the total number of executions in 1937 and 1938 were similar³¹ we can assume that the total for that year was in the same range as that of 1937. This would suggest a total number of members and former members, candidates and former candidates, of both Party and Komsomol, at 136,000 arrested for all reasons during 1937-1939, the years of the "Ezhovshchina" (= "Bad Time of Ezhov") for which Conquest invented the sobriquet "the Terror." These figures correspond reasonably well with Rigby's figure for expulsions (see above) since many of those expelled would not have been arrested.

Available to us today but not to Cohen are the "Stalin lists," mainly of Party members to be tried. Corrected for duplicate entries they number roughly 40,000 names, by no means all of whom were executed.³²

If Cohen's statement had been accurate, it would have meant that at least 2/3 of a million Party members would have been executed during 1936-1939 (that this is the period in question is clear from the previous paragraph). In fact we have the total numbers of all arrested persons, from the study by Mozokhin (2005),³³

| | | |
|------|----------------------------------|-----------|
| 1936 | total number of persons arrested | 131,168 |
| 1937 | | 936,750 |
| 1938 | | 638,509 |
| 1939 | | 145,407 |
| | Total arrested persons 1936-1939 | 1,851,834 |

Here are the numbers of people executed during these years:

| | |
|------|---------|
| 1936 | 1,118 |
| 1937 | 353,074 |
| 1938 | 328,618 |
| 1939 | 2,601 |
| | |

1940 | 1,863

This means a total number of 685,411 people were sentenced to be executed during the period 1936-1939. This is not just Party members, but everybody! The total for 1937-38 is 681,692.³⁴

³¹ In fact the number executed in 1938 was about 7% lower than the 1937 figure; see below.

³² See "Vvedenie" (Introduction) at <http://www.memo.ru/history/vkvs/images/intro1.htm>.

³³ Oleg B. Mozokhin. "Statistika repressivnoi deiatel'nosti organov bezopasnosti SSSR na period s 1921 po 1940 gg." Originally on the FSB (successor to the KGB — NKVD) site at <http://fsb.ru/new/mozohin.html>; now available widely; cf. <http://stalinism.ru/Dokumentyi/Statistika-repressivnoy-deyatelnosti-OGPU-NKVD-1921-1940-g.html>. Cf. Mozokhin, Pravo na repressii. Vnesudebnye polnomochiia organov gosudarstvennoi bezopasnosti (1918-1953). Moscow-Zhukovskii: "Kuchkov Pole" (2006), pp. 331-50.

³⁴ Cohen did not take these totals and apply them to Party members alone. These figures were not published until the 1990s.

Getty makes a different calculation:

Based on the sources now available (which are probably incomplete) we can say that with Order No. 447 plus subsequent known limit increases, Moscow gave permission to shoot about 236,000 victims. We are fairly certain that some 386,798 persons were actually shot, leaving 151,716 people shot without currently documented central sanction either from the NKVD or the Politburo.⁷⁸

A note explains Getty's calculations thus:

⁷⁸ Calculated from Politburo protocols (special folders): RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, dd. 21-23; TsA FSB, collection of documents; Kokurin and Petrov, GULAG, 97-104; Samosudov, Bol'shoi terror, 160-61, 241; Nikolai Il'kevich, "Rasstreliany v Viaz'me: Novoe o M. N. Goretskom," Krai Smolenskii 1-2 (1994): 129-44; Shearer, "Crime and Social Disorder," 139-41; Moskovskie novosti, 21 June 1992; Izvestiia, 3 April 1996; and Khlevniuk, "Les mecanismes," 204-6. Nikita Petrov believes that additional increase permissions were given orally or by telegrams and puts the excess shooting figure at about thirty thousand (personal communication). Such evidence is not currently available to researchers.

The discrepancy between Mozokhin's and Getty's figures may be that the NKVD figures are for the whole years 1937 and 1938, while Getty's are from the issuance of Order No. 00447, issued on July 30, 1937 but part of an operation to regularize repression that began around July 3, 1937 (Getty, Excesses 127; Getty refers to this as No. 447), and that lasted until Order No. 00447 had been rescinded on November 17, 1938 but in practice some time later than that (Getty, Excesses 134). Other operations, especially the "nationalities" operations during which Ezhov and his men executed a huge number of people, are not counted as part of the total for Order No. 00447.

In any case even Mozokhin's figures, the higher of these two sets, apply to all persons in the USSR rather than just to Party members. All the data we have shows that Cohen's statement is vastly exaggerated. Even if all forty thousand people in the so-called "shooting lists" were Party members and all had been executed — and we know that many were not — that would still be only 6% of the 2/3 million Cohen claimed.³⁵

³⁵ We insist that to scrutinize these figures carefully and to insist on accuracy concerning the numbers of people arrested or executed is not in any way to "justify" or to "make light" of those actual repressions and executions that did take place. The evidence is that Ezhov and his men were killing as many Soviet citizens as they could. See "Interrogations of Nikolai Ezhov, former People's Commissar for Internal Affairs," cited at note 27 above.

Charges at Trials False?

"Elaborated most fully at three show trials of old Bolsheviks ... all of the criminal charges were false."¹⁶ (341)

Cohen's footnote to this statement reads as follows:

¹⁶ As has been acknowledged by the Soviet government since Stalin's death. For the charges against Bukharin, see Vsesoiuznoe soveshchanie, p. 298.

This statement is false. At the time of Cohen's writing the Soviet government had not "acknowledged" that all the criminal charges against all the defendants at all the three Moscow trials were false! The Soviet government did not make that claim until late in Gorbachev's day. As we have shown elsewhere, these governmental "acknowledgements," when they did come, were anything but objective evidence. Rather, they were politically motivated pronouncements, some of them demonstrably fabrications, and ought to be treated with critical skepticism by historians and others.³⁶

³⁶ We have examined Bukharin's falsified "rehabilitation" report by the Soviet Supreme Court of February 4, 1988, in Grover Furr and Vladimir Bobrov, 1937. Pravosudie Stalina. Obzhalovaniiu ne podlezhit! Moscow: Iauza-Eksmo, 2010 pp., Chapter 2, "Reabilitatsionnoe moshenichestvo" ["The Rehabilitation Deception"], 64-84. This report is still top-secret in Russia today, so the publishers of our book decided not to print it. We hope to publish this report and our article in English in the near future.

The reference to the Soviet book is also misleading. It is to a talk by Piotr Pospelov, at that time the director of the Institute of Marxism-Leninism. Pospelov had been editor of Pravda and later a close associate of Nikita Khrushchev's. It was Pospelov who wrote the first draft of Khrushchev's "Secret Speech" of 1956, in which, as we have shown elsewhere, virtually every statement about Stalin and Beria is false.³⁷ What follows is a brief examination of the source Cohen quotes above.

³⁷ Furr, Khrushchev Lied.

At an historians' conference in December 1962 Pospelov answered a question from the audience in the form of a written note, in this way.

Later in this same note it says: "Students are asking whether Bukharin and the rest were spies for foreign governments, and what you advise us to read."

I can declare that it is sufficient to study carefully the documents of the 22nd Congress of the CPSU to say that neither Bukharin, nor Rykov, of course, were spies or terrorists.³⁸

³⁸ Vsesoiuznoe soveshchanie o merakh uluchsheniia podgotovki nauchopedagogicheskikh kadrov po istoricheskim naukam. 18-21 dekabria 1962 g. Moscow: "Nauka," 1964, p. 298.

Pospelov was using "weasel words" — words that are literally correct but intended to create a false impression. In the 1938 Trial, Bukharin and Rykov were not convicted of carrying out espionage themselves, but of being leaders in the "bloc of Rights and Trotskyites" that did engage in espionage activities. Likewise both Bukharin and Rykov were convicted of recruiting others to engage in acts of violence against others — the best Russian translation here of the word "terror," which means something quite different in English — but not of engaging in it themselves.

Therefore Pospelov's words are correct in the sense most readers will understand — that a "spy" is someone who himself spies, and a terrorist someone who himself commits acts of terror. But Pospelov is misleading insofar as he wishes his audience to understand that their confessions and the verdict against them were wrong. Furthermore, the question was about "Bukharin and the rest" — presumably, all the other defendants in the 1938 Trial, whereas Pospelov restricted his answer to Bukharin and Rykov only.

And it ought to have been obvious to Cohen as it surely was to Pospelov's audience that Pospelov pointedly refused to answer the questioner's request for recommendations of sources to read. "Read the speeches at the 22nd Party Congress!" means: We are not going to allow you to read any of the materials related to the Bukharin case!

Any reader might wonder: Why not? Those who speak the truth have nothing to hide. Unless what might be found there would compromise the Khrushchevite line on Bukharin, Stalin, and maybe more. As we know today, the latter is the case.

As we know for a fact today, but anyone might have guessed in 1973, Pospelov "knew where the bodies were buried." He had prepared the historical report and first draft of Khrushchev's famous 1956 "Secret Speech." Therefore he knew that it was not just full of lies about Stalin and the history of his day — it was nothing but lies! This has been demonstrated in the recent book by one of the present authors (Furr 2011).

Elsewhere we have examined all the evidence concerning Bukharin.³⁹ There is no evidence extant today to clear Bukharin of these charges; to refute the charges made against him by others at the trial; or to refute his own repeated confessions — repeated, we may add, in his two secret Appeals to the Soviet Supreme Court after his conviction, which were published in the 1990s.

Furr and Bobrov, "Nikolai Bukharin's First Statement of Confession in the Lubianka." Cultural Logic 2007. At <https://ojs.library.ubc.ca/index.php/cllogic/article/view/191745/188745>. This article was first published in Russian in the St. Petersburg journal Klio No. 1 (36), 2007, pp. 38-54. At <https://msuweb.montclair.edu/~furr/research/furnbobrov_klio0107.pdf>.

Therefore although it is true that Pospelov implied Bukharin and Rykov had been innocent, any careful reading of this passage reveals its essential dishonesty. This is as close to their "rehabilitation" as the Soviet authorities came until Gorbachev took up the question again twenty-five years later.

Then as now, and contrary to ubiquitous claims that the defendants were coerced into giving false testimony, there has never been any evidence that the confessions of any of the Moscow Trial defendants were false. Khrushchev and his associates had declared many of the defendants innocent. But we can now see that the Khrushchev-era "rehabilitation studies" were done fraudulently — at least, as regards the defendants at the three public trials (here called "show trials").⁴⁰ There is excellent evidence today, from former Soviet archives, that the defendants were in fact guilty.

⁴⁰ These "rehabilitation reports" are analyzed in Furr 2011.

In any case it is pertinent to ask why Cohen, or any historian, should have simply "believed" the Soviet government in this case. Did they "believe" the Stalin government? Of course not! Then why "believe" the Khrushchev regime?

The answer seems to be something like this: "Accept the claims of the Soviet government, or memoirists, or just about anybody — if those claims support the acceptable paradigm that Stalin was a mass murderer responsible for horrible crimes." This is not historical research — an attempt to find, gather, and interpret the evidence in an unbiased manner. Rather it is an attempt to find any plausible document that supports one's preconceived idea. Start with the desired conclusion — Bukharin was "innocent" — and amass anything that appears to support it. It is another example of "begging the question" by assuming that which ought to be proven.

As Getty pointed out, even when Cohen was writing, long before the end of the USSR some memoirists' works had been published that claimed that opposition groups did exist; that the Military commanders tried and executed were guilty but that others escaped detection. But these sources were, and remain, rarely cited. Why? It is hard to avoid the conclusion that this is so because these accounts do not bolster the dominant paradigm, but rather complicate and threaten to undermine it.⁴¹

⁴¹ Getty cites Girgory Tokaev, Betrayal of an Ideal, 1955 and A. Svetlanin, Dal'nevostochnyi Zagovor (Frankfurt, 1953). Origins of the Great Purges p. 267 n. 22. Elsewhere Getty has also cited Tokaev, Comrade X (1956).

"Moderates in the Politburo"

In addition to assuming, without any evidence, the innocence of the defendants at the Moscow Trials Cohen's chapter relies on a number of other false assumptions. One is the notion that Stalin was long challenged by a group of "moderates" in the Politburo.

. . . by 1933 a muted but fateful struggle over policy had developed between what may be termed moderates and Stalinists in the Politburo itself . . . (342)

There is no evidence even today that there was a "moderate bloc" in the Politburo who opposed Stalin (Getty, Politics of Repression, 131). More to the point: there was no evidence of such a bloc when Cohen wrote either! Cohen simply took this idea uncritically from Nikolaevsky and made it central to his interpretation of events in the 1930s.

Nikolaevsky didn't have evidence to support any of this. He either made it up or reported rumors in the émigré community in Western Europe. Obviously Nikolaevsky knew he didn't know for sure about any "bloc" of "moderates," so he sometimes made other claims. For instance, as Getty explains:

Nicolaevsky (through the "Letter") tagged Kirov as a "moderate," but at the very time that Bukharin was ending his visit to Paris [1936 — GF], Nicolaevsky was publishing in Sotsialisticheskii vestnik an account of how Kirov and Kaganovich formed a "hard-line" bloc against the "liberalism" of Stalin, Molotov, Voroshilov, and others in the Politburo! There were other stories about how Kirov was "conservative." (Getty, Origins 215; cf Dissertation 36-7)⁴²

⁴² The original Russian-language text of "From a Letter of an Old Bolshevik" is at <<http://lib.ru/HISTORY/FELSHTINSKY/buharin.txt>>, "Appendix" (Prilozhenie) 7. The original edition is Sotsialisticheskii Vestnik No. 23-4, Dec. 22, 1936, pp.22-33; ibid., no. 1-2, Jan. 17, 1937, pp. 17-24. It was later published as The Letter of an Old Bolshevik: A Key to the Moscow Trials (London, 1938), and in Boris Nicolaevsky, Power and the Soviet Elite: "The Letter of an Old Bolsheviks" and Other Essays (New York, 1965).

Cohen should have noticed this contradiction too. In short, Nikolaevsky was an irresponsible falsifier and this was obvious at the time. Nonetheless, he was a ferocious anticommunist and a leading Menshevik who became one of the founders of "Soviet studies" in the West. As such Nikolaevsky was a kind of icon before whom anticommunist researchers paid their obeisance. Cohen did likewise.

Most of Cohen's references to the supposed "moderates" are very general ones. For example:

Bukharin's relationship with the emerging moderate faction in the leadership . . . (353)

Politburo moderates . . . saved . . . three of Bukharin's personal protégés [in the Riutin affair]; moderates were beginning to assert themselves on larger questions of policy . . . (354)

When on occasion Cohen attributes some specific act to these supposed "moderates" we can often prove he was wrong and sometimes even document what really happened. For example, Cohen states that Bukharin's appointment to chief editor of Izvestiia was "dramatic evidence of the moderates' progress" (355).

In reality Bukharin's promotion to editor of Izvestiia was just one of a number of examples of Stalin's reaching out to former oppositionists at or shortly after the time of the 17th Party Congress of January 1934, when Zinov'ev, Kamenev, Preobrazhensky, and Uglanov were also restored to the Party, and Bukharin made a major speech at the Congress. By August 1935, Stalin was considering Bukharin and Radek for the editorship of the journal of the Foreign Ministry Journal de Moscou (Stalin-Kaganovich No. 597 & No. 618). Rather than "moderates" making gains in opposition to the "Stalinists," the available evidence makes it clear that it was Stalin who was in fact acting "moderately" by supporting the rise of Bukharin, Zinoviev, and others.

More on the "Moderates": Ordzhonikidze

Politburo opponents of the terror, notably Ordzhonikidze and probably the Ukrainians Kosior, Chubar and Pavel Postyshev, now began their last resistance. . . . They moved to save Bukharin and Rykov. . . . (368)

This statement is a complete fabrication. Nothing of the kind occurred. Moreover, we have evidence that Ordzhonikidze did not "resist" — meaning, oppose — the arrests of those charged with conspiratorial activity. For example, we know that Ordzhonikidze spoke personally to Piatakov while the latter was in detention. Piatakov repeated his confessions of guilt to Ordzhonikidze, who believed them (Getty and Naumov 283-84; 290; 292).

Bukharin's wife Larina describes the way she remembers Bukharin having described it to her:

Second to face Bukharin was Yury Pyatakov. For his adherence to the Trotskyist Opposition in the past, he had been briefly expelled from the Party. Later, at the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Party congresses, he was elected to the Central Committee and served until his arrest. In recent years, Pyatakov had worked as Sergo Ordzhonikidze's assistant in the Commissariat of Heavy Industry. Since the work there was by definition concerned with industrialization, Pyatakov's unique detail, and chief point, was the accusation of wrecking. . . . Pyatakov spoke with lowered head, trying to cover his eyes with his palm. . . . Sergo Ordzhonikidze, peering intently at Pyatakov in amazement, distressed by the tortured look and improbable confessions of his hardworking aide, put his hand up to his ear (Sergo was hard of hearing) and asked, "Can your testimony really be voluntary?"

Pyatakov answered, "My testimony is voluntary."

"Absolutely voluntary?" asked Ordzhonikidze in still greater amazement, but there was no reply.⁴³

⁴³ Anna Larina. This I Cannot Forget. The Memoirs of Nikolai Bukharin's Widow. New York: Norton, 1993, p. 312.

The transcript of this same face-to-face interview with the imprisoned Piatakov, at which Bukharin and Ordzhonikidze were present along with Voroshilov, Ezhov and Stalin, and where they questioned the accused, was published in 2002. It took place in December 1936. In it Ordzhonikidze expressed no amazement at Piatakov's testimony, nor did he ask whether Piatakov's testimony was truthful. Instead Ordzhonikidze asked Piatakov such questions as: "In which year did you begin your [Trotskyist] work?" [Answer: since returning from Berlin in 1932, where Piatakov had met with Sedov, Trotsky's son.] "You have been a saboteur in the People's Commissariat of Heavy Industry all these years?" "Did you plant many saboteurs in industry?"⁴⁴

⁴⁴ "Stenogrammy ochnykh stavok v TsK VKP(b). Dekabr' 1936 goda." Voprosy Istorii 4 (2002), pp. 3-12.

Either Larina, convinced not only of her husband's but also of Piatakov's innocence, misremembered what Bukharin had told her, or Bukharin had misinformed her in the first place. We know that Ordzhonikidze could not have been surprised at Piatakov's testimony in December 1936 because Ordzhonikidze was already convinced of Piatakov's guilt three months earlier.

From Piatigorsk to L.M. Kaganovich, the CC of the VKP(b)

11 September 1936

AM IN FULL AGREEMENT WITH POLITBURO'S [proposed] DECREE TO EXPEL [Piatakov] FROM CC OF VKP(B) AND ON INCOMPATIBILITY WITH HIS RETAINING HIS MEMBERSHIP IN VKP(B) IN THE FUTURE. I VOTE "YES."

Ordzhonikidze (Getty and Naumov 290)

Ordzhonikidze's speech to a meeting of heads of the chief directorates of the Commissariat for Heavy Industry on February 5, 1937 reflects his complete acceptance of Piatakov's admission of guilt (Getty and Naumov 292-4) and determination that saboteurs discovered in the future must be shot as Piatakov had already been by that date.

The criminals have been caught, they have been shot. If there are more criminals in the future, they too shall be caught. We shall shoot all the swine that we can find . . .

Who could imagine that Piatakov could be a saboteur, and yet he turned out to be a saboteur, and, more still, a fine talker. He told [the investigators] how he did it.

Ordzhonikidze then reveals that the Central Committee had reproached him for being too quick to punish without a hearing for those whom Piatakov had named.

You saw the unhappy Todorsky when that scoundrel [Piatakov] named him. We kicked him out of the party, and the CC gave me a solid thrashing for daring to expel him from the party.

Look now how the CC of our party values its officials. Why should a person who has been sentenced to be shot have any apparent reason to name names? And yet, at the last minute he names Todorsky. Why should he⁴⁵ lie? Take him away, throw him in prison. Not only did the CC not do so, it even reprimanded the party organization for having expelled a person from the party. You see how attentive it is to each and every person. (Getty and Naumov 292)

⁴⁵ Getty and Naumov supposed that the person referred to here was Piatakov. In reality, according to the transcript of the January 1937 Moscow Trial, the person referred to was Rataichak, another defendant employed in the Commissariat of Heavy Industry along with Piatakov. See 1937 Trial, 420.

Postyshev

Far from a moderate, Postyshev was one of the most bloodthirsty in killing party members. Getty and Naumov's study devotes a number of pages to documenting this. (498-517) In passages from the January 1938 Central Committee Plenum not in Getty and Naumov but published in Russian Stalin evaluated Postyshev's methods this way:

This is the massacre of the organization. They are very easy on themselves, but they're shooting everybody in the raion [= district] organizations. . . . This means stirring up the party masses against the CC, it can't be understood any other way. 46

⁴⁶ Khlevniuk, Oleg V. ed. Stalinskoe Politbiuro v 30-e gody, p. 164. See fuller discussion in Furr, Khrushchev Lied, pp. 282-88.

For a final point concerning Cohen's "moderates," we note that he spoke of "Central Committee opponents of the terror who were gathering for their 'last stand'" (369). This introduces Cohen's discussion of the February-March 1937 Central Committee Plenum, about which we now know a great deal and which Cohen got completely wrong. We'll discuss this in more detail below.

Riutin

Cohen claimed that Stalin "demanded Riutin's (and possibly his collaborators') execution" (344). There has never been any evidence for this statement, which comes straight from Nikolaevsky's imagination in the "Letter." As Getty puts it,

The supposed contents of the Riutin platform, Stalin's advocacy in the Politburo of the death penalty for Riutin (and the opposition of Kirov and others to it) and the general 'moderation' of Kirov and others (vs. Stalin) all originate in this document. (Dissertation 34)

In a note to this passage Getty continues:

In an interview with Severyn Bialer and Jane Zagoria, Nicolaevsky never indicated which parts of the "Letter" came from Bukharin, Charles Rappoport (a French communist), other sources, or from Nicolaevsky. Cohen and others nonetheless accept the "Letter" as a valid source. (Dissertation 64, n.57)

The passage from the "Letter" is as follows:

Riutin, who at that time was in exile or in an "isolator," where he had worked out his plan, was brought to Moscow. Upon examination, he admitted the authorship. As an old Party leader who had rendered eminent service to the Party, he came within the classification of those who, in accordance with Lenin's commandment, could not possibly receive the death penalty. The question was, therefore, considered by the Politburo, because the OGPU (naturally, at Stalin's wish) had demanded his execution.

The discussions in the Politburo were heated. Stalin was in favor of granting the OGPU's demand. His strongest argument was a reference to the growth of terrorist sentiment among young people, particularly in the Komsomol (Young Communist League). Reports of the OGPU were replete with stories of terroristic talk among young workers and students. Moreover, quite a number of terroristic acts against minor Soviet officials and Party officers had become known. Against such terrorists the Party did not shrink from resorting to the "supreme penalty," even when it was a question of members of the Komsomol, Stalin maintaining that it was politically illogical and unjust to administer such severe punishment to those who performed terroristic acts while sparing those whose political propaganda had inspired these acts. He recommended that no undue attention be given to the small fry, but that the Politburo go straight to the root and cause of the matter. Riutin's program, Stalin said, was a direct justification of and an apology for the necessity of murdering him.

I can no longer recall the actual division of opinion in the Politburo when this question was being considered. I know only that Kirov spoke with particular force against recourse to the death penalty. Moreover, he succeeded in winning over the Politburo to this view. Stalin was prudent enough not to push matters to an open conflict. Riutin's life was thus spared.⁴⁷

⁴⁷ Boris I. Nicolaevsky. Power and the Soviet Elite. "The Letter of an Old Bolshevik" and Other Essays. Hoover Institution — Praeger: New York and Washington, 1965, pp. 29-30.

Even if Bukharin had been the source of these rumors, as Nikolaevsky dishonestly suggested, Getty has pointed out that he couldn't possibly have heard any such discussions (Origins, 215).

We know now that the "Riutin platform" was modeled on an earlier platform that Bukharin had written, and that Riutin had not, in fact, written it. In his first confession of June 2, 1937 Bukharin stated:

The Riutin group was supposed to conceal the fact that the platform was the platform of the whole Rightist organization taken together: this was a pseudonym under which the organization of the Rights presented itself, a pseudonym that protected the center and the organization as a whole from attack.⁴⁸

⁴⁸ Furr and Bobrov, "Nikolai Bukharin's 's First Statement of Confession in the Lubianka." Cultural Logic 2007. At <https://ojs.library.ubc.ca/index.php/clogic/article/view/191745/188745>, p. 30. Originally published as "Pervye priznatel'nye pokazaniia N.I. Bukharina na Lubianke." Klio (St. Petersburg) 1 (36), 2007, p. 49.

In this same statement Bukharin said that Nikolaevsky had already known about this platform from Rykov. Bukharin, as well as Zelenskii and Ikramov, and other defendants, reaffirmed these statements about the Riutin platform at the March 1938 trial.

Cohen states that the "Riutin affair dates Stalin's determination to rid himself of all such restraints . . ." (344). This is also asserted in Na kolenni ne vstanu (1992), a volume dedicated to Riutin and polemically hostile to Stalin (p.37). But this claim is not documented at all, in contrast to many other assertions in this volume, but instead is treated as "common knowledge." Getty says this rumor is "unsubstantiated," "appears to have originated in Paris," and is recorded in Nikolaevsky, Power and the Soviet Elite. (Getty and Naumov 54) Cohen cites Medvedev and Conquest here, who also have no documentary basis for their statements.

Kirov's Murder

"That Stalin plotted the murder [of Kirov] . . . is no longer seriously in doubt." (346)

On the contrary! There is absolutely no reason to believe that Stalin was involved in Kirov's assassination in any way. Getty has a brief explanation of the many studies that have tried, and failed, to prove this on the H-RUSSIA mailing list of August 24, 2000.⁴⁹ Even adherents to the mainstream "anti-Stalin" paradigm have begun to abandon the "Stalin-killed-Kirov" story even though this gets them compared to "Holocaust deniers" by the likes of Robert Conquest and Amy Knight, who will have none of it.⁵⁰ The main specialist on the Kirov assassination in Russia is Alla Kirilina whose book Neizvestniy Kirov, "The Unknown Kirov,"⁵¹ includes her earlier work Rikoshet. Kirilina rejects the "Stalin-did-it" theory, though she embraces the new "mainstream" view that Nikolaev, Kirov's assassin, acted alone.

⁴⁹ At <<http://tinyurl.com/hjput>>.

⁵⁰ See Matthew Lenoë, "Did Stalin Kill Kirov and Does It Matter?" JMH 74 (June 2002) pp. 352-80, and now his book The Kirov Murder and Soviet History (Yale U.Press 2010). For the Holocaust denial accusations see p. 379 of his article.

⁵¹ St. Petersburg / Moscow, "Neva"/ "Olma-Press", 2001.

A brief recent summary of all this is Igor' Pykhalov, "Vystrel v Smol'nom."⁵² Pykhalov is cautious, concluding that Kirov's assassin, Nikolaev, probably acted alone. However, the primary source evidence contained in Matthew Lenoë's recent book, combined with that in Alla Kirilina's earlier study, the confessions of Genrikh Iagoda published in 1997 and archival documents now available, provide very strong evidence that Kirov's assassination was indeed the act of an opposition conspiracy essentially as described in the transcript of the Third Moscow Trial of March 1938, the "Bukharin trial."⁵³

⁵² Spetsnaz Rossii December 2004. At <<http://www.specnaz.ru/article/?621>>; reprinted at <http://www.zlev.ru/53_18.htm>.

⁵³ We are preparing a study of the Kirov murder, including a detailed critique of both Lenoe's and Kirilina's books, for publication in the near future.

"In the years to come tens of thousands would be shot as conspiratorial accomplices in Kirov's assassination . . ." (346)

Cohen offers no evidence at all for this statement, and we have none today. Neither Soviet nor today's Russian authorities have ever released the investigative files on Kirov's assassination nor permitted even trusted scholars to study them. Nevertheless, the material published since the end of the USSR points to the membership of Kirov's assassin, Nikolaev, in an underground Zinov'evite opposition, itself connected to the broader Opposition conspiracies involving the defendants at all three Moscow Trials.⁵⁴

And this is without taking into account either the Trial testimony or the pre-trial interrogations of Iagoda, some of the latter of which we now have. Iagoda makes a differentiated confession concerning Kirov's murder. Iagoda confessed to giving his consent and protection to acts of assassination but insisted that he did not know about the specific assassination of Kirov in advance. He did say that Enukidze had spoken to him about the need to assassinate Kirov and that he had agreed not to stand in the way. But Iagoda firmly reiterated that he had not facilitated it in any active way.⁵⁵ We also now have pretrial interrogations of Kamenev (August 10, 1936) and of Zinov'ev (July 28, 1936), both of whom claimed prior knowledge of the Kirov assassination.⁵⁶ Those who continue to hold to the "lone assassin" theory simply ignore all this evidence — as they must do, if the anti-Stalin paradigm of Soviet history is to be rescued.⁵⁷

⁵⁴ "Protokol doprosa I.I. Kotolynova. 12 dekabria 1934 goda"; "Protokol doprosa L. Nikolaeva. 13 dekabria 1934 goda." Lubianka. Stalin I VChK-GPU-OGPU-NKVD. Ianvar' 1922 — dekabr' 1936. Moscow: IDF "Materik" 2003, Nos. 481 and 482, pp. 577-79. A note (819) claims that the first confession was falsified by NKVD man Agranov, but there is no evidence of this.

⁵⁵ Genrikh Iagoda. Narkov vnutrennikh del SSSR. General'nyi Komissar Gosudarstvennoi Bezopasnosti. Sbornik dokumentov. (Kazan' 1997), pp. 121-22; 180-81.

⁵⁶ Volkogonov Archive, Library of Congress.

⁵⁷ See Matthew Lenoë, "Khrushchev Era Politics and the Investigation of the Kirov Murder, 1956-1957." Acta Slavica Iaponica 24 (2007) 47-73; Lenoë, "Key to the Kirov Murder on the Shelves of Hokkaido University Library." Annual Newsletter of the Slavic Research Center, Hokkaido University No. 13 (2006), at <http://src-h.slav.hokudai.ac.jp/eng/news/no13/enews13-essay3.html>; and now his book The Kirov Murder and Soviet History (Yale University Press 2010). Lenoë simply ignores the documents from Lubianka 1 (2003) and Genrikh Iagoda (1997) though they were long available by the time he wrote. Lenoë also takes the propaganda statement of Genrikh S. Liushkov, an NKVD general who defected to Japan in June 1938, at face value. But Lenoë hides from his readers the fact that Liushkov privately assured the Japanese that real conspiracies against the Stalin government existed, including a real military conspiracy. He also conceals the fact that Liushkov wrote his article about the Kirov assassination while working for the propaganda division of the Japanese army.

The Issue of Confessions

What of the trial confessions and, now, these pretrial interrogation-confessions? Is it possible that they were made as a result of some kind of compulsion — threats, torture, etc.? Anything is "possible" — but historians demand evidence and we have no evidence that they were. Iagoda confessed that he promised to try to obtain leniency for Zinov'ev and Kamenev if they did not expose his own role and then made sure they were swiftly executed so they could not implicate him.

Cohen had edited the transcript of the March 1938 Bukharin Trial, which included Iagoda. Certainly he had read the abbreviated trial transcript of the Zinov'ev-Kamenev Trial in August 1936, a large part of which is dedicated to the rehearsal of the details of the planning of Kirov's assassination by the defendants.⁵⁸ Had Cohen examined these accounts and then stated the obvious — that they might have been made under duress and that, like any piece of evidence, there are different possible interpretations of this evidence and they should not be simply taken at face value — he would have acted correctly. Evidence should never be simply "believed." Nor, however, should it be simply "disbelieved" — which is the same thing — without evidence that it has been falsified. Cohen didn't have any, and we still don't today.

⁵⁸ The abbreviated transcript of this trial was published as a book in English but only in official newspapers in the Soviet Union. Our version is from Pravda August 20-23 1936.

To ignore this testimony is to take the view that an historian can follow his or her own biases and discount whatever evidence he or she wants to, on the grounds that it might have been falsified, while welcoming other evidence that is consistent with his preconceived views or paradigm. The totality of evidence must always be considered. Cohen did not even try to do so.

Avel' Enukidze

Cohen claims that Avel' Enukidze "disappeared from the scene" "as a victim of Stalin's intrigue in January 1935" (346) But lot of evidence concerning Enukidze has been published since the end of the USSR. All of it points towards his guilt. The most authoritative study of this affair, that by Russian historian IUrii Zhukov, also concludes that Enukidze and others in the so-called "Kremlin Affair" were guilty of plotting against the government.⁵⁹

⁵⁹ "Tainy 'Kremlevskogo dela' i sud'ba Avelia Enukidze," Voprosy Istorii 2000, No. 9, pp. 83-113.

We now have transcripts of two pretrial interrogation-confessions of Enukidze.⁶⁰ We also have the texts of several pretrial interrogations of Genrikh Iagoda, former NKVD chief, who inculpates Enukidze as well as many of the defendants in the three Moscow Trials. We will look closely at some of this material below.

⁶⁰ Lubianka ... 1937-1938, No. 60, pp. 144-56; online at <<http://www.alexanderyakovlev.org/fond/issues-doc/61041>> Genrikh Iagoda No. 166, pp. 508-517. Iagoda's interrogations published in 1997 are online at <<http://stalinism.ru/dokumenty/protokolyi-doprosov-yagodyi.html>>.

Cohen blames Stalin for the deaths of Kuibyshev and Gorky in January 1935 and June 1936 (346).

. . . Kuibyshev by a mysterious death the same month, the influential writer Maxim Gorky probably murdered in June 1936 . . . (346)

But in pretrial interrogations now published, Genrikh Iagoda admits to having had four men murdered: Menzhinsky, head of the OGPU and Iagoda's immediate superior; V.V. Kuibyshev, Maxim Gorky, and Gorky's son Maxim Peshkov:

Answer: I affirm that, besides Marx, in the same manner and on my instructions were put to death V.P. Menzhinsky, V.V. Kuibyshev and A.M Gorky. I wish to note that, though only I am guilty in the death of Menzhinsky, but the deaths of V.V. Kuibyshev and A.M. Gorky were organized on the direct order of the united center of the Right-Trotskyite organization, which order was personally delivered to me by A.S. Enukidze, member of that center.

— Interrogation No. 7, December 28, 1937, in Genrikh Iagoda p. 209.

Answer: Both Levin and Enukidze spoke to me about this. Levin came to see me the following day after his talk with Enukidze and stated that now all was clear to him, that he asked me once again to summon Pletnev in order to save himself any superfluous talks with him. Enukidze informed me of this conversation as follows: He asked Levin whom he was treating and who among the members of the Politburo was ill. It turned out that Levin was supervising the care of Kuibyshev. Enukidze proposed that Levin set about preparing Kuibyshev's demise.

Aside from that, Enukidze informed me at the same time that the center of the organization considered it essential to prepare the death of A.M. Gorky in the same manner, and that the assignment in relation to him had also been given to Levin. In the interests of truthfulness I must say that this statement of Enukidze's astonished me. "What does Gorky have to do with this?" — I asked.

From Enukidze's answer I understood the following: the united center of the Right-Trotskyite organization, during a long period, had attempted to win over Gorky and detach him from his closeness to Stalin. Towards this end Kamenev, Tomsky, and a number of others had been assigned to Gorky. But this did not produce any real results. Gorky remained close to Stalin as before and a warm supporter and defender of his line. In any serious consideration of the question of the overthrow of the Stalinist leadership and seizure of power by the Rights and Trotskyites, the center could not help but take into account Gorky's exceptional influence in the country and his authority abroad.

If Gorky remained alive he would raise his voice of protest against us. We could not permit that. Therefore the united center became convinced that it was impossible to separate Gorky from Stalin and was compelled to reach the decision that Gorky would have to be liquidated. I was assigned to carry out this decision through the doctors who were treating Gorky. My attempts to protest did not achieve their results: Enukidze proposed to undertake the execution of the center's decision. After a few days I called Levin to my office and once again confirmed to him what Enukidze had already told me beforehand.⁶¹

⁶¹ Interrogation No. 7, December 28, 1937, Genrikh Iagoda pp. 212-3. For a discussion of these confessions and evidence that they are accepted even by the most anticommunist scholars today see Furr, "Evidence of Leon Trotsky's Collaboration with Germany and Japan." Cultural Logic 2009, <https://ojs.library.ubc.ca/index.php/cllogic/article/view/191550/188662> at p. 140 ff. and n. 92, p. 140.

Dr. Pletnev

The accuracy and truthfulness of Iagoda's testimony can be verified by the confessions and post-trial letters of Dr. D.D. Pletnev, a secondary defendant in the March 1938 "Bukharin" trial. At his trial Pletnev admitted to having been recruited to the conspiracy to murder out of fear of Iagoda's threats. In a face-to-face confrontation with Iagoda arranged by the police on January 5, 1938 and published in 1997 Iagoda confirmed that he had not told Pletnev about the conspiracy to murder Kuibyshev and Gorky.⁶²

⁶² 1938 Trial 590-597; Genrikh Iagoda 227-230.

Pletnev claimed he did not know about the conspiracy until the trial and was recruited by Iagoda through threats and blackmail alone.⁶³ Iagoda had confirmed the latter and the Soviet court believed Pletnev. Prosecutor Vyshinsky's questioning makes it clear that Pletnev's real crime was that he failed to alert the authorities about Iagoda's plot even after Iagoda himself had been arrested and was no longer a threat to him. Pletnev was convicted at the Trial only of conspiracy, not of murder, and was sentenced to prison rather than to execution. Iagoda discusses the recruitment of Pletnev in this same interrogation.

⁶³ 1938 Trial 787-788.

Recently published materials have revealed that Pletnev was "rehabilitated" on April 5, 1985, but in a dishonest fashion: he was cleared of charges that he was never convicted of in the first place! The text of Pletnev's "rehabilitation" is not in the bulletin (Vestnik) of the Soviet Supreme Court for 1985 or thereafter. It has never been published anywhere.

Pletnev wrote some letters while in prison after the trial. To this day these letters have never been published in full. Some fragments from them have been cited in an attempt to argue that Pletnev was innocent. In fact those fragments do not suggest that Pletnev was innocent of what he was convicted of at trial. Rather, Pletnev's letters concern the original charges against him at the trial — the charges that were retracted and of which he was not convicted, and further charges leveled at him while in prison after the trial.⁶⁴

⁶⁴ The present authors have written a detailed study of Pletnev's case. It is awaiting publication in Russia.

It is significant that while vigorously protesting his innocence of other charges not made against him at the Trial, Pletnev did not claim he was innocent of what he had been convicted of. The only explanation is that he was guilty of those charges. Given that Pletnev has been "rehabilitated" but without any evidence he was, in fact, innocent, we may conclude that Gorbachev-era Soviets and Russian authorities today have no evidence he was innocent.⁶⁵ In short, there is a huge amount of evidence, positive and negative, suggesting that the charges against the defendants in the 1938 Trial were true.

⁶⁵ The present author has written an analysis of the Pletnev case that will appear in a collection of essays in Russia.

Ordzhonikidze's Death

Cohen likewise blames Stalin for Ordzhonikidze's "suicide or murder" in February 1937 (346-7). The ferociously anticommunist and anti-Stalin Oleg V. Khlevniuk reluctantly showed that this is not true.⁶⁶ Elsewhere we have summarized this account as follows:

According to Oleg Khlevniuk's research . . . Sergo committed suicide, most likely from bad health. He had been very sick a long time and, in fact, had had a normal work routine his last day of life.

His death had nothing whatsoever to do with Stalin. . . .

Sergo committed suicide on February 17 1937 (147). He had had a completely normal workday that day. . . . Khlevniuk, who has great hatred for Stalin, tries hard to come up with evidence that Stalin had something to do with Sergo's death, and attempts to "reconstruct" an argument over the telephone between the two men, but is finally unable to do so. Khlevniuk could not prove that such a phone call ever took place, much less what was said in it.⁶⁷

⁶⁶ Stalin I Ordzhonikidze: Konflikty v Politbiuro v 30-ie gody. Moscow, "Rossiia Molodaia," 1993; English translation: Khlevniuk, In Stalin's shadow: the Career of "Sergo" Ordzhonikidze. NY: M.E. Sharp, 1995.

⁶⁷ Furr, Khrushchev Lied, pp. 116-17.

In 2008 Vladimir Bobrov published a study of the stories about Ordzhonikidze's supposed suicide and traced their origins first to Nikita Khrushchev and, secondarily, to the memoirs of Anastas Mikoian. Bobrov shows conclusively that both of these sources contradict themselves and each other concerning Ordzhonikidze's death and that neither can be trusted. The official story — that Ordzhonikidze died of heart failure — is the only version consistent with the evidence.⁶⁸

According to Arch Getty:

Ordzhonikidze does not seem to have objected to terror in general, including that directed against Zinov'ev, Kamenev, and Bukharin, and was in fact asked by Stalin to give the main speech on wrecking in industry to the February 1937 Plenum of the Central Committee [n. 64]. The draft of the speech Ordzhonikidze was preparing to give to the February 1937 Plenum, as chief reporter on wrecking in industry, was approved by Stalin and was in character with the hard line of the times: RTsKhIDNI (TsPA), f.558, op.1 d. 3350, ll. 1-16.⁶⁹

⁶⁸ Vladimir L. Bobrov. "Taina smerti Ordzhonikize" (The Mystery of Ordzhonikize's Death). Forum Kara-Murzy October 23, 2008. <<http://vif2ne.ru/nvz/forum/0/co/256309.htm>>. The fully documented version is available at <<http://tinyurl.com/sergo-ru>> in Russian; in English translation at <<http://tinyurl.com/sergo-eng>>.

⁶⁹ J. Arch Getty, "The Politics of Repression Revisited," p. 131 and n. 64, p. 140. In Ward, Chris, ed. The Stalinist Dictatorship. London, New York: Arnold, 1998.

Oleg Khlevniuk has tried to make it appear as though there were some disagreements between Ordzhonikidze and Stalin. He cites the same archival document as does Getty above, but only the draft resolution, not the speech itself. Khlevniuk says that "Stalin was very displeased with the draft resolution that Ordzhonkidze was proposing for the plenum" but can cite no evidence to that effect.⁷⁰ Khlevniuk's reputation is firmly linked to his theory that Ordzhonikidze committed suicide as a protest against Stalin, and he distorts everything to try to support this theory, which Bobrov has shown to be a Khrushchev-era lie.

⁷⁰ Oleg V. Khlevniuk. Master of the House. Stalin and His Inner Circle. New Haven: Yale University Press, 2009, p. 160 and n.90 p. 291.

Cohen continues:

The moderates' last, desperate stand against the terror was an attempt to save Bukharin. . . (347)

Concerning Bukharin, the facts are completely the opposite: Stalin himself was by far the most "moderate" of all, proposing the most lenient measures against Bukharin and insisting that he and Rykov were not in the same category as the Trotskyists. As we've already mentioned, there was no group of what Cohen calls "Politburo and Central Committee moderates" seeking "a reform consensus" and "influence over Stalin" (346). We'll discuss this a bit more below.

Bukharin and the Cult of Stalin

Cohen writes:

An interesting example of Bukharin's public conduct was his refusal to join in the ritual of praising Stalin lavishly and acknowledging him as the leader and architect of the country's achievements. (n. 69 p. 466 to p. 351)

For some reason Cohen limits the time he is speaking of to the years 1930-32. Cohen doesn't document that anyone else was engaging in "the ritual of praising Stalin" during these very hard years. If few others were doing it then it is scarcely remarkable that Bukharin was not doing so either.

Perhaps he restricts his remarks to these years because in January 1934, in his speech to the Seventeenth Party Congress, Bukharin did lavishly praise Stalin as . . . the best expression and inspirer of the Party line, Stalin, who won the victory in inter-Party struggle on the deeply principled basis of Leninist politics and on that same basis received the warm support of the overwhelming and more than overwhelming mass of the Party and the working class.

. . . Comrade Stalin was completely correct when, brilliantly bringing to bear Marxist-Leninist dialectics, he routed a whole series of theoretical presuppositions of the Right deviation, which I more than others had formulated.

. . . the rallying around comrade Stalin as the personal incarnation of the mind and will of the Party, its leader, its theoretical and practical Leader.

And finally, at the end of his speech,

. . . all victories under the leadership of the glorious field-marshal of proletarian forces, the best of the best, comrade Stalin.⁷¹

⁷¹ XVII s"ezd Vsesoiuznoi Kommunisticheskoi Partii (b). Stenograficheskie otchiot. Moscow: Partizdat, 1934. At http://www.hrono.ru/vkpb_17/5_5.html.

Evidently Bukharin also advised former Oppositionist writers in Izvestiia to engage in the "cult" of Stalin. For example, in a December 1936 face-to-face confrontation with Sosnovsky published in 2002 he excuses encouraging the lavish praise for the "cult" — as he calls it himself — of Stalin, even though Stalin himself strongly deplores it.

STALIN — These are servile attitudes, servility.

BUKHARIN — You don't understand the life of the contemporary press. We very often insert appropriate words into one or another article because we believe that for former Oppositionists like me, for example, this is absolutely essential.

EZHOV — Who has been forcing you to do this, the Central Committee, or who?

STALIN — This is shameful behavior for a Party member.

BUKHARIN — I remember one such episode. At Kliment Efremovich's [Voroshilov's] direction I wrote an article concerning an exhibition of the Red Army. There were texts about Voroshilov, Stalin, and others. When Stalin said: What are you writing there? Someone replied: How could he dare not to write like that? I explain these matters very simply. I know that there's no need to create a cult of Stalin, but for myself I consider it appropriate, normal, to do so.

SOSNOVSKI — And you also considered it necessary for me.

BUKHARIN — For a very simple reason — because you are a former Oppositionist. I don't see anything wrong with this.⁷²

⁷² "Стенограммы очных ставок в ЦК ВКП(б). Декабрь 1936 года," Вопросы истории. 2002. №3. С.3-31, at pp. 27-8.

Incidentally, this passage is one of many that could be cited to show that Stalin was no "dictator" in the sense of "someone whose word is law." Bukharin is very clear: he is not going to stop writing fulsome praise of Stalin even though Stalin himself strongly opposes such language.⁷³

⁷³ The relevant sections of the OED's definition of "dictator" are: "1. A ruler or governor whose word is law; . . . 2. A person exercising absolute authority of any kind or in any sphere; one who authoritatively prescribes a course of action or dictates what is to be done."

The Soviet Constitution

According to Nikolaevsky, Bukharin told him he had written the whole of the Constitution. Even Cohen doubts this, but says "it is likely that Bukharin prepared or edited the final draft" and refers to "his central role in preparation of the charter" (357).

As he so often did, Nikolaevsky was lying here. We know now that Bukharin had only a secondary role in drafting the constitution. He was named as one of twelve members of a commission chaired by Stalin (Getty, "State and Society" 19).⁷⁴ These subcommissions reported their findings to an editorial committee made up of A.I. Stetskii, head of Agitation and Propaganda; B.M. Tal', head of the press department, and I.A. Iakovlev, head of Agriculture (Getty, "State and Society" 20; Zhukov, Inoi 197). Stalin himself took part in redrafting the rough draft presented by this subcommission in April 1936 (Zhukov, Inoi 223). A fifth draft version was submitted for national discussion on June 12, 1936.

⁷⁴ Getty, J. Arch. "State and Society under Stalin: Constitutions and Elections in the 1930s." Slavic Review 50, 1 (Spring 1991), pp. 18-35.

Getty addresses Bukharin's role this way:

One of the persistent rumors of Soviet history is that former oppositionists Nikolai Bukharin and Karl Radek played a decisive role in drafting the new constitution. It is said that Bukharin and Radek were "the active members of the commission" and that Bukharin in particular was "mainly responsible" for the document. (Getty, "State and Society" 22)

At this point Getty refers to Robert Conquest, who himself cites Boris Nikolaevsky. Getty then cites a number of writers who hold that the Nikolaevsky's "Letter of an Old Bolshevik" is very inaccurate (Getty, "State and Society" 22 and n. 18). He continues;

The archival documents do not support this assertion. Although Bukharin and Radek chaired the subcommissions on law and on elections, their names do not appear very often in the documents. Their association with Mekhlis, the editor of Pravda, along with their subsequent writings in Pravda and elsewhere, suggest that they were responsible more for praising, than writing, the "most democratic constitution in the world." Akulov, Krylenko, Vyshinskii, Stetskii, Iakovlev, Tal', and Stalin all seem to have played much more substantial roles in the drafting. Moreover, the drafts produced by Bukharin's and Radek's subcommissions were rejected or changed by the editorial subcommission (of which they were not members) in the redaction that immediately followed theirs. Finally, neither Bukharin nor Radek were members of the ad hoc group (Iakovlev, Stetskii, Tal') that, with Stalin, produced the authoritative draft.

Stalin clearly played a major role in the process and devoted considerable time to it. . . .

Getty's analysis agrees with that of IUrii Zhukov in Inoi Stalin. Cohen, who took Nikolaevsky's word here as elsewhere, is wrong here.

Bukharin, Zinov'ev and Kamenev

While other former oppositionists, including Rykov, exhorted the court to show 'no mercy' to Zinov'ev and Kamenev in 1936, Bukharin remained silent. (358)

Cohen cites Conquest here, and once again he is wrong. Whatever he may have written publicly, in private Bukharin expressed the harshest possible views against these two opposition leaders. These statements are far worse than anything we have on record from Stalin.

We now have some of the letters that Bukharin wrote to Party leaders after the Zinov'ev-Kamenev trial. In his letter of August 27, 1936 to Stalin, Bukharin wrote:

Excellent that these scoundrels have been executed; the air became immediately cleaner.⁷⁵

⁷⁵ Pis'ma N.I. Bukharina poslednikh let. Avgust-dekabr' 1936 g." Istochnik 2, 1993, p. 11.

In a letter to Voroshilov of a few days later, September 1, 1936, Bukharin calls Kamenev "cynic and murderer," "most loathsome of men," "human carrion." It had been Kamenev who at the August 1936 Moscow Trial implicated Bukharin as one of the leaders of the Rights as late as 1934, something Bukharin loudly denied. Bukharin added that he was "fearfully glad" (strashno rad) that "the dogs" — he means Zinov'ev and Kamenev — "have been shot."⁷⁶

⁷⁶ ("Vsiudu i Vезде Ia Budu Nastaiivat' Na Svoei Polnoi i Absoliutnoi Nevinovnosti . . .' (Pis'ma N.I. Bukharina poslednikh let). Avgust-dekabr' 1936 g." Istochnik 2, 1993, p. 15; also at <http://perpetrator2004.narod.ru/documents/Bukharin/Bukharin_Letters.doc>.

Bukharin's words have the scent of someone who "doth protest too much." Sure enough, in these letters Bukharin is trying hard to convince Stalin and others that what Zinov'ev and Kamenev said about him at their 1936 Trial was false. In fact, it was anything but!

German-Soviet Pact

Cohen describes the German-Soviet Non-Aggression Treaty (often called the "Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact") of August 1939 as "collaborative alliance" and speculates that Stalin may have foreseen it as early as 1934 (360). There are many academic studies today that show how the USSR was forced into the German-Soviet Non-Aggression Treaty by the attempt of the UK and France to encourage Hitler to attack to the East, and by the refusal of the UK, even at the last minute, to engage in serious negotiations for a defensive alliance (Admiral Drax's embassy).⁷⁷ The present author has published a detailed account of the Nonaggression Treaty and subsequent Soviet incursion into Western Ukraine and Belorussia.⁷⁸

⁷⁷ See, for example, Jonathan Haslam, The Soviet Union and the struggle for collective security in Europe, 1933-39 (St. Martin's, 1984). Clement Leibovitz, The Chamberlain-Hitler Deal (Edmonton, AB: Les Editions Duval, 1993) is an extremely well documented history of Allied machinations to encourage Hitler to attack the USSR. Leibovitz was hostile to the USSR but keeps his biases in check. A very useful collection of primary sources. A good recent study in Russian is Igor' Pykhalov, "Nado li stydit'sia 'Pakta Molotova-Ribbentropa'" [Must we be ashamed of the Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact?], Chapter four of his book Velikaia Obolgannaia Voina [The Great Calumniated War]. Moscow: Yauza-Eksmo, 2005. This book is now available online in its entirety at <https://history.wikireading.ru/4903>; the chapter in question is at <https://history.wikireading.ru/4908>.

⁷⁸ Grover Furr. "Did the Soviet Union Invade Poland in September 1939? (Answer: No, it did not)." Cyrano's Journal September 1, 2009, at <<http://www.cjournal.info/2009/09/01/did-the-soviet-union-invade-poland-in-september-1939/>>. A much longer version, with 19 pages of evidence and documentation, is at <<http://www.tinyurl.com/furr-mlg09>>. A preliminary version of this article was presented at the June 2009 convention of the Marxist Literary Group — Institute for Cultural Studies at Portland State University.

Of course there was such a "collaborative alliance" with Hitler — on the part of the UK and France! It was sealed at Munich in September 1938 where the leaders of the UK and France sold out Czechoslovakia supposedly for "peace in our time," but in reality to encourage Hitler to attack the USSR. France unilaterally disregarded its military alliance with Czechoslovakia. Poland and Hungary also seized parts of Czechoslovakia, though that was nowhere sanctioned in the Munich accords. Neither the UK nor France objected to Polish and Hungarian aggression.

Evidence of all this was available to Cohen, as was the text of the secret protocol of the Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact. There is no evidence of anything like a "collaborative alliance" between the USSR and Hitler's Germany. By contrast the Munich Agreement could be accurately described as a "collaborative alliance." Cohen is simply reproducing Cold-War falsifications here. In Cold War historiography, the USSR must be blamed for something more shameful than the Munich sellout, which is universally acknowledged as a leading cause of Hitler's aggression. (For more discussion of the Pact see the article by Furr cited in the previous note.)

Suicide of Nadezhda Allilueva

According to Cohen, Stalin's wife Nadezhda Allilueva "committed suicide in protest" against collectivization (364). Cohen cites no evidence whatsoever for this claim, which seems to reflect rumors. It was reported as fact by propagandist Isaac Don Levine in his book Stalin's Great Secret (New York, 1956). Levine's "great secret" — that Stalin had been an agent of the Tsar's secret police (Okhrana) — has long since been debunked, and in any case Levine was in no position to know anything about Stalin's wife.

According to Artem Sergeev, who was raised in Stalin's household,⁷⁹ Stalin's wife was chronically ill and prone to unbearable migraine headaches. She had been in a good mood a couple of days before, looking forward to having a party after her graduation. No one was present when she shot herself, but in Sergeev's view desperation over the unbearable pain of a migraine is the most likely explanation. Stalin was overwrought with grief at his wife's death. As Sergeev writes:

The tragedy with Vasili's mother took place in the second Kremlin apartment . . . Vasia and I, I recall, wanted very much to go to town after the November 7 parade, to ski. As I recall, Karolina Vasil'evna Til', the housekeeper, said the evening before to Nadezhda Sergeevna: "The children are on holiday, let them go skiing." And Nadezhda Sergeevna replied: "I am finishing up at the Academy, and then we will really have a celebration — we'll arrange a holiday for my graduation." She was studying in the Industrial Academy in the department of the textile industry, specializing in artificial fabrics. Her specific specialty would have been artificial silk and rayon.

So we went out to the dacha to ski. As I recall, about 9 a.m. someone called to say that Vasili and I should return right away to Moscow. We returned to Moscow and I went home. No sooner did my mother and I settle ourselves to talk than there was a call. Mama took the receiver, gasped and cried: "Oh! Nadya is dead!" And we went there. I noted down what happened at the funeral.

You need to know that Nadezhda Sergeevna had constant, very powerful, completely unbearable headaches. She often held her head in her hands and cried out: "My head! My head!" She often went to Germany, supposedly to her older brother who was working there. But really it was to consult German professors. And the evening before November 7, and on the day of the parade too, she also held her head in her hands — the pains were tormenting her again. The parades used to last 4 hours: from 8 to 12. Nadezhda Sergeevna and we stood in front of the entrance to the Mausoleum. Then she went off early, holding her head in her hands, and after the parade we went off to the dacha. That was how this terrible incident happened.

The coffin with the body stood in the GUM building. There, about in the center, on the side of Red Square there is a niche, and in it a staircase to the second floor. There is a door, and behind it a room in which the coffin was set. Stalin literally sobbed. Vasili hung on his neck the whole time and pleaded with him: "Papa, don't cry, don't cry!" Stalin bent down over the coffin and sobbed.

When they carried the coffin away Stalin went right away to the catafalque. Then came the orchestra, and we walked behind the orchestra. The procession went to the Novodevichii monastery. Stalin stood at the grave on one side, and Vasya and I on the other. There was no one between us. Stalin was crushed with grief. He took a handful of earth and threw it into the grave. They told us to also take some earth and throw it in. We asked: "What for?" They told us, that's what you must do.⁸⁰

Sergeev's account has not been challenged. There is no evidence that Nadezhda Allilueva's suicide had any political motive.

⁷⁹ Fedor Andreevich Sergeev was a leading Old Bolshevik and friend of Stalin's who was killed in an airplane crash in 1921. Stalin raised his son, Artiom Fedorovich (b. 1921) in his own household.

⁸⁰ Artem Sergeev with Ekaterina Glushik, Besedy o Staline [Conversations about Stalin] (Moscow: Krymskii Most 9-D, 2006) pp. 37-9. An abbreviated selection from these pages is reproduced at <<http://www.hrono.ru/biograf/allilueva.html>>.

Kamenev and Zinov'ev

Cohen claims that the defendants at the Zinov'ev-Kamenev First Moscow Trial of August 1936 were "carefully tutored by [their] 'interrogators'" into "pre-arranged confessions" (368). This claim of Cohen's is, at the very least, disingenuous. Cohen had no evidence that this was the case, nor is there even today any evidence at all that Zinov'ev's or Kamenev's confessions were coerced in any way.

On the contrary: there is a great deal of evidence that their confessions were genuine and that both were guilty of at least what they confessed to. We now have

- pre-trial interrogations of Zinov'ev and Kamenev, in which they make incriminating confessions, including admitting their involvement in the assassination of Kirov;
- some pretrial interrogation-confessions from other defendants in the same trial;
- interrogation-confessions from Avel' Enukidze and Genrikh Iagoda, in which they incriminate Zinov'ev and Kamenev, as well as Bukharin and others;
- a statement by Mikhail Frinovsky, Nikolai Ezhov's second-in-command of the NKVD in 1936-1938, in which Frinovsky makes clear that Zinov'ev and Kamenev were part of the Right conspiracy, along with himself, Ezhov, Bukharin, and many others;
- Zinov'ev's and Kamenev's appeals for clemency to the Soviet Supreme Court, which were of course secret. Had there been any "quid pro quo" — any agreement according to which their confessions were fraudulently obtained — we'd expect to read about it here. (Izvestiia September 2, 1992, p. 3). Or somewhere! But their secret appeals contain no claim of innocence — indeed, both reiterate their guilt in the strongest terms;
- the partial transcript of the trial itself (Pravda August 20–24, 1936), available of course to Cohen as well.

We also have a private letter from Stalin to Kaganovich in which Stalin makes it clear that interrogations were leading to new information which must be checked out.

. . . Second. From Reingol'd's confessions it is clear that Kamenev, through his wife Glebova, was feeling out the French ambassador Alfand⁸¹ concerning possible relations of the French government with a future "government" of the Trotskyite-Zinov'evite bloc. I think that Kamenev also felt out the English, German and American ambassadors. That means that Kamenev must have disclosed to these foreigners the plans of the plot and of the murders of the leaders of the Bolshevik Party. That also means that Kamenev had already disclosed to them these plans, or else the foreigners would not have agreed to have discussions with him about a future Zinov'ev-Trotskyite "government." This is the attempt of Kamenev and his friends to conclude a direct bloc with the bourgeois governments against the Soviet government. This explains the secret of the well-known advance obituaries of the American correspondents. Obviously, Glebova is well informed about all this sordid material. We must bring Glebova to Moscow and submit her to a series of meticulous interrogations. She might reveal many interesting things.⁸²

⁸¹ Undoubtedly Hervé Alphand (1907-1994), who was financial attaché, not ambassador, to the USSR in the mid-1930s.

⁸² Stalin to Kaganovich, about testimony at the Zinov'ev-Kamenev "Trial of the 16," August 1936. In Stalin i Kaganovich, Perepiska 1931-1936 gg. [Stalin-Kaganovich Correspondence, 1931-1936] (Russian), No. 763, pp. 642-43.

This letter is strong evidence that Stalin did not know in advance what Reingol'd was going to confess at the trial and was drawing conclusions based on those confessions at the time. In other words, Stalin was trying to figure out what was really going on. That means that Stalin, at any rate, had not stage-managed Kamenev's confession.

We also know that Zinoviev wrote a book-length manuscript of 540 pages in which he confessed his guilt in detail. It has been declassified, though as of this date only Getty has cited any of it. Getty writes:

In "A Deserved Sentence" ["Zasluzhennyi Prigovor"] he [Zinoviev] wrote:

There is no question about it. . . . It is a fact. Whoever plays with the idea of "opposition" to the socialist state plays with the idea of counterrevolutionary terror. . . . Before each who finds himself in my position this question stands in sharp relief. If tomorrow war comes — it stands yet a million times sharper and bigger. And for myself this question in prison for a long time is irreversibly decided. Rise from the dead! Be born again as a Bolshevik! Finish your human days conscious of your guilt before the party! Do everything in order to erase this guilt.⁸³

⁸³ Getty, Yezhov. The Rise of Stalin's "Iron Fist." New Haven: Yale U.P. 2008, p. 191. According to the Bulletin of Declassified Documents of the State Federal Archives, issue 5, section II, this document has been declassified. See <<http://www.rusarchives.ru/secret/bul5/70.shtml>>.

According to Getty, Zinoviev composed this right after he had been named as a conspirator by a number of other, lower-ranked conspirators. If enough of one's co-conspirators name the same person that person's conviction is assured. As Bukharin pointed out in his final statement at his March 1938 trial, the confession of the accused is not at all necessary for the accused to be convicted, provided there is enough other evidence. Zinov'ev must have felt that it would be futile to persist in denial.

The few quotations from Zinoviev's prison letters that have been released by the Soviet and Russian governments record that he reiterated his guilt and said that he was being treated "humanely" and "given medical treatment."

May 6 1935. If only I could hope that sometime I would have the chance to expiate my guilt even a little. In prison I am treated humanely, I get medical care, etc.⁸⁴

⁸⁴ "O tak nazyvaemom 'antisovetskom ob"edinennom trotskistsko-zinov'evskom tsentre." Izvestiia TsK KPSS 8 (1989), 90. Reprinted in Reabilitatsiia. Politicheskie protsessy 30-50-kh godov. Moscow: Izdatel'stvo politicheskoi literatury, 1991, p. 184.

We now have a number of statements from other high-ranking conspirators who implicate Zinov'ev and Kamenev in their own confessions. For instance, Mikhail Frinovsky:

At the time of the trial of Zinoviev, Kamenev and others, when the testimony about Bukharin was published in the press, Evdokimov was in Moscow. He became very upset and in a conversation with me, said: "The devil only knows how he will be able to extract himself from this whole affair. I just don't understand Yagoda at all, what he is doing, why he is broadening the circle of persons for repression, or maybe the nerves of these people are weak — they will give out. But it could have been possible to direct the course of the investigation in such a manner as to leave oneself safe in any case." (41)

Iagoda:

I can admit that, as for myself, after the murder of Kirov there was an attempt, or rather the intention, to "squellch" this case, limit the arrests to Leningrad only. But the unrelenting supervision by the CC [Central Committee] and the participation of Ezhov in the investigation hampered this effort. As you know, Zinoviev, Kamenev, Bakaev and others were arrested in Moscow.⁸⁵

...

In relation to Zinoviev and Kamenev I had a duplex plan. I could not permit the investigation into their case to proceed very far. I feared that they would confess sincerely. They could have given up the whole conspiracy. (Genrikh Iagoda 191)

...

I took every measure to create for Zinoviev and Kamenev the most pleasant conditions in prison: books, paper, food, walks — all this they received without stint. But who knows what could happen? They were dangerous witnesses.

Therefore I reported their case to the CC and proposed that Zinoviev and Kamenev be shot, in order to be finished with them. (Genrikh Iagoda 192)

⁸⁵ Genrikh Iagoda No. 44, May 19, 1937, p. 184.

Bukharin probably felt the same way. He had been on his way back to Moscow to defend himself against the incriminating remarks that Kamenev had made about him during the trial, a partial transcript of which had been published in the national newspapers Pravda and Izvestiia.

Bukharin could not have avoided a face-to-face confrontation with Kamenev during which Kamenev, already condemned, might well have given yet more evidence against Bukharin, just as Iagoda feared that they might disclose his own role in the conspiracy. It was only a few days after their execution Bukharin wrote Voroshilov to call Zinov'ev and Kamenev "dogs" and worse to say that he was "fearfully glad" they had been shot.

Iagoda gave more detail about how he schemed to get rid of Zinov'ev and Kamenev.

In the summer of 1936 Zinoviev and Kamenev were brought from their political exile to Moscow for investigation in the case of the center of the Trotskyite-Zinovievite bloc. As I have already said, I had to get rid of them; they were already finished, under investigation for the third time, and I was very concerned that somewhere, somehow during the investigation they would say too much. Therefore I considered it essential to speak with them. Clearly I couldn't attend the interrogations or call them into my office for a talk. Therefore I began to establish a practice of going around several cells in the inner prison. I went into almost all the cells with Popov, the chief of the prison. I also dropped in on Zinoviev and Kamenev (separately on each of them), having first told Popov to remain outside.

In 5-10 minutes I succeeded in warning Zinoviev and Kamenev about who had been arrested and what confessions we had. I told them that the investigation did not know any facts about other centers that were taking part in the conspiracy, much less about the overall [Iagoda says "general"] center.

"All is not yet lost, so don't give away anything yourselves. The center of the conspiracy still functions. No matter what the court's sentence is, you will be returned to me", I told them. And Zinoviev and Kamenev, both in the investigation and at the trial, as you know, carried out my directives. And after the sentence they were shot. This was in August 1936. (Genrikh Iagoda 198-199).

On April 25, 1937 Bulanov, one of Iagoda's right-hand men, confessed as follows:

In the Spring of 1931 Iagoda openly and directly told me that the political line of the Central Committee of the Party was incorrect, that this line will lead to defeat, that the CC is destroying the peasantry by the introduction of collective farms and Soviet farms and that the only correct line for such a backward country is the line of the Rights. Iagoda said that he himself was connected to the center of the Rights and that if I want to go on living then I just share his line, help him, and of course keep it secret. He said that all of Lenin's coworkers — Tomsky, Rykov, Bukharin, Kamenev, Zinoviev — all fully shared the platform of the Rights and that he too was with them.

I told Iagoda that he could rely on me fully. (No. 165, pp. 500-1)

...

After the murder of Kirov, when the roles of Kamenev and Zinoviev in preparing this murder had been revealed, Iagoda assigned me and Pauker to arrest Kamenev and to Molchanov and Volovich the arrest of Zinoviev. At that time he ordered that they only be brought to the GPU, and not to carry out any search of their premises. (502)

Tomsky's Suicide

Kamenev, Zinov'ev, and Reingol'd (another defendant at the August 1936 Moscow Trial) implicated Tmsky as a leader of the Right opposition along with Bukharin. According to Cohen Tmsky killed himself because he "wanted to escape the abuse and degradation heaped on Zinov'ev and Kamenev" (368). Cohen ought to have at least informed his readers of the fact that he possessed no evidence to support this statement.

Furthermore, we know better now. In 1996, an excerpt from Tmsky's suicide letter was published in an official government journal.⁸⁶ Of course it is true that Tmsky did not want to go through a trial. But he expressed nothing but contempt for Zinoviev and Kamenev, whom he called "these counterrevolutionary dregs (otreb'e) who descended to the base role of fascist murderers."

I saw with disgust how Zinoviev and Kamenev thrice promised and thrice betrayed.

Forgive me for explaining all this at such length, but my only hope is that you understand my outrage and pain when I once again in a document of the CC see my name in any kind of connection with these counterrevolutionary dregs who have fallen to the villainous role of fascist murderers.

⁸⁶ Published in Rodina 1, 1996, pp. 92-3. Online text at <<https://msuweb.montclair.edu/~furg/research/tmskyltr.html>>.

This is not evidence that Tmsky disbelieved the charges against Zinov'ev and Kamenev — though of course he denied their accusations against him specifically. As we saw above, the same thing was true for Bukharin: we have no indication at all that he thought the charges against them or their confessions were false and lots of evidence that he believed the charges true. Furthermore, we have a great deal of evidence that both Tmsky and Bukharin were co-conspirators with Zinov'ev, Kamenev, and many others. We have no evidence whatsoever that all these statements, or those of Zinov'ev and Kamenev themselves, were fabricated. Cohen didn't either. No one has claimed that Tmsky's note is a forgery.

The February-March 1937 Central Committee Plenum

Cohen devotes four pages to an account of this important Plenum. Study of the actual transcript allows us to see that everything Cohen wrote about this important Plenum in his 1973 book is wrong. In 1992-1995 the whole transcript of the very long CC Plenum of February 23-March 5 1937 was published in sections in Voprosy Istorii. In 2006 these materials were scanned and put on the Internet in searchable text format.⁸⁷ All this material is therefore easily available for researchers.

⁸⁷ At <<http://www.memo.ru/history/1937/index.htm>>.

Cohen asserts that Bukharin's followers were compelled to accuse him:

During the next two weeks, several lesser Bukharinists were 'worked over' in police cellars and their 'confessions' delivered to Bukharin as 'a sort of psychic torture'. (369)

Cohen cites Conquest and Medvedev here. We know they, and Cohen, are wrong thanks to the statements of one of the most prominent of these old Bukharinists, Valentin Astrov. Astrov had a face-to-face confrontation with Bukharin, and then lived till 1993, long enough to write about his experiences.⁸⁸

⁸⁸ According to one biographical source Valentin Nikolaevich Astrov was born August 1 1898 and died July 15 1993. See <<http://persona.rin.ru/view/f/0/28956/astrov-valentin-hikolaevich>> [sic].

Astrov

Astrov published a self-serving statement in Literaturnaia Gazeta of March 29, 1989 (V. Astrov, "Kak eto proizoshlo") in which he stated plainly that he was not mistreated in any way. According to Astrov, the NKVD investigators did not even call him "ty," the familiar second person singular which is disrespectful when not from a close friend or family member.

They did not beat or torture me, no one even referred to me as "ty" . . . but consistently, day and night, they demanded that I "tell about the terrorist activities of the Rights," and stubbornly refused to hear that I don't know anything about it!

Astrov said only that he had not actually heard Bukharin utter the word terror. It is far from certain that he was telling the truth even in that, since he certainly did make that claim in 1936 and 1937. But evidently Bukharin had tried to be very careful in what he himself said. Again according to Astrov, Slepkov replied that Bukharin had said to him: It would be good if Stalin were to suddenly die. I asked, what do you mean "suddenly die", things don't happen like that, is Stalin perhaps ill? Slepkov answered, no, not that, it seems. Then does it mean that Stalin should be murdered? Slepkov replied: Understand it as you wish. I asked: That means that Bukharin proposes that we engage in assassination [Russian: "terror"]? Slepkov answered: No, he did not say that directly. I asked that, perhaps, Bukharin wants us to engage in violence but does not want to say that in so many words? Slepkov replied: That must be it.

Bukharin, as Slepkov said, was not talking with me about this subject for the first time, but until this time I thought that it was by chance. Now I see that this thought was insistently preoccupying Bukharin.⁸⁹

⁸⁹ ". . . Ni razu ne govorilos' otnositel'no terrora . . ." Istochnik 1 (2001), p. 91.

Astrov had said virtually the same thing during his interrogation two days earlier, as we shall see.

In this same face-to-face confrontation with Bukharin on January 13, 1937, Astrov said that Tomsy, one of the leaders of the Rights, boasted that when they (the Rights) took power, they would deal "without ceremony" with the current Party leaders. Astrov understood that to mean that they would kill them.

On this point Tomsy said that in a serious struggle for power, like the one we are engaged in, it's impossible to do without arrests, that now they are arresting us, but later we will be arresting them. When we take power we will not stand on ceremony. This statement of Tomsy's was taken by those present as self-evident. (91)

But Astrov also stated that Bukharin did, in fact, once speak to him about "terror," i.e. assassination:

He [Bukharin] said that it was important to keep me free, since I would have to continue Slepkov's terrorist activity in preparing to murder Stalin. (103)

Two days before this confrontation on January 11, 1937 Astrov gave a confession statement to the NKVD in which categorically stated that Bukharin had spoken about assassination:

I recall my conversation with BUKHARIN that took place in the summer of 1931 or 1932, during which BUKHARIN this time directly stated that it was essential that STALIN be murdered. Developing this thought further BUKHARIN emphasized that if STALIN were gone no one would be able to unify the Party, and that would create the possibility for us to seize the leadership in our hands. (Lubianka 2 29)

This is what Astrov retracted in 1989, at a time when no one could confront him with what he had actually said in 1937 because these documents were not yet available, including to Astrov himself. He withdrew no other aspect of his accusations against Bukharin.

If Astrov had falsely claimed in 1989 or later that he had been tortured or maltreated no one could have refuted him and few, if any, would have been surprised. Yet he insisted that just the opposite was the case! Far from being tortured, Astrov insisted that that he had been treated with respect.

There is no need to put scare quotes around Astrov's confession. It is clear that he was not "worked over," as Cohen claims. Astrov's testimony would be powerful evidence of Bukharin's guilt even if there were no other such statements. In fact there are a large number of confessions implicating Bukharin. Bukharin stated that he received twenty of them on one day alone, February 15, 1937.⁹⁰ Aside from Astrov's none of these have been made available to researchers.

⁹⁰ Voprosy Istorii No.2-3, 1992, p. 30.

The Plenum

At this CC Plenum, according to Cohen, "there was, in reality, only one item on the agenda — the expulsion of Bukharin and Rykov" (370, quoting Conquest, GT). This is not true at all.

The Plenum lasted from the evening of February 23 to the evening of March 5, 1937. The cases of Bukharin and Rykov were discussed from the evening session of February 23 through the morning session of February 26, and again in the latter part of the session of February 27. This was indeed an important part of the Plenum, but far from even half of it. A number of other important questions were discussed, including the new Constitution and the lessons to be drawn from the second Moscow Trial that had just taken place in January 1937.

Cohen further claims that:

Stalin and his men took the floor to demand their arrest as 'hired murderers, saboteurs, and wreckers in the service of fascism'. (370)

Once again this is completely false. Not only is there no evidence that Stalin said anything like this — the evidence shows that Stalin was the most lenient of all present towards Bukharin and Rykov! This is well discussed by Getty (Getty and Naumov 412-414). Chapter Ten of his book, "Party Discipline and the Fall of Bukharin," is the most extended discussion of this Plenum in any language at present and includes significant quotations from the transcripts. Unfortunately Getty and Naumov discuss only that part of the Plenum that was devoted to Bukharin and Rykov and ignore the rest of it. But the entire plenum transcript has now been published online and, what's more, can be searched online by key word.⁹¹

⁹¹ "Fevral'sko-martovskii plenum 1937 goda." At http://www.memo.ru/history/1937/feb_mart_1937/. The present authors (Furr and Bobrov) possess "hard copies" of all 26 parts of this transcript, which we use to check the scanned text available here.

Cohen reproduces from Medvedev an alleged hostile exchange between Bukharin and Molotov (370). Nothing like it is to be found in the huge transcript of the Plenum; therefore, it never took place. This is also another passage that reminds us how unreliable is Medvedev's book, one of Cohen's main sources. On the following page (371), Cohen records an "angry, emotional statement" of Bukharin's that, according to the evidence, he never uttered. Cohen took it from Uralov, Medvedev, Trotsky, and Conquest. At best it was a rumor. Cohen had the responsibility to so inform his readers but failed to do so.

Bukharin's "Letter to Future Generations of Party Leaders"⁹²

At this point Cohen quotes from a document that first achieved wide circulation in Medvedev's Let History Judge in the early '70s. ⁹³ According to Bukharin's widow, Anna Larina, her husband had written this "letter" shortly before his arrest, which occurred on February 27, 1937 at the conclusion of the discussion of his and Rykov's situation at the February-March 1937 Central Committee meeting.

⁹² The Russian text can be found online in several places, among them: http://perpetrator2004.narod.ru/documents/Bukharin/To_Future_Generation_of_Party_Leaders.doc; in Larina's autobiography Nezabyvaemoe (Moscow, 1989), 362-3, at http://www.sakharov-center.ru/asfcd/auth/auth_pagesf6ec-2.html?Key=8276&page=349#362. An English translation is in Roy Medvedev, Let History Judge: The Origins and Consequences of Stalinism. Revised and expanded edition. Translated by George Shriver. New York: Columbia University Press, 1989, pp. 366-67.

⁹³ It was published in clandestine samizdat dissident publications before it appeared in Medvedev's book. The following online anthology of samizdat

publications includes it in the period 1960-1965:
<<http://antology.igrunov.ru/60-s/memo/>>.

Larina submitted this letter to the Party Control Commission in 1961 as part of her appeal, unsuccessful at that time, for her late husband's rehabilitation. She claimed that she had memorized the letter and then destroyed the original, as Bukharin had asked her to do, and had reproduced it in writing in 1956 after Khrushchev's "Secret Speech." As suggested by Marc Junge, however, it is unlikely that the text Larina produced is the same, in letter or in spirit, as whatever her husband dictated to her — if in fact he dictated anything at all. Junge observes:

We cannot determine at this point whether the letter that Anna Larina wrote down after the 20th Party Congress and which was published in the early 1970s corresponds to the handwritten original of 1937. Nevertheless it is worth noting that the analysis of the 1930s contained in the letter is typical of the framework of argument of the mid-1950s, that is, of Khrushchev's Secret Speech, and allows us to suppose that Larina-Bukharina tactically adapted this letter to the politics of the 1950s.⁹⁴

⁹⁴ Marc Junge, Bucharins Rehabilitierung. Berlin, 1999, 93. For further discussion of this document see Furr, post to H-RUSSIA August 16 2007, at <<http://tinyurl.com/3xh34m>>.

The letter's contents, a ferocious and personal criticism of Stalin, also fit well into Cohen's analysis, itself both a product and a reflection of the "anti-Stalin" paradigm that Khrushchev elaborated and Gorbachev utilized in justifying Bukharin's rehabilitation in 1987-88.

But when put into context with other texts of Bukharin's published since the end of the USSR, the "Letter to Future Generations" shows its author in a more critical light. For although the contents of this "Letter" are consistent with Cohen's account of Bukharin's defiance of Stalin at the Plenum, they are in complete contradiction with the evidence of what actually occurred there, as well as with what Bukharin wrote later.

In the letters Bukharin wrote to Stalin during his imprisonment, he claimed total loyalty, friendship, and even "love" towards Stalin. Even in his now-famous letter to Stalin of December 10, 1937, in which Bukharin retracted virtually all the confessions he had made to that point, he still professed love and loyalty to Stalin:

And here I speak the absolute truth: through all the last years I have honestly and sincerely put forth the party's line and have learned to value and love you wisely.

But I am prepared spiritually to leave this earthly vale, and there is nothing within me, as relates to all of you and to the party, and to our whole cause — nothing besides a great, unbounded love.

Bukharin even praised the "purge," as he called it, directed not only against "the guilty" and "those under suspicion" but even against those "potentially under suspicion," including himself!

There is some kind of great and bold political idea in a general purge a) in connection with a prewar period, b) in connection with the transition to democracy. This purge envelops a) the guilty, b) those under suspicion and c) those potentially under suspicion. Obviously I had to be involved here too. Some are rendered harmless in one way, other in another way, the third group in a third way.⁹⁵

⁹⁵ Rodina № 2, 1993. C. 52, 54; Istochnik 0 [sic], 1993. C. 23-25. Translated in Getty and Naumov, pp. 556-60.

If Larina's "Letter" were genuine, then Bukharin's credibility would be fatally compromised. He vowed his loyalty to and "love" for Stalin, and strong support for repressive measures against himself and many others, while in the letter supposedly given to his wife he denounced all these same things in the strongest terms. That Bukharin would change his tune so drastically would be consistent with his portrayal as hypocritical, as "two-faced," by many of those who addressed the February-March Central Committee Plenum. The quotations below are just a sampling of many such accusations:

[Ezhov:] While continuing to stand on its Right-Trotskyite positions the center of the Rights, with the goal of preserving its cadres from decisive defeat, adopted the path of hypocritical ["two-faced"] capitulation. In the hope that they would succeed in starting a new attack on the Party in the very near future the center discussed a whole plan, a whole tactic of two-facedness. Here they tried to learn from the errors of the Trotskyists, the errors of the Zinovievists, and they worked out literally to the last details a plan for a two-faced plan of giving statement [i.e. of capitulation to the Party's line — GF]. (Voprosy Istorii № 4-5, 1992, 6)

[Shkiriakov:] But obviously, it is hard to discern the truth from them after all their two-faced work, deception of the Party and the Central Committee. (Vop. Ist. № 6-7, 1992, 18)

[Kosior:] Hypocrites! (ibid., 25)

[Andreev:] The Rights long ago, beginning in 1929, chose that same tactic of deceiving the Party by means of two-facedness. Confessions such as those of Shmidt, Uglanov, Radin and all the rest now disclose with complete clarity that they adopted the same tactic of deceiving the Party, of two-facedness, that the Trotskyists also adopted. . . . What, we may ask, are your statements of 1929 and 1930 worth, when you said that you had completely broken with the Opposition and had gone over to the positions of the Party? This fact speaks to the two-facedness of these same statements (Voice from the hall. Correct.) . . . You abused with all this the attitude of the party to you and instead of completely disarming yourselves and burning your bridges after you, you adopted the methods of two-facedness and deception of the Party, instead of helping the Party expose the Trotskyites and Zinovievites. (Vop. Ist. № 8-9, 1992, 3; 5; 7)

[Kabakov:] Permit me to ask you, who founded this school of two-facedness in the Party? (ibid., 8)

[Molotov:] What they can do is only what anyone could do from behind the corner, secretly and in quiet, like a hypocrite, like a person who does something while hiding his face.

[Bykin:] Comrades, hypocrites are the most malevolent enemies of the Party and the working class. (Vop. Ist. № 10, 1992, 3)

And so on. "Two-facedness" — professing loyalty to Stalin and the Party line while secretly plotting to overthrow both — was the essence of the accusations against Bukharin. If genuine, the "Letter," when set beside his other writings of 1937 and 1938, would strongly tend to confirm that accusation.

Some may well object that "two-facedness" — deception — is essential for clandestine, illegal work. Bukharin, however, claimed that he had ceased such work some years beforehand. Cohen thinks Bukharin was never involved in secret oppositional work at all! In short, it's impossible to know whether Bukharin actually dictated a "last letter" to his wife at all, much less what it might have really said.

Postyshev's Speech

Cohen alleges (371) that Postyshev protested the purge in the Party and blamed Stalin.

The choice clear, Postyshev, a candidate Politburo member, rose to speak for opponents of the purge: "I personally do not believe that . . . an honest Party member who had trodden the long road of unrelenting fight against enemies, for the Party and for socialism, would now be in the camp of enemies. I do not believe it. . . ." At this point, Stalin reportedly interrupted in a way so menacing that Postyshev's determination was shattered.

No doubt Cohen took it from Khrushchev's Secret Speech — something he should have told his readers. In any case, nothing of the kind happened. This passage is indeed in Postyshev's speech. But Khrushchev took it completely out of context — yet another example of Khrushchev's wholesale falsification in that famous speech (Furr 2011 46 ff.).

We now have Postyshev's full remarks thanks to the publication of the transcript of this Plenum. Here is the whole passage:

I reason in this way: such difficult years, such changes took place, where people either were broken or stood on firm legs, or went over to the enemies — the period of industrialization, the period of collectivization, all the same the fight of the Party with the enemies was fierce in this period. I did not at all imagine that it was possible to endure all these periods, and then go to the camp of the enemies. And here now it turns out that since 1934 he has fallen into the clutches of the enemies and become an enemy. Of course, here one can believe this or not believe it. I personally think that it is terribly hard after all these years for a person in 1934, who had gone through on firm legs the very fierce struggle, in 1934 could go over to the enemies. This is very hard to believe. (Molotov. Hard to believe that he became an enemy only in 1934? Probably he was one earlier too.) Of course, earlier. I cannot imagine how it is possible to go through the difficult years with the Party and then, in 1934, go over to the Trotskyists. It's strange. There was some kind of worm in him the whole time. When this worm appeared — in 1926, 1924, 1930, it's hard to say, but obviously there was some kind of worm that did some kind of work, so that he fell into the ranks of the enemies.⁹⁶

⁹⁶ Voprosy Istorii № 5-6, 1995, 4. Interruptions of the main speaker are often indicated, as here, in parentheses.

Stalin never interrupted Postyshev's speech at all, much less in any "threatening" way, as Cohen reports on the same page. We have already noted that Cohen chooses to "believe" communist leaders — Khrushchev, in this case — when doing so fits his "anti-Stalin" paradigm. But in this case even Khrushchev did not say that Stalin interrupted or menaced Postyshev. Cohen never informs his readers whence he took this false claim. Furthermore, the passage in question reveals that Postyshev did not protest the purge at all, but instead agreed to it.

According to Cohen

Feigning neutrality, he [Stalin] left the continuing attack on Bukharin and Rykov to his proconsuls of terror, and appointed a commission dominated by these same loyalists to decide their fate. (371-2)

His footnotes reveal that Cohen relied on Conquest here. But Conquest fabricated this story out of thin air. Thanks to the transcript we now know that Stalin did not "leave" anything to "his proconsuls," for he himself was on this same commission. Cohen continues, writing:

The commission reported its verdict to the meeting on February 17: 'Arrest, try, shoot.' (372)

Getty explicitly deals with this statement of Medvedev's ("The Politics of Repression Revisited" 133) to point out that it is completely false. The resolution was not to shoot, but to arrest and continue the investigation. The original minutes of the commission's conclusion survives and have been published — for example, by Getty and Naumov (406-419). Moreover, Getty shows that Stalin took the most lenient position of anyone present. Stalin himself had apparently first voted simply to exile Bukharin and was overruled by the other commission members, some of whom did vote to shoot him. Further evidence, if more were needed, that Stalin was not a "dictator"!⁹⁷

⁹⁷ There are many examples of Stalin's will being thwarted, including several times during this very Plenum.

Getty and Naumov examine this in some detail, even reproducing a photographic copy of the commission's report (411-419). The very stark differences between Stalin's leniency and the positions of the other commission members were settled in a compromise that was nothing like what Cohen wrote.

Bukharin under Arrest

An important part of Cohen's chapter is devoted to Bukharin's March 1938 trial and what he said at it. Cohen has to deal with the stubborn fact that while all of the accused confessed to many serious crimes, most — notably including Bukharin, Rykov, and Yagoda — stoutly refused to confess to some charges even as they were willingly confessing to other accusations. As he writes:

The confession of each, painfully extracted, was tailored to the bizarre indictment. Everything had again been rehearsed. . . (373)

This is blatant dishonesty on Cohen's part. Both "painfully extracted" and "rehearsed" are, once again, "weasel words" that are intended to create the false impression that Cohen is imparting some knowledge about the trial that, in reality, he did not have. "Painfully," of course, can mean just about anything. But in this context it is clearly intended to imply some kind of mistreatment. More forthright than Cohen, his Russian translators use the word "pytka" meaning: torture (441).

In fact Cohen was making baseless charges again. He knew absolutely nothing about any of this. Cohen has since admitted that Bukharin was not tortured.⁹⁸ As he wrote in 2003:

Unlike many other victims of repression, including the commanders of the Red Army, it seems that no physical tortures were used against him [Bukharin] in prison.

Koen [Cohen], "Bukharin na Lubianke." Svobodnaia Mysl' 3 (2003), pp. 60-1.

Parenthetically, there is no evidence that the Tukhachevsky defenders were "tortured" either. Cohen had no such evidence, nor do we have any today.

Other authors such as Asen Ignatov, another extremely anticommunist researcher, agree:

We may be confident that Bukharin did not undergo torture since, as has become known, in prison a special regime was set up for him, he received all literature, Soviet and Western, and also a typewriter and wrote philosophical works.⁹⁹

⁹⁹ "Revoliutsiia pozhiraet svoikh vunderkindov. Sluchai Bukharina s psikhologicheskimi tochki zreniia." Forum 1 (2005). At <<http://www1.ku-eichstaett.de/ZIMOS/forum/docs/02Ignatow.pdf>> C. 13.

Bukharin had time to write a book of poetry, another of philosophy, a novel, and a number of letters, all while in prison. Naturally he could not have done all these things without the kind of privileges that in the USA today only convicts in minimum-security Federal prisons enjoy. This means that Bukharin was treated extremely well in prison.

Nor did Cohen know anything about "rehearsals," any more than we do today. Once again he just invented this "fact" out of thin air.

Cohen continues:

On around June 2, 1937, he finally relented, 'only after the investigators threatened to kill his wife and newborn son.' . . . To save her and his infant son . . . he had to 'confess' and stand trial. (375)

Cohen's footnote to this passage is to Medvedev's Let History Judge. A secondary source isn't evidence in any case, and Medvedev's book contains no evidence at all, only the claim that "there is much evidence that such blackmail occurred" (LHJ 382).

Since Medvedev had no evidence to support his statement and Cohen could have noted that fact, his footnoting Medvedev here appears to be a deliberate attempt to deceive his readers into believing that evidence in support of this statement existed, while Cohen knew very well it did not. Nor is there is no evidence of this today. Gorbachev's high-level "rehabilitation commission" tried and failed to find any evidence that Bukharin was either tortured, pressured, or promised his life in return for perjuring himself (RKEB 3, 55).

There is no evidence whatsoever that any intimidation at all was used against Bukharin. Even in his letter to Stalin of December 10, 1937 in which he denied the charges he had already confessed to (only to subsequently confess to them again) Bukharin did not allege that his previous confessions of guilt had been the result of any mistreatment or threats. Instead Bukharin claimed that he had confessed falsely to things he did not do in order to convince Stalin that he (Bukharin) had "disarmed."¹⁰⁰

Neither Bukharin's letter to Stalin nor that to his wife of about a month later (January 15, 1938) show any fear that his family might be mistreated. By far his biggest concern in this last letter is that his prison writings be preserved for posterity.¹⁰¹

¹⁰⁰ Published in English translation, somewhat abridged, in Getty and Naumov 556-560. Getty (563) points out that even in this letter Bukharin revealed he had been lying previously. For a thorough analysis see Furr and Bobrov (2009). The Getty and Naumov translation is reprinted in George Walden, "The Evil that Stalin Did." At http://www.yale.edu/annals/Reviews/review_texts/Walden_on_Getty_Ass._Newspapers_10.22.99.html. Walden, a Conservative British M.P., naively or through wishful thinking takes Bukharin's innocence for granted. The original was considered so important that it was published twice in the same year, in two different prestigious Russian historical journals. See "Iz lichnogo arkhiva. 'Prosti menia, Koba . . .' Neizvestnoe pis'mo N. Bukharina." Istochnik 0 [sic] (1993), pp. 23-25; "Poslednoe Pis'mo." Rodina 2 (1993), pp. 52-54.

¹⁰¹ "Vse struny dushi." Rodina № 8-9, 1992, p. 68. The letter is published in English in Anna Larina-Bukharina, This I Cannot Forget: The Memoirs of Bukharin's Widow (New York: Norton, 1993), pp. 353 ff., and in Nikolai Bukharin, How It All Began: The Prison Novel (New York: Columbia University Press, 1998), pp. 336-38.

We now have Bukharin's aforementioned confession of June 2, 1937. A careful study of it concludes there is no reason to believe it was anything but genuine. (Furr and Bobrov) As Getty hints, its timing suggests that Bukharin may have heard of the arrest of Marshal Tukhachevsky and the other high-ranking military officers. Bukharin claimed to be involved in a loose network of interlocking conspiracies with these men, as well as with other circles.

NKVD men apparently believed that Bukharin had been relying on Tukhachevsky and the military conspirators to save him (Getty and Naumov 446, quoting Larina):

And later, in September 1939, in the inner prison at the Lubyanka, one of the investigative workers, Matusov, said to me:

— You thought that Yakir and Tukhachevsky would save your Bukharin. But we work well. That's why it didn't happen.¹⁰²

¹⁰² Russian text Larina, Nezabyvaemoe, 27. The corresponding English translation by Gary Kern is slightly different (This I Cannot Forget, pp. 59-60).

Cohen suggests something similar ("Bukharin na Lubyanke" 60). If Bukharin had been hoping the military men would be successful in seizing power, then confessing once he had heard of their arrests might be an attempt to show himself to be cooperative in order to try for the best possible deal.

Cohen claims:

Within weeks of his arrest, Bukharin's wife had been exiled . . . to Astrakhan in June 1937. (375)

Bukharin was arrested on February 27, 1937, the date the resolution in his and Rykov's case was passed by the Central Committee Plenum. Bukharin's family was moved out of their Kremlin apartment only after he had confessed; Stalin issued the order on June 19, 1937 (Lubyanka 2, No. 103, 226) This was not "within weeks of his arrest," but almost four months later.

So why does Cohen write "within weeks . . ." and then "in June 1937"? Because "within weeks" sounds more callous? Bukharin's wife Anna Larina claims she was sent to Astrakhan and not arrested until September 20, 1937¹⁰³ (Larina 43). So the opposite of what Cohen said is in fact the truth. Bukharin's wife was not exiled after his arrest. Instead she and her son were allowed to remain until after Bukharin had confessed. This suggests the possibility that, had Bukharin not confessed, his family might not have been sent out of Moscow at all. Nor does Cohen report the date of Larina's arrest.

¹⁰³ Spouses of those arrested in national security cases were routinely arrested for further investigation, evidently on the assumption that they would have some knowledge at least of their spouse's illegal activities but had not reported it to the police as required by law and so were likely to be accessories. This must have often been the case, but it seems that Bukharin did not tell Larina of his activities. She was Bukharin's third wife, twenty-six years his junior (born 1914).

We can hardly overestimate the significance of Bukharin's June 2, 1937 confession. Bukharin's name had first been mentioned by Reingol'd and Kamenev at the August 1936 Zinov'ev-Kamenev Trial, at which time the NKVD had begun an investigation of his activities. Since then Bukharin had vehemently denied his guilt many times: in a very long document sent to all the delegates to the February-March 1937 Plenum; at the Plenum itself; at a minimum of five "face-to-face confrontations" with former associates and comrades who denounced him; and in private letters to Stalin.

His confession of June 2 and his subsequent confessions gave the lie to all his fervent and repeated oaths that he had never been involved in the oppositionists' conspiracies. When he did confess, it was to the most serious crimes imaginable.

So many other defendants, including the Military leaders, implicated Bukharin that perhaps he thought further denials would be futile. As he said in his own trial, the confession of the accused is not at all necessary to prove guilt. Doubtless Bukharin simply did as many criminals do — try to "get the best deal possible" from the prosecution once denial has become futile, the evidence against him so overwhelming that conviction was a foregone conclusion.

It would have been logical for Bukharin to attempt this tactic. At the second Moscow "Show Trial" of January 23 — 30, 1937, four of the convicted defendants had been given terms of imprisonment rather than the death penalty. Two of these four, Karl Radek and Grigori Sokol'nikov, had been leading figures in Trotsky's underground conspiratorial movement. Radek had been directly in touch with Trotsky and also with German and Japanese agents. Bukharin might well have reasoned that he himself had done nothing more serious than what Radek had done. Moreover, unlike Radek, he had been closely allied with Stalin in the past: both politically during the mid-1920s, and as a personal friend for many years.

But by confessing to crimes he had denied a great many times, Bukharin had burned his bridges. Thereafter no one could take anything he said at face value. It was also reasonable for the State to suspect that his wives would have known something of his conspiratorial activities. All but the last one, Anna Larina, had been revolutionary activists in their own right, not unlike most of the other oppositionists (though her father had been a famous Bolshevik, Larina herself had not been an activist).

We now have four letters from Bukharin to Stalin while Bukharin was in prison. Not a single one of them shows any fear for his family except that they have no "material basis" — that is, income. In a very long letter he mentions them only in a few lines.¹⁰⁴

¹⁰⁴ Letter from prison of April 15, 1937: "No ia to znaiu, chto ia prav," Istochnik 3 (2000), p. 54.

Bukharin on Trial

Cohen asserts that at his trial in March 1938 Bukharin did not in fact confess to anything specific.

In fact, however, as some understood at the time and others eventually came to see, Bukharin did not really confess to the criminal charges at all. (372)

This is perhaps Cohen's major claim — or, at any rate, the one for which he has become most famous and of which he has somehow convinced many others. For example, a member of Gorbachev's "rehabilitation commission" suggested that Bukharin had "in essence" denied his guilt in everything (RKEB 3, 40). This remark seems to have been completely ignored by the rest of the commission. They had good reason to ignore it, as we shall see.

Much of our discussion below will concentrate on showing that Cohen is wrong about this. For in reality, Bukharin did indeed confess many times and to many specific crimes.

Cohen states that when Bukharin accepted responsibility for "the bloc," he meant something else. The Prosecutor meant "the bloc of Rights and Trotskyites." But Cohen believed that no such "bloc" existed. So he wrote:

He [Bukharin] would accept the symbolic role of representative Bolshevik: "I bear responsibility for the bloc," that is, for Bolshevism. (375)

Cohen is completely wrong here. We know from Trotsky's papers at Harvard University's Houghton Library that there was indeed a "bloc of Rights and Trotskyites." Trotsky denied this at the time, most notably at the Dewey Commission hearings in 1937. But we know that he was deliberately lying. Arch Getty found traces of the correspondence between Trotsky and, among others, Radek and Sokolnikov (two of the main defendants in the Piatakov-Radek trial) in the Trotsky Archive in Boston:

At the time of the Moscow show trials, Trotsky denied that he had any communications with the defendants since his exile in 1929. Yet it is now clear that in 1932 he sent secret personal letters to former leading oppositionists Karl Radek, G. Sokolnikov, E. Preobrazhensky, and others. While the contents of these letters are unknown, it seems reasonable to believe that they involved an attempt to persuade the addressees to return to opposition.¹⁰⁵

In Getty's words,

The meeting with Smirnov took place in 1932 in Berlin. Smirnov informed Sedov that a "bloc" had been formed in the USSR between the Trotskyists and Zinov'evists, with the rightists remaining aloof for the time being. Sedov relayed this to Trotsky.¹⁰⁶

¹⁰⁵ J. Arch Getty: "Trotsky in Exile: The Founding of the Fourth International," Soviet Studies, vol. XXXVIII, no 1, January 1986, pp. 27-28.

¹⁰⁶ Getty, post to H-RUSSIA November 24 1998. At <<http://tinyurl.com/8ogmk>>.

Getty shows that Trotsky's secretary Jan van Heijenoort reminded Trotsky about this at the time of the Dewey Commission hearings. The late Trotskyist scholar Pierre Broué, who was of course intensely hostile to Stalin, was nevertheless forced to agree that the "bloc" really did exist and that Trotsky had lied in denying this.¹⁰⁷ Therefore when Bukharin referred to the "bloc," there is no reason to think that he meant anything else by this term.

¹⁰⁷ "Trotsky et le bloc des oppositions de 1932," Cahiers Léon Trotsky 5 (1980-81), pp. 5-37.

Cohen takes the following nonsense straight from Orlov (282-3; Chapter 23, "Nikolai Bukharin"):

After seeing Stalin's personal revisions in the text of his initial confession, which had been agreed upon in a session with Yezhov and Stalin's emissary Voroshilov in June, Bukharin repudiated it. (376)

As Getty pointed out, Orlov was in no position to know any of this, a fact that ought to have been obvious to Cohen too. It is just another of Orlov's many fabrications. Cohen undoubtedly chose it because it fit his theory so well, but it was completely irresponsible of him to do so.

Did Bukharin Confess?

Cohen's theory is that

Briefly stated, his [Bukharin's] tactic would be to make sweeping confessions that he was 'politically responsible' for everything, thereby at once saving his family and underlining his symbolic role, while at the same time flatly denying or subtly disproving his complicity in any actual crime. The real political meaning of the criminal charges would then be clear to "the interested." (376)

This is yet another completely false statement by Cohen. Bukharin certainly did confess numerous times to many specific, "actual" crimes. We'll spend a good deal of space proving that by citing the text of the trial transcript. We are forced to conclude Cohen must have decided to deliberately lie here, since it is impossible for anyone to study the transcript of the trial and yet assert that Bukharin failed to confess to specific crimes, as Cohen does.

At the outset of his testimony Bukharin made the following statement:

BUKHARIN: Roughly since 1928. I plead guilty to being one of the outstanding leaders of this "bloc of Rights and Trotskyites." Consequently, I plead guilty to what directly follows from this, the sum total of crimes committed by this counter-revolutionary organization, irrespective of whether or not I knew of, whether or not I took a direct part, in any particular act. Because I am responsible as one of the leaders and not as a cog of this counter-revolutionary organization. (1938 Trial 370)

Cohen immediately claimed that "the second half of this statement made nonsense of the first." This is not so at all. In many jurisdictions — for example, normally in the United States today — all of the participants in a criminal conspiracy are juridically guilty of the crimes of their co-conspirators. Moreover, it is obvious that the leader of a criminal enterprise — a Mafia don, for example — is responsible for the acts of his underlings.

What follows here is a rather lengthy account of the specific crimes to which Bukharin did in fact confess. We will accompany the discussion with specific quotations from the Trial transcript in order to prove that Bukharin did indeed confess to specific crimes. We have added boldface so the reader can more easily see Bukharin's admissions.

Specific Confessions

In his own words, Bukharin explicitly confessed to plotting the dismemberment of the USSR "by forcible overthrow," "with the help of foreign states," and "with the help of a war" (1938 Trial 371).

VYSHINSKY: Was the organization of an insurrectionary movement one of your aims?

BUKHARIN: There was an insurrectionary orientation.

VYSHINSKY: There was an orientation? Did you send Slepkov to the North Caucasus to organize this business? Did you send Yakovenko to Biisk for the same purpose?

BUKHARIN: Yes. (373)

BUKHARIN: I utilized legal opportunities for anti-Soviet, illegal purposes. In this talk, which took place in the summer of 1932, Pyatakov told me of his meeting with Sedov concerning Trotsky's policy of terrorism. At that time Pyatakov and I considered that these were not our ideas, but we decided that we would find a common language very soon and that our differences in the struggle against Soviet power would be overcome. Tomsy and Rykov, I may be mistaken, spoke with Kamenev and Sokolnikov. I remember that at that time Tomsy particularly insisted on a coup d'état and a concentration of all forces, while the members of the Right centre orientated themselves on an insurrectionary movement. (391)

BUKHARIN: That refers to the following period. Perhaps you will allow me to relate the facts in chronological order, as I have my material arranged, at first about the "palace coup," then the transition to an uprising, from an uprising to, strictly speaking, a coup d'état.

VYSHINSKY: Tell me, what was the main object of the group of plotters in this sphere?

BUKHARIN: Even at that period the main object was the overthrow of the Soviet government by force. (395)

VYSHINSKY: Well, tell us then how you were preparing for the overthrow of the Soviet government by force.

BUKHARIN: At that period we were already discussing the question of the overthrow of the Soviet government by force, with the aid of a group of military participants in the plot.

VYSHINSKY: A group?

BUKHARIN: Yes.

VYSHINSKY: A group of participants in your plot?

BUKHARIN: Absolutely correct.

VYSHINSKY: In the persons of Tukhachevsky, Primakov and some others?

BUKHARIN: There was the Yenukidze group as well. (395-6)

BUKHARIN: . . . I can mention here yet another fact which has not been referred to. At that time I spoke about myself. I sent Slepkov to prepare a kulak revolt in the Kuban. Rykov sent Eismont to the Caucasus, and he entered into connections with the Right-winger Pivovarov and the Trotskyite Beloborodov; this has been referred to during the Court investigation. (396)

VYSHINSKY: You wish to present matters as if you were not practically concerned with these crimes.

BUKHARIN: How so, when I sent Yakovenko to Siberia to organize armed kulak insurrections, and sent Slepkov to the North Caucasus for the same purpose? (397-8)

BUKHARIN: I sent Slepkov there as an individual skilled in the organization of the insurrectionary movement. But once he got there, found his bearings and learnt what organizations there were, Slepkov could undertake certain steps without me. (398)

BUKHARIN: I don't deny having sent Slepkov there. I sent him to establish contact with Whiteguard Cossack circles. (398)

VYSHINSKY: I ask you, accused Bukharin, did you send Slepkov to organize Whiteguard kulak insurrections?

BUKHARIN: Yes. (399)

VYSHINSKY: I revert to the first question. Consequently, Karakhan engaged in negotiations with the Germans. Apparently this took place with the knowledge of your bloc. Did Bukharin know of this?

RYKOV: Tomsy told me and Bukharin of this.

VYSHINSKY: So, then, was Bukharin aware of this? Accused Bukharin, were you aware of this?

BUKHARIN: Citizen Procurator, I have already said twice that I was. (406-7)

THE PRESIDENT: Accused Bukharin, proceed.

BUKHARIN: In 1933-34 the kulaks were already smashed, an insurrectionary movement ceased to be a real possibility, and therefore in the centre of the Right organization a period again set in when the orientation toward a counter-revolutionary conspiratorial coup became the central idea. Thus, from a "palace coup," from a combination of a coup with a mass insurrection, and from an orientation toward a mass insurrection with the corresponding practical conclusions, we passed on to counter-revolutionary plotting pure and simple. And the central idea became that of a coup d'état which was to be accomplished by means of an armed conspiracy.

The forces of the conspiracy were: the forces of Yenukidze plus Yagoda, their organizations in the Kremlin and in the People's Commissariat of Internal Affairs; Yenukidze also succeeded around that time in enlisting, as far as I can remember, the former commandant of the Kremlin, Peterson, who, apropos, was in his time the commandant of Trotsky's train.

Then there was the military organization of the conspirators: Tukhachevsky, Kork and others.

VYSHINSKY: What year was that?

BUKHARIN: I think it was in 1933-34. (419)

BUKHARIN: It was the first time in my life that I spoke to Khodjayev about politics. This explains the nature of the conversation. I told him that it was necessary for us to be prepared to overthrow the Soviet government by forcible means, and that for this purpose it was necessary to take advantage of possible mass movements which might occur there. (421)

VYSHINSKY: Did you talk with Khodjayev about overthrowing the Soviet government, which your conspiratorial group was preparing for?

BUKHARIN: I spoke in vague nebulous formulas.

VYSHINSKY: But such formulas as he could understand?

BUKHARIN: Perfectly right.

VYSHINSKY (to Khodjayev): Did you understand?

KHOD JAYEV: Absolutely.

VYSHINSKY: Hence, it is not a question of words but of the contents. Did you say that it was necessary to orientate yourselves in your foreign relations towards various foreign states, and to make use of the internal contradictions and international contradictions in the interests of the struggle of your group of conspirators against the Soviet government.

BUKHARIN: Right.

VYSHINSKY: Did you say it?

BUKHARIN: I did. (423-4)

BUKHARIN: . . . I must say that at a much earlier period I personally had already given instructions to Semyonov to organize terrorist groups and reported this to our Right centre. It was accepted. Thus, I, more than any other member of the centre, am responsible for the organization of Semyonov's terrorist groups.
(425)

. . . As regards my direct practical activities at that time, and not only my theoretical formulations, I must testify that I tried to establish a connection of this kind through a number of intermediaries and also personally. I also charged the Socialist-Revolutionary Semyonov — who was mentioned during the interrogation the day before yesterday — to get in touch with the underground members of the Socialist-Revolutionary Central Committee, who, if I am not mistaken, were then in exile (which does not alter the case), and consequently I am directly responsible for it not only as a member of the Right centre, but directly responsible in the immediate sense of the word. (425-6)

Secondly, I tried to establish contact with organizations and groups of Socialist-Revolutionaries abroad through a certain Chlenov. This was one of the men in our diplomatic service, whom I had known years ago, since our school days, when he was a member of a Social-Democratic organization of that time. I say this not by way of a digression into history, but to explain and show why I felt such confidence in him despite the conspiratorial nature of the work of that time. And he tried to establish connections with the Central Committee of the Socialist-Revolutionaries; when he returned, he had no time to discuss the matter with me in detail, but from this conversation I ascertained approximately the following. The Socialist-Revolutionaries agreed in principle to support the bloc and maintain contact with the Rights, Trotskyites, Zinov'evites, and the like. But they demanded formal guarantees, almost in written form, their conditions being that the peasant policy should be changed in the spirit of a kulak orientation, that the Socialist-Revolutionary and Menshevik Parties should be legalized — which obviously implied that the government which would be set up if the conspiracy were successful would be a coalition government. (426)

In the summer of 1934 Radek told me that directions had been received from Trotsky, that Trotsky was conducting negotiations with the Germans, that Trotsky had already promised the Germans a number of territorial concessions, including the Ukraine. If my memory does not fail me, territorial concessions to Japan were also mentioned. In general, in these negotiations Trotsky already behaved not only as a conspirator who hopes to get power by means of an armed coup at some future date, but already felt himself the master of Soviet land, which he wants to convert from Soviet to non-Soviet. (430)

VYSHINSKY: Permit me to read Bukharin's testimony, Vol.V, pp. 95-96: "Tomsky told me that two variants were discussed: The case where the new government would be formed in time of peace," and this meant that the conspirators would organize a new government in time of peace, and "the case where it would be organized in time of war; in the latter case the Germans were demanding big economic concessions," concessions of which I have already spoken, "and were insisting upon cessions of territory." Tell us, is this true or not?

BUKHARIN: Yes, that is all true.

VYSHINSKY (continues to read): "I asked Tomsky how the mechanism of the coup was visualized in this connection. He said that this was the business of the military organization, which was to open the front to the Germans."

BUKHARIN: Yes, correct. (433-4)

In the face of these quotations from the Trial transcript we are at a loss to explain how Cohen could honestly assert that Bukharin did not confess to any specific crimes. Was Cohen so blinded by his "brilliant" preconceived idea that Bukharin "never confessed" that he just could not understand the words of the transcript? This is hard to believe: Cohen actually published an edition of the transcript of the Bukharin trial in 1965.

Or did Cohen simply realize that the vast majority of readers would not attentively read the 800 pages of the trial transcript themselves but instead would "trust" whatever Cohen told them it said? Did Cohen deliberately conceal the truth from his readers? Whatever the explanation, it does Cohen no honor.

Did Bukharin Retract His Confessions?

At one point in his discussion it appears as though Cohen was modifying his assertion, changing it to a claim that Bukharin did confess but then subsequently "took back" his confession:

. . . Bukharin later devalued his entire "confession" with a single aside: 'The confession of the accused is a medieval principle of jurisprudence.' (377)

Cohen is simply wrong here. He has wrenched this sentence out of its context and so changed its meaning. Here is Bukharin's fuller statement:

The point, of course, is not this repentance, or my personal repentance in particular. The Court can pass its verdict without it. The confession of the accused is not essential. The confession of the accused is a medieval principle of jurisprudence. But here we also have the internal demolition of the forces of counter-revolution. And one must be a Trotsky not to lay down one's arms. (778, emphasis added — GF)

This doesn't mean "I am not guilty." Much less does Bukharin mean that "confessions" are in themselves somehow "medieval." Such a statement would be stupid indeed. Confessions are a very important part of many judicial proceedings and are taken into account at sentencing in the United States, Great Britain and elsewhere. In the United States most criminal cases are decided on the basis of plea bargaining — that is, confessions — to avoid trial. Bukharin is simply making the observation, obvious on its face, that a person may be convicted by other testimony and evidence whether or not he or she confesses. It is only the insistence that a person "confess" is that Bukharin was calling "medieval."

Perhaps Bukharin was thinking of the belief, common in the Middle Ages and among some religious persons even today that confession is essential to save the soul of the accused. But whether he had this or something else in mind his statements does not "devalue," "take back," or in any way compromise the validity of the confessions had had previously made.

Bukharin also means that his own statement is not important in comparison to the smashing of the conspiracy.

I feel it my duty to say here that in the parallelogram of forces which went to make up the counter-revolutionary tactics, Trotsky was the principal motive force. And the most acute methods — terrorism, espionage, the dismemberment of the U.S.S.R. and wrecking — proceeded primarily from this source." (778)

Bukharin's Final Plea

Cohen claims:

As the trial progressed, he was careful — for his family's sake — to emphasize repeatedly his extravagant confession of responsibility for all "the crimes of the bloc," while specifically, in one manner or another, disclaiming each and every one. (377)

As we have amply demonstrated this is simply not true of the trial as a whole. It is a tribute to the dogmatic devotion to the "anti-Stalin" paradigm in the mainstream of Soviet history that no one, apparently, has ever taken the trouble to point out that "the Emperor has no clothes" — that this statement of Cohen's is not just false, but blatantly false.

But in his final plea (Evening Session, March 12, 1938, Transcript pp.767ff.) and without any covert or "Aesopian" language, Bukharin did vigorously deny three of the most serious accusations against him: a plot to assassinate Lenin, Stalin and Sverdlov in 1918; personal involvement with foreign intelligence services; and prior knowledge of the assassination of Kirov and other alleged murders of the 1930s.

. . . I categorically deny that I was connected with foreign intelligence services, that they were my masters and that I acted in accordance with their wishes. (770)

I categorically deny my complicity in the assassination of Kirov, Menzhinsky, Kuibyshev, Gorky and Maxim Peshkov. According to Yagoda's testimony, Kirov was assassinated in accordance with a decision of the "bloc of Rights and Trotskyites." I knew nothing of it.

(771)

I refute the accusation of having plotted against the life of Vladimir Ilyich [Lenin] . . . (778)

VYSHINSKY: They [two Left Socialist-Revolutionary witnesses at the trial who testified against Bukharin] say that you, as a traitor to the revolution, were preparing to arrest Lenin, Stalin and Sverdlov.

BUKHARIN: That I admit.

VYSHINSKY: And they added that you were also preparing to assassinate them.

BUKHARIN: With this addition I absolutely do not agree; I categorically deny it. (509)

In many passages Bukharin vigorously denied having conspired to assassinate Lenin, or Lenin, Stalin and Sverdlov. This was one of the major charges against him, and one of which he was convicted despite his denials.

These denials are utterly inconsistent with Cohen's unsupported claim that Bukharin confessed because his family had been threatened. In essence, Cohen wants it both ways. First, he would have it that Bukharin made only "sweeping confessions that he was 'politically responsible' for everything, thereby at once saving his family. . . ." Second, Cohen claimed that Bukharin was "flatly denying or subtly disproving his complicity in any actual crime" (376).

But if Bukharin confessed in order to "save his family," then why did he stoutly fail to confess to so many of the serious crimes he was charged with? Why didn't he just affirm everything? Gorbachev's rehabilitation commission recognized this same dilemma and discussed it (RKEB 3, 39; 51; 55).

It may be replied that the plot to assassinate Lenin, Stalin and Sverdlov was not one of "the crimes of the bloc." Perhaps it was only to those crimes that Bukharin felt he had to confess? But as we've already see, Bukharin denied responsibility for some of these same "crimes of the bloc" as well, such as the plot to kill Kirov and the connection with foreign intelligence services.

Had Bukharin falsely confessed to save his family, to spare himself torture, or for any other reason, why would he deny some of the most serious charges against him? Prosecutor Vyshinsky spent a great deal of time trying to prove Bukharin guilty of plotting Lenin's assassination, and Bukharin spent a great deal of effort denying this, all in open court. This fact alone is strong evidence that Bukharin's confessions — his admissions of guilt to certain crimes but not to others — were sincere.

Cohen quotes (380) a New York Times article in which reporter Harold Denny wrote that Bukharin was ". . . tremendously convincing . . . simply and intensely an earnest man completely unafraid but merely trying to get his story straight before the world."

Cohen continues:

It should be noted, though it cannot be explained, that this same correspondent, Harold Denny, then wrote of the trials: "in the broad sense they are not fakes."¹⁰⁸

¹⁰⁸ New York Times March 14, 1938, p. 4; quoted at Cohen, p. 475 n. 203.

It is not Denny's stance that is strange — it's Cohen's! Denny reported that Bukharin confessed to many crimes, and "his straight story" was that he was guilty of these crimes, though not of plotting to murder Lenin or involvement in the murders of "Gorky and others." His description here is accurate.

To sum up: Bukharin did repeatedly confess to certain specific and very serious crimes. Meanwhile he steadfastly refused to confess to other crimes.

Such behavior is incompatible with the assumption that Bukharin confessed because of threats to his family. Moreover, there never has been a shred of evidence that Bukharin's family was threatened in any way.

Cohen's affirmation that Bukharin "disclaimed" responsibility for any specific crime is nothing short of bizarre. It is directly contradicted by many very specific statements Bukharin made during the trial, some of which we have quoted above. As someone who had not simply read the trial transcript but had published his own edition of it, Cohen could not have "misread" these passages or been ignorant of them.

Was Bukharin's Final Plea "Falsified"?

Since the huge typescript of the preliminary text of the March 1938 trial was discovered in the Archive of the President of the Russian Federation, some scholars have claimed that the published version was "falsified" insofar as it reflects emendations and changes of this text.¹⁰⁹ This preliminary, much lengthier text has not been published.

But we do have an annotated edition of one part of it. We have the full version of Bukharin's Final Plea, showing additions, deletions, and changes. We can see that nothing of substance was changed. As one anticommunist scholar has put it,

Now these purely logical considerations can be considered to have been empirically proven thanks to the well-known difference between the genuine transcript and the transcript that was "corrected" by Stalin and was published in 1938. Stalin did in fact make changes but this at the same time proves that what Bukharin said came precisely from him and not from the NKVD. In addition, these changes are insignificant ones. Stalin's "corrections" did not change anything of substance.

By means of the "corrections" made by Stalin personally or at his direction by the judges Ul'rikh, Matulevich, and others, Stalin emphasizes his [Bukharin's] admissions and weakened his objections. The fundamental content remained the same as it had been before the "editors" began work on the text. Even before the involvement of Stalin and his flunkies there were fully enough confessions by Bukharin to declare him a serious criminal.

...

There is still another striking thing. "I also confess myself guilty of the preparation of a conspiracy, a "palace coup," in the preparation of a coup d'état, said Bukharin to the judge. The judges crossed out the words "in the preparation of a coup d'état." There was not only insufficient evidence of this but on the contrary this excision went against their primary political task. It would have been in their interest to cross out the term "palace coup," but not "coup d'état," since any comparison of the Soviet center of power with a "palace" was a crude provocation of official consciousness.¹¹⁰

¹¹⁰ Ignatov, op.cit.

Whatever the specific reasons for the changes made, nothing was imputed to Bukharin that he did not admit to, and at least one substantive admission he made was omitted, as Ignatov indicates. Stalin — or whoever was charged with editing the transcript — abbreviated it somewhat, but did not falsify it at all. Those like Iurii Murin and Wladislaw Hedeler who say it was falsified are — to put it politely — in error.

¹⁰⁹ IU. G. Murin. "Kak fal'sifitsirovalos' delo Bukharina." Novaia i Noveishaia Istoriia. 1 (1995), pp. 63 ff.; Wladislaw Hedeler, "Ezhov's Scenario for the Great Terror and the Falsified Record of the Third Moscow Show Trial." In McLoughlin, Barry, and Kevin McDermott, Stalin's Terror: High Politics and Mass Repression in the Soviet Union. New York: Palgrave — MacMillan, 2003, pp. 34-55. Despite the titles, neither article demonstrates any "falsification" of any importance.

After the Trial

According to one account that circulated in Moscow, 'Bukharin and Rykov died with curses against Stalin on their lips. And they died standing up — not groveling on the cellar floor and weeping for mercy like Zinov'ev and Kamenev. (Cohen 381)

We have no idea how Zinov'ev, Kamenev, Bukharin or Rykov acted at their executions. All this is utterly unfounded rumor. In any other field of study it would be recognized as such. As we have seen, such is the level of intellectual dishonesty within the field of Soviet history that the citation of such rumors as "evidence" is routine. And Cohen — or his Russian translator — tacitly acknowledges the unreliability of this rumor by omitting Zinov'ev's and Kamenev's names from the Russian translation at this point!

But now we do know something about the post-trial actions of Bukharin, Rykov, Zinov'ev and Kamenev. All of them filed appeals with the Soviet Supreme Court. Bukharin's letter of appeal includes a renewed admission of guilt:

In my soul there is not a single word of protest. For my crimes it would be necessary to shoot me ten times over. A proletarian court has given its decision, one I earned by my criminal activity, and I am ready to bear my deserved punishment and to die surrounded by the justified indignation, hatred and despite of the great, heroic people of the USSR, whom I so basely betrayed.¹¹¹

¹¹¹ "A story of ten who were shot," Izvestiia September 2, 1992, p. 3 col. 3. Photocopies of the originals are in the Volkogonov archive.

Bukharin composed two appeals: one a shorter letter, the other an essay four typewritten pages in length. In both of them he reiterates his guilt in the strongest terms. Rykov's, Zinov'ev's and Kamenev's appeals are simpler but also confirm their guilt.

These appeals present a serious problem for anyone who imagines that Bukharin or Rykov were really innocent. For will not a person who is innocent but has agreed to confess for some other reason — fear for his own life, fear for his family, of torture, etc. — at some point refer to the "agreement" that he has made? If he has confessed because he has been promised his life will be spared, his family unharmed, or no torture used, we should expect him to say: "I have carried out my part of the agreement. I have confessed to crimes I am not guilty of. Now it is your turn to carry out your part of the bargain."

But we have nothing like that in either Bukharin's or Rykov's case. Instead they confirm their guilt and repentance, and humbly ask only for mercy. They did so in documents which were never intended to be made public, and where they could feel free to tell the truth or say whatever they wanted.

Evidence

The evidence we possess today is consistent with only one hypothesis: that Bukharin was, in fact, guilty of those crimes to which he himself confessed. However, some people will say that Bukharin might still have been innocent, or even that he must be innocent, despite this fact.

This is not very different from Cohen's position. Cohen assumes that Bukharin was innocent despite the fact that he had no evidence whatsoever that he was. There were rumors, and some unsubstantiated hints from the Khrushchev era. But despite Robert Conquest's view of hearsay and rumor as "the best, though not infallible, source" of evidence, in reality all historians know even then that such a statement would have been invalid — indeed, unimaginable — in any field save that of Soviet history.

As a Soviet historical figure, Bukharin is particularly important in many ways. One of them is that we know a great deal more about his life after his arrest, during his imprisonment, than we do of any other defendant.

It is in principle impossible to prove that something did not happen. There can only be evidence of things that did happen. We have no evidence, or even indirect indication of any kind, that Bukharin's confessions were false, or given as a result of "torture" or threats. On the contrary: we know that Bukharin was imprisoned under conditions that made it possible for him to produce a large body of intellectual, historical, and literary work during the approximately one year of his imprisonment before trial.

We also know that, in addition to his confessions at his trial in March 1938, he produced at least four other confession-interrogations: one on June 2, 1937, which we have edited and examined, one on June 14, 1937 (cited in RKEB 2, 697, the "Shvernik Report" of 1964), and two in December, 1937, on the first and 25th, these last two cited by Vyshinskii at Bukharin's Trial. Bukharin made the last of these two weeks after his now-famous letter to Stalin of December 10, 1937 in which he claims that his previous confessions were not true.¹¹² If this last were publicly available (it has not been released), this confession would be important in assessing that letter. But we know that these documents exist, and that Bukharin confirmed them all at trial.

¹¹² For a discussion of this letter see Furr and Bobrov 2009.

We also have another statement of Bukharin's dated February 20, 1938, shortly before the Trial. Though it is titled "confession" (pokazaniia), it consists mainly of Bukharin's denial, with clarification, of the charge that he had plotted to kill Lenin while at the same time fully confessing that he was in a conspiracy to arrest Lenin, Sverdlov, and Stalin, and effect a coup d'état (gosudarstvennogo perevorota). None of these have been officially released to researchers. All of these confessions are still secret in Russia, officially denied to any and all historians. The fact that one of them has been published (Furr and Bobrov) is due to its chance discovery rather than to any decision by Russian authorities, who still keep the original secret.

Hypothesis, Evidence, and Paradigm

There is much more than this, though. Bukharin's guilt is consistent with a large and growing body of other materials related to the Moscow Trials that we now have. All of it is mutually reinforcing — that is, consistent with the actual existence of a set of interconnected conspiracies such as Soviet authorities alleged, and such as these individuals, of which Bukharin was only one, confessed to.

Moreover, in his June 2, 1937 confession and in his own testimony at the March 1938 Trial, Bukharin named virtually all the major defendants at the First and Second Moscow Trials, plus Tukhachevsky and the military conspirators tried and executed with him in June 1937, plus Trotsky, the chief indicted but absent defendant at all of the three Moscow Trials. Bukharin's guilt constitutes strong evidence against all of them.

According to the widely accepted "anti-Stalin paradigm" of Soviet history, Bukharin and all the rest of the Moscow Trial defendants were innocent. This is, in fact, a hypothesis, like its contrary: the hypothesis that the same defendants (or some of them, etc.) were guilty. One tacit hypothesis of this part of the "anti-Stalin paradigm" can be phrased as follows: "Bukharin was innocent." Since it is generally impossible to prove a negative, we need to rephrase these contrary hypotheses positively.

Any attempt to prove Bukharin was innocent must confront the evidence that points to his guilt. We can rephrase the two hypotheses as follows:

- Hypothesis #1: Bukharin was guilty of at least those crimes to which he confessed.
- Hypothesis #2: All the evidence against Bukharin was fabricated by the NKVD — i.e., directly or indirectly by Stalin.

Concerning the first hypothesis, we have a great deal of evidence that Bukharin, and other Moscow Trials defendants, were guilty. This evidence begins with the confessions at the trials but does not stop there. Since the end of the USSR, a great deal of additional evidence has been made public.

What evidence exists to support the hypothesis that this evidence was fabricated? The answer is simple: We have no such evidence at all. No primary-source evidence exists of any conspiracy or action by the NKVD, the Soviet prosecutor, or any person or institution, to fabricate or fake the evidence that Bukharin (or others) was guilty. No evidence against Bukharin, evidence that tends to prove his guilt, has been shown to have been fabricated.

All hypotheses must stand or fall on evidence. That is the basis of rationality in the discussion of historical questions. We are thus faced with the following problem:

How can it be that most researchers reject hypothesis #1, for which we have a great deal of evidence, and choose instead hypothesis #2, for which we have no evidence at all?

Anyone who would defend the hypothesis that Bukharin was innocent must contend that the evidence that points towards his guilt must have been fabricated. There is no evidence of fabrication. Put another way: Hypothesis #2 is not supported by any evidence. Yet this hypothesis remains the dominant, "orthodox" or "mainstream," position. Meanwhile we have a great deal of evidence in support of the contrary hypothesis: that Bukharin was guilty of, at least, those crimes to which he confessed at trial.

How can we account for the fact that most scholars reject the hypothesis for which there is a great deal of evidence, and choose instead the hypothesis for which we have no evidence at all? How can most scholars choose to accept as valid a hypothesis that cannot be supported rationally — that is, with evidence? Lack of objectivity, political preconceptions, prejudices, bias: These explain why some people cling to the hypothesis that has no evidence to support it — that Bukharin (and other Moscow Trial defendants) was innocent — rather than the hypothesis that has a lot of evidence to support it — that Bukharin was guilty.

This essay is concerned with what we are calling the "anti-Stalin" paradigm of Soviet high politics in the 1930s. We have examined Cohen's treatment of Bukharin in the 1930s as a representative work, a sort of synecdoche of the entire "anti-Stalin" paradigm. We have seen that insofar as this paradigm is represented by Cohen's book, it falls. There is no evidence to support it.

The problem with what we call here the "anti-Stalin" paradigm, as with all paradigms, is as follows: What happens when a critical amount of evidence has been discovered that puts the entire former paradigm into question? What happens when there is a huge amount of evidence in that supports a different paradigm?

Concerning the Moscow Trials and Bukharin specifically, the "anti-Stalin," or "Trotsky-Khrushchev-Cold War-Gorbachev-post-Soviet," paradigm holds that all the defendants were innocent of the charges to which they confessed. Explanations differ over how they came to confess to crimes they never committed. But the paradigm itself will not permit a conclusion that they were all guilty. However, there is virtually no evidence to sustain the conclusion essential to the paradigm that the defendants, Bukharin included, were innocent.

Researchers devoted to the old paradigm, therefore, are faced with a serious dilemma. On the one hand, they continue to insist that the "anti-Stalin" paradigm is correct. They might try to explain the fact that evidence to support this paradigm has not yet been found by offering a further hypothesis that such evidence will eventually be found. A more desperate version of this further hypothesis would be that such evidence did exist at one time but was destroyed on Stalin's orders in the past — destroyed so efficiently that no trace of the evidence nor of its destruction remains.

Either of these assumptions "saves" the paradigm, but at a cost. Evidence cannot be foregone forever. The more researchers have recourse to such assumptions, the less scientific — that is to say, rational — their conclusions appear.

The objective researcher will concede that there is another possibility: that the "anti-Stalin" paradigm is incorrect. It should be an easy choice. After all, it is not even a matter of determining which paradigm is supported by the preponderance of the available evidence. All the evidence we now have concerning the Moscow Trials is consistent with this hypothesis. Therefore, any objective student will come to that conclusion.

What, therefore, prevents researchers from accepting it? Doubtless such considerations as the following:

- "Bukharin's innocence" is a constituent part of "the Moscow Trials as frameup" hypothesis. This in turn is a central feature of the larger "anti-Stalin" paradigm. This paradigm cannot accommodate the hypothesis that Bukharin and the Moscow Trial defendants were guilty. Confirmation of this hypothesis by the evidence dismantles the "anti-Stalin" paradigm.
- The "anti-Stalin" paradigm has been central to the field of Soviet history since at least Khrushchev's Secret Speech of February 1956. Its predecessor, the "Trotskyist" paradigm with which it is compatible and, in many essential respects, identical, dates back to the late 1920s.

Therefore, to abandon this paradigm means to reject several generations of scholarship on the Moscow Trials. More than that: it suggests that Soviet history of the Stalin period has to be thoroughly recast. This in turn would have serious implications for all mainstream interpretations of much of the history of the 20th century. Therefore those who embrace the "anti-Stalin" paradigm have a high degree of commitment to it.

This commitment is ideological; it transcends — indeed, is incompatible with — rationality. This ideological commitment extends to the component parts of the larger "anti-Stalin" paradigm, which is constituted by these parts. These commitments too are ideological and override the scholars' commitment to rational argument.

We have briefly examined one such ideological component of the overall paradigm. That is Oleg Khlevniuk's dogmatic insistence, in defiance of all existing evidence, that Sergo Ordzhonikidze committed suicide on February 17, 1937 because of some kind of opposition to Stalin. Khlevniuk's commitment to the fictional "Ordzhonikidze suicide-protest" story is important for Khlevniuk's own credibility. He has written about it so many times for so many years that to concede its purely ideological nature now might cause many to doubt all Khlevniuk's other publications. We might wonder: How many more of Khlevniuk's many works are also pseudo-scholarship? But however desperately Khlevniuk may cling to this fiction, the tale of Ordzhonikidze's suicide in protest against Stalin is not critical for the "anti-Stalin" paradigm as a whole.

In contrast the sub-paradigm of the Moscow Trials — the premise that the defendants were innocent and thus were "framed" — is an essential component of the larger "anti-Stalin" paradigm. This sub-paradigm entails the dogmatic affirmation of Bukharin's innocence. We now have a great deal of information about Bukharin. None of it is consistent with the "anti-Stalin" paradigm. All of it is consistent only with the paradigm that Bukharin was guilty of what he confessed to. But Bukharin's confessions and testimony implicate all the major defendants at the previous two Moscow Trials, plus the military leaders in the so-called "Tukhachevsky affair," plus Trotsky, defendant in absentia in all the Moscow trials.

Therefore, to concede what the evidence suggests — that Bukharin was guilty of at least what he confessed to — means abandoning the whole "anti-Stalin" paradigm. In turn this would mean that the history of the Soviet Union during the crucial decade of the 1930s must be completely recast.

A Better Paradigm for the 1930s

The following paragraphs briefly outline a paradigm of Soviet political history of the 1930s that fits the available evidence.

During the 1930s the Soviet leadership was faced with a series of conspiracies at the highest levels of state, party, and military leadership. These conspiracies encompassed an undetermined number of conspiratorial groups all over the country. They involved assassinations, or "terror," widespread sabotage, and espionage for and collaboration with hostile foreign states.

No police or military — no government — can possibly be prepared in advance to deal with such a catastrophic event, one that poses an immediate threat to the existence of the state itself. Widespread treason on the highest level is far beyond the ability of any government to handle in its normal bureaucratic, constitutional, manner. Confronted even with much lesser but still grave challenges, any government whether capitalist or socialist would react swiftly and with great force. Given this context large-scale inaccuracies — condemnation of innocent people, as well as passing over some of the guilty — are predictable, even inevitable.

So the mass repression was, in part, a reaction to a huge perceived threat. But it was much more than that as well. We now know that Ezhov, head of the NKVD, and a number of the First Secretaries used the understandable panic over the high-level conspiracies just discovered to repress many thousands of persons who had nothing to do with any such conspiracies. IUrii Zhukov and others have suggested that these were persons who, in the event of contested elections under the new 1936 Constitution, would not have voted for Party candidates.

We also have evidence that Ezhov and his top NKVD men framed, through torture and intimidation, a great many people, including Party members, into confessing that they were participants in the anti-Soviet conspiracies when they were not. Ezhov and his right-hand man Frinovsky later admitted that they did this to cover up the fact that they were planning their own coup d'état, again in concert with other opposition groups and with Germany and Japan.

At this time Stalin and top leaders associated with him were pushing for a representative Soviet democracy, with universal, secret, equal, and — the crucial point — contested elections. Many Party leaders feared such elections and, in the political struggle that ensued, they were able to defeat Stalin's initiatives. Efforts to promote this program of Soviet democracy, spearheaded by Stalin, were attempted at least several more times: in the late war period; in 1947; and at the Nineteenth Party Congress of October 1952. After Stalin's death, Lavrentii Beria paid at least lip service to the same ideal: getting the Party out of governing the country, which was to be turned over to the Soviets. Once Khrushchev, abetted by the other Presidium members, ousted and then killed Beria, this push for Soviet democracy was never heard of again.

We began to outline this new paradigm in 2005, drawing heavily upon the pioneering research of Arch Getty and IUrii Zhukov.¹¹³ But the immediate question before us in this essay is not what a new paradigm of Soviet history in the Stalin period might be. Rather, it is the unwillingness of anticommunist scholarship to abandon the old "anti-Stalin" paradigm. The ideology of the Cold War and the legitimacy of the post-Soviet states of the former USSR and Eastern Europe are all founded, to a great extent, upon the "anti-Stalin" paradigm, even upon its extreme version, the equation of the USSR with Nazi Germany and of Stalin with Hitler. Abandoning this paradigm would go far to delegitimize them.

¹¹³ Grover Furr, "Stalin and the Struggle for Democratic Reform," Cultural Logic 2005. Part One:

<https://ojs.library.ubc.ca/index.php/clogic/article/view/191861/188830>; Part Two:
<https://ojs.library.ubc.ca/index.php/clogic/article/view/191862/188831>.

Evidence, once more

Established paradigms, whether in science or history, do not fall by themselves. In the final analysis, they fall when the weight of the evidence which they cannot accommodate becomes so great that researchers begin to abandon the old paradigm for one or more others that can accommodate the evidence. Often these are younger or newer scholars, those with fewer commitments to the old paradigm or with the boldness to challenge it directly. Eventually the force of the evidence is ineluctable. Sooner or later it wins out. The old paradigm is gradually abandoned, and the new one takes its place.

In the meantime it is legitimate to ask of those who refuse to question the old paradigm of Bukharin's innocence questions such as these: What evidence would you (a) reasonably expect to exist, and (b) accept as convincing evidence of Bukharin's guilt in those crimes to which he confessed — briefly, of his participation in a wide-flung conspiracy?

The question of "evidence" is important because it goes to the rational nature of one's conclusions. If no conceivable evidence could ever convince one that — say — a conspiracy existed, then one's preconceived ideas are "fixed," unchangeable. That is, if no evidence from among the kinds of evidence that might reasonably be expected to exist could convince one that he is mistaken, then his opinion is prejudice rather than a judgment rationally held.

This latter is no simple question. Conspiracies of the kind alleged here, in the Moscow Trials, and elsewhere, are hardly likely to be formally written down and inserted into archives. This is especially so in the case of the — alleged, once again — Bukharin, or Trotsky (or, Tukhachevsky et al.) collaboration with the Germans, because it was allegedly not a conspiracy directly with representatives of Hitler or the German government but with the German General Staff, which in 1937 was still led by men who did not see eye to eye with Hitler and who worked behind his back in many ways.

Those who refuse to question, let alone abandon, the "anti-Stalin" paradigm, avoid the issue of evidence in one of a number of ways. For instance, they may assert that:

- "We know the NKVD did, in fact, torture many people to force them to agree to false confessions concocted by the investigators. Therefore, NO confessions of ANY defendants in political cases can EVER be believed."

One of the present authors has been told this, in one form or another, by three historians of the Stalin period whose works we generally respect. It's worthwhile, therefore, to spend some time on this reasoning.

The statement reduces history to "belief." What happened to the rational basis for drawing historical, or scientific, conclusions based upon the preponderance of the available evidence in a given case? The issue of "belief" here goes not to evidence, but past the evidence to the paradigm, which is to be held through "belief." That is, "belief" is a statement, not about the matter at hand, but about the state of mind of the person doing the "believing."

The subject of "torture" has been treated, by those who adhere to the "anti-Stalin" paradigm, as an incantation, a magic spell employed to exorcize or dismiss the spectre of evidence. It is still deployed even when, as is usually the case, there is no evidence that torture was used in a specific case to force a specific defendant to confess, for how can we know for certain that the defendant was not tortured? How can we know that he did not confess out of fear that he, or his family, might be tortured?

On the strength of this supposed "logic" all incriminating statements, by all defendants, can be simply dismissed. They count for nothing, need not be taken into account at all! It then swiftly follows that the defendants were innocent, for once the confessions of all defendants are wished away, there is little evidence whatsoever against any of them. And who can assert that a person was guilty of a crime when no evidence against them exists?

Of course, in some cases there is documentary evidence. We have cited Getty's and Broué's studies of some documents in Trotsky's correspondence that prove a "bloc of Rights and Trotskyites" did, in fact, exist even though Gorbachev-era "rehabilitators" declared that there was no such bloc. We have the memoir of Bukharin's friend, Swiss communist Jules Humbert-Droz, stating from the safety of Western Europe and more than five decades later that Bukharin was advocating Stalin's assassination already in 1928.

Despite the fact that the investigative materials for all the Moscow Trials, plus those of the Tukhachevsky Affair, are still top-secret and have never been made available to researchers, we have a bit more evidence that has slipped out. Furthermore, it is "material evidence."

- We have Iona Iakir's letter to Stalin of June 9, 1937, in which the military commander confesses his guilt of treason. No researcher has been permitted to actually see this letter — but it was reprinted in a Khrushchev-era study published in the early '90s.¹¹⁴
- We have the "Arao telegram," published in the same Khrushchev-era study. It documents contact between a representative of Tukhachevsky and the Japanese military.¹¹⁵
- We have further evidence against Tukhachevsky & Co. in documentation from the prewar Czech government that Hitler was awaiting a military coup against the Stalin government, and had informed the Czech ambassador of this fact.¹¹⁶

The two most recent and supposedly authoritative books on Tukhachevsky do not even mention any of these documents.¹¹⁷ Nor does any other study of the Soviet 1930s. It cannot be the case that all these researchers are ignorant of them. This evidence is ignored because it contradicts the paradigm.

114 "Spravka o proverke obvineniy . . ." Voенno-Istoricheskii Arkhiv. Vypusk 1. Moscow, 1994, p. 194; also Reabilitatsiia. Kak Eto Bylo. Fevral' 1956 — nachalo 80-kh godov. Ed. Artizov, A. et al. Moscow: MDF, Izdatel'stvo "Materik", 2003, p. 688. Henceforth RKEB 2.

115 "Tragediia RKKA. M.N. Tukhachevskii i 'Voenno-Fashistskii Zagovor.'" Voenno-Istoricheskii Arkhiv. Vypusk 2. Moscow, 1997, pp. 39-40. Also in RKEB 2, p. 753.

116 Igor Lukes, Czechoslovakia Between Stalin and Hitler: The Diplomacy of Edvard Benes in the 1930s. London: Oxford University Press, 1996, pp. 96-98.

117 Iulia Z. Kantor. Voina i Mir Mikhaila Tukhachevskogo. Moscow: Izdatel'skii dom 'Ogoniok', 'Vremia', 2005.; and idem, Zakliataia družba. Sekretnoe sotrudnichestvo SSSR i Germanii v 1920-1930-e gody. SPb: "Piter," 2009.

Some scholars — the term deserves scare quotes here — resort to fabricating phony "evidence" in an attempt to "save" the paradigm. One example is in Robert Service's recent biography of Stalin, in which we find the following statement:

Tukhachevski was shot on 11 June; he had signed a confession with a bloodstained hand after a horrific beating. (Service 349)

In plain language, this is simply a falsification. A few small brown stains do appear on one copy of one of Tukhachevsky's confession statements. Kantor, who had access to Tukhachevsky investigative files, reproduces it here¹¹⁸ in one of her articles in Izvestiia.ru. Khrushchev-era researchers claimed it is blood. If it is — this has never been verified — we have no idea whose blood it may be. It could be that of the typist or the interrogator. Perhaps someone — Tukhachevsky or someone else — pricked his finger?

¹¹⁸ <<http://images.izvestia.ru/lenta/35492.jpg>>. In case this image disappears we have put a copy online at <https://msuweb.montclair.edu/~furrgr/research/Tukh_confess_with_blood.jpg>.

It is even possible that the Khrushchev-era researchers put them there. They knew their job was not to find the truth, but to find evidence to support Khrushchev's rehabilitation of Tukhachevsky & Co, which had already taken place, before the study was done! The stains are not shaped in any way like a fingerprint. Nor are they associated with the signature. But Service doesn't mention the nature of the stains on the paper. He says "bloodstained hand" and "horrific beating." A regular beating won't do; it must be "horrific." Otherwise Stalin will not appear "horrific" himself.

Moreover, Service's claim is a fine example of circular reasoning. A small bloodstain (if that is what it is) is assumed to be evidence that Tukhachevsky was tortured. Then the hypothesis that he was tortured is deployed to explain the bloodstain! Then it can be asserted that Tukhachevsky was innocent even though we are in possession of multiple confessions by him and many others who implicate him and whom he implicates. At this stage of the false reasoning evidence has become otiose — it is simply regarded as unnecessary.

In short: we now have lots of evidence concerning these events. All of it is mutually reinforcing. All of it is consistent with the guilt of the defendants at the Moscow Trials and, incidentally, of Trotsky's guilt too. But it is ignored, or conjured away by the magic word "torture."

Because this notion of "torture" has paralyzed rationality for so long, a few more considerations about it are in order here.

- That the fact that some persons were tortured, somewhere and at some time, does not mean that everyone was tortured everywhere and at all times.
- Persons who have been tortured can be guilty as well as innocent; can either confess, or refuse to confess.

Once again, to claim that someone might have been tortured even when we have no evidence that he was, and much evidence that he was not, and then to use that as a reason to reject his confession, implies that no possible evidence is acceptable. This is contrary to reason.

There is no rational basis for assuming that Bukharin was not guilty of what he confessed to. But, for those who hold to the "anti-Stalin" paradigm, this is a "slippery slope" — because there is likewise no rational basis for assuming the other figures in the Moscow Trials, plus the Tukhachevsky Affair defendants, were not guilty of what they confessed to either.

Even if we set aside the issue of whether other defendants might, or might not, have been tortured — Bukharin implicates virtually all of them! If Bukharin's confessions of guilt were to be accepted as valid, then all the other defendants are then implicated as guilty regardless of whether they were tortured, mistreated, threatened, etc., or not.

For these reasons, those who refuse to seriously question the "anti-Stalin" paradigm are compelled to reject the evidence that Bukharin was guilty. But this means they must abandon a rational approach to historical research. If the "anti-Stalin" paradigm and all that depends on it is to be preserved, the possibility that Bukharin may have been guilty cannot be admitted, regardless of what evidence there is and how it should be read. Simply put, there is no evidence that "believers" in this paradigm would accept.

Conclusions

What does this mean for those who want to know the truth? It means that we can move beyond the simplistic "anti-Stalin" paradigm and can now turn in a serious way to studying the history of the USSR, its successes and failures. Whatever precise forms the descent of the Opposition into murder, terrorism, and collaboration with German and Japanese fascism took, we now know enough about it to know that none of the Opposition conspiracies, whether "Rights," "Trotskyites," "Zinovievites," Military conspirators, or others, offered principled, positive alternative to the policies represented by Stalin and his supporters.

We also know that the USSR in the '30s cannot be reduced to "terror." The state violence that held sway for a terrible 18 months in 1937-38 represented a panicked reaction to a serious conspiracy — a panic that was hugely exacerbated by Ezhov's plan to kill as many innocent people as possible in order to maximize discontent with the Soviet regime.¹¹⁹ If successful, the anti-Stalin conspirators meant to strengthen Japanese and German fascism to the point where they might well have won World War II.

¹¹⁹ See references at note 27 above.

There was a real, broad, and extremely dangerous conspiracy against the Soviet government. Drastic measures to counter it were essential, and many measures were taken. Those measures that were taken need to be evaluated, critically to be sure, and mined for lessons positive and negative. But this must be done against this proper historical context, a situation which constituted an existential crisis for the Soviet Union, and thus for the communist movement as a whole.

The investigative and punitive arms of the state, hijacked by Ezhov who himself was conspiring with Germany, killed and imprisoned hundreds of thousands of innocent people. Other scholars have written about the hasty convictions without right of appeal which doomed so many of the accused. Such a procedure was expressly employed by Ezhov, abetted by some Party First Secretaries and others, to commit mass murder. By the time that the Soviet Party and government leadership, headed by Stalin, had come to recognize this, however, it was too late for many victims. A large number of NKVD men who had tortured or otherwise trumped up cases against defendants were themselves tried and imprisoned or executed.

Paradigm Shift

The Khrushchev version of Soviet history in Stalin's time and its Trotskyist cousin provided the basis for Cold-War anti-communism for the past half century. They have been continued and extended by Gorbachev and post-Gorbachev anticommunist scholarship. All are exploded, destroyed by the evidence now available. It will take time for this fact to gain widespread recognition.

A great deal of resistance to it still exists among strongly anti-communist scholars. The demonization of the USSR, the world's first sustained experiment in working-class rule, is far too useful to communism's opponents. It is also essential in a somewhat different way for Trotskyists, for whom the preservation of of their "cult" around Leon Trotsky has long since supplanted any desire to learn the truth about Soviet history.

In Russia itself, the historiography of the Soviet Union is sharply divided between those who share the demonized version of Soviet history under Stalin, and those who, rejecting it, are struggling towards new paradigms. Of course it helps those researchers who reject the Cold War paradigm that millions in Russia look back with respect and enthusiasm to the Stalin years, when, with all its weaknesses and failures, the USSR accomplished world-shaking things.

Aside from the stream of new documentary evidence, a further stimulus to rejection of the old paradigms in Russia is the fact that the proponents of the anti-Stalin paradigm continue to serve the interests of the elite — the former Party nomenklatura who are still in political and economic control in the former Soviet countries. They justified their "perestroika," the "restructuring" which privatized the collectively produced Soviet industries, bankrupted those with savings, and catastrophically reduced the living standards of the working population, by denigrating the Stalin years, just as Khrushchev and his cronies had done.

People everywhere who are concerned to learn the truth about Soviet history need to look back with new eyes — and a new sense of respect — to those who dared, the Bolsheviks and their magnificent though ultimately failed experiment in constructing a society free from capitalist exploitation. That can only be done by rejecting the anti-communist, anti-Stalinist lies and distortions whether from the right or the Trotskyist left. We have to work hard to study the lessons of the Soviet experiment, warts and all, but without the blinders of a false paradigm that ultimately dooms us to regard capitalist exploitation as eternal and beneficent.

We have to turn back to those who, little regarded today, began this task, primarily the Chinese Communist Party, during the "Sino-Soviet dispute" of the late 1950s and early 1960s, and those who, like Charles Bettelheim and others, reacting against the post-Mao rejection of socialism in China, struggled to develop an anti-revisionist, Marxist understanding of how and why the Comintern failed.

There are many, many more documents still in secret archives in the former USSR that will gradually see the light of day. We should face these disclosures with confidence. The explosion of the old anti-Stalinist paradigm can only encourage us in that task.

2011: Review of The Historiography of Communism by Michael E. Brown

Philadelphia, PA: Temple University Press, 2009. 264 pp. ISBN:
9781592139224

DOI: 10.1177/0896920511414466

by Grover C. Furr

Montclair State University

This volume presents seven essays published between 1978 and 1995. All but the second essay (Chapter 2) focus exclusively on American communism and its anticommunist critics. Perhaps this should have been indicated in the title of the book, which is really about certain issues in the historiography of American communism.

Brown's aim is to discuss the ideological conditions under which the history of the communist movement has been written. In Brown's view, anti-communism represents an ideological stance that insists upon understanding — really, misunderstanding, distorting — the communist movement as a force largely foreign, even alien, to the society out of which it has, in fact, emerged. The communist movement, in every country including the United States, has been a response to the class struggle of exploited against their exploitation, their exploiters, the capitalists, the capitalist state, and the capitalist system itself. An important characteristic of the "history of communism" has been the fact that this organic connection between communism and capitalism is denied. The communist movement is portrayed as a kind of "deviance," something that comes into American society "from the outside," as though the conditions of capitalism could not possibly have produced it.

It is impossible to understand the history of communism accurately in this way. Brown exposes it as an ideologically loaded, class-biased construct, a way of "not understanding" communism by misunderstanding it. The result is a "history" that is more ideology than science (even "social science"): full of evasions, superficial explanations, and outright falsehoods. Brown believes that the communist movement has been produced by capitalist society. To understand it one has to understand the capitalist society that has produced it. This means one has to understand capitalism itself, especially in one's own country — in this case, in the US.

A theoretical sociologist, Brown strives to demonstrate that historiography — the writing of history — and sociology — the study of society — cannot be separated. Sociology is, therefore, essentially an historical discipline in that it must be informed with an understanding of the society, which is its object of study, and no society can be understood without a deep historical knowledge of its development. However, bourgeois (that is, capitalist) sociology, along with economics and political science, have been developed in a manner so as to marginalize history, even dismiss it altogether. As a result, much historiography — including anticommunist historiography — has avoided discussions of sociology and economics.

Once the intellectual obligation to root analysis of society in history has been conjured away, any accurate, scientific understanding of society is impossible. Arguably, this is the goal of the dominant schools of social science in a capitalist society. The result is a pseudo-analysis that presents itself as social science but is in fact biased towards capitalists in its very assumptions, deeply non-dialectical, and incapable of really understanding the historical origins and development of both communism and anticommunism.

The long (p. 40) introductory essay is the most recent and the most theoretically informed of the contributions. In it Brown critiques some of the central assumptions of anticommunist historiography. He argues for a Marxist critique of US society that reveals class struggle to be an inevitable process within US (or any) society and the communist movement a historically contingent outgrowth.

He also offers short introductions to the succeeding chapters. Had Brown examined specific passages from the authors he discusses — Diggins, Draper, and Klehr, for example — his theoretical critique would have been better grounded and easier to grasp. Some of the later chapters, particularly the third and fourth, do offer specific critique of influential anticommunist works.

Chapter Two addresses the theoretical problem of historical agency through an examination of the work of E.P. Thompson and the historiography of earlier radicalism, especially the French Revolution. The third chapter engages specific passages by some historians. One weakness, in my view, is its uncritical acceptance of Hayden White's tendency, in Metahistory, to focus on historiography as text or narrative at the expense of the problems of evidence (see Chapter 4, and pp. 93-4 as well). Sean Wilentz's unproblematic acceptance of the concept of "Stalinism" (p. 75) while attempting to confront Theodore Draper's "professional anticommunism" passes without remark.

Chapter Five offers a close reading of passages from Capital. The sixth chapter concerns works of anthropology and the concept of the "primitive." A future revision of Chapter Seven, "Left Futures" (coauthored with Randy Martin) would benefit from a critical examination of such terms as "socialist," and "collapse of communism." However, the term "democratic," as mobilized by anticommunists, is briefly examined (p. 171).

Socialism is discussed in Chapter 8, but the authors do not discuss the similarities between contemporary notions of socialism (e.g., p. 201) and traditional social-democratic and Soviet notions, or consider what implications these similarities may have for avoiding the shortcomings of the Soviet system in the future.

At several points Steven Cohen (p. 81; cf., p. 177) is cited as a critic of the field of "Soviet studies." Cohen has some minor differences with the extreme right-wingers in the field (also Moshe Lewin, p. 81). But his book on Bukharin, like those by Robert Conquest (e.g. The Great Terror) and Roi Medvedev (Let History Judge) was a major ideological force in establishing the ideologically-loaded "Khrushchev" version of the "Stalinist" paradigm of Soviet and communist history. Cohen copied uncritically from Khrushchev and Khrushchev-era sources on Soviet history, almost all of which have turned out to be completely false. The authors appear to be unaware of the criticism of this paradigm during the past three decades.

Examination of the historiography of communism outside the USA is almost entirely lacking in this book. There is no discussion at all of the historiography of the Soviet Union; of Chinese communism; of the communist international; or of any communism at all aside from the American communist movement. It contains nothing about communist, or other than anticommunist, attempts to write history or historiography of communism. There is no engagement with the varieties of communism that are commonly thought to straddle the ideological fence between revolutionary anti-capitalism and Cold-War anticommunism such as Trotskyism or Anarchism like Emma Goldman's, or of how these schools of historiography have inspired and fortified more forthrightly pro-capitalist anticommunist histories.

Major paradigms of anti-communist historiography such as "totalitarianism" or "Stalinism" are passed over without examination. Both of these terms have long been widely used, and widely discussed, criticized, and defended, including on the Left, to frame the history of the USSR, China, and communist parties like the CPUSA. On the contrary, in the essays at hand these terms are sometimes accepted unproblematically as descriptive concepts.

This is a serious lack. "Totalitarianism," for example, masquerades as a term of analysis but is in reality only an epithet without any fixed meaning. It is commonly and even increasingly used to equate, or at least compare, Nazism with Soviet Communism, a major political-ideological aim of anticommunist historiography, one in which many "left" historians going back at least to Leon Trotsky are complicit. "Stalinism," a term that, according to the OED, seems to have originated with Trotsky, embodies a universe of doubtful erroneous assumptions about the nature of the communist movement — e.g. that Stalin was a "dictator."

The term "democracy" is routinely used in criticism of the communist movements of the 20th century. But there is no engagement with what this concept might mean in a socialist or communist society nor of its ideological role in anticommunist historiography — for example, the tacit assumption that Western capitalist countries are "democratic." Given that four of the eight essays were first published in the journal "Socialism & Democracy," this is a curious absence.

Aside from a few allusions to the end of USSR & Eastern European satellite states 1989-91 (p. 206, pp. 215-6), Brown has no discussion of the historiography of these events, almost two decades old now.

Those interested in the historiography of the communist movement generally will regret the lack of a broader focus. But no book can do everything. This book will be useful to those engaged in the theory of sociological analysis and to historians of American communism.

2012: Review of John W. Maerhofer, Rethinking the Vanguard: Aesthetic and Political Positions in the Modernist Debate, 1917-1962 (New Castle: Cambridge Scholars Publishing, 2009)

© 2012 Grover Furr

Montclair State University

Montclair, New Jersey

furr@mail.montclair.edu

<http://dx.doi.org/10.1080/08854300.2012.714568>

How has political revolution figured into the development of avant-garde cultural production? Is the vanguard an antiquated concept or does it still resonate in the twenty-first century? Focusing on the convergence of aesthetics and politics that materialized in the early twentieth century, John Maerhofer's book offers a re-interpretation of the historical avant-garde from 1917 to 1962, a turbulent period in intellectual history which marked the apex, crisis, and decline of vanguardist authority. Moving from the impact of the Bolshevik Revolution, to the anti-imperialist and anti-colonial movements in the Third World, to the emergence of neo-vanguardism in the wake of postmodernity, this study attempts to go beyond some of the traditional interpretations of the historical avant-garde that either ignore or discount the importance of revolutionary politics in the formation of radical art and culture.

"Revolution" became a dominating signifier of avant-garde cultural production, as the "manifestos" of many of these movements illustrate. It thus established a paradigm beyond the boundaries of avant-garde aestheticism. Maerhofer uses the term "vanguardism" to denote the practice not only of revolutionary art, but also of radical movements seeking to bridge the gap between revolutionary praxis and cultural production, so that revolutionary art could serve as a medium for political transformation.

He begins by challenging the aspects of revolutionary art that have set limits on the discourse of avant-garde cultural politics. He goes on to examine how specific authors have addressed those issues. His discussion of Négritude (Chapter 4) should be understood in relation to the post-1956 crisis in vanguardism, in which the Euro-American models of revolutionary art and politics were reconfigured into the decolonization and anti-imperialist projects of the Third World, as in the work of Aimé Césaire and Frantz Fanon. The final chapter assesses such movements in the context of what Maerhofer calls the neo-vanguardism associated with late capitalist restructuring and with the post-Stalinist era of the Communist International.

Maerhofer distinguishes between the avant-garde and what he terms "vanguardism," arguing that the "historical" avant-garde needs to be re-historicized. He reviews three theories of the avant-garde: Adorno's aesthetic theory, Peter Bürger's The Historical Avant-Garde, and Susan Suleiman's Subversive Intent: Gender, Politics, and the Avant-Garde. Maerhofer argues that each of these theorists relegates political praxis — revolutionary activity in the socio-political realm — to a position of secondary importance.

He then looks at the impact of the Bolshevik Revolution on avant-garde movements from 1917 through the 1920s. This event was revolutionary in the most direct and literal sense. As such, it presented the artistic avant-garde with a fundamental challenge: What was to be the stance of the artistic avant-garde toward a "real" (political) revolution? Maerhofer examines the ways vanguardist movements began to model themselves on Lenin's concept of the vanguard party. He looks closely at the notion of the committed writer/artist and the deepening of relations between aesthetics and politics up to 1930.

The second chapter traces the links between ideology and art, focusing on the form of the artistic manifesto. The manifesto was adopted by the artistic avant-garde in frank imitation of political practice. It mimics political discourse as the avant-garde mimics political revolution, perhaps as art mimics life — that is, in a highly ambiguous and problematic, even opaque manner. The artistic manifesto also reaffirms the distance between artistic and revolutionary practice. Maerhofer then looks at the relationship between the aesthetics and politics of the Surrealist movement, in particular the participation of many of the Surrealists in the French Communist Party. He examines the nexus between the avant-garde and Socialist Realism, a contentious issue that many historians have addressed.

Maerhofer's aim here seems to be to rethink the supposed binary opposition between Socialist Realism and the historical avant-garde. By situating the debate within the framework of vanguardism, he suggests that Socialist Realism signals a new kind of vanguardism which might be called "totalizing." The struggle to create revolutionary class consciousness in post-revolutionary society requires the end of avant-garde autonomy, for this autonomy had always been understood in relation to a bourgeois, and not a revolutionary, social and political reality. Political revolution impels the artistic avant-garde to carry out its aims in a social manner — to rebuild its prospects collectively. This very repositioning of the creative role of the intellectual struck at the core of avant-garde revolt.

Yet it is also possible from here to renegotiate the discourse of the historical avant-garde itself. For one thing, the artistic avant-garde suffered a crisis that forced it into a reactionary stance, since it had never really envisaged a continued existence after a political revolution. At the same time, the avant-garde was transformed, essentialized through its continued embrace of avant-garde autonomy, the "cult" of avant-garde sensibility. Not collective political practice but individual artistic achievement, the "cult of the avant-garde artist" remains the essential, defining characteristic of the avant-garde. This reveals the gulf — Maerhofer calls it a "tension" — "between the aesthetic and political positions in the continuing discourse of the historical avant-garde." Maerhofer directs his argument against the anti-communist bias that he finds in theorists of the avant-garde who dismiss Socialist Realism as "Stalinist," "authoritarian," etc. In his view, Socialist Realism is an extension of what he terms "vanguardism" which at the same time also signaled a crisis in the historical avant-garde itself.

The third chapter looks at Ezra Pound, Louis Aragon, and Louis Zukofsky, in an attempt to analyze the politics of left-to-right vanguardism. These three authors do not represent the full spectrum of avant-garde responses, but Maerhofer examines them to reveal some of the very different ways in which aesthetics and politics interacted in the avant-garde, and the very different conceptions of what constituted "revolutionary" art.

Chapter four looks at the role of vanguardism in the development of Third World revolutionary consciousness from 1950–62. This period saw a decline in influence of the vanguardist model in "first-world" spaces, ushering in the neo-avant-garde or postmodernism. Maerhofer analyzes movements that used vanguardism to generate solidarity against colonialism and imperialism. He argues that while the universal tenets of vanguardism tend to conflate aesthetic and political radicalism, what distinguishes Third World vanguardist praxis is its ability to evoke what E. San Juan, Jr. calls the "life and death" struggle of the Third World artist "to raise political consciousness, awaken the spectator of fate to become an actor, and intensify the people's commitment to revolution."³

³ Maerhofer, 156, quoting San Juan, From the Masses to the Masses, 1994, 83.

The interconnection between cultural nationalism and revolutionary praxis, much of it in the terminology of Marxism-Leninism, is what distinguishes Third World revolutionary discourse from the European model. Political nationalism generated sympathy with the anticolonial struggle. This merging of the national and anticolonial gave great imaginative force to the development of vanguardist thinking, but also tended to substitute itself for the historical struggle against global capitalism.

Maerhofer then looks at the aesthetics and politics of Aimé Césaire, whom he sees as representing the crisis of vanguardism in his inclusion of Surrealism and Marxism–Leninism in the early Négritude movement. To the extent that it was successful, Négritude appropriated Marxist–Leninist terminology while shifting the terms of aesthetic vanguardism away from European models towards an emerging social reality in the colonial world. Frantz Fanon, he argues, localizes the vanguard by focusing on the use of nationalism in the anti-imperialist struggle, a turn which also reveals what Maerhofer argues are the limitations of Third World revolutionary theory:

the danger, too often realized, that anti-colonialist vanguardism can turn into its opposite, a rhetoric that masks and apologizes for a reactionary political resolution to the contradictions of anticolonialism, just as anticolonial political movements can and often did end in an anti-revolutionary, neo-colonialist outcome. In my view, this is consistent with what Fanon, in his critique of Négritude, identifies as the overarching problematic of the Third World Project: how to sustain anti-colonial commitment in the face of this tendency.

The final chapter is a critique of postmodernism, or the neo-avantgarde, in which politics are subsumed by aesthetic intentionality. Using a Marxist analysis from such writers as Fredric Jameson, Alex Callinicos, Barbara Foley, Perry Anderson, and David Harvey, Maerhofer attempts to analyze "the absence of political engagement in postmodernist aesthetics, or in slightly different terms, the total aestheticization of politics that occurred at the expense of the political commitment." He concludes by offering a prescription for "returning" to the model of class-based vanguardism that critiques and rejects the apoliticality and political passivity that have been a consequence of postmodernist influence.

This book engages an important topic and encompasses a broad range of theoretical and artistic productions, as well as a great breadth of scholarship. Maerhofer is familiar with the major theoretical debates bearing upon his subject. The bibliography is extensive, making the book a mine for further research. It is to be hoped that others will build upon his work by integrating Chinese communist experience into the argument.

My one complaint about the book is that its philosophical-theoretical language relies heavily upon the abstract terminology of postmodernism. This will be difficult to understand for those not accustomed to contemporary literary theory. It also threatens to encourage "descent into discourse"⁴ — the retreat from political openness into the kind of obscurantism which Maerhofer himself opposes.

⁴ Bryan Palmer, Descent into Discourse.

This is a shame, because his book presents a radically new way of viewing the concept of the "vanguard" and even of recuperating Socialist Realism.

Maerhofer shows, in effect, that Socialist Realism and anti-colonial Marxist-influenced literature — rather than literary avant-gardism — are a vital part of the legacy of twentieth century revolutionary movements. His work deserves to be widely known.

2013: The "Official" Version of the Katyn Massacre Disproven? Discoveries at a German Mass Murder Site in Ukraine

September 14, 2014

Author's Note: The officially accepted version of the Katyn Massacre can be read on its Wikipedia page – http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Katyn_massacre This page is relentlessly anticommunist and anti-Stalinist. It makes no attempt to be objective or neutral, in that it has no serious discussion of the scholarly controversy about this question. It's useful only as a short and accurate summary of the "official" version. I would like to acknowledge that I was guided to the new sources by an excellent article by Sergei Strygin on the Russian "Pravda o Katyni" (Truth About Katyn) Internet page.[1] I strongly recommend it to all those who read Russian.*

In 2011 and 2012 a joint Polish-Ukrainian archeological team partially excavated a mass execution site at the town of Volodymyr-Volyns'kiy, Ukraine. Shell cases found in the burial pit prove that the executions there took place no earlier than 1941. In the burial pit were found the badges of two Polish policemen previously thought to have been murdered hundreds of miles away by the Soviets in April-May 1940. These discoveries cast serious doubt on the canonical, or "official," version of the events known to history as the Katyn Massacre.

In April 1943 Nazi German authorities claimed that they had discovered thousands of bodies of Polish officers shot by Soviet officials in 1940. These bodies were said to have been discovered near the Katyn forest near Smolensk (in Western Russia), which is why the whole affair — including executions and alleged executions of Polish POWs elsewhere in the USSR — came to be called "the Katyn Massacre."

The Nazi propaganda machine, headed by Josef Goebbels, organized a huge campaign around this alleged discovery. After the Soviet victory at Stalingrad in February 1943, it was obvious to everyone that, unless something happened to split the Allies, Germany would inevitably lose the war. The Nazis' obvious aim was to drive a wedge between the western Allies and the USSR.

The Soviet government, headed by Joseph Stalin, vigorously denied the German charge. When the Polish government-in-exile, always ferociously anticommunist and anti-Russian, collaborated with the Nazi propaganda effort, the Soviet government broke diplomatic relations with it, eventually setting up a pro-Soviet Polish authority and Polish army. In September 1943 the Red Army drove the Germans from the area. In 1944 the Soviet Burdenko Commission carried out a study and issued a report that blamed the Germans for the mass shootings.

During the Cold War the Western capitalist countries supported the Nazi version which had become the version promoted by the anticommunist Polish government-in-exile. The Soviet Union and its allies continued to blame the Germans for the murders. In 1990 and 1991 Mikhail Gorbachev, General Secretary of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union and, after 1988, President of the USSR, stated that the Soviet Union under Joseph Stalin had indeed shot the Poles. According to this "official" version the Polish prisoners had been confined in three camps: at Kozel'sk, Starobelsk, and Ostashkov and from there transferred to Smolensk, Kharkiv, and Kalinin (now Tver'), where they were shot and buried at Katyn, Piatykhatty, and Mednoe respectively.[2]

In 1990, 1991, and 1992 three aged former NKVD men were identified and interviewed. They discussed what they knew of executions of Poles in April and May of 1940. None of these executions had taken place at the Katyn Forest, site of the German exhumations. In 1992 the Russian government under Boris Yeltsin handed over to the Polish government documents supposedly signed by Stalin and other Politburo members which, if genuine, would put Soviet guilt beyond reasonable doubt. These documents are said to have been found in "Closed Packet No. 1," where "closed" meant the highest level of classification — secrecy. I call these the "smoking gun documents," since they are conventionally assumed to be "proof positive" of Soviet guilt. However, no evidence is ever univocal and definitive; all evidence, whether documentary or material, can be interpreted in multiple ways.

By 1992 the Soviet, and then the Russian, governments had officially declared the Stalin-era Soviet leadership guilty of shooting somewhere between 14,800 and 22,000 Polish prisoners to death in April and May 1940. This was agreeable to anticommunists and a bone in the throat for some pro-Soviet people. For a few years it did appear that the matter was basically settled. The evidence seemed clear: the Soviets had shot the Poles.

I too thought the matter was settled. I admit that I continued to harbor some lingering doubts, mainly because accepting Soviet guilt also meant asserting that the Nazi propaganda campaign and official report of 1943 was 100% honest. Goebbels and Hitler were famous for their concept of "the Big Lie" which states, in part, that one should never tell the truth.[3] But this was, at most, in the back of my mind in 1997 when I went to the Slavic Room of the New York Public Library, a place I had visited a great many times over the years, to make photocopies of the "smoking gun documents" as published in the leading Russian historical journal Voprosy Istorii in January 1993[4] so I could put them on my new web page. I did not post them, because I soon discovered that somebody else had already done it and I could just link to those images, which were of higher quality than my own.

In 1995 Iurii Mukhin, at the time an unknown metallurgical engineer, published a short book titled "The Katyn Murder Mystery" (Katynskii Detektiv). In it he claimed to prove that the "smoking gun documents" were forgeries and the story of the Katyn Massacre a fabrication intended to facilitate the destruction of the Soviet Union. During the following years this position has attracted much support among what we might call Left Russian nationalists, people supportive of the USSR during the Stalin period for its achievements at industrialization and defeating the Nazis. Since that time Mukhin and others have published more books of research in which they continue their campaign to disprove the "official" version that asserts Soviet guilt.

Since the mid-1990s, therefore, the Katyn Massacre has once again been the subject of fierce partisan dispute. In anticommunist circles it is unacceptable to express any doubt as to the guilt of the Soviet Union and of Stalin and his chief assistants in particular. This is the case in Western academia as well, where debate on the subject or any questioning at all of Soviet guilt is simply "beyond the Pale," not tolerated.

Meanwhile Russian defenders of the USSR and of Stalin continue their assault on the "official" account by marshaling evidence to show that the Nazis, not the Soviets, shot the Polish officers. Some of these researchers have concluded that the Soviets did shoot some Polish prisoners (officers and others), and then the Nazis invaded the USSR, captured the remaining Polish prisoners, and shot them. I myself think that some such scenario is the most likely one and I will briefly explain why at the end of this essay.

During the past several years there have been some dramatic developments in the investigation of the Katyn question. I have attempted to summarize them and the academic dispute generally on a special web page that I call "The Katyn Forest Whodunnit." [5] I believe it is the only source in English where one can find this dispute outlined in what I intend to be an objective manner. [6]

In October 2010 a credible case was made that the "smoking gun" documents are forgeries. This had been the position of many Russian communists and Left Russian nationalists since the publication of Mukhin's 1995 book. The materials adduced by Duma member Victor Iliukhin in October 2010 constitute the strongest evidence so far that these documents may well be forgeries. (For more information about these documents see my "Katyn Forest Whodunnit" page.)

Therefore, let's set aside the "smoking gun documents" from "Closed Packet No. 1." What other evidence is there that the Soviets shot the 14,800-22,000 Poles as alleged in the "official" version of the Katyn Massacre?

Basically, there are two types of further evidence:

1. Confession-interviews of three aged and long-retired NKVD men: Petr K. Soprunenko, Dmitri S. Tokarev, and Mitrofan V. Syromiatnikov. These confessions are very contradictory in ways that do not always reinforce the "official" version. None of these men was at the Katyn Forest, the place where 4000+ bodies of Polish POWs were unearthed by the Germans in 1943, and none of them has anything to say about this, the most famous of the execution/burial sites subsumed under the rubric "the Katyn Massacre." Perhaps this is the reason that these confession-interviews are so hard to find. What's more, though they were all conducted in Russian they are available only in Polish translation. The Russian originals have never been made public. So, we do not have the former NKVD men's exact words.

All three men were threatened with criminal prosecution if they failed to "tell the truth" and were told that Soviet guilt had already been established. It is therefore possible that out of fear of prosecution they gave answers they felt their interrogators wanted. Many of the interrogators' questions were "leading" questions. Of course this is common in criminal investigations. But it does appear that the confessions of these three old men were not entirely voluntary.

I have obtained the texts of these confession-interrogations in the published Polish-language versions, scanned them, and made them available on the Internet.[7] It is interesting that no one else has ever bothered to do this. I will not examine these very interesting and problematic confession-interrogations here, however.

The Transit Documents

2. The remaining category of evidence are the many "transit" or "shipment" documents concerning the emptying out of the three POW camps at Kozel'sk, Starobelsk, and Ostashkov in April 1940 and the transfer of the prisoners to the NKVD in other areas. These transit records are the subject of this article.

Figure 1. 1939 map showing places mentioned in the "official" Katyn narrative. Arrows from the POW camps (Ostashkov, Starobelsk, Kozelsk) to cities (Kalinin/Tver', Kharkiv, Smolensk) show destinations on NKVD transit documents. Burial sites in the nearby countryside (Mednoe, Piatykhvatky, Katyn) are also shown, as is Volodymyr-Volyns'kiy (Włodzimierz), which is about 800 miles from Kalinin/Tver' — Mednoe. [map drawn by Victor Wallis based on information supplied by the author]

These shipments of prisoners are routinely stated to be "death transports." The book Katyn: A Crime Without Punishment by Anna M. Cienciala, Natalia S. Lebedeva, and Wojciech Materski (Yale University Press 2007) is the definitive academic account in the English language of the "official" version. It refers to the shipments of prisoners this way (I have added the emphasis):

The final death transport left Kozielsk....

The last death transport left Ostashkov for Kalinin (Tver) on 19 May...

...lists of those to be sent out of the camps to be shot (doc. 62)...

...and reporting on the number sent to their death (doc. 65).

Cienciala, who did the writing in this volume, added all the language about execution. Likewise in her discussion of the documents, none of which mentions executions, shootings, killing, death, etc., at all, Cienciala continuously adds language to remind the readers that, in her interpretation, these prisoners were being transported to places where they would be executed. Here are a few examples (again, I have added the emphasis):

They were transferred to NKVD prisons... to be shot there. (154)

... the same as the order in the death transports. (156)

The first lists of victims to be dispatched to their death... (157)

The delivery of lists for dispatching prisoners to their deaths... (159)

Beria's directive of 4 April 1940 indicates the goal of exterminating not only the officers and police... (160)

This is the first of many reports by the UNKVD head of Kalinin Oblast, Dmitry Tokarev, on the "implementation," that is, the murder... (162)

Soprunenko's instruction to Korolev of 6 April 1940 was, in fact, a death list,... (163)

The dispatch of the prisoners of war to their deaths...(175)

This 11 April 1940 report from Kozelsk shows that 1,643 officers were murdered in nine days. (175)

... the moods of the prisoners as they were being dispatched unwittingly to their deaths. (176-177)

Most prisoners sent to Yukhnov camp... were exempted from the death lists for various reasons... (183)

By 3 May, the UPV together with the 1st Special Department NKVD and with the personal help of Merkulov, had processed the cases of 14,908 prisoners and sent out dispatch lists — death sentences — for 13,682. (187)

...it is likely that they simply signed or stamped the "Kobulov Forms" (doc. 51) with the death warrant already filled in. (187)

This report gives the number of lists of names received in the camp and the number of prisoners sent out from Kozelsk camp to their deaths for each date between 3 April and 11 May...(190)

A report to Soprunenko shows the number of people destined for execution according to the lists received... (193)

One of the last executions of POWs from the Ostashkov camp took place on 22 May 1940. (200)

Ostashkov prisoners were still being executed that day... (200)

It is important to note that not a single one of the documents themselves refers in any way to executions. In fact Document 53 cited by Cienciala explicitly states that the prisoners were being sent to labor camps.

6) USSR Deputy People's Commissar of Internal Affairs, Divisional Commander Com. Chernyshov, shall within ten days' time remove from their NKVD places of imprisonment in the Ukrainian SSR and send to USSR NKVD correctional labor camps 8,000 convicted prisoners, including 3,000 from the Kiev, Kharkov, and Kherson prisons. (Doc. 53, page 155; emphasis added)

All of the documents referred to or reproduced in Part II of the Cienciala volume concern the transportation of prisoners from one camp to somewhere else. Not a single one of them refers to "executions," "shooting," "killing," etc. All this language is added by Cieniala. In this she has followed the practice of the Polish and Russian scholars who promote the "official" version.

It is true, of course, that the absence of a reference to the killings does not in itself prove anything about the fates of the people who were transported. What is important in terms of the Katyn controversy, however, is the dates of the transports and their destinations.

Cieniala assumes that, except for a few shipments that she specifically mentions, all the prisoners who were moved in April and May 1940 out of the three camps in which the Polish prisoners were being kept were in fact being shipped to their executions. Those executions are assumed to have taken place in April and May 1940. The "official" version of the Katyn Massacre simply assumes that all these documents about clearing the Polish prisoners out of the camps in April 1940 in reality meant sending them away for execution. It is this assumption that has been challenged by a recent discovery.

Józef Kuligowski

In May 2011 Polish news media reported that a numbered metal badge had been unearthed which had been identified by the Ukrainian archaeological team as that of a Polish policeman, Józef Kuligowski, heretofore assumed to have been executed by the Soviet NKVD at Kalinin (now Tver'), Russia, and buried with other such victims at Mednoe, outside of the town.

Czy osoby z Listy Katyńskiej mordowano również na Grodzisku we Włodzimierzu Wołyńskim?! Odnaleziona przez ukraińskich archeologów odznaka Policji Państwowej o numerze 1441 / II na to wskazuje. Jak nas poinformował pan Piotr Zawilski, dyrektor Archiwum Państwowego w Łodzi odznaka o tym numerze należała do posterunkowego Józefa Kuligowskiego z IV komisariatu w Łodzi. Informacja o przydziale i numerze służbowym pochodzi z maja 1939 roku. Nazwisko posterunkowego figuruje na jednej z list dyspozycyjnych dla obozu w Ostaszkowie. Dotychczas uważano, że został zamordowany w Kalininie i spoczywa w Miednoje. Jak wytłumaczyć fakt, że odznaka Józefa Kuligowskiego znaleziona we Włodzimierzu Wołyńskim? Czy zginął w Kalininie, czy we Włodzimierzu?[8]

My translation:[9]

Were persons from the Katyn List also murdered at Grodzisk in Włodzimierz Wołyński?! This is indicated by the National Police badge number 1441 / II found by Ukrainian archaeologists. As Mr Piotr Zawilski, director of the National Archive in Łodz has informed us, the badge with this number belonged to constable Józef Kuligowski of the IV commissariat in Łodz. Information concerning the issuance and service number is from May 1939. The surname of the constable figures on one of the dispositional lists for the camp at Ostashkov. Up to now it was believed that he had been murdered in Kalinin and lies in Mednoe. How to explain the fact that Józef Kuligowski's badge has been found at Włodzimierz Wołyński? Was he killed at Kalinin or at Włodzimierz?

This account continues by identifying Kuligowski as one of the men previously believed killed as a part of the Katyn Massacres. The discovery occasioned considerable discussion in the Polish press about the relationship between the Katyn Massacre and this site near the Ukrainian town of Volodymyr-Volyns'kiy (Polish Włodzimierz Wołyński; Russian: Vladimir-Volynskii).[10] At this time no one doubted that this was a site of Soviet NKVD killings.[11] The Ukrainian media also reported the excavations under the assumption that the Soviet NKVD was responsible for the killings, as in the following account in the Ukraine-wide online newspaper Tyzhden.ua of October 4 2011.[12]

І хоча офіційної версії щодо того, хто ці людини чому були розстріляні, щеномає, науковці схиляються до думки, що замордовані — жертви НКВС 1941 року. Польські піддані, військовий цивільні, заможний клас. Процес свідчать знайдені на місці страти артефакти.

Ось два жетони офіцерів польської поліції, і оскільки на них є номери, то ми вже знаємо, кому вони належали: Йозефу Куліговському та Людвігу Маловеїському. Обидва з Лодзя. За документами НКВС, одного з них розстріляно в Калініні (Твер), другого — в Осташкові біля Харкова.

And although there is as yet no official version of who these people were and why they were shot, scientists are inclined to think that the murdered people were victims of the NKVD in 1941. Polish citizens, military and civilians, the wealthy class. This is what the artifacts found at the execution site suggest.

Here are two badges of officers of the Polish police, and since there are numbers on them we already know to whom they belonged: to Josef Kuligovs'kiy and Liudvig Maloveis'kiy. Both were from Lodz. According to NKVD documents one of them was shot at Kalinin (Tver'), the other at Ostashkov near Kharkiv.

The official being interviewed, Oleksei Zlatohorskyy, director of the government enterprise "Volhynian antiquities," goes on to theorize that the Soviets shot all these people, whole families included, when they could not evacuate them in time as the German armies advanced in 1941. He said that many of the artifacts found in the pit are Polish:

Більшість речей мають чітке польське або інше західноєвропейське ідентифікування: фотографія маршала Едварда Ридз-Смігли, жіночі гребінці, пляшечка з-під ліків із написом «Warszawa» на денці, консервна бляшанка з польським текстом, флакон від парфумів, срібні виделки, ложки... А ще відзначаємо дуже якісну стоматологію, яку могли собі дозволити тільки багаті люди. Гадаю, що то була еліта польської держави».

Most of the objects have purely Polish or other Western European identifying marks: a photograph of Marshall Edvard Rydz-Smigly, women's combs, a medicine bottle with the inscription "Warszawa" on the bottom, a tin can with a Polish inscription, a perfume bottle, silver forks and spoons ... And we note very expensive dental work, that only a few rich people could afford. I think this was the elite of the Polish state.

The Tyzhden.ua story quotes Andrzej (Jędrzej) Kola, professor of archaeology at Nicolai Copernicus University in Torun (Poland). He expresses uncertainty as to who the killers were.

Для мене тут більше питань, ніж відповідей. Хто вбивці? Якщо це зробили гітлерівці, то чому так невіпорядковано? Чому все це видається хаотичним, недбалим? Чому воно не збігається з культурою смерті, яку сповідували німці? Чому не було знято золоті коронки й мости, не відібрані коштовності? По-німецьки це мало б зовсім інший вигляд: Ordnung, порядок. Розстрільний взвод, розстріл обличчя в обличчя... Тож усе свідчить про те, що вбивства чинили, найімовірніше, співробітники НКВС. Але остаточну крапку поставимо тільки тоді, коли буде досліджено весь периметр городища.

For me there are more questions here than answers. Who were the killers? If the Hitlerites did this, then why is the site so disorderly? Why does all this look chaotic, careless? Why does it not conform to the culture of death that the Germans professed? Why were the gold crowns and bridges not extracted, the valuables not taken? According to the German manner this would have a completely different appearance: Ordnung, order. A firing squad, shooting face to face... So everything suggests that the murders were most likely done by NKVD officials. But we will be able to draw a final conclusion only when the whole perimeter of the settlement has been investigated.[13]

In November 2012 the Polish members of a joint Polish-Ukrainian archaeological group issued a written report on the excavation of this mass murder site. In mass grave No. 1, 367 sets of human remains were exhumed and examined during 2011, and 232 bodies in 2012. The locations of many more mass graves were also determined. Concerning the finding of Kuligowski's badge this report reads as follows:

Była to odznaka Polskiej Policji Państwowej z numerem 1441, która należała do: Post. PP Józef KULIGOWSKI s. Szczepana i Józefy z Sadurskich, ur. 12 III 1898 w m. Strych. WWP od 20 VI 1919. 10 pap. Uczestnik wojny 1920, szczególnie odznaczył się w bitwie pod Mariampolem 24 V 1920. W policji od 1921. Początkowo służbę pełnił

w woj. tarnopolskim. Następnie od 1924 przez wiele lat w Łodzi — w 1939 w V Komis. W sierpniu 1939 zmobilizowany do 10 pal. Odzn. VM V kl. nr679.L. 026/l (15), 35[.]6.; za: red. Z. Gajowniczek, B. Groniek „Księga cmentarna Miednoje," t. I, Warszawa 2005, s. 465. Odznaka została przekazana do miejscowego muzeum.[14]

It was a Polish National Police badge number 1441, which belonged to: Constable of the National Police Józef Kuligowski son of Stephen and of Josepha née Sadurska, b. 12 March 1898 in the village of Strych. In the Polish army on 20 June 1919. 10 pap. Participant in the 1920 war, particularly distinguished himself at the Battle of Mariampol 24 May 1920. In the police from 1921. Initially served in the Tarnopol region. Then from 1924 for many years in Lodz — in 1939 in the V Komis. In August 1939 mobilized to 10 pal. as Nr679.L class V VM. [NKVD transfer list] 026 / l ([position]15), 35[.]6, according to: ed Z. Gajowniczek, B. Groniek "Mednoye Cemetery Book," Vol. I, Warsaw 2005, p. 465. Badge has been transferred to the local museum.

Here is the entry for Kuligowski from Volume One of the "Mednoe Cemetery Book":

Post. PP Józef KULIGOWSKI s. Szczepana i Józefa z Sadurskich, ur. 12 III 1898 w m. Strzch. W WP od 20 VI 1919, 10 pap. Uczestnik wojny 1920, szczególnie odznaczył się w bitwie pod Mariampolem 24 V 1920. W policji od 1921. Początkowo służbę pełnił w woj. tarnopolskim. Następnie od 1924 przez wiele lat w Łodzi - w 1939 w V Komis. W sierpniu 1939 zmobilizowany do 10 pal. Odzn. VM V kl. Nr 679.

Kuligowski was taken prisoner by the Red Army sometime after September 17, 1939, when Soviet troops entered Eastern Poland to prevent the German Army from establishing itself hundreds of miles further east at the USSR's pre-1939 border. He was held in the Ostashkov prisoner-of-war camp in Kalinin oblast' (province), now renamed Tver' oblast'. In April 1940 along with other prisoners he was transferred from Ostashkov to the town of Kalinin (now Tver'). After that there is no further information about him.

Kuligowski is counted as one of the victims of the "Katyn Massacre." What purports to be a record of his transfer, with the word "Mord" (Murder) added, is on one of the official Polish websites about Katyn.[15]

Nnzwisko: Kuligowski

Imię: Józef

Imię ojca: Szczepana

Data urodzenia: 1898

| LP | Opis losów | Początek | | | Koniec | | | Kraj | Woj/Oblast | Pow. | Miej. |
|----|---|----------|---|---|--------|----|---|------------------|-------------------------|------|---------------------|
| | | r | m | d | r | m | d | | | | |
| 1 | Mord | | | | 1940 | 04 | | Rosyjska FSRR | Kalinińska (Twerska) | | Twier |
| 2 | Obóz | | | | 1940 | 04 | | Rosyjska FSRR | Kalinińska (Twerska) | | Ostaszków |
| LP | opis źródła | | | | | | | | | | sygnatura |
| 1. | Ankiety personalne wypełniana przez samych represjonowanych bądź ich rodziny, zbiory Ośrodka KARTA, sygnatura IR/numer ankiety. | | | | | | | | | | IR -/11707 |
| 2. | Listy wywozowe NKWD (kwiecień-maj 1940) z Ostaszkowa, kopia w zbiorach Ośradka KARTA — strona, pozycja. | | | | | | | | | | OST/-148- 152/15 |

As stated in the Polish media account of May 25 2011, Kuligowski's name is on the transfer lists of Ostashkov prisoners reproduced in the official account by Jędrzej Tucholski published in 1991.[16] Kuligowski is also listed in other recent Polish lists of Katyn victims.[17] Naturally the original Russian record of prisoner transfer reprinted in Tucholski's Mord w Katyniu does not contain the word "Mord" (=murder).

The Polish archaeologist in charge of the excavations and author of the report, Dr. Dominika Siemińska, has determined that the victims buried in the mass grave in which this badge was found were killed no earlier than 1941:[18]

Z pewnością stwierdzono, że zbrodnia została dokonana nie wcześniej niż w 1941 roku. (p. 4)

It can be confirmed with certainty that the crime did not take place earlier than 1941.

They were able to determine the time period by dating the shell casings found in the graves. All but a very few were of German manufacture. Almost all of them are datable to 1941.

The bodies were arranged in the "sardine-packing" (Sardinenpackung) formation[19] favored by Obergruppenführer[20] Friedrich Jeckeln, commander of one of the Einsatzgruppen, extermination teams whose task it was to carry out mass executions.

Also, a large percentage of the bodies in the mass graves are of children. The Soviets did not execute children.

So the evidence is strong that this is a site of German, not Soviet, mass executions. However, regardless of which party is guilty of the mass executions, the fact remains that Kuligowski was indeed transported from Ostashkov POW camp to Kalinin in April 1940 but was not shot until 1941 at the earliest. And this means that the transportation lists, which are assumed to be lists of victims being shipped off to be shot, were not that at all. Kuligowski was transported in April 1940 by the Soviets not in order to be shot but for some other reason. He remained alive, probably to be captured and executed by the Germans, most likely in the second half of 1941 but possibly somewhat later. Moreover, Volodymyr-Volyns'kiy is 800 miles from Kalinin (Tver').

This is the major deduction from this discovery that is relevant to our understanding of the Katyn Massacre case: The fact that a Polish POW's name is on one of the Soviet transportation lists can no longer be assumed to be evidence that he was on his way to execution, and therefore that he was executed by the Soviets.

Ludwik Małowiejski

There is evidence that more Polish POWs are buried in these same mass graves, and therefore were executed at the same time, by the Germans in 1941 or 1942. The epaulette of a Polish policeman's uniform and Polish military buttons were found in grave No. 2.[21]

In September 2011 Polish media reported that police badge number 1099/II belonging to Senior Police Constable (starszy posterunkowy) Ludwik Małowiejski had been found in the Volodymyr-Volyns'kiy mass graves.[22] It had been assumed that, like Kuligowski, Małowiejski was a "Katyn Massacre" victim whose body was buried in a mass grave at Mednoe near Kalinin, where — it has been assumed — other "Katyn" victims shot by the NKVD in 1940 are buried. Małowiejski's name is also on the recent Polish lists of Katyn victims.[23] Like Kuligowski he is memorialized in the "Mednoe Cemetery Book" — in this case, Volume 2, page 541:

St. post. PP Ludwik MAŁOWIEJSKI s. Jakuba i Marianna y Jagiellów, ur. 22 VIII 1890 w Żychlinie. Żołnierz I Korpusu Polskiego, plut. W policji od 1919. Od 14 I 1930 przeniesiony do Rez. Konnej m. Łodzi i tam nadal pełnił służbę we wrześniu 1939. Do Ostaszków przeniesiony ze szpitala w Szepietówce. Odzn. MN, MPzaW, MDzON.

His transfer record with the word "Mord" (Murder) added, like Kuligowski's, is also on the same official Polish Katyn website (<http://www.indeks.karta.org.pl/pl/szczegoly.jsp?id=11445>)

Nazwisko: Małowiejski

Imię: Ludwik

Imię ojca: Jakuba

Data urodzenia: 1890

| LP | Opis losów | Początek | | | Koniec | | | Kraj | Woj/Oblast | Pow. | Miej. |
|----|------------|----------|---|---|--------|----|---|------------------|-------------------------|------|-----------|
| | | r | m | d | r | m | d | | | | |
| 1 | Obóz | | | | 1940 | 04 | | Rosyjska FSRR | Kalinińska (Twerska) | | Ostaszków |
| 2 | Mord | | | | 1940 | 04 | | Rosyjska | Kalinińska | | Twier |

| LP | opis źródła | sygnatura |
|----|---|-------------------------|
| 1. | Ankiety personalne wypełniana przez samych represjonowanych bądź ich rodziny, zbiory Ośrodka KARTA, sygnatura IR/numer ankiety. | IR -/11591 |
| 2. | Listy wywozowe NKWD (kwiecień-maj 1940) z Ostaszkowa, kopia w zbiorach Ośrodka KARTA - strona, pozycja. | OST -/290-297/76 |

Like Kuligowski's, Małowiejski's name is also on the Russian lists of prisoners shipped out of the Ostashkov camp.[24]

In 2011 it was still assumed that the mass graves at Volodymyr-Volyns'kiy were those of victims of the Soviet NKVD. Therefore this apparent discrepancy about the place of burial of one victim received little attention. Since then the Polish archaeological team has definitively dated the site as 1941 at the earliest and argues that it is an SS Einsatzgruppe mass murder site, meaning late 1941 or 1942. This in turn means that Kuligowski, Małowiejski, and perhaps others — perhaps many others — were killed by the Germans in 1941, not by the Soviets in 1940.

Where Does This Leave Us?

So where does this leave us? By "us" I mean those researchers who are fascinated by the uncertainty and the political contentiousness, the challenge of all the contradictory evidence and the mysteriousness, of what I have come to call "the Katyn Forest Whodunnit." What does this mean for people who want to know the truth no matter what it may be, "no matter whose ox is gored"?

Briefly, here's the status of this question at present, as I understand it:

- There is no evidence that the 14,000+ Polish POWs who were transferred out of Soviet POW camps in April and May 1940 were in reality being sent to be shot. This assumption has been one of the main supports of the "official" version of the Katyn Massacre. It must now be rejected. Since Kuligowski and Małowiejski were on those transportation lists and survived to be killed in 1941 by the Nazis, then others could have as well. There is no basis to think that only a few of the Polish prisoners were not shot by the Soviets in April-May 1940 and that, just by chance, two of this group have been identified. Rather it is likely that most of the Polish POWs were not killed by the Soviets but remained in Soviet captivity to be captured and shot by the Nazis sometime after the middle of 1941.

- The "smoking gun" documents from "Closed Packet No. 1" are linked to the assumption that all the POWs shipped out of the camps were being shipped to execution. The fact that they were not shipped to execution in April-May 1940 is an additional reason to suspect that these documents may indeed be forgeries, as some have long argued.
- The confession-interviews of the three NKVD witnesses, Soprunenko, Tokarev, and Syromiatnikov, strongly suggest that the NKVD did execute some Poles. Their testimony is inconsistent — as is to be expected from 50 year-old remembrances of men in their 80s. What's more, they testified under threat of criminal prosecution and so may have elaborated their confessions in order to please their interrogators. But even researchers who contend that the Germans shot the Poles whose bodies were disinterred by the Germans at Katyn in April-June 1943 do not claim that the Soviets shot no Poles at all.
- In 2004 the Russian Prosecutor's office announced that it had closed the criminal investigation on the grounds that there was no evidence that a crime had been committed. This announcement is contained in the following statement on the Prosecutor's web page dated April 7, 2011:

21 сентября 2004 г. уголовное дело по обвинению должностных лиц НКВД СССР в совершении преступления, предусмотренного п. «б» ст. 193-17 УК РСФСР (1926 г.), т.е. превышения власти, выразившегося в принятии незаконных решений о применении в отношении 14 542 польских граждан расстрела, прекращено на основании п. 4 ч. 1 ст. 24 УПК РФ — за отсутствием события преступления. (http://genproc.gov.ru/ms/ms_news/news-71620)

On September 21, 2004 the criminal case against officials of the NKVD in the commission of an offense under subsection "b" of Art. 193-17 of the Criminal Code of the RSFSR (1926), ie abuse of power, manifesting itself as the taking of an illegal decision on the application of shooting to 14,542 Polish citizens, was closed on the basis of paragraph 1 of paragraph 4, part 1, Article 24 of the Code of Criminal Procedure of the Russian Federation — for lack of a crime.

This appears to say that the investigation found that no crime had been committed. This is different from Cienciala's interpretation, which is "that no one would be charged with the crime." (259) The Prosecutor's text plainly states that there was no crime in the first place. Nevertheless Russian officials, including President Putin and Prime Minister Medvedev, have continued to state that the Soviets are guilty of killing all the Poles.

The Volodymyr-Volyns'kiy discovery proves that the "transit lists" are not "execution lists." Instead, they are merely what they seem to be — lists of Polish POWs being transferred somewhere else for some purpose. Some of the Polish POWs transferred may have been tried and shot by the Soviets. But others such as Józef Kuligowski and Ludwik Małowiejski were not transferred to execution. They were transferred for some other purpose — most likely to a correctional labor camp as stated in Document 53, p. 155 in Cienciala et al. (quoted above).

The Burdenko Commission

The fact is: A Polish POW's name on a "transit list" does not mean that he was executed by the Soviets in April-May 1940 or indeed at any time. This forces us to take a closer look at the Soviet Burdenko Commission Report of January 1944. The Burdenko Commission report contains the following information about materials it allegedly found on a body unearthed from grave No. 8 at Katyn:

4. На трупе № 46: Квитанция (№ неразборчив), выданная 16 дек. 1939 г. Старобельским лагерем о приеме от Арашкевича Владимира Рудольфовича золотых часов. На обороте квитанции имеется отметка от 25 марта 1941 г. о том, что часы проданы Ювелирторгу.

...

6. На труппе № 46: Квитанция от 6 апреля 1941 г., выданная лагерем № 1-ОН о приеме от Арашкевича денег в сумме 225 рублей.

7. На том же труппе № 46: Квитанция от 5 мая 1941 г., выданная лагерем № 1-ОН о приеме от Арашкевича денег в сумме 102 рубля.

4. On body No. 46: A receipt (number illegible) issued 16 Dec. 1939, by the Starobelsk camp testifying receipt of a gold watch from Vladimir Rudolfovich Araszkewicz. On the back of the receipt is a note dated 25 March 1941, stating that the watch was sold to the Jewelry trading trust.

...

6. On body No. 46: A receipt dated 6 April 1941, issued by camp No. 1-ON, showing receipt of 225 rubles from Araszkewicz.

7. On the same body. No. 46: A receipt dated 5 May 1941, issued by Camp No. 1-ON, showing receipt of 102 rubles from Araszkewicz.[25]

Włodzimierz Araszkewicz is on the Polish lists of victims of Katyn, and also on the earlier list of Adam Mosziński, Lista Katyńska (GRYF, London 1989).[26] His father's name, Rudolf, is on his transfer record:

Nazwisko: Araszkewicz

Imię: Włodzimierz

Imię ojca: Rudolfa

Data urodzenia: 1896

| LP | Opis losów | Początek | | | Koniec | | | Kraj | Woj/Oblast | Pow. | Miej. |
|----|-------------|----------|---|---|--------|----|---|---------------|----------------------|------|-----------|
| | | r | m | d | r | m | d | | | | |
| 1 | Mord | | | | 1940 | 04 | | Rosyjska FSRR | Kalinińska (Twerska) | | Twier |
| 2 | Obóz | | | | 1940 | 04 | | Rosyjska FSRR | Kalinińska (Twerska) | | Ostaszków |
| LP | opis źródła | | | | | | | | | | sygnatura |

| | | |
|----|---|---------------------------------|
| 1. | Listy wywozowe NKWD (kwiecień-maj 1940) z Ostaszkowa, kopia w zbiorach Ośrodka KARTA - strona, pozycja. | * OST -/338- 340/7 |
|----|---|---------------------------------|

As often with these Polish lists there are contradictions. Mosziński, Lista Katyńska, has Araszkievicz in the Starobelsk camp, while the „Indeks” record (above) puts him at the Ostashkov camp, while Tucholski has him at both Kozel'sk and Ostashkov![27] Here is Araszkievicz's memorial from Volume 1 of the "Mednoe Cemetery Book," page 11:

Por. "cz. rez. Wodzimierz Marian ARASZKIEWICZ s. Rudolfa i Ireny, ur. 13 IX 1896 w Zamo odyczach. Uczestnik wojny 1920. Adwokat Izby Warszawskiej, w 1939 zamieszka y w Łodzi. Ppor. ze starszeństwem 1 VII 1925, por. 19 III 1939. Odzn. KN, KW.

According to the Burdenko Commission report Camp No. 1-ON, origin of the receipt found on body No. 46 and bearing Araszkievicz's name, was one of three labor camps named No. 1-ON, 2-ON, and 3-ON, where "ON" stands for "osobogo naznacheniiia" (special purpose or assignment). These camps were near Smolensk. The "special purpose" was road construction.

The Special Commission established that, before the capture of Smolensk by the Germans, Polish war prisoners, officers and men, worked in the western district of the region, building and repairing roads. These war prisoners were quartered in three special camps named: Camp No. 1 O.N., Camp No. 2 O.N., and Camp No. 3 O.N. These camps were located 25 to 45 kilometers west of Smolensk.

The testimony of witnesses and documentary evidence establish that after the outbreak of hostilities, in view of the situation that arose, the camps could not be evacuated in time and all the Polish war prisoners, as well as some members of the guard and staffs of the camps, fell prisoner to the Germans. (Burdenko Comm. 229)

According to the "official" version this story must be false, part of a putative Soviet coverup. The Nazis had begun their Katyn propaganda campaign on April 15, 1943.[28] By January 1944 the Katyn issue had been public for nine months, plenty of time for the Soviets to manufacture a false version.

However, in their very first response of April 16, 1943 the Soviets had already claimed that Polish officers were involved in construction in the Smolensk area.

Немецко-фашистские сообщения по этому поводу не оставляют никакого сомнения в трагической судьбе бывших польских военнопленных, находившихся в 1941 году в районах западнее Смоленска на строительных работах и попавших вместе со многими советскими людьми, жителями Смоленской области, в руки немецко-фашистских палачей летом 1941 года после отхода советских войск из района Смоленска.[29]

The German-fascist communiqué on this matter leaves no doubt about the tragic fate of the former Polish POWs who in 1941 were engaged in construction works in the area to the west of Smolensk and who, together with many Soviet citizens, residents of Smolensk oblast', fell into the hands of the German-fascist killers during the summer of 1941 after the withdrawal of Soviet forces from the Smolensk region.

This is essentially the same claim the Burdenko Commission made nine months later. But on April 16, 1943 no one knew exactly what the Germans would do or exactly what they would say. No one knew that Katyn would become a huge German propaganda campaign. The consistency between the Sovinformburo statement of April 16, 1943 and the Burdenko Commission report nine months later is therefore worthy of note, just as an inconsistency would have been. It might well be true.

The Burdenko Commission report also mentions finding similar documents on another body unearthed at Katyn: that of Edward Levandowski.

3. На трупе № 101: Квитанция № 10293 от 19 дек. — 1939 г., выданная Козельским лагерем о приеме от Левандовского Эдуарда Адамовича золотых часов. На обороте квитанции имеется запись от 14 марта 1941 г. о продаже этих часов Ювелирторгу....

8. На трупе № 101: Квитанция от 18 мая 1941 г., выданная лагерем № 1-ОН о приеме от Левандовского Э. денег в сумме 175 рублей.

3. On body No. 101: A receipt No. 10293 dated 19 Dec. 1939, issued by the Kozelsk camp testifying receipt of a gold watch from Eduard Adamovich Lewandowski. On the back of the receipt is a note dated 14 March 1941, on the sale of this watch to the Jewelry trading trust....

8. On body No. 101: A receipt dated 18 May 1941, issued by Camp No. 1-ON, showing receipt of 175 rubles from Lewandowski.

Edward Lewandowski, son of Adam, is also on Mosziński, Lista Katyńska [30] and in Tucholski (p. 317 col. 2; p. 891 No. 35). This time there are no contradictions — all these sources have him at Ostashkov, nowhere near the Smolensk area and Katyn. He is also stated to have been "murdered" at Kalinin, the destination of most of the transports from Ostashkov. Here is his memorial in the "Mednoe Cemetery Book" Volume One, p. 498.

Meanwhile the Burdenko Commission claimed to have found his body at Katyn, along with documents dated December 1939 from Kozel'sk and May 1941 from the same Camp 1-ON, near Smolensk, as Arasziewicz's.

Nnzwisko: Lewandowski

Imię: Józef

Imię ojca: Szczepann

Data urodzenia: 1898

| LP | Opis losów | Początek | | | Koniec | | | Kraj | Woj/Oblast | Pow. | Miej. |
|----|---|----------|---|---|--------|----|---|------------------|-------------------------|------|---------------|
| | | r | m | d | r | m | d | | | | |
| 1 | Mord | | | | 1940 | 04 | | Rosyjska FSRR | Kalinińska (Twerska) | | Twier |
| 2 | Obóz | | | | 1940 | 04 | | Rosyjska FSRR | Kalinińska (Twerska) | | Ostaszków |
| LP | opis źródła | | | | | | | | | | sygnatura |
| 1. | Ankiety personalne wypełniana przez samych represjonowanych bądź ich rodziny, zbiory Ośrodka KARTA, sygnatura IR/numer ankiety. | | | | | | | | | | IR -/11707 |

| | | |
|----|--|------------------------|
| 2. | Listy wywozowe NKWD (kwiecień-maj 1940) z Ostaszkowa, kopia w zbiorach Ośradka KARTA — strona, pozycja. | OST/-148-152/15 |
|----|--|------------------------|

The Burdenko Commission report also mentions the following find:

9. На трупе № 53: Неотправленная почтовая открытка на польском языке в адрес: Варшава, Багателя 15 кв. 47 Ирене Кучинской. Датирована 20 июня 1941 г. Отправитель Станислав Кучинский.

9. On body No. 53: An unmailed postcard in the Polish language addressed Warsaw, Bagatelia 15, apartment 47, to Irene Kuczinska, and dated 20 June 1941. The sender is Stanislaw Kuczinski. (Burdenko Comm. pp. 246-247).

A Stanisław Kucziński is named in the Katyn victims list. The name is a common one. The record below is that of the only person by that name who is said in those lists to have been killed in the Katyn Massacres:

Nnzwisko: Kucziński

Imię: Stanisław

Imię ojca: Antoniego

Data urodzenia: 1908

| LP | Opis losów | Początek | | | Koniec | | | Kraj | Woj/Oblast | Pow. | Miej. |
|----|--|----------|---|---|--------|----|---|----------------------|-----------------------------|------|-------------------------|
| | | r | m | d | r | m | d | | | | |
| 1 | Mord | | | | 1940 | 04 | | Rosyjska FSRR | Kalinińska (Twerska) | | Twier |
| 2 | Obóz | | | | 1940 | 04 | | Rosyjska FSRR | Kalinińska (Twerska) | | Ostaszków |
| LP | opis źródła | | | | | | | | | | sygnatura |
| 1. | Listy wywozowe NKWD (kwiecień-maj 1940) z Ostaszkowa, kopia w zbiorach Ośradka KARTA — strona, pozycja. | | | | | | | | | | OST/-/221-225/87 |

This Stanisław Kucziński, son of Antoni, is also memorialized in the "Mednoe Cemetery Book" I, p. 459:

Post. PP Stanisław KUCZYŃSKI s. Antoniego i Stanisławy z Kowalczyków, ur. 18 III 1908 w Żyrardowie. We wrześniu 1939 służbę pełnił na Post. w Pruszkowie Pow. Warszawski.

Once again this victim is stated to have been transferred from the camp at Ostashkov to Kalinin and "murdered" there, though the Burdenko Commission stated that they found his body at Katyn.[31]

How can the Polish Katyn lists assert that Araszkievicz, Lewandowski, and Kucziński were killed ("Mord") at Kalinin and buried nearby at Mednoe when their bodies were unearthed by the Burdenko Commission at Katyn? Only by assuming that the Burdenko Commission was lying when it claimed to have found these corpses at Katyn with papers from March, May, and June 1941 on them. But then the Soviets would have had to go to Kalinin, unearth these bodies and bring them to Katyn. Or they could have chosen the names of three victims they knew were buried at Kalinin and claim they had discovered their bodies at Katyn.

But why go to all that trouble when they could have just planted false documents on the bodies of persons they knew to have been shot at Katyn? After all, if the Soviets had shot all these men they knew not only who was buried at Kalinin but also who was buried at Katyn. So why not use the bodies, or at least the identities, of three men who really were buried at Katyn? Why use the names of three men buried hundreds of miles away?

No objective historian would make such an assumption. One only has to assume that the Burdenko Commission was lying if one has already made the prior assumption that the transportation lists are really "death lists." That is, the second assumption entails the first: it is "an assumption based upon an assumption." If it were definitely the case that the "transfer lists" really were lists of Poles being shipped to execution, then we could confidently state that these assertions by the Burdenko Commission were fabrications — lies intended to blame on the Germans murders that the Soviets had in fact carried out. But the discoveries at Volodymyr-Volyn'skiy have proven that the "transfer lists" were not lists of persons being shipped to execution. Moreover, there is no evidence that the Soviets did any of this.

It is simpler to assume that the Burdenko Commission really did unearth the bodies of Araszkiewicz, Lewandowski, and Kucziński at Katyn.[32] That means that Araszkiewicz, Lewandowski, and Kucziński could have been shipped to a labor camp, a "camp of special purpose" as, according to the Burdenko Commission, they were called; captured by the Germans during the summer of 1941; shot either at the Katyn Forest site or, if shot at their camps — 25 to 45 Km from Smolensk — their corpses brought to Katyn as part of the Nazi propaganda campaign to split the Allies. A number of witnesses testified to the Burdenko Commission that they saw German trucks loaded with corpses being driven in the direction of Katyn.[33]

This is the only scenario that accounts for the facts as we now know them. Moreover, it is strengthened by a discovery the Germans themselves made. The 1943 German report on Katyn states that the following item was found in one of the mass graves:

eine ovale Blechmarke unter den Asservaten vor, die folgende Angaben enthält

T. K. UNKWD K. O.
9 4 2 4
Stadt Ostaschkow[34]

The text of the original badge would have been, in Russian, like this:

Т. К. УНКВД К. О.
9 4 2 4
г. Осташков

A probable English translation would be:

Prison Kitchen, NKVD Directorate, Kalinin Oblast'

[prisoner, or cell, or badge number] 9 4 2 4

town of Ostashkov[35]

None of the "transport lists" from the camp at Ostashkov were for transport to Katyn or anywhere near Smolensk. All these lists state that the Polish prisoners were sent to Kalinin. Therefore the person buried at Katyn who had this badge in his possession had been shipped to Kalinin. But, obviously, he was not shot there. The badge was unearthed at Katyn. Therefore, the owner of this badge was also shot at Katyn, or nearby.

There seems to be just one way these men, and doubtless many more, could have ended up shot and buried at Katyn. They must have been transferred from Kalinin to a labor camp near Katyn, where the Germans captured and shot them. This hypothesis fits the scenario as outlined by the Sovinformburo statement of April 16, 1943, and by the Burdenko Commission. It also offers independent confirmation of the main conclusion of this article: that the prisoners transferred out of the POW camps in April-May 1940 were not being shipped to execution.

What Really Did Happen?

The discoveries in the mass graves at Volodymyr-Volyns'kiy constitute a lethal blow to the "official" version of the Katyn Massacre. This is something that should interest all of us. Katyn has been the most famous crime alleged against Stalin and the Soviet government. It has been the crime most firmly grounded in documentary evidence. For example, it is unlike the alleged "Holodomor," the supposedly deliberate starvation by Stalin of millions of Ukrainians in the famine of 1932-1933, for which no evidence has ever been found.[36]

All the post-Soviet states today employ "Soviet atrocities" narratives to justify the pro-fascist, anti-semitic, and pro-Nazi actions of the forces that sided with the Germans against the Soviet Union before, during, and after World War 2. Katyn is the keystone of contemporary right-wing Polish nationalism. Katyn is also a key component of anti-Stalin, anti-Soviet, and anticommunist propaganda generally. Until now, it has been the best known such alleged atrocity and by far the best documented one. Katyn has been the best proven "crime of Stalinism." That is no longer the case.

So what really did happen? In my view — and here I am following a number of the very competent Russian researchers who have likewise concluded that the "official" version is wrong — the Soviets did execute some Poles.

We know that after occupying Western Belorussia and Western Ukraine, formerly Eastern Poland, in September 1939 the Soviet NKVD searched for Poles who had been involved in the 1920-21 war in which Poland had taken these territories from the Russian Socialist Republic, which had been exhausted by four years of civil war and Allied intervention, typhus epidemic, and famine.[37] Imperialist Poland had deprived the majority populations — Belorussians, Ukrainians, and Jews — of many of their national and civil rights.[38] The Polish government had sent "settlers" (osadnicy), mainly former military officers, to "polonize" ("make more Polish") the lands, giving them estates and making them government officials and teachers. Poland had violently repressed the communist movement and the Ukrainian, Belorussian, and Jewish minorities in these lands, as well as in Poland proper. Moreover: during the Russo-Polish war of 1920-21 somewhere between 18,000 and 60,000 Red Army POWs had died in Polish captivity. There is good documentation that they were treated brutally, starved, frozen, and many of them murdered outright.[39]

Therefore it is probable that the Soviets would have arrested and prosecuted any Polish POWs and civilians they could find who had been involved in these crimes. Many of these people were deported to places of exile deep within the USSR (where many of them survived World War 2, far away from their former homes where the fighting and Nazi and Ukrainian[40] mass murders were the most ferocious). Others must have been tried, convicted, and either executed or sent to labor camps.

It is likely that a substantial number of the Polish POWs — military officers, policemen, and guards of various kinds — had been involved either in repression of or atrocities against Soviet troops, communists, trade unionists, or workers, peasants, or Belorussian, Ukrainian, and Jewish schools or institutions. The Soviet Union would have prosecuted them. It is also likely that some Polish POWs were sentenced to labor in areas that were captured by the Germans when they invaded the USSR in 1941, and subsequently executed, as Kuligowski and Małowiejski were.

Former NKVD men Soprunenko, Tokarev, and Syromiatnikov testified that they knew of some executions of Polish prisoners. So there's no reason to doubt that the Soviets did shoot some Poles. But the discoveries at Volodymyr-Volyns'kiy prove that the "transit" or "shipment" documents do not record the shipping of the prisoners to execution. This is the basis of the "official" version of the Katyn Massacre: it has now been proven false. The Polish POWs were not being shipped to execution when the camps they were in were closed in April-May 1940.

I predict that in "mainstream" — i.e., anticommunist — academia the discourse about the Katyn Massacre will change very little. Mainstream anticommunism is motivated far more by "political correctness" — by political motives — than by any desire to discover the truth. When mainstream anticommunist scholarship does mention the Volodymyr-Volyns'kiy discoveries it will be only to try to dismiss them. One way of attempting to do so is demonstrated in the Ukrainian archaeological report cited below — to claim that the NKVD carried out these executions. Other similar subterfuges can be invented. The central importance of these discoveries for an objective understanding of this infamous historical event will be denied at all costs.

Perhaps the Polish archaeologist's report anticipated this by relegating the finding of Kuligowski's badge to a footnote. It could be considered a principled and even courageous act by this archaeologist, Dr. Dominika Siemińska, to reveal the discovery of the badge and to give the important details about it in the report, no matter how minimized and downplayed. No one compelled her to insert this information, which directs the attentive reader to the contradiction between the discovery at Volodymyr-Volyns'kiy and the "official" version of Katyn. Questioning of the "official" version is not tolerated in the public sphere in Poland. One hopes that Dr. Siemińska's career will not suffer because of her adherence to scientific objectivity.

The report of the Ukrainian part of the same team does not mention the discovery of either badge. Moreover, the Ukrainian report goes out of its way to suggest that the Soviets might still somehow be responsible for the mass executions. It protests the finding of the Polish report that the graves used the "Jeckeln system" "since it only began to be used by the Nazis at the end of 1941 and the beginning of 1942." No evidence is included in support of this claim.

Додатково хочеться відмітити, щоданий метод розстрілів неможливо називати «системою Єскельна», на який посилаються наші польські колеги. Цей нацистський метод не передбачав страти у поховальній ямі. До того ж його почали застосовувати лише наприкінці 1941 — на початку 1942 р. у Ризі, що хронологічно не відповідає володимирській страті.

In addition we wish to note that this method of execution should not be called the "Jeckeln system," to which our Polish colleagues refer. This Nazi method was not used for executions in a funeral pit. In addition, it began to be used only in late 1941 — early 1942 in Riga, which does not correspond chronologically to the Volodymyr executions.

The Ukrainian report mentions the fact that the German shell casings found were from 1941, but then states "It is known that Soviet organs of the NKVD used German weapons in mass executions of Polish citizens." [41]

У поховальних ямах виявлено ідентичні гільзи, головним чином калібру 9 мм. Більшість з них мають позначки dnh (виробництво заводу Верк Дурлах в Карлсрує, Німеччина) та kam (виробництво фабрики Насаг у Скаржиці Кам'яній, Польща) 1941 р. Проте виявлені і декілька гільз радянського зразка. Все це потребує додаткових досліджень, оскільки стверджувати про те, що розстріли проводилися гітлерівцями при наявності в поховальних ямах гільз радянського зразка — не є об'єктивним. Відомі факти (зокрема дані розстрілів польських військових у Катині), що радянські органи НКВС використовували при розстрілах німецьку зброю.

In the burial pits were found identical shells, mainly of 9 mm caliber. Most of them have the mark "dnh" (production of the factory Werk Drulach [42] in Karlsruhe, Germany) and "kam" (production of the Hasag factory in Skarżysko-Kamienna, [43] Poland) of 1941. However a few shells of Soviet type were also found. All this requires further research, inasmuch as it is not objective to affirm that the shootings were carried out by the Hitlerites when shells of Soviet type were found in the pits. Facts are known (including the facts of the shooting of Polish military men at Katyn) that the Soviet organs of the NKVD used German weapons in shootings.

Details of the shells, 150 in all, found in grave No. 1 are given in footnote 3, page 8 of the Polish report but are absent from the Ukrainian report:

1. "kam, 67, 19, 41" — 137 szt; 2. "dnh, *, 1, 41" — 7 szt; 3. Geco, 9 mm — 1 szt; 4. łuski bez oznaczeń, 7,62 x 25, wz. 30, produkcja ZSRR — 5 szt.

1. "kam, 67, 19, 41" — 137 units; 2. "dnh, *, 1, 41" — 7 units; 3. Geco, 9 mm. — 1 unit; 4. Shells without markings, 7.62 x 25 caliber, USSR production of 1930s type — 5 units.

According to the analysis by Sergei Strygin "kam, 67, 19, 41" signifies the Hasag factory in Skarżysko-Kamienna, "67" the percentage of copper in the bullet, "19" the lot number, and "41" the year of production. "dnh , 1, 41" signifies the Dürlach factory, "" means the shell was jacketed in brass; "1" is the lot number, and "41" the year of production. One hundred forty-four, or 96% of the 150 shells found, were of German make and can be dated to 1941.

The Polish, but not the Ukrainian, report also specifies the shells found in grave No. 2:

1. "kam, 67, 19, 41"- 205 szt; 2. „dnh, .*, 1, 41" — 17 szt; 3. łuski bez oznaczeń. 7.62 x 25. wz. 30, produkcja ZSRR — 2 szt; 4. łuska „B ,1906"

1. "Kam, 67, 19, 41" — 205 units; 2. "dny, *, 1, 41" — 17 units; 3. Shells without markings, 7.62×25 caliber — USSR production of 1930s — 2 units; (one) shell "B, 1906."

Of 225 shells found in this grave, 205 are the German 1941 "Hasag" type, 17 are the German 1941 "Dürlach" type, 2 are of the unmarked 1930s Soviet type; and one is marked "B 1906." [44] Hence 98.67% of the shells are of 1941 German manufacture.

By contrast neither of the Ukrainian reports cites the numbers of each type of shell or the fact that German shells made in 1941 constitute the overwhelming majority of those found. The following paragraph appears word-for-word in each:

У поховальних ямах виявлено ідентичні гільзи, головним чином калібру 9 мм. Більшість з них мають позначки dnh (виробництво заводу Верк Дурлах в Карлсрує, Німеччина) та kam (виробництво фабрики Hasag у Скаржиці Кам'яній, Польща) 1941 р. Проте виявлені і декілька гільз радянського зразка. Все це потребує додаткових досліджень, оскільки стверджувати про те, що розстріли проводилися гітлерівцями при наявності в поховальних ямах гільз радянського зразка — не є об'єктивним. Відомі факти (зокрема дані розстрілів польських військових у Катині), що радянські органи НКВС використовували при розстрілах німецьку зброю.[45]

In the burial pits were found identical shells, mainly of caliber 9 mm. Most of them have the mark "dnh" (Werk Dürlach production plant in Karlsruhe, Germany), and "kam" (production factory in Hasag Skarżysko Kamienna, Poland) in 1941. However, several shell casings of Soviet model were also found. All this requires more research inasmuch that it is not objective to assert that the shootings were carried out by the Hitlerites even though shells of Soviet model were found in the burial pits. Examples are known (including data of shootings of Polish soldiers in Katyn) that the Soviet organs of the NKVD used German weapons in executions.

There are some problems with the conclusion in the Ukrainian report. First, it is an example of circular reasoning. It assumes that the mass killings at Katyn, which even the Germans admitted were carried out with German ammunition, was a Soviet crime. But that is the very assumption that the discoveries at Volodymyr-Volyns'kiy call into question.

Second, it assumes that even the overwhelming preponderance of German ordnance is not enough to establish that the killings were done by the Germans, since the Soviets could also use German ammunition. No doubt this is the reason the Ukrainian report does not give the numbers of shells or the percentage of them that are German and of 1941 manufacture. (The Ukrainian reports should have added that Germans could also use Soviet ammunition. The Germans captured immense amounts of Soviet arms and ammunition in 1941.)

The Ukrainian report does note that women clutching children to their breasts were also found in the mass graves.

Відмічено також, що вбиті часто прикривали обличчя руками, або обіймали іншу жертву (жінки тулили до себе і прикривали дітей). (Doslizhdennia; Zvit 15)

It is also noted that those killed often covered their faces with their hands, or embraced another victim (women hugged to themselves and covered children).

There are no examples anywhere of the Soviet NKVD shooting children.

Ukrainian archaeologist Oleksei Zlatohorsky (Russian: Aleksei Zlatogorskii) has pointed out the political problems raised by the Polish archaeologist's identification of the Germans as the murderers:

Неосторожные высказывания польских археологов о принадлежности останков, найденных на территории замка Казимира Великого во Владимире-Волыньском, могут поставить под сомнение уже известные преступления НКВД по отношению к польским офицерам, сообщил директор ГП "Волыньские древности" Алексей Златогорский в комментарии Gazeta.ua.

Incautious statements by Polish archaeologists about the belongings of the remains found on the land of the castle of Kazimir Velikii in Vladimir-Volynskii could cast doubt upon the already known crimes of the NKVD in relation to Polish officers, said the direction of the state enterprise "Volyn antiquities" Aleksei Zlatogorskii in a commentary to Gazeta.ua.[46]

The only "already known crimes of the NKVD in relation to Polish officers" is the Katyn Massacre — to be more precise, the "official" version of the Katyn Massacre. Prof. Zlatohorskyy does not explain how the Polish report "casts doubt" upon the "official" version of Katyn.

The Ukrainian report cited above appears to be a shorter, perhaps Internet version of a longer report written by Zlatohorskyy and two other Ukrainian archaeologists, S.D. Panishko and M.P. Vasheta. This report (Zvit) omits any mention of Kuligowski, Małowiejski, or their badges. Its appendix does include photographs also found in the Polish report. Among them are a photo of the Polish policeman's epaulette and of the "sardine-packing" arrangement of bodies in Grave No. 2. (Zvit 91,92,97). The very "orderly" arrangement of bodies contradicts the description by Prof. Kola.

The opening of an exhibition concerning this site at the Volodymyr-Volyns'kiy Historical Museum on March 5 2013 has been announced. The accompanying article states only that in 1997 researchers assumed that the victims buried there were Poles shot by the NKVD in 1939-1940, and suggests that this is still their conclusion.

Виставка розповідає про результати ексгумаційних робіт протягом 2010-2012 рр., розкриває перед відвідувачами основні віхи історії ще одного великого замку на Волині та страхітливого злочину, прихованих від людського ока.

The exhibit tells of the results of the works of exhumation during the years 2010-2012, reveals to visitors the basic milestones of yet another great castle of Volhynia and of a horrifying crime hidden from human eyes.[47]

Even if we set aside all the evidence that the Germans killed the victims at Volodymyr-Volyns'kiy, there remains the fact that most of the ammunition used was manufactured in 1941. The "transit" or "shipment" documents are of April-May 1940. Kuligowski and Małowiejski could not have been killed earlier than 1941. No one has suggested that they were killed in Kalinin and Kharkiv in April-May 1940 and then their badges brought to a mass grave in Volodymyr-Volyns'kiy, hundreds of miles away, and there thrown into the burial pit.

Kuligowski and Małowiejski were indeed shipped out of their POW camps in April 1940, as recorded in the Soviet transit lists published by Tucholski in 1991. But neither of them was being sent to execution. They were killed in 1941 in Volodymyr-Volyns'kiy, Ukrainian SSR. According to the evidence now available they were killed by the Germans. But this is not important for our present purposes. What is important is this: it is invalid to conclude that any of the prisoners shipped out of the Polish POW camps in April-May 1940 were being sent to their deaths. This in itself disproves the "official" version of the Katyn massacre.

Conclusion

The opinions of persons who are motivated by a desire to learn the truth about Katyn as about historical questions generally can be altered by the evidence discovered at Volodymyr-Volyns'kiy. This can happen only if the news of the discovery, and of its implications for the understanding of the Katyn issue, becomes widely known and understood.

This is no easy matter. Aside from a small number of researchers, what most people learn about the Katyn issue reflects the "official" version. Discussion of Katyn is actively discouraged in mainstream academic and political circles under the pretext that the matter has been so firmly established by evidence that only cranks and communists could question it.

However, the very act of discouraging free discussion and doubts about the "official" viewpoint has the potential to stimulate curiosity and questioning.

Notes

1. "'Волынская Катынь' оказалась делом рук гитлеровцев." ["The 'Volhynian Katyn' turns out to be a deed of the Hitlerites."] At <http://katyn.ru/index.php?go=News&in=view&id=253>.
2. According to the "official" account, small numbers of Polish prisoners were confined at or shipped to other camps and were not executed.

[3] Hitler outlined this "Big Lie" in Mein Kampf: Chapter 6, "War Propaganda," and Chapter 10, "Why the Second Reich Collapsed."

[4] «Секретные документы из особых папок» Вопросы Истории 1993 № 1, сс. 3-22.

[5] At <http://www.tinyurl.com/katyn-the-truth>.

[6] I picked the title "The Katyn Forest Whodunnit" for my page because it expresses my own uncertainty, and thereby my own dedication to objectivity. I don't know "who did it," the Nazis or the Soviets, the Soviets or the Nazis, and I would like to know. Moreover, I don't care "who did it." If the Germans did it, it is just what they did all over Eastern Europe and on a much larger scale. If the Soviets did it, we should try to discover why they did. It would not be "endemic to communism," as the anticommunists claim. In fact, though, it appears more and more likely that the Soviets did not "do it."

[7] I have taken the texts of all but one of the confessions from the official Polish volume Katyń. Dokumenty zbrodni- Tom 2 Zagłada marzec-czerwiec 1940. (Warsaw: Wydawnictwo „Trio,” 1998). They were originally published separately. I have checked those original versions against this one. In addition, Syromiatnikov gave an interview to Polish journalist Jerzy Morawski in 1992. All these interviews with ex-NKVD officers Soprunenko, Syromiatnikov, and Tokarev are available at http://msuweb.montclair.edu/~furrgr/research/katyn_nkvd.html.

[8] "Osoby z Listy Katyńskiej mordowano we Włodzimierzu Wołyńskim?!" (Persons from the Katyn List murdered at Włodzimierz Wołyński?!), ITVL May 25, 2011. At <http://www.itvl.pl/news/osoby-z-listy-katynskiej-mordowano-we-wlodzimierzu-wolynskim>.

[9] All translations in this article are mine.

[10] The surrounding region of Volhynia was part of Austria-Hungary until the end of World War I; then part of Poland; then part of the Soviet Ukraine; then occupied by the Germans; then again part of Soviet Ukraine, and is now part of Ukraine. Until 1939 the language of the urban elite was mainly Polish, that of the peasantry mainly Ukrainian and Yiddish.

[11] See "Tropem zbrodni NKWD pod Włodzimierzem Wołyńskim" (Trail of NKVD crime near Włodzimierz Wołyński) at <http://wolyn.btx.pl/index.php/component/content/article/1-historia/168-tropem-zbrodni-nkwd-pod-wodzimierzem-woyskim.html>; Włodzimierz Wołyński — groby polskich ofiar NKWD" (graves of Polish victims of the NKVD) at <http://www.nawolyniu.pl/artykuly/ofiarynkwd.htm>; "Czyje mogiły odnaleziono we Włodzimierz Wołyńskim?" (Whose graves found at Włodzimierz Wołyński?) <http://wpolityce.pl/depesze/10407-czyje-mogily-odnaleziono-we-wlodzimierz-woylenskim> This last article speaks of „ofiar pomordowanych przez NKWD w latach 1940-1941 w sowieckiej katowni na zamku we Włodzimierz Wołyńskim" (victims murdered by the NKVD in 1940-1941 in the Soviet execution chamber in the castle at Włodzimierz Wołyński). Many more similar articles could be cited.

[12] "Волинська Катинь. У Володимирі-Волинському знайдено масове поховання жертв НКВС 1939–1941 років." Tyzhden.ua October 4, 2011. At <http://tyzhden.ua/Society/31329>.

[13] In reality there was plenty of "order" in the burials. We shall see below that both the Polish and Ukrainian reports attest to this fact. There is also a great deal of evidence, including photographs, that German troops executed people from behind rather than in "firing-squad" formation.

[14] Sprawozdanie z Nadzoru Nad Badaniami Archeologiczno-Ekshumacyjnymi na Terenie Rezerwatu Historyczno-Kulturowego Miasta Włodzimierza Wołyńskiego (Ukraina). Opracowanie zespołowe pod kierunkiem dr Dominiki Siemińskiej. Rada Ochrony Pamięci Walk i Męczeństwa. (Report of the Supervision on the Archaeological-Exhumation Investigation in the Area of the Reservation of the Historical-Cultural Town of Volodymyr-Volyns'kiy (Ukraine). A Team Description under the Direction of Dr. Dominika Siemińska. Council for the Commemoration of Struggle and Martyrdom). Toruń, 2012, Note, pp. 1-2. At <http://www.kresykedzierzynkozle.home.pl/attachments/File/Rap.pdf>.

[15] <http://www.indeks.karta.org.pl/pl/szczegoly.jsp?id=11036> According to the Home Page „Indeks Represjonowanych” (<http://www.indeks.karta.org.pl/pl/index.html>) this online record is a digital version of the contents of the official volume: Maria Skrzyńska-Pławińska, ed. Rozstrzelani w Twrze : alfabetyczny spis 6314 jeńców polskich z Ostaszkowa rozstrzelanych w kwietniu-maju 1940 i pogrzebanych w Miednoje, według źródeł sowieckich i polskich. Warszawa : Ośrodek KARTA, 1997.

[16] Jędrzej Tucholski. Mord w Katyniu: Kozielsk, Ostaszków, Starobielsk. Lista ofiar. Warszawa: Instytut Wydawniczy Pax, 1991, p. 810. No. 15: NKVD list No. 026/1 of 13 April 1940, position 15. In spite of the presence of Kuligowski's name on this NKVD list, for some reason the alphabetical section of Tucholski (p. 314 col. 2) lists Kuligowski on its "victims list" (lista ofiar) as "probably Ostashkov" (Prawdop. Ostaszków).

[17] See "INDEKS NAZWISK — Katyń — zamordowani przez NKWD w 1940 r." <http://www.ornatowski.com/index/katyn.htm>.

[18] See above, note 14.

[19] A description of this method of execution may be found on the English-language Wikipedia page on Jeckeln at http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Friedrich_Jeckeln#World_War_II_mass_murder.

[20] Equivalent to full or four-star General, the highest SS rank aside from that of Heinrich Himmler, whose rank was Reichsführer-SS.

[21] Photos available at http://msuweb.montclair.edu/~furrgr/research/polskie_guziki_pagon_VV2012.jpg ,from the Polish archaeological report.

[22] "Kolejny policjant z Listy Katyńskiej odnaleziony we Włodzimierzu Wołyńskim.." [Another policeman on the Katyn List is found in Volodymyr-Volynsky]. At <http://www.itvl.pl/news/kolejny-policjant-z-listy-katynskiej-odnaleziony-we-wlodzimierzu-wolynskim>.

[23] "INDEKS NAZWISK — Katyń — zamordowani przez NKWD w 1940 r." At <http://www.ornatowski.com/index/katyn.htm>.

[24] Tucholski p. 887 No. 76. Małowiejski was in a transport of 100 Polish prisoners sent to the Kalinin NKVD on April 27, 1940. Of course his name is also on Tucholski's alphabetical list (p. 322, col. 2) as is Kuligowski's, and on other official lists of Katyn victims.

[25] "Report of Special Commission for Ascertaining and Investigating the Circumstances of the Shooting of Polish Officer Prisoners by the German-Fascist Invaders in the Katyn Forest." (Burdenko Report). In The Katyn Forest Massacre. Hearings Before the Select Committee To Conduct an Investigation of the Facts, Evidence, and Circumstances of the Katyn Forest Massacre. Eighty-Second Congress, Second Session. ...Part 3 (Chicago). March 13 and 14, 1952. U.S. Government Printing Office, 1952 (http://msuweb.montclair.edu/~furg/research/burdenko_comm.pdf), p. 246.

[26] "Część Pierwsza. Obóz w Kozielsku. Groby w Lesie Katyńskim," p. 3 (pages unnumbered).

[27] Araszkiewica at Kozel'sk: Tucholski p. 68 col. 2 (the alphabetical list). In the Russian-language "transit lists" that take up almost 400 pages of Tucholski's book, Araszkiewicz's transfer from Ostashkov to Kalinin is recorded on list No.062/2 of May 19, 1940, the last shipment of prisoners out of Ostashkov: p. 907, No. 7.

[28] The New York Times published a very brief notice of the German claim on April 16, 1943; see "Nazis Accuse Russians," p. 4.

[29] "Совинформбюро. Гнусные измышления немецко-фашистских палачей" (Sovinformburo: Vile Fabrications of the German-Fascist Executioners), April 16, 1943. At <http://tinyurl.com/sovinformburo041643>.

[30] "Część Druga. Obóz w Ostaszkowie," p. 13 (pages unnumbered).

[31] Mosziński, Lista Katyńska, lists the only Stanisław Kucziński in the Katyn victims lists as at the Starobelsk camp; see "Część Trzecia. Obóz w Starobielsku," page 34 (unnumbered pages). Tucholski (p.314 col. 1; lists p.

851 No. 87) puts a Stanisław Kucziński at Ostashkov, thus agreeing with the "Indeks" list. The "Indeks" list and Tucholski agree that this Kucziński's father's name was Adam; Mosziński does not give any father's name. Mosziński's Stanisław Kucziński was a "rtm," a Rotmistrz, or Captain of Cavalry, while Tucholski's was a constable of police ("Funkcj. PP, posterunek Pruszków"). It appears that Mosziński and the other two sources are indicating different men.

[32] The names of these three men are not on the list of 4143 bodies, some of them nameless, in the German report Amtliches Material.

[33] Testimony of P.F. Sukhachev, October 8, 1942, and of Vladimir Afanasievich Yegorov, undated, to Burdenko Commission, Burdenko Comm (note 26), 241-2.

[34] Amtliches Material zum Massenmord von KATYN. Berlin: Zentralverlag der NSDAP. Franz Eher Nachf. GmbH., 1943, p. 46. The German sentence reads: "... an oval tin badge among the exhibits, which contains the following information."

[35] The abbreviation "Т.К." may mean "prison kitchen" (тюремнаякухня) or "pantry," or it may mean something else. What matters is that the badge or marker comes from Ostashkov.

[36] For a brief overview of this question see Mark Tauger, "Famine in Russian History," Modern Encyclopedia of Russian and Soviet History, Volume 10: Supplement. (Gulf Breeze, FL: Academic International Press, 2011), 79-92. Tauger's own works on the famine are cited at page 92. I consider Tauger to be the world's authority on this famine, to the study of which he has devoted decades. See also R.W. Davies and Stephen G. Wheatcroft, The Years of Hunger. Soviet Agriculture, 1931-1933 (London: Palgrave Macmillan 2009 [2004]), 440-1. Concerning the "Yezhovshchina" (also called "the Great Terror") see the Yezhov confession of August 4, 1939 printed in Никита Петров, "Сталинский питомец" — Николай Ежов (Nikita Petrov, "Stalin's Pet" — Nikolai Yezhov), Moscow 2008, 367–79 (English translation at <http://msuweb.montclair.edu/~furg/research/ezhov080439eng.html>). Stalin told aircraft designer Alexander Yakovlev that Yezhov had been executed because he had killed many innocent people; see А. Яковлев, Цельжизни. Записки авиаконструктора (М.: 1973), 267 (глава: "Москва в обороне"). For the present author's views see Grover Furr, "The Moscow Trials and the 'Great Terror' of 1937-1938: What the Evidence Shows" (written July 2010). http://msuweb.montclair.edu/~furr/research/trials_ezhovshchina_update0710.html.

[37] See, for example, Piotr Kołakowski, NKWD i GRU na ziemiach polskich 1939-1945 (Warsaw: Bellona, 2002), 74, which discusses NKVD searches and arrests: "nazwiska osób walczących o granice II Rzeczypospolitej w latach 1918-1921" (names of persons who fought for the boundaries of the Second Republic in 1918-1921), "nazwiska wszystkich ochotników, którzy wojowali z bolszewikami w 1920 r." (names of all volunteers who had fought the Bolsheviks in 1920), i.e. in the war which forced Soviet Russia to cede all of Western Ukraine and Western Belorussia to Poland in the Treaty of Riga (March 1921).

[38] See the hair-raising anti-Ukrainian terror of November 1938 described by Jeffrey Burds, "Comment on Timothy Snyder's article..." At <http://www.fas.harvard.edu/~hpcws/comment13.htm>.

[39] For an introduction to this heated question see the section "Polish Massacres of Russian POWs 1919-1920" on my "Katyn Forest Whodunnit" page (note 5).

[40] Ukrainian nationalist forces allied with the Germans massacred roughly 100,000 Polish civilians in German-occupied Western Ukraine in 1943 and 1944. This is known in Poland as "Rzeź wołyńska," the "Volhynian massacres," in Ukraine as "Волинська трагедія," the "Volhynian tragedy."

[41] "Дослідження виявлених решток людей, розстріляних в 1941 році на городищі "вали" у володимирі-волинському ексгумаційні дослідження 2012 року". (Investigation of discovered remains of persons shot in 1941 at the 'Shafts' site at Volodymyr-Volyns'kiy. Investigation of exhumations of 2012.) (Doslizhdennia) At <http://volodymyrmuseum.com/publications/32-publications/naukovi-statti/170-doslidzhennya-vyyavlenykh-reshtok-lyudey-rozstrilyanykh-v->

1941-rotsi-na-horodyskhchi-valy-u-volodymyri-volynskomu-ekshumatsiyni-doslidzhennya-2012-roku.

[42] The correct name for this German munitions factory was Rheinisch-Westfalische Sprengstoff AG Dürlach Werk. A specialized Internet database on German ordnance states that the Dürlach factory was actually in Baden: see German WWII Alphanumeric Ordnance Codes: c-e, at http://www.radix.net/~bbrown/codes_full_alpha_c-e.html.

[43] A town south of Warsaw about halfway between Radom and Kielce. The German munitions factory was HASAG Eisen und Metallwerke G.m.b.H. According to the database cited in the previous note this was the Hugo Schneider AG, Werk Skarżysko Kamienna, Poland.

[44] "B 1906" appears to be Austrian rifle ordnance made for the Tsarist Army during the Russo-Japanese War. See the drawing at <http://7.62x54r.net/MosinID/MosinAmmoID02.htm#Austria> and the photograph obtained by Sergei Strygin at http://katyn.ru/images/news/2012-12-29-gilza_B_1906.jpg.

[45] Doslizhdennia (online); Звіт про результати археологічно-ексгумаційних рятівних досліджень на городищі "вали" у м. володимирі-волинському 2012 р. (Report on the results of the archaeological exhumation recovery investigations at the "Vali" ["shafts"] site in the town of Volodymyr-Volyns'kiy in 2012.). Luts'k, 2012. (Zvit) Available at http://www.formuseum.info/uploads/files/Звіт_2012_Володимир-Волинський.pdf These are two versions of the same report. The much fuller PDF version contains many pages of photographs, graphs, tables, and drawings, but no clear accounting of the cartridge shells as the Polish report has.

[46] Скороход, Ольга. "Польские археологи нагнетают ситуацию вокруг жертв, расстрелянных в 1941-м." (Ol'ga Skorokhkod. Polish archeologists stir up the situation around the victims shot in 1941). Gazeta.ru February 20, 2013, http://gazeta.ua/ru/articles/history/_polskie-arheologi-nagnetayut-situaciyu-vokrug-zhertv-rasstrelyannyh-v-1941-m/483525 Gazeta.ru is a Russian-language Ukrainian newspaper. Roughly half the population of today's Ukraine use Russian as their first language.

[47] Виставка: "Прихована історія: археологічні дослідження на городищі Володимира-Волинського 2010-2012 років" (Exhibition: "Hidden history: archaeological investigations at a site in Volodymyr-Volyns'kiy in the years 2010-2012"), <http://www.formuseum.info/2013/02/27/vistavka.html>.

2016: Trotsky's Lies: What They Are, and What They Mean

Grover Furr

Montclair State University

Montclair NJ 07043 USA

The personality and the writings of Leon Trotsky have long been a rallying point for anticommunists throughout the world. But during the 1930s Trotsky deliberately lied in his writings about Joseph Stalin and the Soviet Union. My new book, Trotsky's 'Amalgams', discusses some of Trotsky's lies that have fooled people, and demoralized honest communists, for decades.

In January 1980 the Trotsky Archive at Harvard University was opened to researchers. Within a few days Pierre Broué, the foremost Trotskyist historian of his time, discovered that Trotsky had lied.

Trotsky had always denied that any clandestine "bloc of oppositionists" including Trotskyists, existed in the Soviet Union. Trotsky called this an "amalgam," meaning a fabrication by Stalin. This "bloc" was the main focus of the second and third Moscow Trials of January 1937 and March 1938. Broué showed, from letters in the Trotsky Archive by Trotsky and by his son Leon Sedov, that the bloc did exist.

In 1985 American historian Arch Getty discovered that the Harvard Trotsky Archive had been purged of incriminating materials, but purged imperfectly. Getty also found evidence that Trotsky had indeed remained in contact with some of his former supporters inside the Soviet Union. Trotsky always strenuously denied this, claiming that he cut off all ties to those who "capitulated" to Stalin and publicly renounced their Trotskyist views. Again, Trotsky was lying.

In 2010 Swedish researcher Sven-Eric Holmström published an article on the "Hotel Bristol" question in the First Moscow Trial of August 1936. In it Holmström proves that Trotsky was lying here too.

In 2005 I began to systematically study all the accusations against Stalin and Beria that Nikita Khrushchev made in his infamous "Secret Speech." I discovered that not a single one of Khrushchev's so-called "revelations" can be supported from the evidence.

But during the 1930s Trotsky had made the same kind of accusations against Stalin that Khrushchev later did. The fact that Khrushchev did nothing but lie suggested that Trotsky might have lied as well.

Thanks to Broué and Getty I already knew that Trotsky had lied about some very important matters. Any detective, in any mystery story, knows that if a suspect has lied about some important matters, he should ask himself: What else is this person lying about?

I set about studying his writings in order to determine which of Trotsky's statements could be tested. Wherever I had independent evidence to check the veracity of any accusation that Trotsky levelled against Stalin, I found that Trotsky was lying — again.

Today I have so much evidence that even a whole book does not come close to holding it all. So there will be two more volumes concerning Trotsky's lies. The second volume will be published in early 2017.

Between September 2010 and January 2013 I researched and wrote a book on the assassination on December 1, 1934 of Sergei Mironovich Kirov, First Secretary of the Leningrad Party. That book, The Murder of Sergei Kirov, was published in June 2013.

The Kirov murder is the key to the Soviet high politics of the rest of the 1930s: the three public Moscow Trials of August 1936, January 1937, and March 1938, often called "Show Trials;" the Military Purge or "Tukhachevsky Affair" of May and June 1937; and the Ezhovshchina of July 1937 to October 1938, which anticommunist scholars call the "Great Terror," after a dishonest book by Robert Conquest.

Trotsky too wrote about the Kirov murder investigation. He identified the articles in the French communist and Soviet press that he read. I discovered that Trotsky lied about what these articles on the Kirov murder investigation said.

Trotsky fabricated a story that Stalin and his men were responsible for Kirov's death. Once again, Trotsky lied about what the articles he read in the French communist newspaper Humanité and in Russian-language Soviet papers, to which Trotsky had access within only a couple of days of their publication in Moscow.

Trotsky's lies would have been immediately apparent to anybody who set Trotsky's articles side by side with the French and Russian newspaper articles that he had read and which he claimed he was closely studying and analyzing. It appears that no one ever did that — until now.

The result was that Trotsky's falsified version of the Kirov assassination — that Stalin and the NKVD had killed Kirov — was taken up not only by Trotsky's followers, but by Nikita Khrushchev.

In his completely fraudulent "Secret Speech" Khrushchev gave additional credibility to the "Stalin killed Kirov" story. Khrushchev and his speechwriters probably took this directly from Trotsky. Trotsky's tale that "Stalin had Kirov killed" passed from Khrushchev to the professional anticommunist scholar-propagandists like Robert Conquest and many others.

In the late 1980s Mikhail Gorbachev's men tried and failed to find evidence in the Soviet archives to support this story. Aleksandr Iakovlev, Gorbachev's chief man for ideology, sent them back to the archives to try again. Once again, the Politburo research team failed to find any evidence to even suggest that Stalin had had Kirov killed.

The history of the "Stalin had Kirov killed" fabrication is a good example of how a number of Trotsky's deliberate lies were taken up by Soviet anticommunists like Khrushchev and Gorbachev, and by pro-capitalist anticommunists in the West.

In my new book Trotsky's 'Amalgams' I uncover and discuss a number of other deliberate lies by Trotsky about Stalin and the USSR. All of them have been adopted by anticommunists and by Trotskyists. In the second and third volumes of this work I will discuss Trotsky's conspiracies with saboteurs and fascists inside the USSR, and with the Nazis and the Japanese militarists.

In early 1937 Trotsky succeeded in persuading John Dewey, the famous educator, and a number of others, to hold hearings, supposedly to determine whether the charges leveled against Trotsky in the August 1936 and January 1937 Moscow Show Trials were true. The Commission duly concluded that Trotsky was innocent and the Moscow Trials were all a frame-up.

I carefully studied the 1,000 pages of the Dewey Commission materials. I discovered that the Commission was dishonest and shockingly incompetent. It made error after error in logical reasoning.

Of most interest is the fact that Trotsky lied to the Dewey Commission many times. The Dewey Commission could not possibly have declared Trotsky "Not Guilty" if the Commission members had known that Trotsky was lying to them.

I wish to briefly mention two more sections of my book. They are: my project to verify — that is, to check — the Moscow Trials testimony; and my examination of the errors that most readers of Soviet history make, errors which make them unable to understand the significance of the evidence we now have.

The testimony of the defendants in the three public Moscow Trials is universally declared to be false, forced from innocent men by the prosecution, the NKVD, "Stalin." There has never been a shred of evidence to support this notion. Nevertheless, it is staunchly affirmed by all specialists in Soviet history, as well as by all Trotskyists.

Thanks to years of identifying, searching for, locating, obtaining, and studying primary sources, I realized that there now exists enough evidence to test many of the statements made by the Moscow Trials defendants.

I devote the first twelve chapters of Trotsky's 'Amalgams' to a careful verification of many of the statements by the Moscow Trials defendants. I found that, whenever we can double-check a fact-claim made by a Moscow Trials defendant against independent evidence now available, it turns out that the Moscow Trials defendant was telling the truth.

Trotsky, Khrushchev and his men, Cold-War Soviet "experts," Gorbachev and his men, and today's academic scholars in Soviet studies, all claimed or claim that the Trials are frame-ups. I prove from the evidence that they are wrong. The Moscow Trials testimony is what it claims to be: statements that the defendants chose to make. I verify this with a great deal of evidence from outside the Trials themselves and even outside the Soviet Union.

This is an important conclusion. This result in itself disproves the "anti-Stalin paradigm" of Soviet history. It also contributes to disproving Trotsky's version of Soviet history, a version that the Trotskyist movement worldwide continues to believe and to propagate today.

Those of us — researchers, activists, and others — who wish to find the truth about Soviet history of the Stalin period, and not merely attempt to confirm our preconceived ideas about it — we are in possession of a number of results that completely overturn the convention anti-Stalin paradigm of Soviet history. These include the following:

- the fact that Nikita Khrushchev lied about every accusation he made against Stalin (and Lavrentii Beria) in his world-shaking "Secret Speech" to the XX Party Congress of the CPSU in February 1956. This clearly means that Khrushchev's researchers could not find any true "crimes" that Stalin — or Beria — had committed, and so were reduced to fabrication.
- the fact that, despite a very thorough and time-consuming search of the archives in 1962-1964, Khrushchev's "Shvernik Commission" could find no evidence at all to suggest that either the Moscow Trials defendants or the "Tukhachevsky Affair" defendants were victims of a "frame-up" or had lied in their confessions in any way.
- the fact that neither Gorbachev's and Eltsin's researchers, nor the anticommunist researchers since that time, who have had wide access to the former Soviet archives, have been able to find any evidence at all to challenge the conclusions in the Kirov Assassination, the Moscow Trials, or the Military Purges.

- the fact that the testimony at the Moscow Trials was, in the main, truthful.
- the fact that Ezhov and Ezhov alone, not Stalin and his supporters in the Soviet leadership, were responsible for the mass murders of July 1938 to November 1939 known to scholars as the "Ezhovshchina" and to anticommunist propagandists as "the Great Terror."
- the fact that, in his writings about the USSR during the period after the Kirov murder, Trotsky lied repeatedly in order to cover up his conspiracies.
- the fact that most of today's scholars of the Stalin period in the USSR lie in order to deceive their readers. But they do so in a way that can only be discovered by a very close, detailed study of their sources.

Trotskyist scholarship is consistently parasitical on mainstream anticommunist scholarship. Here is one example. In a recent review on the Trotskyist, and ferociously anti-Stalin World Socialist Web Site (wsws.org) of Princeton University historian Stephen Kotkin's book Stalin, a Trotskyist reviewer refers approvingly to the anti-Stalin statements of Oleg Khlevniuk, who is called the respected Russian historian Oleg Khlevniuk.

- <https://www.wsws.org/en/articles/2015/06/04/kot4-j04.html>

Khlevniuk is a fanatical anticommunist and also a very blatant liar, in all his writings. Khlevniuk is anti-Stalin; WSWS.ORG, the Trotskyist publication, is anti-Stalin; therefore the Trotskyists "trust" the foremost anticommunist liar in the world today!

Meanwhile, mainstream anticommunist scholarship has been drawing upon the writings of Trotsky himself for decades.

Trotsky, of course, knew that he was lying:

- about the "bloc of Rights, Trotskyists, Zinovievites, and other Oppositionists;"

- about his own involvement in the assassination of Sergei Kirov in December 1934;
- about his conspiring with the "Tukhachevsky Affair" military conspirators for a coup d'état against the Stalin government and to stab the Red Army in the back during an invasion by Germany or Japan;
- about his conspiring with the Nazis and the Japanese militarists;
- about conspiring with fascists and his own followers within the USSR to sabotage industry, transportation, and mines.
- about the charges against, and the confessions by, the defendants in the Moscow trials, which Trotsky knew were true.

Trotsky knew that he lied, repeatedly, over and over again, in his Bulletin of the Opposition. Trotsky knew that he repeated these lies to the Dewey Commission.

The Spanish Civil War

And Trotsky knew that he lied to his own followers, including his closest followers like Andres Nin, Erwin Wolf, and Kurt Landau.

Nin had been one of Trotsky's closest political assistants. Nin is supposed to have broken with Trotsky in 1931.

But in 1930 Nin wrote, in a Trotskyist journal, that Trotsky's Soviet-based followers who had retracted their Trotskyist views and pledged loyalty to the Communist Party's line, had done so dishonestly. They had done so in order to remain within the Party so they could continue to recruit others to their secret conspiracies.

Therefore, though Nin openly broke with the Trotskyist movement in an organizational sense, his actions in Spain suggest that this was a cover for maintaining a secret connection with Trotsky. The Spanish communists and the Soviet NKVD in Spain suspected this too. Nin became one of the leaders of the POUM, an anti-Soviet and anti-Stalin party that was very friendly to Trotsky.

Erwin Wolf went to Spain as Trotsky's political representative. He did so in order to lead a "revolution" against the Spanish Republic — right in the middle of a war with the Spanish fascists, who were aided by Hitler and Mussolini.

Nin and Wolf ran these risks because they believed that Trotsky was innocent of the charges that were made against him in the Moscow Trials. They thought that Trotsky, not Stalin, was the true communist and true revolutionary. Consequently, they thought that they were going to Spain to do what Lenin would have wanted done.

In May 1937 a revolt against the Spanish Republican government broke out in Barcelona. POUM and the Spanish Trotskyists enthusiastically participated in this revolt. It appears that Nin, Wolf, and Landau thought this might be the beginning of a Bolshevik-style revolution, with themselves as Lenin, the POUM as the Bolsheviks, the Republican government as the capitalists, and the Spanish and Soviet communists as the phony socialists like Alexander Kerensky!

The "Barcelona May Days Revolt," was a vicious stab in the back against the Republic during wartime. It was suppressed in less than a week. After that, the Spanish police and Soviet NKVD hunted down the Trotskyists and the POUM leadership. Andres Nin was certainly kidnapped, interrogated, and then murdered by the Soviets and Spanish police. The same thing probably happened to Landau and Wolf.

The Soviets knew then what we know today: that Trotsky was conspiring with the Germans, the Japanese, and the "Tukhachevsky Affair" military men. But Nin and Wolf certainly did not know this. They believed Trotsky's professions of innocence.

If Andres Nin, Erwin Wolf, and Kurt Landau had known what Trotsky knew, and what we now know, would they have gone to Spain to try to carry out Trotsky's instructions? Impossible!

Therefore, Trotsky sent these men into an extremely dangerous situation by means of lying to them about his own activities and aims, and about what Stalin was doing. And it cost them their lives.

The same is true for all the Trotskyists who were executed in the Soviet Union itself. Evidently, there were hundreds of them. They all supported Trotsky because they believed his version of Soviet history, and had been convinced by Trotsky's writings that Stalin was lying, that the Moscow Trials were a frame-up, and that the Stalin regime had abandoned the goal of worldwide socialist revolution.

These men and women would not have followed Trotsky if he had not lied to them.

In the first chapter of Trotsky's 'Amalgams' I examine the errors that most students of Soviet history, including academic professionals, make when faced with primary source evidence.

The truth is that very few people, including professional historians, know how to examine historical evidence. Very few Marxists know what a materialist examination of evidence looks like, or are capable of recognizing or critiquing an idealist argument when they are confronted with one.

These errors are not only errors of "denial" by persons who do not wish to have their pro-Trotsky or anti-Stalin preconceptions disproven. Most or all of these same errors are made by pro-Stalin, anti-revisionist people. Anticommunist arguments have been so overwhelming, not only in Cold War pro-capitalist form but especially in supposedly pro-communist but in reality anticommunist Khrushchev- and Gorbachev-era writings, that it has degraded the thinking of all of us.

The lies of Trotsky's that Pierre Broué and Arch Getty discovered 30 years ago have been ignored. This fact itself deserves explanation.

Throughout the 1980s and 1990s Broué continued to find, and write about, more lies by Trotsky. But all the while he continued to deny that these lies were of any importance.

Broué also ignored Getty's two discoveries. First, that the Trotsky Archive had been "purged" of incriminating materials. Second, that Trotsky had indeed remained in contact with oppositionists like Radek with whom he swore he had broken all ties. Vadim Rogovin, the leading Trotskyist historian of the Stalin-era Soviet Union, went along with Broué's cover-up and also introduced some lies of his own.

Trotskyists and Cold Warriors continue either to ignore Broué's discoveries altogether or to echo Broué's claim that these lies were of little significance. We can understand why they do this. The fact that Trotsky lied dismantles what I call the "anti-Stalin paradigm": the Trotskyist and the Cold War anticommunist versions of Soviet history.

Trotsky, of course, had to lie. He was running a serious conspiracy to get rid of Stalin, in conjunction with many supporters inside the Soviet Union and the Bolshevik Party and in collusion with Nazi Germany, militarist Japan, England and France. A conspiracy requires secrecy and lying.

But who, above all, was Trotsky fooling? Not Stalin and the Soviet government. They knew he was lying.

The conclusion is inescapable: Trotsky was lying in order to fool his own supporters! They were the only people who believed whatever Trotsky wrote. They believed Trotsky was the true, principled Leninist that he claimed to be, and that Stalin was the liar.

This cost the lives of most of his supporters inside the Soviet Union, when Trotskyism was outlawed as treason to the Soviet state because of Trotsky's conspiracy with Germany and Japan. It has led Trotsky's followers outside the Soviet Union to spend their lives in cult-like devotion to a man who was, in fact, doing just what the Soviet prosecutor and the Moscow Trials defendants claimed he was doing.

The figure of Leon Trotsky casts a giant shadow over the history of the Soviet Union, and therefore over the history of the world in the 20th century. Trotsky was the most significant — in fact, the only outstanding — Opposition figure in the factional disputes that shook the Bolshevik Party during the 1920s. It was during the 20s that Trotsky attracted to himself the group of persons who formed the United Opposition and whose conspiracies did so much irreparable harm to the Party, the Comintern, and the world communist movement.

Conclusions

What does the fact that Trotsky lied, that Khrushchev lied, and that these facts were ignored for so long, mean?

What does it mean for the main question that faces us, and billions of working people in the world, today? I mean the question of why the wonderful international communist movement of the 20th century collapsed, the movement that 70 years ago, triumphant in World War 2, in the Chinese communist revolution, in the anti-colonial movements around the world, seemed to be poised to bring about an end to capitalism and the victory of world socialism?

How do we convince workers, students, and others that we know why the old communist movement failed and that we have learned what we have to do differently to avoid repeating those failures in the future? We must study this question. We also need to discuss it — to entertain and debate different, informed viewpoints.

Therefore we have to defend the legacy of the international communist movement during Lenin's and, especially, during Stalin's time. At the same time we must be fearlessly critical of it, so we discover what errors they made and so not make the same errors again.

In my judgment — and I hope that it is yours as well — discovering the reasons for the collapse of the magnificent international communist movement of the 20th century is the most important historical and theoretical question for all exploited people today, the vast majority of humankind.

To have any hope of solving it, we must think boldly, "go where no one has gone before." If we pretend that "Marx and Engels had all the answers," or "Lenin had all the answers" (many Trotskyists, of course, believe that "Trotsky had all the answers") — if we believe that, then we are guaranteed, at best, to fall far short of what they achieved.

Marx said that great historical events occur twice "the first time as tragedy, the second time as farce." The tragedy of the international communist movement of the 20th century was that, ultimately, it failed.

Unless we figure out where they went wrong then we are doomed to be the "farce." And that would be a political crime — our crime.

So we have to look with a critical eye at all of our legacy. Marx's favorite saying was: "De omnibus dubitandum" — "Question everything." Marx would be the last person in the world to exclude himself from this questioning.

History can't teach lessons directly. And history isn't political theory. But if we ask the right questions, history can help us answer them.

Meanwhile, we should all publicize everywhere and in every way we can that, like Khrushchev and Gorbachev, Trotsky lied — provably, demonstrably lied — and, what's more, that all the anti-Stalin, anticommunist "experts" anointed by capitalist universities and research institutes are lying too.

We need to point out that the only way forward is to build a new communist movement to get rid of capitalism. And that to do that, we need to learn from the heroic successes, as well as from the tragic errors, of the Bolsheviks during the period when the Soviet Union was led by Joseph Stalin.

My hope and my goal is to contribute, through my research, to this project which is so vital for the future of working people everywhere. Thank you.

2017: Yezhov vs Stalin: The Causes of the Mass Repressions of 1937-1938 in the USSR

Journal of Labor and Society · 2471-4607 · Volume 20 · September 2017 ·
pp. 325–347 V C 2017 Immanuel Ness and Wiley Periodicals, Inc.

Grover Furr

This article outlines the causes of the mass repressions of 1937–1938 in the Soviet Union. Primary-source evidence strongly supports the hypothesis that these repressions were the result of anti-Stalin conspiracies by two groups, which overlapped somewhat: the political Opposition of supporters of Grigorii Zinoviev, of Trotskyists, of Rightists (Bukharin, Rykov, and their adherents); and of military men (Marshal Mikhail Tukhachevsky and others); and high-ranking Party leaders, nominally supporters of Stalin, who opposed the democratic aspects of the "Stalin" Constitution of 1936. It discusses Stalin's struggle for democratic reform and its defeat. The prevailing "anti-Stalin paradigm" of Soviet history is exposed as the reason mainstream scholarship has failed to understand the mass repressions, misnamed "Great Terror."

Introduction

On February 25, 1956, Nikita S. Khrushchev delivered his "Secret Speech" to the delegates at the XX Party Congress of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union. In it, he attacked Stalin for committing a number of crimes against members of the Party. Khrushchev stated:

It was determined that of the 139 members and candidates of the party's Central Committee who were elected at the 17th Congress, 98 persons, i.e., 70 per cent, were arrested and shot (mostly in 1937–1938)... Of 1,966 delegates with either voting or advisory rights, 1,108 persons were arrested on charges of anti-revolutionary crimes.

... Now, when the cases of some of these so-called "spies" and "saboteurs" were examined, it was found that all their cases were fabricated.

Confessions of guilt of many arrested and charged with enemy activity were gained with the help of cruel and inhuman tortures.

Khrushchev claimed that Nikolai Ezhov, the Commissar of the NKVD from August 1936 until November 1938, must have acted under Stalin's orders.

It is clear that these matters were decided by Stalin, and that without his orders and his sanction Yezhov could not have done this.
(Khrushchev 1962)

The "Great Terror"

In 1968, British writer Robert Conquest published a book titled The Great Terror. Stalin's Purge of the Thirties. Conquest relied heavily on Khrushchev-era books and articles, which he cited without source criticism, as though the claims made in them were unproblematically accurate. Conquest's book proved to be of enormous value as anticommunist propaganda. Scholars of Soviet history began to employ "the Great Terror," as a designation for this period of Soviet history.

The Anti-Stalin Paradigm

The goal of my recent book, Yezhov vs. Stalin, is to identify the causes of, and properly locate the responsibility for, this mass repression. Historians of the Soviet Union have proposed several different explanations. My research concludes that all of them are fundamentally wrong. These historians have in fact not been trying to discover the causes of the mass repressions. Instead, they are groping for an explanation that fits the dominant historical framework, or paradigm, for this period. I call this the "anti-Stalin paradigm."

The proximate origin of the anti-Stalin paradigm is the writings of Leon Trotsky. In service to his own conspiracy, Trotsky depicted Stalin as a monster. Today, we know that Trotsky lied about virtually everything that concerned Stalin and the USSR. In his "Secret Speech" Khrushchev took up a number of the same falsehoods that Trotsky had invented (Furr 2015).

At the XXII Party Congress in 1961, Khrushchev and his men accused Stalin of yet more crimes. From 1962 to 1964, Khrushchev sponsored hundreds of articles and books attacking Stalin. These were avidly repeated by Western anti-communist writers. Between 1987 and 1991, Mikhail Gorbachev sponsored yet another avalanche of anti-Stalin writings. These contributed significantly to the ideological dismantling of the Soviet Union. Today, we know that Khrushchev's and Gorbachev's men were lying in virtually everything they wrote about Stalin.

According to this anti-Stalin paradigm:

- Stalin was a "dictator." Therefore, he must have initiated, or at least could have stopped, everything important that occurred. Whatever happened, happened because he wanted it, or something very like it, to happen. Stalin was always "in control."
- The alleged conspiracies against the Stalin government were all fabrications.
- The evidence produced in the testimony at the Moscow Trials, and in the interrogations and confession statements that have gradually been published since the end of the USSR in 1991, must be fabrications too.

Most mainstream historians of the Stalin period bind themselves a priori to these tenets. They are not questioned, nor is there any attempt to validate them. These strictures dictate the kinds of explanations and the types of evidence that are deemed acceptable. Their purpose is to guarantee that the only historical explanations set forth in mainstream historiography are those that make Stalin and the USSR "look bad." They are convenient to the view of the USSR as "totalitarian," a "dictatorship" ruled by "terror." They reinforce the concept of this period as "the Great Terror."

These are disabling assumptions. Accepting them makes it impossible to understand Soviet history of the Stalin period. But their aim was never to facilitate a truthful account of history. Rather, their purpose is to reinforce an anti-communist, virtually demonized view of Stalin and the USSR, and thereby of the world communist movement of the twentieth century.

Books about the so-called "Great Terror" continue to appear. A recent example is The Great Fear. Stalin's Terror of the 1930s by British historian James Harris. Harris's tone is moderate and, for the field of Soviet history, relatively nonjudgmental.

However, in common with all other mainstream academic historians of this period, including the Trotskyist historians, Harris ignores all the evidence that proves that the massive executions were not Stalin's doing but the product of Ezhov's conspiracy. Harris endorses the long-disproven story of the German plot to frame Marshal Tukhachevsky (169–170), repeats the similarly disproven tale that Kirov's murderer "was almost certainly acting alone" and decides, in the face of all the evidence, that the fears of challenges to the Stalin government were false (186).

The keystone questions concerning the mass repressions known as the "Great Terror" are these:

1. Was Stalin responsible for the murders of hundreds of thousands of innocent persons, as is usually claimed?
2. If Stalin was not responsible, how were Ezhov and his men able to go on killing so many innocent people for over a year?

Two sets of events are crucial to understanding these mass repressions. The first is Stalin's struggle for electoral democracy and its defeat. The second is the interlocking conspiracies involving supporters of Grigorii Zinoviev, of Leon Trotsky, of Nikolai Bukharin, Genrikh Iagoda, Nikolai Ezhov, and many others, called the "Rights"; and of military figures, of which the "Tukhachevsky Affair" is the best known.

Elections

During 1930s, the Stalin leadership was concerned to promote democracy in the governance of the state and to foster innerparty and trade-union democracy. In December 1936, the Extraordinary 8th Congress of Soviets approved a draft of the new Soviet Constitution that called for secret ballot and contested elections (Zhukov 2003, 309).

Candidates were to be allowed not only from the Communist Party¹ but from other citizens' groups as well, based on residence, affiliation (such as religious groups), or workplace organizations. But this last provision was never put into effect. Contested elections were never held.

¹ Its official name was "All-Union Communist Party (Bolshevik)."

The democratic aspects of the Constitution² were inserted at Stalin's insistence. Stalin and his closest supporters fought tenaciously to keep these provisions. He, and they, yielded only when confronted by their rejection by the Party's Central Committee, and by the panic surrounding the discovery of serious conspiracies that collaborated with Japanese and German fascism to overthrow the Soviet government.

² By "democratic" here we mean "consistent with social-democratic, that is, capitalist, notions of democracy."

In June 1934, the Politburo assigned the task of drafting a new Constitution to Avel' Enukidze, long a leading figure in the Soviet government. Some months later, Enukidze returned with a suggestion for open, uncontested elections. Almost immediately, Stalin expressed his disagreement with Enukidze's proposal, insisting on secret elections (Zhukov 2003, 116–121).

In a dramatic interview of March 1, 1936, with American newspaper magnate Roy Howard, Stalin declared that the Soviet constitution would guarantee that all voting would be by secret ballot. Voting would be on an equal basis, with a peasant vote counting as much as that of a worker; on a territorial basis, as in the West, and direct—all Soviets would be elected by the citizens themselves.

We shall probably adopt our new constitution at the end of this year...
As has been announced already, according to the new constitution, the suffrage will be universal, equal, direct, and secret.

Stalin also declared that all elections would be contested. Different citizens' organizations would be able to put forth candidates to run against the Communist Party's candidates. Stalin told Howard that citizens would cross off the names of all candidates except those they wished to vote for.

Stalin also stressed the importance of contested elections in fighting bureaucracy.

You think that there will be no election contests. But there will be, and I foresee very lively election campaigns. There are not a few institutions in our country which work badly. ... Our new electoral system will tighten up all institutions and organizations and compel them to improve their work. Universal, equal, direct and secret suffrage in the U.S.S.R. will be a whip in the hands of the population against the organs of government which work badly. In my opinion our new Soviet constitution will be the most democratic constitution in the world. (Stalin 1936a)

Stalin insisted that lishentsy, Soviet citizens who had been deprived of the franchise, should have it restored. These included members of former exploiting classes such as former landlords, those who had fought against the Bolsheviks during the Civil War of 1918–1921, and those convicted of certain crimes (as in the U.S. today). Important among the lishentsy were the "kulaks," former rich peasants who had been the main targets of the collectivization movement a few years earlier.

These electoral reforms would have been unnecessary unless the Stalin leadership wanted to change the manner in which the Soviet Union was governed. Stalin wanted to get the Communist Party out of the business of directly running the Soviet Union and return "all power to the Soviets," a Bolshevik demand of 1917.

The Anti-Bureaucracy Struggle

The Stalin leadership was also concerned about the Party's role. Stalin himself raised the fight against bureaucratism with great vigor as early as his Report to the XVII Party Congress in January 1934.

Party leaders controlled the government both by determining who entered the Soviets and by exercising various forms of oversight or review over what the government ministries did. Stalin, Molotov, and others called the new electoral system a "weapon against bureaucratization." Speaking at the 7th Congress of Soviets on February 6, 1935, Molotov said that secret elections "will strike with great force against bureaucratic elements and provide them a useful shock" (Zhukov 2003, 124).

Government ministers and their staffs had to know something about the affairs over which they were in charge, if they were to be effective in production. This meant technical education in their fields. But Party leaders usually made their careers by advancement through Party positions alone. These Party officials exercised control, but they themselves often lacked the technical knowledge that could make them skilled at supervision.

This is, apparently, what the Stalin leadership meant by the term "bureaucratism." Though they viewed it as a danger—as, indeed, all Marxists did—they believed it was not inevitable. Rather, they thought that it could be overcome by changing the role of the Party in socialist society. The concept of democracy that Stalin and his supporters in the Party leadership wished to inaugurate in the Soviet Union would necessarily involve a qualitative change in the societal role of the Party.

Those documents that were accessible to researchers did allow us to understand... that already by the end of the 1930s determined attempts were being undertaken to separate the Party from the state and to limit in a substantive manner the Party's role in the life of the country. (Zhukov 2000, 8)

Article 3 of the 1936 Constitution reads "In the U.S.S.R. all power belongs to the working people of town and country as represented by the Soviets of Working People's Deputies." The Communist Party is mentioned only in Article 126, as "the vanguard of the working people in their struggle to strengthen and develop the socialist system and is the leading core of all organizations of the working people, both public and state." That is, the Party was to lead organizations, but not the legislative or executive organs of the state (Constitution 1936; Zhukov 2000, 29–30).

At the June 1937 Central Committee Plenum, Iakov A. Iakovlev, one of those who had worked on the draft of the new constitution, said that the suggestion for contested elections was made by Stalin himself. This suggestion met with widespread, albeit tacit, opposition from the regional Party leaders, the First Secretaries. After the Howard interview, there was not even nominal praise or support for Stalin's statement about contested elections in the central newspapers—those most under the direct control of the Politburo. Pravda carried one article only, on March 10, 1936, and it did not mention contested elections (Zhukov 2003, 423; 210).

From this historian Iurii N. Zhukov concludes:

This could mean only one thing. Not only the 'broad leadership' [the regional First Secretaries], but at least a part of the Central Committee apparatus, Agitprop under Stetskii and Tal', did not accept Stalin's innovation, did not want to approve, even in a purely formal manner, contested elections, dangerous to many, which, as followed from those of Stalin's words that Pravda did underscore, directly threatened the positions and real power of the First Secretaries — the Central Committees of the national communist parties, the regional, oblast', city, and area committees. (Zhukov 2003, 211)

Senior Party leaders were usually veterans of the dangerous days of Tsarist times, the Revolution, the Civil War, and collectivization, when to be a communist was fraught with peril and difficulty. Many had little formal education. It appears that most of them were unwilling or unable to "remake themselves" through self-education.

All of these men were long-time supporters of Stalin's policies. They had implemented the collectivization of the peasantry—a step essential to escape the cycle of famines—during which hundreds of thousands of kulak families had been deported. They had been in charge of crash industrialization, under necessarily severe conditions of poor housing, insufficient food and medical care, low pay and few goods to buy with it.

Now Stalin was threatening them with elections in which persons formerly deprived of the franchise because they had opposed these Soviet policies would suddenly have the right to vote restored. They feared many would vote against their candidates or indeed any Party-backed candidate.

Stalin himself put it even more strongly:

... if the people here and there elected hostile forces, this will mean that our agitational work is poorly organized, and that we have fully deserved this disgrace. (Stalin 1936b; Zhukov 2003, 293).

This was Stalin's position. The First Secretaries opposed it. Did they consider Stalin's proposal to be a violation of the dictatorship of the proletariat? Did they regard it as too great a concession to capitalist concepts of democracy? Even in the most "democratic" of capitalist states avowed enemies of capitalism are not permitted to participate freely in elections unless pro-capitalist parties have overwhelming advantages. And even in those states the system itself—capitalism—is never "up for grabs."

Conspiracy: The Bloc of Oppositionists

While the Congress, which had opened on November 25, 1936, was attending to the new Constitution the Soviet leadership was between the first two large-scale Moscow Trials. Grigorii Zinoviev and Lev Kamenev had gone on trial along with some others in August 1936. The second trial, in January 1937, involved some of the major followers of Trotsky, led by Iurii Piatakov, until recently the Deputy Commissar of Heavy Industry (Zhukov 2003, 291).

At the public Moscow trials of 1936, 1937, and 1938, the prosecution charged that a clandestine criminal bloc of the various opposition groups was formed in 1932, had murdered Kirov, and continued to conspire against the Stalin leadership. From exile Leon Trotsky vigorously denied that he and his followers had joined or ever would join such a bloc. But in 1980 Pierre Broué, at that time the most prominent Trotskyist historian in the world, discovered that this bloc did in fact exist and that Trotsky had approved it (Broué 1980).

On December 1, 1934, Sergei M. Kirov, First Secretary of the Leningrad oblast' and city Party Committees, was murdered in Party headquarters at the Smolny Institute in Leningrad. The Stalin-led Soviet government stated that their investigation proved that the assassin, Leonid Vasil'evich Nikolaev, had acted on behalf of a secret Zinovievist group.

Trotsky claimed that Stalin was lying. Khrushchev's and, later, Gorbachev's men claimed that no secret Zinovievist group existed and that Nikolaev had been a lone assassin. Western anticommunist scholars either echo Khrushchev and Gorbachev or claim that Stalin had had Kirov killed. Thanks to evidence from the former Soviet archives and the Harvard Trotsky archives we now know that the Stalin-era police and prosecution were correct (Furr 2013).

At the first Moscow Trial in August 1936, Zinoviev and Kamenev confessed to collaborating in Kirov's murder. They admitted that the goal of the bloc of oppositionists including Zinovievists, Trotskyists, and others was to seize power in the USSR by violence. Other Trotskyists confessed to plotting assassinations of Soviet leaders, including Stalin.

The defendants in the 1936 Moscow Trial had disclosed the existence of a parallel leadership for the bloc and had named Trotskyists and Rightists as participants. Trotskyists named included Karl Radek and Iurii Piatakov. Rightist leaders named included Mikhail Tomsky, Aleksei Rykov, and Nikolai Bukharin (Report of Court Proceedings, 1936).

Between September and December 1936, Radek, Piatakov, and others involved with them revealed details about Trotsky's conspiracies with Germany, Japan, and with anti-Soviet and pro-fascist forces inside the USSR. At the second Moscow Trial of January 1937, the defendants detailed Trotsky's plans to dismantle socialism in the USSR in exchange for German and Japanese support in seizing power. They implicated Bukharin, Rykov, and other Rightists as members of the bloc who were fully informed about Trotsky's plans (Report of Court Proceedings 1937).

The February-March 1937 Plenum of the Central Committee, the longest ever held, dragged on for two weeks. This plenum dramatized the contradictory tasks that confronted the Party leadership: the struggle against internal enemies, and the need to prepare for secret, contested elections under the new Constitution. The discovery of more groups conspiring to overthrow the Soviet government demanded police action. But to prepare for truly democratic elections to the government, and to improve innerparty democracy—a theme stressed over and over by those closest to Stalin in the Politburo—required the opposite: openness to criticism and self-criticism, and secret elections of leaders by rank-and-file Party members.

Leningrad Party leader Andrei Zhdanov spoke about the need for greater democracy in the country and in the Party, invoking the struggle against bureaucracy and the need for closer ties to the masses, both party and non-party.

The new electoral system ... will give a powerful push towards the improvement of the work of Soviet bodies, the liquidation of bureaucratic bodies, the liquidation of bureaucratic shortcomings, and deformations in the work of our Soviet organizations. And these shortcomings, as you know, are very substantial. Our Party bodies must be ready for the electoral struggle. In the elections we will have to deal with hostile agitation and hostile candidates. (Zhukov 2003, 343)

Zhdanov spoke out strongly for democracy in the Party as well.

This meant secret ballot re-election of all party organs from top to bottom, periodic reporting of party organs to their organizations, strict party discipline, and subordination of the minority to the majority, and unconditional obligatory decisions of higher bodies on all party members. He complained about co-option (appointment) to party buros rather than election, and candidates for leading positions being considered behind closed doors, 'in family order. When he called this 'familyness [semeistvennost']' Stalin interjected, 'it is a deal [sgovor, literally, a marriage agreement]. This was a virtual declaration of war against the regional clan leaderships, and their reaction in the discussion to Zhdanov's report (which they at first unprecedentedly greeted with angry silence) showed that they were angry. (Getty 2013a, 77)

Nikolai Shvernik, representing the Stalin leadership of the Party, issued a strong call for democracy in the trade unions.

Shvernik argued that the unions, like the Party, lacked internal democracy.

"I should say here, directly and with all frankness," he explained, "that the unions are in even worse shape." With the development of new industries during the first five-year plan, the country's 47 unions had split into 165, creating thousands of new jobs. Positions at every level were filled by appointment, rather than election ... Shvernik concluded his speech with the suggestion that elections were needed not only in the Party, but in the unions as well. (Goldman 2007, 126)

Party Secretaries' Fear of Elections

Zhdanov's report was drowned out by discussions about "enemies." A number of First Secretaries responded with alarm that those who were, or might be expected to be, preparing most assiduously for the Soviet elections were opponents of Soviet power.

From the beginning of the discussions Stalin's fears were understandable. It seemed he had run into a deaf wall of incomprehension, of the unwillingness of the CC members, who heard in the report just what they wanted to hear, to discuss what he wanted them to discuss. Of the 24 persons who took part in the discussions, 15 spoke mainly about "enemies of the people," that is, Trotskyists. They spoke with conviction, aggressively, just as they had after the reports by Zhdanov and Molotov. They reduced all the problems to one — the necessity of searching out "enemies." And practically none of them recalled Stalin's main point — about the shortcomings in the work of Party organizations, about preparation for the elections to the Supreme Soviet. (Zhukov 2003, 357)

Most threatening for all Party officials, including First Secretaries, Stalin proposed that each of them should choose two cadre to take their places while they attended six-month political education courses. With replacement officials in their stead, Party secretaries might well have feared that they could easily be reassigned during this period, breaking the back of their "families" (officials subservient to them), a major feature of bureaucracy (Zhukov 2003, 362). This proposal of Stalin's was ignored. The courses never took place.

During the next few months, Stalin and his closest associates tried to turn the focus away from a hunt for internal enemies—the largest concern of the CC members—and back toward fighting bureaucracy in the Party and preparing for the Soviet elections. Meanwhile, "local party leaders did everything they could within the limits of party discipline (and sometimes outside it) to stall or change the elections" (Getty 2002, 126; Zhukov 2003, 367–371).

But a very ominous period loomed. In late March 1937 Genrikh Iagoda, former head of the NKVD, was arrested. In April, he began to confess to having played an important role in the secret bloc of oppositionists that had been the main target of the First and Second Moscow Trials (Genrikh Iagoda 1997).

The Politburo had planned for the Constitutional reforms to be the central agenda item at the upcoming June 1937 Plenum. But by June, the discovery of plots by the former chief of the NKVD and by top military leaders to overthrow the government and kill its leading members had changed the political atmosphere entirely.

In a June 2 speech to the expanded session of the Military Soviet Stalin portrayed the series of recently uncovered conspiracies as limited and largely successfully dealt with. At the February-March Plenum, he and his Politburo supporters had minimized the First Secretaries' overriding concern with internal enemies. But the situation was "slowly, but decisively, getting out of his [Stalin's] control" (Stalin 1937; Zhukov 2003, Chapter 16, passim.; 411).

Between the end of the February-March 1937 CC Plenum on March 5, 1937, and the opening of the June CC Plenum on June 23, 1937, 18 members of the Central Committee and 20 candidate members were arrested for participation in anti-Soviet conspiracies. Their expulsions were approved at the June Plenum.

The Conspiracies Were Genuine

On June 17, 1937, just prior to the June CC plenum, Nikolai Ezhov, who had replaced Iagoda as Commissar of the NKVD, transmitted a message from S. N. Mironov, NKVD chief in Western Siberia, reporting the threat of revolts by subversives in concert with Japanese intelligence. Mironov reported that Robert I. Eikhe, Party First Secretary of Western Siberia, would request the ability to form a "troika" to deal with this threat (Furr 2016, 48; Khaustov and Samuel'son 2009, 332–333).

On June 19, 1937 Stalin received a telegram, addressed to the Soviet government, sent by Trotsky from his exile in Mexico. In it, Trotsky stated that Stalin's policies would lead "to external and internal collapse." On it Stalin signed his name and wrote: "Ugly spy! Brazen spy of Hitler!" It was also signed by Molotov, Voroshilov, Mikoian, and Zhdanov. Clearly, they all believed that Trotsky really was in contact with the Germans. Given Tukhachevsky's confession and Marshal Budennyi's comments on the Tukhachevsky trial, there can no doubt that this conspiracy did exist (Furr 2009, 15).

Anti-Soviet Conspiracies

No transcript of the June 1937 Plenum has been published. However, Iurii Zhukov quotes extensively from some archival transcript materials. We also have a "konspekt" (synopsis) of the remarks Ezhov made. It is dated June 23, which would make Ezhov's remarks the first report of the Plenum. Ezhov's report was extremely alarming. He listed a dozen active conspiracies, concluding: "the above is a list of only the most important groups" (Petrov and Iansen 2008, 293–294).

Elections

Iakovlev and Molotov criticized the failure of Party leaders to organize for independent Soviet elections. Molotov stressed the need to move even honored revolutionaries out of the way if they were unprepared for the tasks of the day. He emphasized that Soviet officials were not "second-class workers" (persons of little importance). Evidently, some Party leaders were treating them as such.

According to the surviving agenda of the CC Plenum Iakovlev spoke on June 27. He exposed and criticized the failure of First Secretaries to hold secret elections for Party posts, relying instead on appointment. He emphasized that Party members who were elected delegates to the Soviets were not to be placed under the discipline of Party groups outside the Soviets or by Party superiors and told how to vote. And Iakovlev referred in the strongest terms to the need to "recruit from the very rich reserve of new cadre to replace those who had become rotten or bureaucratized." All these statements constituted an explicit attack on the First Secretaries (Zhukov 2003, 424–427; Zhukov 2000, 39–40, quoting from archival documents).

Perhaps most revealing is the following remark by Stalin, as quoted by Zhukov:

At the end of the discussion, when the subject was the search for a more dispassionate method of counting ballots, [Stalin] remarked that in the West, thanks to a multiparty system, this problem did not exist. Immediately thereafter he suddenly uttered a phrase that sounded very strange in a meeting of this kind: "We do not have different political parties. Fortunately or unfortunately, we have only one party." [Zhukov's emphasis] And then he proposed, but only as a temporary measure, to use for the purpose of dispassionate supervision of elections representatives of all existing societal organizations except for the Bolshevik Party...

The challenge to the Party autocracy had been issued. (Zhukov 2003, 430–431; Zhukov 2000, 38)

The Constitution was finally outlined and the date of the first elections was set for December 12, 1937. The Stalin leadership again urged the benefits of fighting bureaucracy and building ties to the masses. But all this followed the unprecedented expulsion from the CC of 26 members, 19 of whom were directly charged with treason and counter-revolutionary activity (Zhukov 2003, 430).

The Party was in severe crisis, and it was impossible to expect that events would unroll smoothly. It was the worst possible atmosphere during which to prepare for the adoption of democratic—secret, universal, and contested—elections.

Causes of the Repression

In common with most historians of the USSR, Iurii Zhukov largely discounts the existence of real conspiracies. He believes the NKVD's targets must have been lishentsy, the very people whose citizenship rights, including franchise, had recently been restored and whose votes potentially posed the greatest danger to the First Secretaries' continuance in power. This may indeed have been one of the motives of some of the regional Party leaders. But it should not simply be assumed, and as yet we have no evidence to support it.

Other historians claim that this mass repression was led by Stalin, who was trying to kill anybody who might be disloyal, a "Fifth Column," if the Soviet Union were invaded. Still others claim that Stalin was out to murder any and all possible rivals, or was paranoid, or simply mad. There is no evidence to support these notions.

In fact, the reason for the campaign of repression stands out clearly in the evidence we have. The subversive activities and rebellions that Mironov, Eikhe, and other regional Party leaders and NKVD men reported were a logical consequence of the conspiracies that had been gradually discovered since the assassination of Kirov over the previous 2 ½ years.

Before Khrushchev's "Secret Speech" few specialists in Soviet studies doubted the real existence of these conspiracies. Only the Trotskyist movement, faithful to their murdered leader, claimed that these conspiracies were fabrications by Stalin.

This changed after Khrushchev's speech. Virtually all anticommunists, as well as most communists and, of course, all Trotskyists, chose to believe Khrushchev's allegations against Stalin. It followed from what Khrushchev implied in 1956, and from what his supporters claimed at the XXII Party Congress in October, 1961, that the defendants in the Moscow Trials, plus the Tukhachevsky Affair defendants, had all been innocent victims of a frame-up. Mikhail Gorbachev's lieutenants made the same assertions. Since Khrushchev's day, the consensus among professional students of Soviet history has conformed to the Khrushchev-Gorbachev position: there were no conspiracies, all were inventions by Stalin.

This is all false. There has never been any evidence that any of these conspiracies were frame-ups or that any of the defendants were innocent. Just the opposite is the case. The evidence is overwhelming that Kirov was indeed murdered by the clandestine Zinovievist group and that Zinoviev and Kamenev were involved in the group's activities, including Kirov's murder. Trotskyists and Trotsky himself were also implicated (Furr 2013).

We have a great deal of evidence that the conspiracies alleged in all three Moscow Trials were real and that all the defendants were guilty of at least what they confessed to. In some cases, we can now prove that defendants were guilty of crimes that they did not reveal to the Prosecution. We also have a great deal of evidence on the Tukhachevsky Affair. All of it supports the hypothesis that the defendants were guilty as charged (Furr 2015). The evidence that all these conspiracies did in fact exist allows us to view the Ezhov mass repressions of July 1937 to October-November 1938 objectively and in their proper context (Furr 2015, Chapters 1–12).

Denial

Western historians of the USSR have accepted Khrushchev's supposed "revelations" as unproblematically true despite the fact that Khrushchev never gave any evidence for his charges against Stalin and in fact withheld evidence from Party researchers who asked for it.

The main evidentiary basis for Conquest and for works by Khrushchev-sponsored writers including dissidents like Roi Medvedev and Alexander Nekrich, was the Khrushchev-era "revelations." Western historians' accounts of the Stalin period continue to rely heavily on Khrushchev-era accounts.

Vladimir L. Bobrov and I have studied the tenth chapter of Stephen F. Cohen's prize-winning book Bukharin and the Bolshevik Revolution. Cohen traces Bukharin's life from 1930 until his trial and execution in March 1938. He relied on Khrushchev-era sources that have all proven to be lies. Through the use of primary source evidence from former Soviet archives we show that every fact-claim Cohen makes in this chapter that in any way alleges wrong-doing by Stalin is false (Furr and Bobrov 2010).

From the time of the Bolshevik Revolution in 1917, the study of Soviet history has developed as an adjunct of political anticommunism. It has always had a dual character: that of discovering what happened, and that of defaming Stalin, the Soviet Union, and communism generally. The result is that academic historiography of the Soviet Union is rarely objective. It has "sacred cows," tenets that are never questioned. This is the "anti-Stalin paradigm." Academic historians of the USSR are pressured to conform to this paradigm, or at least not openly violate it.

Chief among the tenets of the anti-Stalin paradigm is that all the Moscow Trials, plus the Tukhachevsky Affair, were frame-ups. Today, we know that this is false. An objective study of the evidence now available from former Soviet archives, from the Trotsky archives, and elsewhere, proves that these conspiracies did indeed exist. This false paradigm deprives academic historians and their readers of the ability to understand the conspiracy trials. It robs them and us of the ability to understand the context for the Ezhov-era mass repressions.

The Threat was Real

Archival documents show that the central Party leadership, Stalin and the Politburo, were constantly receiving very credible NKVD accounts of conspiracies, including transcripts of confessions and details of investigations (Zhukov 2003, Chapter 18; Zhukov 2002a,b, 23). We also possess a number of accounts of these conspiracies from beyond the borders of the USSR (and thus beyond any power of the Soviet prosecution or NKVD to fabricate them).

NKVD Evidence of Conspiracies Sent to Stalin

On July 2, 1937, shortly after the conclusion of the plenum, the Politburo—Stalin and those closest to him—issued the decree "On anti-Soviet elements." For the next year or more, the Stalin leadership was flooded with reports of conspiracies and revolts from all over the USSR. Many of these have been published. Undoubtedly, a great many more remain unpublished. According to V.N. Khaustov, an anti-Stalin researcher and editor of one of these collections, Stalin believed these reports (Khaustov 2004, 234–235, No. 114).³

³ Online at <http://www.memo.ru/history/document/pbkulaki.htm>. A slightly different translation is in Getty and Naumov, Doc. 169, 470–471.

And the most frightening thing was that Stalin made his decisions on the basis of confessions that were the result of the inventions of certain employees of the organs of state security. Stalin's reactions attest to the fact that he took these confessions completely seriously. (Khaustov 2011, 6)

Here, Khaustov admits the existence of a major conspiracy by Ezhov and concedes that Stalin was deceived by him. Stalin acted in good faith on the basis of evidence presented to him by Ezhov, much of which may, or must, have been false.

The Lists

Khrushchev:

The vicious practice was condoned of having the NKVD prepare lists of persons whose cases were under the jurisdiction of the Military Collegium and whose sentences were prepared in advance.

Yezhov would send these lists to Stalin personally for his approval of the proposed punishment. In 1937–1938, 383 such lists containing the names of many thousands of party, Soviet, Komsomol, Army and economic workers were sent to Stalin. He approved these lists.

These lists have been published on the Internet, where they are titled the "Stalin Shooting Lists."⁴ Some writers dishonestly call them "death warrants." Both are tendentious, inaccurate names, for these were not lists of persons "to be shot" at all.

⁴ <http://stalin.memo.ru/>

Following Khrushchev, the anti-Stalin editors of these lists do call the lists "sentences prepared in advance." But their own research disproves this claim. In reality, these were lists sent to Stalin and other Secretariat members for "review"—rassmotrenie—a word that is used many times in the introduction to the lists.⁵

⁵ <http://stalin.memo.ru/images/intro1.htm>

The lists give the sentences that the NKVD recommended to the prosecution to seek if the individual were convicted—that is, the sentence the Prosecution would ask the court to apply. Many people on these lists were not convicted at all or were convicted of a lesser offense and so not shot.

The Limits

In the campaign against insurgents and conspirators the Politburo set limits on the numbers of persons the Party leaders and NKVD could execute and imprison.

Order No. 00447 established limits [limity] rather than quotas, maximums, not minimums.... As we have seen, for years Stalin had been putting limits on mass executions by provincial leaders. If the Politburo had at this moment expected or wanted an open-ended terror, there would be no reason to call them 'limits' at all. The word's meaning was well known: it never meant 'quotas'. Reflecting Stalin's concern that locals might go out of control (or out of his control) Order No. 00447 twice warned that 'excesses' in local implementation of the operation were not permitted. (Getty, 2013b, 231–232)

Getty also emphasizes this fact in a recent book:

One of the mysteries of the field [of Soviet history] is how limity is routinely translated as "quotas." (Getty 2013b, 340 n. 109)

One writer who constantly translates "limity" as "quotas" is Oleg Khlevniuk. Another is Timothy Snyder. It seems that anticommunist writers want Stalin to have called for "quotas" so that he appears dishonest and cruel.

Contested Elections to the Soviets are Canceled

The Central Committee Plenum of October 1937 saw the final cancellation of the plan for contested elections to the Soviets. This represented a serious defeat for Stalin and his supporters in the Politburo. A sample ballot, showing several candidates, had already been drawn up.⁶

⁶ At least one copy of such a ballot has survived in an archive. Zhukov has included a photograph of it in Inoi, 6th illustration. I have put it online at https://msuweb.montclair.edu/~furrq/research/sample_ballot_1937.html

The Soviet elections of December 1937 were implemented on the basis that the Party candidates would run on slates with 20–25 percent of nonparty candidates—an alliance of sorts, but without a contest. Originally the elections were planned without slates, with voting only for individuals—a far more democratic method in that candidates would not get votes simply by being "on the ticket" (Zhukov 2000, 41; Zhukov 2002a,b; Zhukov 2003, 443).

Iakov Iakovlev

Iakov Iakovlev had been one of those closest to Stalin in drafting the 1936 Constitution to which Stalin was so committed. Along with A. I. Stetskii and B. M. Tal', Iakovlev was a member of the small commission that worked on the text of the constitution. The commission had presented a "rough draft" to Stalin in February 1936—the draft that Stalin referred to in his celebrated talk with Roy Howard on March 1 (Zhukov 2003, 223).

But on October 10, all the members of the Politburo and Secretariat met in Stalin's office. The meeting ended at 10 p.m. after approving the main points of Molotov's presentation at the opening session of the CC Plenum, to be held the next day.

The second point of Molotov's presentation was:

Contested [literally "parallel"] candidates (not obligatory).

Contested elections were effectively ruled out, since no one expected the regional Party leaders, the First Secretaries, to permit them unless they were required to do so. Point three of Molotov's outline reads: "Non-Party members: 20–25 percent."

What happened? Zhukov concludes that there was simply no majority in the Politburo, let alone the Central Committee, in support of contested elections and a strong insistence on guaranteeing that the Party—which meant the regional Party leaders—would dominate the Soviets. Clearly, Stalin was no "dictator."⁷ He did not get what he had fought hard for.

⁷ For more on the "dictator" question see, Wheatcroft, S. G. 2007. Agency and terror: Evdokimov and mass killing in Stalin's great terror. Australian Journal of Politics and History 53:20–43.

Iakovlev's Arrest and Confession

The Saratov oblast' Party organization had distrusted Iakovlev, who had been a Trotskyist in 1923. Stalin had stood firmly by him. But on October 12, the day after the opening of the CC Plenum, Iakovlev was arrested. Two days later he confessed to having been a clandestine Trotskyist "sleeper" since 1923. An even greater shock was the fact that Iakovlev also confessed to having been recruited by a German agent who told him that they, the Germans, were in contact with Trotsky and wished to work with Iakovlev on the same terms.

Iakovlev's confession is arguably one of the most important documents from the former Soviet archives published in recent years. That no doubt explains why it is virtually never mentioned, let alone studied, by mainstream historians of the USSR. Iakovlev inculpated as conspirators a number of leading Soviet figures. In a few cases, we also have one or more confessions that confirm Iakovlev's confession.

Party and Trade Union Elections

Although contested elections were not held for the Soviets they were held for Party and trade union positions. Stalin did indeed have democratic intentions—relying on the rank-and-file to vote out local leaders, if they chose to do so, is one of the things democracy is all about. The forces that were powerful enough to defeat Stalin's struggle for democratic, contested elections to the Soviets had not been powerful enough to stop democratic elections in the Party and the trade unions. During the second half of 1937, the unprecedented democratic trade union elections were in fact conducted. But they did not happen again.

The Mass Repressions are Stopped

Accounts of the repressions of 1937–1938 by mainstream historians are useful insofar as they document how the repressions proceeded. By surveying the large number of primary sources now available these accounts show how Stalin and the top Party leadership gradually came to understand what was happening. What they had been assured was a battle against counterrevolutionary conspiracies had in fact very often been directed against loyal Party members and completely innocent citizens.

Mainstream historians do not discuss the most important sets of documentary evidence that bear directly on the causes, course, and conclusion of the Ezhov mass repressions:

- The conspiracies that we know existed. This includes all those that were the subject of the three Moscow Trials plus the conspiracy of military commanders and other officers that is often referred to simply as the Tukhachevsky Affair. These conspiracies provided the impetus for the resolutions of early July 1937 concerning the need to use massive force.

- The investigation documents detailing the confessions of alleged conspirators and the conclusions of NKVD investigators with which Ezhov bombarded Stalin and the central Party leadership for more than a year after the June 1937 CC Plenum. Dozens of these reports, often very long and detailed, have been published. Iakov Iakovlev's confession is one of them. Only a few have been translated into English. We do not know how much more documentation Stalin received. This is probably just a fraction of it.

- The confession of Ezhov's assistant Mikhail Frinovskii and Ezhov's many confessions of 1939.⁸ These are entirely ignored. The few remarks mainstream historians make about this material shows that they prefer to "not believe" it. This is the fallacy of "begging the question," "assuming that which is to be proven." It is illegitimate for historians to ignore evidence simply because that evidence is not consistent with some preconceived paradigm of "what must have happened." These confessions dismantle the "anti-Stalin paradigm."

⁸ For these texts in Russian and English see my article "The Moscow Trials and the 'Great Terror' of 1937–1938: What the Evidence Shows." At http://msuweb.montclair.edu/~furrgr/research/trials_ezhovshchina_update0710.html

Mainstream scholarship ignores all the evidence that explains the reason for the mass repression of the Ezhov era. Then, these scholars declare that the reason for these repressions is a mystery. Naturally, if one decides in advance to ignore the evidence, then the events are indeed inexplicable.

November 1938: Orders to Stop all Mass Repressions

We have a little documentation about early suspicion by the Politburo against the NKVD itself.

In early 1938, the Central Committee sent Shkiriakov to Ordzhonikidze to "investigate evidence that had come through about criminal perversions during the mass operations" committed by regional NKVD organs. (Jansen and Petrov 2002, 135)

Suspicious continued to grow in the Politburo that massive, unauthorized repressions were going on. In August 1938, Ezhov's second-in-command, Mikhail Frinovskii, was replaced by Lavrentii Beria. Beria was chosen as a reliable person to keep watch over Ezhov, as Ezhov himself later stated.

By the time of the October 1937, CC Plenum Stalin and the Politburo had begun to uncover evidence of massive illegal repression. On November 15, 1938, the hearing of cases by troikas were stopped, along with military tribunals and the Military Collegium of the Supreme Court (Furr 2016, 107).

On December 8, the press announced that he [Ezhov] had been relieved of his duties as head of the NKVD "at his own request." Four days later, the Moscow Regional Court reversed the first of many convictions of former "enemies." The declaration noted that the Supreme Court had not only released five construction engineers but had recognized that the five had actually tried to thwart "real enemies." (Getty, 1985, 188–189)

Ezhov's Conspiracy Gradually Uncovered

"...legality is reintroduced under Beriia, November 1938." (Wheatcroft 2007, 41)

Once Ezhov had resigned, to be replaced by Beria, orders were issued to immediately stop all the repressions, to repeal all the NKVD Operational Orders that enabled them, and to re-emphasize the need for oversight by the Prosecutor's Office of all cases of arrest. Then there began a flood of reports to Beria and the central Party leadership concerning massive illegitimate repressions and shootings on the part of local NKVD groups. The central Party leadership began to investigate.

On January 29, 1939, Politburo members Beria, Andrei Andreev, and Georgii Malenkov signed a report detailing massive crimes during Ezhov's tenure (Petrov and Iansen 2008, 359–363). This important evidence that the mass repression was Ezhov's, not Stalin's, doing was only published in 2008. During the next few years, further investigations and prosecutions of guilty NKVD men proceeded. According to the editors of a major document collection:

...in 1939 the NKVD arrested more than 44 thousand persons, about one-fifteenth of the number arrested in 1938. Most of these arrests were in Western Ukraine and Belorussia [as a result of the retaking of these territories from Poland in September 1939 and the arrests of Polish officials and settlers]. During the same year about 110,000 persons were freed after the review of cases of those arrested in 1937–1938. (Khaustov 2006, 564 n. 11)⁹

⁹ Russian text online at <http://istmat.info/node/24582>. English translation at http://msuweb.montclair.edu/~furrgr/research/beria_andreev_malenkov012939eng.html

On October 28, 1939, a group of prosecutors wrote to Andrei Zhdanov to ask him to intercede with the Central Committee about the slowness of the NKVD in reviewing cases of persons innocently imprisoned.

It would seem that the party's Central Committee decision of November 17, 1938, should have mobilized all attention on immediately rectifying the criminal policy of the bastard Ezhov and his criminal clique, which has literally terrorized Soviet persons, upright, dedicated citizens, old party members, and entire party organizations. (Koenker and Bachman 1997, 26–27)¹⁰

¹⁰ Online at https://msuweb.montclair.edu/~furrgr/research/prosecutors_zhdanov_102839.pdf

Ezhov's Confessions

Ezhov's own confessions are evidence that Stalin and the central Soviet leadership were not responsible for his massive executions. Ezhov explicitly states many times that his repressions and executions were carried out in pursuit of his own private conspiratorial goals. In his confession of August 4, 1939 Ezhov admitted: "[W]e were deceiving the government in the most blatant manner."¹¹ There is no evidence that these confessions represent anything but what Ezhov chose to say—no evidence of torture, threats, or fabrication.

Ideologically, anticommunist accounts suppress the evidence of Ezhov's conspiracy against the Soviet government. The apparent reason is the desire to falsely accuse Stalin of having ordered all the huge number of executions carried out by Ezhov.

¹¹ English translation at <https://msuweb.montclair.edu/~furrgr/research/ezhov080439eng.html>

Frinovskii's Statement

In his statement to Beria of April 11, 1939, Mikhail Frinovskii, Ezhov's second-in-command, explicitly confirms the guilt of the defendants in the Moscow Trials.¹² Frinovskii is explicit that Ezhov did not force Bukharin and others to falsely confess. Instead Ezhov asked them not to name him, Ezhov, as one of the Rightist conspirators—and Bukharin and the others did not. We have a great deal of other evidence that Bukharin was guilty. This evidence also serves as confirmation of Frinovskii's (2006) statement.

¹² English translation at <https://msuweb.montclair.edu/~furrgr/research/frinovskyeng.html>

Ezhov was arrested on April 10, 1939. According to Ezhov the idea of an NKVD conspiracy was first suggested to him by German military attaché General Ernst Köstring. After the Tukhachevsky Affair trial and executions Marshal Egorov (already a conspirator) and the Germans reconsidered this original plan, which was oriented towards aiding an invasion of the USSR by Germany and/or allies. With the top figures in the military conspiracy now removed, the Germans suggested a coup d'état instead.

Aside from the Moscow Trials and Tukhachevsky Affair defendants, of whose guilt we can be sure, we do not know whom Ezhov specifically targeted. We would like to know how many of the Central Committee members and other well-known persons such as intellectuals and military officers of lesser rank who were tried and executed during 1937–1938 were in fact guilty; likewise, the hundreds of thousands of ordinary Soviet citizens. The main reason we do not know more about this is that no one is asking this question and doing the research. A huge number of persons have been "rehabilitated"—declared innocent. But the rehabilitation process is political and judicial, not historical. We have shown that many of the well-known figures who have been "rehabilitated" were in fact guilty, declared innocent under Khrushchev and Gorbachev out of political expediency alone (Furr 2011, Chapter 11).

At the end of Ezhov's interrogation of August 4, 1939, the interrogator raises the fact that the NKVD also controlled the GULAG, the labor camps where those not sentenced to execution were confined. Accounts of the GULAG agree that conditions in the camps were bad during 1937–1938 and improved immediately on Beria's taking over the NKVD from Ezhov. Ezhov's account here explains this.

Evgeniia Ginzburg, who was in Iaroslavl' Prison and who saw no newspapers, said that the prisoners could tell when Ezhov fell: The draconian regime in the prisons (frequent solitary confinement and deprivation of all privileges) was relaxed one day. The timing was confirmed a few days later when Beria's name began to appear on official prison notices. (Getty, 1985, 189)

Conclusion

"Great Terror" is a misleading name, but not because no one was frightened. It is misnamed because Conquest invented the term "Great Terror" to mean "Stalin's Purge of the '30s," and it was no such thing. The falsehood is located not in the assertion that there was terror but in the claim as to who the terrorists were. Ezhov picked a great many of his victims at random, a process that must have sparked fear. But the Soviet population was not ruled by terror and the Soviet population generally was not "terrorized." The term "Great Terror" is false in the way in which Conquest used it, and in the way it continues to be used in the field of Soviet history.

Ezhov's mass repressions were a continuation of the conspiracies described at the three Moscow Trials and the Tukhachevsky Affair. Ezhov initiated his own NKVD conspiracy—the mass murders—after the military conspiracy had been discovered and, in the main, destroyed.

A great many innocent persons had been murdered. From 1939 into the war years Beria, as head of the NKVD, and the Soviet Procuracy reviewed hundreds of thousands of cases and released hundreds of thousands of persons whom they judged had been wrongly imprisoned.

At the same time, they continued to investigate, uncover, and punish persons who really were involved in anti-Soviet conspiracies. Real conspiracies did exist. Ezhov's and Frinovskii's confessions make it clear that not everyone repressed under Iagoda and Ezhov was innocent. Soviet émigrés like Grigory Tokaev (1956) and "Svetlanin"/Likhachev testify to the fact that some conspirators were never identified.¹³

¹³ In the early 1980s, I tried to verify this account by writing to persons who had known Likhachev. Professor Nikolai Andreyev, of Cambridge University (now deceased), wrote me two letters telling me of his close friendship with Likhachev/Svetlanin/Frolov; of how highly he thought of his trustworthiness.

The evidence we now have supports two hypotheses. First, that many First Secretaries and other Party leaders were involved in the Right-Trotskyist conspiracy. Second, that some of them were also directly involved with Ezhov's NKVD conspiracy. It is confirmed by the convergence of a great many individual pieces of evidence. It is also utterly incompatible with mainstream Soviet historiography, which demands that Stalin be the mass murderer and Ezhov his "loyal executioner." For this reason, it is rejected by mainstream anticommunist Soviet historians and by Trotskyists. It does not fit the Procrustean bed of the anti-Stalin paradigm.

Grover Furr has written many books on Soviet history of the Stalin period, most recently Trotsky's "Amalgams": Trotsky's Lies, The Moscow Trials as Evidence, The Dewey Commission. Trotsky's Conspiracies of the 1930s, Volume One (2015) and Yezhov vs. Stalin: The Truth about Mass Repressions and the So-Called "Great Terror" in the USSR (2016), as well as many articles. His Home Page may be accessed at <http://tinyurl.com/grover-furr-research>. He is a Professor of Medieval Literature in the English Department at Montclair State University in New Jersey.

References

Broué, P. 1980. Trotsky et le bloc des oppositions de 1932. Cahiers Léon Trotsky 5:5–37.

Constitution of 1936: in Russian, <http://www.hist.msu.ru/ER/Etext/cnst1936.htm>, in English, <http://www.departments.bucknell.edu/russian/const/1936toc.html> (1936 Constitution).

Frinovskii, M. P. 2006. To the people's commissar for internal affairs of the union of Soviet Soc. Republics: Commissar of state security 1st degree Beria L.P. Lubianka 1939–1946 33–60. Russian original at <https://msuweb.montclair.edu/~furr/research/frinovskyr.html> English translation at <https://msuweb.montclair.edu/~furr/research/frinovskyeng.html>

Furr, G. 2005. Stalin and the struggle for democratic reform. Cultural Logic. <https://ojs.library.ubc.ca/index.php/clogic/issue/view/182859> and <https://ojs.library.ubc.ca/index.php/clogic/article/view/191862/188831>.

Furr, G. 2009. Evidence of Leon Trotsky's collaboration with Germany and Japan. Cultural Logic. <https://ojs.library.ubc.ca/index.php/clogic/article/view/191550/188662>.

Furr, G. 2011. Khrushchev lied: The evidence that every "Revelation" of Stalin's (and Beria's) crimes in Nikita Khrushchev's infamous "Secret Speech" to the 20th Party Congress of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union on February 25, 1956, is Provably False. Kettering, OH: Erythrós Press & Media, LLC.

Furr, G. 2013. The murder of Sergei Kirov. History, scholarship and the anti-Stalin paradigm. Kettering, OH: Erythrós Press and Media, LLC.

Furr, G. 2015. Trotsky's "Amalgams": Trotsky's lies, the Moscow trials as evidence, the Dewey commission. Trotsky's conspiracies of the 1930s. Vol. 1. Kettering, OH: Erythrós Press& Media, LLC.

Furr, G. 2016. Yezhov Vs. Stalin: The truth about mass repressions and the so-called 'Great Terror' in the USSR. Kettering OH: Erythrós Press & Media LLC.

Furr, G. The Moscow trials and the "Great Terror" of 1937–1938: What the evidence shows.

http://msuweb.montclair.edu/~furrgr/research/trials_ezhovshchina_update0710.html

Furr, G., and V. L. Bobrov. 2010. Stephen Cohen's biography of Bukharin: A study in the falsehood of Khrushchev-Era 'Revelations'. Cultural Logic. <https://ojs.library.ubc.ca/index.php/clogic/article/view/191531/188643>.

Genrikh Iagoda. 1997. Narkom vnutrennikh del SSSR, General'niy komisar gosudarstvennoi bezopasnosti. Kazan: Sbornik dokumentov.

Getty, J. A. 1985. Origins of the great purges. The Soviet communist party reconsidered, 1933–1938. New York and Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Getty, J. A. 2002. Excesses are not permitted: Mass terror and Stalinist governance in the late 1930s. The Russian Review 61:113–38.

Getty, J. A. 2013a. The Rise and Fall of a Party First Secretary: Vainov of Iaroslavl'. In The Anatomy of Terror: Political Violence Under Stalin, ed. J. Harris, 66–84. Oxford Scholarship Online.

- Getty, J. A. 2013b. Practicing Stalinism. Bolsheviks, Boyars, and the persistence of tradition. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.
- Getty, J. A. Pre-election fever: The origins of the 1937 mass operations. Harris Anatomy 216–235.
- Getty, J. A., and O. V. Naumov. 1999. The road to terror. Stalin and the self-destruction of the Bolsheviks, 1932–1939. New Haven: Yale University Press.
- Goldman, W. Z. 2007. Terror and democracy in the age of Stalin. The social dynamics of repression. New York: Cambridge University Press.
- Harris, J. ed. 2013. The anatomy of terror. Political violence under Stalin. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Jansen, M., and N. Petrov. 2002. Stalin's loyal executioner. People's commissar Nikolai Ezhov 1895–1940. Stanford: Hoover Institution Press.
- Khaustov, V. N. 2011. Lubianka. Sovetskaia elita na stalinskoi golgofe. 1937–1938. Dokumenty. Moscow: Mezhdunarodny i Fond "Demokratii", 2011.
- Khaustov, V. N. 2004. Lubianka. Stalin i Glavnoe Upravlenie Gosbezopasnosti NKVD. 1937–1938. Moscow: Materik, 2004.
- Khaustov, V. N. 2006. Lubianka. Stalin i NKVD-NKGB-GUKR "Smersh." 1939 - mart 1946. Moscow: MDF, 2006.
- Khaustov, V., and L. Samuel'son. 2009. NKVD, i Repressii 1936–1938 gg. Istoriiia Stalinizma series. Moscow: ROSSPEN.
- Khrushchev, N. S. 1962. The new leader. The crimes of the Stalin era. Introduction by Anatol Shub, notes by Boris Nikolaevsky. New York: The New Leader.
- Koenker, D.P., and R.D. Bachman, eds. 1997. Revelations from the Russian archives. Documents in English translation. Washington, DC: Library of Congress.

Petrov, N., and M. Iansen. 2008. "Stalinskii pitomets"—Nikolai Ezhov. Moscow: ROSSPEN.

Report of court proceedings. The case of the Trotskyite-Zinovievite terrorist center. Moscow: People's Commissariat of Justice of the U.S.S.R. 1936.

Report of court proceedings in the case of the Anti-Soviet Trotskyite Centre. Heard before the military collegium of the supreme court of the U.S.S.R. Moscow, January 23–30, 1937.... Verbatim report. Moscow: People's Commissariat of Justice of the U.S.S.R. 1937.

Stalin, J. V. 1936a. The Stalin-Howard interview. NY: International Publishers.

Stalin, J. V. 1936b. On the Draft of the Constitution of the USSR. Collected Works, Vol. 14. http://grachev62.narod.ru/stalin/tl4/tl4_44.htm (in Russian); Problems of Leninism, 795–834. Peking: Foreign Languages Press (in English). <http://www.marx2mao.com/Stalin/SC36.html>

Stalin, J. V. 1937. Vystuplenie Stalina na Rashirennom Zasedanii Voennogo Soveta pri Narkome Oborony. Istochnik 3 (1994) 72–88. A slightly different version is in Lubianka 1937–1938, 202–209.

Tokaev, G. 1956. Comrade X. London: Harvill Press.

Wheatcroft, S. G. 2004. From team-Stalin to degenerate tyranny. In The nature of Stalin's dictatorship. The Politburo, 1924–1953, ed. E. A. Rees, 79–107. Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan.

Wheatcroft, S. G. 2007. Agency and terror: Evdokimov and mass killing in Stalin's great terror. Australian Journal of Politics and History 53:20–43.

Zhukov, I. 2002a. "Zhupel Stalina," Komsomolskaya Pravda, November 5, 6,12,13,14,15,19, 20. http://www.x-libri.ru/elib/smi_958/

Zhukov, I. 2002b. Repressii i Konstitutsiia SSSR 1936 goda. Voprosy Istorii. 1:3–26.

Zhukov, I. 2000. Tainy Kremliia: Stalin, Molotov, Beria, Malenkov.
Moscow: Terra-Knizhnyy Klub.

Zhukov, I. 2003. Inoi Stalin. Politicheskie reformy v SSSRv 1933–1937 gg.
Moscow: Vagrius.

2018: Review of October. The Story of the Russian Revolution

(by China Miéville)

The primary requisites for any historical work are evidence and objectivity in studying that evidence. China Miéville's October has neither. There are no foot-notes or endnotes. October is a partisan Trotskyist screed that ignores evidence — including that from Trotskyist historians — that threatens to complicate his simple framework: "Trotsky, good; Stalin and the post-Trotsky Soviet Union, bad."

During the 1930s Leon Trotsky himself was widely published in, and handsomely paid by, the capitalist press. Miéville's October is similarly celebrated and for the same reason: it is an anticommunist attack on the heroic period of the Soviet Union, the historical legacy of the revolution of 1917. What makes the Bolshevik Revolution of 1917 a milestone in world history is the achievements of the Soviet Union and the Communist International during the twenty-five years after Trotsky's exile in 1929. These achievements are the reason that the revolution of 1917 remains a world-historical event. Like Trotsky and the whole tribe of anticommunists, Miéville slanders them.

October is a one-sided interpretation of the insurrection of October 25/November 7, 1917 in Petrograd and the events leading up to it. At the end Miéville outlines an explicitly Trotskyist, and completely inaccurate, interpretation of the subsequent development of the history of the Soviet Union. The flagrant incompetence, even dishonesty, of this false thumbnail sketch of Soviet history naturally raises the question: How historically accurate is the main part of the book?

Leon Trotsky's History of the Russian Revolution (HRR) likewise contains no footnotes. It is a frankly anti-Stalin polemic published after his exile from the USSR. Beyond the Trotsky cult no one takes it to be a reliable account. At almost 900 pages only dedicated scholars or Trotsky cultists read it. Miéville's text is much shorter. And Miéville is a skilled story-teller. But how much of it is accurate? Miéville:

...the embrace of 'Socialism in One Country' is a dramatic reversal of a foundational thesis of the Bolsheviks... (314)

This is Trotskyist dogma. In fact, Lenin had repeatedly said that Russia had "all that is necessary and sufficient" for building a socialist society. ("On Cooperation", 1922). Miéville also claims that building socialism in the USSR was a wish for "autarchic socialism" and a "bad hope" (sic). Better that the Soviet Union fail than that it attempt to build socialism! Hitler, Winston Churchill, and in short the capitalists and imperialists of the world, would certainly have agreed.

Miéville:

[Lenin] grows suspicious of Stalin's personality and his place within the machine. In his last writings, he insists Stalin be removed from his post as general secretary. His advice is not followed. (313)

Valentin Sakharov's detailed study of Lenin's supposed "Testament" was published in 2003. Sakharov concludes these documents are forgeries, not by Lenin. Stephen Kotkin agrees.¹ Miéville ignores Sakharov's study.

The revolution in the rest of Russia is entirely missing — even the ten-day armed struggle in Moscow, which was not a coup against minimal opposition as in Petrograd, but a hard-fought Bolshevik victory with hundreds of casualties. Yet Miéville discusses only Petrograd.

Following his hero Trotsky Miéville can say nothing but lies about Stalin. A few examples:

There is a rare hint at something more troubling about the man in the assessment of the party's Russian Bureau in Petrograd, which allowed him to join, but only as advisor, without the right to a vote — because, it said, of 'certain personal features that are inherent in him'. Would that the rest of Sukhanov's description had been accurate: that Stalin had remained no more than glimpsed, 'looming up now and then dimly and without leaving any trace'. (97)

The words highlighted here are accurate. The rest is a "cheap shot." Trotsky himself wrote that "Sukhanov obviously underestimates Stalin" here. (HRR, 209²) But Miéville cannot resist insulting Stalin. These words are from the minutes of the Russian Buro of March 12, 1917 published in 1962 after Khrushchev's lie-filled attack on Stalin at the XXII Party Congress and the same year Khrushchev expelled Viacheslav Molotov from the Party.

Molotov was one of the three members of the Russian Buro already in Petrograd in March 1917 along with Aleksandr Shliapnikov and Piotr Zalutskii.³ And Molotov says this never happened! He wrote: "The transcript of March 12 is completely inaccurate as regards the factual situation."⁴

Shliapnikov published three volumes of memoirs on the year 1917. He discusses the arrival of Kamenev and Stalin from Siberian exile⁵ but mentions nothing about Stalin's being given less than full membership in the Buro. Even Trotsky, who misses no opportunity to attack and belittle Stalin, does not mention it.

In fact, it cannot be true because Stalin was already a member of the Russian Buro! He had been appointed to it and to the Central Committee in 1912 by the All-Russian Conference of the Bolshevik party.⁶

Miéville claims:

...the powerful and respected party right, particularly Stalin, went so far in the direction of moderation as to support a merger of Bolsheviks and Mensheviks... (104)

This is a lie. Miéville copied it straight from Trotsky, who cites no evidence (HRR, 721–2). Trotsky also lied when he wrote that Stalin admitted this error in 1924. In reality, what Stalin in 1924 acknowledged as "profoundly mistaken" was the policy of "pressure on the Provisional Government through the Soviets."⁷

Melville:

... his [Trotsky's] supporters are ... driven to suicide. (314)

Also false. Adol'f Ioffe, the only Trotskyist suicide of the 1920s about whom we know anything, cited illness as his reason. Ioffe's letter was published in the official Party journal Bol'shevik in 1927.

Miéville calls collectivization "brutal." In reality collectivization was a real reform that modernized Soviet agriculture and stopped the 1,000-year cycle of killer famines, four of which had struck Russia and Ukraine in the 1920s alone.

Miéville on the Moscow Trials:

Party activists are ... forced to betray others, to confess to preposterous crimes with stentorian declarations. (315)

False again. We have had strong evidence of the guilt of the Moscow Trials defendants for decades. Beginning in 1980 the discoveries of Trotskyist historian Pierre Broué proved that Trotsky had consistently lied about the Moscow Trials and his own conspiracies in all his writings, including in "The Red Book on the Moscow Trials" (1936) and to the Dewey Commission in 1937. The clandestine bloc of Rights, Trotskyites, and other former oppositionists, did indeed exist. Broué's discovery dismantles Trotsky's claims that he and the defendants were "framed."⁸ Trotskyist writers do not mention it.

Stalin, however, did not lie about Trotsky. In a Pravda article of November 6, 1918 Stalin acknowledged Trotsky's leading role in winning over the Petrograd garrison. Stalin retained this passage in his book The October Revolution, published in 1934, when Trotsky had been slandering Stalin for years.

According to Molotov Stalin complained that Trotsky's contribution to the revolution was being suppressed.

In 1939 Stalin looked through the second volume of the "History of the Civil War" and asked me:

But where is Trotsky's picture?

But he is an enemy of the people!

He was People's Commissar of the Army and Navy! — said Stalin.⁹

At the second and third Moscow Trials Trotsky was charged with conspiring with Nazi Germany and fascist Japan against the USSR and with plotting assassination and sabotage in the USSR. There is a great deal of evidence to support these charges.¹⁰ Miéville ignores it.

In 1961 Robert McNeal wrote:

Rarely has the historical image of a major leader been shaped as much by his arch-enemy as the generally accepted conception of Stalin has been shaped by the writings of Trotsky. ... To the end of his life [Trotsky] could not believe that so vulgar a person as Stalin was capable of the most staggering social and economic undertakings or that "history" could continue to suffer such a creature.¹¹

Miéville's October perpetuates this historical falsification.

The accomplishments of the socialist Soviet Union: collectivization, industrialization, a panoply of social welfare benefits for workers, the defeat of the Nazi hordes, the feats of the Communist International under Soviet leadership — these were the pivot on which the history of the world in the twentieth century turned. If we are to learn the lessons of 1917 we must discard biased, subjective, and anticommunist accounts like Miéville's and face the evidence squarely, no matter how disillusioning this will be to some of us. The new and better world for which the communists of the last century fought can only be built on a foundation of historical truth.

Grover Furr, Montclair State University, Montclair, NJ 07043, USA.
Email:furrg@mail.montclair.edu

¹ Stalin. Volume I. Paradoxes of Power (New York: Penguin, 2014), 498–501.

² Haymarket Press, 2008.

³ Sovetskaia Istoricheskaia Entsiklopedia, at <http://dic.academic.ru/dic.nsf/sie/15125/PYCCCKOE> ; Alexander Rabinowitch, Prelude to Revolution (Bloomington, IN: Indiana University Press, 1968), 32.

⁴ Vladimir Nikonov, Molotov. Molodost' (Moscow: Vagrius, 2005), 234–5.

⁵ A. Shliapnikov, Kanun Semnadtsatogo Goda. Semnadtsatyi God. 2 (Moscow: Izd. 'Respublika', 1992), 444–5.

⁶ P. V. Volobuev, ed. Politicheskie deiateli Rossii. 1917. Biograficheskii slovar' (Moscow: Nauchno Izdatel'stvo 'Bol'shaia Rossiiskaia Entsiklopediia', 1993) 303 col. 3.

⁷ J. V. Stalin. Works. Volume 6. 1924. (Moscow: Foreign Languages Publishing House, 1953), 348.

⁸ A thorough discussion of this evidence is in Grover Furr, Trotsky's 'Amalgams'. Trotsky's Lies, the Moscow Trials as Evidence, The Dewey Commission (Kettering, OH: Erythrós Press & Media, LLC, 2015).

⁹ Feliks Chuev, Molotov. Poluderkhavnyi Vlastelin (Moscow: Olma-Press, 2002), 300. This is the expanded version of the Russian edition of Conversations with Molotov.

¹⁰ Grover Furr, Leon Trotsky's Collaboration with Germany and Japan. Trotsky's Conspiracies of the 1930s, Volume Two. (Kettering, UK: Erythrós Press & Media, LLC, 2017).

¹¹ Robert McNeal, "Trotsky's Interpretation of Stalin." Canadian Slavonic Papers 3 (1961), 97.

2018: Communications: Stalin Reappraised: Comments on Meyer

Science & Society, Vol. 82, No. 4, October 2018, 568–575

To begin, I would like to acknowledge the positive aspect of Gerald Meyer's article in Science & Society's Special Issue, "The Russian Revolution One Century Later" (Meyer, 2017). Meyer's call to reject anti-Stalin hysteria and to seek the balance of positive and negative elements in Stalin's legacy is welcome. However, as I will argue below, Meyer still accepts far too much of the mainstream beliefs about Stalin's purported "crimes."

Marxists are materialists. Whether in the sciences or in historical study, materialists decide on the truth or falsehood of statements on the basis of evidence. Materialists are determined to maintain objectivity, striving to eliminate their own preconceptions and biases as far as possible. They take positive steps to do so, regarding any evidence that appears to confirm their own biases with extra suspicion and giving additional, generous consideration to evidence that appears to contradict their own biases.

I follow these practices. I have been studying the alleged crimes of Stalin for many years from the primary source evidence now voluminously available, much of it from former Soviet archives, some from the Trotsky archives at Harvard and the Hoover Institution. All of my research and conclusions are premised upon recognition of the fact that any evidence can in principle be accounted for by multiple explanations and that it is imperative to corroborate a datum from one source with data from as many other sources as possible.

For example, I have concluded that the Moscow Trials transcripts constitute valid evidence through corroboration by multiple pieces of evidence from other sources, not from any subjective desire on my part to pursue a specific interpretation out of political bias. Indeed, I always actively search for evidence that might disconfirm my hypotheses.

But Meyer accepts and repeats, on the basis of secondary literature alone, many statements about Stalin that have been shown to be false. For example, he states:

Stalin was responsible for horrendous crimes, not only against "class enemies," but ardent Communists and his own people. (549.)

Here Meyer reflects a widely held view. There is an enormous body of writing alleging that Stalin was mainly or solely responsible for very serious crimes.

The existence of this literature cannot be denied. However, much of what looks like evidence of Stalin's crimes is really not. Rather, it consists of invalid procedures such as mutual citations from secondary sources (where A and B cite each other in support of a single view); highly selective, ideologically driven use of sources; attribution to Stalin of things done by others (for example, by Nikolai Yezhov, who headed the NKVD between August 1936 and November 1938); the fraudulent use of footnotes; and bias by omission.

It will surprise many readers to learn that there is not now, nor has there ever been, any evidence to support any charge of crimes by Stalin against anybody, let alone against "ardent Communists" and Soviet citizens.¹ For more than six decades ideological bias has resulted in the substitution of unsupported assertions for genuine evidence.

¹ The "Katyn Massacre" is an important exception, in that Soviet guilt is widely accepted on the basis of forgeries. For a discussion of recent discoveries that challenge this version see Furr, 2013. For a full discussion of all the evidence, see Furr, 2018, forthcoming.

Meyer states:

Resistance to collectivization erupted. . . . For the peasants, collectivization meant the loss of lands they had so recently wrested from the landowners after toiling on them for centuries. (Meyer, 555.)

Mark Tauger, of West Virginia University, is an internationally recognized authority on Russian and Soviet agriculture and famines, a subject to which he has devoted his professional life. Tauger concludes that peasant resistance to collectivization has been greatly exaggerated.

The vast majority of Soviet peasants, some 95 per cent based on the data in this document, did not engage in protests against collectivization. (Tauger, 2005, 71.)

Meyer continues:

The unintended consequences of the collectivization drive account for the widespread famine that intensified and expanded across the Ukraine and Central Russia. (555.)

But Tauger's exhaustive research shows that the serious famine of 1932–33 was not due to collectivization at all. It had environmental causes, as had the four famines of the 1920s, and each of the famines of the previous millennium, which had occurred regularly every three or four years.

By 1932, these colossal oversights were rectified. (Meyer, 555.)

Meyer is in error here. The famine took place precisely in 1932–33.

Despite the Truman administration's abrupt termination of Lend Lease in 1945 and the United Nations Reform and Rehabilitation Agency in 1946 — which had provided massive amounts of food aid — neither did famine occur after the war. (Meyer, 556.)

In fact there was indeed a final famine in 1946–47. Stephen Wheatcroft, author of the most recent study of this famine, concludes that it was due to a worldwide agricultural crisis exacerbated by wartime destruction (Wheatcroft, 2012).

Meyer continues:

The human costs for collectivization reached into millions. The lowest figure mentioned by Gellately is four million. (557.)²

² The reference is to Gellately, 2013, an important source on which Meyer relies to frame his argument.

Here Meyer incorrectly assumes that the famine was caused by collectivization. Tauger's research shows that, in reality, collectivization was a real reform that helped to put an end to the famine, which had environmental causes:

Collectivization brought substantial modernization to traditional agriculture in the Soviet Union, and laid the basis for relatively high food production and consumption by the 1970s and 1980s. (Tauger, 2006, 109.)

Meyer continues:

Stalin, however, was directly implicated in another set of deaths that understandably Gellately finds few words to mitigate. These included the execution or assassination of Lev Kamenev, Grigory Zinoviev, and Nikolai Bukharin, leaders of the Right Opposition; Leon Trotsky, leader of the Left Opposition; and the mass executions of the adherents of his opposition, and innumerable numbers of Soviet citizens associated with the pre-Revolutionary regimes. (558.)

Despite widespread belief that this allegation is true there is not now, nor has there ever been, any evidence to support it. On the contrary: there is a great deal of evidence that the conspiracies alleged at the Moscow Trials were real and that the defendants' confessions reflected what they chose to say. I devote the first 12 chapters of my book Trotsky's "Amalgams" to a review of this evidence (Furr, 2015, 29–218).

In pursuit of his own conspiracy against the Soviet Union Leon Trotsky lied about Stalin in his writings of the 1930s, including to the Dewey Commission (Furr, 2015.) What's more, there is compelling primary-source evidence that Trotsky did indeed collaborate with the Germans and Japanese, as he was accused of doing at the Second and Third Moscow Trials (Furr, 2017). Neither Gellately nor Meyer, nor anyone else, has any evidence to the contrary.

Gellately gives equal standing to a neglected aspect of this brutal course of action: the dislocation of small nationalities — such as Karachays, Kalmycks, Chechens, Ingushetians, Balkars, Crimean Tartars, and Volga Germans — unassimilable into the evolving Soviet civilization due to their commitment to maintaining traditional lifestyles. (Meyer, 558.)

In reality, these national groups were deported from their homelands because of collaboration with the Nazis. Post-Soviet, anti-Stalin scholars have documented this collaboration (Furr, 2011, 96–100, 364–366).

Stephen Kotkin, in another recent biography of Stalin [Kotkin, 2014], suggests that Stalin's purging of his rivals for the leadership of the Soviet Union and their supporters resulted from an acute attack of "political paranoia."³ This explanation is plausible. Had an erstwhile comrade given voice to the mass discontent caused by the collectivization and industrialization drives, these vast projects would likely have grounded to a halt. . . . Neither [Kotkin or Gellately] apologizes for Stalin's brutality. (Meyer, 559, 559n.)

³ In fact the term "political paranoia" does not occur in volume 2 of Kotkin's biography of Stalin. In any case, Kotkin's is a profoundly dishonest, fraudulent work. I am preparing a study of it in which I demonstrate this fact.

By the mid-1930s none of those tried and either executed or imprisoned in the Moscow Trials or for membership in anti-Soviet conspiracies were "rivals for the leadership of the Soviet Union." Moreover, all were convicted of criminal, not political, offenses, at trial, and with the presentation of evidence against them. Documents from former Soviet archives have yielded a great deal of evidence that the Moscow Trials defendants were guilty of at least those crimes to which they confessed at trial.

As part of his own anti-Soviet conspiracy Nikolai Yezhov, head of the NKVD from September 1936 till November 1938, did indeed execute a great many innocent persons (Furr, 2016). Nikolai Bukharin knew of Yezhov's conspiracy. Yet he failed to expose it. Had he done so, Yezhov's mass murder conspiracy could have been stopped in its tracks. Therefore, Bukharin must share the blame for this terrible crime (Furr, 2014, 294–296).

It was Stalin who stopped Yezhov. Under Lavrentii Beria, appointed in November 1938 by the Politburo and Stalin to head the NKVD, Yezhov and many of his henchmen were convicted and punished for these massive crimes. In addition, a great many false convictions were reviewed and overturned (Furr, 2016).

Gellately sees all of this reasoning as secondary to a primary cause for The Great Terror: Stalin's need to fulfill "the big idea, the dream of a Communist society." . . . As a means to explain Stalin's mind-set, Gellately quotes Bukharin to good effect, who in a final plea for his life, wrote to Stalin: "I know all too well . . ." (Meyer, 560.)

The document in question is Bukharin's letter to Stalin of December 10, 1937. Bukharin was lying in this letter, as Vladimir Bobrov and I have shown. Aside from refusing to expose Yezhov's conspiracy, Bukharin concealed the fact that he and his followers had been plotting to murder Stalin as early as 1928, as his friend Jules Humbert-Droz revealed in his 1971 memoir (Furr and Bobrov, 2007). In his prize-winning 1973 book, Bukharin and the Bolshevik Revolution, Stephen Cohen, a personal friend of Bukharin's widow and children, cites Humbert-Droz's memoir but omits any mention of this passage, no doubt because it contradicts his preconceived belief that Bukharin was innocent.

Nor was this Bukharin's "final plea," as Meyer claims. Bukharin made such a plea again in his concluding speech to the court during the Third Moscow Trial of March 1938, where he also admitted to committing serious crimes. He did so yet again in his appeal of his death sentence, first published in 1992, in which he stated:

In my soul there is not a single word of protest. For my crimes I should be shot ten times over. (Izvestiia, 2002; Protsess, 2013, 737–739.)⁴

⁴ I have put my own English translation online at <https://msuweb.montclair.edu/~furr/r/research/bukharinappeals.html>

Meyer continues:

This near seven-year-long period was devoid of notable successes; worse, by insisting Communists oppose "social fascists," the term now used to denote the social democrats, this go-it-alone strategy contributed to the Nazis' assumption of power. (Meyer, 561.)

But what about the Social Democrats? They hated the Communists and refused to work with them. On the following page (562) Meyer himself notes that the Social Democrats betrayed all the alliances that the Communists attempted during the Popular Front period. (For more on Social Democrats' anticommunism see Dutt, 1935; Brandt, 2014.)

Nonetheless, whatever their cause or motivation, the scope of the purges, the indifference to even minimal due process, the elevation of suspicion to a level of proof — all of this condemns Stalin and his associates. (566.)

This statement too is false. I have been studying this period from primary sources for many years. Yezhov's crimes aside, I have never seen a single case in which a defendant was convicted on mere "suspicion" or without a trial. Neither has Gellately or Meyer.

For some reason Meyer includes the following factoid:

Robespierre, "The Incorruptible," a provincial autodidact, advocated and practiced the use of terror, which fed as many as 100,000 active and suspected counterrevolutionaries to the guillotines. . . . (567.)

But several studies of the French Revolution cite a number less than one-sixth of this:

Because on the whole the Jacobins were so meticulous in maintaining a legal structure for the Terror, we have very clear records for official death sentences. Thus, we know that the total number of death sentences in Paris was 2,639. The total number of death sentences during the Terror (including Paris) was 16,594. (Linton, n.d., 4; cf. Jones, 2014, 119.)

As Robespierre is not mentioned in Gellately's book, this claim must be Meyer's alone.

Conclusion

How can a scholar who aims to portray the Stalin era in a more dialectical and objective manner, to delineate not just the supposedly "negative" but also the positive qualities in the Soviet experience of the Stalin era (566), still end up by reproducing fact-claims that, as my own research has shown, are not supported by any evidence but rather are refuted by the evidence we do have?

I presume that, in common with a great many others on the left, Gerald Meyer is "a reasonable person in the grip of an unreasonable idea." That "unreasonable idea" is the deeply ingrained but demonstrably false notion of Joseph Stalin as a criminal.

As Marxists Meyer, and all of us, should ask ourselves: "What is the evidence that Stalin committed these crimes?" In addition, Marxists must never shrink from saying: "I don't know!" when confronted by any fact-claim — and, a fortiori, by allegations of "crimes" by communists — for which they have no evidence.

It is not just a question of Meyer. The avalanche of anti-Stalin falsehoods, starting with Leon Trotsky, continuing with Nikita Khrushchev and Western anticommunist propagandists like Robert Conquest, then with Mikhail Gorbachev, Boris Yeltsin, and the writers beholden to them, and continuing to the present day with the professional Soviet history establishment, plus the chorus of the Trotsky cult — this massive onslaught of lies has made many Marxists act like punch-drunk boxers, unable to think straight.

Karl Marx's favorite slogan was: "De omnibus disputandum" — "Doubt everything." The Soviet Union failed to build communism. Obviously, Stalin and the other Soviet leaders during his time made serious errors. But the evidence is clear: these were the errors of pioneers, not of criminals.

We need to learn from the great textbook of the Soviet experience, so we can avoid those errors the next time around. To do that, we have to demand evidence. Meyer fails to do this, and so inevitably lapses into repeating false statements about Joseph Stalin and the communist movement in the Soviet Union.

Grover Furr

English Department

Montclair State University

1 Normal Avenue

Montclair, NJ 07043

furg@mail.montclair.edu

References

Brandt, Konstantin. 2014. Das kleine Schwarzbuch der deutschen Sozialdemokratie. Berlin u. Böklund: Verlag Wiljo Heinen.

Cohen, Stephen F. 1973. Bukharin and the Bolshevik Revolution 1888–1938. New York: Oxford University Press.

Dutt, R. Palme. 1935. Fascism and Social Revolution. New York: International Publishers.

Furr, Grover. 2011. Khrushchev Lied: The Evidence That Every "Revelation" of Stalin's (and Beria's) Crimes in Nikita Khrushchev's Infamous "Secret Speech" to the 20th Party Congress of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union on February 25, 1956, is Provably False. Kettering, Ohio: Erythrós Press & Media.

Furr, Grover. 2013. "The 'Official Version' of the Katyn Massacre Disproven? Discoveries at a German Mass Murder Site in Ukraine." Socialism and Democracy, 27:2, 96–129.

Furr, Grover. 2014. Blood Lies. The Evidence that Every Accusation Against Joseph Stalin and the Soviet Union in Timothy Snyder's Bloodlands Is False. New York: Red Star Publications.

Furr, Grover. 2015. Trotsky's "Amalgams": Trotsky's Lies, The Moscow Trials as Evidence, The Dewey Commission. Trotsky's Conspiracies of the 1930s, Volume One. Kettering, Ohio: Erythrós Press & Media.

Furr, Grover. 2016. Yezhov vs. Stalin: The Truth About Mass Repressions and the So-Called "Great Terror" in the USSR. Kettering, Ohio: Erythrós Press & Media.

Furr, Grover. 2017. Leon Trotsky's Collaboration with Germany and Japan: Trotsky's Conspiracies of the 1930s, Volume Two. Kettering, Ohio: Erythrós Press & Media.

Furr, Grover. 2018, forthcoming. The Mystery of the Katyn Massacre.

Furr, Grover, and Vladimir Bobrov. 2007. "Nikolai Bukharin's First Statement of Confession in the Lubyanka." Cultural Logic. Available at <https://tinyurl.com/furr-bobrov1>

Gellately, Robert. 2013. Stalin's Curse: Battling for Communism in War and Cold War. New York: Oxford University Press.

Izvestiia. 2002. "Raskaz o desiati rasstrelennykh." (September 2), 3.

Jones, Colin. 2014. The Longman Companion to the French Revolution. London: Routledge.

Kotkin, Stephen. 2014. Stalin: Paradoxes of Power, 1878–1928. New York: Penguin.

Kotkin, Stephen. 2017. Stalin: Waiting for Hitler, 1928–1941. New York: Penguin.

Linton, Marissa. n.d. "The Terror in the French Revolution."
<http://www.port.ac.uk/special/france1815to2003/chapter1/interviews/filetodownload,20545,en.pdf>

Meyer, Gerald. 2017. "Joseph Stalin: Revisionist Biography." Science & Society, 81:4, 549–569.

Protsess. 2013. Protsess Bukharina 1938. Dokumenty. Moscow: Mezhdunarodniy Fond "Demokratiia" i Fond Stivena Koena i Katriny Vanden Khiuvel.

Tauger, Mark. 2005. "Soviet Peasants and Collectivization, 1930–1939: Resistance and Adaptation." Pp. 65–94 in Stephen K. Wegren, ed., Rural Adaptation in Russia. New York: Routledge.

Tauger, Mark. 2006. "Stalin, Soviet Agriculture, and Collectivization." Pp. 109–142 in Food and Conflict in Europe in the Age of the Two World Wars, ed. Frank Trentmann and Flemming Just. New York/Houndsmills, England: Palgrave Macmillan.

Wheatcroft, Stephen G. 2012. "The Soviet Famine of 1946–1947: The Weather and Human Agency in Historical Perspective." Europe–Asia Studies, 64:6, 987–1005.

2019: Leon Trotsky and the Barcelona "May Days" of 1937

Abstract: During the past several decades, evidence has come to light which proves that Leon Trotsky lied a great deal to cover up his conspiracies against the Stalin regime in the USSR. References to the studies that reveal Trotsky's falsehoods and conspiracies are included in the article. The present article demonstrates how this evidence changes the conventional understanding of the assassinations of some Trotskyists at the hands of the Soviet NKVD and Spanish communists, during the Spanish Civil War. A brief chronology of the Barcelona May Days revolt of 1937 is appended.

During the past several decades evidence has come to light which proves that Leon Trotsky lied a great deal in order to cover up his conspiracies against the Stalin regime in the USSR. In 1980 and subsequent years Pierre Broué, the foremost Trotskyist historian in the world at the time, discovered that Trotsky approved the "bloc of Rights and Trotskyites," whose existence was the most important charge in the Moscow Trials, and had maintained contact with clandestine supporters with whom he publicly claimed to have broken ties. Arch Getty discovered that Trotsky had specifically contacted, among others, Karl Radek, while he and Radek continued to attack each other in public. These discoveries prove that Trotsky lied wholesale in his testimony to the Dewey Commission in 1937.¹

¹ Trotsky had to lie, of course, in defense of his conspiracies against the Soviet regime, headed by Stalin. The modern discovery of Trotsky's lies began with the article by Pierre Broué (Broué, 1980). During the 1980s and 1990s, Broué published more discoveries of Trotsky's lies. In 1986, American scholar Arch Getty revealed yet more lies by Trotsky (Getty, 1986). Broué and Getty based their research on discoveries in the Harvard Trotsky Archive, opened to scholars on January 2, 1980. The present author has extended the work of Broué and Getty in several books by comparing Trotsky's articles in his Bulletin of the Opposition to the sources he used, and by drawing upon documents from formerly secret Soviet archives, available after the end of the USSR. For these discoveries, and a close examination of Trotsky's lies as disclosed by other scholars, see Furr (2015), Chap. 12–16; Furr (2017); and Furr (2019).

The present article demonstrates how this evidence changes the conventional understanding of the assassinations of some Trotskyists during the Spanish Civil War at the hands of the Soviet NKVD and Spanish communists, both because of their role in the "May Days" revolt of 1937 against the Republican government, and also because of the collaboration with fascists, by Trotskyists and by Trotsky himself, against the Soviet Union.

This article makes four main points.

1. German and Francoist agents were indeed involved in starting the "Barcelona May Days" revolt of May 3–7, 1937, against the Republican government.
2. One or more of Trotsky's representatives was involved in planning, initiating, and vigorously supporting the Barcelona May Days revolt of 1937.
3. The uncovering in the USSR of the military conspiracy known as the "Tukhachevsky Affair" was the spark that set off the determined Soviet onslaught against Trotskyists in Spain.
4. By concealing from his followers the truth about his own conspiracies, Leon Trotsky put them in grave peril.

Andres Nin, Erwin Wolf, and Kurt Landau believed Trotsky's repeated assertions that he was innocent of the charges made against him at the Moscow Trials. Their activities in Spain all but guaranteed their assassinations at the hands of the communists, who regarded them as fascist collaborators because they believed that Trotsky was.

1 | The German Role in the May Days Revolt

Between 1939 and 1941, Pavel Sudoplatov was the assistant director of the Soviet Foreign Intelligence — the First (Intelligence) Directorate of the NKVD of the USSR. Sometime in 1939 Lavrentii Beria, People's Commissariat for Internal Affairs, put Sudoplatov in charge of "Operatsia Utka," the assassination of Leon Trotsky.² In his memoir, The Intelligence Service and the Kremlin, Sudoplatov states the following:

In the interests of the political situation the activities of Trotsky and his supporters abroad in the 1930s are said to have been propaganda only. But this is not so. The Trotskyists were also involved in actions. Making use of the support of persons with ties to German military intelligence [the 'Abwehr'] they organized a revolt against the Republican government in Barcelona in 1937. From Trotskyist circles in the French and German special intelligence services came "indicative" information concerning the actions of the Communist Parties in supporting the Soviet Union. Concerning the connections of the leaders of the Trotskyist revolt in Barcelona in 1937 we were informed by Schulze-Boysen ... Afterward, after his arrest, the Gestapo accused him of transmitting this information to us, and this fact figured in his death sentence by the Hitlerite court in his case. (Sudoplatov, 1997, p. 58)³

² "Operatsia 'Utka'" literally means "Operation 'Duck'." "Utka" was apparently an acronym for the Russian words "ustranenie Trotskogo," "removal of Trotsky." The best discussion of this operation I have found is in Vishliov (2001), pp. 123–140. "Utka" is deciphered on 127–128.

³ All boldfacing in this article is that of the present author.

The actual text of the German Reichskriegsgericht (Military Court of the Reich) against Harro Schulze-Boysen has been published. Schulze-Boysen was a Luftwaffe officer and member of the "Red Orchestra" (Rote Kapelle) group of anti-Nazi spies that funneled intelligence to the Soviets during World War 2.⁴ In December, 1942, he and his wife Libertas were convicted of espionage for the Soviet Union and executed. The relevant paragraph reads thus:

Anfang 1938, während des Spanienkrieges, erfuhr der Angeklagte dienstlich, daß unter Mitwirkung des deutschen Geheimdienstes im Gebiet von Barcelona ein Aufstand gegen die dortige rote

Regierung vorbereitet werde. Diese Nachricht wurde von ihm gemeinsam mit der von Pöllnitz der sowjetrussischen Botschaft in Paris zugeleitet.

At the beginning of 1938, during the Spanish Civil War, the accused learned in his official capacity that a rebellion against the local red government in the territory of Barcelona was being prepared with the co-operation of the German Secret Service. This information, together with that of von Pöllnitz, was transmitted by him to the Soviet Russian embassy in Paris. (Haase, 1993, p. 105)

⁴ A classic account of the Red Orchestra is Perrault (1969).

"Pöllnitz" was Gisella von Pöllnitz, a recent recruit to the "Red Orchestra" anti-Nazi Soviet spy ring, who worked for United Press and who passed the report to the Soviet embassy. The German court got a few things wrong: the year was 1937, not 1938, and the Soviet embassy was that in Berlin, not in Paris, as Pöllnitz was arrested by the Gestapo. She was soon released. (Brysac, 2000, p. 237)

By the time he wrote his memoirs in the 1990s, Sudoplatov regretted many of the things he had done in the Soviet secret service. Yet, he still insisted that the Trotskyists were involved with the Nazis in the May Days revolt of 1937 in Barcelona.

The information from the German Military Court provides independent confirmation of Sudoplatov's statement and confirms Communist suspicions that German intelligence was involved in planning the Barcelona revolt of May 1937. According to General Wilhelm Faupel, German ambassador to Spain, Franco himself claimed that agents of his were also involved in instigating this revolt.

As for the disorders in Barcelona, Franco informed me that the street fighting had been started by his agents. As Nicolás Franco⁵ further told me, they had in all some 13 agents in Barcelona. ... the agent had succeeded, within a few days of receiving such instructions, in having street shooting started by three or four persons, and this had then produced the desired result. (Craig, 1951. No. 254, p. 286)

⁵ Nicolás Franco Bahamonde was the brother of Francisco Franco.

The Barcelona May Days revolt was an uprising against the Republican government during wartime by anti-Soviet anarchists and socialists including the pro-Trotsky POUM (United Marxist Workers Party).⁶ Faupel's report and the German Military Court document show that Franco and his German allies naturally regarded this revolt as very favorable to themselves.

⁶ For a brief chronology of the revolt, see the Appendix.

2 | The Trotskyist Role in the May Days Revolt

At the time of the Second Moscow Trial of the "Anti-Soviet Trotskyite Center" that took place in Moscow from January 23 to 30, 1937, Hitler's Germany was massively supporting Franco's forces against the Spanish Republic, while the USSR was the only significant supporter of the Republic itself. During the trial, the Spanish Civil War was directly referred to twice. At the January 28 evening session in the course of his summation, Andrei Vyshinsky mentioned Stalin's stirring message to José Diaz, Chairman of the Spanish Communist Party, in which Stalin characterized the Spanish Republic's cause as "the common cause of the whole of advanced and progressive humanity." (Report, 1937, pp. 508–509; Protsess. 1937, p. 206)

Karl Radek was one of the most prominent Trotskyist defendants. He had been one of Trotsky's main supporters within the Soviet leadership since the early 1920s.⁷ Like other Trotsky supporters, Radek had publicly "capitulated"—promised to abandon his allegiance to Trotsky and to support Stalin's policies—but had secretly remained an active Trotskyist. He and the other high-ranking defendant at the January 1937 trial, Yuri Piatakov, had learned from Trotsky about his collaboration with the German General Staff and decided that they could not continue their allegiance to Trotsky.

⁷ Radek's article in Pravda of March 14, 1923, titled "Leon Trotsky — the Organizer of Victory," signaled the beginning of Trotsky's campaign for leadership of the Bolshevik Party after Lenin had been definitively sidelined by repeated strokes.

During the trial, Radek appealed directly to "the Trotskyite elements" in other countries, naming Spain:

[W]e must say to the Trotskyite elements in France, Spain and other countries — and there are such — that the experience of the Russian revolution has shown that Trotskyism is a wrecker of the labour movement. We must warn them that if they do not learn from our experience, they will pay for it with their heads. (Report, 1937, p. 550; Protsess, 1937, p. 231)

At the February–March 1937 Central Committee Plenum in Moscow, Stalin made two speeches. In the first of them, Stalin expressed intense hostility to Trotsky and his followers, as might be expected.

The restoration of capitalism, the liquidation of the collective farms and state farms, the restoration of the system of exploitation, an alliance with the fascist forces of Germany and Japan to bring war against the Soviet Union nearer, a struggle for war and against the policy of peace, the territorial dismemberment of the Soviet Union, giving the Ukraine to the Germans and the maritime provinces to the Japanese, the preparation of the military defeat of the Soviet Union if enemy states should attack it, and, as a means of achieving these tasks, wrecking, diversion, individual terrorism against the leaders of the Soviet government, espionage for the benefit of the Japanese and German fascist forces — such was the political platform of present day Trotskyism which was set forth by Piatakov, Radek and Sokolnikov. (Stalin, 1937, p. 17)

Stalin and the Soviet leadership considered Trotsky's collaboration with Germany and Japan to be a proven fact and acted accordingly. Thanks to the release of documents from former Soviet archives, we now possess a lot of evidence that Trotsky was indeed conspiring with the Germans and Japanese. (Furr, 2017)

In a speech on March 3, 1937, to the Central Committee Plenum, Stalin specifically mentioned Trotsky's new Fourth International as a continuing threat:

Take, for example, the Trotskyite counter-revolutionary Fourth International, two-thirds of which is made up of spies and subversive agents. Isn't this a reserve? Is it not clear that this international of spies will select forces to do the spying and wrecking work of the Trotskyites? (Stalin, 1937, p. 34)

Emphasizing the grave damage that a small number of spies and saboteurs, even without a base in the working class, could do, Stalin nonetheless called for "an individual, differentiated approach" in dealing with persons who had had Trotskyist sympathies in the past.

But here is the question — how to carry out in practice the task of smashing and uprooting the German-Japanese agents of Trotskyism. Does this mean that we should strike and uproot not only the real Trotskyites, but also those who wavered at some time toward Trotskyism, and then long ago came away from Trotskyism; not only those who are really Trotskyite agents for wrecking, but also those who happened once upon a time to go along a street where some Trotskyite or other had once passed? At any rate, such voices were heard here at the plenum. Can we consider such an interpretation of the resolution to be correct? No, we cannot consider it to be correct.

On this question, as on all other questions, there must be an individual, differentiated approach. You must not measure everyone with the same yardstick. Such a sweeping approach can only harm the cause of struggle against the real Trotskyite wreckers and spies. (Stalin, 1937, pp. 44–45)

Stalin went on to minimize the significance of Trotskyists as a force:

... [I]f, in spite of this, the Trotskyite wreckers nevertheless have some reserves or other around our Party, it is because the incorrect policy of some of our comrades on the question of expulsion from the Party and reinstatement of expelled people, the heartless attitude of some of our comrades toward the fate of individual Party members and individual Party workers, artificially engender a number of discontented and embittered people, and thus create these reserves for the Trotskyites. (Stalin, 1937, pp. 60–61)

In early March, 1937, Stalin was speaking up strongly against any kind of "witch hunt" atmosphere against Trotskyists while at the same time warning his audience about the danger of Trotskyists as spies and saboteurs—a danger reinforced by the defendants' testimony at the January 1937 trial.

A few months later this had all changed dramatically under the impact of two sets of events that Stalin and the Soviet leadership saw as linked both to one another and to the conspiracies admitted by the January 1937 trial defendants. The first of these was the May Days revolt in Barcelona. The Soviets had learned that agents of Franco, Hitler, and Trotsky were deeply implicated in it.

The second was the "Tukhachevsky Affair." This was the investigation, arrest, interrogation, trial, and execution of eight top-ranking Soviet military commanders who confessed to conspiracy against the Soviet Union in alliance with Hitler's Germany and with Trotsky.

3 | The Barcelona May Days Revolt

In early May, 1937, an armed revolt against the Catalanian republican government broke out, led by anarchists and by the POUM (Partido Obrero de Unificación Marxista). The POUM is briefly and accurately described by John Costello and Oleg Tsarev:

... the revolutionary Catalanian group of Marxists who had declared war on Stalin, accusing the Soviet dictator of betraying the Revolution by establishing "the bureaucratic regime of a poisoned traitor." Urged on by their leader Andrés Nin, the radical Spanish Marxists invited Trotsky to live in Barcelona, proclaiming the need to bring down the "bourgeois democracy" of the Communist-backed Popular Front administration of the Spanish Republic. (Costello & Tsarev, 1993, p. 280)⁸

⁸ The phrases "the bureaucratic regime of a poisoned traitor" and "bourgeois democracy" are taken from Thomas, 1961, p. 382, who cites the POUM newspaper The Spanish Revolution of February 3, 1937.

One of the leaders of the POUM was Andres Nin, a former secretary of Trotsky's.⁹ Nin had publicly "capitulated"—broken with Trotsky. However, the Soviets would have been foolish to believe that this apparent break was sincere or complete. The late Pierre Broué, the most prominent Trotskyist historian of his day, pointed out that Nin himself considered the "capitulations" of all other Trotskyists to be false. Broué wrote:

Lev Sedov called the Smirnov group either the "former capitulators" or the "Trotskyite capitulators." Everybody had known, from 1929 on, that people in the Smirnov group had not really capitulated but were trying to fool the apparatus, and were capable of organizing themselves as an Opposition within the party: the fact was so universally known that Andrés Nin, the Spaniard deported from the Soviet Union in August 1930, explained it openly to his German comrades of Die permanente Revolution who printed his declaration without apparent problem. (Broué, 1990, p. 104)¹⁰

⁹ "Secretary" here means "member of the secretariat," i.e., close political assistant.

¹⁰ In a subsequent article, Broué corrected the journal reference where Nin made this revelation: it was "Die Lage der russischen Arbeiterklasse," Der Kommunist 12 (beginning of November) 1930. See Broué (1997), p. 44.

American researcher Arch Getty found documentary evidence in the Harvard Trotsky Archive that Trotsky's loudly proclaimed breaks with Radek, Sokol'nikov, and Preobrazhensky were ploys to disguise continued secret conspiracy with them. The Soviets would naturally have suspected that Nin's break with Trotsky too was a cover for continued collaboration.

4 | The POUM and Trotsky

The POUM was not technically a Trotskyist party. However, it was associated closely enough with Trotsky and Trotskyists that many would deem it such.

- The POUM had been formed from a Trotskyist group and the "Bloc Obrer i Camperol" affiliated with the Right opposition.
- The POUM newspaper La Batalla condemned the first Moscow Trial of August 1936:

We are revolutionary socialists, Marxists. In the name of socialism and the revolutionary working class, we protest against the monstrous crime that has just been perpetrated in Moscow.

The description of the first Moscow trial as "the monstrous crime" signaled that the POUM leaders took their analysis directly from Trotsky.

- La Batalla also praised Trotsky alongside Lenin, pointedly ignoring Stalin.

Trotsky is for us, along with Lenin, one of the great figures of the October revolution and a great revolutionary socialist writer. Insulted, persecuted, we express our solidarity with him, without hiding, at the same time, our disagreement with some of his opinions. (Alba & Schwartz, 1988, p. 132)

- At Nin's urging, the POUM voted to invite Trotsky to come and live in Spain. According to Alba and Schwartz:

As early as August [1936] he [Nin] had proposed to the P.O.U.M. executive that, since Trotsky was in exile in Norway and had nowhere else to go, having been rejected by many countries, the P.O.U.M. should suggest to the Generalitat that he be offered asylum in Catalunya. ... [T]he executive accepted the suggestion ... (166)¹¹

¹¹ According to French Trotskyist René Dazy, Nin made this proposal to the Catalonian government (Generalitat) on December 7, 1936: "Le 7 décembre 1936, Andrèu Nin proposa en conseil des ministres de Catalogne d'accorder l'asile politique à Trotski." Dazy (1981), p. 177.

- While living in the USSR, Nin had been a supporter of Trotsky's and a member of the Left Opposition. After returning to Spain, Nin had been the key figure in the formation of the Spanish Trotskyist group, the Izquierda Comunista de España.
- The POUM's "self-defense" group killed the Soviet agent Narvich. (Alba & Schwartz, 1988, p. 234)¹²

¹² According to Landau's biographer Hans Schafranek, POUM leader Julián Gorkin admitted in 1983 that he had given the order for Narvich to be killed. See Schafranek (1988), 502 and 547 n. 400.

These facts may be found in Alba and Schwartz's book Spanish Marxism versus Soviet Communism. A History of the P.O.U.M. This is a very anti-Stalin work in which the authors take pains to criticize the communists and Soviets at every turn, and insist on the "non-Trotskyist" nature of the POUM.

However, POUM was "non-Trotskyist" in a formal sense only. If one can imagine a party such as described above and then substitute "Stalin" for "Trotsky," one can see that these are the kinds of characteristics that would have qualified a noncommunist Party as being "Stalinist" or a "Communist front." In the same way, the POUM could be characterized as "Trotskyist" or a "Trotskyist front."

According to Broué, Trotsky's supporters reported to him in 1936 that most POUM "militants" in Barcelona were in fact Trotskyists. (Broué, 1982, p. 77) No wonder, then, that Trotsky dispatched Erwin Wolf as his emissary to Spain.

Another reason for associating the POUM with Trotsky was its involvement in the Barcelona May Days in 1937. This revolt against the Republic during its war against the fascists was exactly what the Trotskyist defendants in the second Moscow Trial of January 1937 had admitted that they, together with the Germans and under Trotsky's leadership, had been planning in the event of an invasion of the USSR.

Pyatakov: About the end of 1935 Radek received a long letter-instructions from Trotsky ... the question of defeatism, of military wrecking activities, of inflicting telling blows during wartime both to the rear and to the army was here put point-blank ...

In the event of military attack the destructive forces of the Trotskyite organizations which would act within the country must be co-ordinated with the forces from without acting under the guidance of German fascism. The diversive and wrecking activity which is being conducted by the Trotskyite-Zinovievite organization within the Soviet Union must be carried out under the instructions of Trotsky, which are to be agreed upon with the German General Staff. (Report, 1937, pp. 55–56; 65)

We now know that German and Francoist agents were involved in instigating the May Days revolt along with the POUM and others. The Soviets and the Spanish communists knew it then.

5 | What Were Leading Trotskyists Doing in Spain?

A number of prominent Trotskyists went to Spain, including Erwin Wolf and Kurt Landau. Paul Preston is a contemporary and objective historian of the Spanish Civil War. Preston's account of Wolf's and Landau's disappearances is as follows:

In September 1937, Orlov managed to eliminate Erwin Wolff, who had become Trotsky's secretary in Norway. In 1936, Wolff played a key role in refuting the accusations made at the Moscow Trials and was a central figure in the International Secretariat which was the predecessor to the Fourth International [Trotsky's organization]. He came to Spain to work with Grandino Munis's Bolshevik-Leninist group. In Barcelona, he was arrested for subversive activity on 27 July 1937, released on the following day but immediately rearrested. He was officially released on 13 September but was never seen again.

Another prominent Trotskyist who disappeared ten days later was the Austrian Kurt Landau. A one-time collaborator of Trotsky, Landau had a long history of anti-Stalinist militancy in Austria, Germany, France and Spain ... In Spain, he worked closely with Andreu Nin and conducted liaison between the POUM and foreign journalists and writers ... He had outraged the Soviets with his pamphlet Spain 1936, Germany 1918, published in December 1936, which compared the crushing of the revolutionary workers of Germany by the Freikorps in 1918 to Stalinist hostility to the CNT and the POUM in Spain. In consequence, he had been smeared by Soviet propaganda as 'the leader of a band of terrorists' and the liaison agent between the Gestapo and the POUM. Kurt Landau managed to remain at liberty until 23 September 1937 when he was abducted by Soviet agents from his hiding place. Like Rein¹³ and Wolff he was never seen again. (Preston, 2012, pp. 418–419)

¹³ "Rein" was Mark Rein, son of a prominent anti-Bolshevik Menshevik. Rein "had come to Spain as correspondent for several anti-Stalinist publications including the New York Jewish daily Forward. On April 9, 1937, he left the hotel Continental in Barcelona and was never seen again." (Preston. 2012, 407) Rein was a dedicated anticommunist. His murder, though, was separate from the fate of the three Trotskyists Wolf, Landau, and Nin.

Landau had publicly broken with Trotsky. However, Nin had written that such declarations by former Oppositionists were phony. During the Moscow Trials, Radek, Piatakov, Khristian Rakovsky, and others confirmed this. The Soviets would have considered Landau's public break with Trotsky to be phony as well.

Landau's writings show that he had remained under the strong influence of Trotsky's ideas and writings ideologically and politically.¹⁴ Landau's biographer Hans Schafranek shows that Landau went to Spain to support Trotskyist and other similar forces, mainly the POUM, in an attempt to make a revolution against the Republican government. Erwin Wolf went to Spain as the emissary of the International Secretariat of the IV International, Trotsky's organization, and therefore as Trotsky's own emissary. Wolf and Landau knew that the Soviets considered Trotsky a fascist collaborator and therefore would regard them in the same light.

¹⁴ At least one document in the Harvard Trotsky Archive proves that Landau remained in written communication with Trotsky as late as 1936–1937.

6 | Prior Knowledge of the Planned Revolt

Costello and Tsarev had privileged access to the reports sent to Moscow by Alexander Orlov, the chief of the Soviet NKVD in the Spanish Republic.¹⁵ Costello and Tsarev summarize a part of one of Orlov's reports as follows:

Orlov's agents had already penetrated the leadership of the Federation of Spanish Anarchists and the POUM. His plants reported back to NKVD headquarters on the preparations the two groups were making for an armed insurrection. This was nothing new or surprising to Orlov ... After a visit to Barcelona he reported to Moscow in December 1936 "that a militant uprising is being prepared by Trotskyists (POUM) in Barcelona for the beginning of January for the purpose of active penetration into the exposed Fascist organization at the Hispano Suiza plant." (Costello & Tsarev, 1993, p. 281)

¹⁵ These files were subsequently reclassified, so Costello and Tsarev's is the only account we have of the contents of Orlov's reports. We can check what Costello and Tsarev quoted from other files. The Volkogonov Archive in the Library of Congress contains photocopies of the originals of some of Mark Zborowski's reports to his NKVD handlers about Leon Sedov. The texts of those documents in Costello and Tsarev's book correspond exactly with these originals. It is reasonable to assume that they also copied accurately from other Soviet files.

In a report dated February 22, 1937, Orlov wrote:

For some time there has been an association between POUM and the Federation of Spanish Anarchists taking shape which is directed at anti-Soviet activity associated with the latest Trotskyist trial. (Costello & Tsarev, 1993, p. 469 n. 41)

This is a reference to the Second Moscow Trial of January 1937, during which Karl Radek had warned the Trotskyists in Spain to stand down. Costello and Tsarev link this planned uprising with the one reported by Schulze-Boysen:

This was the same insurrection independently reported to the Centre by the Soviet embassy in Berlin after receiving an anonymous tip-off from their agent Harro Schulze-Boysen. From contacts on the Luftwaffe General Staff he revealed that German agents had also infiltrated Trotskyists circles in Barcelona with the intention of encouraging their putsch. (Costello & Tsarev, 1993, p. 281)

In a report to Moscow dated March 1937, Orlov specifies NKVD intelligence concerning some of the anticommunist activity being planned by the POUM:

At present a number of people for terrorist work have been confirmed by the Committee [Central Committee of POUM]. The control of the POUM youth organization has been assigned to first Tedor Sans, second Mendez, third another head of the organization called Lorenzo. All these are experienced in terrorist activity and have participated in various armed raids. ... It was established that Blanco's group [a member of the directorate of the POUM youth organization] was preparing a terrorist act against the former Komsomol [Communist youth organization] secretary of the town of Cordova, Ramon Gorrero, and failed to accomplish it only because Blanco was killed at the front. (Costello & Tsarev, 1993, p. 469 n.42)

When the revolt finally broke out in May 1937, Orlov reported to Moscow that it had been long in the planning.

It has long been known that FAP [Fascists Anarchists POUMists] are preparing for a putsch in Catalonia by provoking it using a variety of means. (Costello & Tsarev, 1993, p. 281)

The Spanish communists and Soviet NKVD would certainly have interpreted the presence of leading Trotskyists like Wolf and Landau as additional evidence that the May Days uprising had been planned in advance and that Trotskyists were in on the planning.¹⁶

¹⁶ It is significant that neither Wolff nor Landau was arrested and "disappeared" until after the May Days uprising.

7 | Andrés Nin

Nin and Trotsky had exchanged sharp words over Nin's strategy as a founder and leader of the POUM. However, so had Trotsky and Radek, among others, and Nin had claimed in 1930 that such a public falling out was a cover for continued collaboration. Nin remained loyal to Trotsky's interpretation of the Soviet Union, Stalin, the Soviet role in Spain, and loyal to Trotsky personally as well. The Soviets would have naturally assumed that Nin was still a Trotskyist agent.

Paul Preston's is the most recent and most objective account of these events. According to Preston, Nin and other members of the POUM executive were arrested on June 16, 1937, in Barcelona. Nin was interrogated four times but did not make any confession to conspiracy with the fascists. When Nin refused to confess and so was useless for a trial, Alexander Orlov, head of the NKVD in Spain, decided to kill him. He was shot, evidently on July 24.¹⁷ (Preston, 2012, p. 417; Costello & Tsarev, 1993, pp. 291, 470)

¹⁷ Preston believes that Nin was not tortured.

8 | The Tukhachevsky Affair

After the May Days revolt but before the arrest and subsequent assassination of Nin came the "Tukhachevsky Affair" in the USSR. Marshal Tukhachevsky and other high-ranking officers admitted to plotting with the Germans to instigate a civil war within the USSR on the event of a German attack. Tukhachevsky also confessed to giving Red Army operational plans to the Germans.

At the same time as Tukhachevsky and others were confessing, both Genrikh Iagoda, former head of the NKVD, and Nikolai Bukharin confessed to similar involvement with Trotsky in conspiring to overthrow the Soviet government.¹⁸ They also admitted to conspiring with the Germans to instigate a civil war within the USSR¹⁹ —essentially what the rebels had actually done in the May Days revolt.

¹⁸ Iagoda's confessions about Trotsky are in Iagoda (1997). Bukharin's confession is discussed later in the present essay.

¹⁹ I use the word "conspiring" here, because Bukharin claimed that he never actually met with Trotsky or Germans, but insisted that he was involved with others who did.

It was logical for the Soviets to assume that the POUM were Trotskyists not only in their support for Trotsky and opposition to the communists (= "Stalinists", to them), but also in their determination to stab the Republic in the back during wartime just as the Trotskyists, military figures, and Rightists like Bukharin had admitted they were planning to do within the Soviet Union.

At an enlarged session of the Military Soviet, held from June 1 to 4 to discuss the Tukhachevsky conspiracy, Stalin stated that Tukhachevsky and the rest had "tried to make out of the USSR another Spain."²⁰ Stalin was referring to Piatakov's and Radek's descriptions of Trotsky's plan to sabotage the Red Army in the event of an invasion by one or more imperialist powers. He meant: create a civil war—do what the POUM, the Trotskyists, and others had done in the May Days in Barcelona. The Barcelona revolt appeared to be exactly the kind of "stab in the back" in wartime that the 1937 Trial defendants had confessed to planning, at Trotsky's behest, against the USSR in the case of war with Germany and/or Japan.

²⁰ Stalin (1996) [1937], 115. Original in Khaustov & et al. (2004), p. 206; Stalin (n.d.) vol. 14, at <http://www.hrono.ru/libris/stalin/14-5.html>

Today, we have a large amount of evidence that Tukhachevsky and the other military leaders tried, convicted, and executed with him were indeed guilty. On June 1, 1937, Marshal Mikhail Tukhachevsky wrote out by hand a lengthy statement in which he admitted to conspiring against the Soviet Union with the German General Staff. Tukhachevsky stated that the commanders discussed their planned revolt with Trotsky.

In 1932, on more than one occasion, I talked to Feld'man, criticizing the army's leadership and the policies of the Party. Feld'man expressed great misgivings about the policies of the Party in relation to the countryside. I told him that this should warn us, military workers, to be on our guard and suggested to him to organize a military group, sharing the views of the Rightists, which would be able to discuss these matters and take the necessary steps.

Feld'man agreed and thus was begun the creation of the anti-Soviet military Trotskyist conspiracy. I told Feld'man that I already had established links with Enukidze, who represented the leadership of the Rightists.

Upon the return from the Far East of Putna and Gorbachev — I think this was in 1933 — I had talked separately with them both. Putna quickly admitted that he was already in contact with Trotsky and with Smirnov. I suggested to him to join the ranks of the military-Trotskyite conspiracy, telling him that I had direct instructions of Trotsky. Putna immediately agreed. Later, following his appointment as military attaché, he was asked to maintain the link between Trotsky and the center of the anti-Soviet military-Trotskyite conspiracy.

If I am not mistaken, also around about this time, I talked to Smirnov, I.N.,²¹ who told me that he, by order of Trotsky, was attempting to disorganize the preparations for the mobilization of industry in the area of shells.

Round about this time, 1933/1934, Romm visited me in Moscow and told me that he had to pass on Trotsky's new instructions. Trotsky pointed out that it was no longer feasible to restrict our activities to simply recruiting and organizing cadres, ... that German Fascism would render the Trotskyists assistance in their struggle with Stalin's leadership and that the military conspiracy must supply the German General Staff with intelligence data, as well as working hand in glove with the Japanese General Staff, carrying out disruptive activities in the army, prepare diversions and terrorist acts against members of the government. These instructions of Trotsky I communicated to the center of our conspiracy.

I recruited Eideman in 1932. On receiving instructions from Trotsky about wrecking activities, spying diversionary activities, Eideman asked that he be given instructions about his activity in Osoaviakhim.

During the winter of 1935/1936, Pyatakov told me that Trotsky had now asked us to ensure the [future] defeat of the USSR in war, even if this meant giving the Ukraine to the Germans and the Primor'ye to the Japanese ... Pyatakov stated that Trotsky would carry out a decisive struggle to plant his people in the Comintern. Pyatakov stated that such conditions would mean the restoration of capitalism in the country.

As we received Trotsky's instructions on unleashing a campaign of sabotage activity, espionage, diversionary and terrorist activity, the center of the conspiracy ... issued various instructions to the members of the conspiracy, based on Trotsky's directives.

The center of the anti-Soviet military Trotskyite conspiracy carried out all its wrecking activity and diversionary work exclusively according to a chain of command, within the existing organs of administration within the RKKA ...

Yakir put forward the question about whether, or not, it was not more correct for the center of the anti-Soviet military Trotskyite center to unite with the Rightists or the Trotskyists.

In the autumn of 1935, Putna came to my office and handed over a note from Sedov, in Trotsky's name, insisting that I more energetically attract Trotskyite cadres to the military conspiracy ... In addition, Putna told me that Trotsky had established direct links with Hitler's government and the General Staff, and that the center of the anti-Soviet military Trotskyite conspiracy should task itself to prepare defeats on those fronts where the German Army would operate.

At the end of January 1936 I had to travel to London to attend the funeral of the British King. During the funeral procession, first by foot and then on the train, General Rundstedt — the head of the German government's military delegation — spoke to me. It was obvious that the German General Staff had already been informed by Trotsky.

As I have already pointed out in the first section, during the strategic military exercises carried out in April 1936, on the question of the operational position of our armies, I exchanged opinions with Yakir and Uborevich. Taking into account Trotsky's directive to prepare for defeat on that front where the Germans would attack ... I proposed to Yakir to make the German task easier by diversionary-wrecking tactics ...²²

²¹ Trotsky and Sedov identified Ivan Nikitich Smirnov as the leader of the clandestine Trotskyists inside the USSR (Broué, 1980; Broué, 1997).

²² The only published confessions of Tukhachevsky are in Molodaia Gvardiia 9 (1994), 129–135 and 10 (1994), 255–266. They are online, as one text, at the very useful Russian "Historical Materials" site <http://istmat.info/node/28950>. For the reader's convenience, I have cited the partial English translation in Main (1997). The first part of Tukhachevsky's confessions are dated June 1, 1937; the second part have no date, at least in the published version, but may have come one or several days later.

Neither Steven J. Main, who translated and published this statement of Tukhachevsky's, nor anyone else has any evidence that Tukhachevsky's confessions were not genuine. However, it is not acceptable, not "politically correct," to use these confessions as evidence, because a real German and Trotskyist conspiracy, moreover one that included the Tukhachevsky Affair defendants, would threaten to dismantle the "anti-Stalin paradigm," the false notion that Stalin "framed" all the defendants. This paradigm is virtually sacrosanct in Trotskyist and anticommunist historiography.

9 | Nikolai Bukharin's Confession Accusing Trotsky

On June 2, 1937, one day after Tukhachevsky made these admissions, Nikolai Bukharin, who had been imprisoned since the end of February 1937, also confessed to knowledge of Trotsky's work with the Germans.

I spoke with PYATAKOV and TOMSKY and RYKOV with SOKOL'NIKOV AND KAMENEV. I had a conversation with PYATAKOV in the People's Commissariat of Heavy Industry (approximately the summer of 1932). It began with an exchange of opinions concerning the overall position in the country. PYATAKOV informed me about his meeting in Berlin with SEDOV about the fact that TROTSKY was insisting on a transition to terrorist methods of struggle against the Stalin leadership and on the necessity of consolidating all anti-Soviet forces in the struggle for the overthrow of the "Stalinist bureaucracy." ... PYATAKOV hinted at terror but was very skeptical about this method of struggle, considering it to be a specific outgrowth of Trotsky's fury and bitterness, with little political rationale ...

In the summer of 1934 I was at RADEK'S apartment when RADEK informed me about Trotsky's international-political directives. RADEK said that Trotsky, insisting on terror, all the same considered that the basic chance of the bloc's coming to power was the defeat of the USSR in the war with German and Japan, and in this connection set forth the idea of an agreement with German and Japan at the cost of territorial concessions (the Ukraine to the Germans, the Far East to the Japanese). I did not protest against the idea of an agreement with Germany and Japan, but did not agree with Trotsky as far as the nature and extent of the concessions ... I insisted that Trotsky's impetuosity could lead to completely compromising his organizations, and so the organizations of all Trotsky's allies, including the Rights ...

In the summer of 1935 I was sitting on the veranda at Radek's dacha when all of a sudden three Germans drove up in a car. RADEK recommended me to them as German fascist professors ... Afterwards RADEK told me that one of the Germans was BAUM, and that he had had dealings with him before, on instructions from Trotsky, that he, RADEK, had informed BAUM about the Trotskyite-Zinovievite bloc and about the Rights, but that he did not want to converse with BAUM in the presence of other persons ...

I remember one more important conversation in which RADEK hinted that he had received some sort of new directives from Trotsky concerning both internal and foreign politics. I remember that I was upset in general by way Trotsky issued orders of various kinds, to which the Trotskyites related as though they were the military commands of a general. RADEK hinted to me that it was a question of some kind of new negotiations of Trotsky's with Germany or England, but limited himself to telling about Trotsky's directives about sabotage ...

Besides these ... conversations there were shorter and more accidental meetings where we briefly exchanged views. From these the most important examples were the following:

1. RADEK informed me that TROTSKY was always insisting on terror ...²³

²³ Bukharin (1937). For an edition and scholarly examination of Bukharin's first confession, see Furr & Bobrov (2007).

We can be reasonably sure that Bukharin was telling the truth. Bukharin spent most of his testimony during the March 1938 Third Moscow Trial denying certain accusations leveled at him by the prosecution—something he would never have done if, for example, his family had been threatened. Yet Bukharin affirmed his participation in the Right-Trotskyist bloc and the confessions outlined above. Stephen F. Cohen, a world authority on and champion of Bukharin, concluded in 2003 that Bukharin was not tortured.²⁴

²⁴ Koen (2003), 60–61. For a detailed discussion, see Bobrov & Furr (2010).

We now possess a great deal of evidence confirming the reality of the military-Trotskyist conspiracy, including its collusion with the German General Staff. To take two examples:

- In 2012, Vladimir Bobrov and I published Marshal Semion Budyonny's letter to Marshal Voroshilov of June 26, 1937. In it, Budyonny, one of the panel of judges at the trial of Tukhachevsky and the seven other commanders on June 11, 1937, outlined the

- confessions at the trial, including the defendants' admissions to collaboration with Trotsky and the Germans. (Furr & Bobrov, 2012)
- In May 2018, Russian authorities declassified the 172-page official transcript of the Tukhachevsky Trial. In their testimony, all of the defendants confess their guilt. Among many other things, Vitalii Primakov, one of the defendants, confessed that Trotsky had assigned him, Primakov, to raise an armed uprising in Leningrad in the event of war. Tukhachevsky and Vitovt Putna confessed to being allied in their conspiracy with the Nazis and with Trotsky.²⁵

²⁵ More discussion of Budyonny's letter may be found in Chapter 9 of Furr (2015).

The accused implicated Trotsky many times during their testimony. They confirmed the existence of the bloc of oppositionists, including the Trotskyists. We know that this bloc existed from Trotsky's and Sedov's own letters, found in the Harvard Trotsky Archive by Pierre Broué and his team of researchers. (Broué, 1980)

10 | The Moscow Trials Were Not "Frame-Ups"

The POUM repeated Trotsky's line that the Moscow Trials were frame-ups of innocent men. Trotsky claimed that the defendants at the Moscow Trials, Tukhachevsky, and Bukharin were tortured, and their confessions were fabricated and false. This line was picked up by Khrushchev, Gorbachev, and Cold War anticommunists, who repeat it to this day.

However, there never has been any evidence to support this view. On the contrary, we now have a great deal of evidence that corroborates the Moscow Trials testimony, including the discovery that Trotsky lied about them. This evidence shows that the defendants at the Moscow Trials testified what they chose to testify and were not "forced" by the NKVD or prosecution.²⁶ Therefore, there are no rational grounds not to accept the confessions of the defendants at these trials as evidence. The only grounds for rejecting them are political bias.

²⁶ In Furr (2015) and Furr (2018), I have carefully verified those statements in Moscow Trials confessions that can be independently checked.

Viewed in its historical context, the sudden and unexpected Soviet and Communist campaign against Trotskyists makes sense. Sudoplatov's account shows that the Soviets had evidence of Trotskyist and German involvement in the instigation of the "Barcelona May Days" revolt. Faupel's letter shows that the German ambassador believed that Franco's agents were also involved. The statement of the German Military Court shows that the German secret service was involved in instigating the revolt and that the communists learned of this through the bold actions of communist agents von Pöllnitz and Schulze-Boysen.

The POUM acted like a Trotskyist party. The rebels appeared to be doing precisely what the Trotskyists had confessed that they had long been planning to do in the USSR: revolt against the government in wartime so as to guarantee its defeat. The Trotskyist defendants had said that Trotsky had some kind of understanding with the Germans (as well as with the Japanese). In addition, we now have conclusive evidence confirming Trotsky's collaboration with the Germans and Japanese.

This is the context in which the kidnapping, interrogation, and murder of Nin took place. It is logical to assume that the NKVD and Spanish communists kidnapped Nin to find out what he knew about Nazi/Francoist/POUM collaboration, and whether this had been due to Nazi infiltration or whether it was part of Trotsky's own collaboration with German intelligence.

11 | Erwin Wolf

One of Leon Trotsky's closest and most trusted aides, Erwin Wolf came to Spain directly from Trotsky, who had moved to Norway. Georges Vereeken says that Wolf was going to Spain not to fight but as a representative of the "International Secretariat," Trotsky's political movement. (Vereeken, 1976, p. 171). Wolf was Trotsky's liaison to the Trotskyists in Spain, including to Andres Nin, with whom he worked closely. Boris Volodarsky writes:

In the second half of July [1937], shortly after the arrest of the POUM leadership, Moulin (Hans Freund) set up a meeting in which he invited several prominent Trotskyists who were still at large ... Those present at the meeting were Erwin Wolf, who was in Spain under his own name, posing as a foreign correspondent for several British newspapers, Wolf's wife, and a Spaniard whom Thalmann [Paul Thalmann, a Swiss Trotskyist] calls 'Munez' in his memoirs, 'a real leader of the Spanish Trotskyists.'²⁷ This was quite certainly Grandiso Munis. The agenda of the urgent meeting was to discuss the political situation and chances for a revolutionary uprising after the May Days and following arrests. (Volodarsky, 2015, pp. 263–264)

²⁷ The reference here is to Thalmann (1974), p. 198.

After Wolf and his wife were arrested trying to leave Spain, they were detained in two different places. According to Volodarsky, Thalmann noted that when he himself was arrested "his investigators always ask[ed] the same questions: when was he last in Germany? When did he meet Trotsky in Norway? Where was the Trotskyite Moulin?" (Volodarsky, 2015, p. 265).

Released, rearrested, released again, and rearrested again, Wolf was ultimately released by the Spanish police on September 13, 1937, and immediately abducted, Boris Volodarsky assumes, by persons who were acting for "Moscow," i.e., the NKVD in Spain under the command of Alexander Orlov (266).

12 | Kurt Landau

In April 1930, Landau had been one of the founding members of Trotsky's "International Bureau." According to his wife Katia, Landau believed Trotsky's version of the 1936 Moscow Trial, as she did. Thanks to Pierre Broué's discovery in the Harvard Trotsky Archive, we know that Trotsky was lying. Trotsky and his Soviet-based supporters had indeed been in a clandestine political "bloc" with Zinovievists, Rights, and other oppositionists. (Broué, 1980)

Landau had supposedly broken with Trotsky in 1931. However, his determination to defend the defendants of the 1936 Moscow Trial is what one would expect of a Trotskyist. The Soviets would have suspected that Landau and Trotsky had staged a phony falling-out and exchanged insults as a smokescreen much as Karl Radek and Yuri Piatakov had done.

Landau moved to Catalonia in November 1936 with Katia. There he "rapidly won substantial influence with the leaders of the POUM which he joined." (Volodarsky, 2015, p. 273) According to Hans Schafranek and Pierre Broué, Landau clearly worked closely with Nin.

[Landau] contributed to La Batalla, [the POUM newspaper] and coordinated the POUM's international relations, especially in connection with the preparation of the international conference in Barcelona being planned by the POUM leadership. He still envisaged "a new Zimmerwald" of which the POUM would be the axis. (Broué, 2008; Schafranek, 1980, p. 80, 85, 86 n.112)

13 | A New Bolshevik Revolution?

Both Wolf and Landau regarded the May Days revolt as the prelude to a Bolshevik-type Revolution. Landau wrote that the goal was to overthrow the bourgeois Spanish Republic, which he called "the democratic counter-revolution." (Schafranek, 1988, p. 475) The Trotskyists saw the Spanish Republic through the lens of the 1917 revolution, with the socialist Republican government like the socialist Kerensky, the Spanish and Soviet communists like the Mensheviks, and themselves as the true Leninists, or Bolsheviks. They even formed a "provisional government" on May 5. (471)

At the POUM trial of October 1938, Nin and Landau were accused of being Gestapo agents. (Volodarsky, 2015, p. 278) The Trotskyists in the Second (January, 1937) and Third (March, 1938) Moscow Trials had confessed that Trotsky was collaborating with the Germans. So had the Tukhachevsky Affair defendants of May–June 1937. It was logical that the Soviets and communists generally would have suspected that Nin and Landau, in working for Trotsky, were German agents too.

14 | Trotsky and the Assassinations of Nin, Wolf, and Landau

The Soviets knew what Trotsky was doing. They knew that the Moscow Trials defendants were guilty of at least what they had confessed to. However, Trotsky publicly denied this, and the Trotskyists believed him. They did not know that it was not Stalin but Trotsky who was lying, in defense of his conspiracy.

The evidence that Trotsky lied demands that we reject the conventional understanding of the repression of Trotskyists in Spain. The Soviet attack on the Trotskyists was neither paranoid nor criminal. The Soviets had no way of knowing how much of Trotsky's conspiratorial activities Wolf, Nin, and others knew about. Wolf had come to Spain directly from Trotsky in Norway, presumably with Trotsky's instructions. It would have been only prudent for the Soviets to assume that Nin and Landau had done so as well.

We do not know whether Nin, Wolf, and Landau knew of Trotsky's collaboration with the Germans. During their secret meeting in Norway in December 1935, Trotsky made it clear to Piatakov that his real plans must be kept secret from his followers. However, the Soviets would have assumed that they were doing Trotsky's bidding. That was enough to make them German agents in the eyes of the Soviets.

It was Trotsky, not Stalin, who doomed these men. Nin, Wolf, and Landau went to Spain either as Trotsky's direct representatives—Wolf certainly, Nin probably, Landau possibly as well—or to help with the Trotskyist agenda to undermine Soviet and Spanish Republican policy in the hope of leading a revolution against the Spanish Republican government.

Did Nin, Wolf, and Landau know that Trotsky was lying to the world as, for example, Radek and Piatakov did? Lilia Estrina, one of the closest associates of Leon Sedov, Trotsky's son and chief political assistant, told Pierre Broué that none of Sedov's assistants knew about Trotsky's contacts inside the USSR, and that only Sedov and Trotsky knew these details. (Furr, 2015, pp. 75–76) As far as we know, only Trotsky's closest co-conspirators inside the USSR knew about the collusion with Germany and Japan. Of course, after the January 1937 Moscow Trial, the world knew too. However, Trotsky's followers outside the USSR chose to believe Trotsky's denials.

Landau believed Trotsky's claims that the charges against the 1936 Moscow Trials defendants were false. It is possible that Wolf knew more, since he worked directly with Trotsky. Nevertheless, it seems unlikely that Nin, Wolf, or Landau knew the truth about Trotsky's collaboration with fascists inside the Soviet Union and with Germany and Japan. Their actions suggest that they believed this was a cynical and slanderous charge. But the Soviet NKVD knew these charges were true.

Trotsky's political fortune rested entirely upon his credibility as a principled Leninist. His political followers believed that Trotsky was honest and truthful, and that it was Stalin and his regime who were the falsifiers.

Today we can prove that many of the accusations made against Trotsky in the Moscow Trials were true. If this had been generally known at the time, many of Trotsky's followers would have abandoned him. Trotsky knew this. In his statement of December 19–20, 1936, to then-NKVD chief Nikolai Ezhov, Yuri Piatakov described what Trotsky told him during their secret meeting in Norway in December 1935:

... that not everything that he was going to say should be reported to his followers in the U.S.S.R. He mentioned once again the difference between the preparation of a coup d'état and a mass uprising and in this connection much of what he was about to say must not only not be made public (and therefore I should not be surprised that much of it will contradict what is said in his 'Bulletins'), but also must not be made known to wider circles of his supporters in the U.S.S.R.²⁸ (TsA FSB 1936-1937, LD 264)

²⁸ My thanks to Vladimir L. Bobrov of Moscow for obtaining this important part of Piatakov's investigation file.

The Soviets knew that Wolf was Trotsky's representative in Spain. They either knew or assumed that Nin and Landau were Trotsky's representatives too. It was reasonable to believe that they or others like them were in touch with the Germans when they joined the "May Days" rebellion.

The Soviets and Spanish communists are sometimes condemned for assassinating these Trotskyists and for forging documents to incriminate the POUM. But the World War 2 Allies believed it was no crime in wartime to assassinate German agents and forge phony documents to incriminate them. These and more drastic measures were widely employed against Germany.

Would Nin, Wolf, or Landau have gone to Spain if they had known what we know today about Trotsky's lies and conspiracies? It is possible that they would not have adhered to Trotsky's cause at all. But they believed Trotsky, and paid for this with their lives.

ORCID

Grover C. Furr (ID) <https://orcid.org/0000-0002-1529-5222>

References

Alba, V., & Schwartz, S. (1988). Spanish Marxism versus Soviet Communism. A history of the P.O.U.M (p. 1988). New Brunswick, NJ and Oxford, England: Transaction Books.

Bobrov, V. L., & Furr, G. (2010) "Stephen Cohen's Biography of Bukharin: A Study in the Falsehood of Khrushchev-Era 'Revelations.'" Cultural Logic 2010. Retrieved from <https://ojs.library.ubc.ca/index.php/clogic/article/view/191531/188643>.

Broué, P. (1980). Trotsky et le bloc des oppositions de 1932. Cahiers Léon Trotsky, 5 (January-March), 5–37.

Broué, P. (1982). La mission de Wolf en Espagne. Cahiers Léon Trotsky, 10 (June), 75–84.

Broué, P. (1990). Party opposition to Stalin (1930-1932) and the first Moscow trial. In J. W. Strong (Ed.), Essays on revolutionary culture and Stalinism. Selected papers from the Third World Congress for Soviet and East European studies. Columbus, OH: Slavica Publishers.

Broué, P. (1997). Ivan Nikitich Smirnov. Une conscience communiste (1881 — 1936). Cahiers Léon Trotsky, 60 (November), 35–56.

Broué, P. (2008). Kurt Landau. Revolutionary History, 9(4), 229–236
Retrieved from
<https://www.marxists.org/archive/broue/1988/xx/landau.html>

Bryson, S. B. (2000). Resisting Hitler: Mildred Harnack and the Red Orchestra. Oxford, England: Oxford University Press.

Bukharin, Nikolai I. 1937. "Lichnye Pokazaniia N. Bukharina" ("Personal Confessions of N. Bukharin"), June 2, 1937. Volkogonov Papers, Library of Congress.

Costello, J., & Tsarev, O. (1993). Deadly illusions. NY: Crown.

Dazy, R. (1981). Fusillez ces chiens enragés ... le genocide des trotskistes. Paris: Olivier Orban.

Craig, G. A. (1951). Documents on German Foreign Policy 1918–1945. Series D (1937–1945). Volume III. Germany and the Spanish Civil War 1936–1939. London: His Majesty's Stationery Office.

Furr, Grover., & Bobrov, V. (2007). "Pervye Priznatel'nye Pokazaniia N.I. Bukharina na Lubianke" ["N.I. Bukharin's First Confessions from the Lubianka"], Klio (St. Petersburg), 38–51. Retrieved from https://msuweb.montclair.edu/~furr/research/furrnbobrov_bukharin_klio07.pdf; English translation at <https://ojs.library.ubc.ca/index.php/clogic/article/view/191531/188643>.

Furr, G., & Bobrov, V. L. (2012). Marshal S.M. Budiennyi on the Tukhachevsky trial. Impressions of an eye-witness (in Russian). Klio, 2(2012), 8–24.

Furr, G. (2015). Trotsky's "Amalgams": Trotsky's lies, The Moscow trials as evidence, The Dewey Commission. Trotsky's conspiracies of the 1930s (Vol. 1). Kettering, OH: Erythrós Press & Media, LLC.

Furr, G. (2017). Leon Trotsky's collaboration with Germany and Japan: Trotsky's conspiracies of the 1930s, volume two. Kettering, OH: Erythrós Press & Media, LLC.

Furr, G. (2018). The Moscow trials as evidence (p. 2018). New York: Red Star Publishers.

Furr, G. (2019). Trotsky's Lies. Kettering, OH: Erythrós Press & Media, LLC.

Getty, J. A. (1986). Trotsky in exile: The founding of the fourth international. Soviet Studies, 38(1), 24–35.

Haase, N. (1993). Das Reichskriegsgericht und der Widerstand gegen die nationalsozialistische Herrschaft. Berlin: Druckerei der Justizvollzugsanstalt/Tegel.

Iagoda, G. S. (1997). Genrikh Iagoda. Narkom vnutrennikh del SSSR. General'niy Komisar Gosudarstvennoi Bezopasnosti. Sbornik Dokumentov. Kazan'.

Khaustov, V. N., et al. (Eds.). (2004). Lubianka. Stalin i Glavnoe Upravlenie Gosbezopasnosti NKVD 1937-1938. Moscow: Materik.

Koen, S. (2003). (Stephen Cohen), Bukharin na Lubianke. Svobodnaia Mysl, 22(3), 58–64.

Main, S. J. (1997). The arrest and 'testimony' of marshal of the Soviet Union M.N. Tukhachevsky (May — June 1937). Journal of Slavic Military Studies, 10(1), 151–195.

Perrault, G. (1969). The red orchestra. New York: Simon & Schuster.

Preston, P. (2012). The Spanish holocaust. Inquisition and extermination in twentieth-century Spain. New York & London: W.W. Norton.

Protsess. (1937). Protsess antisovetskogo trotsistskogo tsentra 23–30 ianvaria 1937 goda. Moskva: IURidicheskoe izdatel'stvo.

Report. (1937). Report of court proceedings in the case of the anti-soviet Trotskyite Centre. Moscow: People's Commissariat of Justice of the USSR.

Schafranek, H. (1980). Kurt Landau. Cahiers Léon Trotsky, 5, 71–95.

Schafranek, H. (1988). Das Kurze Leben des Kurt Landau. Vienna: Verlag für Gesellschaftskritik.

Stalin, J. V. (1937). Mastering bolshevism. NY: Workers Library Publishers Retrieved from <http://www.marx2mao.com/Stalin/MB37.html>

Stalin, J. V. (1996). Speech by J.V. Stalin at the Ministry of Defense. In Secret Documents. Toronto, CA, Northstar Compass.

Stalin, J. V. Sochineniia [Collected Works]. n.d., vol. 14. Retrieved from <http://www.hrono.ru/libris/stalin/14-5.html>

Sudoplatov, P. (1997). Razvedka i Kreml' (the intelligence service and the kremlin). Moscow: TOO "Geia."

Thalmann, P. (1974). Wo die Freiheit Stirbt. In Stationen eines politischen Kampfes. Olten, Freiburg im Breisgau: Walter-Verlag.

Thomas, H. (1961). The Spanish Civil War. New York: Harper & Brothers.

TsA FSB. 1936–1937. [= Central Archive of the FSB, successor to the KGB-MGB-MVD-NKVD] P-33835, D [=delo, cae] № 3257 concerning the accusation against Piatakov Iurii Leonidovich et al, Tom [=volume] 1, L.D. [-list dela, page of the case file] 264. My thanks to Vladimir L. Bobrov of Moscow for obtaining this important part of Piatakov's investigation file.

Vereeken, G. (1976). The GPU in the Trotskyist Movement. Clapham: New Park Publications.

Vishliov, O. (2001). Nakanune 22 iunia 1941 goda. Dokumental'nye ocherki. Moscow: Nauka.

Volodarsky, B. (2015). Stalin's agent. The life and death of Alexander Orlov. London and New York: Oxford University Press.

Author Biography

Grover Furr, professor of literature at Montclair State University (Montclair, NJ, USA), is the author of many books and articles on the history of the USSR during the 1930s.

How to cite this article: Furr GC. Leon Trotsky and the Barcelona "May Days" of 1937. Labor and Society. 2019; 1–20.
<https://doi.org/10.1111/lands.12448>

Appendix: Chronology of the Barcelona May Day Revolt of 1937

May 2: Forces of the Republican Government attack the telephone exchange and the anarchists who were holding it.

May 3: Government forces retake the telephone exchange. Anarchists shoot at them. The POUM, the Trotskyists ("Bolshevik-Leninists"), and anarchists take out hidden weapons, hoarded instead of being sent to the front to fight the fascists, and build barricades. Civil war begins in Barcelona.

May 4: Anarchist and POUM units threaten to leave the front and to march on Barcelona and Madrid, but are dissuaded by appeals from their leaders or by threats of being bombed by Government forces.

May 5: Fighting continues, with deaths on both sides. A "provisional government" is formed by rebel leaders.

May 6: Government troops from Madrid and Valencia move toward Barcelona. Republican warships converge on the harbor. Government forces begin to disarm rebel groups.

May 7: The revolt ends, in Barcelona and in the nearby towns where it had also taken place, with the defeat of the Anarchist, POUM, and Trotskyist forces.

2020: The Katyn Massacre: A Re-examination in the Light of Recent Evidence

Cultural Logic: Marxist Theory & Practice

Volume 24 (2020), pp. 37-49

Grover Furr

Montclair State University

Abstract

In Socialism & Democracy, 27:2 (2013) I published an article about some important new discoveries concerning the events known collectively as the Katyn Massacre. The standard account of these mass murders, which I refer to in this paper as the official version, blames Joseph Stalin and his associates in the leadership of the USSR for them. In the present article I review all of the evidence published since the early 1990s concerning Katyn. In general, there can be two major categories of evidence. First, there is evidence whose genuineness either is not contested by any party or, if it is contested, disappears from subsequent renditions by such contesting parties, indicating a dishonest desire to reinforce an account with which such evidence is incompatible. This category I refer to as "unimpeachable" evidence. And second, there is evidence that is either rejected by one or another party or, if retained by such parties, contradicts other pieces of evidence presented by them, apparently without their realizing it. Such evidence is far weaker, or even demonstrably fabricated, and does not carry the weight that unimpeachable evidence carries in solving the mystery of which party — the Germans or the Soviets — committed the Katyn Massacre. This paper reviews all the evidence and concludes that the "official version" of Katyn is mistaken. All of the unimpeachable evidence excludes Soviet guilt, and therefore points towards German guilt.

The Katyn Massacre: A Re-examination in the Light of Recent Evidence

On April 13, 1943, German authorities announced that they had discovered thousands of bodies of Polish POWs near Katyn, in an area of the Western Soviet Union then under German occupation. In their official report of summer-fall 1943, Amtliches Material zum Massenmord von Katyn, the Germans claimed the Soviets had shot the Poles. The Polish government in exile in London worked with the Germans at Katyn, accepted the German account, and held the Soviets responsible. The Soviet government responded in the Burdenko Commission report¹, blaming the Germans.

¹ Academician Dr. Nikolai N. Burdenko headed the medico-legal team that disinterred and examined bodies at Katyn.

During the war and for a few years afterwards the Western Allies acknowledged German guilt. But once the Cold War got under way, the Allies quickly adopted the German version, now upheld by anticommunist Polish émigrés. In 1952, the U.S. Congress formed the Madden Commission, which took testimony and issued seven volumes of materials blaming the Soviets.² This situation — the West and Polish anticommunists blaming the Soviets, the Soviets blaming the Germans — continued until the last years of the USSR.

² The Katyn Forest Massacre. Hearings before the Select Committee to Conduct An Investigation of the Facts, Evidence, and Circumstances of the Katyn Forest Massacre. Eighty-Second Congress, First Session. Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1951-1952. 7 Parts. (Madden Commission)

On March 22, 1989, in a note to the Central Committee of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union, Soviet Foreign Minister Eduard Shevardnadze, Valentin Falin, Director of the International Department of the CPSU, and Vladimir Kriuchkov, Chairman of the KGB, urged the Soviet leadership to admit Soviet — i.e. Stalin's — guilt.³

³ Cienciala 247. See footnote 7 for the full reference to this book.

However, as we know today, they possessed no evidence of Soviet guilt. The lack of any evidence, other than the documents in "Closed Packet No. 1," that the Soviets shot the Poles is clear from the "List of Documents with Sources" in Cienciala (2007), 356-363. Gorbachev himself claims that he did not know of the documents from "Closed Packet No. 1" (see below) until "the waning days of the Soviet government" — that is, sometime in 1991.⁴

⁴ "Hiding of Stalin's Files Denied by Gorbachev." The New York Times October 16, 1992, p. A6.

On April 13, 1990, Soviet President Gorbachev gave to Polish President Jaruzelski the lists of Polish POWs transferred from three camps at Kozel'sk, Ostashkov, and Starobel'sk.⁵ However, none of these documents say anything about the Soviets killing the Polish POWs.

⁵ Cienciala 252. These lists are published in Jędrzej Tucholski. Mord w Katyniu: Kozielsk, Ostaszków, Starobielsk. Lista ofiar. Warszawa: Instytut Wydawniczy Pax, 1991.

On October 14, 1992, the Russian government made public the contents of "Closed Packet No. 1,"⁶ documents purporting to record decisions by the Soviet Politburo to execute the Polish prisoners. If genuine, these documents would seem to establish Soviet guilt beyond reasonable doubt.⁷ Since that time this, the "Soviets-did-it" version of Katyn — or, as I will call it, the "official version" — is the only account that is tolerated in academic and public discourse.

⁶ Cienciala 256.

⁷ The documents of "Closed Packet No. 1" themselves:
<http://katyn.ru/index.php?go=Pages&in=view&id=6> Also published by Rusarchives, the archival service of the Russian Federation:
<http://rusarchives.ru/publication/katyn/spisok.shtml> (04.10.19 — no longer online — use Web Archive:
<https://web.archive.org/web/20100501230126/http://rusarchives.ru/publication/katyn/spisok.shtml> See also Celestine Bohlen, "Russian Files Show Stalin Ordered Massacre of 20,000 Poles." The New York Times October 15, 1992, p. A1.

In this article I will briefly review the developments in Katyn evidence that have appeared since 1992. All of this evidence points towards German, not Soviet, guilt.

It is important to note that all of this evidence is circumstantial evidence. No single piece or unit of evidence is unequivocal. When viewed individually, in isolation from the whole concatenation of evidence, any piece of evidence can be accounted for in multiple ways. The explanatory power of circumstantial evidence is revealed when multiple pieces of evidence can all be accounted for by only one hypothesis, one single explanatory narrative.⁸

⁸ "A popular misconception is that circumstantial evidence is less valid or less important than direct evidence... In practice, circumstantial evidence can have an advantage over direct evidence in that it can come from multiple sources that check and reinforce each other." "Circumstantial Evidence," Wikipedia, at http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Circumstantial_evidence#Validity_of_circumstantial_evidence (Accessed October 16, 2020.)

I begin by noting the publication of the two books that are widely considered the definitive accounts of the "official version": by Sanford (2005), and Cienciala et al. (2007).⁹

⁹ George Sanford, Katyn and the Soviet Massacre of 1940: Truth, Justice and Memory (BASEES / Routledge Series on Russian and East European Studies). London, UK: Routledge, 2009 (2005) Anna M. Cienciala, Natalia Sergeevna Lebedeva, Wojciech Materski. Katyn: A Crime Without Punishment. New Haven & London: Yale University Press, 2007.

1994, March 24: István Déak's letter to the New York Review of Books titled "Reply to George Thuroczy," concerning Dr. Ferenc Orsós.¹⁰ Orsós was chosen by the Germans to head the international team of forensic medical experts at Katyn that was designed to lend an air of scientific objectivity to the German account. Déak exposes Orsós as pro-German, a confirmed fascist and anti-Semite.

¹⁰ At <https://www.nybooks.com/articles/1994/03/24/misjudgment-at-nuremberg-2/>

Sanford acknowledges that Orsós was pro-German and anti-Semitic, but dismisses this as "irrelevant." (174) Cienciala merely says he "escaped to the West." (526 n. 298) Orsós testified before the Madden Commission, which took no notice of his pro-Nazi bias.¹¹

¹¹ Madden Commission hearings, vol. 5, pages 1597-1615. But there is evidence that even Orsós privately admitted that the Germans killed the Poles. It is cited in Vladimir Abarinov, Katynskii labirint (Moscow: Novosti, 1991), 125-6. Abarinov himself believes the Soviets were guilty; see the "Radio Liberty" interview with him of April 8, 2010, at <https://www.svoboda.org/a/2006708.html>

2006, December 12: The Russian translation of Frantisek Hájek, Dúkazy Katynské ("Katyn Evidence") is published in a dual-language version, thus making Hájek's book, published in Prague in 1946 in the Czech language and very hard to find, available to a wider audience (there is no English translation).¹² One of the experts brought to Katyn by the Germans, Hájek strongly denounced the German report after the war and insisted that the Germans, not the Soviets, had shot the Poles.

¹² At http://katynbooks.narod.ru/hajek/Hajek_rus_cz.html

Sanford claimed Hájek was "pressurized" (206) into retracting his signature on the German report. But Sanford has no evidence to support this statement. It appears that he made this claim because Hájek rejects the "official version." Cienciala does not mention Hájek at all.

Hájek's book was published in Czechoslovakia before communists controlled the government. Hájek confirmed this account at Nuremberg, from where he could easily have defected to the West, but did not. Instead, he wrote yet another article denouncing the German report in Pravda on March 12, 1952.¹³

¹³ I examine Hájek's testimony in detail, as well as the testimony of two members of a Polish delegation who went to Katyn at German invitation, in The Mystery of the Katyn Massacre: The Evidence, the Solution (Kettering, OH: Erythrós Press & Media, LLC, 2018), Chapter 11.

2010, May 27: Valentin Sakharov, "German documents about exhumation and identification of the victims of Katyn (1943)."¹⁴ A professor at Moscow State University, Sakharov quotes an archival document, a July 1943 account by Soviet partisans in the Smolensk area stating that the Germans were fabricating evidence at Katyn. The partisan report, written before the German Report, when no one knew that Katyn would become a famous event, mentions the German fabrications only in passing. A photographic reproduction of this Soviet partisan account, obtained from GANISO, the Russian State Archive of Contemporary History of the Smolensk Oblast', is in Chapter 9 of my 2018 book.

¹⁴ At https://kprf.ru/rus_law/79589.html

Sakharov also publishes captured documents revealing that German and Polish authorities admitted that the victims were not identifiable and that documents found nearby were simply distributed randomly among the various corpses.

2010, October: Duma member Viktor Iliukhin announces that documents purporting to be draft forgeries of the documents in "Closed Packet No. 1," together with official stamps and stationery blanks, had been given to him by one of the alleged forgers. These materials inevitably cast doubt on the genuineness of the "Closed Packet No. 1" documents.¹⁵

¹⁵ See the Appendix for much information, in both Russian and English, on the "draft forgery" documents presented by Iliukhin.

Iliukhin's revelations are ignored by mainstream scholars. It is easy to understand why that is. If the "Closed Packet No. 1" documents are assumed to be genuine, then Soviet guilt at Katyn could hardly be doubted. Likewise, if they are assumed to be forgeries, then no evidence of Soviet guilt exists. Therefore, any honest attempt to investigate the Katyn massacre must set them aside, and determine the guilty party by evidence whose bona fides are not in doubt.

2011, June 06: Sergei Romanov, "Katyn documents. Documents from the GDA SBU¹⁶ concerning the victims from the Ukrainian list."¹⁷ Romanov presents high-quality scans of these documents, with a bare minimum of his own analysis. In effect, analysis is left to the interested reader.

¹⁶ Archives from the Branch State Archive of the SBU, Ukraine Security Service, equivalent to Russian FSB, successor to the KGB — MGB/ MVD — NKVD.

¹⁷ At <http://katynfiles.com/content/gdasbu-1.html>

These 121 documents provide proof that many of these men were in fact alive long after spring, 1940, when — according to the "official version" of Katyn — they should have been shot. Many of these men were not Poles but Ukrainians.¹⁸ It is remarkable that Romanov published them at all, for they refute the claim that these men were "victims of Katyn." Romanov is a firm supporter of the "official version" of Katyn.

¹⁸ See Grover Furr, The Mystery of the Katyn Massacre: The Evidence, the Solution (Erythrós Press, 2018), Chapter 13: "The 'Ukrainian Trail of Katyn'." (Furr 2018)

2007 — 2011: Aleksei Pamiatnykh, "From the unpublished materials of the Burdenko Commission."¹⁹ Pamiatnykh too is a strong supporter of the "official version" of Katyn. He has published online the inventory notes of Burdenko Commission investigators on which they recorded what they found on the corpses of Katyn victims in late 1943 and January, 1944. Like Romanov, Pamiatnykh provides no analysis of these documents.

¹⁹ At <http://katynfiles.com/content/pamyatnykh-burdenko-materials.html>

These documents confirm the existence of Camp ON-1, one of three camps where, according to the Soviet account, the Polish POWs were sent to do road work. Sanford claims these camps were "a wholly fictitious NKVD invention." (138) Cienciala claims these documents were planted on the corpses by the Soviets, but cites no evidence to support this statement. (319-320)

In fact we have evidence that they were not planted. The last name on one piece of paper found by Soviet investigators on a Katyn corpse is mostly unreadable, and was not used in the Burdenko Report. I have identified this name as Przemyslaw, son of Boleslaw, Koziatulski, an Ostashkov prisoner.²⁰

²⁰ Furr (2018) Chapter 3, 62-65.

The fact that the Soviet investigators could not decipher the name on this paper and did not use it is strong evidence that they did not "plant" — i.e., fabricate — it. For more evidence that the Soviets did not plant these papers see the discussion below concerning Kathleen Harriman's letter and report.

Therefore, Koziatulski was transferred to Kalinin, along with the other prisoners of the Ostashkov camp. But his body ended up at Katyn. This in itself contradicts the "official version," according to which all the Polish prisoners were shot at or near the cities to which they were transferred from their POW camps.

2011, May 25: Announcement of the discovery of the badge of Polish policeman Josef Kuligowski at a German mass murder site in Volodymyr-Volyns'kiy, Ukraine.²¹

²¹ "Osoby z Listy Katyńskiej mordowano we Włodzimierzu Wołyńskim?!" <https://web.archive.org/web/20110922233230/http://www.itvl.pl/news/osoby-z-listy-katynskiej-mordowano-we-wlodzimierzu-wolynskim-->

Kuligowski was a prisoner at Ostashkov. On April 13, 1940, he was transferred to Kalinin, along with other Polish POWs.²² Kuligowski's memorial plaque is at the Mednoe memorial site, near Tver' (formerly Kalinin), and his name is in the "Mednoe Cemetery Book" published by the Polish government.²³ But Kuligowski's badge — and, presumably, his body — was buried at Volodymyr-Volyns'kiy, at least 1200 km from Kalinin (Tver'), and in a mass grave of victims of the Nazis.

²² Jędrzej Tucholski. Mord w Katyniu: Kozielsk, Ostaszków, Starobielsk. Lista ofiar. Warszawa: Instytut Wydawniczy Pax, 1991, p. 810. No. 15: NKVD list No. 026/1 of 13 April 1940, position 15.

²³ Miednoje. Księga Cmentarna Polskiego Cmentarza Wojennego. Warsaw: Rada Ochrony Pamięci Walk i Męczeństwa 2005. Tom 1, 465.

2011, September 5: Announcement of the discovery at the Volodymyr-Volyns'kiy site of the badge of Polish policeman Ludwig Małowiejski.²⁴ Małowiejski too was an Ostashkov prisoner, transferred to Kalinin in April, 1940.²⁵ His memorial plaque is also at Mednoe. He is also in the "Mednoe Cemetery Book."²⁶

²⁴ "Kolejny policjant z Listy Katyńskiej odnaleziony we Włodzimierzu Wołyńskim
<https://web.archive.org/web/20111016084252/http://www.itvl.pl/news/kolejny-policjant-z-listy-katynskiej-odnaleziony-we-wlodzimierzu-wolynskim-->

²⁵ Tucholski p. 887 No. 76. Małowiejski was in a transport of 100 Polish prisoners sent to the Kalinin NKVD on April 27, 1940.

²⁶ Miednoje. Księga Cmentarna Polskiego Cmentarza Wojennego. Tom 2, 541.

The central assumption of the "official version" of Katyn is that the Polish prisoners were transferred in the spring of 1940 from their POW camps — Kozel'sk, Ostashkov, and Starobel'sk — to the NKVD at the nearest city — Smolensk, Kalinin (Tver') and Kharkiv — shot there, and buried at Katyn, Mednoe, and Piatykhvatky respectively. The discoveries of the badges of Ostashkov prisoners Kuligowski and Małowiejski at Volodymyr-Volyns'kiy, in a mass grave of victims of German murder in 1941, strongly suggests that this assumption is false.

Thus these discoveries strongly challenge the "official" — "the Russians-did-it" — version of Katyn. There is no other version of the Katyn massacres that alleges Soviet guilt.

2012, October — November: Publication of the report on the excavation of mass graves at Volodymyr-Volyns'kiy.²⁷

²⁷ Sprawozdanie z Nadzoru Nad Badaniami Archeologiczno-Ekshumacyjnymi na Terenie Rezerwatu Historyczno-Kulturowego Miasta Włodzimierza Wołyńskiego (Ukraina). Opracowanie zespołowe pod kierunkiem dr Dominiki Siemińskiej. Rada Ochrony Pamięci Walk i Męczeństwa. (Report of the Supervision on the Archaeological-Exhumation Investigation in the Area of the Reservation of the Historical-Cultural Town of Volodymyr-Volyns'kiy (Ukraine). A Team Description under the Direction of Dr. Dominika Siemińska. Council for the Commemoration of Struggle and Martyrdom). Toruń, 2012, Originally at <http://www.kresykedzierzynkozle.home.pl/attachments/File/Rap.pdf> Now on the Internet Archive at <https://web.archive.org/web/20131219001802/http://www.kresykedzierzynkozle.home.pl/attachments/File/Rap.pdf>

In this report, signed by Polish archeologist Dr. Dominika Siemińska, only Kuligowski and his badge are mentioned. The report is silent about Małowiejski's badge, discovery of which had been reported by the Polish media.

In the report Dr. Siemińska states that 96%+ of the shell casings found in the mass grave are German and dated 1941. She also affirms that these mass murders must have taken place no earlier than 1941:

Z pewnością stwierdzono, że zbrodnia została dokonana nie wcześniej niż w 1941 roku. (p.4)

It is confirmed with certainty that the crime did not take place earlier than 1941.

The presence of their badges in the mass grave of victims of the Germans is evidence that Kuligowski and Malowiejski were alive and in the Ukraine until at least late June 1941. They were indeed shipped from Ostashkov to Kalinin — we have the Soviet transit lists — but were not killed there. This fact refutes the "official version."

2012, December: Publication of Ivan Katchanovski's article "Katyn in Reverse in Ukraine: Nazi-led Massacres turned into Soviet Massacres."²⁸ Dr. Katchanovski, a historian of Ukrainian background at the University of Ottawa, Canada, exposed the Polish-Ukrainian claim that the victims killed at Volodymyr-Volyns'kiy were NKVD victims to be a cover-up of the fact that it was the Nazis and their Ukrainian Nationalist allies who committed the murders.

²⁸ At <http://www.opednews.com/articles/Katyn-in-Reverse-in-Ukrain-by-Ivan-Katchanovski-121212-435.html>

2013, February 20: Ukrainian archeologist Oleksei Zlatohorskyy expresses with alarm the political problem raised by the Polish archeologist's identification of the Germans as the murderers:

Incautious statements by Polish archeologists about the belongings of the remains found on the land of the castle of Kazimir Velikii in Vladimir-Volynskii could cast doubt upon the already known crimes of the NKVD in relation to Polish officers ...²⁹

²⁹ Скороход, Ольга. "Польские археологи нагнетают ситуацию вокруг жертв, расстрелянных в 1941-м." (Ol'ga Skorokhkod. Polish archeologists stir up the situation around the victims shot in 1941). At http://gazeta.ua/ru/articles/history/_polskie-arheologi-nagnetayut-situaciyu-vokrug-zhertv-rasstrelyannyh-v-1941-m/483525 All boldfacing in this article is by the author.

The only "already known crimes of the NKVD in relation to Polish officers" is the "official version" of the Katyn Massacre. Zlatohorskyy recognized that the "official version" of Katyn appears to be disproven by the finds at Volodymyr-Volyns'kiy, and suggested that the Polish report should not have revealed what really was found there.

The Ukrainian archeological report on the excavations at Volodymyr-Volyns'kiy fails to mention either the discovery of Kuligowski's badge or the fact that more than 96% of the shell casings found were German and dated 1941.³⁰ Both findings are cited in the Polish report.

³⁰ "ДОСЛІДЖЕННЯ ВИЯВЛЕНИХ РЕШТОК ЛЮДЕЙ, РОЗСТРІЛЯНИХ В 1941 РОЦІ НА ГОРОДИЩІ " ВАЛИ" У ВОЛОДИМИРИ- ВОЛИНСЬКОМУ. ЕКСГУМАЦІЙНІ ДОСЛІДЖЕННЯ 2012 РОКУ." (Investigation of discovered remains of persons shot in 1941 at the 'Shafts' site at Volodymyr-Volyns'kiy. Investigation of exhumations of 2012.) (Doslizhdennia) At <http://volodymyrmuseum.com/publications/32-publications/naukovi-statti/170-doslidzhennya-vyyavlenykh-reshtok-lyudey-rozstrilyanykh-v-1941-rotsi-na-horodyshchi-valy-u-volodymyri-volynskomu-ekshumatsiyini-doslidzhennya-2012-roku>

2013: Valentin Sakharov's article "Secrets of Katyn." Svobodnaia mysl' 1 (2013).³¹ Here Sakharov proves that some documents listed in the German report as taken from corpses at Katyn can be dated, from internal evidence, as later than spring, 1940. Sakharov also shows that the Germans possessed the list of POWs transferred from Kozel'sk to Smolensk. In my 2018 book, I show that the Germans used that list to assign false identities to at least some corpses.

³¹ Online at <http://svom.info/entry/319-tajny-katyni/>

2013, September — 2015 January-February: Poland withdraws the November, 2012, report on the Volodymyr-Volyns'kiy excavations, and now claims that the Soviet NKVD shot the victims. By September, 2013 Dr. Siemińska begins to shift the blame onto the NKVD for some killings. But she still refers to "the identification of persons on the Mednoe list" and repeats that "most shell cases are also of German production."³²

³² "Kim są ofiary z Włodzimierza?" <https://naszdzienik.pl/polska-kraj/54675>

By October 13, 2013, Dr. Siemińska no longer mentions the German shells dated 1941, and no longer mentions Kuligowski and Małowiejski, the supposed Katyn victims whose badges had been found at Volodymyr-Volyns'kiy.³³

³³ Interview on YouTube: <https://youtu.be/gPGFcvETG1Q> (accessed 04.06.19)

However, she reveals that two more badges of Polish policemen have been found.³⁴ But the policemen who owned these badges are not identified. This raises the suspicion that these men too may be on the "Katyn" list — otherwise, why not name them? That would constitute yet more evidence that the Soviets did not kill the Polish POWs.

³⁴ Photos of these badges here: —

<http://msuweb.montclair.edu/~furrgr/research/vv/ppbadge01.jpg> —

<http://msuweb.montclair.edu/~furrgr/research/vv/ppbadge02r.jpg> —

<http://msuweb.montclair.edu/~furrgr/research/vv/ppbadge02o.jpg>

By January-February 2015 Dr. Siemińska is blaming the NKVD alone.³⁵

³⁵ Dzienik Kijowski January-Februray, 2015, p. 5 — http://kresy24.pl/wp-content/uploads/2015/03/Dziennik_Kijowski_2_2015.pdf

2015, August: Aleksandr Gur'ianov of the Moscow "Memorial Society" publishes Ubity v Katyni — "The men killed at Katyn." Gur'ianov assumes that the Soviets were the killers at Katyn, but admits that there is no evidence of this, aside from "Closed Packet No. 1."

... if we restrict ourselves to only the Soviet sources listed, from a formal point of view it is impossible to establish any connection between the decision of the Politburo of March 5, 1940 36 on the shooting of Polish prisoners of war and the NKVD proscription lists. (66-7)

The need to refer to the absence of signs of life after the spring of 1940 and the commonality of the fate of the identified and the unidentified by the results of the exhumation, in order to consider the NKVD prescription lists as lists of dispatching for execution by shooting — this is the weakest link in our formal legal evidence chain. (67)

³⁶ This is one of the documents in "Closed Packet No. 1." It may be viewed at <http://katyn.ru/index.php?go=Pages&in=view&id=26>In fact, we do have "signs of life after the spring of 1940" for many of the Polish POWs listed in the Soviet transit lists (not "proscription" lists, as Gur'ianov claims) and in the German report. Gur'ianov simply ignores this evidence — as he must, if he is to remain loyal to the "official version."

Gur'ianov admits that he must assume that all the corpses unearthed by the Germans and listed in their 1943 report are bodies of prisoners from the Kozel'sk camp.

We proceed from the premise that all the remains exhumed in 1943 in the Katyn forest, including those listed in the list of "outsiders" in the Appendix³⁷, are the remains of prisoners of war from the Kozel'sk camp mentioned in the documents of the NKVD. (77)

³⁷ Gur'ianov is referring to the Appendix to his own book.

If Gur'ianov had been interested in an objective study of Katyn, he would not have made this assumption. He makes it because this assumption is essential to the "official version," according to which all the Polish POWs were shot at or near the cities to which they had been transferred out of the POW camps.

Gur'ianov lists a number of names in the German Report that he cannot identify as Kozel'sk prisoners. Given his premise, it is not surprising that he did not check the prisoner lists from the other two POW camps, Ostashkov and Starobel'sk. In my 2018 book I have identified a number of them as Ostashkov and Starobel'sk prisoners. Discovery of bodies of prisoners from these camps at Katyn dismantles the "official version" and supports the Soviet account, according to which the prisoners were not shot, but were transferred on to labor camps to do road work.³⁸

³⁸ Gur'ianov also acknowledges that no "shooting lists" have been discovered, though he insists that they must have existed — if the Soviets really did shoot the Poles. (80)

2015, Winter: Publication of Kathleen Harriman's letter of January 28, 1943, to her sister Mary and to Pamela Churchill, wife of Randolph, son of Winston Churchill.³⁹ Kathleen Harriman visited Katyn in January 1944 with her father, US ambassador to the USSR Averill Harriman. At Katyn she observed Soviet investigators searching some corpses. She wrote:

While I was watching, they found one letter dated the summer of '41, which is damned good evidence.

³⁹ Harriman Magazine, Winter, 2015, 12-23. Letter at p. 18. At http://www.columbia.edu/cu/creative/epub/harriman/2015/winter/kathleen_harriman.pdf

She repeated this in the formal report she made after visiting Katyn, and gave the precise date on the letter — June 20, 1941.⁴⁰ This confirms Pamiatnykh's discovery that all the names of Polish POWs mentioned in the Burdenko Report except that of Stanislaw Kuczynski are also mentioned on the documents found on the corpses by Soviet investigators.

⁴⁰ Madden Commission, Part 7, p. 2138.

Pamiatnykh writes:

It should be noted that 21 names are mentioned in the aforesaid inventory. In addition, another Polish surname, not mentioned in the inventory, is in the published Report of the Burdenko Commission (Stanislav Kuchinski).

This is an important point. If the Burdenko investigators' materials had included the document from Kuczynski, that would have suggested the possibility that it had been "planted" in order to be "discovered" when Kathleen Harriman was observing. That would, in turn, cast doubt on the bona fides of this document and, by extension, the other documents presented by the Burdenko investigators. Thanks to the documents published by Pamiatnykh, to Kathleen Harriman's letter, and to the Koziatulski document discussed previously, we can be certain that these materials were not planted by the Soviets.

Conclusion: The Germans shot the Polish prisoners.

The only evidence that points towards Soviet guilt are: (a) the documents in "Closed Packet No.1," the genuineness of which has been credibly challenged by the alleged forgery documents produced by Viktor Iliukhin in 2010; (b) testimony of Katyn area residents published in the German report and supporting the German version; (c) testimony by retired NKVD men to Soviet officials in 1990 in support of the Gorbachev "official version."

However,

- the genuineness of the "Closed Packet No.1" documents are called into question by the draft forgery documents made public by Iliukhin;
- the testimony of residents in the German report is contradicted by other testimony from residents in the Soviet Burdenko Report;
- the 1990 testimony of the former NKVD men is also contradicted by the Soviet residents' testimony in the Burdenko Report. In addition, it is full of contradictions, shows signs of intimidation and falsification, and does not mention Katyn at all. Eyewitnesses are vulnerable to intimidation, and eyewitness testimony is one of the least reliable types of evidence.⁴¹

⁴¹ See, for example, the many publications by cognitive psychologist Elizabeth Loftus, including Eyewitness Testimony (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1979; revised edition 1996).

Therefore, any objective study of the Katyn massacre mystery must set the evidence in categories (a) through (c) aside, and proceed on the basis of evidence that cannot have been fabricated. I call this the "unimpeachable" evidence.

All of the "unimpeachable" evidence — the evidence that cannot have been faked — supports the conclusion that the Germans, not the Soviets, are guilty of the mass murders of Polish POWS collectively known as the Katyn massacre. It necessarily follows that the "Closed Packet No. 1" documents are indeed forgeries, since they contradict the evidence that we know is genuine.

Why did Gorbachev, Yeltsin, and their men claim Soviet guilt without any evidence? We can, perhaps, hazard a guess.

One of the documents in "Closed Packet No. 1," titled "Excerpt from Protocol No.13 of the Politburo Session of March 5, 1940, titled 'A Question of the NKVD of the USSR,'" is a duplicate, the second version of which is clearly a forgery produced during Nikita Khrushchev's time. The name of Aleksandr Shelepin has been written in where Lavrentii Beria's name should be, and the date has been changed from 1940 to 1959. The stamps on this document are from the Khrushchev era.⁴² Stalin's name is typed at the bottom.

⁴² At <http://katyn.ru/images/pages/f17op166d621l135.jpg> I discuss this document in Furr 2018, Chapter Four, 68-71. Both versions of this document may be viewed at <http://katyn.ru/index.php?go=Pages&in=view&id=26> The obviously forged duplicate is at the bottom.

It is unlikely anyone would have forged such an important document unless Khrushchev had ordered it. But for some reason, Khrushchev decided not to go through with the plan to blame Stalin for Katyn. Perhaps this was because, as a Politburo member himself in March 1940, Khrushchev would have implicated himself.

We know that Shelepin, Khrushchev's head of the KGB between December 25, 1958, and November 13, 1961, was convinced by these documents that the Soviets were guilty. Shelepin's friend Valerii I. Kharazov said that Shelepin had told him the Soviets had shot the Poles. Shelepin had been told this, evidently by other KGB workers, and believed it.⁴³ Other senior Soviet officials were probably also told this.

⁴³ V.N. Shved, "Information about the testimony of V.I. Kharazov concerning A.N. Shelepin's note to Khrushchev" At <http://www.katyn.ru/index.php?go=Pages&in=view&id=231>

So when, in March, 1989, Shevardnadze, Falin, and Kriuchkov advised Gorbachev to confess that the Soviets were guilty of the Katyn massacres, they may have believed it. But they had no documentary evidence. Hence, the forgery uncovered by Iliukhin.

Appendix

The "Draft Forgery Documents" Published by Viktor Iliukhin

- Drafts of the forgery of the "Beria letter" read into the Russian Duma record by Duma member Viktor Iliukhin:
<http://www.katyn.ru/index.php?go=News&in=view&id=205>
- English –language article from a Swedish blog with the same draft forgery documents: At:
<https://mythcracker.wordpress.com/2010/11/27/katyn-sensational-new-documents-and-ilyukhins-letter-to-gryzlov-about-the-katyn-resolution-in-the-russian-state-duma/>
- The stamps, facsimiles, and blanks allegedly used in the forgery:
<http://www.katyn.ru/index.php?go=News&in=view&id=196>
- Viktor Iliukhin interview with documents, stamps, facsimile of Beria signature on a stamp, etc. <http://www.katyn.ru/index.php?go=News&in=view&id=198>

The Swedish blog "Katynmassakern" has also published these documents for readers of English.

- Katyn: Mysterious "discoveries" of the Katyn documents.
<http://katynmassakern.blogspot.com/>
- Katyn: Lazar Kaganovich's testimony —
<http://katynmassakern.blogspot.com/2010/07/katyn-lazar-kaganovichs-testimony.html>
- Katyn: "Beria's letter" was written on two different typewriters —
<http://katynmassakern.blogspot.com/2010/07/katyn-berias-letter-was-written-on-two.html>
- Katyn: 49 signs of falsification of 'Closed package no. 1' —
<http://katynmassakern.blogspot.com/2010/07/katyn-49-signs-of-falsification-of.html>
- Katyn: Dionis Kaptar's interview with Viktor Ilyukhin regarding the forgeries — <http://katynmassakern.blogspot.com/2010/07/katyn-dionis-kaptars-interview-with.html>

- Katyn: KPRF press conference regarding the falsification of archival documents — <http://katynmassakern.blogspot.com/2010/07/kprf-press-conference-regarding.html>
- Katyn: Ilyukhin's appearance in the Duma regarding the forgeries — <http://katynmassakern.blogspot.com/2010/07/katyn-ilyukhins-appearance-in-duma.html>
- Katyn: Ilyukhin's video on Katyn forgeries — <http://katynmassakern.blogspot.com/2010/07/katyn-ilyukhins-video-on-katyn.html>
- Katyn: "Closed package no.1" was forged — <http://katynmassakern.blogspot.com/2010/07/katyn-closed-package-no1-was-forged.html>

Author

Grover Furr has written many books on Soviet history of the 1930s. His book The Mystery of the Katyn Massacre: The Evidence, the Solution (Kettering, OH: Erythrós Press) was published in July, 2018.