Then [German military attaché to the Soviet Union General Ernst Köstring informed me that my appointment as People's Commissar of Internal Affairs opened up the perspective "of uniting all those dissatisfied with the existing political leadership and that, at the head of this movement, I would be able to create a considerable force."

Köstring said: "We military men think like this: for us the decisive factor is military strength. Therefore the first task which, as it seems to us, presents itself is to unite the military forces in the interests of the common task. We must strengthen in every way our influence in the Red Army, so as to direct the Russian army at the decisive moment in a manner corresponding to the interests of Germany."

How Ezhov's Mass Repression Originated

According to Ezhov the idea of an NKVD conspiracy was first suggested to him by German military attaché General Ernst Köstring.

Köstring touched on the NKVD. He said: "In the general plan of the tasks we face, the People's Commissar for Internal Affairs must play a determining role. Therefore for the success of the group d'etat and our seizure of power you must create in the NKVD a broad organization of those who agree with you, and it must be united with the military men." Köstring declared that these organizations, in the army and in the NKVD, must be prepared in such a way as to guarantee united actions at the outbreak of war towards the goal of seizing power. (62)

After the Tukhachevsky Affair trial and executions, Egorov and the Germans reconsidered this original plan, which was oriented towards action upon an invasion of the USSR by Germany and/or allies. With the top figures in the military conspiracy now removed, the Germans suggested a coup d'état instead of the initial plan of coordinating Red Army actions with an invading German army.

Question: How did your espionage work proceed further?

Answer: In the summer of 1937, after the trial of Tukhachevsky, Egorov in the name of German intelligence set before me the question of the necessity to build all the espionage work in the army and the NKVD in such a way as to organize, under certain conditions, the seizure of power without waiting for a war, as we had agreed according to the preliminary plan.

Egorov said that the Germans explained this alteration by the fear lest the destruction which had begun of the anti-Soviet formations in the army reach us, i.e. me and Egorov.

According to Egorov the Germans proposed that we communicate to them our concrete ideas about this question as soon as possible.

We discussed this new situation with Egorov and arrived at the conclusion that the Party and the popular masses were behind the leadership of the ACP(b) and that the soil for this coup d'état had not been prepared. Therefore we decided that it was necessary to get rid of Stalin or Molotov under the flag of some other kind of anti-Soviet organization in order to create the conditions for my further advancement towards political power. After that, once I occupied a more leading position, the possibility would be created for further, more decisive, changes in the politics of the Party and the Soviet Union that corresponded to the interests of Germany.

I asked Egorov to transmit to the Germans through Köstring our ideas and to request the opinion of governmental circles in Germany about this question.

Question: What answer did you receive?

Answer: Soon after that, according to the words of Köstring, Egorov informed me that the government circles of Germany agreed with our proposal.

According to Ezhov, it was at this time that his plan of an NKVD conspiracy was born.

Question: What measures did you undertake to realize your traitorous designs?

Answer: I decided to organize a conspiracy within the NKVD and to attract to it people through whom I could carry out terrorist acts against the leaders of the Party and government. (64)

The NKVD conspiracy was to include terrorist acts against the Stalin leadership. Ezhov goes on to name those in the NKVD, plus Evdokimov (not an NKVD man), who were already in his conspiratorial group, including a group of NKVD men who had been in Iagoda's conspiracy. In later confessions Ezhov goes into detail about how the mass repressions were planned and executed. We will discuss them in future chapters.

The final section of this confession details the plot to assassinate Stalin. Marshal Egorov was arrested on March 27, 1938. In one of the document collections which we have cited previously, we have a Politburo decision of January 25, 1938 detailing suspicious actions by Egorov. Marshal Budennyi had evidently testified that Egorov had tried to recruit him into an anti-party military conspiracy of his own. A number of persons already under arrest had testified that Egorov knew about the Tukhachevskii conspiracy but had failed to denounce it to the Soviet leadership. (Lubianka 1937-1938 No. 281)

A decree of the Central Committee Plenum dated February 28 — March 2, 1938 reported that Egorov had had a face-to-face confrontation with four of his accusers and concluded that "com[rade]. Egorov has turned out to be politically more tarnished than one could have thought before the face-to-face confrontation." At this point Egorov was only removed as a candidate member of the Central Committee. (Lubianka 1937-1938 No. 297)

In a list dated July 26, 1938, of 139 persons for whom the NKVD recommended execution if convicted at trial, Egorov's was the only named crossed out entirely. (Lubianka 1937-1938 No. 331) Egorov was not tried and executed until February 22, 1939, long after Beria had taken charge of the NKVD from Ezhov and embarked on the task of reviewing the cases of tens of thousands of persons condemned under Ezhov.

Egorov's arrest caused a change in Ezhov's plans.

I informed Köstring about further arrests among military workers and declared to him that I did not have the power to prevent these arrests, and in particular I reported about the arrest of Egorov, which had the possibility of causing the ruin of the whole conspiracy.

Köstring was extremely upset by all these events. He sharply put to me the question that either we immediately take some kind of measures to seize power, or we will be destroyed one at a time.

Köstring again returned to our old plan of a so-called "short blow" and demanded that it be executed immediately.

According to Ezhov, the idea of assassinating Stalin and/or other Politburo members originated with the Germans.

Khoziainov has been made aware of that not only by me but by German intelligence, since during the first meeting after we had established contact between us Khoziainov transmitted to me a directive of the Germans: to speed up at all costs the carrying out of terrorist acts.

Besides that Khoziainov transmitted to me the directives of German intelligence that in connection with my dismissal from work in the NKVD and the naming of Beria as People's Commissar for Internal Affairs German intelligence considered it essential to assassinate someone among the Politburo members and by this means to provoke a new leadership in the NKVD.

In this same period in the NKVD itself there began arrests of the active members of the conspiracy which I headed, and then we concluded that it was essential to organize a mass action on November 7, 1938. (67)

Ezhov again attributes the plan to assassinate Soviet leaders to the Germans.

Answer: In the last days of November 1938 I was dismissed from work in the NKVD. Then I finally understood that the Party did not trust me and the moment of my exposure was approaching. I started to seek a way out of the situation I had created and decided not to stop anything in order to either carry out the assignment of German intelligence, to kill one of the members of the Politburo, or to flee abroad myself and save my skin.

... I told Lazebny: "There is no way out for you, you are going to be destroyed in any case, but by sacrificing yourself you might save a large group of people." When Lazebny questioned me about this I informed him that the murder of Stalin would save the situation in the country. Lazebny agreed. (69)

Boris Berman

Pavliukov, who has had access to NKVD documents not cited by others, transmits this testimony concerning Ezhov's conspiracy from Boris D. Berman. It confirms what we know from the other sources we have.

...[T]he confessions made by B.D. Berman during the fourth week of January 1939, had dotted almost all the "i's" as concerns the political accusations against Ezhov. Berman, the former chief of the Transportation Directorate of the NKVD and, before that, Commissar of Internal Affairs of Belorussia, declared that unjustified mass arrests, as a result of which completely innocent persons died, were conducted by Ezhov and Frinovsky on the instructions of foreign intelligence services while at the same time actual spies, diversionists and terrorists remained at liberty. By this time Berman had already 'confessed' to contacts with German intelligence, so that such knowledge concerning Ezhov could not compromise himself in any way.

Pavliukov cites the following direct quotation from Berman's statement:

It was important to both Ezhov and Frinovsky to create as much damage to the Party and in the country as possible to strive, through their hostile work in the NKVD, to ruin the authority of the Party, the authority of the Central Committee, as much as possible among the wide circles of the population. This was Ezhov's and Frinovsky's principal assignment, and they acted in this direction, involving and corrupting the apparatus of the NKVD both in the periphery and, especially, in the center. This was done upon the directive of foreign intelligence services of aggressor countries... with whom Ezhov and Frinovsky were tied and whose agents they were. (Pavliukov, 516-517)

Chapter 13. Ezhov's interrogation of August 4, 1939

Ezhov's interrogation confession of August 4, 1939 is a most important document for understanding the mass repressions. In it Ezhov explains how he carried out the mass repressions of innocent persons and duped Stalin and the Soviet leadership into believing that it was a battle against subversion. Ezhov also touches on this topic in other interrogations, of which only certain sections have been published. We consider them in the next chapter.

Mainstream Soviet historiography ignores this confession-interrogation of Ezhov's. No wonder! For it demonstrates how invalid the "anti-Stalin paradigm" of Soviet history is. We will give lengthy quotations from this document and comment on them. I have put an English translation of the whole text online.¹ Unless otherwise specified, quotations are from this translation.

Ezhov begins by asserting that there was some validity to the charge that returned kulaks, criminals, and others were indeed causing disruption in the country. Therefore the repressions were initially welcomed by the Soviet population.

Question: Did you achieve your provocational, conspiratorial aims in carrying out these mass operations?

Answer: The first results of the mass operation were completely unexpected by us conspirators. Not only did they not create dissatisfaction among the population with the punitive policy of Soviet power, but on the contrary they resulted in a large political upsurge, especially in the countryside. We observed a great many cases in which the kolkhoz workers themselves came to the UNKVD and the regional sections of the UNKVD with the demand that we arrest one or another fugitive kulak, White Guardist, trader, and so on.

In the towns the levels of robbery, knife-fighting, and hooliganism, from which working-class regions suffered especially, were sharply reduced.

It was completely obvious that the Central Committee of the All-Union Communist Party (Bolshevik) was correct and timely in deciding to carry out these measures. Despite the provocational measures with which we undertook to carry out the mass operation it met with friendly approval by the working people. (Ezhov 04.26.1939, 367)

"Approval by the working people" was the opposite of what Ezhov and his men wanted. Ezhov continues by noting how they turned this situation around.

Question: How did you manage to use the working people's sympathy with repression against kulaks, counter-revolutionary clerics, and criminals, in order to attain the goals set by the conspiratorial organization?

Answer: In the provinces, when the so-called "limits" that had been set of the numbers of former kulaks, White Guards, counter-revolutionary clerics, and criminals to be repressed had been exhausted, we the conspirators and I in particular again set before the government the question of the need to prolong the mass operations and increase the number of those to be repressed.

As evidence of the need to prolong the mass operations we alleged that the kolkhozes in the countryside and the factories in the towns had been heavily infested by these elements, and stressed the interest and sympathy of the working people of town and country for these measures.

Question: Did you succeed in obtaining a government decision to prolong the mass operation?

Answer: Yes. We did obtain the decision of the government to prolong the mass operation and to increase the number of those repressed. (367-368)

Here is the reason for the increases in limits that have been widely publicized as showing how "bloodthirsty" Stalin was. Ezhov told him that the working people showed support for these actions. This also shows that disruptions by anti-Soviet forces were far from ended.

"We Were Deceiving the Government"

The interrogator asks Ezhov to specify whether he had deceived the government or, on the contrary, was acting according to the government's wishes.

Question: What did you do, deceive the government?

Answer: It was unquestionably essential for us to prolong the mass operation and increase the number of persons repressed.

However, it was necessary to extend the time period for these measures and to set up a real and accurate account so that once we had prepared ourselves, we could strike our blow directly on the most dangerous part, the organizational leadership of the counterrevolutionary elements.

The government, understandably, had no conception of our conspiratorial plans and in the present case proceeded solely on the basis of the necessity to prolong the operation without going into the essence of how it was carried out.

In this sense, of course, we were deceiving the government in the most blatant manner. (368)

I cannot find any quotation of this passage by any mainstream historian of the Soviet Union. The reason should be clear: it directly contradicts the anti-Stalin paradigm, the false notion that all of Ezhov's repressions, mass murders, etc., were planned or at least desired by Stalin, and that Ezhov was just "Stalin's loyal execution."

As Ezhov explains, increases in repression eventually began to seriously alienate large parts of the Soviet population who could not understand what was happening, and how this repression elicited the kind of opposition and protest from the Soviet population that he, Ezhov, aimed at. He then explains how he and his men managed to stifle these protests, especially those from honest NKVD men.

Question: After you succeeded in prolonging the mass operations, did you achieve the set aims of the conspiratorial organization to cause dissatisfaction among the population with the punitive policy of Soviet power?

Answer: Yes, once we had prolonged the mass operations over many months we finally succeeded, in a number of areas, in causing incomprehension and dissatisfaction with the punitive policy of Soviet power among specific sectors of the population. (369)

Ezhov lists the areas where this policy of repression of innocent persons was successful, and says:

In all of these oblasts there were more gross anti-Soviet acts of repression against people who were basically innocent, which caused legitimate dissatisfaction among the working people. (369)

We won't quote or summarize everything Ezhov says about the repressions. Rather, we'll concentrate on emphasizing a few crucial points. Ezhov says that Leplevskii, in the Ukraine, repressed persons who were either not politically active or were in fact loyal to the Soviet government, while letting the dangerous elements go.

In carrying out the mass operation Leplevskii, like most of the other chiefs of the UNKVDs who were not conspirators,² spread them out over a broad front while leaving the most bitter and active of the organizers from among the kulaks, White Guardists, Petliurovists, counter-revolutionary clergy, etc., almost untouched. At the same time he concentrated the whole force of his blow against the less active elements and in part among that part of the population that was close to Soviet power [i.e. loyal to the Soviet government]. (370)

² We will return to Ezhov's claim that Leplevskii was not a part of his conspiracy in a later chapter.

Under Uspenskii, who succeeded Leplevskii in the Ukraine, this same policy was accelerated.

Uspenskii was completely informed about our conspiratorial plans and I informed him about them personally. I personally also gave him concrete assignments concerning this matter. The result was that Uspenskii not only continued Leplevskii's practice of sabotage but increased it significantly.

Uspenskii received additional "limits" after my arrival in the Ukraine and, on my direction, he did not limit himself only to repression of former kulaks, clerics, and criminals, but broadened the category of those subject to repression to include nationalists, former prisoners of war, and others. (370)

Ezhov describes the negative reaction on the part of the Soviet population.

All of this caused bewilderment and dissatisfaction among the working people in many regions of the Ukraine. This dissatisfaction was especially strong in the regions near the border, where there remained families of those who were repressed.

The NKVD of the USSR and the Procuracy received many warnings about this from the oblasts of the Ukraine. However no one reacted to them in any way. (370)

Ezhov makes it clear that the central government — Stalin — did not learn of this negative reaction:

These warnings were hidden from the Central Committee of the Party and from the government.

The negative reaction to Ezhov's mass repression of innocent persons was considerable.

From what Uspenskii said I know that flights through the border posts into Poland increased as a result of the provocational conduct of the mass operations, especially in the border regions of the Ukraine. The families of those repressed began to be expelled from kolkhozes, and in connection with that, robberies, arson, and thefts began. There were even a few examples of terrorist acts against workers of the village soviets and kolkhozes. Not only families of the repressed, but rank-and-file kolkhoz members and even Party members began to write complaints.

... Such in general terms were the results of the provocational conduct of the mass operations in the Ukraine.

We were successful in achieving about the same results in Belorussia too. (370)

Ezhov gives more detail in his discussion of the mass repressions in Belorussia:

He [Boris Berman, NKVD chief in Belorussia and originally a Iagoda man] incessantly demanded an increase of "limits" and, following Uspenskii's example, put "nationalists" into the category of persons subject to repression, carried out completely unfounded arrests, created exactly the same kind of dissatisfaction in the border regions of Belorussia, and left the families of those repressed where they were.

There were even more warnings sent to the NKVD and the Procuracy concerning dissatisfaction among the population of the border regions of Belorussia than in the Ukraine. We left all these too without investigating them and hid them from the Central Committee of the Party and the government. ... In the other oblasts

I enumerated in my confession we achieved analogous results and also succeeded in creating dissatisfaction among certain sectors of the population. (371)

Ezhov discusses the operation in the Far Eastern Region (FER), the Donbass, and the Central Asian Republics. His discussion of Frinovskii's actions in the Far Eastern Region give some more detail about how the repression was conducted.

Q: But can it be that in June 1938 this operation had still not been completed in the FER?

A: It had already been completed in the FER. However, we had arranged with Frinovskii that after he had arrived in the Far East he would send a telegram with the request to increase the "limits" of the numbers of persons to be repressed, giving as the reason for this measure that the FER was heavily infested with counter-revolutionary elements who remained almost untouched.

Frinovskii did this. He arrived in the FER and after a few days asked that the limits be increased by 15,000 persons, for which he received permission. For the FER with its small population this was a significant figure.

Q: Why did you find it necessary to renew the mass operation in the FER?

A: We considered it to be the most convenient and most effective form of sabotage, capable of very quickly evoking dissatisfaction among the population. Since the situation in the FER at that time was rather tense we therefore decided to exacerbate it even further through the provocational prolongation of the mass operation. (373)

Ezhov summarizes Frinovskii's achievements in furthering their conspiracy by sparing the real counterrevolutionaries while repressing the innocent.

According to Frinovskii's words the mass operation prolonged by us came in very handy indeed. He created the impression that he had thoroughly routed the anti-Soviet elements in the FER and in fact was successful in using the mass operation in order to preserve the more leading and active cadre of the counterrevolution and of the conspirators. Frinovskii concentrated the whole blow of the mass operation on those sectors of the population closest to us³ and on passive, declassed elements and was able on the one hand to stir up legitimate dissatisfaction among the population of many areas of the FER, and on the other hand to preserve the organized and active cadre of the counterrevolution. (373-374)

The "Foreign Operations"

The interrogator asked about the so-called "foreign operations."

Q: Above you have touched on the question that you also utilized the mass operations concerned with the repression of persons of foreign origin from the capitalist countries neighboring with us (refugees, political emigrants, and others) in a provocational manner in the interests of realizing your conspiratorial plans.

Ezhov discusses how the "foreign operation" intended by the Stalin government to rid the country of spies, was turned by himself and his men into another massive repression of innocent Soviet citizens.

The mass operations concerning the repression of persons of foreign origin from neighboring capitalist countries had as their goal to destroy the base of foreign intelligence services within the USSR. They took place at the same time as the mass operations against kulaks, criminals, et al.

We conspirators naturally could not carry out these operations without trying to use them for our conspiratorial ends.

We conspirators decided to conduct these operations too on a broad front and strike as great a number of persons as possible, all the more so since there were no definite limits assigned to these operations and, accordingly, we were able to broaden them at will according to our judgment.

Q: What were your aims in carrying out these operations?

A: The aims that we pursued in the provocational conduct of these operations also consisted in causing dissatisfaction and ferment within the Soviet population who belonged to these nationalities. Besides that we hoped, by the provocational conduct of these operations, to create the public opinion in European states that people in the USSR are being repressed solely according to the criterion of nationality, and to stimulate protests by some of these states.

I must say that all this also coincided with our conspiratorial plans of orienting ourselves towards the seizure of power during wartime, insofar as it created the prerequisite conditions for this. These conditions in the present case were expressed in creating a condition of dissatisfaction not just with the punitive but also with the national policies of Soviet power.

Asked whether this policy of massive repression of innocent persons on national pretexts was successful, Ezhov asserted that it was.

[W]e succeeded in achieving the result that among the Soviet population of nationalities under repression we created a great sense of alarm, incomprehension concerning the purpose of these repressions, dissatisfaction with Soviet power, talk about the approach of war, and a strong orientation towards emigration.

An important result for Ezhov's purposes were the protests of foreign countries and some well-known individuals.

... as a result of the provocational conduct of these operations there were many protests on the part of the government of Germany, Poland, Persia, Greece, and other states, and articles of protest appeared in a number of newspapers of European countries.

According to Ezhov, Iran, Greece, Finland, England, Germany, Poland, and France protested.

Besides that, as I have already said, in the European press a number of articles of protest appeared, which succeeded in evoking incomprehension and protests even among friends of the Soviet Union.

Question: And namely?

Answer: I have in mind in the first place Romain Rolland. He sent a special letter in which he asked that he be told whether it were true that repressions against foreigners had begun in the USSR that took place purely on the basis of nationality without regard to their attitude towards the Soviet Union. He explained this request by the fact that a number of protest articles had appeared in the foreign press, and then many prominent figures in Europe had turned to him to ask about this, knowing that he was a friend of the Soviet Union.

Besides that Romain Rolland had already asked about certain persons under arrest whom he knew personally and whom he recommended because of their sympathy with Soviet power.

Ezhov explained how the "national operations" were used to repress anybody he and his men wanted, not only spies or even just those of a given nationality.

As I have already said, we had decided to carry out these mass operations on a broad front and to encompass in the repressions the greatest number of people possible.

Our main pressure on the heads of the UNKVDs, whether they were conspirators or not, was precisely along these lines with the aim of forcing them all the time to expand the operation.

As a result of this pressure the practice of repressions without any incriminating evidence whatsoever on the sole basis of one criterion alone, that the person repressed belonged to such-and- such a nationality (Pole, German, Latvian, Greek, etc.), was broadly expanded.

However, that was not enough. The practice of including Russians, Ukrainians, Byelorussians, et al. in the category of Poles, Finns, Germans, et al., became a rather mass phenomenon, especially in certain oblasts.

Of those who especially distinguished themselves in this manner were the People's Commissars of Internal Affairs of such republics as: the Ukraine, Belorussia, Turkmenia, and the heads of the UNKVDs of such oblasts as the Sverdlovsk, Leningrad, and Moscow.

So for example Dmitriev, former head of the NKVD of the Sverdlovsk oblast included a great many Ukrainians, Byelorussians, and even Russians under the category of repressed Polish refugees. In any case for every arrested Pole there were no fewer than ten Russians, Ukrainians, and Byelorussians.

There were many cases in which Russians, Ukrainians, and Byelorussians generally were made into Poles with falsified documents.

The practice in Leningrad was the same. Instead of Finns Zakovskii arrested many native inhabitants of the USSR — Karelians, and "transformed" them into Finns.

Uspenskii, under the appearance of Poles arrested many Ukrainian Uniates, that is, selected them not on the basis of national origin but according to their religion. I could multiply many times examples of this kind. They are characteristic for the majority of oblasts.

Thereupon Ezhov outlines the impunity he and his henchmen enjoyed by virtue of the special powers of the judicial system.

Question: Was it only the simplified judicial procedure that permitted you to realize your provocational plans?

Answer: Basically, of course, it permitted us to carry out sabotage with impunity.

As a result of such an extremely simplified judicial procedure in the oblasts, for example, the practice of falsifying investigative facts, forgery, and deception was widely developed.

Ezhov claimed that the Procuracy, which was supposed to oversee police actions, did not do so.

The procurors of the oblasts, krajs, and republics, and also the Procuracy of the USSR could not have been unaware of such a blatant criminal practice of mass provocational arrests and falsification of investigative facts, since they bore responsibility, together with the NKVD, for the review of such cases.

This inactivity of prosecutorial supervision can only be explained by the fact that in charge of the Procuracy in many oblasts, krajs, and republics were members of various anti-Soviet organizations who often practiced even more widespread provocational repressions among the population.

Another part of the procurors, those who were not involved in participation in anti-Soviet groupings, simply feared to argue with the heads of the UNKVDs on these questions, all the more so since they did not have any directives on these matters from the center, where all the falsified investigative reports that had been mechanically signed by themselves, i.e. the procurors, went through without any kind of restraint or remarks.

...The Procuracy of the USSR could not, of course, have failed to notice all these perversions.

I explain the behavior of the Procuracy of the USSR and, in particular, of Procuror of the USSR Vyshinskii by that same fear of quarreling with the NKVD and by [the desire] to prove themselves no less "revolutionary" in the sense of conducting mass repressions.

I have come to this conclusion also because Vyshinskii often spoke to me personally about the tens of thousands of complaints coming in to the Procuracy and to which he was paying no attention.

Likewise, during the whole period of conduct of the operations I do not recall a single instance of protest by Vyshinskii concerning the mass operations, while there were instances when he insisted on more severe sentences in relation to some persons or other.

This is the only way I can explain the virtual absence of any procuratorial supervision at all during the mass operations and the absence of any protests from them to the government against the acts of the NKVD.

Ezhov's Use of the GULAG for his Conspiracy

At the end of the interrogation the interrogator raises the question of the role played by the fact that the NKVD also controlled the GULAG, the labor camps where those not sentenced to execution were confined. Ezhov discusses this question briefly.

Question: It is well known that a large number of those persons repressed in all the mass operations were sentenced to terms of imprisonment in the camps.

How is it that you did not fear the exposure of your criminal practices, since you knew that many of these people were convicted on the basis of falsified materials?

Answer: We, and specifically I, had no fears that our criminal machinations might be exposed by those imprisoned in the camps. All the camps were not only under the command of the NKVD but were also commanded from the GULAG by conspirators. Under these conditions we could always take the appropriate preventative measures.

Most important, we had our own special consideration when we sent this contingent to the camps.

These considerations and plans were as follows: when we sent repressed persons to the camps on the basis of materials that had no sufficient basis we planned to use their dissatisfaction during wartime and, in particular, upon our seizure of power.

In the next chapter we will discuss Ezhov's testimony about the use of the GULAG camps as a component of his conspiracy.

Chapter 14. Other Interrogations of Ezhov

We do not know how many transcripts of interrogations of Ezhov are in existence. The prosecution materials concerning virtually all the important matters of the later 1930s in the USSR are still top-secret, kept in the Presidential Archives of the Russian Federation.

Under Russian law materials are to be declassified after 75 years. If this law were followed, all of the documents concerning the repressions of the 1930s should have been declassified and should now be available to researchers.

However, as of the time of this writing (June 2016) all investigative materials of persons not subsequently "rehabilitated" are still being refused to researchers by the FSB, which is the successor to the KGB — MGB — MVD — NKVD. Ezhov has been denied "rehabilitation" so his file, which must be very large, is not open to researchers. We have to work with what is available. I have collected and translated those texts that have been published.

Certain other materials are also being withheld. One example is the transcript of the Tukhachevskii trial of June 11, 1937. All the military men convicted at it have long since been "rehabilitated." But as of early 2016 the FSB claims that the trial transcript is still at the Procuracy, meaning that it is still under investigation. We assume that this is a legal-sounding subterfuge to prevent the transcript of this trial from being made public. From other evidence we know that the trial transcript would provide the strongest possible proof that Tukhachevskii and the other military leaders were guilty and that the conspiracies alleged in the Moscow Trials were also genuine.

I have compiled and translated all the Ezhov interrogations now available from the following "semi-official" sources:

- Briukhanov, Boris Borisovich, and Shoshkov, Evgenii Nikolaevich. Opravdaniiu ne podlezhit. Ezhovshchina 1936-1938 gg. Sankt-Peterburg: OOO "Petrovskii Fond" 1998.
- Polianskii, Aleksei. Ezhov. Istoriia «zheleznogo» stalinskogo narkoma. Moscow: «Veche», «Aria-AiF», 2001.

- Pavliukov, Aleksei. Ezhov. Biografiia. Moscow: Zakharov, 2007.

A few remarks have been taken from Vassilii Soima, Zapreshchennyi Stalin, Chast' 1. Moscow: OLMA-PRESS, 2001.

I consider these sources to be "semi-official" since they are quoted unproblematically by all the anticommunist scholars. For the most part these scholars ignore these confessions and what they may imply concerning Ezhov's mass repressions. No one, however, has made any argument that the documents are false.

I have made available online the original Russian text and English translations of all the extant interrogation-confessions of Ezhov's. (Ezhov, Interrogations) Here I examine only those interrogation-confessions that bear directly on the question of the mass repressions and quote only selections from them.

In some cases we are told that we have direct quotations from Ezhov's interrogation-confessions. In other cases the authors have summarized parts of the texts of the interrogations. Usually they have done so without telling us why they have chosen some parts and what they have left out. However, the small part of Ezhov's investigative file now public is enough to give us vital evidence about Ezhov's mass repressions.

Ezhov interrogation of April 18 — 20, 1939

According to Pavliukov this is the first confession in Ezhov's file. The quotations are from pp. 519-520 & n. 481 p. 564. The summary is on pp. 520-521.

Summary of other parts of Ezhov's statement.

Ezhov started the history of his "fall into sin" in 1921, when he worked in Tartaria and under the influence of anarcho-syndicalist ideas supposedly joined the local group of the 'Workers' Opposition.' In the following years, the period of inner-party discussions of the 1930s, he also supposedly expressed differences in his political views with the general line of the party. However, the investigators showed no interest in digging so deeply into the garbage-heap of history, and they did not permit Ezhov to deviate long from the basic theme.

Quotation:

Question: What is the point of this expansive story about these or those 'political waverings' of yours? As a long-time agent of foreign intelligence services you must confess about your direct espionage work. Talk about that!

Answer: All right, I will do directly to the moment when my espionage ties were formed.

Pavliukov's summary continues:

Ezhov related that he was drawn into espionage work by his friend F.M. Konar*, who had long been a Polish agent. Konar learned political news from Ezhov and gave them to his bosses in Poland and on one occasion told Ezhov about this and proposed that he volunteer to begin working for the Poles. Since Ezhov had in fact already become an informant of Polish intelligence, since he had transmitted to them via Konar many significant party and state secrets, he supposedly had no other choice than to agree with this proposal.

* F.M. Konar — An assistant Commissar of Agriculture, he was among those convicted and executed in March 1933 for sabotage in agriculture at the height of the serious famine. Konar had also been a friend of the poet Osip Mandel'shtam, according to Mandel'shtam's daughter Nadezhda (Memoirs).

The Poles supposedly shared a part of the intelligence received from Ezhov with their allies the Germans, and so after a time an offer of collaboration from the latter was also made.

According to Ezhov Marshal A.I. Egorov, first assistant Commissar for Defense, acted as the middleman [between Ezhov and the Germans]. He met with Ezhov in the summer of 1937 and told him that he knew about the latter's ties with the Poles, that he himself was a German spy who on orders from the German authorities had organized a group of conspirators in the Red Army, and that he had been given a directive to establish close working contact between his group and Ezhov.

Ezhov agreed with this proposal and promised to protect Egorov's men from arrest.

Ezhov interrogation of April 30, 1939

This Ezhov interrogation is taken from Pavliukov 525-6 & n. 489 p. 564. According to Pavliukov p. 526, Ezhov named 66 of his fellow conspirators in this one interrogation.

Summary:

The first stage of the investigation was completed on April 30, 1939. In the course of the interrogation that took place on that day Ezhov told about the method of recruiting his subordinates in the Cheka into the anti-Soviet conspiracy and about the basic direction of the sabotage work in the NKVD. This sabotage consisted in massive arrests without any basis, falsification of investigative materials, forgeries, and reprisals against undesirable elements.

Quotation (Pavliukov 525-6)

All this was done in order to cause widespread dissatisfaction in the population with the leadership of the Party and the Soviet government and in that way to create the most favorable base for carrying out our conspiratorial plans.

Here Ezhov confirms the reason for his mass repressions and executions. This is good evidence that this — Ezhov's conspiracy — and not any initiative by Stalin, was the basic cause of the "Ezhovshchina."

Ezhov interrogation of May 5, 1939

Pavliukov summarizes it on p. 526, with no quotations or notes.

Summary:

...at his interrogation of May 5 1939 Ezhov recounted the work of the "conspirators" in the Commissariat of Foreign Affairs. Here at that same time took place the beginning of the large-scale purge (after the removal of M.M. Litvinov, the director of the division of foreign political affairs). Therefore the theme of subversive activity in the Commissariat of Foreign Affairs was especially timely in those days.

Ezhov stated that the goal of this activity was the creation of conditions for the victory of Germany and Japan in the inevitable war with the USSR. Specifically, they undertook attempts to create disagreements between the Chinese government of Chiang Kai-shek and the Soviet authorities, for the purpose, in the last analysis, of facilitating Japanese seizure of the Soviet Far East.

Here Ezhov confirmed that his general goal was the same as that of the Rightists and Trotskyists, as outlined in the Second and Third Moscow Trials.

Ezhov interrogation of June 21, 1939

This is taken from Polianskii pp. 235-238. It is summarized by Pavliukov on p. 527.

Rodos: If you intend to lie again and make fun of the investigation, then we will not waste our time. I'd prefer to send you back to prison for a week or so to think it over.

These words suggest that Ezhov was not being tortured or indeed subjected to any physical abuse.

Ezhov confirms his espionage work for Germany.

Ezhov: I admit that I was connected with Zhukovskii in espionage work for Germany since 1932. The fact that I tried to conceal that circumstance from the investigation can be explained only by my cowardice, which I showed at the beginning of the investigation when I tried to minimize my personal guilt, and since my espionage link with Zhukovskii concealed my even earlier ties with German intelligence, it was hard for me to speak [about them] at the first interrogation.

In the direct quotation below taken from this interrogation Ezhov tells how he arranged for Zhukovskii to be recruited by the Germans on the strength of his (Zhukovskii's) obvious pro-Trotskyist views.

Not long before Zhukovskii's arrival there arrived at the office of foreign groups, which at that time was also a part of the Raspredotdel of the CC of the Party and was under my supervision, there had arrived materials that characterized Zhukovskii in an extremely negative way. From these materials it was obvious that Zhukovskii had carried out a number of trade operations that had been unprofitable for the Commissariat of Foreign Trade. From these materials it was also obvious that in Berlin Zhukovskii was involved with the Trotskyists and spoke in their defense even at the official Party gatherings of the Soviet colony [Soviet citizens residing in Berlin.]

Semion Borisovich Zhukovskii did not join the NKVD until October 15, 1936. Before that he was involved in foreign trade, which would have often taken him abroad.

Ezhov considered Zhukovskii's Trotskyist sympathies as qualifying him for recruitment as a spy. This is consistent with what we know about Trotsky's conspiracy with Germany, which Trotsky of course denied.¹

Ezhov interrogation by Rodos of July 2, 1939

This is taken from Pilianskii pp. 252-260.

In this passage Ezhov reveals that he was involved in anti-Party activities long before he was appointed to the NKVD in August 1936.

Ezhov: In my hands at that time was in fact all the work of reassigning of leading cadres. Choosing their activities, punishment, directing them for work abroad. So I did everything that a saboteur could do in such positions. I directed to leading positions people who were weak in professional, political, and moral sense, people who could ruin production, undermine the fulfillment of the Five-Year Plan. To compromise the Party. In the Party Control Commission I managed things so as to cover up and not disclose elements hostile to the Party, and to deprive of Party membership and shut out in every way those who were loyal to the Party. Abroad I tried to send those who would probably become spies or non-returnees.

Rodos: What tasks did Mnatsakanov² give you? Did you hand over to him secret NKVD information?

Ezhov: He was not interested in secret NKVD information. In the leadership of the Commissariat on the level of heads of departments and their assistants were Gestapo agents. Then many of them were exposed, as was Mnatsakanov himself. These agents knew more detailed information than I did. So I told him about Politburo sessions, CC plenums, conversations with Stalin, Molotov, Kaganovich and other leaders, related to him the contents of secret letters and telegrams of the Central Committee and the Council of People's Commissars.

It has long been known that documents supposedly coming from the Soviet Politburo made their way during the 1930s to the German government. We don't know whether they came from Mnatsakanov, from one or more other

German agents, or whether they were forgeries foisted off on the Germans for profit.³

From Polianskii pp. 262-268

This interrogation concerns Ezhov's NKVD conspiracy, of which the mass repressions known as the "Ezhovshchina" or "Great Terror" form an important part.

Question: Tell us how and when you recruited Uspenskii in the espionage-sabotage organization in the NKVD that you had created.

Answer: I turned my attention to Uspenskii already at the beginning of 1936.

Question: That was when he was still the assistant commandant of the Moscow Kremlin for internal security?

Answer: Yes.

Q: Where did you find out about Uspenskii's hostile anti-Soviet views. Did he express them to you himself?

A: No. Veinshtok and Frinovskii told me about that. They knew him well and believed that he'd be very suitable for espionage work.

Q: Did you recruit Uspenskii personally?

A: Yes. That was right after my arrival in the Commissariat. He quickly agreed and I told him that we needed our own men in the provinces. That was why I sent him to Western Siberia.

Q: What kinds of assignments did you give him then?

A: He was supposed to recruit agents into our organization from among the Chekist⁴ cadre and to promote them to leading positions so that they could seize power in the event of war or a coup.

Q: In November 1937 you sent Uspenskii a coded message with the following content: "If you think you are going to sit in Orenburg for five years, you are mistaken. Very soon, it seems, I will have to promote you to a more responsible post."

Q: What is the meaning of this message?

A: At that time the leadership of our organization decided to move to active measures. There was a lot of evidence against Leplevskii and Zakovskii showing that they were spies and enemies of the people. It was impossible to hide such matters, and we had to get rid of these people, we couldn't use them, they could cause everything to fail. We decided to replace them with Uspenskii and Litvin. I gave Uspenskii a coded message so that he would find out about his forthcoming departure from Orenburg and would switch all the sabotage-espionage work over to other people whom he had been able to recruit there.

In September of that year [1938] Litvin was in Moscow and used to come to my dacha. He told me that the arrival of Beria at the NKVD⁵ was the beginning of the end and soon we would all be arrested, since the Party was most likely aware about our plot. And he also said that he would not give himself up alive and that if they unexpectedly recalled him to Moscow he would shoot himself. That's what happened.

Q: Did Shapiro carry out sabotage activity in the Commissariat of Agriculture on your instruction?

A: Yes, he did. But for a short time only. I decided to take him into the Central Committee, since there I needed people for subversive work.

Q: He knew that you were a German spy?

A: Yes, I told him that together we would work for German intelligence, so as later to overthrow the government and come to power if there were a war with Germany.

⁴ "Chekist" means NKVD man. The original name for the police organization was "Cheka," an acronym for "Extraordinary Commission" for combating counterrevolution.

⁵ Lavrentii Pavlovich Beria was appointed to be Ezhov's second-in-command on August 22, 1938. This was clearly a sign that Stalin and the Politburo no longer entirely trusted Ezhov.

Ezhov and Liushkov

When NKVD General Genrikh Samoilovich Liushkov, chief of the NKVD in the Far Eastern Region, defected to the Japanese in June 1938 few persons took his statements as anything more than propaganda. The New York Times reported with skepticism on his press conferences under Japanese military auspices. However, since Khrushchev's "Secret Speech" Liushkov's accusations against Stalin have fit into the "anti-Stalin paradigm" and so have been accepted as truthful by historians of the USSR.

Liushkov claimed that all the conspiracies alleged in the Moscow Trials and confessions by the defendants were fabrications by Stalin and that no such conspiracies existed. Liushkov also claimed that despite their confessions at the First Moscow Trial of August 1936 Zinoviev and Kamenev had nothing to do with the murder of Sergei Kirov. Indeed Matthew Lenoe, author of a mainstream study of the Kirov murder, accepts these statements by Liushkov as the most important evidence concerning the Kirov murder.

In 1999 American professor Alvin D. Coox published a two-part article in which he revealed that Liushkov had lied at his press conferences. Privately, he had told his Japanese military handlers that in fact there were conspiracies among Party and military leaders in the Far Eastern Region and that the conspirators were linked with the Rights through Aleksei Rykov, one of the major defendants in the Third Moscow Trial of March 1938. Lenoë had simply failed to mention this fact, which disproves his whole thesis about the Kirov murder and, in fact, dismantles much of the "anti-Stalin paradigm" by itself. We have examined Liushkov's statements to the Japanese in Chapter 17 of The Murder of Sergei Kirov.

Coox did not know that Liushkov himself was a conspirator who was guilty of the mass executions of innocent people. In his 2000 doctoral dissertation Steven E. Merritt discussed material from former Soviet archives that revealed something of Liushkov's bloody prints in the mass murders of the Far Eastern Region. (Merritt, Purges, Chapter 8) But that in itself did not suggest that Liushkov was any more than an agent of Stalin. Perhaps, as the anti-Stalin paradigm dictates, it was Stalin who was ordering the mass repressions and that Ezhov was, in the words of Jansen and Petrov, only his "loyal executioner?"

In the present interrogation-confession of July 8, 1939 Ezhov discloses that Liushkov was a member of his, Ezhov's, NKVD conspiracy. Because of its importance we reproduce the whole of this section of Ezhov's statement, still from Polianskii.

A: I recruited Liushkov right after his return from Leningrad from the investigation of Kirov's murder. At that time I was already secretary of the Central Committee and Liushkov knew that I was beginning to oversee the NKVD. Therefore, when I called him to my office and hinted that I had information about his ties with the Petliurovists during the civil war in the Ukraine and other incriminating facts, he was frightened and immediately agreed to work for me as a German-Japanese intelligence man.

Q: Did you really have that kind of information?

A: No, I did not have. I made it all up in order to recruit Liushkov. But I guessed that he was a hostile element with a foul past, and turned out to be correct. Liushkov agreed to become a spy.

Q: How did you order Liushkov to flee to the Japanese?

A: Frinovskii often told me that he did not like Liushkov. He was cowardly and could betray us all at any moment. Upon our orders he was carrying out important espionage tasks for Japanese intelligence and knew a great deal about our subversive and sabotage work. Frinovskii said that he had to get rid of him, that means, kill him. And he told me that he would take care of that himself. I decided not to hinder him.

Q: Did Frinovskii say how he wanted to kill Liushkov?

A: No. But I think the he wanted to arrest him first, and then in the inner prison to poison him or put him to death somehow.

Q: What a gang! And who warned Liushkov anyway about the danger?

A: I don't know. But Frinovskii wanted to appoint Gorbach from Novosibirsk to Liushkov's place and recall the latter to Moscow, supposedly for a new job, but in reality to arrest him. Liushkov, most likely, found out that Gorbach was already on route to Khabarovsk, and fled across the border.

It has always been a mystery how Liushkov succeeded in walking unscathed across the heavily-guarded border between the USSR and Japanese-occupied Manchukuo. Logic alone suggests that Liushkov must have had some arrangement with the Japanese. Ezhov's confession confirms this: Liushkov was a Japanese spy and a part of Ezhov's conspiracy. His crossing of the border to the Japanese may have been prearranged with the Japanese border guard.

From Polianskiii pp. 272-275.

Ezhov: The use of poisons for the purpose of terror against the government was discussed by us, when our original plan of a coup d'état and seizure of power fell apart.

Q: Tell us about this in more detail.

A: Already in the summer of last year our organization took the decision to organize a military coup on the 7th of November.

Q: Who was present at this assembly and where did it take place?

A: It took place at my dacha. Present were Frinovskii, Evdokimov, Dagin, Zhurbenko, Zhukovskii, and Nikolaev-Zhurid. That was, so to speak, the general staff of our subversive organization. Oh, I forgot, Litvin was also there, he was coming to Moscow at that time on official business.

Q: What did you discuss there at the dacha?

A: We decided that the interior troops [of the NKVD — GF] that were in Moscow and were under the command of Frinovskii as first assistant to the Commissar would carry out the coup. As for him, he should prepare a fighting group that would annihilate the members of the government in attendance at the parade. Then we decided to confirm a final plan for the coup in September or October and to send around directive to our people in the republics and oblasts' about what they should do on the seventh of November.

Q: And this meeting took place, who was present at it?

A: There were only three of us. Frinovskii, Zhukovskii, and I. Either the end of September or the beginning of October we met in my office.

Q: And what did you discuss?

A: At that time the possibilities of our organization had been seriously disrupted by the arrival of Beria in the NKVD. He replaced Frinovskii, and we could no longer use the internal troops.

Q: But why, he must have had his agents there?

A: Yes, he did have his agents, but obviously Beria already had information about our conspiracy and arrested almost all of them in September. I could not prevent these arrests or I would have exposed myself. Then Frinovskii proposed that we put off the coup and take power by means of poisoning the members of the government and in the first place Stalin, Molotov and Voroshilov. Their deaths would have immediately caused confusion in the country and we would have taken advantage of this and seized power. We calculated that we could then arrest all the people in the government and the NKVD who were unsuitable for us, and to claim that they were conspirators guilty in the deaths of the leaders.

...Frinovskii then said that Dagin would carry out the poisoning, and that Alekhin and Zhukovskii would give him the poisons, and we decided to carry out this terrorist act when the requisite poisons were collected. We agreed to meet when Dagin had the poisons and to put together a detailed plan for the coup. But Zhukovskii was unexpectedly arrested, a few days after this meeting, and after him Alekhin and Dagin, and I do not know whether or not Dagin received the poisons.

These three men were indeed all arrested during Ezhov's last months as head of the NKVD. Ezhov gets the order of their arrests wrong. According to the information now available Mikhail Sergeevich Alekhin was arrested on September 19, 1938; S.B. Zhukovskii on October 23; and Izrail' Iakovlevich Dagin on November 5, less than 48 hours before the conspirators had planned to strike at Stalin and the Politburo during the celebration of the twenty-first anniversary of the Bolshevik Revolution on November 7.

Ezhov interrogation 08.02.39 by Rodos

Polianskii pp. 275-280; Briukhanov & Shoshkov 139-142. Some text is in both of them.

NKVD means "People's Commissariat of Internal Affairs." Its area of responsibility went far beyond that of police work and included labor camps. Ezhov discusses how he and his accomplices utilized the vast resources of the labor camps and the hundreds of thousands of prisoners in an attempt to further their conspiracy.

Sabotage and mismanagement in the construction sites flourished with complete impunity. We managed to go over completely to questions of defense construction, achieving practical control over a significant part of it. This gave us the possibility in case of need in our conspiratorial goals to vary and carry out different subversive measures which could help accomplish the defeat of the USSR in wartime and our coming to power.

...The greatest population of prisoners was in the border regions of the far Eastern borders. Here it was very easy for us to take over different economic tasks of a defense nature because of the lack of workers. However the camps of the Far Eastern Region were situated not only near to the borders but we sent there mostly prisoners sentenced for espionage, diversion, terror and other more serious crimes, and we sent almost no so-called "ordinary" prisoners.

In this way along the borders of the FER, in the direct rear of the Red Army was prepared the most active and embittered counterrevolutionary force, which we planned to use in the widest possible manner in case of complication or of war with the Japanese... A significant quantity of prisoners were concentrated on our western borders of Ukraine, Belorussia, the Leningrad oblast', and the Karelian ASSR, especially in road construction.

... The whole conspiratorial plan of the regime we created for the prisoners consisted in that the most privileged conditions were created for the prisoners sentenced for the most serious crimes (espionage and terrorism), since that was the qualified force that would often be used for directing the administrative and economic work in the camps. In their hands was concentrated also all the cultural and educational work of the prisoners. It is clear in what spirit they were educated. Finally the regime created in the camps often permitted the counterrevolutionary activity of the prisoners to continue with complete impunity.

In the camps the work of the so-called 3rd sections was so badly organized and the camps were guarded so poorly, that the prisoners had the possibility of creating their own counterrevolutionary groups in the camps and to associate with each other at will. Facts like this were many. The guard of the camps was extremely small, made up of unreliable people, the material situation of the soldiers and the command staff was very poor, and, finally, the prisoners themselves were used in many cases in the capacity of guards. As a result of a security organized like this there were many cases of mass escapes from the camps. We fought against this evil so poorly and did so consciously, in the hopes that the escapees from the camps would continue their counterrevolutionary activity and would become a force that would spread all kinds of anti-Soviet agitation and rumors. (Briukhanov and Shoshkov 140. The final paragraph above is also in Polianskii 279).

At the beginning of 1937 Frinovskii and I conferred with each other and decided that we had to have our own man in the Far East, through whom we could maintain contact with Japanese intelligence. In the event of an attack by the Japanese he was to let the counterrevolutionaries out of the camps, seize with their help the stores of arms and military supplies, and then head terrorist-diversionist work in the rear of the Red Army. We thought about this and chose Liushkov for these purposes, whom I had already recruited for our organization in 1936. Then I transferred him from the Azovo-Chernomorskii region and made him the head of the NKVD in the Far Eastern Region.

Q: In which other areas did you create the same kind of espionage-diversionist centers?

A: We also did this in the western borders of the USSR. A significant quantity of prisoners were concentrated on our western borders of Ukraine, Belorussia, the Leningrad oblast', and the Karelian ASSR.

Q: In Leningrad oblast and Karelia Litvin was in charge for you, of course?

A: Yes. I sent him there specially at the beginning of 1938 instead of Zakovskii, whom I could not fully trust.

Q: And in the Ukraine?

A: There Uspenskii carried out all the assignments, including contact with Polish and German intelligence. That is why I made him Commissar of Internal Affairs of the Ukraine.

Ezhov also discussed his use of GULAG prisoners in a face-to-face confrontation (ochnaia stavka) with Zhukovskii on July 21, 1939. This is in Polianskii, pp. 269-272; in Briukhanov and Shoshkov, pp. 138-139.

We conspirators had special plans about the GULAG about which I have given detailed confessions, and I decided to bring Zhukovskii up to date. By this time the people who could have exposed Zhukovskii along the lines of this Trotskyist and espionage connections were already condemned and the danger of Zhukovskii's arrest had passed. I told Zhukovskii about the existence of the conspiracy in the NKVD, that the conspiratorial organization is connected with government circles of Germany, Poland, and Japan. I don't remember exactly now, but I think that I told him about our desire to get into contact with the English. Then I told him about the leading members of the conspiratorial organization and about our plans, specifically about our terrorist plans...

... The conspiratorial assignments concerning the GULAG that I gave to Zhukovskii consisted in this: we sent to work in the GULAG a very great quantity of compromised people. We could not leave them in the operational work, but we kept them in the GULAG for the purpose of forming a sort of reserve for conspiracies in the case of a coup in the country. I assigned Zhukovskii to maintain these people, but not to connect himself with them along conspiratorial lines, but to carry out all conspiratorial assignments that came to the GULAG through these people...

There were two variants of our plans. The first variant: in the case of war, when we proposed to carry out the arrests of the members of the government and their physical removal. And the second variant: if there were no war in the immediate future, then to get rid of the leadership of the Party and the government, especially Stalin and Molotov, by carrying out terrorist acts against them.

The "two variants" outlined below by Ezhov are the same as those described by the defendants in the Second Moscow Trial and by the conspirators in the clandestine Zinovievist group that murdered Sergei Kirov on December 1, 1934.

Ezhov interrogation by Rodos of August 3, 1939

Text from Polianskii pp. 280-284.

This is an extended explanation of how Ezhov and his men used the GULAG camps to sabotage the Soviet economy, in conjunction with German and Japanese intelligence.

Q: Name the concrete properties where sabotage was carried out according to your instructions.

A: The construction of the Ukhto-Pechersk road has a decisive meaning for the development of the extraction of coal, oil, and other valuable products, without which the economic development of the Northern region as a whole is impossible. Meanwhile the construction of this road was retarded by us deliberately and in every way, under various pretexts and the resources allotted to it were spread over a large area of work and did not have any effect. The retardation in the construction of the Ukhto-Pechersk railroad is explained in the main by the lack of a satisfactory plan, which the Commissariat of Roads and Rails should present. The saboteurs in the GULAG and in the Commissariat of Roads and Rails without our support organized a never-ending dispute about the choice of the direction of the roads, which has been going on for a long time now, and the planning and even the exploratory works in many sectors have not been begun to this day.

Ezhov gives a detailed discussion, which we omit here, of sabotage activity in Kolyma.

Ezhov also discusses the use of GULAG prisoners as a part of their conspiracy. The text given here by Polianskii is also in Briukhanov and Shoshkov, where it is attributed to an August 2, 1939 interrogation of Ezhov.

Q: What subversive, espionage and sabotage activity did you carry out in the GULAG itself?

A: We understood, that the expansion of the economic functions of the NKVD must express themselves in the worsening of our basic operative work. We proposed to widely use the system of camps so as to send there the compromised part of NKVD workers. There are not only drunkards, idlers and wastrels. Among them were people with a Trotskyist past, Rights who sympathized with Bukharin, and Iagoda's people. De-facto they were all recruited by us since, in sending them to the GULAG, we were hinting to them that we had evidence against them that could be investigated at any moment. In this manner we created a special reserve of people read to carry out any conspiratorial task.

But there were many anti-Soviet elements in the GULAG even without this. The conspiratorial leadership of the GULAG remained, for all practical purposes, unreplaced. At the time of my arrival in the NKVD the GULAG was headed by the conspirator of Iagoda's group Matvei Berman, Boris Berman's older brother. He had put together a large anti-Soviet group of people who occupied more or less responsible posts in the GULAG. Among these people were a great many Trotskyists, Zinovievists, Rights, and it was easy to attract them to our side after Berman left when the GULAG was headed by Ryzhov, a participant of the conspiracy recruited by me, who was sent to this work on my initiative in order to carry out sabotage assignments. And after his departure for the Commissariat of Forests, the GULAG was headed by the conspirator and spy Zhukovskii, who was connected with me and who was at the same time my assistant.

Accounts of the GULAG agree that conditions in the camps were bad during 1937-1938 and improved immediately upon Beria's taking over the NKVD from Ezhov. Ezhov's account here explains this. This fact also helps to exonerate the Stalin leadership, since it was they who replaced Ezhov with Beria.

Evgeniia Ginzberg, who was in Iaroslavl' Prison and who saw no newspapers, said that the prisoners could tell when Ezhov fell: The draconian regime in the prisons (frequent solitary confinement and deprivation of all privileges) was relaxed one day. The timing was confirmed a few days later when Beria's name began to appear on official prison notices. (Getty, Origins 189)

Chapter 15: The Testimony of Stanislav Frantsevich Redens

In October 2016 my colleague Vladimir L. Bobrov of Moscow sent me some important materials from the NKVD investigative file of Stanislav F. Redens. From July 1934 to January 1938 Redens headed the directorate of the NKVD (UNKVD) of Moscow oblast'. In November 1935 he was promoted to the rank of Commissar of the State Security, 1st rank. From January 1938 until his arrest in September 1938 Redens was People's Commissar (= minister) of Internal Affairs of the Kazakh SSR.

Redens was one of Ezhov's main co-conspirators, a spy and a mass murderer. His file is available to us only by a historical fluke. As of 2016 the FSB archive in Moscow makes available only the files of persons who have been "rehabilitated." As we shall see Redens confessed to capital crimes. His confessions were confirmed by other of Ezhov's NKVD men, including by Ezhov himself.

But Redens was "rehabilitated" in 1961, on the appeal of his wife Anna S. Allilueva¹ and reportedly at the specific command of Nikita Khrushchev. The "rehabilitation" document, available in his NKVD file, states the following:

From the rehabilitation determination No. 4n-1304/61 of the Military Collegium of the Supreme Court of the USSR of 16 November 1961 concerning Redens S.F.

p. 373

As the case file establishes REDENS, while working as chief of the UNKVD of Moscow oblast' and Narkom [People's Commissar] of Internal Affairs of the Kazakh SSR, carried out baseless arrests of Soviet citizens, used illegal methods of interrogation against arrested persons, and falsified investigation materials, and his actions, as indicated in the conclusion, fall under the article of the Criminal Code concerning responsibility from crimes committed while in office.

However, at the present time it is not expedient to decide this question concerning the classification of these actions of REDENS.

In 1988 and 1989 Redens' rehabilitation was reviewed by the Procuracy of the USSR and his crimes were reaffirmed. But the legal period for withdrawing his rehabilitation had long elapsed, so Redens' rehabilitation remains in effect.²

¹ Anna Sergeevna Allilueva was the sister of Stalin's second wife Nadezhda S. Allilueva, so Redens was Stalin's brother-in-law.

At this present time, therefore, Redens' file is the only file, of all those of Ezhov's closest henchmen, including Ezhov himself, which is open to researchers. Moreover, it includes materials from the files of other NKVD men, including of Ezhov himself, that bear on Redens' case. For example, it contains the transcript of one face-to-face confrontation, or ochnaia stavka, between Redens and Ezhov. Here we only cite a few quotations from this file.³

Ezhov's Conspiracy

From the Transcript of the interrogation of the prisoner REDENS Stanislav Frantsevich of 28 May 1939:

...EVDOKIMOV beat the leader of the terrorist group "Promparty" PREDTECHENSKII and demanded that he withdraw his confessions of terror, and from the group of military conspirators he demanded retraction of their confessions about TUKHACHEVSKII. (1, 291)

EZHOV, with KOSAREV and AGRANOV were sent to Leningrad in 1934 to oversee the investigation of the murder of S.M. KIROV and see that it was done properly. He did not do this and instead of working he got drunk with ZAKOVSKII. As a result of EZHOV'S inactivity LUR'E, ("Emil"), TROTSKY'S emissary to the Soviet Union who had been named in SAFAROV'S confessions, was not arrested in time. The arrest of LUR'E would have made possible the discovery of the role of German intelligence of TROTSKY'S and ZINOVIEV'S in the murder of S.M. KIROV. (1, 300)

After that I helped EZHOV and FRINOVSKII to retain IAGODA'S men in leading positions in the NKVD despite that fact that IAGODA'S own confessions named many of them.

Although we had agent reports from our secret agent ZAFRAN I suppressed these signals and did not expose the hostile (literally: "enemy") activities of the Trotskyist center in Moscow led by RADEK, I.N. SMIRNOV, KAMENEV and ZINOVIEV. (1, 302)

Despite the fact that the arrested group of terrorists in the field of athletics admitted their intention to carry out terrorist acts against leaders of the Party and government and confessed about STAROSTIN'S leadership role as an agent of the Gestapo, he was not arrested. (1, 303)

For more of what we now know about Trotsky's real conspiratorial activities through his adherents in the USSR see Trotsky's 'Amalgams'. We will deal with Trotsky's ties to Germany and Japan in the next volume, Trotsky's Conspiracies.

Volume 2. Concerning the Conspiracy in the NKVD Headed by Ezhov

TRANSCRIPT OF INTERROGATION

of the prisoner REDENS Stanislav Frantsevich

of 29 July 1939

Question: To what do you confess?

Answer: I confess that I am guilty of being an active participant in the anti-Soviet conspiratorial organization that existed within the NKVD.

EZHOV gave me the job of preserving all hostile (literally: "enemy") cadres. He specifically told me that in conducting the investigation not under any conditions to record for myself (samomu realizovat') all incriminating conspiratorial materials but to hand them to him personally. ... EZHOV instructed me under no conditions was I to inform the Central Committee of the Party what was going on in the NKVD without his knowledge.

Question: Was this the extent of your hostile (literally: "enemy") activity?

Answer: Of course not. I carried out hostile (literally: "enemy") work by keeping safe the conspirators within the NKVD and the Right-Trotskyist underground in Moscow and Moscow oblast'. (2, 88)

[Redens] EZHOV said to me: "The problem is not to seize power, that is not all, here is what troubles me: What will happen on the day after the coup d'état, what will the Party say? What will the Soviet people say? For the Central Committee of the Party has enormous authority among the Soviet people. So we must patiently undermine the authority of the Politburo members. We must prepare everything very well, so everything seem to happen naturally." (2, 93)

Mass repressions

Redens' testimony fully confirms the account of the mass operations that we find in Ezhov's and Frinovskii's statements and interrogations. As Redens stated in the preceding quotation, Ezhov's plan was to undermine the confidence of large sectors of the Soviet population by carrying out massive, violent repression, including mass murder, against innocent Soviet citizens and in the name of the State. This is in fact the phenomenon that anticommunists and Troskyists call "the great terror."

Question: What hostile (literally: "enemy") tasks did you carry out at EZHOV'S behest?

Answer: On EZHOV'S instructions I carried out hostile (literally: "enemy") work in distorting the punitive policy of Soviet power, specifically in the mass operations. Among the 36 thousand persons condemned in Moscow oblast' were many who were completely innocent. It was the same in Kazakhstan, where I demanded the intensification of the mass operations. As a result about 4000 persons were arrested and convicted without sufficient evidence. (1, 301)

Answer: EZHOV told me that the main task of the conspiratorial organization within the NKVD that he had set up was to use, in every possible way, the organs of the NKVD of the USSR, by means of the conspirators he had placed around the country, to overthrow the Party leadership and the Soviet government so that EZHOV could come to power in the USSR. To further this goal, he had set as one of the primary tasks the fomenting of dissatisfaction of the population in the country and in particular, through myself, in the capital of the USSR — Moscow and Moscow oblast'. (2, 87)

Question: How did you intend to foment the dissatisfaction of the population?

Answer: By means of the so-called mass operations for carrying out a large number of baseless arrests of Party and Soviet cadres. According to EZHOV these measure would, on the one hand, be directed at the arrest of many completely innocent persons, and on the other they would help create a great aura of authority for the organs of the NKVD and for EZHOV as its leader. (2, 88)

... EZHOV assigned me to continue in Kazakhstan to use the mass operations to foment dissatisfaction against the leadership of the Party and the country. ... in Kazakhstan I did not manage to fully develop my hostile (literally: "enemy") work, although even so I arrested around 4 thousand people, among whom many people, completely innocent, were shot. (2, 96)

EZHOV: I told REDENS that it was essential to direct the work of the conspirators in the NKVD, like those in other organizations, in every way so as to foment the dissatisfaction of the population in the country against the leadership of the Party and the government. In other words, in the NKVD this meant to carry out baseless arrests of completely innocent persons. (2, 112)

The policy of the repression — arrest and shooting — of innocent persons in order to foment dissatisfaction among the Soviet population and direct against the Party and government, is repeated in many other passages in the Redens file. Redens' testimony confirms Ezhov's testimony as we have outlined it in previous chapters.

We conclude this section with one quotation from face-to-face confrontation, dated August 28, 1939 between Ezhov's assistant Frinovskii, whose confession statement we examined in an earlier chapter, and Aleksei A. Nasedkin, another of Ezhov's NKVD henchmen. Nasedkin was arrested under Beria in December, 1938, and was tried, convicted, and executed in late January, 1940, at the same time as Ezhov and many of his men, including Redens.⁴ Apparently this document was inserted into the Redens file because the evidence of these two NKVD men was used in Redens' case. We do not have access to either Frinovskii's or Nasedkin's investigative files, as neither has been "rehabilitated."

[NASEDKIN]: FRINOVSKII told me that the conspiratorial organization set as its goal the elimination of the existing leadership of the Party and government but he failed to say only by what methods he intended to accomplish this. In giving me instructions on practical hostile (literally: "enemy") work FRINOVSKII told me to develop more widely the mass operations and to compromise the current Party leadership by the arrests of innocent persons.

Coup d'état and plot to seize power

Question: When did you intend to carry out your evil plan of a coup in our country?

Answer: Please believe me that I was not informed about all the plans that EZHOV mentioned. For conspiratorial purposes there were many things he did not tell me. Still, after my frequent questions about this EZHOV told me that he intended to carry out this coup in either 1938 or 1939. (2, 89-90)

Question to REDENS: Did EZHOV tell you about the goals and tasks of the anti-Soviet conspiratorial organization?

Answer: After I had been recruited EZHOV informed me generally about the goals and tasks of the anti-Soviet conspiratorial organization. EZHOV told me that the main task of the conspiratorial organization that he had created within the NKVD was the overthrow of the leadership of the Party and the Soviet government so EZHOV'S coming to power in the USSR. To these goals, EZHOV said, was subordinated all the work of the conspirators whom he had spread around in the apparatus of the NKVD of the USSR. (2, 109)

Question to EZHOV: Do you confirm this?

EZHOV: During the period of my conspiratorial ties with REDENS I fully informed him of the course of the goals set before the conspiratorial organization. I told REDENS that once a suitable time had been chosen and an essential pretext created for carrying out the coup in the country, it would be essential to replace the current leadership of the Party and government and to seize power in our own hands.

I told REDENS about the two plans for a possible seizure of power. The first was to schedule the seizure of power at the beginning of a war. The second did not exclude the possibility of seizing power in the country before war, if a suitable moment were to occur. (2, 110)

[EZHOV]: It should be understood that in these conversations the plan to seize power by means of terrorist acts were always stressed, for without them no coup could be carried out. (2, 112)

[EZHOV]: Fifthly, in one of our talks I gave REDENS the assignment of scrutinizing the people around him for the purpose of bringing them in to carry out terrorist acts against the leadership of the Party and government. (2, 115)

[EZHOV]: ... I really did intend to use poisons in my terroristic goals against the members of the Politburo of the CC VKP(b). Specifically, I assigned REDENS to take steps to poison STALIN since I knew that he would be able to carry this out.⁵ (2, 120)

⁵ Presumably because Redens was related by marriage to Stalin and would be able to gain access to him.

German and Other Foreign Connections

[REDENS]: To this EZHOV added: "As you see, both internal and foreign affairs are now in my hands and the capitalist states will render us full support at the necessary moment, i.e. at the time of the coup in the country."

Question: Which states?

Answer: EZHOV was referring to Germany and England. (1, 91)

[REDENS]: EZHOV told me something like this: "Class struggle continues, even though the Trotskyists, Zinovievists, and Rights have been crushed, and the crushing of the conspiratorial organizations in the Red Army is taking place.

None of this happened because the conspirators in the USSR wanted it to happen. In spite of our own will and wishes there is necessity, coercion. Whether this or that conspirator wishes it or not he must carry out the orders of his real "bosses," who are abroad.

You, REDENS, have one group of bosses and I another. Who these are you do not have to know now; you will know in time."

Question: Stop trying to wiggle out of it. You knew exactly about EZHOV'S "bosses." Why don't you talk directly about them?

Answer: Please believe me when I say that I do not know exactly who EZHOV'S "bosses" are. But I presume that he was connected with either German or English intelligence. (2, 91-92)

[EZHOV]: At last, as my fundamental resources I told REDENS about my ties to the government circles of Germany, Poland, England, and Japan. (2, 112)

[REDENS]: EZHOV told me: "If on the periphery I am more or less at ease, then here at the center it will be more difficult to carry out the coup, everything must be well prepared so as not to fail, as it is easy to lose one's head, if you do anything carelessly all will be lost. I have the experience of the failure of the others, I have studied all their mistakes and believe that I'll carry out the matter well to the end, I will not hurry, but I also cannot drag it out too long, because somebody is insisting on speeding up the coup."

Question to REDENS: Who, exactly, was insisting upon speeding up the coup?

Answer: EZHOV did not say, but it was clear that he was talking about his "bosses" — the leaders of foreign intelligence services.

In other passages Redens makes it clear that Genrikh S. Liushkov, a Iagoda man, was retained by Ezhov. Iagoda had named Liushkov in his confessions but Ezhov refused to use these confessions, saying that "Liushkov is ours, " "we trust Liushkov completely," and "we will not let Iagoda compromise Liushkov." On the point of being identified and arrested, Liushkov deserted to the Japanese in June 1938. Liushkov proceeded to claim for propaganda purposes that all the Moscow Trials had been Stalin's fabrications. Meanwhile, he told his Japanese handlers that these conspiracies really did exist. Now we know that Liushkov was an important figure in Ezhov's conspiracy.

Conclusion

The testimony of Redens, Ezhov, and others contained in Redens' investigative file confirms the account of the Ezhovshchina documented in the earlier chapters of this book. It constitutes more evidence that the only framework of Soviet history considered "respectable" by mainstream Soviet historiography — what I have called "the anti-Stalin paradigm" — is completely false.

There is no basis to think that all this material was obtained falsely — forged, dictated to helpless prisoners, etc. — and then inserted into various investigative files for some purpose. That is in fact the local stance of those who ignore all this evidence, though they do not have the courage to state it outright.

Chapter 16. Source Criticism of Interrogations and Confessions

In the study of history it is always necessary to base one's conclusions upon primary source evidence. That primary source evidence must be studied and evaluated to assess it for reliability. This is true of all primary sources, including archival documents, memoirs, eyewitness accounts, and of course interrogations and confessions.

Any fact-claim — statement about an event that is presented as being truthful — can be deliberately false, false but not deliberately so (the person making the fact-claim aimed to give a truthful account but was mistaken), or true. This is not only the case with confessions and interrogations, but with fact-claims in all other sources as well, from archival documents to oral accounts that exist only as audio files. It is true about all fact-claims made by all persons at all times.

There is no way to prejudge the degree of truthfulness or falsehood of a fact-claim solely on the basis of what kind of source it is or who produced it. Specifically, it is not the case that fact-claims made by prisoners during interrogation are more likely to be false than fact-claims in other kinds of sources.

All sources must be carefully evaluated. An important method of evaluation is to determine whether the fact-claims made in a given primary source are consistent with fact-claims made in other independent primary sources. Often the degree to which different primary sources are independent of one another is easily determined, though sometimes it is not.

Interrogations and confessions

Much of the evidence available to researchers concerning the causes of the Ezhov mass repressions is in the form of interrogations of persons who have been arrested and are in detention — we will call them "prisoners" — and fact-claims made by them of a confessional nature, or "confessions."

In mainstream historiography of the Stalin-era Soviet Union the accepted practice is to regard all such confessions as "fabrications" — deliberately false statements dictated in some way or other by the authorities: the NKVD investigators, their supervisors, the Commissar of the NKVD himself (Iagoda, Ezhov, Beria), or Stalin. This is done without any attempt to evaluate the fact-claims made by the defendant. That is, according to a convention widely practiced in mainstream historiography of the Stalin era, there is not attempt at source criticism of prisoners' confessions. The fact-claims they make are simply discounted, ignored.

However, this is not done uniformly, in all cases. Fact-claims made by prisoners in interrogations or confessions are not ignored when they can be made to fit smoothly into the anti-Stalin paradigm. An example is the confession statement made by Mikhail Frinovskii dated April 11, 1939, that we have examined in a previous chapter. When Frinovskii outlined how Ezhov's men fabricated false confessions, his statement is treated as credible. The following statement of Frinovskii's fits well into the anti-Stalin paradigm and so is accepted as truthful.

In my opinion I would speak the truth if I declared, in general, that very often the confessions were given by the investigators, and not by those under investigation. (46)

In the same confession statement Frinovskii testifies that the Moscow Trials defendants were guilty, that the conspiracies to which they confessed were not fabricated but were true. He testifies that Bukharin, Rykov, Iagoda, and Bulanov knew that Ezhov was part of the conspiratorial bloc and did not reveal this at trial. Frinovskii testified that "Ezhov kept himself aloof" from the preparation of the Third Moscow Trial — he did not falsify it. These statements by Frinovskii do not fit the anti-Stalin paradigm. On the contrary: they dismantle it entirely. These parts of Frinovskii's statement are routinely ignored.

For example, in the recent (2015) collection by Shearer and Khaustov only the first paragraph of Frinovskii's statement is reproduced — the part where he says that he is going to confess. Nothing at all of his dramatic confession itself is given. No doubt the editors "do not believe" it. (Shearer & Khaustov 236-237)

One of the very few scholars who does at least cite this confession statement of Frinovskii's as evidence is Stephen G. Wheatcroft. In his 2007 essay Wheatcroft, one of the best mainstream historians of the Stalin period, cites Frinovskii's statement in a way that tends to undermine its validity but with no evidence provided. On page 42 Wheatcroft writes:

According to Frinovskii's forced statements taken after his arrest, Yezhov went to pieces at this time.

Check to see whether Zakovskii and all Yagoda's people have been executed, because after Beria's arrival the investigation of these cases may be renewed and they may turn against us.

Of course there are grave doubts as to how we should treat these forced depositions, but they are interesting. Either they were what really happened, or if not, then they were something that Beria's investigators were imagining could have happened. (Wheatcroft, Agency 42)

Wheatcroft completely avoids the issue of source criticism. What does "forced" mean? Are all confessions "forced?" Once you have called the deposition "forced," does that make it invalid? Wheatcroft does not discuss this obviously very important question, as though there were no way to resolve it — that is, no way to attempt to test the usefulness of this document (Frinovskii's confession statement) as evidence.

Moreover, what Wheatcroft says here is vacuous with respect to the possibilities he names: that Frinovskii was telling the truth, or that Beria's investigators "imagined" that this "could have happened." That is, it was either true or false but, if false, made to appear other than absurd. That could be said about almost any deliberate lie, since lies are normally told in a way that "could be" true.

Wheatcroft concludes:

Is it possible that in this one instance they ["these forced depositions"] may be telling us something that really happened.

Wheatcroft avoids the issue again. What does "possible" mean here? Why "in this one instance"? Why not in many instances, or in no instance at all?

It appears that Wheatcroft does not realize that in calling Frinovskii's confession "forced" he is not in fact making a statement about what Frinovskii said at all. Rather, he is telling us something about himself, his own attitude. Wheatcroft is really saying: "It is my opinion that Frinovskii's confession was 'forced'."

But the fact that Wheatcroft chooses to regard it as "forced" does not mean that it is not truthful, or is "less likely to be truthful." Likewise, the fact that some other person does not regard Frinovskii's confession as "forced" does not mean that it is truthful, or more likely to be truthful. In the absence of evidence, as here, statements such as "the confession was forced," "the confession was not forced," are statements about the person who is making the statement. They say nothing at all about the confession itself. They are not objective.

When Wheatcroft calls Frinovskii's confession "forced" he is committing the logical fallacy of petito principii, "begging the question." He is "assuming that which must be proven." What we must do is to assess Frinovskii's statement, and all historical sources, objectively.

Evaluating confessions made under interrogation

Source criticism is always necessary. It is invalid to assume that a confession is a fabrication just as it is to assume it is what the person under interrogation wanted to say.

We can, and are obligated to, evaluate — verify — interrogations and confessions in the same way we verify any other evidence. We check to see if there are any fact-claims that are also made in other documents. If there are, we ask whether they could have been "coordinated" so as to look genuine when they were not, or whether such coordination can be ruled out. In the latter case, the fact-claim can be accepted as genuine, meaning: it represents what the speaker wished to say. Sometimes we can assess it as to truthfulness as well.

In all source criticism the student must begin with studying the evidence by reading it carefully and repeatedly. We must attempt to determine the reliability of the testimony by trying to discover whether some of the fact-claims contained in it can be verified in other sources that are independent of it. When two or more independent sources agree on the same fact-claim, the likelihood that that fact-claim is true increases dramatically. If we can verify a number of fact-claims made in these interrogation confessions through independent sources, then we have established that the testimony under study should be considered to be legitimate evidence.

This is the process we have undertaken here. Every time we can check a statement made in the testimony presented here against independent evidence, we find that the testimony under consideration is verified. This means that we have no objective basis to reject these confessions.

We have devoted the first twelve chapters of Trotsky's 'Amalgams', more than 250 pages, to source criticism of the testimony given at the three Moscow Trials of August 1936, January 1937, and March 1938. We were able to check a great many fact-claims made by the defendants at those trials against independent evidence. Almost all of them proved to be true.

The few exceptions are especially interesting. In the few cases where we can determine today that a defendant lied, we can prove that he was hiding facts from the prosecution that the defendant did not want the prosecution to know. The defendant lied not to falsely inculpate himself, but to falsely exculpate himself.

This itself is evidence that the confessions are genuine, for why would the NKVD or the prosecution "force" a defendant to lie and successfully hide some crime he had indeed committed?

We are able to prove that the testimony of the defendants at the Moscow Trials was truthful whenever it can be checked. that means that the interrogation-confessions at the Moscow Trials are what they appear to be. They represent what the defendants chose to say, not what they were "forced" to say. The interrogation-confessions of the Moscow Trials defendants are therefore judged to be valid evidence.

Frinovskii's statement of April 11, 1939

In an earlier chapter we studied this important confession statement by Mikhail Frinovskii. Frinovskii confirms what we know from much other, independent evidence: that the conspiracies alleged in the First Moscow Trial against Zinoviev and Kamenev, and in the Third Moscow Trial against Bukharin, Rykov, Iagoda, and others, did in fact exist.

Absent evidence to the contrary, we can accept Frinovskii's account in this statement as falling into one of the latter two categories: either true, or what Frinovskii believed to be true. But Frinovskii's fact-claims demolish the anti-Stalin paradigm! This is why this evidence is ignored by mainstream anticommunist historians: not on objective grounds, but because it does not fit the required, but radically invalid and false, paradigm of the Stalin-era Soviet history that dominates the academic study of this period.

Source criticism of Ezhov interrogation-confessions

Ezhov's interrogation-confessions must be subjected to source criticism using the same method. We must try to check as many fact-claims made by Ezhov as we can against other sources. As in the case of Frinovskii's statement, there are not as many other sources with which to compare Ezhov's fact-claims as there are for the Moscow Trials testimony, a much larger amount of text. Nevertheless, some of Ezhov's fact-claims can be checked against other sources.

Mar'iasin

Lev Efremovich Mar'iasin was Chairman of the directorate of the State Bank. Ezhov names him in his interrogation of June 16, 1939:

Question (Investigator Rodos): Were you friends with Piatakov?

Answer: (Ezhov): Never. Mar'iasin, the president of the Gosbank, introduced us. We would get together for a drinking bout sometimes at his place, sometimes at Piatakov's. And then I always got angry with Piatakov.

...Q: ...When was this?

A: In 1930 or 1931: I can't remember now. (Polianskii, Ezhov 230-233)

Mar'iasin did not become Chairman of the Directorate of the State Bank until 1934. In 1930-1931 he was a member of the Directorate but not its chairman. By 1939, when this interrogation took place, Mar'iasin was dead. He was chairman from 1934 to 1938.

At his trial in February 1940 Ezhov repudiated his confessions and claimed they were all false. But he does confirm this specific fact-claim.

I have already told the investigation about my enmity with Piatakov. In 1931 Mar'iasin tried to make peace between us, but I refused to do it.

Here Ezhov asks the court to consult the text of one of his confessions in order to find out the truth about his attitude towards Piatakov. Here Ezhov himself verifies a fact-claim that he made in one of his confessions. Ezhov is telling the court: "This statement in that confession of mine is true." But Ezhov has just told the court that his confessions are false! Evidently he did not recognize the contradiction.

Ezhov also confirmed that Mar'iasin had been his friend:

With Mar'iasin I had personal, everyday ties for a long time.

According to Frinovskii Ezhov had ordered Mar'iasin to be beaten repeatedly.

Mar'iasin was arrested, the former chairman of the State Bank, with whom Ezhov had been in close relations before his arrest. Ezhov exhibited an exceptionally great interest in the investigation of his case. He led the investigation on his case personally and was often present at the interrogations. Mar'iasin was held the entire time in the Lefortovo prison. He was beaten ferociously and continually. If other persons under arrest were beaten only up to the moment they confessed, Mar'iasin was beaten even after the investigation had ended and no more confessions were being taken from him.

Once, as I walked around the interrogation rooms with Ezhov (and Ezhov was drunk) we dropped in on an interrogation of Mar'iasin and Ezhov spoke for a long time with Mar'iasin, told him that he had still not said everything and, in particular, made a remark to Mar'iasin about terror in general and a terror act against himself, Ezhov, and then stated that "we will beat, beat, beat you." (Frinovskii, 46)

In his confession of November 15, 1938, I.N. Dagin, one of Ezhov's "investigator-bonebreakers," testified as follows:

One time, at the end of October or the beginning of November of this year, I stayed in the Kremlin on official business. Knowing that Ezhov was not sleeping (this was about 6 o'clock in the morning) I phoned Ezhov. From his voice I could clearly tell that Ezhov was in a seriously inebriated condition.

... Suddenly Ezhov glared at me and said, gritting his teeth and clenching his fist:

"What, you have all led me on? And this Nikolayev, the swine, is giving confessions against everyone... We'll cut him to pieces.

— I had this good friend, Mar'iasin — continued Ezhov, we worked together in the CC. Mar'iasin opposed our business and for that he was beaten every day by my order...

— Mar'iasin's case was long finished, it had been set to be heard, but I arranged for it to be postponed each time in order to continue to beat Mar'iasin. I ordered them to cut off his ear, his nose, to poke out his eyes, to cut Mari'iasin into pieces. And that's the way it's going to be with all those..." (Petrov & Iansen, 350)

Both Frinovskii and Dagin testify that Ezhov had Mar'iasin savagely beaten. In his final statement at trial and after having repudiated his confessions Ezhov still admitted that he had had Mar'iasin beaten:

When he had been arrested, for a long time Mar'iasin did not confess about his espionage and provocations in relation to the members of the Politburo. That is why I gave the order to "beat up" Mar'iasin.

Frinovskii and Dagin agree that Ezhov had Mar'iasin badly beaten. Ezhov too agrees. This is another instance where Ezhov, having just declared his confessions to be false, then confirms that the confessions of others about some of his actions are true, and therefore a statement in one of his confessions is true as well.

In his interrogation of October 25, 1939, by NKVD investigator Esaulov, Ezhov claims to clarify the question of his birth.

Q: In official documents you lied that you were born in Petrograd. No information about your birth in that city has been found. Where were you born in reality?

A: I only know about the place I was born from my mother's words, from memories of my early childhood. Mother said that I was born in the city of Mariampol [today Marijampolė, Lithuania — GF], in the former Suval'sk guberniia of Lithuania. Afterwards I went to Petrograd. By means of the facts about my birth in Petrograd I wanted to portray myself in the guise of a deeply-rooted proletarian and old revolutionary.

In the confession already cited Dagin confirms Ezhov's confusion about his place of birth.

... Then we all began to review documents that Ezhov brought, and during this he made the following remark: "Here is everything almost from the day of my birth, although where I was born, I myself do not know, no one knows. I believe I was born in Leningrad, but according to the way my mother told it, somewhere on the road, the devil knows where."

... I seem to remember that sometime earlier Ezhov had somehow mumbled to me that he had been born of Polish blood, his grandfather or someone else was of Polish descent.

Once again, Dagin's confession verifies a fact-claim from one of Ezhov's confessions.

Liushkov

NKVD General Liushkov was sent to the Far East by Ezhov in 1937 and defected to the Japanese in June 1938. Under Japanese auspices Liushkov gave press conferences in which he claimed that all the allegations of conspiracies, beginning with the First Moscow Trial of August 1936 (the Zinoviev-Kamenev trial) were fabrications by Stalin. But this was purely for propaganda purposes. Privately, Liushkov gave his Japanese military handlers details about real conspiracies in the Far East among the military commanders and about their ties to the rights through Rykov. Liushkov confirmed that the conspiracies existed. His testimony, as uncovered by Alvin Coox, dismantles the anti-Stalin paradigm.

But Liushkov did not tell the Japanese, or of course admit at his press conferences, that he himself was part of Ezhov's conspiracy to overthrow Stalin, or that he himself was responsible for mass repressions, including the falsification of evidence. This was revealed by Stephen Merritt's dissertation in 2000. Merritt writes:

Material from both the testimonies of victims and the interrogations of the NKVD operatives themselves, taken when they were later arrested, bears out the claim that the arrival of Liushkov and his group signalled an increase in the use of physical torture and the wholesale fabrication of evidence. Typical of the statements made by NKVD operatives was that by Dimentman, who was to replace Vizel' as head of the Primorsk NKVD. Dimentman stated that illegal methods had begun in Khabarovsk in 1937, when he arrived with the brigade of Mironov, but that the beating and torture of arrested persons began on a mass order with the arrival of Liushkov. (348)

A.S. Suturin's book on repression in the Soviet Far East, cited by Merritt here, contains testimony by NKVD men arrested and interrogated in 1939 under Beria that attests to the fact that, under Liushkov's leadership, they engaged in beating and fabricating confessions against completely innocent persons.

On May 31, 1939, Semenov said: "With Liushkov's arrival the investigative staff of the directorate, including I, Semenov, used measures of physical action [torture — GF] against those arrested.

"Chief of the investigative section Malakhov gave the order to the investigators of the Secret-Political Section to use measures of physical action against those arrested. Together with Liushkov there arrived in the region a brigade of operations workers (Malakhov, Rysenko). They brought handcuffs which they kept in the investigative section. Upon Malakhov's orders I, Semenov, put handcuffs on the arrested person Ovchinnokov (S.I. Ovchinnikov was the First Secretary of the Ussurii obkom of the VKP(b) and a delegate to the XVII Party Congress)."

Later Semenov stated: "The whole investigative staff of the directorate took part in the beating of prisoners after handcuffing them. He personally used measures of physical action at the interrogation of the chairman of the Ussurii province executive committee Mishin, and in the same way he compiled documents against the arrested Larin, Lukin, and Bragin..." (Suturin, Delo 249)

Frinovskii claimed that Liushkov was one of Ezhov's men for whom Ezhov lied and covered up from the Central Committee and Stalin.

A second fact about which I became aware after I left the NKVD. Ezhov hid from the CC and from Stalin confessions that were sent from the Georgian NKVD on Liushkov and other conspirators at the time of Liushkov's appointment as chief of the directorate of the NKVD in the DVK [Far Eastern Region].

Upon Ezhov's instructions I conducted a "verification" of these confessions against Liushkov by means of interrogating Yagoda. The interrogation was deliberately carried out in such a way that Yagoda did not confirm these confessions against Liushkov, at a time when Liushkov had been one of the men closest to him. Liushkov, as is well known, fled abroad. (49)

We have already quoted from Ezhov's interrogation of August 2, 1939, by NKVD Rodos, where Ezhov admits that:

Q: Did you send Liushkov there specially. What assignments did you give him?

A: At the beginning of 1937 Frinovskii and I conferred with each other and decided that we had to have our own man in the Far East, through whom we could maintain contact with Japanese intelligence. In the event of an attack by the Japanese he was to let the counterrevolutionaries out of the camps, seize with their help the stores of arms and military supplies, and then head terrorist-diversionist work in the rear of the Red Army. We thought about this and chose Liushkov for these purposes, whom I had already recruited to our organization in 1936. Then I transferred him from the Azovo-Chernomorskii region and made him the head of the NKVD in the Far Eastern Region.

The evidence cited by Meritt confirms Ezhov's claim that Liushkov was part of his conspiracy. Liushkov's intense hostility towards Stalin is evident from his press conferences.

Both Frinovskii's statement and Suturin's study confirm a fact-claim made by Ezhov in one of his confessions.

The Military Conspiracy

In an earlier chapter we analyzed Ezhov's confession of April 26, 1939. There he outlines the military conspiracy and its close connections with the German General Staff. The existence of the military conspiracy is confirmed both in the confession by Marshal Tukhachevskii that was published in the early 1990s and then re-classified, and by Marshal Budennyi's report to Marshal Voroshilov two weeks after the trial and executions of Tukhachevskii and his associates.

The military conspiracy is also confirmed at length in Genrikh Liushkov's remarks to his Japanese handlers as uncovered by Alvin Coox. We have outlined and analyzed Liushkov's revelations in detail in The Murder of Sergei Kirov and won't repeat all this material here.

Both of these sources confirm Ezhov's testimony about the military conspiracy. Testimony at the Third Moscow Trial also confirms it.

Testimony of Zinaida Glikina

During the interrogation of Ezhov on May 11, 1939 by NKVD man Bogdan Kobulov the investigator raised the question of Ezhov's knowledge of the adulterous affair between Ezhov's wife Elena Solomonovna and the famous Soviet novelist Mikhail Sholokhov.

Q: What can you tell us about her relations with the writer Sholokhov?

A: I seem to recall that, I think last spring, my wife told me that she had met Sholokhov, who had come to Moscow and dropped in at the journal "SSSR na stroike." There was nothing surprising in this, Ezhova always tried to meet writers and never missed an opportunity to do so. I was very well informed about this.

Q: Good. And what did you do when you found out about the intimate relations between Ezhova and Sholokhov?

A: I did not know anything about such relations; this is the first time I have heard about them.

Q: Don't lie, Ezhov. In June and August of last year upon your instructions Alekhin arranged to monitor the letter "N" at the phone number of the Hotel "Nationale," where Sholokhov was staying.

Ezhov denied knowing about this affair and beating his wife for it:

Q: ...you did know that the intimate relations of Sholokhov with your wife were recorded. Here, take a look at the this.

Do you admit that a few days after you received the transcript you brought it home and showed the document to your wife, and then berated her for betraying you?

A: No such even happened. No one ever gave me this transcript of the intimate relations between Ezhova and Sholokhov, and in general I never showed my wife documents from my work and never told her what they contained.

Q: Of course you can deny this, Ezhov. But we have the confessions of Glikina, Ezhova's close friend and a German spy, who is now arrested and is under investigation. Glikina confesses that Ezhova was beaten by you and complained to her and told her about everything. Therefore let me remind you that lying will not help you!

By chance we have that part of Glikina's confession, which Shentalinskii claims fills an entire notebook, Glikina wrote:

After dinner Ezhov noticeably drunk and nervous, got up from the table, took some document a few pages long out of his briefcase, turned to Khaiutina-Ezhova [his wife] and asked: "Did you cohabit with Sholokhov?" She denied it, whereupon Ezhov with bitterness threw it in her face saying, "Take it, read!"

Ezhov told Glikina to read it too. She described it thus: "I understood that this document was a transcript of everything that had happened between Khaiutina-Ezhova and Sholokhov in his hotel room, and that this clandestine recording had been organized at Ezhov's order."

After this Ezhov finally lost control of himself, ran up to his wife who was standing by the divan and began beating her with his fists on the face, in the chest, and in other parts of her body. Ezhov only stopped when I interfered... (Shentalinskii, Donos 421-422)

Therefore, this part of Glikina's confession confirms that genuineness of the May 11, 1938, interrogation of Ezhov by Kobulov. It is significant that Ezhov lied to Kobulov, whereupon the latter had the transcript of Glikina's testimony to confront him. Nothing of the kind would be necessary if the NKVD intended to beat, torture, or otherwise compel Ezhov to say what they wanted him to say.

Therefore these two passages are evidence that, although Ezhov lied for some reason, the investigation was genuine. Ezhov was not beaten into a false confession. Nor was he beaten in order to get him to tell the truth — in this case, about his knowledge of his wife's adultery with Sholokhov and his beating her.

On the contrary: the investigator utilized a conventional interrogation technique familiar to investigators everywhere: to try to get the prisoner to tell the truth by confronting him with the testimony of others who have already named him. This is strong evidence that the investigation of Ezhov did not proceed by beating him.

We note in passing that Glikina also confirms Ezhov's guilt in "anti-party activity." Glikina lived with the Ezhovs and spent a great deal of time with them. In the very short passage from her confession quoted by Shentalinskii she concedes:

... However, I do not intend to present myself as completely innocent. I admit that I am guilty in that, though I knew all about Ezhov's anti-party activities I hid everything I knew and did not report it to anyone because of my close relationship with his wife N.I. Ezhova and to him personally, and was completely devoted to them. (Shentalinskii, Donos 418)

Confessions of Izrail' Moiseevich Leplevskii

In a passage we have already quoted in an earlier chapter Frinovskii identified Leplevskii as one of Ezhov's "investigator-bonebreakers":

"Investigator-bonebreakers" were chosen basically from among the conspirators or persons who were compromised. They had unsupervised recourse to beating arrested persons and in a very short time obtained "confessions" and knew how to write up transcripts in a grammatical and elegant fashion.

During his interrogation by NKVD man Rodos of July 8, 1939, Ezhov testified:

At that time the leadership of our organization decided to move to active measures. There was a lot of evidence against Leplevskii and Zakovskii showing that they were spies and enemies of the people. It was impossible to hide such matters, and we had to get rid of these people, we couldn't use them, they could cause everything to fail. We decided to replace them with Uspenskii and Litvin.

Leonid Naumov reproduces a summary report on Leplevskii made in June 1956. This was a period when, by Khrushchev's order, many files of those executed for treason during the 1930s were being reviewed. The report in question is a summary of Leplevskii's file. The report states in part:

Leplevskii confesses that when he worked in the Ukraine he did not struggle against the organized counterrevolution but only exposed those whom, given the existing situation, it was impossible to hide any longer (Liubchenko, Khvyliya, Poraiko). At the same time in organizing the mass operations he would consciously arrest innocent, honest Soviet citizens so as to be able to show large number and a determined struggle against counterrevolution. (In the guise of liquidating the Polish underground more than 30 thousand persons were arrested, but the serious counterrevolutionary Polish formations remained untouched.)

... From Kosior Leplevskii knew that despite the losses suffered by the conspiracy significant forces of the plot remained untouched, but in order to carry out a coup d'état successfully it was essential to have an orientation abroad towards the Germans and Poles, who were ready to cooperate on this question. (Naumov, Stalin 541-2)

Leplevskii does not mention Ezhov as a leader of the conspiracy. This is consistent with what Ezhov himself testified in his August 8, 1939, interrogation:

Question: Give more detailed information about each oblast separately, and report to the investigation those facts known to you about provocational methods of repression that were deliberately carried out.

Answer: I'll begin with the Ukraine. The People's Commissariat of Internal Affairs of the UkSSR was headed at the beginning by Leplevskii, a member of the anti-Soviet organization of Rightists, and then by Uspenskii, a conspirator whom I had recruited. The mass operation had been begun under Leplevskii, but Uspenskii's share of repressed persons was no smaller.

Question: Was Leplevskii aware of your conspiratorial plans?

Answer: No, Leplevskii could hardly have known about our real conspiratorial plans. In any case I myself did not recruit him to our conspiratorial organization and did not inform him of our plan to conduct the operation in a provocational manner. None of the leading conspirators told me that he was connected to Leplevskii in the conspiracy. (369)

Ezhov then describes Leplevskii's activity in suppressing honest Soviet citizens while leaving the real conspirators alone.

In carrying out the mass operation Leplevskii, like most of the other chiefs of the UNKVDs who were not conspirators, spread them out over a broad front while leaving the most bitter and active of the organizers from among the kulaks, White Guardists, Petliurovists, counter-revolutionary clergy, etc., almost untouched. At the same time he concentrated the whole force of his blow against the less active elements and in part among that part of the population that was close to Soviet power. (370)

The 1956 review reports that Leplevskii fully confessed this guilt at trial. Let's consider this interesting question:

- If Leplevskii had said that he was part of Ezhov's conspiracy, then we could conclude that Ezhov was lying, as he lied about knowing about his wife's infidelity with Sholokhov.
- If Leplevskii had not confessed he might have done so because he thought his best tactic was to deny his crimes or because he was in fact innocent.

In fact the two Ezhov confessions and the 1956 report on Leplevskii mutually confirm each other.

Agnessa Mironova-Korol'

In his book Stalin i NKVD historian Leonid Naumov writes:

Interestingly, in January 1939, S. Mironov-Korol' [S.N. Mironov's full name] was arrested, and almost immediately testified that in July 1937 in a private conversation Frinovskii told him of Ezhov's intention to come to power on the basis of their group in the NKVD. Of course, one might attribute this to the imagination of Beria's investigators. But here's an interesting detail. Mironov's wife Agnes Mironov in her memoirs says almost the same thing: "We thought that Ezhov had risen even higher than Stalin." These thoughts, according to the text of memoirs, are from sometime in mid-1938. But who is this "we" who were thinking such thoughts? Judging by the text of Mironova's memoirs, she was then talking only with the members of her family, with Mironov's brother, the intelligence official David Korol' and his family, and with the Frinovskii family. (263)¹

See <http://www.pseudology.org/GULAG/Agnessa/06.htm> It is also at <http://www.memo.ru/history/agnessa/Chapt1h.htm>

Mironova-Korol' did not in fact know much of NKVD work apart from rumors. But this reflects what she thought, based on her personal contacts. She also reports that even the Politburo members were afraid of Ezhov, or at least wary around him, and that she witnessed this herself. Her testimony is consistent with her husband Mironov's account of what Frinovskii had said to him. And that is consistent with what Frinovskii testified in his statement of April 11, 1939, to Beria, which we studied in a previous chapter.

Ezhov's renunciation of his confessions and his final statement at his trial

Pavliukov describes the conclusion of the investigation of Ezhov's case as follows.

The last interrogation took place on January 31 [1940], and on the very next day the assistant chief of the investigative section of the NKVD of the USSR A.A. Esaulov composed a protocol of the conclusion of the investigation. Ezhov was given for his perusal 12 volumes of his criminal case. He read through it and declared that he confirmed all the confessions given by him at the preliminary investigation, and that he had no additions to make. (529)

But the next day, according to Pavliukov, Ezhov received a visit from Lavrentii Beria during which he informed Beria that he would now deny everything, that all the charges against him were a complete invention.

What was going on here? Pavliukov makes the following surmise:

Evidently Ezhov, having understood that after the formal court procedure he would have no chance of remaining alive, had decided to delay the trial, hoping that they would not bring to trial a defendant who had renounced his confessions. And any delay in such an important case might attract the attention of Stalin who, having learned what was happening, might send some representative to find out what was happening. And then at last there might be a chance to tell the Vozhd' [leader, i.e. Stalin] the truth about why and how his faithful pupil and comrade-in-arms had been forced to slander himself.

However, Ezhov's plans — if such they were — were not successful.

A transcript of Ezhov's trial must still exist. Pavliukov evidently had privileged access to it or to a summary of it. Evidently it is still classified despite the expiration of more than 75 years.

Pavliukov describes the trial itself as follows:

Then the protocol concerning the conclusion of the investigation was announced, in which Ezhov had confirmed the truth of his confessions with his own signature. Ezhov stated that at that moment he had not retracted these confessions, but that he was retracting them now. He had no connections with any intelligence services, had not planned any terrorist act on Red Square on November 7, 1938, and had never taken part in any conspiratorial activity.

It was necessary for the court to set aside its preliminary intention to do without witnesses and to call into the courtroom one of them, Ezhov's former assistant M. P. Frinovskii. That same day he too was supposed to appear in court and probably was somewhere nearby.

Frinovskii stated that soon after his appointment as Commissar of Internal Affairs Ezhov had recruited him into the conspiratorial organization in the NKVD organized by himself. At first they prevented the exposure of the participants of the Right-Trotskyite bloc as much as possible, and at the end of 1937 they set to the creation of a terrorist group within the NKVD.

Besides that Frinovskii discussed the falsification, in accordance with Ezhov's directives, of the so-called mercury poisoning, the murder on Ezhov's order of the chief of the Foreign Division of the GUGB of the NKVD A. A. Slutskii, and of the poisoning by Ezhov of his own [Ezhov's] wife.

In answer to the questions of the chairman V.V. El-rikh Ezhov called everything Frinovskii said to be vicious slander. He did not poison his wife and did not send her luminal, and in relation to Slutskii had had a directive from "directive organs" not to arrest him but to get rid of him by another means, "as otherwise our whole foreign intelligence service would would have fled." The need to get rid of Slutskii was dictated, in Ezhov's words, by the fact that there were very weighty confessions of the former assistant commissar for internal affairs Ia. S. Agranov.

Ezhov continued that he did not take part in the anti-Soviet conspiracy together with Frinovskii. Evdokimov, Dagin, and the other persons whom he had named in his confessions as participants in the conspiracy were in fact not such, or in any case he did not know anything about that. (531-532)

A text has been published that purports to be Ezhov's final speech at his trial. I have translated it and put it online. (Ezhov, Last) Briukhanov and Shoshkov make the following comments on Ezhov's last words:

Reading "the Last Word" it is impossible not to notice that Ezhov said nothing about the essence of the accusations leveled against him. He rejected them all, but spoke mainly about his services in exposing "enemies and spies of various types and intelligence services" while stating at the same time he had "such crimes for which I could be shot," promising to discuss them, but admitted guilt only in that he "did not purge enough" enemies.

Ezhov denied his participation in a secret organization directed against the Party and the government, saying that, on the contrary, he had taken all measures to expose the conspirators who had murdered S.M. Kirov. But was there a conspiracy in the organs of the NKVD? Or did those 14 thousand NKVD men whom Ezhov purged act individually — each one on his own?

Judging from the transcript [of Ezhov's trial] such a question was not raised at the trial: Everything was clear to the court as it was. The "sincere confessions" in his "Last word" did not ring true. Ezhov was careful to avoid any sharp corners. He even distorted the episode that had already figured in the trial of Bukharin, Rykov and the others, concerning the falsification of a terrorist act against himself. As it turned out the "terrorist act" was planned and executed — if we can even use that word in this case — by Ezhov and by the former chief of the counter-revolutionary section Nikolaev in order to increase the authority of the "iron commissar." Having consulted with specialists about the conditions for mercury poisoning Nikolaev had rubbed mercury into the upholstery of the soft furniture in Ezhov's office and submitted a piece of cloth for laboratory analysis. In the "terrorist act" they blamed NKVD man Savolainen, on whom a vial of mercury was planted. After the necessary "working over" Savolainen confessed to everything.

And Ezhov's attempt to deny the accusation about dissolution in his morals and private life, to convince the court that he was supposedly for his modesty and honesty, seems altogether senseless.

As a whole the "Last word" creates an impression of something not thought through, rambling, incomplete, and dishonest. And yet Ezhov, in essence, had nothing to lose. He could have spoken more frankly.

The last two sentences suggest that Briukhanov and Shoshkov believe that Ezhov had only acted upon Stalin's orders. If that had been so then Ezhov would indeed have been a fool not to "speak more frankly."

But we know that it is not true. Ezhov could renounce his many confessions. But he could not refute them. For one thing the investigators had interrogated those whom Ezhov had named in his confessions, and compared and collated the confessions. Also, the court had the testimony of many others, and witnesses at hand to testify — not only Frinovsky but others, perhaps many others.

Pavliukov did not state the matter as plainly as he should have done. Given the voluminous confessions he had made, and the immense amount of testimony against him, the only thing Ezhov could possibly gain by renouncing his own confessions was to force the court to convict him on the testimony of witnesses. That is in fact what happened.

As Nikolai Bukharin stated at his own trial in March 1938:

The confession of the accused is not essential. (1938 Trial, 778)

This is indeed a feeble attempt at justifying oneself. Very few of the specific crimes to which Ezhov had confessed are mentioned. Nor does a last-minute retraction of confessions that the defendant has just finished affirming carry any conviction. Even a person totally unfamiliar with the facts of the case would ask: Was he lying then? Or is he lying now? On top of which Ezhov admits, cryptically, that he had committed "such crimes for which I should be shot." Such a statement, lacking almost all specifics, calls into question not so much the confessions but the credibility of the person who makes it.

Pavliukov tells the story about how in the 1990s Ezhov's daughter Natalia Khaiutina petitioned to have her father "rehabilitated." In 1998 the office of the Main Military Procuracy determined that there was no evidence that Ezhov had been a traitor (had conspired with Germany or Poland). But it did conclude the following:

The evidence gathered in this case confirm the guilt of Ezhov N.I. in organizing political repression against innocent citizens, illegal arrests, using physical means of compulsion against those under investigation, falsification of materials in criminal cases, all of which had irreversible consequences, which materially furthered the weakening of the power of the State. That is, he was guilty of acts aimed at undermining and weakening the state and damage to its economic and military power.

Without saying so in so many words the Procuracy declared that Ezhov was indeed guilty of mass repressions. However, it said nothing about why Ezhov did these things: nothing about any conspiracy. About treason — the charges of collaboration with the Germans and Japanese and conspiring to overthrow the government, lead revolts against it, and murder Stalin and other leaders — nothing at all was said.

Conclusion

Whenever we are able to double-check a fact-claim made concerning Ezhov's interrogation-confessions or Frinovskii's statement, we find that those documents are true. This is so even in the case where Ezhov was evidently lying in saying that he had not known of his wife's affair with Sholokov. Therefore, we have no reason not to use Frinovskii's and Ezhov's statements and confessions as truthful.

Chapter 17. What Really Happened

In the dominant model of Soviet history of the 1930s the conspiracies alleged by the Stalin government were all bogus. The conspiracy that led to Kirov's murder, the conspiracies to which the defendants in the three Moscow Trials confessed, the Tukhachevskii Affair military conspiracy — all these never existed. All were frame-ups of innocent persons, and all are attributed to Stalin. Naturally, Ezhov's conspiracy never existed either. Michael Ellman believes that the "Ezhovshchina" should be called the "Stalinshchina" since, he claims, Stalin planned it all, Ezhov having been merely a tool. Many conventional or "mainstream" anticommunist historians contend that the "Great Terror" began as early as 1936, or even 1934.

This is not history. Rather, it is deduction from firmly entrenched but demonstrably false premises. If one believes a priori, in thrall to the anti-Stalin paradigm, that none of the alleged conspiracies existed, it follows that all were fabrications by the Soviet NKVD and prosecution. If one believes a priori that Stalin was an all-powerful "dictator" it follows that everything that happened must have happened because Stalin wanted it to happen. Likewise, the mass repressions must have stopped only when Stalin decided they were no longer needed and it could possibly become dangerous for them to continue.

This whole line of thinking is based on a paradigm that flies in the face of an objective assessment of the available evidence. It represents the triumph of anticommunist ideology over objectivity and is contradicted by all the evidence. We have an immense amount of evidence about each of these conspiracies. We know that Stalin was not a dictator and frequently could not get what he wanted, contested elections to the soviets being the clearest example in our discussion.

In hewing to what we have called the "anti-Stalin paradigm" mainstream Soviet historiography follows political, anticommunist imperatives. Demonizing the Soviet Union serves the propaganda function which remains the primary function of the field of Soviet history as it has always been.

Historians are supposed to be objective, to question their own preconceived ideas and the paradigms that inform those ideas, shape them into explanatory narratives; to give a more generous reading to evidence that contradicts their preconceived ideas and read with an especially skeptical attitude that evidence that seems to reinforce their own biases. If a historian does not begin his/her research with determination to be objective, to discover the truth according to the best evidence and logical induction from this evidence, then that historian has no chance of stumbling across the truth by accident and what he or she does "discover" will not be the truth.

This is why mainstream historians of the so-called "great terror" have failed to attain an account of these mass repressions that fits the evidence. Mainstream historiography has chosen not to do so.

What Did Happen?

The evidence now available suggests that the repressions of the period 1934-1938 saw the following political developments in the Bolshevik Party.

1. The gradual discovering of a wide-ranging conspiracy among many leading Bolsheviks against the Stalin government. These conspiracies developed out of the factional disputes of the post-Revolution period and became particularly acute during the 1920s. After the defeat of the United Opposition in 1927, with the ensuing expulsion and then "capitulation" of most of its members, and Leon Trotsky's expulsion from the USSR in February 1929, the opposition factions, which already had a clandestine, underground existence, endured a period of disorganization.

They were regathered in 1931-1932 as a "bloc" of Zinovievists, Trotskyists, Rights, and other oppositionists. This bloc — all parties, including both its participants and the Soviet prosecution, used this term — first planned to come to power when the Soviet government collapsed under the strain of rapid industrialization and opposition to collectivization, or when the Stalin government failed to cope with an attack by capitalist powers.

During 1933 it became clear to the bloc leaders that the Stalin government had come through the crisis successfully and would not collapse, while capitalist powers failed to invade. The bloc then turned to the tactic of a coup d'état and assassination of the Stalin leadership as the only way to seize power. Contact was made, and agreements reached, with at least Germany and Japan, and also with England and France, to gain recognition once their coup had succeeded.

This plan began to be put into operation on December 1, 1934, with the murder of Sergei Mironovich Kirov, First Secretary of the Bolshevik Party in Leningrad, who was assassinated by a clandestine Zinovievist group. Other groups within the bloc such as the Rights and Trotskyists knew that this assassination attempt was being planned and were either planning their own attempt or had agreed not to interfere. The Zinovievist assassin Leonid Nikolaev was supposed to commit suicide immediately after killing Kirov. This suicide attempt failed and he was captured and interrogated.

Because he had no "cover story" prepared — he was not supposed to survive — his attempts to concoct a story on the spot were full of contradictions. The NKVD investigators kept Nikolaev talking. Within a few days, he had named a number of his associates, who were arrested and interrogated in turn. Very soon the investigators had enough testimony to convict the fourteen members of the Leningrad Zinovievist group, and to prove that Zinoviev, Kamenev, and a few of their associates, all in Moscow, were aware of the Leningrad group. The NKVD did not prove that Zinoviev and Kamenev were complicit in Kirov's murder, but only because Genrikh Iagoda, the chief of the NKVD, was himself involved in the conspiracy. However, they and some of their associates were convicted of failing to report the Leningrad group and merely sentenced to prison terms.

During 1935 a conspiracy within the Kremlin was uncovered. This led to additional suspicions against Zinoviev and Kamenev, since some of the latter's relatives were involved. It also led to suspicions against Avel' Enukidze, who was responsible for the library staff.

In early 1936 the investigation of the Kirov murder was resumed, resulting in more arrests and some confessions. By July there was enough information from these confessions to infer the existence of a much broader conspiracy involving Zinovievists and Trotskyists. In late July Zinoviev and Kamenev, confronted and accused by some of their followers, confessed to being directly involved in Kirov's murder. This resulted in the First Moscow Trial of August 1936. Defendants at that trial identified others who comprised a spare, or "parallel," leadership group, including Karl Radek, Iurii Piatakov, and Grigory Sokol'nikov. Bukharin and Rykov were also named. On September 26, 1936 Genrikh Iagoda was removed as chief of the NKVD and replaced by Nikolai Ezhov. The Second Moscow Trial of January 1937 led to the executions of most of the defendants, including Piatakov, and prison for others.

Meanwhile Bukharin and Rykov, as leaders of the Rights, were accused by many of their former supporters. The evidence against them was the first item of business at the February-March 1937 Central Committee Plenum. After three days of discussions and accusations Bukharin and Rykov were arrested and imprisoned.

Stalin had been planning a redraft of the Soviet Constitution since at least 1935. In March 1936 he gave an interview to US newspaper magnate Roy Howard in which Stalin — over-optimistically equating his view with the outcome of the CC vote — promised contested elections for the legislative bodies, the soviets. The Constitution was drafted and adopted in 1936. But at the February-March 1937 CC Plenum there was much opposition to it from the CC members. Most of those who spoke warned against hostility among the population and about anticommunist groups, including returned kulaks, religious figures, former White Guardists, and members of the new illegal Social-Revolutionary Party.

It was clear that most CC members did not want contested elections under these circumstances. Stalin and his supporters argued the case for contested elections but clearly did not convince many, if any. This is not to argue for either side of this debate, since both had valid reasons for their respective positions. Rather, it is to emphasize that Stalin's leadership was just that — leadership. Stalin did not possess dictatorial powers.¹

¹ See Stephen G. Wheatcroft, "From Team-Stalin to Degenerate Tyranny." In E.A. Reez, ed., The Nature of Stalin's Dictatorship. The Politburo, 1924-1953. Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan, 2004, 79-107. Wheatcroft argues that Stalin was no dictator up to the early 1940s. Wheatcroft cites no evidence for his claim in the title that Stalin became a "tyrant" or dictator during his last years.

On March 1, 1937 Genrikh Iagoda was arrested. He had been implicated by testimony at the Second Moscow Trial and, evidently, by testimony of others under interrogation. By April 1937 Iagoda had begun to outline his own involvement in the Rightist conspiracy and his prior knowledge of the plan to murder Kirov.

In April and May 1937 NKVD investigators had gotten enough testimony from military men involved in the conspiracies already including Marshal Mikhail N. Tukhachevskii. When investigators came to interrogate Ian Gamarnik, head of the Political Directorate of the Red Army, he committed suicide. In late May and early June Tukhachevskii and others confessed to conspiring with the Rights, with the Troskyists and directly with Trotsky, and with the German General Staff in a plot to overthrow the Stalin government, seize power, and become an ally with Nazi Germany. On June 11-12 Tukhachevskii and seven others were tried, confessed at trial, were convicted, and executed.

During the first week of May 1937 the "May Days" revolt broke out in Barcelona, Spain. Among its leaders were longtime Trotskyists. At the Second Moscow Trial in January, 1937 Karl Radek had called up the Trotskyists in Spain to stop their plotting against the Spanish Republic or face the consequences. The NKVD had obtained intelligence that German and Francoist agents had been attempting to provoke just such a revolt. At a talk to military officers in early June Stalin said that the Tukhachevskii defendants wanted to make of the Soviet Union "another Spain" — to stab it in the back when it was attacked by fascist powers.

From April 1937 on we have a number of interrogations of high-ranking Bolshevik government and Party officials in which they confess to being a part of the Rightist conspiracy. On June 2, 1937, Bukharin broke his silence and began to give very dramatic confessions of his own guilt in this same Rightist conspiracy.

During the June 1937 CC Plenum 15 members of the CC and 16 candidate members were removed from the CC. Earlier in 1937 5 members and 5 candidate members had been expelled, for a total of 20 members and 21 candidate members since the beginning of 1937. During the rest of 1938 18 more members and 15 more candidate members were expelled. In total, 38 members and 36 candidate members were expelled from the Central Committee. As far as we call tell — little information has been released about some of them — all were expelled for being a part of the clandestine conspiracy of the Right-Trotskyist bloc.

By the time the June 1937 Plenum ended both the Right-Trotskyist conspiracy and the military conspiracy, which was linked to it, were on the defensive. Ten more CC members were removed from the CC in December 1937 and two more in early 1938 for a total of 50. The Third Moscow Trial of March 1937 Right-Trotskyist Trial of which Bukharin, Rykov, Iagoda, and Khristian Rakovskii are perhaps the best known defendants, was the culmination in the demolition of the conspiracy of the bloc.

Elections

A day before the October 1937 CC Plenum began Stalin and the Politburo withdrew their efforts to force competitive elections, required under the new 1936 Constitution. It is possible that the remaining CC members along with the NKVD had been repressing prospective hostile voters, the lishentsy, up to this point. It's important to realize, however, that we have no evidence that this was so. After the October 1937 CC Plenum it would have made no sense to do this.

There is no question that the CC members in February-March and in June 1937 opposed competitive elections to the soviets. This opposition is firmly documented. But repression — meaning mass murder and mass imprisonment — of hostile prospective voters to prevent a hostile takeover of the soviets makes no sense after October 1937, for after that there would be no contested election.

In January 1938 Pavel Postyshev was sharply criticized, then removed from the Politburo, then in February from the CC, then arrested, and ultimately tried and convicted, for being a part of the Rightist conspiracy. According to the evidence now available Postyshev was indeed repressing Party members, especially Party officials. The main resolution of the January 1938 CC Plenum was aimed at unwarranted mass expulsion of Party members by higher Party officials.

Judging from the scanty documentation we have today, Postyshev was also terrorizing many others. According to one account of this evidence, between June 1937 and January 1938, when he was removed from office, Postyshev had 34,540 persons prosecuted for criminal offenses and about 5000 shot. Stalin said that Postyshev was shooting the whole Party leadership and destroying the Party on thin grounds or on no grounds at all.²

Postyshev's actions in Kuibyshev are consistent with his being both a part of the Rightist conspiracy and engaging in the kind of massive, illegal executions of innocent people on the flimsiest of grounds or on no grounds at all, that Frinovskii and Ezhov agreed were part of their NKVD conspiracy. Postyshev agreed to this charge to which he confessed in April 1938 and, evidently, was the reason Molotov and Voroshilov went to see him in prison to learn from his own lips that he was guilty.

Postyshev may have told the truth. Or he may have been forced by Ezhov to confess, after he was already exposed at the January 1938 CC Plenum.

Therefore it appears that at least some CC members were repressing Party members. It was after the failure of the Tukhachevskii conspiracy that, according to Ezhov, he began his massive repressions of innocent Soviet citizens, of whom Party members must have been a very small proportion.

Chapter 18. Conclusion

The only conclusion supported by the evidence is that the mass murders of many tens of thousands of Soviet citizens was the result of a conspiracy by Nikolai Ezhov, People's Commissar of the NKVD.

In the introduction we stated the three principal questions about the "Ezhovshchina" or "Great Terror" as follows:

1. Did hundreds of thousands of innocent victims meet their deaths?
2. Was Stalin responsible for these murders, as is usually claimed?
3. If — as the evidence demands us to conclude — Stalin was innocent and was part of putting a stop to this crime against humanity, how could he and his colleagues have been oblivious to what was happening for so long?

The answers to the first two questions are yes, and no, respectively.

The answer to question three is more complex. The evidence shows that it took a long time for the Stalin leadership to realize what was going on, on a national level. In the meantime Ezhov was supplying Stalin and the leadership with voluminous documentation of conspiracies, many of which were falsified but some of which were genuine.

What happened was a kind of mirror image of the Big Lie technique. As Hitler explained in Mein Kampf, the "big lie" is a falsehood that is so big, so important, that most people will be unwilling to think anyone would try to get away with unless it were true. Paradoxically, it thereby becomes difficult to believe that it isn't true and is therefore accepted. There were at least three reasons that the Stalin leadership took so long to realize what was happening before they put a stop to it and executed those responsible.

- There were genuine conspiracies behind which Ezhov et al. were able to hide their unhidden trials and executions (out in the open and well reported to the CC), as justified attempts to end the conspiracies.
- The Stalin leadership was occupied with many very complex tasks at the time — including preparing for a coming war that they well recognized was mainly designed to crush their revolution, conscious co-operators rather than the selfish individualists that capitalism had trained people to be for centuries, the need to organize and rule over a vast geographical area (the largest country in the world in area).

Because of these complex multiple tasks, all of which were absolute necessities, the Stalin leadership was forced to delegate tasks, around the immense country, to people they thought they could trust.

- The natural difficulty of believing the hints that came in, slowly at first, that something awful was actually occurring at the hands of their trusted delegates. This must have been particularly hard since such stories could have been inspired precisely by the very enemies they hoped to eliminate.

Terminology

"Great Terror" is a misleading name, but not because no one was terrorized. Certainly many people were. It is misnamed because Robert Conquest invented the term "Great Terror" to mean "Stalin's Purge of the '30s," and it was no such thing. Ezhov picked a great many of his victims at random, a process that must have sparked great fear. But this was not the Soviet government, not "Stalin." The mass murders, the only events that could have spread "terror," were perpetrated not by the Soviet government but by the enemies of the Soviet government: Ezhov, his men, and some members of the political elite of the Party and state.

The Soviet population was not "ruled by terror," and the Soviet population generally was not "terrorized." The term "great terror" is false in the way in which Conquest used it and in the way it continues to be used in the biased field of Soviet history. The falsehood is located not in the assertion that there was terror but in the claim as to who the terrorists were.

Ezhov's mass repressions were a continuation of the conspiracies described at the three Moscow Trials and the Tukhachevskii Affair. Ezhov had long been a Rightist. He initiated his own NKVD conspiracy — the mass murders — after the military conspiracy had been discovered and, in the main, destroyed.

Ezhov acted together with at least one of the military conspirators, Marshal Egorov. He fooled Stalin and the Soviet leadership with false reports, many of which have survived.

When, finally, news of massive illegal repressions reached a certain level Stalin and Politburo reacted. First they removed Frinovskii as Ezhov's deputy and put Lavrentii Beria in his place. Later Ezhov was persuaded, or forced, to resign. The repressions immediately stopped. Investigation began to disclose the enormity of Ezhov's crimes.

During 1939 Ezhov and many of his men were arrested and made confessions. Ezhov and Frinovskii gave the general outlines, and much of the detail, of their massive crimes. The small number of these confessions that have been published constitute an important body of evidence. Source criticism shows that there are no objective grounds to dismiss them.

A great many innocent persons had been murdered. From 1939 into the war years Beria, as head of the NKVD, and the Soviet Procuracy reviewed hundreds of thousands of cases and released hundreds of thousands of persons whom they judged had been wrongly imprisoned.

At the same time they continued to investigate, uncover, and punish persons who really were involved in anti-Soviet conspiracies. Real conspiracies did exist. Ezhov's and Frinovskii's confessions make it clear that not everyone repressed under Iagoda and Ezhov was innocent. These investigations continued into the war years. Tokaev and Svetlanin testify to the fact that some conspirators were never identified.

This is the only version of the mass repressions that can be supported by the evidence. It is confirmed by the convergence of a great many individual pieces of evidence. The "mainstream" explanation for the Ezhovshchina is that Stalin intended and planned it. But there is not now, nor has there ever been, any evidence to support this conclusion. Rather, it flows from the a priori acceptance of the anti-Stalin paradigm.

It will be rejected by those who are incapable, or contemptuous, of objectivity. The false story that "Stalin the dictator" planned and carried out these massive repressions, just as he had fabricated all the alleged conspiracies is the only account tolerated by mainstream Soviet historiography. But there is no evidence to support it and a great deal of evidence that it is wrong.

Leaders of the CPSU and their researchers have long known the truth about the repressions and conspiracies. Khrushchev and his men had to lie deliberately to put forward their false version that the repressions were Stalin's doing. Gorbachev's men continued in this vein. They kept the truth a secret while inventing falsehoods to blame Stalin.

The version set forth here absolves Stalin of guilt for the massive repressions. This is what is unacceptable to mainstream Soviet history. But it was certainly Stalin's responsibility, as the principle political leader of the country, to take decisive action to stop violations of justice, have them investigated, and make sure those responsible are punished. Stalin did this. Tragically, it took him many months to fully realize what was really going on, by which time Ezhov and his men had murdered hundreds of thousands of innocent Soviet citizens.

In a 1976 review Roger Pethybridge wrote the following about the fixation on the "evil Stalin" in the historiography of the Soviet Union:

If one considers all the well-known biographies of Stalin, a common feature emerges: the volumes are a quite accurate reflection of biographical method current at the end of the nineteenth and beginning of the twentieth centuries, when historical biographies dwelt on so-called "good" and "bad" kings. The personality who reigned appeared to dominate not only the political but the social and economic life of his kingdom, so that by a sneeze or a yawn he could magically change the whole socioeconomic pattern of his reign. This method of historical biography has long been discounted in the treatment of authoritarian rule in earlier history. It has also been discarded with regard to the study of Nazi Germany. Unfortunately, it still remains as a specter from the past in the study of Soviet personalities in high politics.

The anti-Stalin paradigm resembles the "great man theory of history" that was already abandoned by serious historians in the 19th century. The problem was not that the Soviet system put into power a paranoid or psychopathically murderous person as, following Khrushchev, so many anticommunist and Trotskyist historians claim. Rather, the problem — the failure — was systemic.

Most Bolsheviks, like most Soviet citizens, were honorable, hardworking, and devoted to the cause of socialism and communism. But a small number of them were not honorable and devoted, or began that way but were corrupted, so that immense injustices were perpetrated and enormous harm was done.

The Bolshevik Party promoted people to positions of power who used that power to commit massive crimes. German, Japanese, and other foreign intelligence services made use of some of these persons. But the basic corruption came from within: not only from intelligence agents of capitalist countries — though they certainly played a role — but from the retention, or insufficiently thorough rejection, of the ideas and values of exploitative, capitalist society.

Unresolved Issues

There are some issues that are not clear. One of them is the question of the relationship between Stalin's push for contested elections and the Right-Trotskyist conspiracy involving First Secretaries and the NKVD. Stalin's push for competitive elections was defeated, and competitive elections taken off the table, just before the October, 1937 CC Plenum. Therefore mass repression cannot have been aimed at lishentsy, at least not after mid-October 1937.

One hypothesis is that Stalin wished to break up the "family groups" of leaders and their followers who dominated the Bolshevik Party local leaderships, and therefore had them killed on some pretext or other. It is certainly true that almost all of the First Secretaries elected at the XVII Party Congress in 1934 were convicted and executed as part of the Right-Trotskyist conspiracy.

But the evidence now available suggests that, on the contrary, it was these powerful local Party leaders, the "Soviet prefects," who wanted to get rid of Stalin! Getting rid of Stalin and those loyal to him, and putting into power a leadership with a Rightist economic and political agenda, was the goal of the Rights in the bloc.

The other purported explanation of the mass repressions is that Stalin himself wanted to suppress — kill or imprison — any potential "Fifth Column" in a way with Germany or Japan. As it happens, this is true — but not in the way it has been understood by mainstream anticommunist historiography. This "fifth column explanation" is false in that the exaggerated application of death sentences to hundreds of thousands of innocent persons was not Stalin's doing. Rather, Ezhov did this under the guise of ridding the nation of its actual and undisputed "Fifth Column" of conspirators.

We know that these conspiracies existed and we know the mechanism by which Ezhov concealed from Stalin and the central leadership just what he was up to. There is no evidence whatever to support the version that Ezhov's mass murders were Stalin's doing. This version contradicts all the evidence we do have. It survives because it "saves" the anti-Stalin paradigm.

Resolution

The evidence we now have supports two hypotheses. First, that many First Secretaries and other Party leaders were involved in Right-Trotskyist conspiracy. Second, that some of them were also directly involved with Ezhov's NKVD conspiracy. Jansen and Petrov cite evidence that Robert Eikhe was involved with Ezhov's conspiracy. Eikhe is also mentioned by Frinovskii in his statement to Beria of April 11, 1939.

Pavel Postyshev, who confessed to being a member of the Right-Trotskyist conspiracy, was involved in massive repressions against innocent people, both Party members and others, in Kuibyshev. Ezhov and Frinovskii did exactly this. It appears likely that Postyshev too was involved in both conspiracies.

Ezhov's conspiracy was a spinoff of the Right-Trotskyist conspiracy. Ezhov testified that he began his massive executions after the executions of Tukhachevskii and other leaders of the military conspiracy. This is consistent with what we know of Eikhe's and Postyshev's mass repressions. It was a very dangerous moment for the Soviet state and Ezhov took advantage of it.

From the beginning the Right-Trotskyist conspiracy was a bloc of different oppositional groups, originating as anti-Stalin factions, with somewhat different programs and different leaderships. The Trotskyists did not trust the Rights, nor did the Rights, like Iagoda and Bukharin, trust the Trotskyists or agree with Trotsky in some respects. Tukhachevskii was aligned with both but saw himself as the eventual leader of the state. Ezhov too aimed to be the next leader of the Soviet Union. Each faction in the bloc was willing to sacrifice the others to save themselves.

Defeatism and assassination were common threads in all the conspiracies. The former oppositionists, and many former Stalin supporters too, could not believe that the USSR would succeed. Either the pressures of crash industrialization and collectivization would cause the Stalin government to collapse, perhaps in widespread rebellion, or a combination of capitalist states would attack and defeat the Red Army. Such fears, admixed with personal ambition, sparked and fueled the conspiracies.

Objections

The principal objection to this explanation is that it does not find Stalin guilty of them. It will be claimed that the confession statements on which it is based are false, fabrications. Rejection of this evidence is essential if the genuine nature of the anti-Soviet conspiracies is to be denied.

But this is wrong. We have tested the confessions in the Moscow Trials and those of Frinovskii and Ezhov by source criticism. There is no legitimate basis at all to reject them as fabrications. The real reason they are rejected or ignored is that they are incompatible with the anti-Stalin paradigm.

It is sometimes claimed that Ezhov was tortured. But there is no evidence that Ezhov or Frinovskii were tortured.

It appears that the Right-Trotskyist conspirators had a kind of code of omertà: a practice of not identifying other members of the conspiracy whose identity was not yet known to the NKVD, even if it meant their own execution. Stalin drew this conclusion from Piatakov's behavior and expressed it at the December 1936 CC Plenum.

...we questioned about 50 people, at least. They really turned Piatakov inside out. It turns out that he's a monster of a person! So why did he agree to be the public prosecutor? Why did he agree to shoot his comrades himself? It turns out that they have a rule like this: If your fellow Trotskyist is arrested and has begun to give up the names of others, he must be destroyed. You can see what kind of hellish joke this comes to. Believe after this in the sincerity of former oppositionists! We can't take former oppositionists at their word even when they volunteer to shoot their friends with their own hands.¹

It appears that Stalin was correct. As Frinovskii points out, Bukharin, Radek, Iagoda and others did not identify Ezhov as part of the conspiracy even though they went to their deaths. Zinoviev and Kamenev did not identify Iagoda or Ezhov. At the January 1937 Moscow Trial Karl Radek swore that Tukhachevskii was a loyal Party man. He had to have known the truth: Bukharin did, and he and Radek were close.

This code did not function perfectly. Some conspirators did in fact name others. No doubt some falsely inculpated innocent persons while remaining silent about guilty ones. Others did "name names." Many conspirators were arrested and punished. But not all. Tokaev's and Svetlanin's accounts suggest that some conspirators remained unidentified. Nikita Khrushchev may have been among the conspirators who escaped detection. Such a hypothesis would help to account for his massive falsifications about Stalin and his insistence on "rehabilitating" and declaring innocent a great many persons whom we now know were in fact guilty.

Denial

This explanation for the mass repressions offered here is the one that best fits the evidence we now have. It is also utterly incompatible with mainstream Soviet historiography, which demands that Stalin be the mass murderer and Ezhov his "loyal executioner." For this reason it will be rejected by mainstream, anticommunist Soviet historians and by Trotskyists. It does not fit the Procrustean bed of the anti-Stalin paradigm.

There are numerous other examples of mainstream Soviet historiography ignoring or rejecting the truth about Soviet history.

- Khrushchev's Secret Speech is virtually 100% false. This has been known for years but is never acknowledged. (Furr, Khrushchev)
- Sergei Kirov was indeed murdered by an underground Zinovievist gang linked through the bloc of oppositionists with Rightists, Trotskyists, and others. Since the mainstream interpretation is that no such conspiracies existed and were all fabricated by Stalin and the NKVD, the Kirov murder continues to be falsified in spite of the evidence. (Furr, Kirov)
- The Katyn Massacre could not possibly have occurred in the way described by mainstream anticommunist historiography. But this massacre is far too useful as a cudgel to beat Stalin and the Soviet Union with to be abandoned simply because it has been proven false. Therefore, the evidence is ignored. (Furr, Katyn)
- Timothy Snyder's book Blood Lies contains not a single true accusation against Stalin or the USSR. Yet this completely meretricious book won many prizes and continues to be widely quoted. (Furr, Blood Lies)
- Evidence from the Harvard Trotsky Archive proves that a political bloc of clandestine oppositionists including Rights, Trotskyists, Zinovievists, and others did in fact exist in the USSR. This proves that the Khrushchev- and Gorbachev-era "rehabilitations" are false, since they claim no such bloc existed. This fact is ignored. (Furr, Amalgams)

- The testimony of the defendants in the three public Moscow "Show" trials of August 1936, January 1937, and March 1938 was not fabricated or forced on them by the NKVD, the Prosecution, or Stalin. Rather, it represents what the defendants chose to say. The conspiracies alleged in the Trials really did exist. This is denied, the evidence that supports it ignored. (Furr, Amalgams)

A recent example of the falsification that is tolerated in the field of Soviet studies comes from the pen of the widely respected historian of Soviet science, Loren Graham. In the spring of 2016 Graham wrote in Foreign Affairs:

... thousands of biologists were sent to prison or killed for criticizing Stalin's favorite scientist [Trofim Lysenko] ...²

<http://tinyurl.com/fa-agriculture>

The truth is that not a single Soviet biologist was either killed or sent to prison for criticizing Lysenko. In his 1970 book on the Lysenko affair anticommunist scholar David Joravsky has a list of all the biologists he could find out about who were "repressed" (imprisoned or executed). Joravsky was unable to show that any of them were repressed because of opposition to Lysenko.³ A non-Lysenko plant biologist even won the Stalin prize in 1950. (Elina, Lysenko)

Lies about Stalin not only tolerated but promoted

In the academic field of Soviet history of the Stalin period false statements, so long as they are condemnatory of Stalin, are seldom criticized or refuted.

For example, Arch Getty continues to point out that "limits" are consistently mistranslated as "quotas." This is an obvious, deliberate falsification. But this flagrant mistranslation continues to be repeated by prominent scholars in the field such as Oleg Khlevniuk. Khlevniuk has consistently falsified Soviet history for decades. In another field of history — say, American history — he would have been exposed and both his credibility and his career cut short long ago.

Only in the field of Soviet history of the Stalin period is such blatant falsification virtually ignored and, in fact, rewarded, as long as it is anti-Stalin. The Soviet studies field will continue to spread falsehoods about the mass repressions of the 1930s.

Objectivity and the Truth

What is badly needed in the field of Soviet history of the Stalin period is a devotion to discovering the truth. Objectivity can only be approached by a determination to question one's own preconceived ideas, to seriously entertain the possibility that they may be mistaken.

Like a detective working to solve a crime by finding the real culprit, the historian must go where the evidence leads, and not where he/she would prefer that it leads. And if the evidence can only be satisfied by a hypothesis that rejects the historical models that are popular — so be it.

In this study we have attempted to be objective. The truth is not at all to the liking of powerful people. It nonetheless remains the truth.

Remarks regarding additional works by Grover Furr, originally on the back cover:

"Grover Furr's authoritative historical research in his major works, Blood Lies and Khrushchev Lied recaptures the historical narrative propagated by anti-communist historians on the soviet era from 1917-1956. Through systematic review and analysis of historical accounts, Furr interrogates this most crucial era, and demonstrates that Joseph Stalin was not responsible for alleged atrocities that were attributed to his actions: especially the Ukraine famine, Molotov-Ribbentrop, Katyn Forest, and the purges. Furr's heretical findings are corroborated through dispassionate meticulous archival research of Soviet archives and a keen knowledge of original accounts of the era."

— Immanuel Ness, Professor, City University of New York

"What is most remarkable and unique about Professor Furr's work is that besides being fluent in English, French, German and Russia — the latter two being the bare minimum to do accurate research on the Stalin era — he has a reading knowledge of over a half-dozen other languages, including Chinese and Polish. When he writes on Khrushchev (Khrushchev Lied 2011); the Kirov case (The Murder of Sergei Kirov. History, Scholarship and the Anti-Stalin Paradigm 2013); Timothy Snyder's Bloodlands. Europe Between Hitler and Stalin (Blood Lies. The Evidence that Every Accusation Against Joseph Stalin and the Soviet Union in Timothy Snyder's Bloodlands is False 2014); and Trotsky (Trotsky's Amalgams: Trotsky's Lies, The Moscow Trials as Evidence, The Dewey Commission, Trotsky's Conspiracies of the 1930's, vol. 1 2015), one receives the primary source cited on one page and Professor Furr's translation on the opposite page. It is no wonder that his work has already been translated into over a dozen languages. His work is riveting and revolutionary in its assessments. It is up to those who disagree with him to present the same kind of meticulous research."

— Anthony Gronowicz, Borough of Manhattan Community College, City University of New York; Associate Editor, The Journal of Labor and Society; and author of Race and Class in New York City Before the Civil War (1998).

"Grover Furr is one of a kind. Lots of us try to slay the dragons of bourgeois ideology, but no one is more effective than Grover. We are all indebted to his work exposing the shoddy scholarship behind mainstream anti-Stalinism and anti-Communism. There is no better example of this than his book Blood Lies: The Evidence that Every Accusation against Joseph Stalin and the Soviet Union in Timothy Snyder's Bloodlands Is False. We're looking forward to more from his relentless search for truth.

Acknowledgements and Dedication

I would like to express my thanks to the dedicated staff of Harry S. Sprague Library, Montclair State University.

I am especially grateful for the invaluable work of the InterLibrary Loan librarians Kevin Prendergast, Arthur Hudson, and Siobhan McCarthy. Without their hard work I simply could not obtain the many hard-to-find books and articles, in many languages, that make my research possible.

I would like to thank Montclair State University for giving me a sabbatical leave in the Fall semester of 2015 for the purpose of working on this book.

My publisher, cover designer, cogent critic, and friend Mike Bessler of Erythrós Press and Media, LLC, has given me encouragement, inspiration, and help whenever I needed it, often at late night hours. I could not ask for a better publisher.

Once again my colleague and friend Vladimir L'vovich Bobrov, of Moscow, Russia, has given unstintingly of his time and help to make this book a reality. I cannot do justice to the contribution he has made to this book, as to all my research and our joint research, in the field of history of the Stalin period.

Professor Susana M. Sotillo, Ph.D., my camarada and compañera, has helped me immeasurably with her patience and affectionate encouragement more than any words of mine can express.

My deepest thanks to all of you.

This book is dedicated to Graciela Moreno — my firm supporter, my staunch friend, my inspiration.

Introduction

If an objective research project on the events of those years were to be done, free of ideological dogmas, then a great deal could change in our attitude towards those years and towards the personalities of that epoch. And so it would be a "bomb" that would cause some problems...

— Col. Viktor Alksnis, 2000.

...it is essential for historians to defend the foundation of their discipline: the supremacy of evidence. If their texts are fictions, as in some sense they are, being literary compositions, the raw material of these fictions is verifiable fact. Whether the Nazi gas ovens existed or not can be established by evidence. Because it has been so established, those who deny their existence are not writing history, whatever their narrative techniques.

— Eric Hobsbawm, 1994, p. 57.

...we can demolish a myth only insofar as it rests on propositions which can be shown to be mistaken.

— ibid. p. 60.

This chapter and those that follow constitute an inquiry into the evidence that Leon Trotsky collaborated with German and/or Japanese officials, whether governmental or military, during the 1930s.

Trotsky was charged with and convicted in absentia of such collaboration at the three Moscow "Show," or public, Trials of 1936, 1937 and 1938.¹

Trotsky and his son Leon Sedov² were absent defendants and central figures in all these trials. Trotsky himself proclaimed the charges false but they were widely, though not universally, credited until 1956. On February 25th of that year Nikita Khrushchev delivered his famous "Secret Speech" to the 20th Congress of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union (CPSU). Aside from much other matter that will not concern us here Khrushchev hinted, without expressly affirming, that at least some of the defendants in these trials were punished unjustly.

¹ These trials are often called the "Show Trials." Often too they are identified by the names of the one or two most famous defendants. Thus the trial of August 19-24, 1936, is often called the "Zinoviev-Kamenev Trial"; that of January 23-30, 1937, the "Piatakov-Radek Trial"; that of March 2-13, 1938, the "Bukharin-Rykov Trial." The formal names for these trials are as follows: August 1936: "The Case of the Trotskyite-Zinovievite Terrorist Centre"; January 1937: "The Case of the Anti-Soviet Trotskyite Centre"; March 1938: "The Case of the Anti-Soviet 'Bloc of Rights and Trotskyites.'"

² Leon Sedov died on February 16, 1938, shortly before the Third Moscow Trial. He continued to figure prominently in the confessions of some of the defendants, as did his father.

In succeeding years some of the defendants were "rehabilitated" in the Soviet Union and declared to have been innocent. Under Khrushchev's successors between 1965 and 1985 the wave of "rehabilitations" almost ceased. Subsequently, during Mikhail Gorbachev's tenure between 1985 and the end of the USSR in 1991, an even larger flood of "rehabilitations" took place. Later in the present essay we will discuss the essentially political, rather than juridical, nature of "rehabilitation."

By the late 1980s almost all the defendants at all the Moscow Trials, plus the defendants in the "Tukhachevsky Affair" of May-June 1937 and a great many others had been declared to have been innocent of all charges. The chief exceptions were figures like Genrikh Iagoda and Nikolai Ezhov, two heads of the NKVD³ who were certainly responsible for massive repressions, and many of their subordinates. Trotsky and Sedov have also been "rehabilitated," though not for the crimes they were accused of at the Moscow Trials since they were not among the defendants and so were not formally convicted.

³ People's Commissariat (= Ministry) of Internal Affairs, which included national security and political police functions.

Meanwhile there is a scholarly consensus that the Moscow Trials were fabrications, the defendants all innocent victims of frame-ups, and all the conspiracies inventions either of the NKVD or of Stalin himself. This consensus is a constituent part of the model, or paradigm, of Soviet history that is dominant within Russia itself and beyond its borders and can usefully be termed the "anti-Stalin paradigm." However, no significant evidence that the trials were fabricated and the confessions faked has ever been published. In Trotsky's 'Amalgams' (2016) I have provided ample evidence that the accusations and confessions were indeed genuine.

The Soviet Archives "Speak"

During the existence of the USSR and especially since Khrushchev's accession to power in 1953 few if any documents concerning the Moscow Trials and repressions of the late 1930s were published in the USSR or made available in the archives to researchers. Khrushchev and authorized historians and writers made a great many assertions about this period of history but never gave anyone access to any evidence about it.

Here is one example. At an historians' conference in December 1962, after many presentations by speakers promoting the official Khrushchev position about questions of Soviet history, the convener, Presidium⁴ member Piotr Pospelov, spoke the following words:

Students are asking whether Bukharin and the rest were spies for foreign governments, and what you advise us to read. I can declare that it is sufficient to study carefully the documents of the 22nd Congress of the CPSU to say that neither Bukharin, nor Rykov, of course, were spies or terrorists.⁵

Pospelov's words create a false impression. In the 1938 Trial Bukharin and Rykov were not convicted of carrying out espionage themselves, but of being leaders in the "bloc of Rights and Trotskyites" that did engage in espionage activities. Likewise both Bukharin and Rykov were convicted of recruiting others to engage in acts of violence against others — the best translation here of the Russian word for "terror," which means something quite different in English — but not of engaging in it themselves.

Therefore the implication of Pospelov's words is correct in the sense most readers will understand — that a "spy" is someone who himself spies, and a terrorist someone who himself commits acts of violence. But Pospelov is incorrect insofar as he wished his audience to understand that their confessions and the verdict against them were wrong. Furthermore, the question was about "Bukharin and the rest" — presumably, all the other defendants in the 1938 Trial, whereas Pospelov restricted his answer to Bukharin and Rykov only.

In the passage that immediately follows the quotation above Pospelov clearly told his audience that the only materials historians should read are the official speeches made at the 22nd Congress:

"Why is it not possible to create normal conditions for working in the Central Party archive? They do not give out materials concerning the activity of the CPSU." I have already given you the answer.

In effect Pospelov was saying: "We are not going to give you access to any primary sources."

That situation continued until the USSR was dissolved. Thanks to documents published since the dissolution of the USSR we can now see that some of the speeches at the 22nd Party Congress (October, 1961) also contained blatant lies about the oppositionists of the 1930s — a fact that fully explains Pospelov's refusal to let anyone see the evidence.

As one example of the degree of falsification at the 22nd Party Congress and under Khrushchev generally we cite Aleksandr Shelepin's⁶ quotation from a letter to Stalin by Komandarm 1st rank (= Full General, the rank just below Marshal) Iona E. Iakir, accused of collaboration with Nazi Germany. In Shelepin's quotation from Iakir's letter to Stalin of June 9, 1937, the text read by Shelepin I put in boldface. The text in the original letter but omitted by Shelepin is in italics.

A series of cynical resolutions by Stalin, Kaganovich, Molotov, Malenkov and Voroshilov on the letters and declarations made by those imprisoned testifies to the cruel treatment of people, of leading comrades, who found themselves under investigation. For example when it was his turn Iakir — the former commander of a military region — appealed to Stalin in a letter in which he swore his own complete innocence.

Here is what he wrote:

"Dear, close comrade Stalin. I dare address you in this manner because I have said everything, given everything up, and it seems to me that I am a noble warrior, devoted to the Party, the state and the people, as I was for many years. My whole conscious life has been passed in selfless, honest work in the sight of the Party and of its leaders — then the fall into the nightmare, into the irreparable horror of betrayal. And during that short period of my life there were always within me two persons: one who had worked much and honestly for the army, the soviets, the party, and another who thought up and was preparing vile acts hostile to the country. The investigation is completed. I have been formally accused of treason to the state, I have admitted my guilt, I have fully repented. I have unlimited faith in the justice and propriety of the decision of the court and the state. The investigation has been completed. I have been accused of treason to the state; I have admitted my guilt, I have fully repented. I have unlimited faith in the justice and appropriateness of the court and the government. I know that there can and must be only one sentence — death. I am prepared for this sentence. Nevertheless I appeal to you and to the government and beg you, beg you to believe in the possibility of my correction, to believe that I can still be of use to the state, to which I dedicate my whole being. Perhaps you will consider and decide to allow me to go somewhere in the far North or East, in Kolyma, to work and on rare occasions to learn about the magnificent Land of the Soviets, mine again. I ask you to permit me, even though rarely, to take up "Pravda" and to see, by the amount of the sowing, the production, the transportation, the victories of the party, of the soviets, and of the people, whom I have betrayed.

*I beg you and I understand that I do not have any right to do so. Now I am honest in my every word, I will die with words of love for you, the Party, and the country, with an unlimited faith in the victory of communism."⁷

⁷ Shelepin's remarks, here in bold face type, are from his speech to the 22nd Party Congress of the CPSU, Pravda, October 27, 1961, p. 10, cols. 3-4. XXII S"ezd Kommunisticheskoi Partii Sovetskogo Soiuza. 17-31 oktiabria 1961 goda. Stenograficheskii Otchet (Moscow, 1962). II, 403. The parts Shelepin omitted, here in italics, are from the original document. My thanks to my colleague Vladimir L. Bobrov, who obtained an image of it for me. A version containing some of Iakir's confession of guilt but still omitting much of the complete text is in the "Spravka" of the Shvernik Report of 1963-4 first published in Voenno-Istoricheskii Arkhiv 1 (1993), p. 194, now normally cited from the volume Reabilitatsia. Kak Eto Bylo ["Rehabilitation. How It Happened"] vol. 2 (2003), p. 688.

As Shelepin read it the letter is from an honest, loyal man protesting his innocence. In reality Iakir fully admitted his guilt. Iakir was one of the military figures involved both in collaboration with Germany and with Trotsky.

The falsification goes far beyond the speeches at the 22nd Party Congress. Archival evidence now available permits us to see that Khrushchev, then later Gorbachev, and the historians who wrote under their direction, lied consistently about the events of the Stalin years to an extent that would be scarcely imaginable if we did not have primary source evidence that proves beyond doubt the extent of their lies.

A large number of documents from formerly secret Soviet archives have been published since the end of the USSR. This is a very small proportion of what we know exists. Especially as regards the oppositions of the 1930s, the Moscow Trials, the military "purges," and the massive repressions of 1937-38, the vast majority of the documents are still top-secret, hidden away even from privileged, official researchers.

Yet no system of censorship is without its failures. Many documents have been published. Even this small number enables us to see that the contours of Soviet history in the 1930s are very different from the "official" version.

The Question of Trotsky and Collaboration with Germany and Japan

During the past decade a lot of documentary evidence has emerged from the former Soviet archives to contradict the viewpoint, canonical since at least Khrushchev's time, that the defendants in the Moscow Trials and the "Tukhachevsky Affair" military conspiracy were innocent victims forced to make false confessions.

We have written a number of works, including a number of chapters in the present book and in volume one, Trotsky's 'Amalgams,' in which we point out that we now have strong evidence that the confessions were not false and Moscow Trial defendants appear to have been truthful in confessing to conspiracies against the Soviet government. That work has led us to the present question.

Hypothesis

Leon Trotsky and his son Leon Sedov were indicted but absent defendants at each of the three Moscow Trials. If the charges against and the confessions of other defendants were basically accurate, as our research has suggested so far, that has implications for the charges voiced at those trials that Trotsky was in league with fascist Germany and militarist Japan.

Such considerations led us to form the hypothesis for the present study: that a thorough search of published documents from the former Soviet and other archives would turn up more evidence of Trotsky's collaboration with Germany and Japan in addition to that given at the three Moscow Trials. In the first chapter of Trotsky's 'Amalgams' we make reference to Stephen Jay Gould's essay "Dinosaur in a Haystack" in order to outline the concept of scientific paradigm and its parallel usage in historical investigation.

In particular, it is scientifically and historically justified to hold as proven for the time being for all practical purposes a conclusion of nonexistence (in this case nonexistence of Trotsky's guilt) of something for which evidence is lacking despite concerted effort to discover it. This was the state of affairs for many historians for a long time with regard to Trotsky. However, once such evidence is found — assuming the validity of that evidence — the conclusion of nonexistence (in this case of his guilt) ceases to be scientifically or historically valid, even though many historians illegitimately continue to advocate the validity of Trotsky's innocence and therefore to ignore the evidence.

We set out to see whether we could find still more evidence that Trotsky had collaborated with the Germans and Japanese. At a certain point in our research, when we had gathered a quantity of such evidence, we decided to study it and see what it amounted to. The present volume is the result.

If Trotsky did not collaborate with the Germans and/or Japanese there would be no evidence of his having done so. Of course, in the case of human history and even of science there arises the possibility of fabricated or faked evidence. We have devoted a lot of attention to this problem.

There exists a great deal of evidence concerning clandestine involvement on Trotsky's part with oppositional activities within the USSR during the 1930s quite aside from any collaboration with Germany and Japan. In addition to the testimony by defendants at the Moscow Trials, we also have archival evidence in the form of investigative interrogations to confirm such activity. The present work concentrates solely on evidence of Trotsky's collaboration with German or Japanese governmental or military officials. The charges of German and/or Japanese collaboration were the most shocking. They have always been regarded with skepticism.

For the most part we only cite and analyze direct evidence concerning Trotsky and the Germans or Japanese. This is a very narrow approach that excludes a great deal of other, corroborating evidence which tends to add credence to the direct evidence of Trotsky's guilt in collaborating with the fascists. For example, Nikolai Bukharin heard details from Karl Radek about Trotsky's negotiations and agreements with Germany and Japan. Bukharin never directly communicated with Trotsky or Sedov about this. However, there is no reason whatever to doubt that Radek did tell him about Trotsky's collaboration.

By corroborating Radek's testimony on this point — Bukharin agrees that Radek did tell him this, as Radek himself had testified, so Bukharin attests to Radek's truthfulness here — Bukharin also tends to indirectly corroborate what Radek said about Trotsky and what Radek claimed to have gotten at first hand from Trotsky himself. That is, Bukharin's testimony confirms that Radek was telling the truth in one instance, and that increases the credibility of Radek's testimony on other matters, including of his contacts with Trotsky and what Trotsky communicated to him. But here we will examine only Radek's testimony, not Bukharin's. We refer the interested reader to our previous study of Bukharin (Furr and Bobrov 2007). In a few places we do cite some corroborating evidence, mainly for the sake of providing context for the direct evidence.

Objectivity and Persuasion

Political prejudice still predominates in the study of Soviet history, particularly since opposition to what we call the "anti-Stalin paradigm" incurs risks to one's job security, possibilities of promotion, and publication opportunities, among other possible dangers. Conclusions that contradict the dominant model of Soviet history are routinely dismissed as being the result of bias or incompetence. Conclusions that cast doubt upon accusations against Stalin or whose implications tend to make him look either "good" or simply less "evil" than the predominant paradigm holds him to have been, are called "Stalinist." Any objective study of the evidence now available is bound to be called "Stalinist" simply because it reaches conclusions that are politically unacceptable to those who have a strong political bias, be it anticommunist generally or Trotskyist specifically.

The aim of the present study is to examine in the light of the evidence now available the allegations made in the USSR during the 1930s that Leon Trotsky collaborated with Germany and Japan against the USSR. This study is not a "prosecutor's brief" against Trotsky. It is not an attempt to prove Trotsky "guilty" of conspiring with the Germans and Japanese. Nor is it an attempt to "defend" Trotsky against such charges.

We have tried hard to do what an investigator does in the case of a crime in which he has no parti pris but only wishes to solve the crime. This is what historians who investigate the more distant past, or the history of countries other than the Soviet Union, do all the time.

We do wish to persuade the fair-minded, objective reader that we have carried out a competent, honest investigation: namely, that we have done the following:

- collected all the evidence we could find supporting the contention that Trotsky collaborated with the Germans and Japanese;
- collected all the "negative" evidence — any "alibi" Trotsky or his son and chief political aide Leon Sedov may have had. We have done this chiefly by paying serious attention to Trotsky's testimony at the Dewey Commission hearings in 1937, where he himself laid out his defense;
- studied all this evidence carefully and honestly; and
- drawn our conclusions logically on the basis of that evidence.

We wish to persuade the objective reader that we have reached our conclusions on the basis of evidence and its analysis and not on any other basis, such as that of political bias. We are not out to arraign or "convict" Trotsky. We remain ready to be convinced that Trotsky did not collaborate with Germany and Japan if, in the future, evidence comes to light that those charges are false.

The Role of Appropriate Skepticism

Throughout this essay we have tried to anticipate the objections of a skeptical critic. This is no more than any careful, objective researcher should do.

In the present chapter we have a lengthy discussion of evidence. In this and the following chapters we follow each presentation of evidence with a critical examination. In the final chapter of this section titled "Conclusion" the reader will find a review and refutation of the objections a sharp but fair-minded critic might have.

We are aware that there is a subset of readers for whom evidence is irrelevant, for whom this is not a matter of evidence but one of belief or loyalty. We discuss the arguments normally raised from this quarter in the subsection titled "Objectivity and Denial." In any historical inquiry as in any criminal case "belief" and "loyalty" are irrelevant to the truth or falsehood of the hypothesis. A belief that is not rationally founded on evidence cannot be dispelled by a sound argument and evidence.

However, those who cannot bring themselves to question their preconceived ideas may nevertheless be provoked by those same prejudices to look especially critically at the evidence and to find weaknesses in its interpretation that might escape other readers for whom there is less at stake. This sometimes makes objections from such quarters worthy of attention. We have tried hard both to anticipate and to deal with such objections in a satisfactory manner.

Evidence

Before proceeding to cite and study the new archival documents we need to discuss the nature of evidence itself. Whereas "documents" are material objects — in our case, writing on paper — "evidence" is a relational concept. We are concerned with investigating an allegation: that Trotsky conspired with German and Japanese officials. We aim to gather and study the evidence that suggests Trotsky acted as alleged and find the flaws in any putative contrary evidence.

There is no such thing as "absolute" evidence. All evidence can be faked. Any statement — a confession of guilt, a denial of guilt, a claim one has been tortured, a claim one has not been coerced in any way — may be true or false, i.e., an attempt to state the truth as the speaker (or writer) remembers it or a deliberate lie. Documents can be forged and, in the case of Soviet history, often have been. False documents have on occasion been inserted into archives in order to be "discovered." Or it may be alleged that a given document was found in an archive when it was not. Photographs can be faked. Eyewitnesses can lie, and in any case eyewitnesses are so often in error, even when honestly believing that their memories are accurate, that such evidence is among the least reliable kind.⁸ In principle there is no such thing as a "smoking gun" — a single piece of evidence that is so clearly genuine and powerful that it cannot be denied.

⁸ One famous study is Elizabeth Loftus, Eyewitness Testimony. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1979.

The problems of identifying, gathering, studying, and drawing correct conclusions from evidence are similar in criminal investigation and in historical research. This is especially true when, as in our case, the research is to determine whether a kind of crime took place in the past. But there are important differences, and it's vital to be clear about them.

In a criminal trial the accused has certain rights. The trial has to be finite in length, after which the accused is either convicted or acquitted for good. The defendant ought to enjoy the presumption of innocence and the benefit of any reasonable doubt. The defendant is entitled to a qualified defender whose sole job it is to interpret all evidence in a way so as to benefit his client. Meanwhile, the judge and even the prosecution are supposed to be concerned not only about securing a conviction but also about justice. Once they are reasonably convinced that the defendant is innocent their duty is to dismiss the charges and discharge the accused even though they might be able to sway the jury to convict. These practices, though often "honored more in the breach than in the observance," are intended to prevent an innocent defendant from an unjust verdict and penalty.

Historians are in quite a different situation. People long dead have no rights (or anything else) that need to be defended. Therefore the historian does not have to be concerned with any presumption of innocence, "reasonable doubt," and so on. Unlike a legal verdict no historical conclusion is ever final. The historical inquiry need never end. It can, and will, be taken up again and again as new evidence is discovered or as new interpretations of old evidence are reached. This is in fact what we are doing in the present book. We are investigating the question of whether Trotsky collaborated with German and Japanese officials in the light of new evidence, while at the same time reconsidering evidence that has long been available.

Objectivity

Identifying, locating, gathering, and even studying and interpreting evidence are skills that can be taught to anyone. The most difficult and unfortunately all-too-rare skill in historical research is the discipline of objectivity. In order to reach true conclusions — statements that are more truthful than other possible statements about a given matter — a researcher must first question and subject to doubt any preconceived ideas she may hold about the subject under investigation. It is one's own preconceived ideas and prejudices that are most likely to sway one into a subjective interpretation of the evidence. Therefore, the researcher must take special steps to make certain this does not happen.

This can be done. The techniques are known, and widely practiced in the physical and social sciences. They can be adapted to historical research as well. If such techniques are not practiced the historian will inevitably be seriously swayed from an objective understanding of the evidence by her own pre-existing preferences and biases. That will all but guarantee that her conclusions are false even if she is in possession of the best evidence and all the skills necessary to analyze it.

Nowhere is a devotion to objectivity more essential or less practiced than in the field of Soviet history of the Stalin period. As it is impossible to discover the truth absent a dedication to objectivity, this study strives to be objective. Its conclusions will displease, even outrage, a good many persons who are dedicated not to objectivity and the truth but to protecting the legend of Trotsky as an honorable revolutionary or to defending the Cold War, anticommunist paradigm of Soviet history.

Of course we don't claim to have found all the relevant evidence there is. It is overwhelmingly likely that there is a great deal more such evidence, since the vast majority of primary source documents dealing with the Oppositions of the 1930s are still classified in Russia and the post-Soviet states today and are inaccessible to researchers. But what we have now is a lot. In our judgment there is more than sufficient evidence to validly conclude that Trotsky did indeed collaborate with Germany and Japan more or less as defendants in the second and third Moscow Trials testified. Why Trotsky may have done so is a question worthy of consideration.

The Crisis of May-June 1937

The first document we want to present is one that illustrates both the promise and the problems of interpreting documentary evidence.

June 1937 was a time of great crisis for the Soviet leadership. In April Genrikh Iagoda, Commissar (head) of the NKVD until the previous September, and Avel' Enukidze, until recently both a Central Committee member and high-ranking member of the Soviet government, had begun to confess about their important roles in plans for a coup d'état against the government. The month of May had begun with an internal revolt against the Spanish Republican government in which anarchists and Trotskyists participated. The Soviet leadership knew this revolt had involved some kind of collaboration between pro-Trotsky forces there and both Francoist and German-Nazi intelligence.⁹ By the beginning of June eight military officers of the highest ranks including Mikhail Tukhachevsky, one of only five Marshals of the Red Army, had been arrested and were making confessions of conspiracy with Trotsky and Trotskyists, with the Rights led by Bukharin, Iagoda and Rykov, and — most alarming of all — with Nazi Germany and Japan.

⁹ We will examine this question in a chapter in volume three of this three-volume study of Trotsky in the '30s.

On June 2 Nikolai Bukharin suddenly reversed himself and confessed to having been one of the leaders of this same conspiracy.¹⁰ That same day Lev M. Karakhan, a leading Soviet diplomat who at one time had been closely linked to Trotsky, also confessed.¹¹ Marshal Tukhachevsky and the other military leaders evidently continued to make further confessions right up until June 9. At their trial on June 11 they confessed once again and were then convicted, sentenced, and executed.

Before and during the Central Committee Plenum which took place from June 23 to 29 twenty-four of its members and fourteen candidate members were expelled for conspiracy, espionage, and treasonable activities. In February and March Bukharin, Rykov, and Iagoda had been likewise expelled. Never before had there had been such wholesale expulsions from the Party's leading body.

Unquestionably, there was much else that has never been made public. But these events, particularly the military conspiracy, appeared to constitute the gravest threat to the security — indeed, the continued existence — of the Soviet Union since the darkest days of the 1917-1922 Civil War.

Trotsky and his son Leon Sedov had been charged in absentia at the first Moscow Trial in August 1936.¹² At the second Moscow Trial of January 1937 Karl Radek had explicitly identified Leon Trotsky as the leader of an important anti-Soviet conspiracy. He had specifically mentioned Spain as a place where Trotsky's adherents were dangerous and called on them to turn away from Trotsky. When the "May Days" revolt in Barcelona broke out on May 3 Radek's warning seemed prescient. For the communists, but also for many non-communists who supported the Spanish Republic, this rebellion in the rear of the Republic appeared to be the same kind of thing the Rights, Trotskyists, and military figures were allegedly plotting for the USSR.

¹² They were accused of "having directly prepared and personally directed the organization in the U.S.S.R. of terroristic acts against the leaders of the C.P.S.U.. and the Soviet State." *Report of Court Proceedings. Trotsky's Telegram to the Soviet Leadership

On the eve of the June Central Committee (CC) Plenum Trotsky chose to send a telegram from his Mexican exile not to Stalin or the Politburo but to the Central Executive Committee, the highest organ of the Soviet government. In it he directly challenged its members to reject Stalin's leadership and turn towards himself.

STALINS POLICY IS LEADING TO COMPLETE COLLAPSE INTERNAL AS WELL AS EXTERNAL STOP ONLY SALVATION IS RADICAL TURN TOWARD SOVIET DEMOCRACY

¹³ We have used the original English text of the telegram from a facsimile of the telegram itself in the Volkogonov Archive, Library of Congress, Washington DC. At this time international telegrams were normally sent in English; Trotsky sent it from Mexico. The comments of Stalin and his associates are not on the telegram itself but on the Russian translation provided to them along with it. The telegram was evidently first published in Novoye Vremia № 50 (1994) C. 37. We have put this facsimile and the Russian translation with the remarks of Stalin and his associates on the

http://msuweb.montclair.edu/~furrgr/research/trotsky_telegram061837.pdf

A postscript to the original publication of this telegram reads as follows:

In June 1937 in Moscow, at the address of the Central Executive Committee (CEC) which was then formally the highest organ of state power in the USSR a telegram arrived from L.D. Trotsky in Mexico: [text of telegram]. Of course this telegram ended up not in the CEC but in the NKVD, whence it was directed to Stalin as a so-called "special communication." He wrote on it the following remark: "Ugly spy.¹⁴ Brazen spy of Hitler." Stalin not only signed his name under his "sentence," but gave it to V. Molotov, K. Voroshilov, A. Mikoian, and A. Zhdanov to sign.¹⁵

¹⁵ L.B., "Will there be no more 'Secrets of the Kremlin'?" Novoe Vremia No. 50, 1994, 37.

The late Trotskyist author Vadim Rogovin paraphrased this same article in a footnote:

Trotsky's telegram ended up not in the CEC but in the NKVD where it was translated from the English (the only way the Mexican telegraph could accept it for sending) and sent to Stalin as a so-called "special communication." Stalin read the telegram and wrote on it a remark that bears witness to the fact that he had clearly lost his self-control: "Mug of a spy. Brazen spy of Hitler!" His signature beneath these words was completed with the signatures of Molotov, Voroshilov, Mikoian and Zhdanov, which expressed their agreement with Stalin's evaluation.¹⁶

¹⁶ Vadim Rogovin. 1937. Stalin's Year of Terror. Translated by Frederick S. Choate. Oak Park MI: Mehring Books, 1998, p. 487. Chapter 50: The July Plenum of the Central Committee.

"L.B.", the anonymous author of the article in Novoe Vremia dismissed Trotsky's note as a fantasy on Trotsky's part.

How should we understand Trotsky's proposal? Could he have possibly supposed that they would accept his help? Or that in 1937 a turn towards "Soviet democracy" was possible? One can't call this irony; it's more like an illusion.

"L.B."s cynicism is unfounded. As a number of scholars have shown, a "turn towards Soviet democracy" was indeed a point of struggle in 1937.¹⁷

In his critical 1997 study of Trotsky Evgenii Piskun wrote:

This strange document bears witness to the fact that the leader of the Fourth International hoped that the USSR was going to undergo immense changes in the near future and that he would return to power again.

But he was wrong this time too. When the June Plenum of the CC had ended the Party leadership had not changed.¹⁸

¹⁸ Evgenil E. Piskun. Termidor v SSSR. Idei L.D. Trotskogo i sovetskaia deistvitel'nost' 1920-1980. Riazan': Russkoe slovo, 1997, 73.

Rogovin agreed that Trotsky must have believed he had a good chance of coming to power:

Trotsky was not a person given to taking senseless or impulsive steps. Despite the fact that the motives of his appeal remain unclear even today, it is natural to assume that Trotsky possessed information which showed that the true devotion to Stalin of the majority of Party and Soviet leaders was in inverse proportion to their official exclamations of this devotion, and that Stalin's position was extremely fragile and unstable. This might have been the source of Trotsky's hopes that, under conditions of the Great Terror which was tearing one member after another from the Party ranks, a consolidation of the leading figures in the country would be possible which would be aimed at overthrowing Stalin and his clique. (Rogovin 487)

Rogovin accepted unquestioningly the orthodox Trotskyist position that Trotsky was not involved in conspiracies with the Germans. But this presented him with a problem: How to explain Stalin's handwritten comment on Trotsky's telegram? Even Rogovin had to admit that, since the note was addressed only to his closest, most trusted associates, it appeared to prove that Stalin and the rest of them did genuinely believe Trotsky was guilty of conspiring with the Germans.

Moreover, Rogovin's attempt at an explanation is factually incorrect. If the term "Great Terror" refers to anything, it refers to what is called in Russian the Ezhovshchina or "Ezhov's mass repression," the period of the illegal mass murders carried out by NKVD chief Nikolai I. Ezhov under the guise of combatting subversion. These did not begin until after the June 1937 Central Committee meeting. What's more, central aspects of the Ezhovshchina remained almost unknown outside a tiny circle of top Soviet leaders for many years.

All Rogovin could offer was the following formulation, which takes us to the heart of our matter:

The document, as well as many other documents of the Politburo, and even the personal correspondence of its members, show that Stalin and his "closest comrades-in-arms" expressed themselves in a conventional code which was designed to give the impression that they believed in the amalgams they were creating. Otherwise Stalin, who hardly believed in the existence of contacts between Trotsky and Hitler, would not have written such words in a document intended only for his most immediate circle. (Rogovin 487, note)

We now possess additional evidence that Stalin did indeed believe that Trotsky was plotting with the Germans. Rogovin offers no evidence to the contrary. In addition we now also have evidence that Trotsky, as well as many others, actually were conspiring with Germany and Japan. The evidence concerning Trotsky is the subject of this book. Trotsky's telegram of June 18, 1937¹⁹ will serve as an introduction both to the new evidence that has come to light since the end of the USSR and to the problems of and barriers to understanding what it means.

To our knowledge no one has bothered to put all this evidence together or to re-examine in light of this new evidence the question of Leon Trotsky's ties to Japan and Germany, ties alleged by defendants at the Moscow Trials and by the Soviet government. Why is this? The two very different comments by Piskun and Rogovin suggest an answer. Rather than being the object of careful study with an eye to questioning previous knowledge, the new evidence is being marshaled in defense of old historical paradigms.

Piskun's paradigm — that Trotsky was probably preparing for some kind of coup against the Soviet leadership — has only rarely been heard for many years. Nevertheless, Piskun reads Trotsky's telegram through the "lenses" of that paradigm, for the text of the telegram itself suggests nothing about any expectation of imminent change and return to power. The most that could be said is that the text is perhaps compatible with such an expectation. But we could never deduce such an expectation from the text alone. A sober reading of Trotsky's telegram might be that it is evidence that Trotsky was hoping for a return to power in the USSR but nothing more.

Rogovin's interpretation is even more strained. According to Rogovin Stalin could not possibly have believed Trotsky was a German spy even though

(a) Stalin wrote this on the telegram; (b) only his closest associates would see it; and (c) Stalin referred to this alleged espionage by Trotsky on other occasions. Rogovin's paradigm demands that Stalin had invented the charge that Trotsky was collaborating with the Germans (and Japanese). If that paradigm is to be preserved, then Rogovin must maintain that Stalin must be faking here too.

But no objective reading of the text of Trotsky's telegram and Stalin's remarks upon it would arrive at Rogovin's conclusions. Furthermore, Rogovin has no evidence to support his position that Stalin invented the charges against Trotsky. He simply assumes this to be true.

Piskun and Rogovin represent antithetical poles in interpreting both this document itself and the question of Trotsky's relationship, or lack thereof, with Germany and Japan. But charges of collaborating with the intelligence services of the major Axis powers were alleged not just against Trotsky but also against many of the defendants at the second and third public Moscow trials of January 1937 and March 1938, as well as against the military commanders tried and condemned with Marshal Mikhail Tukhachevsky in June 1937.²⁰

There is a great deal of such evidence. The present chapter and those that follow concentrate on evidence concerning Trotsky specifically.

In addition, the failure to find evidence that the Oppositionists did have such a relationship would not necessarily mean that no such relationship existed. Indeed, in the case of a deeply clandestine conspiracy we should expect that evidence should be rare and indirect. And, of course, we do have strong evidence of such a conspiracy in the testimony of some of the Moscow Trials defendants and of the "Tukhachevsky affair" conspirators.

The present study does conclude that the evidence now at our disposal strongly supports the existence of collaboration between Trotsky and the Germans and Japanese. This creates a peculiar problem for us as historians since an article or book based upon the evidence — the present book — directly challenges the prevailing consensus among anticommunist writers on the Moscow Trials and specifically on Trotsky.

What's At Stake?

This prevailing consensus is a constituent part of the model, or paradigm, of Soviet history that is dominant within Russia itself and beyond its borders.

At the 1936 Moscow Trial Trotsky and his son Sedov were accused of involvement with the German Gestapo and of involvement with Germans and Japanese at both the 1937 and 1938 Moscow Trials. Numerous witnesses at each of these trials testified that they had direct knowledge of Trotsky's (Sedov's) collaboration. These charges constituted a central feature of the trials.

The allegation that these charges are false likewise constitutes a central feature of the dominant paradigm of Soviet history during the Stalin period. Confirmation of the guilt of Nikolai Bukharin in the crimes to which he confessed guilt has already seriously undermined what we may briefly term the "anti-Stalin paradigm" of Soviet history. Confirmation of Trotsky's involvement with the Germans and Japanese would corroborate the evidence we already have that the charges were true to which the Moscow trials defendants confessed themselves guilty.

On the evidence we have, Trotsky did in fact collaborate with the Germans and Japanese. This is consistent with the charges made against Trotsky and his son at the Moscow trials. It is not for us to hazard a guess as to what may be the implications of this fact for Trotskyism itself. Insofar as Trotskyism may be considered as a variety of Marxist theory, a set of political principles that are detachable from Trotsky the politician, it may have few implications. But the implications will be more far-reaching for those varieties of Trotskyism that base themselves on a cult of respect for Trotsky the man and are unable to separate him from his ideas.

What Do You Mean "Evidence"?

This statement focuses our attention on a central question: What kind of evidence would we accept? Unless objective criteria are established and then rigorously adhered to, the researcher will almost certainly "find" what his historical preconceptions, his favored paradigm, tells him to look for. In doing so he will either ignore or misconstrue anything that does not fit his preconceived ideas. What a researcher agrees to accept as evidence, and to exclude as evidence, is too often a reflection of his historical paradigm. The problem of "acceptable evidence" is simply magnified in the case of a charge of secret conspiracy.

There are serious problems with any kind of evidence.

- Confessions in or out of court: They might be fabricated, for any of a number of motives, including currying favor with the prosecution or state; as evidence that one has "repented"; to shift the blame onto someone else; as a result of torture or the threat of torture, threats against one's family, and so on.
- Incrimination by associates: These are open to the same kinds of tampering as are confessions of the accused.
- Documentary evidence: Documents can be forged. Any state has the technical means to fabricate documents that will convince anyone except, possibly, an independent scientific expert who is allowed to use destructive methods of analysis to test the chemical composition of the ink, molecular analysis of paper, etc., in order to determine whether the document is genuine. As this is virtually never permitted in the case of archival documents deemed to be important, skillful forgery is a powerful tool of historical falsification.

Documentary evidence can also be destroyed. Russian researchers have told us that Khrushchev had a great many papers — perhaps amounting to thousands of pages — removed from archives during his leadership in the USSR.²¹ Some documents have also been removed from the "closed" Trotsky Archive at Harvard University.²² No archive is, or can be, completely secure from such manipulation.

²¹ E.g. M. Iunge, R. Binner. Kak terror stal "Bol'shim." Sekretnyi prikaz No.004471 tekhnologiiia ego ispolneniia. Moscow: AIRO-XX, 2003, 16.

Moreover, how likely is it that agreements of espionage and conspiracy would have been written down in the first place? Anything written down at some point would surely have been hidden securely or, more likely, destroyed as soon as read. As long as such written evidence remained it would pose a terrible threat to any conspirator. We can be certain of the existence of one such conspiracy in Soviet history — that among members of the Presidium to get rid of Lavrentii Beria — because it succeeded on June 26, 1953. Yet no prior written record of that conspiracy has ever come to light, and no single, canonical account of it exists even today.

These are just examples. In general, there is no kind of evidence that cannot be forged or faked. Neither is there any kind of evidence that can, by itself, provide conclusive proof of any act.

In this essay I assume that the larger the number of individual items of evidence that are all consistent with a single interpretation, the less is the chance that they and that interpretation are the result of some kind of "orchestration" or fabrication according to a preconceived plan. This should be especially so in the case of documents which were never intended to be public at all. When combined with evidence from documents that were never directly related to any prosecution, the likelihood of fabrication becomes very small indeed. This is similar to what is called "circumstantial evidence" in the legal system. When there is enough of it, circumstantial evidence is the most powerful evidence there is.²³

Such is the case, I would argue, with Trotsky's telegram of June 18, 1937. As Rogovin recognized, the most significant thing about this telegram is what Stalin wrote upon it. But Rogovin's own conclusion lacks any convincing rationale. No one who was not already convinced that Trotsky was innocent of collaboration with Germany would ever suspect that Stalin did not believe the truth of what he wrote to an audience of his closest associates, remarks never intended to go any further. Rogovin would have us believe that Stalin, Molotov, Mikoian and Zhdanov were "pretending" among themselves that Trotsky was working with the Germans even while knowing perfectly well that it was they themselves who had made this story up. No evidence supports such a conclusion.

If the words on this telegram were the only evidence we had that led us to suspect the accusations against Trotsky were not fabricated — not by Stalin or to his knowledge, at least — they would still be highly significant. Stalin saw all investigative materials, including huge quantities of evidence that is either still classified in Russia today or has been destroyed. What's more, we have no evidence that he ever talked in "code" with his associates. In fact, pace Trotsky, we have yet to find a single instance in which we can discover evidence that Stalin lied, while there are a great many examples of Trotsky's deliberately lying in his published works and speeches.²⁴

"Fabrication" Of Confessions

In discussions such as these, where any questioning of the dominant paradigm is viewed with distrust and even horror, it is vital that the presentation of the evidence be accompanied by refutations of the anticipated objections to this evidence coming from that same paradigm. So below we will offer a summary rebuttal to paradigmatic objections to some of the evidence we present. The details will come later.

The "canonical view" or "dominant paradigm" of Soviet history is that all defendants in the Moscow Trials were innocent of the charges to which they confessed. But there is no "canonical view" about how the faking of those confessions might have been accomplished.

The transcripts of the three Moscow Trials have been available since the 1930s. According to the dominant paradigm of Soviet history these transcripts are dishonest and the confessions of the defendants recorded in them are fabrications.

But the term "fabrication" does not have any fixed meaning. No one has cited any evidence whatsoever that the confessions were not truthful, so no one is in a position to say anything definite. The charges against the defendants are simply declared to be "fantastic" or "absurd" and the conclusion is drawn that the defendants must have been induced to lie by some means. "Fabrication" is a word that is broad enough in its meaning to cover any kind of falsification.

The allegation that the confessions were false, like any other assertion of fact, can and must be tested in the light of all the other available evidence. This is supposed to be done as a matter of course in criminal cases. Historians are under a similar obligation to verify the veracity of confessions as well as of other evidence.

We undertook to discharge this responsibility in the first part of Trotsky's 'Amalgams.' At the outset we were prepared to find evidence that the confessions of the defendants and/or the other evidence against them were false. In fact, we found that the opposite is the case. The evidence now available strongly confirms the truth of the confessions and other evidence we cite here.

The Issue of Torture

In the present book we devote serious attention to the hypothesis that the defendants in the Moscow Trials and others who directly or indirectly implicate Trotsky in collaboration with Germany or Japan may have been induced to make false accusations by one means or another. Most troubling is the allegation of real or threatened torture.

Specifically, we discuss the "torture" hypothesis in connection with Zinoviev, Ezhov, Uritsky, and Iakovlev (see below). We examine Col. Alksnis' belief that the Tukhachevsky trial defendants were not tortured. We have a great deal of evidence that the defendants in the Moscow Trials were not tortured or otherwise threatened into making false confessions.

All interpretations of the Trial testimony, like all interpretations of any evidence, are hypotheses. "Torture" is one hypothesis. Like any hypothesis, evidence is required before it becomes a reasonable theory of explanation. In this case there is no such evidence. We have adduced the appeals to the Soviet Supreme Court by four of the defendants at the first Moscow Trial, two of the defendants from the second Moscow Trial, and all but one of those from the third Moscow Trial. All of them insist that they are guilty. These documents were never intended to be made public.

At the second Trial of January, 1937 Karl Radek, one of the chief defendants, directly addressed the suspicion that he had been threatened into testifying. Radek stated that it was not the investigators that tormented him, but he who tormented his investigators. (1937 Trial 549)

Nikolai Bukharin said that "incriminating evidence" (uliki) was what induced him to begin confessing after three months of silence.

I shall now speak of myself, of the reasons for my repentance. Of course, it must be admitted that incriminating evidence plays a very important part. (1938 Trial 777)

Stephen Cohen has stated that Bukharin was not tortured.

Unlike many other victims of repression, including the Red Army commanders, it seems that they did not use physical torture on him in prison.²⁵

²⁵ Stephen Cohen (Koen), "Bukharin na Lubianke." Svobodnaia Mysl' 21, No. 3 (2003), 58-63, at 60-61.

We see no reason to repeat Cohen's reasoning here. Cohen is a world authority on Bukharin and continues to insist that he was entirely innocent while admitting that there is no evidence to support that conclusion. However, it is important to note that neither Cohen nor anyone else has ever found evidence that the Red Army commanders' confessions were obtained through torture.

In early 2006 a confession by Mikhail Frinovskii, second-in-command to Nikolai Ezhov at the NKVD, was published.²⁶ In it Frinovskii admitted that Ezhov and his co-conspirators, himself included, had tortured and fabricated false charges against a great many people. But Frinovskii explicitly said that this was not done in the case of the March 1938 Trial of the "Bloc of Rights and Trotskyites," the "Bukharin" trial. Frinovskii also makes it clear that Zinoviev and Kamenev, the principal defendants at the first Moscow Trial of August 1936, were guilty.

²⁶ "Spetssoobshchenie L.P. Berii I.V. Stalinu s Prilozheniem Zaiavleniia M.P. Frinovskogo. 13 aprelia 1939 g. In Lubianka. Stalin i NKVD-NKGB-GUKR "Smersh" 1939 — mart 1946. Eds. V.N. Khaustov, V.P. Naumov, N.S. Plotnika. Moscow: "Materik," 2006. No. 33, pp. 33-50. I have put the original text online at <http://msuweb.montclair.edu/~furrgr/research/Frinovskiiu.html> and an English translation (mine) at <http://msuweb.montclair.edu/~furrgr/research/Frinovskiieng.html> .

In this same confession Frinovskii also explicitly states that Bukharin et al. were guilty, and that moreover he and Ezhov were part of this Rightist conspiracy too. Furthermore he states that Bukharin knew Ezhov was involved in this conspiracy and kept quiet about it at the trial, taking this secret to his death.

Frinovskii wrote:

The preparation of the trial of Rykov, Bukharin, Krestinsky, Iagoda and others.

An active participant in investigations generally, Ezhov kept himself aloof from the preparation of this trial. Before the trial there took place the face-to-face confrontations of the suspects, interrogations, and refining, in which Ezhov did not participate. He spoke for a long time with Iagoda, and that talk concerned, in the main, assuring Iagoda that he would not be shot.

Ezhov had conversations several times with Bukharin and Rykov and also in order to calm them assured them that under no circumstances would they be shot. Ezhov had one conversation with Bulanov, and began this conversation in the presence of the investigator and myself, and finished the conversation one on one, having asked us to leave.

At that moment Bulanov had begun talking about the poisoning of Ezhov. What the conversation was about Ezhov did not say. When he asked us to enter again he said: "Behave yourself well at the trial — I will ask that you not be shot." After the trial Ezhov always expressed regret about Bulanov. At the time of the executions Ezhov suggested shooting Bulanov first and he himself did not enter the building where the shootings took place. Here Ezhov unquestionably was ruled by the necessity of covering up his own ties with the arrested leaders of the Right who were going into the public trial.

In no way did Frinovskii deny torturing and fabricating false confessions against innocent people. Rather, he contrasted the way Ezhov handled the "Bukharin" trial defendants with the way he dealt with a great many innocent victims, whom he had tortured by his "bone-breakers" so that they would sign confessions drafted by Ezhov's NKVD men.

To sum up: Frinovskii confessed to widespread torture, but (a) specifically exempted the defendants in the 1938 Trial; (b) specifically stated that Bukharin and the other major defendants at the trial were, in fact, guilty; and (c) made passing reference to the principal defendants in the first Moscow Trial in which he claims that they too were guilty. Frinovskii's confirmation of the guilt of Bukharin and others corroborates all the other evidence we have concerning Bukharin.

Before its publication in 2006 Frinovskii's confession had been fraudulently quoted by historians and by the Soviet Supreme Court itself, suitably expurgated so that it seemed to prove the innocence, not the guilt, of the 1938 Trial defendants. This was done in the same manner as Shelepin's dishonest quotation of Iakir's letter, which we briefly examined above.

No hypothesis is worth anything unless it is supported by evidence. With respect to the Moscow Trials and Tukhachevsky Affair there is no evidence to support the "torture" hypothesis, and a great deal of evidence against it. Therefore the "torture" hypothesis must fall.

Other Possible Hypotheses to Account for Bukharin's Confession

Bukharin's confessions are important for us both because they illustrate the issues involved in allegations of torture and because Bukharin explicitly implicates Trotsky. We'll discuss his testimony about Trotsky later in the present essay. Here we are concerned with the "torture" question.

In any trial there are a number of hypotheses aside from the "torture" hypothesis that may account for a false confession of guilt by a defendant:

- The defendant's family is threatened.
- The defendant wishes to "punish himself" to atone for past misdeeds.
- The "Rubashov" explanation made famous in Arthur Koestler's book Darkness At Noon — that "the Party demands it," the Party is history's instrument and so history demands it, and so on.
- The defendant has been promised favored treatment by the Prosecution in return for falsely accusing others.

In Bukharin's case there is no evidence to support any of these hypotheses.

The main reason defendants confess to crimes of which they are guilty is their calculation that the prosecution has sufficient evidence to convict them of the crime(s) in question, rendering further denial useless, indeed counterproductive. A defendant decides to cooperate with the prosecution in hopes of more lenient treatment by the court — of "getting the best deal he can." It now seems beyond doubt that this was the reason for Bukharin's confession of guilt. At the second Moscow Trial of January 1937 four defendants who appeared to have cooperated fully with the prosecution — Radek, Sokol'nikov, Arnol'd and Stroilov — were sentenced to prison instead of execution. Two of these, Grigory Sokol'nikov and Karl Radek, were among the principal defendants. This was a strong incentive to cooperate for any defendant for whom further denial seemed hopeless. Frinovskii's statement corroborates Bukharin's own testimony at trial. Bukharin himself said that "the incriminating evidence" was the primary factor motivating his confessions, which began with his first one on June 2, 1937. Frinovskii testified that Ezhov promised Bukharin and others that they would not be shot as long as they did not disclose Ezhov's own involvement with the conspiracy. Frinovskii does not claim that he actually heard Ezhov say this. But he does state that Ezhov did not organize any false confessions in this trial. Frinovskii himself stated that he knew that Bukharin was guilty. And indeed Bukharin did not mention at his trial that Ezhov was a co-conspirator.

Frinovskii also confirms Bukharin's guilt as a conspirator known to Ezhov. This corroborates a great deal of other evidence we now possess, including some confessions of Iagoda published for the first time in 1997.

Towards the end of these chapters we return to the matter of torture in a different way: to consider the allegations of torture and how they have functioned in the historiography and mythology of Trotsky's role, the Moscow Trials, and the history of the Stalin period generally.

Why Did None of Trotsky's Supporters at the Moscow Trials Defend Trotsky?

None of Trotsky's longtime and devoted supporters among the Moscow Trial defendants defended Trotsky or their actions in supporting him. Not only did they plead guilty to various crimes, including working with Trotsky; most of them recanted their former longtime allegiance to him (not all: Khristian Rakovsky, for one, did not). To anticipate one objection, it may be asked: how is this to be explained other than by the fabrication of false testimony through torture or some other means?

In a criminal case we should not think it strange if co-conspirators "fall out" and denounce one another, as the longtime Trotskyists did during their testimony at the public Moscow trials. Moreover, we should also consider the trial from the viewpoint of the prosecution, the Stalin government. What was the purpose of having these public trials in the first place?

Like any criminal prosecution, of course, the trial was to deter further criminal (in this case, treasonous) activity and encourage those who suspected such activity to report it to authorities. But larger motives were doubtless at play as well.

Given the political conjuncture of the mid-1930s it seems safe to assume that the trials were also aimed to demonstrate to the world that these high-level conspiracies had been nipped in the bud, that the Soviet government was still in charge, and that, therefore, Soviet security was not adversely affected. The Soviets may have feared that, if the USSR were seen to have been weakened by serious conspiracies at the top, some combination of enemy states would attack them. They also feared that the Western powers, led by France and the U.K., would not agree to "collective security" mutual defense treaties with the USSR against Nazi Germany because of German penetration of the Soviet leadership including, especially, the military leadership.

That these fears were well founded is suggested by the facts that (a) Japan did indeed attack the USSR — twice, in 1938 and a larger assault in 1939; and (b) the Allies did refuse to make any mutual defense treaties with the USSR. Rather, they continued to encourage Hitler to attack the USSR. The late Alvin D. Coox, the leading expert on Soviet-Japanese relations during this time, concluded that the Japanese attack on the USSR at Lake Khasan in 1938 was directly motivated by the testimony of General Genrikh Liushkov, who defected to Japan in July 1938 and reported that the Red Army was seriously weakened.²⁷

If we assume that this was the purpose of the "Show Trials" it stands to reason that the only defendants who would appear in them would be those who would attack Trotsky and say they were wrong, the USSR was right, and so on.

Why Is There No German or Japanese Evidence of Trotsky's Collaboration?

"Most conspiracy theorists don't understand this. But if there really were a C.I.A. plot, no documents would exist." (Shane 2009)²⁸

"Instructions on concrete organization questions regarding preparation for underground conditions must be given only verbally.... At the very least it should have been specified that these names and addresses be given strictly orally..."²⁹

In the course of this essay we will show that there is a large amount of mutually-corroborative evidence of Trotsky's German-Japanese collaboration from the Soviet side. In addition we have important evidence from German and Japanese sources of collaboration by members of the Soviet opposition, including by some who themselves claimed to have been working with Trotsky.

But no direct evidence of German or Japanese collaboration with Trotsky has been discovered outside the former USSR. There are a number of possible explanations:

- Trotsky never collaborated with the Germans or Japanese. All the Soviet evidence is fabricated.

If Trotsky did collaborate the following possibilities exist:

- Many of these archives were destroyed during the war.
- Nobody has looked for such evidence. At least, we are not aware anybody has done so, particularly in the unpublished papers of the German generals allegedly involved.
- These archives too might have been "purged."
- There never was any archival evidence of this collaboration because conspiratorial information of this kind is typically not written down at all.

We know that the Soviet archives have been purged by Khrushchev, and perhaps by others. Despite our limited experience working with other archives, we know of two cases in which archival materials have "disappeared." In addition most Soviet archives are not open to researchers. Given the evidence that we have discovered in the relatively few archival documents that have been published to date it seems likely that further evidence implicating Trotsky may be contained in archives that are still classified. Later in this essay we briefly discuss the "purging" of the Trotsky archive at Harvard of incriminating materials.

In many countries it is normal to keep intelligence archives secret indefinitely. This is certainly the case in the USA. We suggest it is logical to suspect the same thing in the case of Germany and Japan. There is a great deal of evidence that the military commanders led by Marshal Mikhail Tukhachevsky did indeed collaborate with the German General Staff and with the Japanese. We have indirect confirmation of this from a German archive and more direct confirmation in one document from the Czech Archives. We discuss this evidence in more detail in Trotsky's 'Amalgams.'

In discussing their espionage for Germany several Soviet defendants said they had dealt directly with German General Kurt von Hammerstein-Equord. Rumor, at least, of this collaboration evidently survived in Hammerstein's family. Although to our knowledge no written record of that collaboration exists, it appears that no one has actually looked for such records.³⁰ Nor has anyone ever undertaken to survey the surviving papers of the German generals allegedly involved.

We believe that the single most likely reason for the absence of such evidence is simply that no one should expect a conspiracy like this to be documented anywhere, ever, much less in archives. The demands of secrecy and security require that such information be exchanged only by word of mouth.

The lack of archival or in fact of any documentary evidence of the successful conspiracy against Lavrentii Beria has already been cited. This conspiracy must have involved at least half a dozen men. Accounts of it by its participants do not agree in details except in this: it was all planned and carried out through oral communication. There is no mention of any written communication. What does exist in the archives is the outline of a speech to be delivered by Malenkov at the Presidium meeting of June 26, 1953. It was at this meeting, we know, that Beria was either arrested or killed. Malenkov was certainly a party to whatever occurred. Yet according to the outline of Malenkov's speech Beria was to be removed as head of the MVD (Ministry of Internal Affairs, including the internal police force) and made Minister of the Petroleum Industry.³¹

³¹ The outline of Malenkov's speech is in Lavrentii Beria. 1953. Stenogramma iul'skogo plenuma TsK KPSS i drugie dokumenty. Ed. V. Naumov, IU. Sigachev. Moscow: MDF, 1999, pp. 69-70.

Alleged Lack Of Non-Soviet Evidence

The Trotsky archives at Harvard have been purged of evidence that Trotsky supporters with privileged access to this otherwise-closed archive found embarrassing to Trotsky's reputation, as we demonstrated in Trotsky's 'Amalgams.' The materials purged included, at the very least, further evidence about the existence of the "Bloc of Rights and Trotskyites" and Trotsky's correspondence with supporters within the USSR.

The late Pierre Broué, in his day the foremost Trotskyist historian in the world and a person who enjoyed widespread respect from anticommunist scholars, concluded that this evidence meant little since it only demonstrated the existence of a bloc in 1932. Broué assumed that because the only evidence that was not successfully purged from the archive happened to be from 1932 that must have been the only time the bloc existed. That is, Broué erroneously assumed in his article that there was no bloc after 1932 because there is no evidence in Trotsky's archive for the bloc after 1932.

This is an invalid assumption. It ignores the fact that the archive has been purged. Had those who purged Trotsky's archive done an even more thorough job we would not even have this evidence. Yet that would in no way imply that no evidence of the bloc ever existed. Much less would it imply that the bloc itself never existed. "Lack of evidence" — in this case, of the existence of the bloc after 1932 — "is not evidence of lack" — that such evidence never existed.

If those who purged the Harvard Trotsky archive of incriminating documents had been more thorough they would have also taken the certified mail receipts of Trotsky's letters to oppositionists in the USSR and Trotsky's and van Heijenoort's notes about the "bloc of Rights and Trotskyites." Then what would we now have? We'd have the Gorbachev-era "rehabilitation" document denying that there ever was such a "bloc," and Trotsky's staunch denial that there ever was such a "bloc." Plus we'd have the insistence of the Soviet Prosecutor, Vyshinskii, and the confessions of a number of Moscow Trial defendants, that there was indeed such a "bloc."

Getty's discovery in the Trotsky archive corroborates the testimony of the Moscow Trial defendants. It is evidence that they did not lie, since in the few instances where we can get independent evidence — as here — that evidence supports the trial defendants' confessions. Likewise it corroborates the statements of the Prosecutor — that is, of "Stalin," in the reductive language of anticommunist writers. The testimony of the trial defendants and the Soviet prosecutor about the bloc and about Trotsky's correspondence turns out to have been truthful, while Trotsky's testimony and that of the Gorbachev-era Soviet government is false.

This is not direct evidence of any Trotsky collaboration with Germany or Japan. But it is consistent with such allegations, since it corroborates the testimony of the same witnesses on a related matter. Trotsky denied collaborating with Axis representatives just as he denied existence of the bloc and contact with his Soviet supporters. Therefore the lack of evidence in Trotsky's archive of any contact with the Axis is not evidence that such evidence was never there.

We do have a little non-Soviet evidence of such collaboration. In February 1937 the Japanese Minister of War, General Hajime Sugiyama, revealed in a meeting that Japan was in touch with oppositionists within the USSR who were providing the Japanese with military intelligence.³²

Other examples of non-Soviet evidence attest to the real existence of the conspiracies alleged by the Stalin government. There is the Arao Document, still extant in 1962-63. We have direct testimony from the German ambassador to Czechoslovakia that Hitler knew that high-ranking military figures in the USSR were preparing a coup d'état. This document, in the Czech national archives, was only discovered in 1987. This document is corroborated by correspondence found in captured German archives disclosed in 1974 but not recognized until 1988 (see the section on the Mastny-Benes note in Trotsky's 'Amalgams').

On June 13, 1938 General of the NKVD Genrikh S. Liushkov defected to the Japanese. At a press conference prepared by the Japanese he claimed that the alleged conspiracies in the USSR were faked. But privately Liushkov told the Japanese that Stalin was convinced there were real conspiracies, including the military conspiracy. He also confirmed that the conspirators were linked with the Tukhachevsky group through Gamarnik. Liushkov confirmed that the conspirators wanted to join forces with the Japanese to inflict defeat upon the Soviet military, and that some of them had been conspiring directly with the Japanese military. We discuss Liushkov's testimony in Trotsky's 'Amalgams' and in Chapter 17 of The Murder of Sergei Kirov.

Even if we had no non-Soviet evidence of collaboration between Soviet oppositionists and Axis representatives that would not mean that no such evidence ever existed. Much less would it mean that no such collaboration took place, for such collaboration might well not leave any evidence. However, despite frequent allegations to the contrary, we do possess evidence of the anti-Soviet conspiracies that could not have been fabricated by the Soviets.

Soviet Evidence

No researcher today, no matter how anti-Soviet, dismisses Soviet evidence just because it is Soviet. Evidence from Soviet archives is routinely regarded as valid. For example, later in this essay we examine pretrial testimony of Genrikh Iagoda, Ezhov's immediate predecessor as head of the NKVD and defendant at the 1938 Moscow Trial, and will show that it is cited unproblematically as genuine by extremely anticommunist scholars. It includes testimony about Trotsky. In collaboration with my colleague Vladimir L. Bobrov the present author has published and analyzed Bukharin's first confession of June 2, 1937. (Furr & Bobrov) This document is still top-secret in Russia. In it Bukharin directly implicates Trotsky.

Lengthy Quotations

Much of the following chapters consists of direct quotations from primary sources. We understand that this increases the length of these chapters. However, in a study such as this one we cannot do without these quotations. The primary sources constitute the evidentiary basis for the analysis and conclusions. Some quotations are from sources that are not easy for most readers to obtain, such as the English versions of the Moscow Trial transcripts. Even more of them are from documents not available in English at all. Marshal Budennyi's letter to Marshal Voroshilov, which we have discussed in Trotsky's 'Amalgams,' is an archival document that had never been published in any language and whose contents are entirely new to the scholarly world.³³

³³ See Vladimir L. Bobrov and Grover Furr, "Marshal S.M. Budennyi's on the Tukhachevsky Trial. Impressions of an Eye-Witness." (in Russian). Klio (St. Petersburg) No. 2 (2012), pp. 8-24.

In the age of the Internet there is no reason why any scholar should ever cite archival or hard-to-obtain materials without making them available to the reader. We could have put the primary source quotations onto a separate file and inserted hyperlinks when appropriate, and considered doing so. Doing so, however, would force the reader either to ignore the evidence or to move back and forth between the document and the Internet. We feared such a procedure would be distracting to a careful reader and so decided against it.

We urge the reader to study carefully the quotations from the primary sources. Like any work of scholarship this book stands or falls on the evidence and its analysis.

In this book all boldface emphases are by me unless otherwise noted.

I have put the central documents discussed in this book online in both the Russian original and in English translation. See the URL cited at the beginning of the Bibliography.

Chapter 1. A Brief Overview of the Evidence

Our aim in these chapters is to cite and analyze all of the evidence that directly ties Trotsky to collaboration with Germany or Japan. We follow each citation of evidence with an analysis of that evidence. Because all evidence may be interpreted in various ways, no evidence is left to "speak for itself." We have also striven to cite and study contextual and corroborative evidence, as all analysis of evidence requires.

There is no such thing as "absolute proof." This ought to go without saying. What gives the complex of existing evidence its power is its mutually corroborative or reinforcing character, the sheer quantity of it, and the fact that it comes from different sources.

Strictly speaking eye-witness evidence is not "circumstantial" in the same manner as other evidence. We pay special attention to the testimony of those who claim they were told by Trotsky himself of his ties with Germany and Japan. This testimony is mutually corroborative too. We will examine the extent to which the credibility of the eye-witnesses can be verified by cross-checking some of the statements they make with other evidence at our disposal.

In Trotsky's 'Amalgams' we devote a great deal of attention to the job of verifying the Moscow Trials testimony. Aside from verbal denials there can be no absolute evidence that Trotsky did not collaborate with the Germans or Japanese. Therefore any investigation must search for evidence that he did collaborate.

We also tried hard to find evidence that supports the contrary hypothesis: that the confessions of all these people, whether at the Moscow Trials or otherwise, were "fabricated" and false. This would impugn the evidence that Trotsky did collaborate, and so represent "negative" evidence of a sort. But we have been unsuccessful. We feel confident in saying that, at this point at least, no such evidence has ever been discovered by anyone.

The introduction to the Report of the Dewey Commission, which was convened in 1937 to examine the charges against Trotsky, itself states:

If Leon Trotsky is guilty of the acts with which he is charged, no condemnation can be too severe.

On the evidence now available, the only objective conclusion must be that Trotsky did indeed collaborate with the Germans and Japanese. If evidence to the contrary should surface in the future we must be ready to review and, if necessary, change this conclusion.

Trotsky Lied

Trotsky denied working with Germany or Japan, as charged in the 1937 and 1938 Moscow Trial by several of the defendants. But we now know he lied to the very friendly Dewey Commission in 1937 about other matters far less serious. We have documented many of these lies in the two sections of Trotsky's 'Amalgams'.

On the basis of his research in the Trotsky papers at Houghton Library, Harvard University, J. Arch Getty pointed out in 1986 that Trotsky had been in written contact with his followers in the USSR at least in 1932. Either Trotsky himself or one of his secretaries took some pains to conceal these connections.

The noted French Trotskyist scholar Pierre Broué, who also studied these papers and acknowledged Trotsky's lies, explains them as an attempt to deny any plausibility to the "Stalinist" accusations against him at the Moscow Trials, as well as to protect any further Trotskyist supporters not yet uncovered in the USSR.¹

From Trotsky's point of view this made perfect sense. Why give Stalin and his colleagues additional ammunition in their war with him? But for the historian it means that Trotsky's denials, not only of the existence of the bloc, but of any charge, cannot simply be taken at face value. As Getty has pointed out elsewhere:

The point here is that Trotsky lied.... [H]e had good reasons to lie. But what he said was not the truth. It was not "objective."²

² Getty, post to H-RUSSIA list Nov. 24, 1998. See <http://tinyurl.com/getty-trotsky-lied>

We cite this not to blame Trotsky for lying (although many would blame him for the conspiracies themselves). Lying is an essential part of any conspiracy. Trotsky had good reason to lie. But the fact that Trotsky lied means that we must set aside any denials on Trotsky's part.

It is to be expected that persons will lie when necessary to deflect punishment or blame from themselves. No one pays much attention to denials of guilt on the part of persons suspected of a crime. In many countries an accused person has the right to lie in his own defense, though of course at his own peril too. To any investigator and to any historian as well an accused's confession of guilt may be much more significant than a claim of innocence. So Trotsky's claim of innocence means little in itself.

However, Trotsky never did confess. He lied, and "got away with it" — and not merely insofar as the Dewey Commission members and its audience were concerned. To this day very few books about Trotsky even mention his many proven lies. I have never found a single book about Trotsky that attempts to explore the implications of Trotsky's many demonstrable falsehoods. Very few Trotskyists are even aware of them. What's more, on the evidence now available we can validly conclude that Trotsky lied about a great deal more.

It is no wonder that Trotsky lied in order to conceal his conspiratorial activities. Keeping such a thing secret would have been an elementary sine qua non of such a conspiracy. The German and Japanese participants, if asked about this, would also have denied it. In lying, they would have felt certain that they were being loyal to their countries and to their military oaths. General Ernst Köstring, German military attaché in Moscow, did deny the contact with the conspirators that he was charged with.³

Trotsky's Archive Falsified

In volume one of this study, Trotsky's 'Amalgams,' we examine the falsification of the Trotsky archive in more detail. What follows is a brief outline for the readers of volume two.

We know that there has been a practice of falsifying what Trotsky did that extended to the Trotsky papers themselves. Getty has pointed out that the correspondence between Trotsky and Oppositionists in the USSR had been removed from the Trotsky Papers at Harvard at some time before they were opened to researchers in January 1980.⁴ Broué and Getty both note that Trotsky's secretary Jean van Heijenoort reminded Trotsky and his son Leon Sedov of his (Trotsky's) correspondence about the bloc at the time of the Dewey Commission hearings. Trotsky chose to lie about this. Van Heijenoort knew the Trotsky Papers better than anyone else. But he never revealed that he had personal knowledge that Trotsky (and Sedov) had deliberately lied to the Dewey Commission. Therefore van Heijenoort lied too — an issue we investigate in Trotsky's 'Amalgams.'

Isaac Deutscher was also given special access to the Trotsky Papers by Trotsky's widow so he could write his famous three-volume biography of Trotsky. But Deutscher did not reveal the existence of the bloc of Rights and Trotskyites or of van Heijenoort's letter. Van Heijenoort, Deutscher, or conceivably some other defender of Trotsky's legacy with rare privileged access deliberately falsified his archive.

This makes one doubly curious as to exactly what was in those letters from Trotsky to the Oppositionists that have been removed and for which Getty found only the certified mail receipts. The question remains: What information in those letters to his followers in the USSR would have been so sensitive that persons loyal to Trotsky felt it necessary to remove them even while leaving sensitive personal materials alone? The logical answer is: sensitive political material.

But this could not have been mere evidence that Trotsky was in contact with his followers in the USSR. That evidence still remains in the Archive. Getty wrote:

Sedov's address book contained the exile addresses of Trotskyists in the USSR. Trotsky Papers 15741. The Exile Correspondence section of the Trotsky Papers contains copies of such letters. (Getty, Trotsky, 34 n. 16)

Those of Trotsky's followers who had access to the Trotsky Papers did not feel that this material was politically sensitive enough to remove. So what would have been? At the top of any such list would be: material that confirmed the accusations made against Trotsky at the Moscow Trials. Such evidence would have irreparably ruined Trotsky's reputation while justifying, in the eyes of many, the repressions of the late 1930s and, therefore, Stalin. Such evidence would have threatened to cut the foundation out of Trotskyism.

Trotsky's denial that he was involved in conspiring with the Germans and Japanese cannot be accepted as evidence, since, when accused of a crime, both the innocent and the guilty would tend to claim innocence. The path is now cleared for us to study the evidence that does exist.

Evidence from the Three Moscow Trials

The testimony of the defendants at the three Moscow "Show" Trials is routinely dismissed as false. The defendants are said to have been threatened, or tortured, or in some other way induced to confess to absurd crimes which they could not have committed.

As we have exhaustively demonstrated in the twelve chapters that comprise the first part of Trotsky's 'Amalgams' this is all wrong. There is no evidence worthy of the name that the defendants were threatened, or tortured, or induced to give false confessions by promises of some kind.

Under Khrushchev, again under Gorbachev and, in fact, right up to this day the official stance of both Soviet and Russian regimes has been that the defendants' confessions are false. The investigative materials, all but a small fraction of which are still classified in Russia today, have been scoured by anticommunist historians for any evidence that would discredit the Trials and prove the defendants' confessions were false. But, despite their intense desire to find such evidence, none has been discovered. This failure can make us reasonably confident that no such evidence exists.

In 1992 during the short-lived "glasnost" period under Eltsin the appeals to the Soviet Supreme Court of ten of the Moscow Trials defendants were published in the newspaper Izvestiia. All the defendants in question had been sentenced to death on the basis of their own confessions and the accusations of other defendants.

This was their last chance to retract their confessions and proclaim their innocence. Not one of them did so. Every one of them reconfirmed his own guilt.

In 2013 the appeals of all but one of the defendants (Khristian Rakovsky) in the third Moscow Trial of March 1938 were published. Once again, all repeated that they were guilty of the crimes of which they had been convicted. We have discussed these appeals in more detail in Trotsky's 'Amalgams.'

Most people who disregard the confessions of the defendants at the Moscow Trials have never studied the transcripts of these trials. They dismiss them because they have been told that the defendants' confessions were fabricated. In Trotsky's 'Amalgams' we demonstrated that the evidence given in those confessions that we can now check from independent sources is in fact corroborated.

A number of the defendants at the Moscow Trials testified that Trotsky was collaborating with Germany or Japan. Some testified that they had been told of Trotsky's collaboration personally by Trotsky, personally by Trotsky's son Leon Sedov, or in notes or letters from Trotsky or Sedov. Other defendants said that they had been told of Trotsky's collaboration at second hand.

In these chapters we will concentrate on this first-hand testimony of Trotsky's collaboration. At the end of the chapter we will say something about the indirect or second-hand evidence to note how it corroborates the first-hand evidence.

The August 1936 Trial: Valentin Ol'berg

In the August 1936 trial of Zinoviev, Kamenev, and others the only first-hand testimony to collaboration between Trotsky and the German government concerns collaboration with German intelligence. Defendant Valentin Ol'berg claimed that he obtained from the Gestapo a Honduran passport to get into the USSR with the help of his brother Paul, a German agent. He further testified that he was given the money to buy it from the German Trotskyite organization because Sedov had told them to provide it.

Ol'berg claimed that he had been in direct contact with Trotsky. We know that this latter statement is true because letters from Ol'berg remain in the Harvard Trotsky Archive. These letters are not incriminating. But this means nothing, since we know that the Trotsky Archive has been purged.

Getty discovered evidence in the Trotsky Archive that Trotsky had "safe contacts in Berlin, Prague, and Istanbul" (Getty 28). Insofar as German Trotskyists did exist, therefore, the contact Ol'berg alleged could have happened. The alleged contacts between Trotskyists and the Gestapo were for the joint purpose of organizing assassination attempts on Stalin and Voroshilov.⁵

⁵ There is no testimony at this trial about any Trotsky contacts with the Japanese.

Ol'berg claimed there was systematic collaboration between the Gestapo and German Trotskyists with Trotsky's consent. From Prosecutor Vyshinskii's Opening Statement:

As the investigation has established, V. Olberg arrived in the U.S.S.R. with the passport of a citizen of the Republic of Honduras obtained with the aid of the German Secret Police (Gestapo).

On this point V. Olberg, during examination in the office of the State Attorney of the U.S.S.R., testified

"... Sedov promised to help me to obtain a passport to return to the U.S.S.R. once more. But I succeeded in obtaining a passport with the help of my younger brother, Paul Olberg. Thanks to my connections with the German police and their agent in Prague, V. P. Tukalevsky, I, by means of a bribe, obtained the passport of a citizen of the Republic of Honduras. The money for the passport — 13,000 Czechoslovakian kronen — I obtained from Sedov, or rather, from the Trotskyite organization on Sedov's instructions." (Vol. XXI, p. 262)

Re-examined on the question of his connection with the Gestapo, V. Olberg on July 31 of this year testified:

"Confirming also my testimony of May 9 of this year, I emphasize that my connection with the Gestapo was not at all an exception, of which one could speak as of the fall of an individual Trotskyite. It was the line of the Trotskyites in conformity with the instructions of L. Trotsky given through Sedov. The connection with the Gestapo followed the line of organizing terrorism in the U.S.S.R. against the leaders of the C.P.S.U. and the Soviet Government." (1936 Trial, 25)

From the trial transcript:

Then, continues Olberg, I wrote a letter to Sedov in Paris telling him about the proposal made by the agent of the Gestapo, and asked him to inform me whether L. D. Trotsky would approve of an arrangement with such an agent. After some time I received a reply sanctioning my actions, that is to say, my understanding with Tukalevsky. Sedov wrote saying that the strictest secrecy was necessary, and that none of the other members of the Trotskyite organization was to be informed about this understanding. (1936 Trial, 89)

Interrogation of Pavel Ol'berg

Volume two of the document collection Politbiuro i Lev Trotskii (PiLT2), published in 2013, contains a single interrogation of Pavel Ol'berg. It is dated May 5, 1936. Pavel Ol'berg confirms that his brother Valentin

...lived in Prague from the summer of 1933 to the end of 1934. During this time he obtained the Honduran passport and, as I have already testified in my previous confessions, traveled to the USSR in order to organize a terrorist act against Stalin as an assignment he had received from Lev Sedov. (274)

Pavel Ol'berg stated that his brother Valentin had contact "with the German secret police (Gestapo)." He continued:

During his first trip to the USSR in 1933 [Valentin] Ol'berg was not able to make contact with the Trotskyist organization and get himself established in the USSR. Then he returned to Prague, where he maintained his contact with the Gestapo. When he received his assignment from Sedov in 1934 to go to the USSR to prepare a terrorist act against Stalin he reported this to the Gestapo. Then he received the assignment from the Gestapo to accept this [Sedov's] assignment and to stop off in Berlin for instructions before his trip to the USSR ...

The Gestapo helped him obtain the passport. He received from Sedov the money to buy the passport, 13,000 Czech crowns. In addition, before his trip to the USSR he also received money from the Gestapo. What sum he received from the Gestapo, I do not know.

Valentin Ol'berg's wife Betty Ol'berg also knew about her husband's contact with the Gestapo. (275) In the one interrogation of Betty Ol'berg now available (PiLT2, 251 ff.) she admits to knowing that her husband had been assigned by Trotsky's son Sedov to murder Stalin and other Bolshevik leaders but does not mention the Gestapo. This interrogation is dated April 26, 1936, nine days before Pavel Ol'berg's.

Conclusion: the 1936 Moscow Trial

Ol'berg connected Trotsky or Sedov directly with the German Gestapo. Ol'berg repeated this charge in his direct testimony:

Vyshinsky: Connection between the German Trotskyites and the German police — was that systematic?

Olberg: Yes, it was systematic and it was done with Trotsky's consent.

Vyshinsky: How do you know that it was done with Trotsky's knowledge and consent?

Olberg: One of these lines of connection was maintained by myself. My connection was established with the sanction of Trotsky.

Vyshinsky: Your personal connection with whom?

Olberg: With the fascist secret police.

Vyshinsky: So it can be said that you yourself admit connection with the Gestapo?

Olberg: I do not deny this. In 1933 there began organized systematic connection between the German Trotskyites and the German fascist police. (1936 Trial, 87-88)

Gurevich

Khatskel Geselevich Gurevich was a Latvian by birth who had been a member of the Communist Party of Germany until 1933 and had then moved to Leningrad. Gurevich's activities and those of his wife Frida Grebe show how Trotskyist activity was interconnected with that of the German Gestapo.

[Gurevich] Answer. I must also admit the following: In Leningrad Grebe told me that while she was under arrest in Leipzig she had been recruited by the Gestapo and she had agreed to work with the Gestapo.... Grebe received the assignment of conducting military espionage within the USSR for the Germans. (PiLT2, 288)

Frida Grebe knew that I was in contact with the Trotskyist organization in Berlin and Leipzig, knew about my contacts with Lev Sedov, and also knew that I and Mikhail Bykhovski had an assignment from the Trotskyist organization to prepare and carry out inside the Soviet Union terrorist acts against the leaders of the Party.

Yes, I have to admit that in connection with the confessions of my wife Frida Grebe in Leipzig, at the beginning of June one of the officials of the Gestapo interrogated me about my Trotskyist activity and contacts in Germany. During this interrogation I admitted that I was a member of a Trotskyist organization and was connected in my activity with Sedov, Ol'berg, Fridman, Bykhovski and others, and that I had been assigned by the organization to emigrate to the USSR to prepare terrorist acts against the leaders of the Party.

I also asked them to release me from custody so that I would be free to leave for the USSR. The Gestapo official said that my liberation might compromise me in the eyes of the Soviet colony and the CPG, and so I would be transferred to the USSR by convoy. On June 22, 1933, I was transferred to the USSR ...

I have already confessed about the persons with whom Grebe, by assignment of the Gestapo, was in contact.

Through Grebe in connection with the assignments I had received I also transmitted for the Gestapo information about the preparation by the Trotskyist organization in Leningrad of a terrorist act against Zhdanov.

Grebe's last meeting that I know of with Fridrich, a Gestapo courier, was in March 1936 ... (289)

Gurevich confessed that he had informed a known German spy about his Trotskyist activities so that they would work together.

I have to admit that Mikhail Sukhanov, who had been drawn into espionage for the Germans by Grebe in 1935, was informed in 1936 by me about the existence of the Trotskyist terrorist organization. I considered that the risk of doing this for me was minimal since Sukhanov, as a spy, was completely in our hands and if he gave me up to the authorities it would be the inevitable end for him.

During one of Sukhanov's trips from Gatchina to me in Leningrad in January 1936 I, in Grebe's absence, told him that I was a member of a Trotskyist organization and had come to the USSR on assignment from Sedov. (290)

Gurevich worked with both the Gestapo and the clandestine Trotskyist organization within the USSR. He was also in direct touch with Sedov. In this interrogation he does not explicitly state that Sedov had approved his collaboration with the Gestapo. But we can infer it. Since Gurevich's loyalty was to Trotsky he would no doubt have informed Sedov, as well as his fellow Trotskyists, about his Gestapo collaboration.

The January 1937 Trial: Piatakov, Radek, Sokol'nikov, Shestov

In the January 1937 Trial defendants Piatakov, Radek, and Shestov all testified to having been given explicit instructions by Trotsky himself concerning collaboration by either Germany or Japan. We'll briefly review that here.

Piatakov

The espionage activities of the Trotskyites on behalf of the German intelligence service were covered up in a number of cases by their connections with certain German firms.

The investigation in the present case has established that an agreement was concluded between L. Trotsky and certain German firms by virtue of which these firms financed the Trotskyites from a fund formed by raising the price of goods imported into the U.S.S.R. from Germany.

On this point the accused Pyatakov, referring to his conversation with Trotsky's son, L. L. Sedov, now in emigration, testified:

...Sedov conveyed to me Trotsky's instructions to try and place as many orders as possible with the firms Demag and Borsig, with whose representatives Trotsky has connections.

"You, added Sedov, will have to pay higher prices, but this money will go for our work." (Vol. I, p. 227) (1937 Trial, 15-16)

Sedov said that only one thing was required of me, namely, that I should place as many orders as possible with two German firms, Borsig and Demag, and that he, Sedov, would arrange to receive the necessary sums from them, bearing in mind that I would not be particularly exacting as to prices. If this were deciphered it was clear that the additions to prices that would be made on the Soviet orders would pass wholly or in part into Trotsky's hands for his counter-revolutionary purposes. There the second conversation ended. (26-27)

...I recall that Trotsky said in this directive that without the necessary support from foreign states, a government of the bloc could neither come to power nor hold power. It was therefore a question of arriving at the necessary preliminary agreement with the most aggressive foreign states, like Germany and Japan, and that he, Trotsky, on his part had already taken the necessary steps in establishing contacts both with the Japanese and the German governments. (53)

...In connection with the international question Trotsky very emphatically insisted on the necessity of preparing diversionist cadres. He rebuked us for not engaging energetically enough in diversive, wrecking⁶ and terrorist activities. He told me that he had come to an absolutely definite agreement with the fascist German government and with the Japanese government that they would adopt a favourable attitude in the event of the Trotskyite-Zinovievite bloc coming to power. But, he added, it went without saying that such a favourable attitude was not due to any particular love these governments cherished for the Trotskyite-

Zinovievite bloc. It simply proceeded from the real interests of the fascist governments and from what we had promised to do for them if we came to power. (63-64)

Pyatakov: Here I must first make one explanation. Trotsky again said that from this standpoint, too, from the standpoint of the negotiations he was conducting and of what he had already achieved, it was extremely important to build up an active, concrete and real force. He then told me that he had conducted rather lengthy negotiations with the Vice-Chairman of the German National-Socialist Party — Hess. It is true I cannot say whether there is an agreement signed by him, or whether there is only an understanding, but Trotsky put it to me as though an agreement existed, one which it is true still had to be given definite shape by certain other persons, of whom I shall speak in camera. (64)

...

First, the German fascists promise to adopt a favourable attitude towards the Trotskyite-Zinovievite bloc and to support it if it comes to power, either in time of war, or before a war, should it succeed in doing so. But in return the fascists are to receive the following compensation: a general favourable attitude towards German interest and towards the German government on all questions of international policy; certain territorial concessions would have to be made, and these territorial concessions have been defined — in particular, mention was made of territorial concessions in a veiled form which were called "not resisting Ukrainian national-bourgeois forces in the event of their self-determination."

Vyshinsky: What does that mean?

Pyatakov: It means in a veiled form what Radek spoke about here: should the Germans set up their Ukrainian government, ruling the Ukraine not through their German Governor-General but perhaps through a hetman — at any rate, should the Germans "self-determine" the Ukraine — the Trotskyist-Zinovievite bloc will not oppose it. Actually, this meant the beginning of the dismemberment of the Soviet Union. (64) ...

Vyshinsky: And what about diversive acts in case of war?

Pyatakov: That was the last point ... In the event of military attack the destructive forces of the Trotskyite organizations which would act within the country must be co-ordinated with the forces from without acting under the guidance of German fascism. The diversive and sabotage activity which is being conducted by the Trotskyite-Zinovievite organization within the Soviet Union must be carried out under the instructions of Trotsky, which are to be agreed upon with the German General Staff. (65)

⁶ For the word "wrecking" it is best to substitute "sabotage." "Wrecking" is a clumsy translation that makes the original sound forced. The Russian word is вредительство, from "vred" = "harm."

This statement of Piatakov's is confirmed in Marshal Budennyi's letter to Marshal Voroshilov, and in Marshal Tukhachevsky's confession. We have studied both documents in Trotsky's 'Amalgams.'

Radek: ...The third point that emerged from Trotsky's conversation with Pyatakov was that Germany demanded complete freedom of action for the advance of Germany to the Balkan and Danube countries. This is also a very important fact.

Vyshinsky (To Pyatakov): Did you say that? Do you confirm that?

Pyatakov: Yes. Radek is relating it very exactly. It is all quite true. (445)

Assessing this Evidence

Piatakov testified at length that he had personally spoken to Trotsky and received letters from him concerning the latter's agreements with both Germany and Japan. Likewise Radek said that Trotsky had discussed his (Trotsky's) agreements with both Germany and Japan in letters to him.

Getty discovered that Trotsky had sent letters to Radek, Sokol'nikov, Preobrazhensky, "and others" in 1932. Shestov said that he had received Trotsky's instructions through a face-to-face talk with Sedov.

Piatakov claimed Sedov had told him to order through German firms that would "kick back" funds to Trotsky. American engineer John Littlepage read this passage in the trial transcript and wrote that he found it credible. Littlepage claimed that in Berlin in 1931 he had learned of fraudulent orders for useless mining equipment being made by Russian émigrés acting for Soviet companies. He said that if Piatakov had made such orders the German companies would not have found it unusual, so Piatakov's story did not seem at all farfetched to him.⁷

⁷ John D. Littlepage with Demaree Bess, In Search of Soviet Gold. New York: Harcourt, Brace & Co, 1938, pp. 102-3. According to the late Prof. John N. Hazard of Columbia University, Littlepage was an anticommunist but basically apolitical engineer who had no reason to lie to make the Soviet charges "look good." As a student of Soviet law Hazard stayed with the Littlepage family in Moscow in the mid-1930s. (Interview of Professor John N. Hazard at Columbia University by Grover Furr, April 1981)

The passage below from Littlepage³⁸ is also quoted in Trotsky's 'Amalgams' Part One, Chapter Eight. There we cited it in verifying Moscow Trial testimony. We are citing it again here for the reader's convenience and to emphasize how Littlepage dramatically confirms Piatakov's testimony that Trotsky had conspired with German firms for the purposes of espionage and sabotage.

I was particularly interested in that part of Piatakoff's confession which concerned his actions in Berlin in 1931, when he headed the purchasing commission to which I was assigned as technical adviser. It then became clear to me why the Russians around Piatakoff had not been pleased when I discovered that German concerns had substituted cast-iron for light steel in specifications for mine-hoists.

Piatakoff testified that anti-Stalin conspirators, headed by Leon Trotsky, the exiled former Commissar of War, needed foreign currency to build up a fund for their work abroad. Inside Russia, with so many conspirators occupying important positions, he said it was easy to get funds, but Soviet paper money was no good abroad. Trotsky's son, Sedoff, according to Piatakoff, therefore worked out a scheme to get foreign currency without rousing suspicion.

At his trial Piatakoff testified that he met Sedoff in Berlin in 1931, by previous arrangement, in a restaurant near the Zoo. He added, "Sedoff said that only one thing was required of me — namely, that I should place as many orders as possible with two German firms and that he, Sedoff, would arrange to receive the necessary sums from them, bearing in mind that I would not be particularly exacting as to prices."

Questioned by the prosecutor, Piatakoff added that he was not required to steal or divert Soviet money, but only to place as many orders as possible with the firms mentioned. He said that he made no personal contacts of any kind with these firms, but that the matter was arranged by others without any further action on his part than throwing business to them.

Piatakoff testified: "It was done very simply, particularly since I had very many opportunities and a fairly large number of orders went to those firms." He added that it was easy to act without rousing suspicion in the case of one firm because that firm itself had a fine reputation, and it was simply a question of paying slightly higher prices than were necessary.

The following testimony then was given at the trial:

PIATAKOFF: But as regards the other firm, it was necessary to persuade and exercise pressure in order to have purchases placed with this firm.

PROSECUTOR: Consequently you also paid this firm excessively at the expense of the Soviet Government?

PIATAKOFF: Yes.

Piatakoff then went on to say that Sedoff did not tell him exactly what the conditions were, what the technique was for this transfer of money, but assured him that if Piatakoff placed orders with these firms Sedoff would receive money for the special fund.

This passage in Piatakoff's confession is a plausible explanation, in my opinion, of what was going on in Berlin in 1931, when my suspicions were roused because the Russians working with Piatakoff tried to induce me to approve the purchase of mine-hoists which were not only too expensive, but would have been useless in the mines for which they were intended. I had found it hard to believe that these men were ordinary grafters, as they did not seem to be the kind interested in feathering their own nests. But they had been seasoned political conspirators before the Revolution, and had taken risks of the same degree for the sake of their so-called cause.

Of course, I have no way of knowing whether the political conspiracy mentioned in all confessions at this trial was organized as the prisoners said it was. I never attempted to follow the ins and outs of political disputes in Russia, and wouldn't have known what anti-Government conspirators were talking about if they had tried to drag me into their affairs, which none of them ever did.

But I am absolutely sure that something queer was taking place in Berlin in 1931 during the period mentioned by Piatakoff at his trial. I have already said that my experiences at that time puzzled me for years, and that I couldn't work out any sensible explanation until I read Piatakoff's testimony in the Moscow newspapers at the time of his trial.

Another part of this testimony that some Moscow journalists found it hard to believe was that German firms would give commissions to Sedoff. But I have already mentioned in an earlier chapter that Russian émigrés were in the habit of collecting commissions from German firms for using their alleged influence to throw Soviet business in their direction. The managers of these German firms might consider that Sedoff was simply another Russian émigré, and would make the same kind of a deal with him that I know they had been making for years with other émigrés.

In such cases it was the usual procedure for German firms merely to work the promised commissions into their prices, and if the Russians accepted the prices nothing more was necessary. But in the case of these mine-hoists the commission must have been put so high that the firm had to juggle the specifications in order to clear its profit. When they did this my attention was attracted and the deal was blocked. Piatakoff testified that he had to exert pressure to have some orders passed, and I have told how pressure was put on me.

The testimony at this trial roused a great deal of scepticism abroad, and among foreign diplomats at Moscow. I talked with some Americans there who believed it was a frame-up from beginning to end. Well, I didn't attend the trial, but I did follow the evidence very closely, and it was printed verbatim in several languages. A great deal of the testimony about industrial sabotage sounded more probable to me than it did to some of the Moscow diplomats and correspondents. I know from my own experiences that a good deal of industrial sabotage was going on all the time in Soviet mines, and that some of it could hardly have occurred without the complicity of highly placed Communist managers.

My story is valuable, so far as this trial is concerned, only as regards the incident in Berlin. I have described what that was, and how, so far as I was concerned, Piatakoff's confession cleared up what had happened.

In Trotsky's 'Amalgams' we discuss Littlepage's memoir and how it confirms the testimony of Piatakoff and other defendants at the second Moscow Trial of January 1937 concerning the special arrangements made by Trotsky and Sedov through Piatakoff with certain German firms.

Radek

Radek: This was in May 1934. In the autumn of 1934, at a diplomatic reception, a diplomatic representative of a Central European country who was known to me, sat down beside me and started a conversation. He said (speaking German): "Our leaders" (he said that more explicitly) "know that Mr. Trotsky is striving for a rapprochement with Germany. Our leader wants to know, what does this idea of Mr. Trotsky's signify? Perhaps it is the idea of an émigré who sleeps badly? Who is behind these ideas?"

It was clear that I was being asked about the attitude of the bloc.... I told him that the realist politicians in the U.S.S.R. understand the significance of a German-Soviet rapprochement and are prepared to make the necessary concessions to achieve this rapprochement. This representative understood that since I was speaking about realist politicians it meant that there were realist politicians and unrealist politicians in the U.S.S.R.: the realist politicians were the Trotskyite-Zinovievite bloc. And he also understood that what I meant was: if the bloc comes into power it will make concessions in order to bring about a rapprochement with your government and the country which it represents. (108-109)

Radek: ... Several months later, approximately, November 1935, at one of the regular diplomatic receptions, the military representative of that country...

The President [Presiding officer of the court]: Do not mention his name or the country.

Radek: ...approached me and began to complain about the complete change of atmosphere between the two countries. After the first few words he said that during Mr. Trotsky's time the relations between the armies of the two countries were better.

He went on to say that Trotsky had remained true to his old opinion about the need for Soviet-German friendship. After speaking in this strain for a little while longer he began to press me hard as one who had formerly pursued the Rappalo⁸ line. I replied to this by uttering the same formula which I had uttered when I was first sounded, namely, that the realist politicians of the U.S.S.R. appreciate the significance of Soviet-German friendship and are prepared to make the necessary concessions in order to ensure this friendship. To this he replied that we ought at last to get together somehow and jointly discuss the details, definitely, about ways of reaching a rapprochement. (444)

⁸ In 1922 Soviet Russia and Germany signed a treaty at Rapallo that provided for economic and later agreed to secret military collaboration.

We have put the word "realist" in boldface because this same expression was used by a Japanese agent in conversation with Nikolai Ustrialov. Ustrialov recognized that it referred to the "bloc of Rights and Trotskyites." We discuss this issue in more detail in Trotsky's 'Amalgams'.

Radek: As regards Japan, we were told she must not only be given Sakhalin oil but be guaranteed oil in the event of a war with the U.S.A. It was stated that no obstacles must be raised to the conquest of China by Japanese imperialism.

Vyshinsky: And as regards the Danube countries?

Radek: As regards the Danube and Balkan countries, Trotsky said in his letter that German fascism was expanding and we should do nothing to prevent this. The point was, of course, to sever any of our relations with Czechoslovakia which would have contributed to the defense of that country. (115-116)

And, finally, after receiving Trotsky's directives in 1934, I sent him the reply of the centre, and added in my own name that I agreed that the ground should be sounded, but that he should not bind himself, because the situation might change. I suggested that the negotiations should be conducted by Putna,⁹ who had connections with leading Japanese and German military circles. And Trotsky replied: "We shall not bind ourselves without your knowledge, we shall make no decisions." For a whole year he was silent. And at the end of that year he confronted us with the accomplished fact of his agreement. You will understand that it was not any virtue on my part that I rebelled against this. But it is a fact for you to understand. (545)

And, finally, when Pyatakov returned from abroad, he casually remarked when speaking of the conversation with Trotsky that Trotsky had told him that cadres of people were being formed who had not been corrupted by the Stalin leadership. But when I read about Olberg and asked others whether they had known of the existence of Olberg, and none of them had heard about him, it became clear to me that in addition to the cadres who had passed through his school, Trotsky was organizing agents who had passed through the school of German fascism. (548)

⁹ Corps Commander Vitovt Kazimirovich Putna was the Soviet military attaché to Great Britain when he was named by one or more defendants at the August 1936 Moscow Trial, whereupon he was recalled and arrested. In 1937 he confessed to conspiring with other military leaders and was tried and executed in what has become known as the "Tukhachevsky Affair."

Evaluating This Evidence: Pavliukov's Book

In 2007 Russian researcher Aleksei Pavliukov published the fullest account to date of Nikolai Ezhov's career.¹⁰ This book, and Ezhov's career and conspiracies, are of great importance to any accurate understanding of the events of the late 1930s. For our present more limited purposes it is important because Pavliukov was accorded privileged access to certain unpublished materials relating to these conspiracies from the investigative files.

¹⁰ Aleksei Pavliukov, Ezhov. Biografia. Moscow: Zakharov, 2007.

Among those materials were some dealing with the second Moscow Trial. Here is Pavliukov's discussion of the part of a confession by Radek dated October 20, 1936 in which Radek discusses Trotsky's relations with Germany and their significance:

Radek reported that Trotsky, who had supposedly established firm contacts with German authorities, let them know that after its coming to power the Trotskyite-Zinovievite bloc was ready to make significant concessions in relation to Germany. This would be expressed in profitable conditions for the export of German goods to the USSR, in a reduction of prices for Soviet goods exported to Germany, in the permission of German capital to exploit the natural riches of the country, and also in several territorial concessions. (Pavliukov 236)

This corresponds with what Radek testified during the January 1937 Moscow Trial. Had the pretrial investigation materials to which Pavliukov was made privy, but which were never intended to be made public, failed to confirm the trial testimony, we would have reason to doubt that testimony and suspect some "stage-managing" at the trial. But here the opposite is the case, as it confirms Radek's trial testimony. The existence of such pretrial investigative material, along with the confessions during trial, argues against any claim that the Trial was "stage-managed."

In the following passage Pavliukov quotes some words of Radek's directly:

In the event of war between Germany and the Soviet Union upon which, according to Radek's words, Trotsky laid great hopes, "the Trotskyist commanders could even use certain individual defeats in battle as proof of the supposedly incorrect policy of the Central Committee of the AUCP(b) and in general of the senselessness and ruinous nature of the given war ... Using such failures and the exhaustion of the Red Army soldiers, they might even call upon them to abandon the front and turn their weapons against the government. That might give the German Army the possibility of occupying the abandoned areas and create a real threat of a crushing defeat of the whole front." Under these conditions the conspirators, relying upon those parts of the Army commanded by the Trotskyist commanders, might obtain a real chance to carry out a seizure of power in the country. (Pavliukov, 236-7)

This passage is congruent with the testimony of some of the military figures who asserted that they were in collaboration with both Trotsky and the Germans. We will examine that testimony below. It is also broadly consistent with what Piatakov testified at the January 1937 trial (see above).

Pavliukov also summarizes a confession of Radek's in the archives — dated two days later, December 22, 1936 — that concerns Trotsky:

The ultimate completion of the story with Trotsky's sellout of his former country occurred in Radek's confession of December 22, 1936. "As it turned out," the supposed meeting between Pyatakov and Trotsky in Norway was caused by the necessity to discuss a letter that had been received the evening before from Trotsky, in which the latter set forth his plans on the questions of the activity of the Trotskyist-Zinovievist bloc on foreign matters.

This letter, according to Radek, pointed out the desirability of the seizure of power even before the start of the impending war, and for this it would be essential to activate terrorist activity against the leaders of the Soviet government. For the normalization of relations with Germany it was considered expedient to agree to permit Germany to take part in the exploitation of areas of useful ores on the territory of the USSR and to guarantee the provision of foodstuffs and fats at less than world prices. As for Japan, the letter supposedly said that it would be necessary to give it access to Sakhalin oil, and to guarantee additional access to oil in the event of war with America, and also to permit it access to the exploitation of Soviet gold-producing areas. Besides that it followed that they ought not to hinder the German seizure of the Danubian and Balkan countries and not to interfere with Japan's seizure of China.

If they did not succeed in taking power before the war this goal might be attainable, in Trotsky's opinion (in Radek's exposition), as a result of a military defeat of the USSR, for which it was essential to energetically prepare. Active sabotage activities before and during the war would, besides weakening the defensive potential of the Soviet Union, demonstrate the real strength of the Trotskyist-Zinovievist bloc and facilitate postwar negotiations with Germany, which was not of small importance, since in the event the conspirators came to power as a result of a crushing defeat of the USSR, it would not be possible to manage with the concessions of peacetime. In that case they would have to yield to the Germans obligations for the purchase of German goods for a long period of time, etc. In order that this scheme, attributed to the professional revolutionary Trotsky, would not look altogether too clumsy, Radek supplied it with arguments that Trotsky supposedly relied upon in developing all these defeatist plans. Afterwards, as a result of the strengthening of Germany and Japan (although at the expense of the USSR), would begin the unavoidable war between the imperialist powers, as it was supposedly set forth in Trotsky's letter, it could be possible to go once again on the counter-offensive, since the consequences of this war would facilitate the reappearance in the world of a new revolutionary situation.

This is the message supposedly received by Radek at the end of 1935 that stimulated Pyatakov to set out as soon as he could to consult with Trotsky in person. Radek confirmed Pyatakov's confessions about this meeting and filled them out with new details that Pyatakov had supposedly shared with him after his return to Moscow. It turned out that Trotsky had promised the Germans that during war between Germany and the USSR the Trotskyist commanders at the front would act according to the direct orders of the German General Staff, and after the war the new government would compensate Germany for part of its military expenses by paying with goods that were essential for its military industries.

Radek stated that Trotsky was also negotiating with Britain and France — still Pavliukov:

At the same time Trotsky strove to avoid too great a dependence on Germany and Japan and was supposedly carrying on negotiations with the English and French too. As a result of the meetings that had taken place with representatives of Germany, England and France an agreement had been drafted that foresaw that, in the event the Trotskyists came to power, England and France would also not lose by it, to which Germany graciously acceded. The French were promised a benevolent regard to their attempts to obtain the return of their prerevolutionary debts to Russia and their pretensions to the metallurgical industry of the Donbas, and the English — consideration of their interests in the Caucasus.

In his one pretrial interrogation published in Pilt2 Sokol'nikov gives details about his negotiations on the bloc's behalf with representatives of Britain and France. We will discuss this interrogation in volume three.

Radek concluded:

After the war, in accordance with the plans attributed to Trotsky, there would be established in the Soviet Union the same kind of social ... economic system as in the other countries of Europe and, of course, the Comintern would be disbanded. (Pavliukov 239-240)

This fully corresponds with some recently-declassified texts from the former NKVD archive in Moscow that confirm and give more detail about these matters.

Pavliukov and the 1937 Trial Transcript Compared

This summary of Radek's confession of December 22, 1936, is consistent with Radek's testimony at the January 1937 trial. Vyshinskii read a brief quotation from this very confession in his opening statement at the trial:

For example, the accused Radek, confirming Pyatakov's testimony, testified during examination on December 22, 1936, that one of the points of the agreement reached between Trotsky and the representatives of the German National-Socialist Party was the obligation ...

"... during Germany's war against the U.S.S.R. ... to adopt a defeatist position, to intensify diversive activities, particularly in enterprises of military importance ... to act on Trotsky's instructions agreed upon with the German General Staff." (Vol. V, p. 152) (1937 Trial, 10-11)

Pavliukov's summary of Radek's confession also contains some details that did not come out at the trial. For instance, according to the published trial transcript Radek did not accuse Trotsky during the Trial of planning to accommodate the powerful imperialist countries by dissolving or banishing the Comintern.

In this unpublished confession Radek stresses that "Trotskyist military commanders" would be working directly with the German general staff to take advantage of defeat in war with Germany. According to the transcript Radek said nothing about this at the trial. It is, however, confirmed in Marshal Budennyi's letter to Marshal Voroshilov concerning the trial of Tukhachevsky and other military commanders. We have studied this letter in Trotsky's 'Amalgams' and published the text in the documentary appendix to that book.

Shestov

Aleksei Aleksandrovich Shestov was to be a major defendant in the second Moscow Trial of January 1937. Shestov was a mining engineer and former Party member who had been expelled as a Trotskyist.

The following passages are from Shestov's trial testimony:

During my meeting with Sedov I asked him what our leader, Trotsky, thought, what were the specific tasks he placed before us Trotskyites. Sedov began by saying that it was no use sitting and whistling for fair weather; we must proceed with all forces and means at our disposal to an active policy of discrediting Stalin's leadership and Stalin's policy.

Further, Sedov said that his father held that the only correct way, a difficult one but a sure one, was forcibly to remove Stalin and the leaders of the government by means of terrorism....

Seeing that I was being influenced by his words, he switched the conversation to a new subject. He asked me whether I knew any of the directors of German firms, Dehlmann in particular. I told him that I remembered such a name, that he was a director of the firm of Fröhlich-Klüpfel-Dehlmann. This firm was rendering technical assistance, under a contract, in sinking mines in the Kuzbas. Sedov advised me to get in touch with that firm and make the acquaintance of Herr Dehlmann.

I asked him why I should get in touch with him. He said that this firm was of help in sending mail to the Soviet Union. I then said: "Are you advising me to make a deal with the firm?" He said: "What's terrible about that? You must understand that if they are doing us a favour why should not we do them a favour and furnish them with certain information."

I said: "You are simply proposing that I should become a spy." He shrugged his shoulders and said: "It is absurd to use words like that. In a fight it is unreasonable to be as squeamish as that...." I met Smirnov about the middle of July and he asked me bluntly: "Well, how is your mood?" I told him that I had no personal mood, but I did as our leader Trotsky taught us — stand at attention and wait for orders....I detained him and asked: "But Ivan Nikitich, Sedov ordered me to establish connections with the firm of Fröhlich-Klüpfel-Dehlmann ... that was engaged in espionage and diversive work in the Kuzbas. In that case, I said, 'I will be a spy and a diversionist.'" To this he replied: "Stop slinging big words like 'spy' and 'diversionist' about...." He said: "What do you find terrible in enlisting German diversionists for this work? ..." He insisted that there was no other way. After this conversation I consented to establish connection with this firm. (235-236)

Here Shestov is very explicit that Sedov and I.N. Smirnov, who headed the clandestine Trotskyist organization within the USSR and was one of the major defendants at the first Moscow Trial of August 1936, wanted him to collaborate with German firms.

Pretrial Interrogation of Shestov

We now have two pretrial interrogations of Shestov, from October 14 and October 16, 1936. (PiLT2 239-339; 339-349) In his pretrial confessions Shestov explained how Trotsky was connected to German firms through his son Leon Sedov.

Q: With which German firms did you deal?

A: "Siemens-Schuckert," "AEG," "Freilich-Klüpfel-Deilman," "Borsig."

Q: And with which firms did you have contact in your counterrevolutionary espionage work?

A: Only with the firm "Freilich-Klüpfel-Deilman." ... I categorically assert that I was in contact only with "Freilich-Klüpfel-Deilman" with which I was in contact, as I have already confessed, by direct orders from Sedov and Smirnov.

Q: ... L. Sedov and I. Smirnov explained to you the necessity of establishing contact in your work with German agents. You contacted the Deilman firm. You travelled to Essen especially for a meeting with them. Is that correct?

A: Right.

Q: Did this meeting take place already after you have spoken with Sedov and Smirnov?

A: Yes, I had already received Sedov's and Smirnov's assignment to contact this firm.

Q: What did you talk about with Deilman and Koch?

A: There were no talks about espionage work. We only arranged my meeting in Essen.

We agreed on the day I would fly in. On the advice of Deilman and Koch I was to stay at a hotel next to the building of the technical office of the firm.

Q: Give a detailed account of this meeting.

A: At the end of June or the beginning of July on the day we had agreed I arrived in Essen and checked in at the hotel indicated to me by Deilman.

On the second day, during the daytime, Deilman, Koch, and the director of the Essen technical office (I do not remember his name) came to see me. We had a business meeting, arranged that I would inspect 3-4 mines and a factory in Wuppertal, and in the evening I would go to see them in the technical office to familiarize myself with the plan of the Shcheglovsk mine that the firm had developed.

In the evening I went to the office. After I had been introduced to the plan for the Shcheglovsk mine I began a conversation concerning Sedov's assignment.

Q: How did you pose this question?

A: I asked them whether they knew Sedov and received an affirmative answer. I asked them whether there had been any instructions from him to discuss some questions with me. They answered in the affirmative and Deilman, smiling, stated: "To speak plainly, we know each other, and let's get straight to the business."

The essence of the conversation: the firm is interested in economic information, the perspectives and the factual plan for the development of coal, chemicals, and metallurgy in the Kuzbas. The firm has its own man, Stroilov, in Novosibirsk. He knows their men in the Kuzbas. According to the wishes of our organization we can use their men to organize sabotage (diversion—nykh aktov). The firm can increase the quality and quantity of its people as needed.

To my question about how the firm will repay our organization for the economic information Deilman said, and Koch translated, that:

1. Their people will work to carry out such tasks as our organization gives them. They know about the tasks of our organization from Mr. Lev Sedov, who is a great friend of theirs. Their people will act in the most determined manner.

2. The firm assumes the responsibility of maintaining the contact of our organization with our foreign bureau by the avenues we know about. We can maintain the same contact in Siberia; the means of contact through Stroilov and their people, when they travel on any occasion out of the USSR and back.

Here Deilman told me that any letter addressed to him with the note on it "for my boss" would be infallibly passed on to Sedov.

As a result of our exchange of views we arrived at the conclusion:

First: whenever necessary letters from Siberia to Sedov would be addressed to Deilman with the note "give to my boss."

Second: Stroilov would concentrate all diversionist (sabotage) and espionage work in his hands, since he would be working in the management of Kuzbasstroi. He knows the German language well and people from Germany will go to him.

Third: The Trotskyist organization will cooperate with the Germans in their diversionist (sabotage) work.

Fourth: There is no doubt that once the Trotskyist organization has attained power it will not forget Deilman and will give to it a new order for the planning of new mines and for carrying the plan out.

I asked Deilman whether his people were reliable enough and whether they would give us up if they were caught. Deilman answered me: "We Germans are the kind of people that will die without saying a word about the fact that they are spies and are working with Trotskyists."

... I assured Deilman that when the Trotskyists came to power the interests of their firm will certainly not be forgotten.

Q: ... You have yourself confessed that the Trotskyist organization needed money.

A: I repeat that I personally did not take any money from the German firms, but I must admit that if Sedov and Smirnov had given me such an assignment I would have certainly carried it out.

Q: Did you interest yourself in the sources of money received by the Trotskyists abroad?

A: Unquestionably the Trotskyist organization abroad needed money. But it was not appropriate for me to ask Sedov, Smirnov, or Piatakov where the money was obtained. I can tell the investigation about one incident that may disclose one of the sources that the Trotskyist organization abroad used to obtain money.

From talks in Berlin with individual comrades: with Zubkov of Soiuzugol', Donbass; with Nedrasov of Soiuzzoloto, with an engineer from Solikamsk who was working under the command of the leadership of Glavkhim whose name I don't remember but whose face I recognize well, I found out that German firms such as "Borsig" and "Demag" for some reason enjoyed special protection by Piatakov...

Q: After the meeting in Essen did you meet with Deilman and Koch again in Germany?

A: No, I didn't. I have already confessed that after returning from England, besides my meeting with Sedov in Berlin and receiving letters from him for Piatakov and Muralov I had no more meetings with Deilman and the Trotskyists.

Q: When you gave to Piatakov in Moscow the letters from Sedov did you speak with him about the assignments of Deilman and Koch?

A: No, I didn't.

Q: Have you confessed everything about the use of German specialists for counterrevolutionary work?

A: No, not everything. I used Floren for sending information of the Siberian center to Sedov and receiving instructions from him. This was in 1932 when Floren was working in Prokop'evsk.

Q: How did you do this?

A: During the winter, at the end of 1932, knowing about Floren's impending trip to Germany on holiday, I proposed to Muralov to use this occasion to send information to Lev Sedov. ... He agreed to the sending of a letter to Sedov via Floren and offered to return in a few days with the letter.... In this same letter Muralov asked Sedov for instructions on our position during war with capitalist countries and in particular with Germany....

Floren went to Germany during the winter at the end of 1932. He carried out my assignment and when he returned in the spring of the same year he brought a reply from Sedov to Muralov. I gave this letter to Muralov in the spring of 1933.

Q: Do you know the contents of this answer of Sedov's?

A: Muralov decoded the letter himself. He told me as follows: The center abroad is satisfied with the Siberian Trotskyist work. The Trotskyists abroad have had successes. Contacts with socialist groups are being established. There has been success in breaking off from foreign companies, especially French ones, separate groups that are now working under Trotsky's direction. We need to carry out work in the Kuzbass along the same lines as this. On the question of the position of the Trotskyist organization during the period of a war between the Soviet Union and Germany, Sedov instructed Muralov that we must unconditionally take a defeatist position.

Stroilov

Mikhail Stepanovich Stroilov was a mining engineer who had been recruited by the Germans to do espionage work in the Kuzbass mining area. Stroilov was also a defendant in the January 1937 Moscow Trial. Stroilov was not a Trotskyist. Therefore in his testimony at trial Stroilov did not connect Trotsky or Sedov directly with Germans or Germany.

We do have two pretrial confessions of Stroilov's, dated October 16 and October 20, 1936. (PiLT2 349-360; 360-365) In them he relates how he worked with Trotskyists and Germans.

Q: Does that mean that the Trotskyists contacted you on their own initiative?

A: Not entirely on their own initiative. In the ensuing talks with the Trotskyists I discovered that they had a parallel line of contact directly with the Germans.

Q: Tell us how the Trotskyists established contact with you concerning subversive work.

A: Until my business trip abroad I had only a weak understanding of Trotskyists. From newspapers I knew of the existence of various opposition groups and knew about Trotsky's exile abroad, but I had no particular interest in these matters. Once I was abroad I understood from talks with the Germans that the Trotskyists were carrying out counterrevolutionary work in the USSR and that the Germans regarded this work sympathetically.

...Shestov informed me that the Trotskyist organization set itself the task of destruction in the Kuzbass in order to retard its development.

353

... Sommeregger proposed that I put Shebesto in contact with the Trotskyist Shestov, who would be obliged to render practical assistance to the German saboteurs on the spot.

Stroilov's testimony corroborates Shestov's in confirming that the Trotskyists worked closely with the Germans.

Andreev

Vladimir Mikhailovich Andreev was a young mining engineer who was recruited to a fascist organization while working in the Kuzbass. He was not a defendant in any of the Moscow Trials. We have two interrogations of him dated October 5 and 21, 1936. (PiLT2, 368-373; 373-380)

Andreev testified about the connection between the Trotskyists and the pro-German fascist group of which he was a member. He had been recruited to this group by a certain Peshekhonov (no first name or patronymic is given in this source). Peshekhonov had been involved in the Shakhty conspiracy some years earlier and was an avid fascist.¹¹

Andreev testified about three members of the fascist group he was in, who turned out to be Trotskyists.

Q: What did Peshekhonov tell you about them?

A: He said that it would be harder now for us to do our work since our counterrevolutionary group had been dealt a serious blow. I asked: What blow? Peshekhonov replied that during my vacation Noskov and Shubin were no longer among the participants of our group, and Kurov had to temporarily stop any practical involvement in counterrevolutionary work since he was also under threat. I was astonished at hearing these names: Noskov, Shubin, and Kurov I knew as members of the Party. I said to Peshekhonov: "But aren't they communists?" Peshekhonov answered me: "They are not communists, but Trotskyists. Communists and Trotskyists are as different from one another as day is from night." I still did not really understand Peshekhonov and asked him to explain.

Then Peshekhonov told me that the Trotskyists in our organization play an especially active role. In their hostility and revenge against the Party they stop at nothing and are in contact with our organization through Stroilov and carry out together with us active work against the Party and construction in the country. Then he told me that during my vacation (I was on vacation from the beginning of June until the end of August) the Trotskyist activities of Noskov and Shubin had been discovered. Both had been expelled from the Party and removed from work. Kurov was also threatened and for self-protection had to temporarily withdraw from active counterrevolutionary work.

But Peshekhonov warned me that this was just a temporary interruption caused by the Moscow Trial of the Trotskyist-Zinovievist center. Now the Trotskyists, as Peshekhonov said, would come to us even more hostile and more actively. Therefore we had to hold to our course of relying on them especially for attracting to our work.

Q: Do you admit that in carrying out your counterrevolutionary tasks in conjunction with the fascists and Trotskyists, in the method of carrying them out you stopped at nothing, including sending workers to their deaths and putting whole mine shafts in danger of being blown up?

A: Yes, I am compelled to admit this.

Q: Was the explosion of September 23, as a result of which 9 miners were killed and 15 were seriously injured, the work of your fascist-Trotskyist group?

A: Yes, it's true, September 23 was the work of our fascist-Trotskyist group.

Archival Documents and the 1937 Trial Transcript:

Sokol'nikov and Radek Concerning Trotsky's Relations with Japan and Germany

Sokol'nikov

In the course of his indictment at the start of the 1937 Trial Soviet Prosecutor Andrei Vyshinskii said that in pretrial confessions Sokol'nikov had testified that a foreign diplomat had informed him of Trotsky's contact with his country:

The accused Sokolnikov also admitted that, taking advantage of his position as Assistant People's Commissar of Foreign Affairs, he, on L.D. Trotsky's instructions, carried on secret negotiations with representatives of a certain foreign state.

The accused Sokolnikov testified:

"At the conclusion of an official conversation held in my office, when Mr. ___ and the secretary of the embassy were about to leave, Mr. ___ stopped awhile.

"At that time both interpreters had already left my office. Taking advantage of this opportunity, Mr. ___, while I escorted him to the door, exchanged a few sentences with me. Mr. ___ asked me:

'Are you aware that Mr. Trotsky has made certain proposals to my government?'

"I replied: 'Yes, I have been informed of this.'

"Mr. ___ asked: 'How do you appraise these proposals?'

"I replied: 'I think the proposals are quite serious.'

"Then Mr. ___ asked: 'Is this only your personal opinion?'

"I replied: 'No, this is also the opinion of my friends.'"

(Vol. VIII, pp. 235, 236)

To this day not one of the many volumes of the preliminary investigative materials of this, of the other two Moscow Trials, and of many other such proceedings, has ever been opened to researchers. But the investigative materials pertaining to this particular passage were published in 1989 and again in 1991 in a volume on the "rehabilitation" process.

Its content is important for our purposes. First, because it shows that these many volumes of preliminary investigation materials do exist (or did in 1989). Second, because this passage, quoted from those preliminary materials, show clearly that the country in question was Japan.

...to the file was associated a copy of notes of a talk between G. Ia. Sokol'nikov, who was at that time the vice-commissar of Foreign Affairs, with the Japanese ambassador Ota of April 13, 1935, on the question of the petroleum, fishing, and anthracite concessions on Sakhalin [Island]. At the preliminary investigation and at the trial G. Ia. Sokol'nikov confirmed the fact of this talk and stated that after the talk he supposedly had a short conversation with Ota on the subject of L.D. Trotsky's proposals to the Japanese government. The contents of the conversation, as it is reflected in the transcript of the interrogation of G. Ia. Sokol'nikov of December 12, 1936, was as follows:

Sokol'nikov: ...when Ota and the secretary of the embassy were about to leave, Ota stopped awhile. At that time both interpreters had already left my office. Taking advantage of this opportunity Ota, while I escorted him to the door, exchanged a few sentences with me.

Question: Please reproduce your conversation with Ota word for word, as far as possible.

Answer: Ota asked me: "Are you aware that Mr. Trotsky has made certain proposals to my government?" I replied: "Yes, I have been informed of this." Ota asked: "How do you appraise these proposals?" I replied: "I think the proposals are quite serious." Then Ota asked: "Is this only your personal opinion?" I replied: "No, this is also the opinion of my friends." On this point our conversation ended.

Question: Did Ota return to the question of contact between the bloc and the Japanese government after that?

Answer: No. This conversation with Ota took place at the very end of my negotiations with him. Shortly after that I stopped working in the NKVD and did not meet with Ota again.¹²

¹² Reabilitatsiia. Politicheskie Protsessy 30-50-x godov. Moscow: Izdatel'stvo Politicheskoi Literatury, 2001, pp. 228-9. Originally published in Izvestiia TsK KPSS No. 9 (1989), p. 45.

We will discuss Sokol'nikov's talk with Japanese ambassador Tamekichi Ota in the next chapter. If Sokol'nikov had been forced to fabricate his testimony here, including the details of person and country, it's difficult to conceive of any reason he would have then been admonished to omit these details at trial. It's precisely these details, confined only to his pretrial testimony, that strongly suggest the statement was not a fabrication. The details in this pretrial testimony were never intended by the prosecution to see the light of day. The text of this part of Sokol'nikov's confession is strong corroborative evidence that both it and his testimony at the Moscow trial are truthful.

Confirmation of Trotsky's Contact with Japanese

In his "Statement" to Ezhov of December 19-20, 1936, made public in 2015, Iurii Piatakov mentions Japanese ambassador Ota's contact with Sokol'nikov:

Also, Sokol'nikov told me that he had a talk with the Japanese, with Ota, I think, from which it was also clear that Trotsky was carrying on negotiations with representatives of the Japanese government. (LD 257)¹³

¹³ I have put this document online. See the note at the head of the Bibliography.

Piatakov made this remark in passing, without any emphasis. Sokol'nikov must have told him about this incident. It confirms Sokol'nikov's claim that Trotsky had been conspiring with the Japanese. We will examine other evidence of Trotsky's conspiring with the Japanese when we study Serov's report to the Molotov Commission.

Radek

The text of Radek's similar statement at a preliminary investigation has not been published, though it is briefly summarized on p. 229 in the Reabilitatsia volume, right after the quotation from Sokol'nikov we've just reviewed. But a version of that text was reprinted in a 2004 volume of NKVD materials sent to Stalin. It occurs in a part of the draft of Vyshinskii's opening statement at the 1937 Trial.¹⁴ Though expurgated to remove the names of the German figures identified in the original interrogation (which is still secret) the name of the government — Germany, in this case — was left in the draft, while it was omitted in the Trial transcript (1937 Trial, 7-9).

¹⁴ Lubianka 1937-1938, 11-12.

In the following section:

- the passages that are common to both versions of Vyshinsky's remarks are in normal type.

- those passages that are only in the pretrial draft of Vyshinsky's remarks published in 2004, but are not in the Trial transcript, are in italics.
- the passages that are only in the Trial transcript are in bold.

The most important result of this textual analysis is this: the draft version published in 2004 contains more specific references to Germany and Japan, to German individuals, and to an outline of Trotsky's purported agreements with them.

As testified by the accused Pyatakov, L. Trotsky, in his conversation with the accused in December 1935, informed him that as a result of these negotiations he had concluded an agreement with the said leader of the National-Socialist Party HESS on the following terms:

"1) to guarantee a generally favourable attitude towards the German government and the necessary collaboration with it in the most important questions of an international character;

"2) to agree to territorial concessions;

"3) to permit German industrialists, in the form of concessions (or some other forms), to exploit enterprises in the U.S.S.R. which are essential as complements to German economy (iron ore, manganese, oil, gold, timber, etc., were meant);

"4) to create in the U.S.S.R. favourable conditions for the activities of German private enterprises;

"5) in time of war to develop extensive diversive activities in enterprises of the war industry and at the front. These diversive activities are to be carried on under Trotsky's instructions, agreed upon with the German General Staff.

These principles of the agreement, as Trotsky related, were finally elaborated and adopted during Trotsky's meeting with Hitler's deputy, Hess.

Likewise, said Trotsky, he had well-established connections with the Japanese government. (Vol. I, pp. 267, 268)

The nature of this agreement and the extent of the territorial concessions proposed were communicated by L. Trotsky in his letter to the accused Radek in December 1935.

On this point the accused Radek, during examination on December 4, 1936, testified:

"...Trotsky's assertion about his communication with the representatives of the ___ government was not idle talk. I was able to convince myself of this from conversations I had had at diplomatic receptions in 1935-35 with the military attaché Mr. German General K., the naval attaché, if I am not mistaken, Mr. B and finally with the press-attaché of the German embassy, Mr. B, a very well informed representative of Germany.

Both of them, in a cautious way, gave me to understand that the ___ government was in communication with Trotsky."

And further:

"I told Mr. K___ that it was absolutely useless expecting any concessions from the present government, but that the German government could count upon receiving concessions from 'the realist politicians in the U.S.S.R.,' i.e. from the bloc, when the latter came to power." (Vol. V, pp. 119, 121)

We should note that even Vyshinsky's draft has been expurgated of some details. For example in the summary of Sokol'nikov's confession Ota's name is replaced by "O" in this draft, while in the Trial transcript itself even this letter is omitted and we read "Mr. ___."

Hess's name is mentioned in the Trial transcript. Presumably this is because Hess was an official of the Nazi Party, not a member of the German government. The Soviets insisted upon making a distinction between the policies of the Soviet government that wanted good relations with capitalist countries in diplomacy, trade, etc., and the policies of the Bolshevik Party that pursued communist ends. It is logical that they would make a similar distinction in the case of Germany.

By analogy with Sokol'nikov's interrogation we may assume that all the names were present in the still-secret transcript of Radek's interrogation. Explicit identification of German and Japanese individuals is more frequent in the draft of Vyshinsky's remarks, yet Hess's name does get into the Trial transcript, though the word "Japan" is excised, as are the ranks and initials of the German officials and, in the last quotation, the word "German" itself. This appears to show considerable uncertainty within the Soviet government as to how much to reveal publicly. Perhaps they did not want to "burn their bridges" to the government and military of any of the Western countries.

Assessing This Evidence

We will have much more discussion of the testimony above, and of confirmatory testimony, in the chapter on Piatakov's Statement to Ezhov in volume three of this work.

As in the case of the Sokol'nikov passage, these differences between the various versions of the same testimony are hard to explain unless one assumes that the original testimony was genuine. It would be absurd to create multiple levels of fake confessions. But real confessions that were obtained in many interrogations over an extended time, then edited down in several versions of the indictment, and finally edited again in the final draft of the Trial transcript, would leave this kind of documentary trail.

Radek's and Sokol'nikov's interrogations were still in existence in 1989 when the excerpts from them were published. We have evidence that the texts of many other interrogations, as well as other vital investigative materials, still exist but are kept top secret in Russian archives. They probably have a great deal more evidence to support the existence of the conspiracies, including those with Trotsky, Germany, and Japan. Since the archives have been scoured for any evidence that could support the "rehabilitations," and thus the supposed innocence, of the defendants, it seems safe to assume that the material that is still secret tends to support the defendants' guilt.

Until recently very few such pretrial confession transcripts had been published — Bukharin's first confession, plus Frinovskii's, Ezhov's, Iagoda's, Enukidze's, Fel'dman's, and a few by defendants at the 1936 trials like Zinoviev and Kamenev. Now we have more: the several interrogation-confessions in the volume Politbiuro i Lev Trotskii, T. 2 (PiLT2); Piatakov's Statement of December 19-20, 1936; plus some quotations from investigative materials in Ivan Serov's report to the Molotov Commission of June, 1956. All of these materials confirm the impression that they contain primary evidence of outstanding importance. We devote a separate chapter to each of the last two in the present volume. We will study more of the materials in PiLT2 in volume three.

Evidence

We have no evidence that the testimony in these confessions was extracted by threat or force — that is, was false. Why go to the trouble of having a suspect concoct a detailed confession, naming names, and then take out those names for the sake of a trial?

By far the most likely reason for omitting the names at trial is that they were genuine in the first place. Given the absence of any evidence that these confessions were false, and given the logical progression from more detail in the secret documents to the least detail in public ones, any objective student would conclude that we should consider these confessions genuine unless and until evidence to the contrary should be discovered.

But the practice among most scholars of this period of Soviet history is to do precisely the opposite. Any evidence that tends to support the theory that Trotsky or any of those accused of espionage, sabotage, conspiracy to overthrow the government, or treasonable contacts with foreign governments did in fact so conspire, is routinely dismissed. The evidence itself is not evaluated.

Such a procedure is incorrect. There is never any reason to "dismiss" — to refuse to consider — any evidence. All evidence needs to be evaluated on its own merits and in conjunction with the rest of the evidence available, as we have done here. The evidence is strong that Radek testified truthfully both in his pretrial interrogations and at the trial. That means either that Trotsky was involved with Germany and Japan or, at the least, that Trotsky told Radek he was.

The March 1938 Trial

Krestinskii

In this trial Nikolai Krestinskii testified that in 1922 he began collaborating for factional Trotskyist aims with the German General von Seeckt at Trotsky's behest. Krestinskii said that the clandestine Trotskyite organization performed some kind of espionage or intelligence services for the German General Staff in return for a considerable sum of money to further their factional work within the Bolshevik Party.

KRESTINSKY: I began my illegal Trotskyite activities at the end of 1921, when on Trotsky's suggestion I consented to the formation of an illegal Trotskyite organization and to my joining its centre, which was to be made up of Trotsky, Pyatakov, Serebryakov, Preobrazhensky and myself, Krestinskii. Trotsky made this proposal to me immediately after the Tenth Congress. ... (1938 Trial, 262)

A year later I committed a crime — I refer to the one I spoke about during the examination of the accused Rosengoltz — the agreement I concluded on Trotsky's instructions with General Seeckt, with the Reichswehr in his person, about financing the Trotskyite organization in exchange for services of an espionage nature which we undertook in this connection to render the Reichswehr.... (262)

VYSHINSKY: Will you tell us how much money you received?

KRESTINSKY: Beginning with 1923 until 1930 we received annually 250,000 German marks in gold.

VYSHINSKY: This makes approximately two million gold marks altogether during these years?

KRESTINSKY: Yes, approximately two million gold marks. (265)

Krestinskii made a point of stressing that he had contacted von Seeckt as early as the previous year, 1921, but that his illegal, criminal contacts with von Seeckt dated only from 1922.

VYSHINSKY: Inasmuch as you are winding up the story of this period of your criminal activities, I want to get more precise information on one question. You said that in the winter of 1921-22 you evolved your calculations on the German Reichswehr.

KRESTINSKY: The plans to utilize the German Reichswehr for criminal Trotskyite purposes appeared in the spring of 1922.

VYSHINSKY: Did your Trotskyite organization maintain contact with Seeckt even before 1921?

KRESTINSKY: There was a contact with him of which I do not want to speak at an open session. It was a contact established by a member of our organization who at that time was not yet a member of our organization, and it was not a contact of a Trotskyite nature. (267-268)

...

VYSHINSKY: The question of money for Trotskyite purposes from the German Reichswehr — is that an official aspect or not?

KRESTINSKY: This was the secret Trotskyite aspect, a criminal thing.

VYSHINSKY: Which refers to 1921-22?

KRESTINSKY: To 1922. (269)

It is hard to understand why Krestinskii would have insisted upon such precision over an insubstantial matter — whether his illegal Trotskyist activity began in 1921 or in 1922 — unless he were telling the truth.

Krestinskii also claimed that he had met personally with Trotsky in Meran, Italy¹⁵ in October 1933, where Trotsky told him that collaboration with Japan was also essential. Krestinskii said that Trotsky personally informed him that he was continuing to work personally with the Germans, and with the Japanese through Sokol'nikov.

He undertook to carry on the negotiations with the Germans. As for the Japanese, of whom he spoke as a force with which it was also necessary to come to terms, he said that, for the time being, it was difficult for him to establish direct connections with them, that it would be necessary to carry on conversations with them in Moscow, that it was necessary in this connection to use Sokolnikov, who was working in the People's Commissariat of Foreign Affairs and, as it happened, was in charge of eastern affairs. And inasmuch as this conversation would be held only with an official person, and the preliminary conversation would only be in the nature of soundings, it would be sufficient to confine ourselves at first to general statements to the effect that if a government of a bloc of the opposition groups assumed power in the Soviet Union, it would display a favourable attitude towards the Japanese and take into consideration the wishes of the Japanese during the discussion and settlement of the controversies existing between the Soviet government and the Japanese government. (277-278)

¹⁵ The city is called "Meran" in German and Russian, and "Merano" in Italian. We use "Meran" here because this is the spelling in the English translation of the 1938 Trial transcript.

As we have seen, Sokol'nikov did outline his talk with Tamekichi Ota, the Japanese ambassador, who informed him about Trotsky's contact with the Japanese government.

Rozengol'ts

Rozengol'ts testified that he had contacted von Seeckt and Chief of the German General Staff Hasse in 1923 when ordered by Trotsky and for Trotskyist purposes.

My espionage activities began as far back as 1923, when, on TROTSKY'S instructions, I handed various secret information to the Commander-in-Chief of the Reichswehr, SEECKT, and to the Chief of the German General Staff, HASSE. Subsequently, direct connections with me were established by the ___ Ambassador in the U.S.S.R., Mr. N, to whom I periodically gave information of an espionage character. After Mr. N's departure I continued my espionage connections with the new Ambassador, Mr. N.¹⁶ (Vol VI, p. 131 reverse) (9)

Krestinskii too had confessed to meeting with German generals von Seeckt and Hasse.

We came to an agreement with Generals SEECKT and HASSE to the effect that we would help the Reichswehr to create a number of espionage bases on the territory of the U.S.S.R. by permitting the unhindered entry of spies sent by the Reichswehr, and that we would supply the Reichswehr with espionage materials, i.e., to put it plainly, that we would be German spies. In return for this the Reichswehr undertook to pay us 250,000 marks per annum as a subsidy for counter-revolutionary Trotskyite work.... (1938 Trial, 9)

From March 1920 to October 1926 Hans von Seeckt was "Chef der Heeresleitung" — literally, "Chief of the Army Command" — in English terminology, Commander-in-Chief. General Otto Hasse was "Chef der Truppenamt" after 1922. During the period when Germany was pretending to adhere to the Treaty of Versailles "Truppenamt" was the code word for "Generalstab der Reichswehr" or German General Staff.¹⁷ Both were strong proponents of German alliance with Russia.

Rozengol'ts insisted that this is when his conspiratorial work began — that is, that this contact was not work for the USSR, which had trade and military agreements with Weimar Germany at the time.

VYSHINSKY: ...So you, Rosengoltz, established connections with the German intelligence service already in 1923?

ROSENGOLTZ: With Seeckt directly.

VYSHINSKY: Do you draw a line between the two?

ROSENGOLTZ: I am saying it merely for the sake of exactitude.

VYSHINSKY: So since 1923 you, accused Rosengoltz, began to supply espionage information to foreign states?

ROSENGOLTZ: That is right. (261)

Rozengol'ts' distinction here is correct: contact with the German General Staff is not the same as contact with German intelligence, even though espionage for both would be equally illegal. Here too it is hard to imagine why Rozengol'ts would have taken the trouble to be so precise unless he were telling the truth. Liars can feign precision, but in this case there seems to be no reason to fabricate this kind of distinction.

Rozengol'ts testified to working with both Germany and Japan on Trotsky's instructions.

In addition to instructions I received from TROTSKY through KRESTINSKY and SEDOV to carry on sabotage activities in the sphere of foreign trade with the object of rendering direct assistance to Germany and Japan, the character of my sabotage activities was also determined by instructions I received from the Ambassadors in the U.S.S.R., Mr. N and Mr. N, connections with whom played an important part in this matter, as I had to be guided in my work by their definite instructions.

After I had established contact with TUKHACHEVSKY and RYKOV, I informed the former through KRESTINSKY, and the latter I myself informed, of TROTSKY'S instructions regarding sabotage activities, and both approved of the work I had done.

As a result of all this, sabotage activities in foreign trade proceeded mainly along the following three lines: first — economic assistance to Germany and Japan at the expense of the U.S.S.R.; second — causing economic loss and damage to the U.S.S.R.; third — causing political damage to the U.S.S.R. (Vol. VI, p. 49) (15-16)

ROSENGOLTZ: I shall enumerate the main points. Sedov also conveyed directions from Trotsky about the organization of terrorism, stating that at that period these instructions about terrorism should have no direct practical bearing on Krestinskii and myself from motives of secrecy, since special instructions were being given on this score to the terrorist organization of Ivan Nikitich Smirnov. In 1933 directions and instructions were received with regard to sabotage in the sphere of foreign trade. As Sedov had told me that Trotsky had an agreement with certain German circles, from this standpoint sabotage was of very essential importance to Trotsky for the maintenance of his prestige and the preservation of the agreement. The principal line in sabotage was to further the interests of Germany and Japan in the sphere of foreign trade. (246)

Rozengol'ts said that he met personally with Sedov in both 1933 and 1934.

In so far as TROTSKY had an agreement with Germany and Japan, of which I had been informed (both during the negotiations — at my meeting with Sedov in 1933; and of the agreement that had been reached — at my meeting with him in 1934), I received corresponding instructions from TROTSKY, and my sabotage activities in the sphere of foreign trade served the same purpose. (Vol. VI, p. 48) (18)

Bessonov

Sergei Alekseevich Bessonov, a defendant at the third Moscow Trial, said that he had received a letter from Trotsky in 1934, and also met Trotsky in Paris in that year. Here Trotsky urged him to pressure the Germans to come to some official agreement with the Opposition, saying:

VYSHINSKY: What did you and Trotsky say about your underground Trotskyite tasks?

BESSONOV: He imposed on his followers working in the diplomatic field the task of adopting the line of sabotaging official agreements in order to stimulate the interest of the Germans in unofficial agreements with opposition groups. "They will come to us yet," said Trotsky, referring to Hess and Rosenberg. He said that we must not be squeamish in this matter, and that we might be ensured real and important help from Hess and Rosenberg. He said we must not stop short at consenting to big cessions of territory. (63)

Rakovsky

We now have additional evidence concerning Khristian Georgievich Rakovsky's meeting with Japanese officials on Trotsky's behalf. We devote special study to this evidence in the chapter on Ivan Serov's report to the Molotov Commission. Here we will discuss Rakovsky's testimony at the March 1938 Moscow Trial.

Khristian Rakovsky testified that in September 1934 an important Japanese official had spoken to him directly concerning an agreement with the opposition.

RAKOVSKY: ...In September 1934 I was sent to Tokyo at the head of the Soviet Red Cross Delegation to an international conference of Red Cross Societies, which was to take place there in October. The day after I arrived in Tokyo, I was stopped in the corridor of the Japanese Red Cross building by a certain prominent public man of Japan. I can mention his name.

THE PRESIDENT: No, there is no need.

RAKOVSKY: Very well, I will name him at the session in camera. He invited me to tea. I made his acquaintance. He held a position which had some relation to my mission — I want to say, not my mission as one who belonged to the opposition, but my governmental mission. I accepted his amiable invitation. During the conversation this person (here I omit various compliments, commonplaces, flattering remarks) said that the interests of the political trend to which I belonged in the U.S.S.R. and the interests of a certain government fully coincided, and that he personally welcomed my arrival in Tokyo because it would give him the opportunity to discuss certain questions concerning both sides, ... (289-290)

Rakovsky then said that during 1935 and the first half of 1936 he had had five communications with Naida, a Japanese agent. Naida gave him to understand that the Japanese had relations with Trotsky. Rakovsky communicated with Trotsky about this.

During the second and third meeting with the public man who headed a big public organization in Japan we established the nature of the information which I promised to supply to the agents of the Japanese intelligence service in Moscow and also the technique of transmitting this information. While still in Tokyo, I drew into this work Dr. Naida, secretary of the Red Cross Delegation, of whom I already knew that he was a member of the underground counter-revolutionary terrorist organization. I sent Dr. Naida with my card to the public man and he arranged with him as to how and with whom Dr. Naida was to meet in Moscow; it was he who acted as liaison agent between me and the Japanese intelligence service. In Tokyo I had yet another meeting, with a third person I was introduced to this third person by the second high personage. He asked me to take coffee with him — this was after dinner; we sat down at a table and began to talk.

I shall not reproduce the whole conversation, and it is not necessary either; I shall give it to you in substance. He started the conversation by saying: "We are aware that you are a very close friend and adherent of Mr. Trotsky. I must ask you to write to him that a certain government is dissatisfied with his articles on the Chinese question and also with the behaviour of the Chinese Trotskyites. We have a right to expect a different line of conduct on the part of Mr. Trotsky. Mr. Trotsky ought to understand what is necessary for the certain government. There is no need to go into details, but it is clear that an incident provoked in China would be a desirable pretext for intervening in China." I wrote to Trotsky about all this.... (1938 Trial, 293-294)

Summary: Evidence from the Moscow Trials

In the first section of Trotsky's 'Amalgams,' volume one of this study, we carry out an exhaustive verification of the Moscow Trials testimony. On the basis of that study we concluded that the defendants' testimony at the Moscow Trials represents what the defendants themselves chose to say. This testimony is not the result of innocent men being forced to testify falsely against themselves and others according to some kind of script designed by the investigation or the prosecution. We refer the interested reader to that study.

Of the defendants at the three public Moscow Trials eight men claimed to have heard directly from either Trotsky or his son Sedov about contacts between Trotsky and German or Japanese officials: Ol'berg, Piatakov, Radek, Shestov, Rakovsky, Krestinskii, Bessonov, and Rozengol'ts. One man, Sokol'nikov, heard of Trotsky's collaboration with Japan from a Japanese diplomat.

We noted above that other defendants — Bukharin, for example — testified that they had heard about this at second or third hand and believed it. Bukharin said he had heard about it from Radek, whom he had every reason to believe. But if Radek had been lying Bukharin would not have known, so Bukharin's testimony on this point is evidence at second hand.

The Moscow Trial defendants provided very strong evidence of Trotsky's collaboration with Germany and Japan. This evidence has never been successfully impugned. But it has been declared false so many times — its falsity taken for granted without evidence — that its "falsehood" is constituent of the current mainstream paradigm of Soviet history.

Chapter 2. Iakov A. Iakovlev

Dimitrov's Diary

In 2003 the diary of Georgi Dimitrov, head of the Comintern after 1935 and close associate of Stalin, was published. Dimitrov met frequently with Stalin and other Bolshevik leaders, and his diary contains many important passages and statements by Stalin and others. On December 16, 1936, Dimitrov met in the Kremlin with Stalin and four of his closest associates, Molotov, Kaganovich, Voroshilov, and Ordzhonikidze. During this meeting they received a report about an interrogation of Sokol'nikov of December 12, a few days before. Here is what Dimitrov wrote, with the phrases of special interest to our present investigation in boldface:

16 December 1936

— With "the Five" in the Kremlin

(Stal[in], Molot[ov], Kag[anovich], Vor[oshilov], Ordzhonikidze).

Exchange of opinions of Ch[inese] events....

— On the French question: ...

— From the investigation of Piatakov, Sokolnikov, Radek, and others:

Interrogation of Sokolnikov, 12 December 1936:

Question: Thus, the investigation concludes that Trotsky abroad and the center of the bloc within the USSR entered into negotiations with the Hitlerite and Japanese governments with the following aims:

First, to provoke a war by Germany and Japan against the USSR;

Second, to promote the defeat of the USSR in that war and to take advantage of that defeat to achieve the transfer of power in the USSR to [their] government bloc;

Third, on behalf of the future bloc government to guarantee territorial and economic concessions to the Hitlerite and Japanese governments.

Do you confirm this?

Reply: Yes, I confirm it.

Question: Do you admit that this activity by the bloc is tantamount to outright treason against the motherland?

Reply: Yes, I admit it.

Analysis

This meeting can be confirmed in the schedule of visitors to Stalin's office for December 16, 1936.¹ The four Politburo members named by Dimitrov are recorded as entering Stalin's office at 1905 hrs, fifteen minutes before Dimitrov entered along with Manuilsky, who was a Secretary of the Executive Committee of the Comintern and head of the Soviet delegation to it, while Dimitrov himself was General Secretary of the Executive Committee of the Comintern. Dimitrov and Manuilsky stayed for fifty minutes. The two Comintern leaders were obviously there to discuss Comintern — international — matters. Sokol'nikov's testimony was relevant to their concerns.

Dimitrov heard this at a meeting of political leaders of the highest level, including Stalin himself. There is no indication that Stalin — he would be the only person who might be able to get away with such a thing — "staged" this meeting for Dimitrov's benefit. Dimitrov, a staunch supporter of Stalin and the Soviet Union, did not need reassurance or "shoring up." And Dimitrov wrote this in his private diary, only recently published because of the demise of the Soviet bloc.

Therefore this entry is similar to the signatures of Stalin et al. on the Trotsky telegram six months later. It is an excellent gauge of what Stalin and top Soviet leaders believed at the time. This is significant because they had access to all the evidence, including a huge amount that is still secret.

Was Stalin Lying?

It is often asserted by Cold War historians that Stalin was a "liar" so that nothing he wrote should be "believed." Therefore — this logic might go — we should not "believe," in this case or in the case of the Trotsky telegram, the comments he wrote on statements and confessions — ever.

But this reasoning is all wrong. There is no reason to view Stalin as a liar any more than any other political figure. In the course of our research over the past decade we have found no examples of Stalin's "lying," even concerning the "Katyn massacre" question, for a recent discovery at a German mass murder site in Ukraine has shown that the "official version" of the "Katyn massacre" cannot possibly be correct. But in any case Katyn was a very different situation that allegedly involving lying to foreign powers, a common practice among all governments at all times.²

Lying is a universal human trait. Everybody lies — but nobody lies all the time. Therefore, the fact that someone lied in one case or other is not evidence that they lied at another time. There's no reason to think that Stalin was lying here to Dimitrov and Manuilsky, in his words on Trotsky's telegram, or at any other time unless there is specific evidence that he was. This is, of course, true for anyone, not just for Stalin. There is no such thing as an historical figure "who can always be trusted," to tell the truth or one "who can never be trusted."

Finally, no single piece of evidence by itself is to be "believed" or "disbelieved" in any case. All evidence must be analyzed carefully, including in context with other evidence.

S.M. Uritsky

Only a tiny proportion of all the investigative materials from the 1930s have been made available to researchers and only a small part of that has been published. Occasionally a privileged researcher is permitted to read and quote from some investigative files to which no one else has been given access. Normally these are researchers who promote the "official" Russian government position, which corresponds to the Khrushchev-Cold War-Gorbachev-Trotskyist positions the anti-Stalin paradigm that all those convicted in the Moscow Trials, the Military Purges, plus many others, were completely innocent.

Such a researcher is Col. Nikolai S. Cherushev, author of a number of books arguing that no military conspiracies ever existed and, by extension, no other anti-government conspiracies could have existed either. Cherushev has been permitted to see and to quote liberally from investigative files of many military men that no one else has seen — or, at least, that no one else has published about.

One of these files is that of Komkor³ S.P. Uritsky. In Uritsky's indictment we read the following:

In the extremely exhaustive text of the sentence by the Military Collegium in the case of S.P. Uritsky of August 1, 1938, we read:

— on the order of Gamarnik, Pyatakov, Iakir, and Tukhachevsky Uritsky transmitted their letters to Sedov to be passed to Trotsky;

— was connected to the Trotskyist group of Souvarine in Paris, through which he passed espionage materials from Tukhachevsky for French intelligence.

⁴ Cherushev, N.S. 1937 god. Byl li zagovor voennykh? Moskva: Veche, 2007, 179. (Cherushev, 1937)

Analysis

We know from other evidence that these men were involved directly with Trotsky. Since Gamarnik, Iakir, and Tukhachevsky were also involved in military collaboration with Germany it is safe to assume that Uritsky's contact with Trotsky had something to do with at least Germany as well. However, given Cherushev's wording here we can't be sure that Uritsky did confess to direct contact with Trotsky. We can only be certain that the court found him guilty of doing so.

In a short fragment below from one of Uritsky's statements to the NKVD he said that he would make a clean breast of everything. So it appears that this high-ranking military officer confessed to sending messages from Gamarnik, Piatakov, Iakir, and Tukhachevsky to Trotsky via Sedov.

All Cherushev's works are devoted to the predetermined conclusion that no military conspiracy existed at all. That might explain why he has the access he does to investigative files to which no one else has been admitted: he can be trusted not to question the "canonical" viewpoint. Nevertheless Cherushev cites the following direct quotation from Uritsky's pen. On April 14, 1938, after referring to their "long-standing friendship" — a phrase not further explained — Uritsky wrote to NKVD officer Veniamin S. Agas:

I have been feeling poorly in recent days, no bladder control, bloody vomiting, unable to think, if possible let me have a day's respite, [then] summon me, I will report to you, and then I will write everything completely. I wish to turn myself into the kind of arrestee who helps the authorities, I wish to earn the mercy of Soviet authority.

As Cherushev notes, this confirms that Uritsky was ill. But it contains no accusation of torture or mistreatment. In any case, far from being a profession of innocence it is, on the contrary, an admission of guilt.

Personal contact with Trotsky or, as here, to claim that one had such personal contact, was highly unusual. The NKVD had no need to fabricate such a detail simply in order to frame an innocent man. On the contrary: it would have made Uritsky's confession stand out from most others, perhaps leading to an interview with a Politburo member or Stalin himself. That would put things out of Ezhov's control, because the arrestee might say that his testimony had been coerced. We know that Politburo members did interview some arrestees. So we can't just assume that Uritsky's confession was coerced. It may well have been genuine, and at this time we have no reason to doubt that it was.

Ezhov's second in command Mikhail Frinovskii identified Agas as one of Ezhov's "bone-breakers," skilled in beating defendants and in fabricating convincing confessions. But this does not mean that all defendants were beaten into false confessions either. It ought to remind us that no individual piece of evidence can by itself be decisive, because each piece of evidence taken by itself is subject to multiple possible explanations or interpretations. It is only when the whole complex of circumstantial evidence is consistent with one conclusion that that conclusion becomes highly probable, and for all practical purposes, until proven otherwise, can be taken to represent the truth.

Ia. A. Iakovlev's Confession of October 1937

Among the documents from former Soviet archives that have been published since the end of the Soviet Union in 1991, one of the most significant for our purposes is the lengthy interrogation of Ia. A. Iakovlev. Iakovlev had been People's Commissar for Agriculture during the collectivization period of the early 1930s. In 1937 he was a prominent member of the Central Committee. Iakovlev also held a number of other very responsible posts: head of the agricultural section of the C.C., and first assistant to the chairman of the Party Control Commission but in reality its head since Ezhov, its formal head, was spending full time as Commissar of the NKVD. Since August 11, 1936, Iakovlev had been a member of the secretariat for the first draft of the program of the VKP(b), the Bolshevik Party.⁵

<http://www.knowbysightinfo/YaYY/05215.asp> ;
http://www.hrono.info/biograf/yakovlev_ya.html ;

Iakovlev had been very close to Stalin. He was one of those who worked most closely on the new Constitution that was announced in 1936, and that was supposed to bring free elections to the USSR. Along with Tal' and Stetskii, Iakovlev was, in reality, one of the authors of the Constitution. He had worked closely with Stalin on this, one of Stalin's pet projects. (Zhukov 308 ff.) In short, Iakovlev was one of the very highest members of the Soviet government and Bolshevik Party outside the ranks of the Politburo itself.

Iakovlev was arrested on October 12, 1937. On October 15-18 he confessed that in 1923 Trotsky had asked him to be a Trotskyist "sleeper" in the Party — to go underground, cease all contact with any Trotskyists, and climb into responsible Party positions.

Trotsky had already at that time posed the question in this context, that he should have his own agents in the Party leadership at the necessary time who could pass information to him and collaborate in his seizure of power. (Lubianka 1937-1938, 388⁶)

Here are the parts of Iakovlev's statement, dated October 15-18, 1937, that concern his ties to Trotsky and to German intelligence. In the first section Iakovlev outlines how he was recruited to a secret Trotskyist conspiracy against the Party even before Lenin had died.

Question: Explain how you managed to hide your Trotskyist anti-Soviet activity for so long, since 1923?

Answer: This can be explained by the fact that, since 1923, following TROTSKY'S personal directives, I retreated from open struggle with the Party. I maneuvered and immediately took up a conspiratorial position. Outwardly I broke with the Trotskyists and conducted all my further anti-Soviet work under the flag of duplicity.

Even in 1923 TROTSKY, foreseeing the possible failure of an open attack against the Party, considered it essential to make some part of his supporters very carefully concealed so that they, while remaining in the Party and doing Party work, could become fortified, trusted by the Party masses and leadership, and could move gradually into the leadership of the Party.

TROTSKY set this task at that time so as to have his agents in the Party leadership at the necessary moment, so they could keep him informed and cooperate in the seizure of power. Such tasks were given to me as well.

Question: That is, such tasks of betrayal, provocation, and espionage, in the fulfillment of which you had already had experience from your collaboration with the Okhranka [Tsarist secret police in pre-Revolutionary times].

Answer: Yes.

Question: Continue your confession. Where and when did you ally yourself with TROTSKY?

Answer: In 1923 SOSNOVSKY put me in touch with TROTSKY. The meeting took place at VORONSKY'S apartment in the 1st Palace of Soviets in the Hotel 'Natsional.' In attendance were TROTSKY, SOSNOVSKY, VORONSKY and myself. In speaking of the plan for the work of the Trotskyists, TROTSKY was pointing out that the possibility of the temporary — as he put it — victory of the CC'ists was not excluded; he further said that in politics, as in war, it is necessary to take into account the possibility of temporary defeat and for that reason it was essential to insure oneself in advance on enemy territory.

TROTSKY especially pointed out that the conditions of struggle prove that the Party apparatus has attained decisive importance. Proceeding from that, he set before us the task: to strive in our future work not only to penetrate the Party apparatus, but to strengthen ourselves there, to move forward, to select and recruit out of the Party apparatus cadres of supporters of TROTSKY'S line. Proceeding from that, TROTSKY proposed that I outwardly cease all contact with Trotskyists; in future, always and everywhere to proclaim myself a firm supporter of the Central Committee, a merciless enemy of Trotskyists, to use everything in order to increase my influence in the Party, but at the same time extremely carefully and conspiratorially, by second and third hand, to move forward the work of attracting very carefully selected people into the Trotskyist organization.

After that meeting and directions from TROTSKY I ceased open contact with VORONSKY and SOSNOVSKY, as with compromised persons; on my part I instructed those persons connected with me and who supported Trotskyism, in the spirit of the instructions I had received from TROTSKY. (Lubianka 1937-1938, 388-389)

A few pages further in his interrogation Iakovlev outlines how he was recruited by German intelligence in 1935 in Berlin. According to Iakovlev he had been recruited by a German agent named Shmuke.⁷

⁷ Presumably "Schmucke" in German.

The German agent who, according to Iakovlev, recruited him into cooperation did so on two bases. Shmuke knew from Russian émigrés in Germany that Iakovlev had collaborated with the Russian Tsarist Okhranka, or secret police, towards the end of 1916 in Petrograd, and used this information to blackmail Iakovlev by threatening to expose it.

Once in the Bolshevik Party and after the Revolution a confession of collaboration, even at a vulnerable early age, would destroy one's Party career. Hiding such a connection could be much worse because it suggested that such a person was completely untrustworthy and might still be some kind of clandestine agent or other. A Party member was not supposed to have any secrets — certainly none of any political relevance — from the Party. Moreover, it made one vulnerable to blackmail and so an additional security risk.

Shmuke also knew from Trotsky about Iakovlev's participation in the Trotskyist underground, and revealed this to him. This section of the document also constitutes strong evidence that Trotsky collaborated with German intelligence.

Question: You speak about GAMARNIK'S and VAREIKIS' connections with foreign intelligence services. Did you yourself have such connections?

Answer: Yes, I had ties with German intelligence.

Question: Tell us concretely, when did you establish ties with German intelligence?

Answer: I was recruited by German intelligence when I was in Germany, in Berlin, in the autumn of 1935, and at that time and until my arrest I collaborated with this intelligence and maintained contact with it through a special representative in Moscow.

In Berlin I was in the hospital "Catholic Commune" for treatment. About a week after my arrival in Berlin a man in a suit, whom I did not know, came to me in the hospital, and introduced himself to me by the name SHMUKÉ, and said that "he had instructions to have discussions with me on a number of questions of interest to him and of urgency for me." He announced that he knew "from my political friends" about my membership in the underground organization that was struggling with the existing powers in the USSR and that, following orders of the German government, he wished to establish businesslike relations with me. SHMUKÉ further told me that in leading governmental spheres in Germany there were many friends of those tendencies in the USSR that were hostile to the current leadership, that these German spheres supported those tendencies in the USSR — therefore the German government considered it possible to send SHMUKE to me for negotiations.

Fearing a provocation, I naturally did not want to disclose myself to this unknown person and expressed my total confusion concerning what he had proposed to me. However, SHMUKE stubbornly continued that it was useless for me to deny facts that both he and I knew; that the German government was not turning to me alone, among leaders of underground organizations in the USSR, with such a proposal. At last he said to me emphatically: "Your chief leader L. TROTSKY is acting in full contact and on the basis of mutual benefit with the new Germany." I still attempted to end this conversation and made as though I wanted to stand up in order to say goodbye and force SHMUKE to leave. But SHMUKE did not budge from the spot and told me that I was too careful and, clearly, did not trust him; that this carefulness was a good sign in me, on the one hand, however, he had the full possibility of proving to me the "official nature" of his visit and had the full information of the German government about me. After that he told me that "in Germany they had been very interested in me personally even when I was the People's Commissar for Agriculture, and that it was not by chance" — said SHMUKE — "that one of our magazines in Berlin had been graced by your photograph and biography." In fact this did take place: my photograph had appeared in one of the fascist magazines. Then he said that in Germany live emigrants from Russia, including former members of the Russian police, who have informed the German authorities about certain episodes of my collaboration with the Russian police at the end of 1916 in Petrograd. Although they had the full ability to compromise me with the Soviet authorities at any moment they, said SHMUKE, did not wish to do that, since they hope to establish with me the same kind of contact as they have with TROTSKY.

I understood that I had fallen into a pitfall and there was no other way out. Faced with this fact, and realizing that the Germans were fully informed about me, I decided to agree with SHMUKE'S proposal, all the more since SHMUKE'S information about TROTSKY'S connections with Germany completely corresponded with what PIATAKOV had said to me and what TROTSKY had written.

I then asked what specifically he — SHMUKE — wanted from me, and what services I might render the German government, adding that by my work I was mainly involved in agricultural affairs and had no relation to military matters of defense. SHMUKE retorted that the German government was not interested only in defense work, but in the situation within the country, in the Bolshevik party, and especially in the situation within the government and the Central Committee of the Bolshevik party; he asked me to inform the German authorities about these matters from now on and, as he put it, he hoped that with this information I would also help my political friends who were working in full contact with Germany.

Besides that, SHMUKE stressed to me that he and his leaders would not object if I would inform the German government, within those limits I thought possible, about the affairs of the underground organizations to which I belonged. SHMUKE said that he assumed this would be to our mutual benefit.

Then I told SHMUKE that I accepted his proposal and agreed that in the future, to the best of my abilities and strength, I would inform the German government on the matters of interest to the Germans.

Considering the matter more thoroughly, I decided that if possible I would sell my collaboration to the Germans more dearly, first of all to obtain from German intelligence corresponding possibilities for foreign connections for our organization and, in the first place, with TROTSKY, and also to increase my importance in the eyes of the German government. (Lubianka 1937-1938, 394-395)

Assessing Iakovlev's Confession

This confession by Iakovlev is especially important because of Iakovlev's high position in the Soviet government and Bolshevik Party and his closeness to Stalin. He confirms that as early as 1923 Trotsky formed a factional underground movement within the Party. The years 1922 and 1923 pop up frequently in the transcript of the March 1938 Moscow Trial as the year many of those who confessed to being in the Trotskyist underground began their activities.⁸

⁸ See 1938 Moscow Trial 6, 9 (Rozengol'ts); 45 (Bessonov, about Reich).

Iakovlev admits direct ties with German intelligence. This confirms allegations by others that Trotsky's movement had such contacts. He also confirms German ties of Gamarnik — that is, the Military conspirators led by Tukhachevsky — and Vareikis, head of the Party in the Far East who was arrested for ties with the Japanese. NKVD General Genrikh S. Liushkov, who defected to the Japanese in June 1938, named both Gamarnik and Vareikis to his Japanese handlers as genuine conspirators in the Far East.⁹

⁹ See Coox 1998 (1), 151, 152, 157; Coox 1998 (2) 81 (Vareikis); Coox 1998 (1) 156; Coox 1998 (2) 85 (Gamarnik).

A dramatic revelation is Iakovlev's claim that he heard directly from a German agent that Trotsky was working with the Germans. He confirms that he had also heard this from Piatakov, and that he had also received this information in writing from Trotsky himself.

Stalin's Annotations

The document immediately following Iakovlev's interrogation in the same volume is a copy of Stalin's handwritten questions on his copy of Iakovlev's interrogation:

- 1) Did he know about Vareikis' service with the Tsarist secret police (okhranka)?
- 2) His opinion about Mikhailov from Voronezh and his participation in the c.-r. org. [counter-revolutionary organization — GF].

3) His contact with Trotsky (did he see him personally in 1935 or in 1934).

4) How did he want to use MOPR? Whom in MOPR did he make use of? [MOPR = Mezhdunarodnoe Obshchestvo Pomoshchi Revoliutsioneram, International Organization for Aid to Revolutionaries, the Soviets' organization to give help to revolutionaries in fascist countries where communist parties were illegal and subject to severe repression. — GF]

5) "Turn" Iakovlev's wife: he is a conspirator and she must tell us everything. Ask her about Stasova, Kirsanova,¹⁰ and other friends — acquaintances of hers. (Lubianka 1937-1938 396)¹¹

Stalin's handwritten comments on this confession show that he believed this confession of Iakovlev's was true and suggested further lines of investigation following from it. No reasonable reading of the evidence would suggest that Stalin had Iakovlev framed and then carried on a charade by annotating the confession and asking for Iakovlev's wife, also a Party member, to be brought in for questioning about his activities.

The "Stasova" referred to is Elena D. Stasova. She was one of the earliest Bolsheviks, having joined the Party in 1898, the same year as Stalin. She had long been working in the Comintern. Also an Old Bolshevik and participant in the Revolution of 1917, K.I. Kirsanova, wife of famous Old Bolshevik Emelian Iaroslavskii, worked with Stasova and others in the Comintern. She published books on women under socialism.

The lists of those who met with Stalin in his office from the early 1930s until his death have been published. We now know that Iakovlev met in Stalin's office with members of Stalin's groups of supporters in the Politburo on the evening of October 11, 1937.¹² Thereafter he disappears from the political record. According to one source Iakovlev was arrested the next day, October 12.¹³ According to the header of the interrogation transcript, dated October 15-18, 1937, Iakovlev had already made some kind of statement of confession on October 14.

Stalin and his supporters wanted contested elections to the Soviet government. The Party First Secretaries opposed contested elections. Iurii Zhukov has followed the struggle over this issue through the archival evidence. This struggle for contested elections was finally lost during the October 1937 Central Committee Plenum.¹⁴ We discuss this struggle in Yezhov vs Stalin.

Assessing Iakovlev's Confession: The 1938 Moscow Trial

In the note to Iakovlev's confession Stalin suggested that I. M. Vareikis had also been involved with the Tsarist secret police. Like Iakovlev (born 1896) Vareikis (born 1894) was a young man during the First World War. He had been arrested on October 10, just two days before Iakovlev. Perhaps it was Vareikis who named Iakovlev. Iakovlev did name Vareikis in his own confession.

Both Vareikis and Iakovlev were named as active underground Trotskyists by defendants in the March 1938 Moscow Trial. Defendant Grin'ko testified about Iakovlev's active role in the conspiracy. He evidently regarded Iakovlev as one of the leaders of the "terrorist" activity and suggested Iakovlev was in touch with Trotsky.

GRINKO: In the event of success the organization intended to set up a bourgeois Ukrainian state after the type of the fascist state.

About this character of the organization I told a prominent member of the Right and Trotskyite conspiracy, Yakovlev. In the Right and Trotskyite circles with whom I had occasion to speak, this tendency to transform our organization into a fascist type of organization undoubtedly existed. (1938 Trial, 71)

By "fascist" — earlier in his testimony he had called it "national-fascist" — Grin'ko meant that the Ukrainian Nationalist organizations outside the Soviet Union had become organized in a fascist manner and were under either German or Polish nationalist leadership. The fascist nature of Ukrainian nationalism during the interwar period has long been recognized.¹⁵

and Afterlife of a Ukrainian Nationalist: Fascism, Genocide, and Cult. New York: Ibidem Press, 2014.

GRINKO: Gradually extending my connections with the Right and Trotskyite centre, and having ascertained who belonged to it, I at the beginning of 1934 formed an opinion of what the "Right and Trotskyite centre" was.

From a number of conversations and connections, and the tasks I received from Rykov, Bukharin, Gamarnik, Rosengoltz, Yakovlev, Antipov, Rudzutak, Yagoda, Vareikis, and a number of other persons, it became clear to me that at that time the "Right and Trotskyite center" based itself mainly on the military aid of aggressors. (76)

VYSHINSKY: Tell us about the terrorist activities.

GRINKO: At that period terrorist activities were one of the main weapons in the common arsenal of struggle against the Soviet power.

VYSHINSKY: From whom did you learn this?

GRINKO: From Rykov, Yakovlev, Gamarnik and Pyatakov.

VYSHINSKY: Where did this terrorist link emanate from?

GRINKO: From Trotsky. I learned this from Gamarnik. (77)

In carrying out the sabotage measures and sabotage instructions in the financing of agriculture, no little assistance was rendered by Rudzutak, who was in charge of financial affairs in the Council of People's Commissars, and by Yakovlev. (80)

Grin'ko's confession corroborates that of Iakovlev. There would seem to be little point in "coordinating" confessions at the public March 1938 trial with a confession — Iakovlev's — that was secret and never intended to be published at all.

Interrogations of Nikolai I. Vavilov

We have further evidence concerning Iakovlev from the investigative materials of Nikolai I. Vavilov, a prominent Soviet biologist who was arrested, tried and imprisoned in 1940 for his clandestine participation in an anti-Soviet conspiracy in the early 1930s. Best known for his feud with Trofim Lysenko and as a champion of Mendelian genetics, Vavilov's reputation as a scientist was high in his own day and has increased since. It was long assumed that his arrest and conviction was really a screen for repressing his scientific view. But according to archival evidence released since the end of the USSR this was not the case.

Like Iakovlev, Vavilov has long since been "rehabilitated." However, that does not mean that he was not guilty or that his confessions have been refuted. In them he implicated Iakovlev.

Question: You have been arrested as an active participant of an antisoviet organization and as an agent of foreign intelligence services. Do you admit your guilt to these charges?

Answer: I admit myself guilty in that since 1930 I have been a member of an antisoviet organization of Rightists that existed in the system of the People's Commissariat of Agriculture of the USSR. I do not confess myself guilty of espionage.

Question: Bear in mind that you will not succeed in keeping your espionage activity hidden and that the investigation will interrogate you about it, but for now confess with whom you have been connected in the antisoviet work.

Answer: In antisoviet work I have been connected with the following persons: Yakovlev, former People's Commissar for Agriculture,

Chernov, former People's Commissar for Agriculture, Eikhe, former People's Commissar for Agriculture, Muralov, former vice-Commissar for Agriculture, Gaister, former vice-Commissar for Agriculture....¹⁶

Vavilov made a differentiated confession. Accused of having spied for foreign intelligence services, he refused to admit it. But he did admit participating in a Rightist anti-Soviet organization within the People's Commissariat of Agriculture throughout the tenures of five commissars. The fact that Vavilov confessed to one capital charge while refusing to confess to another makes his confession appear more reliable. A likely explanation for such a confession is the desire to tell the truth.

The commissars he names as Rightist conspirators include Iakovlev and Eikhe. Eikhe too was executed for massive illegal executions and repressions in collaboration with Ezhov.

Question: You have admitted your guilt in that from 1930 you have been a participant in an antisoviet organization of Rightists that has existed in the system of the People's Commissariat of Agriculture of the USSR.

Tell us by whom and under what circumstances you were recruited into the aforesaid organization.

Answer: I was recruited to the anti-Soviet organization by the former People's Commissar for Agriculture of the USSR YAKOVLEV Yakov Arkad'evich in 1930. The process of recruitment took place through my receiving, directly from YAKOVLEV, and also from him via GAISTER Aron Izrailovich — former vice-president of the agricultural academy and VOL'F Moisei Mikhailovich — second vice-president of the agricultural academic — obvious orders for sabotage, which I carried out in the agricultural academy and in the Institute of Plant Development.¹⁷

Question: It is not clear why YAKOVLEV recruited you to the antisoviet organization. What was his basis for doing this?

Answer: During the process of my carrying out YAKOVLEV's directives he became aware of my anti-soviet sentiments which, at the beginning, were most clearly expressed in the high evaluation that I gave to American and Western European agricultural methods and my emphasizing their superiority in comparison with the development of agriculture in the Soviet Union. (Transcript of interrogation of August 27-28, 1940. Vavilov, 271-2)

Unquestionably it was also the fact that I carried out every assignment given me by YAKOVLEV that facilitated my being drawn into the antisoviet organization.

Question: And in what form was your conversation with YAKOVLEV concerning your participation in the antisoviet organization of Rightists?

Answer: There was no direct conversation about this. I understood him by the obvious assignments of sabotage that I received from YAKOVLEV.

Question: Why do you conclude that it was precisely YAKOVLEV who recruited you to the antisoviet organization of Rightists?

Answer: I conclude that because it was precisely from this period — my carrying out YAKOVLEV's directives — that my obvious work of sabotage begins in the organization of science and in that of plant culture in the sense of justifying plant culture projects.

Question: You have confessed that you were recruited to the antisoviet organization of Rightists by YAKOVLEV and at the same time declare that you never had any direct conversation with YAKOVLEV about this organization. You are either confusing or simply do not wish to say that even before your introduction into the organization of Rightists you were one of the ideologues and leaders of the antisoviet organization about which you are now remaining silent. (Transcript of interrogation of August 28-29, 1940. Vavilov, 273-4)

¹⁷ Vavilov has long since been "rehabilitated" and this Institute, still in existence in Russia, is named in his honor.

In these passages Vavilov claims that he collaborated in Iakovlev's Rightist organization without having been specifically recruited to it. This confuses his interrogator, who does not understand how Iakovlev could have been a member without having been specifically recruited to it and also how he could state that he had been recruited (zaverbovan) by Iakovlev and yet never have spoken with Iakovlev about the organization.

The interrogator draws the obvious conclusion from this apparently contradictory assertion by Vavilov that the accused must be hiding something. Something is missing that if added would make sense of Vavilov's contradictory story. Vavilov gives fuller details in the following passage, stating that he and Iakovlev had a mutual understanding, and that Iakovlev spoke to him in hints and allusions rather than speaking directly of conspiracies and organizations.

Question: You confessed earlier that YAKOVLEV recruited you into the antisoviet organization, that, supposedly, he never had any direct conversations with you about this. We demand that you make your confession more precise.

Answer: I confirm the fact that I was recruited into the antisoviet organization of Rightists by YAKOVLEV Yakov Arkad'evich. However, YAKOVLEV never explicitly said that I should take part in an antisoviet organization, and there was no special need for him to do so, since YAKOVLEV knew my antisoviet views, about which I confessed in previous interrogations, and could confidently rely on me to carry out antisoviet work. In addition I enjoyed YAKOVLEV'S particular trust, and he himself told me many times: "We know you well — we trust you, and for that reason I demand you carry out my directives without objection." To my frequent declarations about my desire to leave my leading administrative work in the Agricultural Academy YAKOVLEV answered: "We will not let you go, we need you, we understand each other." (Transcript of interrogation of August 30-31, 1940. Vavilov, 278-84)

However, in the following passage Vavilov does give specific details about the sabotage of certain agricultural undertakings he was ordered to accomplish by Iakovlev.

Answer: One of the basic undertakings of sabotage carried out with my direct participation upon YAKOVLEV'S orders was the creation of a great superfluity of narrowly specialized scientific-research institutes that were of absolutely no vital importance...

The next sabotage action of significance that was carried out with my direct participation upon YAKOVLEV'S order and whose consequences may still be felt today was the collapse of the provincial [oblast'] network of experimental pasture-farming stations, the assignment of which under conditions of socialist reconstruction and the wide variation of climate conditions and soils in our country is of great importance, ...

Besides that I directly participated in the development of deliberately harmful plans of plant culture during the First and Second Five-Year Plans. I carried out this sabotage work according to the direct order of the former People's Commissar for Agriculture YAKOVLEV Y.A. and the former vice-presidents of the agricultural academy VOL'F M.M., GAISTER A.I. ...

Despite this I was given a directive by YAKOVLEV, through VOL'F, of expanding the compulsory plan of area to be sown in 1937 of 150 million hectares, which, it was clear, did not correspond to the possibilities at that time...

(Transcript of interrogation of September 5-7, 1940. Vavilov, 284-288)

Analysis of Vavilov's Confessions

These confessions of Vavilov's, at least insofar as they implicate Iakovlev, appear completely credible. There is no reason that the NKVD investigators would have wanted Vavilov to fabricate testimony against Iakovlev, who by that time had long since been executed. By 1940, when Vavilov was interrogated, Ezhov and his men too had long since been arrested, tried, and executed for fabricating false cases against a very large number of people, and Beria was now in charge of the NKVD. During Beria's tenure the cases against large numbers of people falsely accused under Ezhov were reviewed, and many of the victims released.

Here, as virtually everywhere in history, there is no such thing as "absolute proof" — all evidence can be interpreted in multiple ways — and therefore no "certainty." But the fact that there are many pieces of circumstantial evidence, all of which implicate Iakovlev, suggests that Iakovlev was not lying in his confession and neither was his wife. Furthermore, Iakovlev's testimony is broadly consistent with the confessions of many of the Moscow Trials defendants, of the Tukhachevsky Affair defendants, and the evidence we have cited above.

According to the volume we have been citing Vavilov's interrogators claimed in a report that they had carried out 240 interrogations of Vavilov that occupied 1000 hours. Vavilov himself claimed in a letter dated April 25, 1942, to Beria, who was head of the NKVD at the time, that he had been subjected to 400 interrogations that took 1700 hours! Such time-consuming and therefore expensive investigations bespeak a genuine attempt to find out the truth. No such titanic efforts are required either to fabricate an entirely false set of confessions or to compel a middle-aged academic to fabricate them himself. Moreover, when it was all completed and Vavilov had been convicted NKVD chief Lavrentii Beria acceded to Vavilov's request for clemency. The scientist was in the process of being moved to the East ahead of the German military advance when he died on January 26, 1943.

Confession of Iakovlev's Wife

In 2004 a short excerpt from just one of the interrogation-confessions of Sokolovskaia, Iakovlev's wife, was published. This corresponds exactly to the time Iakovlev himself was under interrogation.

In his own confession Iakovlev said that he had collaborated with Ian Gamarnik, head of the Political Department of the Red Army who had committed suicide on May 30, 1937, when questioned about the Tukhachevsky conspiracy. Iakovlev named his wife as a friend of Gamarnik's family. She worked in the film studio Mosfilm.

According to a report to Stalin from Ezhov of April 30, 1938, Sokolovskaia headed a Trotskyist organization at her workplace that obtained weapons for a planned uprising.¹⁸

Stalin's remarks on Iakovlev's interrogation-confession, quoted above, are dated "no later than October 20, 1937" (Lubianka 1937-1938 No. 227, p. 396). Iakovlev's wife Elena Kirillovna Sokolovskaia was arrested on October 12, 1937. On October 17 she composed a "special communication" to NKVD head Nikolai Ezhov in which she confessed to knowledge of her husband's Trotskyist activities.

Iakovlev has been a Trotskyist since 1923. Already in 1923 he was taking part in the struggle against the Party on Trotsky's side. During this period he was connected with a group of active Trotskyists Voronsky, El'tsin, Popov N.N., Mikhailov, and took an active part in the fractional meetings of the group...

During the past five years Iakovlev has taken an active role in the underground anti-Soviet organization that stood on Trotskyist positions. He was in an especially conspiratorial position, acted with hypocrisy in order to strengthen his position in Party work while trying to move towards the leadership of the Party.

Along with Iakovlev, Vareikis and Bauman played an active role in this underground organization...

Iakovlev was in anti-Party contact with the leader of the military conspiracy, Gamarnik. Through Gamarnik he maintained contact with Piatakov, who headed the Trotskyist underground...

My guilt is even greater because after the exposure of Gamarnik, Iakir, Popov N.N., who were connected in counterrevolutionary work with Iakovlev, Bauman, and Vareikis, I did not have the courage to tear myself away from this counterrevolutionary filth, go to the Party, and expose this gang of enemies of the Party and the people. (Lubianka 1937-1938, 398-9).

But she was to face far more serious charges. By April 1938 at least one of her coworkers in Mosfilm had named her as the leader of a clandestine Trotskyist group in that organization.

SLIVKIN ... confessed that he took an active part in counterrevolutionary Trotskyist activity, and that one of the serious underground organizations under his leadership was established at the "Mosfilm" cinema studio.

SLIVKIN confessed that the organization's main leader was SOKOLOVSKAIA (wife of IAKOVLEV) and BABITSKY, the director of the studio.

SLIVKIN confessed that the organization was connected in counterrevolutionary work with GAMARNIK and EIDEMAN. Upon the directives of GAMARNIK and EIDEMAN the Trotskyist organization at the "Mosfilm" cinema studio, under the guise of working with Osoaviakhim, organized in 1935 a shooting range of a military type to prepare the leaders of the units that would be in the uprising. (Lubianka 1937-1938, 529)

Both Stasova and Kirsanova, both prominent Old Bolsheviks, must have been investigated. On November 11, 1937, Stalin privately told Dimitrov:

We shall probably arrest Stasova, too. Turned out she's scum. Kirsanova is very closely involved with Yakovlev. She's scum."
(Dimitrov 69)

On November 16, 1937, Dimitrov noted "Resolution on the dismissals of Kirsanova and Stasova." In Stasova's case this meant dismissal from her post as Vice-Chairman of the Executive Committee of MOPR and Chair of the Central Committee of the Soviet MOPR.

Yet neither Stasova nor Kirsanova was arrested, much less repressed. This must mean that Stalin's serious suspicions against them were not borne out by investigation. The investigation into their cases must have been an objective one, rather than a frame-up or one that simply aimed to invent "evidence" to sustain Stalin's suspicions. And that not only suggests that the investigations of at least some prominent Bolsheviks were carried out in a proper manner. It means that, whatever his suspicions, Stalin wanted to know the truth.¹⁹

¹⁹ We discuss this, with references, in a chapter in the third volume of this work.

Stalin's note complains that the interrogator did not ask the right questions of Sokolovskaia:

On the first page is a handwritten annotation: "Com. Ezhov: Which Mikhailov? They didn't even ask his name and patronymic ... what fine investigators! What's important is not Iakovlev's and Sokolovskaia's past activity but their sabotage and espionage work during the past year and the recent months of 1937. We also need to know why both of these scoundrels were going abroad almost every year. J. Stalin." (Lubianka 1937-1938, 399 n.)²⁰

Here as in the case of Iakovlev's interrogation Stalin has annotated the interrogation in such a way as to rule out any suggestion that he had ordered it fabricated or faked. He was attempting to learn from the interrogation how deep the conspiracy ran. This is evidence that the interrogation was genuine. As such, it is also evidence that Iakovlev's interrogation was not faked, and therefore that Iakovlev's confession about Shmuke and Trotsky's contacts with the Nazis is also true.

What concerned Stalin was not the history of Iakovlev's disloyalty but recent matters. "The past year and the recent months of 1937" had seen the Tukhachevsky conspiracy of top military leaders spying for Germany, plus allegations of widespread conspiratorial activity on the side of Germany and Japan. This too is consistent with the fact that Stalin genuinely believed that Iakovlev really did conspire with Germany.

Iakovlev's "Rehabilitation"

Aside from the confession we cite here none of the investigative or court materials from Iakovlev's file have ever been made public. We do have the report (zapiska, or memorandum, shorter and/or less formal than a full report) recommending Iakovlev be posthumously "rehabilitated" dated December 27, 1956, and signed by Roman Rudenko, General Procuror (Prosecutor) of the USSR.²¹ It declares Iakovlev innocent but without giving any evidence whatsoever that he was, in fact, innocent. It is similar to many other such published "rehabilitation" reports from the Khrushchev and Gorbachev eras. Elsewhere we have studied a number of these obviously fraudulent "reports."

²¹ RKEB 2 (2003) No. 30, pp. 215-216; note 41 on p. 808.

We have no evidence that Iakovlev was tortured, beaten, etc. Nor would it explain why Iakovlev confessed at trial. We know he did so because, among other evidence, even Rudenko's "zapiska" says he did — the full transcript of his trial has not been declassified:

Thus Iakovlev admitted his guilt in the commission of counterrevolutionary crimes, affirmed both during the preliminary investigation and at his trial that he, supposedly, had recruited to the counterrevolutionary organization of Rights Vareikis, Mikhailov, Gegechkori, Tsyl'ko, Tokarev, Polovinkin, Sidel'nikov, Iosifov, and Odintsov, and was also supposedly in contact in the anti-Soviet activity with Postyshev, Rudzutak, Bubnov, Gamarnik, Rukhimovich, Antipov, Sulimov, Komarov, Bauman, Popov, Goloded, and others, in all more than 100 persons.

However, all the testimony of these men against others was then dismissed as false on the grounds that they had previously been "rehabilitated," i.e., declared innocent. Since no affirmative evidence of Iakovlev's innocence was provided, this must mean that Rudenko's men could not find any, and could only find evidence of his guilt. This is one sign of the fraudulent nature of this "rehabilitation."²²

²² See Grover Furr, Khrushchev Lied, Chapter 11.

Probably another such sign is that this 1956 report, in order to support Iakovlev's "rehabilitation," said that Iakovlev was a member of the "Rights" rather than of the "Trotskyists." In 1956 Khrushchev and his men were looking with favor on the Rights but Trotskyists were still viewed with great hostility. Had Rudenko's report been truthful that Iakovlev had been a Trotskyist, they would not have been able to "rehabilitate" him.

The memorandum also declares that NKVD man "Kazakevich," who had taken part in the investigation of Iakovlev, had said — evidently in 1956 — that "methods of physical pressure" were used against Iakovlev. His testimony is not available. Even his name is not certain. No first name and patronymic are given. An NKVD man named Kozakevich is one of two investigators who signed the confession of Iakovlev that we have examined.

"Methods of physical pressure" can mean almost anything, from real torture — beatings, for example — to the "third degree," prolonged sleeplessness, and so on. But Iakovlev confessed within two days of his arrest, so there was no time for any prolonged pressure. Moreover, the fact that a suspect was subjected to some kind of "physical pressure" is not evidence of that suspect's innocence.

It is doubtful that Ezhov would have dared to fabricate a false case against someone as close to Stalin as Iakovlev, who most recently worked with Stalin on the new constitution. After all, Ezhov could not have known in advance that Stalin would not choose to interview Iakovlev himself, and that Iakovlev would not inform on Ezhov to Stalin if he had been forced to incriminate himself. And, as we've noted above, Stalin's comments on the interrogations of Iakovlev and his wife are not consistent with any theory that Stalin was involved with Ezhov, or at all, in "framing" Iakovlev for some reason.

Chapter 3. Tukhachevsky and Others

Tukhachevsky and the Military Leaders

Much of the evidence we present concerning Trotsky's collaboration with Germany and/or Japan comes from the investigative materials connected with the so-called "Tukhachevsky Affair." On June 11, 1937, Marshal Mikhail Tukhachevsky, one of only five marshals of the Red Army, and seven other very high-ranking military commanders were tried and convicted of collaboration with Trotsky, other oppositionists, Germany, and/or Japan to bring about the overthrow of the Stalin government, the assassination of its leading members, the facilitation of war between the USSR and its major enemies Germany, Japan, and Poland, seizure of power, reversion to capitalism, and an alliance with the Axis countries.

Budennyi's Letter to Voroshilov

One of the judges at the special military court was Marshal Semion Budennyi. On June 26, 1937, Budennyi sent a letter to commissar for Defense Kliment Voroshilov in which he outlined his impressions of the trial and what it meant. As we studied it in more detail in volume one, Trotsky's 'Amalgams,' we will only consider it briefly here.

This letter has been dishonestly quoted out of context by several Russian writers, as will be seen. For example, among the lines that have been quoted is this sentence:

PRIMAKOV¹ very stubbornly denied that he led a terrorist group consisting of SHMIDT, KUZ'MICHEV and others, against com. VOROSHILOV.

What has always been omitted are the following passages which follow immediately after the sentence above:

He denied this on the basis that, he said, TROTSKY had entrusted him, PRIMAKOV, with a more serious task — to organize an armed uprising in Leningrad, for which purpose he, PRIMAKOV, was obliged to remain strictly secret from all terrorist groups, to break his ties with all Trotskyists and Rights and at the same time to win for himself authority and the absolute trust of the Party and the Army command.

PRIMAKOV did not, however, deny that he had indeed earlier led a terrorist group and for that purpose had recommended SHMIDT to the post of commander of the mechanized corps.

By means of the omission of these paragraphs, a passage in which Primakov confessed to a somewhat different role in the same conspiracy is made to appear to be a claim of innocence that implies Primakov was "framed." This is the same technique that we have seen employed by Shelepin in misquoting Iakir's letter to the 22nd Party Congress in 1962, discussed in a previous chapter.

Another passage in Budennyi's letter reveals that Tukhachevsky had testified that the German Luftwaffe was prepared to come to the aid of the opposition uprising in Leningrad.

Tukhachevsky received an instruction from General RUMSHTET² that the plan for sabotaging the Red Army should take into account the most likely directions of the main blows of the German armies: one against the Ukraine — Lvov, Kiev — and the others, the seizure of Leningrad by the rebels, something that would be very beneficial to Germany as it could render help to the rebels with its rather significant air force, which ought to advertise itself as forces coming over to the rebels from the side of the Soviet forces.

We know from another archival document, Marshal Voroshilov's address to the "Aktiv" (officers directly attached) of the Commissariat of Defense on June 9, 1937, that this information stems from Putna's confession.³ It concerns what he was told by German General Erhard Milch, one of the highest ranking commanders of the German Luftwaffe.⁴ Reading from an undated confession by Putna, Voroshilov stated the following:

[German Air Force General] Milch directly states — I ask you to say this to Karakhan, also a spy since 1927 who carried out the negotiations on behalf of these swine — Milch directly states...: "If you can capture Leningrad, the Leningrad oblast', you can count on serious help from our side and, mainly, on help from our air force, under the guise of forces that have gone over to you from the legal government. We will give you our air forces in significant quantities with our own crews.

"And," declared Milch, "we will be able to render you all this help in the Leningrad area because this area has a border with Finland with which we, he said, have excellent relations."

⁴ See the article on Milch at http://de.wikipedia.org/wiki/Erhard_Milch

This ties Primakov's testimony about Trotsky's role in planning an uprising in Leningrad together with the projected German role in the same uprising. A number of other defendants, both military and civilian, confessed to discussions with German generals including von Rundstedt and Milch.

In a segment from an interrogation of May 21, 1937, Primakov said:

...The bloc of Trotskyists and Rights and the organization of the common traitorous anti-Soviet military conspiracy led to the union of all the counterrevolutionary forces within the (Workers' and Peasants') Red Army... This anti-Soviet political bloc and military conspiracy, personally headed by the base fascist Trotsky, ...⁵

⁵ Iulia Kantor. Voina i Mir Mikhaila Tukhachevskogo. Moscow: Izdatel'skii Dom Ogoniok "Vremia", 2005, 374. (Kantor Voina)

Budennyi also reported, incidentally, that the military figures were not planning to accept the leadership of Trotsky or the Rights for very long.

...KORK confessed that he was aware that the leaders of the military-fascist counterrevolutionary organization regarded their ties to Trotsky and the Rights as a temporary situation. TUKHACHEVSKY had spoken to KORK to the effect that the Trotskyites, Rights et al. were only temporary fellow-travelers, and when the armed coup had been effected he, TUKHACHEVSKY would play the role of Bonaparte. And on November 29, 1934, according to KORK's confession, TUKHACHEVSKY, in KORK's apartment, had stated this unequivocally to all those present.

Colonel Viktor Alksnis and the Transcript of the Tukhachevsky Trial

The transcript of the June 11, 1937, trial of Tukhachevsky and the seven other commanders has never been made public. Its text is still so top-secret in Russia that no researcher, no matter how trusted, is allowed to read it today. But in 1990, shortly before the end of the USSR General Viktor Alksnis, military leader, member of the Duma (Soviet Parliament), and grandson of one of the judges at this 1937 military trial, was given permission by the KGB (successor to the MVD — NKVD) to read the transcript.

Perhaps the KGB thought Alksnis would be sympathetic to the story that the military men had been framed. After all his own grandfather, Comandarm 2nd rank (= Lieutenant General) Iakov I. Alksnis had been arrested in November 1937 and then tried and executed as a conspirator in July 1938, only months after he had served as one of the judges in the military panel that judged Tukhachevsky and the rest.

Instead Alksnis, interviewed in a Russian journal in 2000 and again by researcher Vladimir L. Bobrov shortly afterwards, said that reading the trial transcript had forced him to reverse his opinion. He is now convinced that the conspiracy had in fact taken place. From the interview in the journal Elementy in 2000:

My grandfather and Tukhachevsky were friends. And grandfather was on the judicial panel that judged both Tukhachevsky and Eideman. My interest in this case became even stronger after the well-known publications of [former] Procuror Viktorov, who wrote that Iakov Alksnis was very active at the trial, harassed the accused....

But in the trial transcript everything was just the opposite. Grandfather only asked two or three questions during the entire trial. But the strangest thing is the behavior of the accused. Newspaper accounts [of the Gorbachev-era — GF] claim that all the defendants denied their guilt completely. But according to the transcript they fully admitted their guilt. I realize that an admission of guilt itself can be the result of torture. But in the transcript it was something else entirely: a huge amount of detail, long dialogues, accusations of one another, and a mass of precision. It's simply impossible to stage-manage something like this.... I know nothing about the nature of the conspiracy. But of the fact that there really did exist a conspiracy within the Red Army and that Tukhachevsky participated in it I am completely convinced today.

It appears as though back there, in the 1930s, there stands some type of "cannon" that might be fired at us, at our times. And then everything could turn out completely differently. And in the meantime... in the meantime a certain conception of those events has been created, and everything is done to sustain that conception. (Alksnis)

Boris Alekseevich Viktorov was a military prosecutor who had been assigned to restudying the cases of military men convicted during the 1930s and of recommending "rehabilitations." His book of memoirs, Bez grifa "sekretno." Zapiski voennogo prokurora ("Stamp of Secrecy Removed: Notes of a Military Prosecutor") was a major work in Mikhail Gorbachev's campaign to "rehabilitate" almost everybody involved in the repressions of the 1930s. It was published in an edition of 200,000 copies, an enormous printing for a non-fiction book. Viktorov also published an article in the collection Krovavy Marshal. Mikhail Tukhachevsky 1893-1937 (St Petersburg: KORONO-print, 1997). It is in this article that Viktorov claimed that General Ian Alksnis "especially" asked the accused questions (16).

Viktorov's accounts are certainly fraudulent. For example, he claims that the transcript of the Tukhachevsky trial "consisted of only a few pages in all." (14) Col. Alksnis describes a very lengthy transcript. Many other such passages in Viktorov's writings confirm that it is dishonest.

On August 13, 2000 Vladimir L. Bobrov interviewed Col. Alksnis about his reading of the Tukhachevsky trial transcript and what about it forced him to change his mind and conclude that the military conspiracy really had existed. Here are some excerpts from this interview:

Alksnis: ...I turned the pages of the transcript and had more questions than answers. I came away with the impression that, obviously, there had really been a conspiracy.... But this is what struck me: in the transcript there are parts which attest to the sincerity of what the defendants said (no matter who claims that the trial was an organized show, that they worked on the defendants especially so that they would give the necessary confessions.)

Imagine this. Let's say, Tukhachevsky is telling about a meeting with the German military attaché in a dacha near Moscow... and at that moment Primakov interrupts him and says "Mikhail Nikolaevich, you are mistaken. This meeting did not take place in your office at the dacha, but was on the veranda." I think that it would have been impossible to "direct" things such that Tukhachevsky said precisely that and that Primakov would then make a correction like that.

Bobrov: Very well. But was there anything there that made you think that the trial had been scripted and directed anyway?

Alksnis: No, it would have been impossible to script and direct a trial such as is in the transcript.

Bobrov: That is, you wish to state that, having read the transcript, you did not find in it any traces of any kind of staging?

Alksnis: Yes, yes. On top of that all of them confessed, and when they all admitted guilt in their last words, stating that they had been participants in the conspiracy and knowing that after that execution awaited them, it is just impossible to imagine that they forced them all to make such admissions and declarations.

Bobrov: What was the main point of accusation of the "conspirators"?

Alksnis: Everything was there: espionage, preparation for a military coup, sabotage [wrecking]....

Bobrov: And what does "espionage" mean? You were talking about the meeting at the dacha....

Alksnis: Yes, yes, with the German military attaché. They were talking about arranging coordination with the German military, contacts were going on with them....

Bobrov: One last question. In your interview with "Elementy" you talked about some kind of "cannon" that might shoot at our own times from back in the 30s. What did you have in mind?

Alksnis: If an objective research project on the events of those years were to be done, free of ideological dogmas, then a great deal could change in our attitude towards those years and towards the personalities of that epoch. And so it would be a "bomb" that would cause some problems.... (Bobrov)⁶

It is not surprising that the transcript of the Tukhachevsky trial is top-secret once again. As far as we can determine no one has been permitted to read it since Alksnis. But we do have the Budennyi letter. It is by far the most direct evidence of the testimony given at the trial that we have. Alksnis' two accounts confirm the accuracy of Budennyi's account of the trial. For example, Alksnis confirms that the defendants confessed to all the charges and in some detail, something that Budennyi's letter also states.

It would be hard to overestimate the significance of Budennyi's testimony. There is no evidence to suggest or reason to believe that eight battle-hardened military men could have been forced to falsely confess at trial to such devastating charges, in such detail, and in the manner in which they did. Nor is there any evidence that they were forced to falsely confess in the first place, even before the trial.

Like the trial transcript itself, the letter remains top-secret. We located it in a little-known and disorganized archive and have published it, along with an introductory article in a Russia history journal.⁷ For Budennyi as for Col. Alksnis there is no question at all of the guilt of the generals, all of whom confessed it and gave details. This is also the case with the published commentary by General Belov, another of the judges. Belov's letter to Voroshilov was published in 1996, presumably because he makes very few substantive remarks about the specific charges. But Belov was also convinced of the generals' guilt. We do not examine it here because Belov says nothing specifically about Trotsky and the Germans or Japanese.⁷

Significance of the Tukhachevsky Trial Evidence

The Budennyi letter to Voroshilov and Col. Alksnis' account of his reading the transcript of the "Tukhachevsky Affair" trial together constitute one of the most important discoveries in the historiography of the Soviet Union. Thanks to them we now know as certainly as we will ever know that the military defendants in this trial were, in fact, guilty of what they confessed to.

This in itself completely dismantles the "anti-Stalin paradigm," the canonical interpretation of Soviet history. For example, it means that the testimony at the Third Moscow "show" trial, the March 1938 "Bukharin-Rykov" trial, was truthful insofar as it confirms the testimony given by Tukhachevsky and the other military men. It also confirms testimony about Trotsky's German and Japanese collaboration that was given by those defendants at the Second Moscow Trial of January 1937, the "Piatakov-Radek" trial, since that is also confirmed by the Tukhachevsky trial testimony.

If we had no corroborative evidence at all to this effect the testimony of the military figures would still be very strong. And we do have much other evidence. All of it is consistent with what we now know of the Tukhachevsky trial testimony. For our present purposes this is the strongest possible evidence that Trotsky was indeed conspiring with the Nazi government and German military.

Dreitser

The NKVD investigators of the 1930s referred to the interlocking conspiracy cases as the "klubok," or "tangle." This metaphor referred to the fact that the various separate conspiracies were intertwined with each other, at least on the leadership level. It also serves to illustrate how the NKVD "unraveled" them. Once one minor conspiracy was discovered it led by persistent investigation to others.

Efim Dreitser had been chief of Trotsky's bodyguard during the 1920s. He was a defendant at the first Moscow Trial of 1936 and claimed to be in personal contact with Trotsky. Dreitser named Putna at the 1936 Trial as a Trotskyist conspirator who also had direct links to Trotsky.

At the end of the evening session of August 21, the accused Dreitzer, replying to questions put to him by Comrade Vyshinsky concerning certain details of the counter-revolutionary activities of the Trotskyite-Zinovievite centre, declares that one of the active participants in the terroristic work of the Trotskyites was Putna, an old and active Trotskyite. According to Dreitzer, Putna at one time ostensibly left the Trotskyites in pursuance of the line of double-dealing, but actually continued until quite recently to carry on strictly secret work for the Trotskyite centre. In particular, Dreitzer testifies that Putna had direct contact with Trotsky, met I. N. Smirnov, and in 1932 communicated to Smirnov, through Dreitzer, Trotsky's verbal instructions to organize terrorist groups. The accused Smirnov tries to deny the fact that Putna participated in the terroristic activity of the Trotskyites. However, in reply to questions put to them by Comrade Vyshinsky, the accused Pickel, Reingold and Bakayev corroborate Dreitzer's testimony. (1936 Trial, 116)

This was evidently just one of a number of bits of evidence that led to Putna's arrest, just as Kamenev's naming Radek, Sokol'nikov, Bukharin and others provided "threads" that led to the Second and Third Moscow Trials. Dreitser's investigation file confirms his confessions at trial and his close ties to Putna and Iakir, another of the later Tukhachevsky trial defendants. A close member of Dreitser's family and his only surviving relative has confirmed that her great-uncle Efim was indeed close to high-ranking Red Army men. Putna was well-known as a Trotskyist and was named by defendants in all three Moscow Trials, tried and executed as one of the eight military leaders in the Tukhachevsky Affair.⁹

Dmitry Shmidt, a military commander who was also arrested and questioned in 1936, testified to Putna's close and conspiratorial connection with Trotsky.

In 1927 when I joined the Trotskyists I learned from DREITSER, OKHOTNIKOV and PUTNA that PUTNA was one of the members of the military center of the Trotskyist organization and was carrying out important organizational work in the Red Army. He was responsible for that work to Trotsky personally. In 1927 or 1928 PUTNA was assigned by the Revolutionary Military Council to be military attaché to Japan. At that time I had a meeting with PUTNA before his departure. He told me Trotsky used to come to his apartment to give him a whole series of instructions and tasks in connection with his going abroad.¹⁰

So the NKVD had other evidence, perhaps a lot of it, about Putna's activities. Concerning Shmidt's testimony specifically, it's difficult to imagine what foreign instructions, other than conspiratorial ones, Trotsky might have been giving Putna in 1927, since Trotsky had long since (January 1925) resigned from his military posts.

Kantor's Four Articles¹¹

¹¹ Kantor's four articles were published in Istoriia Gosudarstva i Prava (2006). This legal journal is very hard to obtain outside of Russia. I have reformatted and republished the text of all four articles at http://msuweb.montclair.edu/~furrgr/research/kantor_4articles_igp06.pdf (Kantor 2006)

In 2005 Iulia Kantor, a journalist and a graduate student in history, published a series of articles and a book¹² on Marshal Tukhachevsky. Kantor does not investigate whether Tukhachevsky was guilty or not but, like Cherushev, takes it for granted that Tukhachevsky was the innocent victim of a frame-up by Stalin. It's probably no coincidence, therefore, that like Cherushev Kantor was granted access to some documentary materials which others have not been permitted to see including, in Kantor's case, some of the Tukhachevsky investigative materials. Additionally she claims that she was given permission by Tukhachevsky's family to see his investigative file — something that, until the 75-year period of declassification had expired, was strictly limited in Russia to next-of-kin and normally forbidden to all others, researchers included.

¹² Kantor, Julia. Voina i mir Mikhaila Tukhachevskogo. Moscow: Izdatel'skii Dom Ogoniok "Vremia," 2005.

Kantor used these materials in her doctoral dissertation as well as her books and some articles. Anyone who studies only the texts of the primary sources that Kantor quotes without regard to her tendentious commentary will see that these sources strongly support Tukhachevsky's guilt. Some of these quotations involve Tukhachevsky's allegations concerning Trotsky.

No complete interrogations of Vitovt Putna have been published. Only excerpts from them have been published. We will briefly examine them below. But according to what we have of Tukhachevsky's testimony Putna was in direct contact with Trotsky and passed on to Tukhachevsky the information that he, Trotsky, had direct contacts with the German government and General Staff. This is consistent with what we've seen of Radek's testimony both before and during the January 1937 trial.

Tukhachevsky claimed to have been in direct contact by letter with Sedov through Putna.

I inform the investigation that in 1935 Putna brought me a note from Sedov in which it said that Trotsky considers it very desirable that I establish closer ties with the Trotskyist commander cadres. Through Putna I orally answered with my agreement, and burned the note from Sedov. (Kantor 2006, 5; Kantor Voina, 378)

Tukhachevsky also said that in 1932 he received a "directive" from Trotsky to form a conspiratorial military organization, something he had been preparing to do in any case.

Long before the creation of the antisoviet military-Trotskyist plot I grouped around myself, over the course of a number of years, men who were hostile to Soviet authority, dissatisfied with their positions as commanders, and conspired with them against the leadership of the Party and government. Therefore, when in 1932 I received a directive from Trotsky about the creation of an antisoviet organization in the army I already virtually had devoted cadres ready on whom I could rely in this work. (Kantor 2006, 5; Kantor Voina, 378-9)

According to Tukhachevsky Putna had direct contact with Trotsky concerning the latter's ties to the German government and General Staff and passed on news of this orally to Tukhachevsky.

Putna told me orally that Trotsky had set up direct contact with the German fascist government and General Staff. (Kantor 2006, 5; Kantor, Voina, 378-9)

Tukhachevsky said that Vladimir Romm had told him that Trotsky was relying on Hitler's help in his struggle against Soviet power. We know from Romm's testimony at the 1937 Trial that Romm claimed to have been in direct contact with Trotsky.

Romm told me that Trotsky is expecting Hitler to come to power and that he is counting on Hitler's aid in Trotsky's battle against Soviet authority. (Kantor 2006, 7; Kantor, Voina, 381)

Tukhachevsky reiterated that he had indeed had contact with Trotsky, and also that he himself had collaborated with German intelligence, though in the following passage he does not explicitly say that Trotsky had told him of his own German or Japanese connections.

The transcript of the interrogation of the accused Tukhachevsky of June 9, 1937:

I fully confirm my confessions given during the preliminary investigation concerning my leading participation in the military-Trotskyist plot, my ties to the Germans, and my past participation in anti-Soviet groupings. I admit my guilt in that I transmitted to German intelligence secret information and facts concerning the defense of the USSR. I also confirm my ties with Trotsky and Dombal'. (Kantor 2006, 15; Kantor, Voina, 406-7)

Assessing the Evidence: Kantor

Kantor received the permission of the Tukhachevsky family and the Russian government to gain access to some of the investigative materials for her long biography of Tukhachevsky. Though she does not admit as much, it seems that she was not permitted to read everything. Specifically it appears that she was not allowed to read the transcript of the trial of Tukhachevsky and the rest.¹³ If she had read it and yet completely omitted its contents from her articles and book Kantor would be guilty not just of being guided by her own preconceived ideas, but of gross deception. She is guilty of deceiving her readers in any case, since she never tells us what she was permitted to see and what was kept from her.

¹³ The trial transcript might not be in the investigative file.

Kantor takes the official position that the Marshal and all the other military figures were innocent victims of a frame-up. Therefore she would surely have cited any evidence that this was so. But she is unable to cite any. This is very significant, since it strongly suggests that no such evidence exists in the materials to which she was permitted access. Since the whole thrust of Kantor's work is to try to demonstrate the innocence of Tukhachevsky (and, by extension, of all of his codefendants), it appears that she had no such evidence before her. Kantor also ignores some of the evidence that they were guilty — notably, some already well-known to researchers because it is in the Shvernik Report, which has been published (see below).

The passages Kantor quotes strongly support all the other evidence we have cited. We have only quoted the passages from Kantor's work that directly inculcate Trotsky with Germany. The reliability of their testimony concerning Trotsky's collaboration with the Germans is predicated upon the truthfulness of the rest of their testimony — that is, upon their guilt. Kantor is committed to asserting the innocence of all these men rather than to investigating whether they were guilty or not. But the evidence she quotes, as opposed to her tendentious commentary on it, gives strong evidence of their guilt. This is also strong evidence that they told the truth about their collaboration with Trotsky and his with Germany.

Tukhachevsky's Confessions

In 1994 the texts of two of Tukhachevsky's confessions were published in Russia. In them Tukhachevsky repeats that Romm told him Trotsky was relying on Hitler. As we saw above Romm confessed to having been a courier between Trotsky and conspirators within the USSR.¹⁴

...Romm also passed on that it was Trotsky's hope that Hitler would come to power and would support him, Trotsky, in his struggle against Soviet power. (Main, 159; Molodaia Gvardiia (henceforth MG) 9 (1994), 133) (Evidently the same passage as above.)

¹⁴ These confessions of Tukhachevsky's have been translated and published in Steven J. Main, "The Arrest and 'Testimony' of Marshal of the Soviet Union M.N. Tukhachevsky (May-June 1937)," Journal of Slavic Military Studies 10, No. 1 (March 1997), 151-195. All the passages dealing with Trotsky were published in Molodaia Gvardiia issues 9 and 10 of 1994. We have used Main's English text for the convenience of readers and made silent corrections in a few places where we disagreed with Main's translation, which we have compared with the originals.

Tukhachevsky repeats that he had told Kork (another of the eight defendants) that he had had contact with Trotsky and the Rights.

I told Kork that I had links both with Trotsky and the Rightists and tasked him to recruit new members in the Moscow military district....

According to Tukhachevsky Putna, another of the eight defendants and, as we have already seen, a long-standing supporter of Trotsky's, admitted to him in 1933 that he was in touch with Trotsky as well as with I.N. Smirnov, the leaders of the clandestine Trotskyist underground within the USSR. Putna later received an appointment as military attaché (in 1934, as attaché to Great Britain) and so was assigned to be the contact person between Trotsky and the other conspirators.

Upon Putna's and Gorbachev's return from the Far East — I believe this was in 1933 — I spoke with each of them separately. Putna quickly admitted that he was already in contact with Trotsky and with Smirnov. I suggested to him to join the ranks of the military-Trotskyite conspiracy, telling him that I had direct links with Trotsky. Putna immediately agreed [to join]. Later, following his appointment as military attaché, he was tasked to maintain the link between Trotsky and the center of the anti-Soviet military-Trotskyite conspiracy. (Main 160; MG 9, 134)

Tukhachevsky said that in 1933 or 1934 Romm had instructions from Trotsky that the "German fascists" would help the Trotskyists, and so the military conspirators should help both the German and the Japanese General Staffs in sabotage, diversions, and assassinations against members of the Soviet government. Tukhachevsky said he passed "Trotsky's instructions" to the conspiratorial leadership, implying that he himself accepted them.

Round about this time, 1933/1934, Romm visited me in Moscow and told me that he had to pass on Trotsky's new instructions. Trotsky pointed out that it was no longer feasible to restrict our activities to simply recruiting and organizing cadres, that it was necessary to adopt a more active program, that German Fascism would render the Trotskyists assistance in their struggle with Stalin's leadership and that therefore the military conspiracy must supply the German General Staff with intelligence data, as well as working hand in glove with the Japanese General Staff, carrying out disruptive activities in the army, prepare diversions and terrorist acts against members of the government. These instructions of Trotsky I communicated to the center of our conspiracy. (Main, 160-161; MG 9, 134)

In another part of this published confession Tukhachevsky asserts that he got other instructions from Trotsky via Piatakov, rather than through Romm, Putna, or directly to himself.

During the winter of 1935/1936, Pyatakov told me that Trotsky had now asked us to ensure the [future] defeat of the USSR in war, even if this meant giving the Ukraine to the Germans and the Primor'ye to the Japanese. In order to prepare the USSR's defeat, all forces, both within the USSR and outside the USSR would have to be made ready; in particular, Pyatakov stated that Trotsky would carry out a decisive struggle to plant his people in the Comintern. Pyatakov stated that such conditions would mean the restoration of capitalism in the country.

As we received Trotsky's instructions on unleashing a campaign of sabotage activity, espionage, diversionary and terrorist activity, the center of the conspiracy, which included not only me, but also Feld'man, Eideman, Kamenev,¹⁵ Primakov, Uborevich, Iakir and those closely associated with it, Gamarnik and Kork, issued various instructions to the members of the conspiracy, based on Trotsky's directives. (Main, 163; MG 10, 257)

¹⁵ This means Army Commander, 1st rank (= General) Sergei Sergeevich Kamenev.

Tukhachevsky claims that he also received direct written instructions via Putna from Sedov, who was passing on Trotsky's instructions. Putna assured him that Trotsky had established direct ties to the German government and General Staff.

In the autumn of 1935, Putna came to my office and handed over a note from Sedov, in Trotsky's name, insisting that I more energetically attract Trotskyite cadres to the military conspiracy and more actively use them. I told Putna to say that this would be done. In addition, Putna told me that Trotsky had established direct links with Hitler's government and the General Staff, and that the center of the anti-Soviet military Trotskyite conspiracy should task itself to prepare defeats on those fronts where the German Army would operate.

During the winter of 1935/1936, as I have already mentioned, I had a talk with Pyatakov, during which the latter passed on another directive from Trotsky [to the effect] to ensure the unconditional defeat of the USSR in war with Hitler and Japan, as well as the break-up of the Ukraine and the Primor'ye from the USSR. These instructions meant that it was necessary to establish ties with the Germans in order to define where they intended to deploy their armies and where necessary to prepare the defeats of the Soviet armies. (Main, 166; MG 10, 261)

This passage in Tukhachevsky's published confession confirms what Budennyi reported to Voroshilov in his letter of June 26, 1937. Evidently Tukhachevsky restated this at the trial and inserted a comment that von Rundstedt must have known this information through Trotsky.

At the end of January 1936, I had to travel to London to attend the funeral of the British King. During the funeral procession, first by foot and then on the train, General Rundstedt — the head of the German government's military delegation — spoke to me. It was obvious that the German General Staff had already been informed by Trotsky. Rundstedt openly told me that the German General Staff was aware that I stood at the head of a military conspiracy in the Red Army and that he, Rundstedt, had been instructed to begin talks about matters of mutual interest. (Main, 166; MG 10, 261)

Taking into account Trotsky's directive to prepare for defeat on that front where the Germans would attack, as well as General Rundstedt's instruction to prepare for defeat on the Ukrainian front, I proposed to Iakir to make the German task easier by diversionary-sabotage tactics leading to the fall of the Letichev fortified region, the commandant of which was a member of the conspiracy, Sablin. (Main, 185; MG 10, 264)

Assessing the Evidence: Tukhachevsky's Confessions

Only a few of Tukhachevsky's confessions have been made public. We are fortunate to have any of them at all. They were published in the early 1990s when the promise of glasnost ("openness") was still in the air. In 2006 one confession of Nikolai Ezhov's was published. Ezhov confirmed the existence of several groups of military conspirators including that around Tukhachevsky. Ezhov also named some, at least, of the German military figures with whom they and he himself were jointly in touch.¹⁶ To that extent Ezhov's and Tukhachevsky's confessions mutually confirm each other.

¹⁶ English translation at <https://msuweb.montclair.edu/~furrgr/research/ezhov042639eng.html>

Frinovskii strongly confirmed the guilt of the Rightists, including Bukharin, some of whom, like Grin'ko, claimed direct conspiratorial contact with Trotsky. Others, like Bukharin, claimed indirect knowledge of Trotsky's dealings with the Germans through Radek.

Other Documents of the "Tukhachevsky Affair": The "Shvernik Report"

During the 22nd Party Congress in October 1961 Nikita Khrushchev and his supporters in the Soviet leadership leveled an even stronger attack against Stalin than Khrushchev's 1956 "Secret Speech" had been. After the Congress Stalin's body was removed from Lenin's tomb and a new wave of materials attacking Stalin and those closely associated with him was published. This anti-Stalin campaign — for so it may be called — ended shortly after Khrushchev was removed from office at the Central Committee meeting of October 1964 by Leonid Brezhnev and others.

In early 1962 the Presidium (formerly the Politburo, in effect Khrushchev himself) authorized a blue-ribbon commission to investigate the trials and executions of the 1930s and especially the so-called Tukhachevsky Affair.¹⁷ This commission seems to have had total access to all the investigative and other materials concerning the repressions of the 1930s. Its purpose seems to have been to find further information for attacks on Stalin and his supporters, and justificatory materials for further "rehabilitations." In fact, it provided little if any exculpatory evidence but quite a bit of further evidence that the accused were guilty.

¹⁷ There had been an earlier commission, called the "Molotov Commission." We discuss it later in the present chapter.

The report was issued in two parts. The Zapiska (memorandum) devoted mainly to the Military Purges and Tukhachevsky Affair was issued in 1963. A further part, the Spravka (= information, report), is dated 1964. Neither seems to have been used by Khrushchev or given to Soviet writers to promote Khrushchev's "line."

The Shvernik Reports were both published after the end of the USSR in Voennyi Arkhivy Rossii, a journal dated 1993 that never had another issue. Since that time the Reports have been published several more times and are readily available. It's fair to say that these reports constitute the largest single published collection of excerpts and quotations from investigative materials of the 1930s repressions.

We cite here all the passages from the Shvernik Commission reports that bear directly on the specific topic of this book: Trotsky's purported collaboration with Germany and Japan. There are a great many other passages, both in these reports and elsewhere in the available investigative materials, that bear on Trotsky's involvement in the general opposition conspiracies, for example to assassinate Stalin and others. Since these allegations are not the subject of our present study we will not consider them here.

From the "Zapiska:"¹⁸

On March 25, 1936, Iagoda informed Stalin that Trotsky was giving directives through agents of the Gestapo to Trotskyists inside the USSR about carrying out terrorist activity, and that even in prisons Trotskyists were trying to create militant terrorist groups and that the leader of the Trotskyists in the USSR was I.N. Smirnov. (Zapiska, 557)

The sentence of the court states that Tukhachevsky and the other defendants, "being leaders of an anti-Soviet military-fascist organization, have violated their military duty (oath), have betrayed their country, have established ties with military circles in Germany and with enemy of the people L. Trotsky and according to their directives have prepared the defeat of the Red Army in the event of an attack on the USSR by foreign aggressors, specifically, of fascist Germany, and with the goal of destroying the defensive capability of the USSR have engaged in espionage and sabotage in the units of the Red Army and in enterprises of military significance, and also have been preparing terrorist acts against the leaders of the AUCP(b) and the Soviet government." (605)

In the indictment it is asserted that in April-May 1937 the organs of the NKVD discovered and liquidated in the city of Moscow a military-Trotskyist conspiracy, in the "center" of leadership of which were Gamarnik, Tukhachevsky, Iakir, Uborevich, Kork, Eideman and Fel'dman. The military-Trotskyist organization, of which all those accused in this case were members, was formed in 1932-1933 upon the direct instructions of the German general staff and of Trotsky. It was connected with the Trotskyist center and the Bukharin-Rykov group of Rightists, was involved in sabotage, diversions, terror, and was preparing the overthrow of the government and the seizure of power with the aim of restoring capitalism in the USSR. (688)

Iakir's address at the court trial in connection with the plots of the organizers, set the line for the other defendants also to expose the machinations of Trotsky and of the fascist governments against the USSR, and in addition emphasized the role of Tukhachevsky in the conspiracy in every way. (690)

Tukhachevsky was also forced to confirm ... in court:

"When in 1932 Romm brought me Trotsky's proposal to gather the Trotskyist cadres, I agreed to do this. Therefore I consider the beginning of the organization of our military conspiracy to have been 1932." (695)

Putna testified about Tukhachevsky's ties with Sedov and Trotsky. Specifically, he declared during the investigation that, finding himself in London in September 1935 and learning that he was being summoned to Moscow, he reported about this to Sedov, Trotsky's son, in Paris. From Sedov he received by special delivery a package in which were a note from Sedov to Putna and a "letter of recommendation, written and signed personally by Trotsky" for Tukhachevsky.

Putna carried out Sedov's task and during the first days of October 1935 supposedly handed Tukhachevsky Trotsky's letter. Tukhachevsky familiarized himself with the letter and asked Putna to "transmit orally that Trotsky could count on him."

"Already in 1928 I [Tukhachevsky] was brought into the Rightist organization by Enukidze. In 1934 I personally made contact with Bukharin. I established espionage ties with the Germans in 1925, when I used to travel to Germany for study and maneuvers.... On my trip to London in 1936 Putna arranged for me a meeting with Sedov... I was connected in this conspiracy with Fel'dman, S.S. Kamenev, Iakir, Eideman, Enukidze, Bukharin, Karakhan, Pyatakov, I.N. Smirnov, Iagoda, Osepiyan and a number of others." (681-2)

...the investigation obtained their [Tukhachevsky's and Putna's] "admissions" of a personal meeting with Sedov, supposedly arranged for Tukhachevsky by Putna in 1936 in a café in Paris. Meanwhile detailed information about Tukhachevsky's stay in Paris from February 10 to 16, 1936, came from Ventsov, Soviet military attaché to France, and from the organs of the NKVD, but this information contained nothing about his meeting with Sedov. In the course of the present verification Afanas'ev, a former worker of the Foreign Section of the NKVD, member of the CPSU since 1923, expatiated upon this matter:

"Between 1932 and 1938 I was continuously in illegal work abroad. I headed the illegal resident bureau in Paris which mainly worked on the activities of Trotsky's son Sedov and his circle.... We were up to date on the most secret conspiratorial activity of Trotsky and Sedov. Therefore when you pose me the question of whether meetings between Sedov and Tukhachevsky, Putna, and other military figures of the Soviet Union could have taken place, I can assert that that could not be true... the agent reports and documentary materials we obtained in the process of our work on Trotsky, Sedov, Kleman and in part on the ROVS in Paris do not confirm either directly or indirectly the accusations that were brought against the military figures of the Red Army in connection with the case of Tukhachevsky, Kork, Gamarnik, Putna, and others." (695-696)

The language of the Shvern timer Report makes it clear that its authors proceeded on the preconceived assumption that no such conspiracy existed. It was designed to provide "evidence" — likely-looking materials — for citation in further "rehabilitations." Soviet historians and researchers, as we have seen, were not to be permitted access to the archives themselves.

In the case of Tukhachevsky's alleged meeting with Sedov in the Paris café in 1936 the Report cites Ventsov, Soviet military attaché to France, who reported nothing about it. Ventsov-Krants had been very close to Trotsky. According to an archival document cited by Cherushev he had helped Trotsky write the book How the Revolution Armed Itself.¹⁹ The report also cites an undated "former worker of the Foreign division of the NKVD" named Afanas'ev — no first name or patronymic are given — who claimed that Soviet intelligence in France were closely following information about Sedov and Trotsky and knew nothing about any such meeting or any of the activities mentioned in the Tukhachevsky case.

It's worth making several points here. First, the fact that Ventsov and Afanas'ev were told nothing about such a meeting cannot prove that such a meeting never took place. It only means that they claim they did not know of it. Afanas'ev's claim that Soviet intelligence knew about "the most secret conspiratorial activities of Trotsky and Sedov," and so knew that Sedov could not have met with Tukhachevsky, is empty for another reason. At or shortly after the time of the alleged meeting — late January or early February 1936 — Soviet intelligence man Mark Zborowski became Leon Sedov's closest confidant. We have Zborowski's reports back to Moscow. But Zborowski himself was not privy to all of Sedov's secrets, and did not accompany him everywhere. Zborowski's handwritten notes and reports are in the archives and have been published, while we do not even know Afanas'ev's name. So the claim that Soviet intelligence knew about all Trotsky's and Sedov's "most secret conspiratorial activities" cannot be true.

Rudenko's Letter to Molotov

On April 13, 1956, the Presidium of the Central Committee of the CPSU passed a decree establishing a commission to be chaired by V.M. Molotov to study the materials of the "public trials."²⁰ The commission proved unsatisfactory to all concerned. It was sharply divided between the three men who had been closest to Stalin and the majority, who were Khrushchev's people. On December 10, 1956, it issued a compromise report exonerating Tukhachevsky and the military men but refusing to consider rehabilitating any of the defendants in the public trials.²¹ Since we know that Molotov continued to be firmly convinced of Tukhachevsky's guilt we can assume this was, indeed, a compromise. In 1957 Molotov, Malenkov and Kaganovich were dismissed from the Presidium for having attempted to remove Khrushchev from office.

²⁰ Reabilitatsiia. Kak Eto Bylo. T. 2, No. 4, p. 70. Tukhachevsky was included even though his trial had not been public.

The Molotov Commission did study a lot of materials, but only some of their documents have been made public. We will quote below from a report dated June 10, 1956, to that commission from Rudenko, the General Prosecutor of the USSR. Rudenko was a staunch supporter of Khrushchev. It was his office that would have to issue recommendations to the Soviet

Supreme Court to get convictions reversed, the legal aspect of "rehabilitation."

Rudenko's report has not been published, although at some point it was obtained by Krasnaia Zvezda ("Red Star"), which is the military daily newspaper in Russia today as it was during Soviet times. Still not published, a copy of it was obtained from that source in 2002 by my Moscow colleague Vladimir L. Bobrov, and we reproduce portions of it here. Once again, we reproduce only quotations that deal with the question of Trotsky and Germany/Japan, ignoring other aspects of this important document.

Only on May 15, almost ten months after his arrest, after confessions about the military conspiracy had been obtained from Medvedev, were confessions also obtained from Putna about his counterrevolutionary ties with Tukhachevsky. At this interrogation Putna confessed that in September 1935 he received Trotsky's directive concerning the attraction to the Trotskyist organization of high-ranking military men. Trotsky also declared that he was aware that Tukhachevsky and S.S. Kamenev were already carrying out counterrevolutionary work in the army, and that it was essential to contact them. With this Trotsky handed him a note for Tukhachevsky, in which he proposed that he [Tukhachevsky] unite with the Trotskyist center for mutual counterrevolutionary activity. In October 1935 he [Putna] handed this note to Tukhachevsky, who accepted this proposal of Trotsky's.

In January 1936 he informed Trotsky of the existence of a Trotskyist military organization and its center consisting of Primakov, Putna, and Dreitser, about the connections of this organization and about recruitment.

At his interrogation of June 2, 1937, Putna had already confessed that in the spring of 1931 he had established espionage ties with the German G[eneral] S[taff] and at various times gave the Germans, through their generals Nedavmeister²² (?), Adam, and Bokkel'berg, information about the military staff of the Red army, its organizational structure and location of its forces, about armaments and the system of military readiness. It is not apparent from these interrogations precisely what information Putna transmitted.

Putna declared moreover that in 1936 at the time of his and Tukhachevsky's trip together to England Tukhachevsky compared the relationship of forces and proved to him that the defeat of the USSR in a war with Germany was inevitable. And that he, Putna, agreed with Tukhachevsky and said to him that for the swiftest defeat of Soviet forces it was essential to act together on the side of the Trotskyist organization. However Putna did not confess how Tukhachevsky reacted to this.

Fel'dman also confessed that from Tukhachevsky's words he [Fel'dman] was aware that he [Tukhachevsky] had an agreement with Pyatakov concerning a disruption in the supply of artillery, and also maintained a connection with Trotsky, from whom he was receiving directives concerning counterrevolutionary activity. From his [Tukhachevsky's] own words Fel'dman learned that Egorov, commander of the VTSIK School was preparing a "palace coup," but Tukhachevsky said that Egorov was an indecisive person and unsuitable for this purpose. In addition this School was being moved out of the Kremlin and therefore a more realistic plan for the seizure of power — as Tukhachevsky averred — was defeat of the Red army in the future war, and an armed uprising.

... But at this point Tukhachevsky declared that Putna and Primakov did not trust him politically very much, that during their trips to Moscow Primakov gave the military center information but avoided conversations with Tukhachevsky on this topic. That Primakov and Putna had private ties through their Trotskyist centers and were maintaining contact with Trotsky. Tukhachevsky declared that he personally did not share Trotskyist views and further admitted that in 1936 he had received a note from Sedov in which the latter in Trotsky's name proposed [that Tukhachevsky] proceed to join with the Trotskyist cadres in the Red army in order to prepare the seizure of power.

... At the beginning of the interrogation Tukhachevsky confessed that he had not met in person with either Trotsky or Sedov after their exile from the Soviet Union. But at the end of the interrogation he declared that in 1932, when he was at the maneuvers of the German army, he had established a personal connection with Trotsky and had reached an agreement about carrying on Trotskyist work in the Red Army.

... On that same day, May 27, 1937, Tukhachevsky signed the transcript of an interrogation in which he admitted to his leading role in the military conspiracy, but these confessions differ significantly from those he had given earlier. In these confessions Tukhachevsky said nothing about personal ties with Trotsky and affirmed that he maintained ties with Trotsky through Romm and Primakov. That it was through them that he received Trotsky's directive that it was essential to go over to terrorist methods of work, about which Tukhachevsky had not confessed earlier.

²² This is probably German General Oskar von Niedermayer, who worked for the Reichswehr (German military) in an intelligence capacity in Moscow in the early 1930s, having formally resigned from the military. He was a General again during World War II, was captured after the War by the Soviets, tried and sentenced to 25 years in prison, and died shortly thereafter in 1948.

Iona Iakir, another of the Tukhachevsky defendants:

In 1933 Tukhachevsky, who knew about my waverings on questions of the Party's policy in the village, and about my ties to former Trotskyists, after first feeling me out, informed me that he was connected with Trotsky, according to whose directive he was organizing a military conspiracy and proposed that I take part in it. I gave Tukhachevsky my agreement, after which he said to me that he was at the head of the conspiracy, that there was a military center whose staff he proposed that I join. I agreed to become part of the staff of the center. In this conversation Tukhachevsky informed me that Uborevich, with whom he had recently had a conversation on this subject, was also in the center of the military conspiracy.

Tukhachevsky spoke about a directive of Trotsky's that he had recently received and in which the following tasks were placed before the center of the military conspiracy:

1. The organization of a coup in Moscow, in the Ukraine, and in a number of other places in the Soviet Union with the aim of seizing power.
2. In the event that the coup d'état was unsuccessful, to organize the defeat of the Red army in a war with the Polish-German bloc and to organize the theater of military operations and the armies accordingly.
3. To organize sabotage in the RKKA [Workers' and Peasants' Red Army] in both material-technical and military preparations.
4. Independently of Trotsky's direct ties with the German General Staff and the fascist government, it was important for the military center to organize these ties independently.

Analysis of Rudenko's Letter

Rudenko summarized details from some interrogations of Putna, Tukhachevsky, and Iakir that have not been made public. These passages tie Trotsky to collaboration with Germany in several ways:

- Putna, the leading Trotskyist among the military men, claimed he had been in touch with Trotsky; was involved in a Trotskyist military organization; and was conspiring with the German General Staff.
- Tukhachevsky confirmed that Primakov and Putna were in touch with Trotsky, as he himself was, and that he and the Trotskyist cadres were working together.
- According to Iakir, Tukhachevsky had said that the military conspiracy was being organized in coordination with Trotsky and "according to his directive."
- Iakir confirmed that the military conspirators were to work for the defeat of the Red Army in a war with Germany and Poland.

- Iakir said that Trotsky had direct ties with the German General Staff.

The richness and consistency of this material suggests that there is yet more evidence in the investigation materials of the Tukhachevsky group of Trotsky's contacts with Germany.

Voroshilov's Talk at the Commissariat of Defense

From the same source we have obtained a copy of the transcript (stenogramma) of a talk by Commissar of Defense Voroshilov to the top military personnel (aktiv) of the Commissariat (= Ministry) of Defense on June 9, 1937.²³ Voroshilov read out quotations from interrogations and court documents of the Tukhachevsky Affair.

²³ We have already cited a short passage from this document above in connection with the question of General Milch.

Some of those quotations are not given in the transcript, or are given only partially. We will use what we have, and will only cite those quotations that deal directly with Trotsky and his alleged ties to either Germany or Japan or that confirm the information in Rudenko's report.

TRANSCRIPT OF THE ACTIV OF THE PEOPLE'S COMMISSARIAT OF DEFENSE USSR

June 9, 1937

Both PUTNA and all the rest of them tell about how they linked their work with the principal scoundrel and main gunman of counterrevolution in our country who was driven out of this country — Trotsky.

Here is what PUTNA says:

"— When I found out (he was saying this to the investigator) that I was being recalled to Moscow in the last days of September 1935 I reported about this to Sedov." (reads PUTNA's confessions)

They [the investigators] asked him this question: "Was Trotsky's letter handed to Tukhachevsky, when and under what circumstances?"

Answer: "Trotsky's letter was handed to Tukhachevsky." (reads)

What Tukhachevsky says about this. They asked him this question: "When did you establish contact with Trotsky and what directives did you receive from him?"

Answer: "I established contact with Trotsky through Romm in 1932." The latter brought him a note in 1935 too. Obviously this was not the first note.

"In 1932..." (reads) Further he relates what Romm said to him. "Everything that he reported I approved, then I met with him in 1933 and 1934. When in fact the anti-Soviet work in the army had already been developed by me there took place my second meeting with Romm in Moscow ..." (reads)

That's what Tukhachevsky says about his contacts with Trotsky and about those tasks which the latter set before him.

Here you see it's not just a question of Trotsky's assigning tasks on his own account, but Trotsky at the same time has instructions also from the German General Staff. I have information that it is not only the German General Staff that has influence on Trotsky, but that the latter was connected to the Japanese General Staff as well, or in any case with its intelligence organs.

Primakov answers the question what tasks were set before him and what he did:

"Trotsky's basic directives ... were known to me too from the words of Dreitser and Putna; they came down to this, that Trotsky was demanding to reestablish a military organization, to strengthen it in the army as well, making use of the sharpening of the class struggle ... up to 1933."

Putna about his spying: "A few days later" (reads) ... Then while conversations went on: "about the desirability of changing the system, the leadership in the USSR...." (reads)

That means that preparatory conversations were going on, and then further: "Shleikher expressed his unequivocal readiness...." (reads) He brought this to Trotsky's attention through this gentleman Sedov and Sedov reports that Trotsky proposes: (reads)²⁴

The testimony here generally accords with what we have seen previously, no doubt because Voroshilov drew his information from the same interrogations. The "Shleikher" named here is no doubt General Kurt von Schleicher, Chancellor of Germany from June 1932 to January 1933 and previously Minister of Defense.

Colonel L.A. Shnitman

Further evidence about contacts between the military conspirators and Trotsky keeps coming to light, even in sources that try to impugn its validity. In a 2009 book we read the following:

In September 1937 Ezhov sent Stalin a special communication containing an assessment of the activities of Colonel L.A. Shnitman, military attaché to Czechoslovakia. There was compromising material stating that he was aide to Komandarm 2nd rank A.I. Kork, military attaché to Germany. In January 1937 a group of Soviet pilots who had served in Spain had been detained in France, and Shnitman was also blamed for this. During his interrogation he had also told the investigators about his "meetings" upon Tukhachevsky's instructions in Paris with Sedov, Trotsky's son, concerning the transmission of secret information to foreign intelligence services.²⁵

²⁵ Vladimir Khaustov and Lennart Samuel'son. Stalin, NKVD, i Repressii 1936-1938 gg. "Istoriia Stalinizma" series. Moscow: ROSSPEN, 2009 226. (Khaustov-Samuel'son)

That Khaustov and Samuel'son include this material at all is apparently part of their attempt to illustrate the unreliability of such reports. The scare quotes around the word "meetings" are an example of the dishonest "argument by scare quotes." Instead of citing evidence for their implied suspicion that Shnitman had not met with Sedov, Khaustov and Samuel'son put scare quotes around the word. This is a common tactic of proponents of the anti-Stalin paradigm when they have no evidence to support their preconceived ideas but rather are forced to contend with contrary evidence. An objective historian would cite evidence and, if there were no such evidence, conclude that the meetings might well have taken place. Since such an admission would contradict the anti-Stalin paradigm, Khaustov and Samuel'son use this subterfuge. We have discussed "argument by scare quotes" elsewhere.²⁶

²⁶ Furr. Kirov Chapter 4, 87-92.

Evaluating This Evidence

As with a great many other statements in this book the authors give no citation, not even an archival source, for this information. What are we to make of this?

Both authors are extremely anticommunist and very hostile to Stalin. They reject out of hand any possibility that any of the Opposition conspiracies actually existed. Their book contains many falsifications, significant omissions, and outright lies, all in an anticommunist direction. Moreover, Khaustov is associated with the "Memorial" organization. He is one of a few privileged researchers who have access to many archival documents.

Another "Memorial" society source reports that Shnitman was convicted of "espionage [and] participation in a military conspiracy in the Red Army."²⁷ This is what we would expect if Shnitman did confess as Khaustov and Samuel'son affirm. Yet another source confirms that Shnitman was aide to the military attaché to Germany in 1926-1929 and again in 1934-35, was military attaché to Finland in 1929-30 and military attaché to Czechoslovakia 1936-1938.²⁸

²⁸ <http://baza.vgd.ru/1/38052/>.

The date of Ezhov's memorandum to Stalin as given by Khaustov and Samuel'son, September 1937, is curious. There's good evidence from other sources that Shnitman was arrested on January 14, 1938, and that his trial and execution took place on August 28, 1938.²⁹ One would expect that an interrogation in which Shnitman made such self-incriminating disclosures would almost certainly have taken place between these two dates rather than prior to Ezhov's September 1937 communication to Stalin. Surely no one who had confessed to such crimes would have been left at large for another four months. That deduction in turn suggests that Khaustov and Samuel'son saw not just Ezhov's note to Stalin but at least part of Shnitman's investigative file and are not being truthful about the content of Ezhov's note.

²⁹ O.F. Suvenirov. Tragediia RKKA 1937-1938. Institut Voennoi Istorii Ministerstva Oborony Rossiiskoi Federatsii. Moscow: "Terra," 1998, 441, No. 262.

The "foreign intelligence service" for which Sedov and, through Shnitman, Tukhachevsky were spying is not named. But it must have been Germany. Tukhachevsky had ties with the German General Staff about which he confessed at length, as we have seen, while Shnitman had had some connection to Germany but not to any other of the great European powers.

In a book of more than 400 pages the authors devote only this single paragraph to Shnitman's case. Indeed, there is no particular reason they should have inserted this paragraph at all other than to impugn internal communications among the Soviet leaders. But the implication nevertheless is that there may be still more — perhaps much more — evidence of contact between Trotsky or Sedov and Germany or Japan, to say nothing of Trotsky's contacts with Soviet oppositionists.

Other Evidence from the Soviet Archives of Trotsky's Collaboration

To this point we have confined our attention to documents from the former Soviet archives containing evidence of "first-hand" contact between Trotsky and Germany or Japan. The persons whose accounts we have examined claim that they knew of Trotsky's contact with Germany or Japan either from Trotsky himself or from German or Japanese diplomats.

Although the dividing line between first- and second-hand evidence is a clear one, the evidentiary value of second-hand evidence is not necessarily less. For example we now have Nikolai Bukharin's first confession of June 2, 1937, a document still top-secret in Russia today that turned up in an archive that was sent West sometime in the mid-1990s. We have examined this confession in detail in another study to which we refer the interested reader.³⁰

³⁰ Grover Furr and Vladimir L. Bobrov, "Nikolai Bukharin's First Statement of Confession in the Lubianka." Cultural Logic 2007, at <https://ojs.library.ubc.ca/index.php/clogic/article/view/191745/188745>. This article was first published in the Russian historical journal Klio 1 (36), 2005, 38-52. I have put the Russian version online at http://msuweb.montclair.edu/~furrgr/research/furrnbobrov_bukharin_klio07.pdf

It is significant because Bukharin confirms what we have already learned from Radek's testimony, since Bukharin's knowledge of Trotsky's collaboration with Germany came only through Radek. Radek had implicated Bukharin in pretrial statements and then again at the public January 1937 Moscow trial. Bukharin had denied over and over again what Radek said, but on June 2, 1937 he reversed himself and confessed.

Why did Bukharin decide to confess? It appears that one reason may have been that Bukharin had learned of Tukhachevsky's arrest, and figured "the jig was up."³¹ In his final statement at the March 1938 Moscow Trial Bukharin said that "of course, the incriminating evidence [uliki]" played a determining role. That must mean evidence recently obtained and shown to him, which would probably include the evidence of the military conspirators.

³¹ See Grover Furr and Vladimir Bobrov, "Nikolai Bukharin's First Statement of Confession in the Lubyanka." Cultural Logic 2007, 17 and nn. 32 and 33. Bibliographic information of the Russian original of this article is given there.

If Bukharin's testimony contradicted Radek's we would be forced to conclude that, on the evidence, one or both were wrong. Since Bukharin's statement confirms Radek's, their statements mutually corroborate, or strengthen each other.

Iagoda's Confessions

There exists a good deal more such "second-hand evidence" of Trotsky's collaboration with the Germans and Japanese in recently published Soviet archival documents.

Genrikh S. Iagoda was Commissar of the NKVD (= Minister of Internal Affairs), which included the political police, from 1934 till he was dismissed in September 1936. He was arrested in early March 1937. Subsequently he was one of the leading defendants in the third Moscow trial of March 1938.

In 1997 a number of materials from Genrikh Iagoda's investigative file were published in a very small edition of 200 copies in the provincial city of Kazan' by some researchers employed by the FSB, successor to the KGB. Since that time some of the documents published in this collection have been published elsewhere, evidently from copies held in different archives. In these interrogation transcripts Iagoda makes startling confessions. These confessions include details of his collaboration with German intelligence.³²

(Genrikh Iagoda)

Avel' Enukidze was a high-ranking Party official and member of the Soviet government who had been arrested earlier. Only two interrogations of Enukidze's have been published: one in the 1997 collection of Iagoda materials, another in the second of the "Lubianka-Stalin" volumes in 2004. In neither does Enukidze speak much about Trotsky. In the volume of materials devoted to Iagoda, however, we find the following remark about Enukidze, Trotsky, and the Germans. We have bolded passages of special interest to our investigation.

In the first place, in 1935 the prospects of a war by a strengthened Germany against the Soviet Union were growing with each day. In that connection it was necessary to move ahead swiftly and make an agreement with them.

Enukidze told me that Trotsky abroad had established full contact with German governmental circles, and that Enukidze himself also had a line of contact with the Germans. (Genrikh Iagoda, 193)

Iagoda also testified about Lev Karakhan's ties to Trotsky and the Germans.

But I am aware that in the orientation to and conspiracies with German governmental circles both the Trotskyists and Zinovievists, on the one side, and the Rights, on the other side, had their own separate lines [of contact].

Question: How did they differ and where do you know this from?

Answer: Karakhan spoke to me about this in one of our talks with him in 1935.

The essence of these two lines in orientation to and contact with the Germans consists in the following: the Trotskyist-Zinovievist part of our center was carrying out negotiations with German governmental circles through Trotsky, who was in emigration, isolated from the Soviet Union, ignorant of the internal processes of the country and ready to give away everything just in order to overthrow Soviet power and return to Russia as soon as possible.

We, the Rights, had a different attitude. We were not supporters of a new partition of Russia, as Trotsky was doing....

Karakhan's connection with the Germans had existed for a long time. And the center of the Rights used this line of contact, already established, as a real line, and offered to Karakhan to enter into official negotiations with the German governmental circles. I have already confessed that Karakhan was in Berlin after this and met there with Nadolny and Hess (or Goebbels) and, as he said to me, had already in 1936 achieved significant concessions from the Germans.

Question: What concessions?

Answer: Concessions of the servile conditions on the basis of which the agreement with Trotsky had been achieved. (Genrikh Iagoda, 194-195)

Karakhan apparently claimed to have had his own ties to the Germans through Nadolny (presumably Rudolf Nadolny, German diplomat)³³ and either Hess or Goebbels. Others of the Rights testified at the March 1938 Trial that Karakhan and Iagoda were very critical of Trotsky's dealings with the Germans, believing that Trotsky was cut off from the realities of life in the USSR and was yielding far too much to the Germans just in hopes of returning to power.

³³ See https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Rudolf_Nadolny. The German Wikipedia page article is much fuller.

Assessing the Evidence: Iagoda's Confessions

Scholars with "impeccable" anticommunist credentials have cited these documents unproblematically. For example, Marc Jansen and Nikita Petrov cite this work as a primary source, without claiming that the interrogations in it were, or even might have been, faked, obtained by compulsion, etc.³⁴ One of the documents has also been published in a semiofficial collection of documents from the Soviet archives, a fact that further attests to their genuine nature.³⁵ We may therefore conclude that the documents really do come from the Iagoda investigative file and are generally conceded to be genuine.

These documents merit a detailed analysis in and of themselves. Their contents intersect with and confirm many other materials now available such as confession statements by other individuals arrested in connection with the investigations concerning espionage and conspiracy, and the transcript of the Third Moscow trial.

At the end of each of Iagoda's confessions printed in this 1997 volume is a disclaimer, variously worded. At the end of interrogation two, Iagoda's first confession, which took place on April 26, 1937, pp. 109-137, we read:

Information about the conspirator-employees of the NKVD is falsified. Other aforementioned statements by Iagoda are not credible.

For more information about the repression of Chekists in the middle 1930s see Palchinsky A.A. "Represii v organakh NKVD v seredine 30-kh godov," in Political persecution in Russia. Historical and contemporary. St. Petersburg: 1997, pp. 284-294.

At the end of the second confession of May 4, 1937, (pp.137-143):

Information about the conspirator-employees of the NKVD is falsified.

At the end of the third (May 13, 1937, pp. 144-167):

All information in the transcript concerning acts of terror and conspiracies are falsified.

V.M. Primakov and the other military men were fully rehabilitated in 1957. Izvestiia TsK KPSS No. 4 (1989), 42-73. A.I. Rykov, N.I. Bukharin and others were rehabilitated in 1988. Izvestiia TsK KPSS No. 5 (1989), 69-92.

At the end of the fourth (May 19, 1937, pp. 167-184):

All information about conspiracies and acts of terror is falsified. The case of the murder of S.M. Kirov remains open to this day. A.E. Ehlukidze and the other persons named in the transcript were rehabilitated in the 1960s-1980s.

The fifth (May 26, 1937, pp. 185-199):

All information in the transcript concerning conspiracy and accusations of "espionage" is falsified. L.M. Karakhan and the other persons named in the transcript have been rehabilitated.

At the end of a two-page statement by Iagoda to Ezhov concerning NKVD worker Mironov (June 4, 1937, pp. 200-202):

The information in the document is not credible.

At the end of the interrogation of December 28, 1937 (pp. 202-218):

The information is not credible. Professor L.G. Levin and other doctors were later rehabilitated because there is no evidence of any crime in their activities.

The end of the "face-to-face confrontation" (ochnaia stavka) between Iagoda and Dr. Levin of January 4, 1938, pp. 218-223:

The information cited in the transcript is not credible.

The end of the confrontation between Iagoda and Dr. Kriuchkov of January 5, 1938, pp. 223-227:

The answers are not credible. P.P. Kriuchkov was later rehabilitated because there is no evidence of any crime in his activities.

The end of the confrontation between Iagoda and Professor D.D. Pletnev of January 5, 1938, pp. 227-230:

The answers are not credible. Professor D.D. Pletnev was later rehabilitated because there is no evidence of any crime in his activities.

The end of the confrontation between Dr. Levin, also of January 5, 1938, pp. 231-233:

The "confessions" of L.G. Levin and P.P. Kriuchkov were later refuted as not credible.

At the end of the interrogation of Iagoda held on January 10, 1938, pp. 235-239:

Iagoda's answers are not credible.

There are similar remarks at the end of the interrogation-confession of Artuzov of June 15, 1937 (pp. 487-499). We will consider Artuzov's confession below.

The information given by Artuzov is not credible. Later it was all refuted in his rehabilitation.

The same kind of comments are made at the end of other interrogation-confessions which we do not consider here, such as those of Avel' Enukidze and of NKVD men Bulanov, Prokof'ev, Radzivilovskii, and Trilisser.

Assessing These Documents: "Rehabilitations"

The comments cited above are of course not a critical analysis, or indeed any kind of analysis, of the confessions of Iagoda's that the volume reproduces. In fact, the book has no analysis of the assertions made in the interrogation-confessions at all.

Some of the comments allude to "rehabilitations." Most such "rehabilitations" have not been made public, so we can't evaluate them. However, we know a good deal about a number of "rehabilitations" of well-known figures — enough to know that they are political, not historically accurate, documents.

Specifically, we have a good deal of the material on Bukharin's "rehabilitation." We know that it does not prove him innocent in the slightest. On the contrary, in their decree "rehabilitating" Bukharin the Plenum of the Soviet Supreme Court falsified a key document — Frinovskii's confession of April 11, 1939, which was not public in February 1988 when Bukharin's case came before it, but has been published since. Far from proving Bukharin innocent, Frinovskii's confession in fact shows him to have been guilty. Earlier in the present volume we pointed out that the "rehabilitation" document of Zinoviev and his codefendants contains evidence of Zinoviev's guilt rather than his innocence.

So "rehabilitations" are not proof that the individuals "rehabilitated" were innocent, even though they are presented as though they were. Rather, they are official claims that the individuals "rehabilitated" will be considered to be innocent, and in future will be declared to have been "victims" of "Stalin's crimes."

"Rehabilitations" are political acts, not exercises in the reconsideration of evidence. Marc Junge, a German researcher on the repressions of the 1930s and a determined proponent of the "anti-Stalin" paradigm, put it this way:

In Übereinstimmung zu von Goudoever kann abschließend festgestellt werden, daß Rehabilitierung in der Sowjetunion ein politisch-administrativer Willkürakt blieb, der vor allem von der politischen

Zweckmäßigkeit der Maßnahmen bestimmt wurde, nicht aber von der strafrechtlichen Korrektheit.³⁶

In agreement with von Goudeover it may be definitively established that rehabilitation in the Soviet Union remained an act of political-administrative caprice that was determined above all by political usefulness, not by juridical correctness.

³⁶ Bucharins Rehabilitierung. Historisches Gedächtnis in der Sowjetunion 1953-1991. Berlin: BasisDruck Vlg, 1999, 266. This is discussed in more detail in Furr and Bobrov, 5 ff.

It appears that the "disclaimers" quoted above and attached to the end of every confession-statement in this volume are the same kind of thing. They indirectly inform the reader something like this: "We, the editors of this volume, claim that the contents of these confession-statements are not true. We assert that they are 'not trustworthy' or 'falsified' but we cannot prove it and, in fact, have no evidence to that effect. If you want evidence, refer to the 'rehabilitations' of the individuals in question — to which, in fact, you cannot gain access."

The editors of the Iagoda volume are employees of the FSB, the successor to the KGB — that is, the Russian intelligence and security service. Not to state that these confessions are "false" or at least "not trustworthy" would be for them to take a position contradictory to what some important Russian (and Soviet) state institutions have taken in the past. It's not the job of the state security service to call some other state institution a liar. Whatever else it may mean this formula allows them to avoid doing so.

We can deduce something more from these brief phrases. We may assume that if there were any other kind of evidence that the statements made in the confessions and interrogations were false, that evidence would be cited. Since no such evidence is cited, in effect these notes constitute a kind of admission that the contents of the confessions cannot be shown to be false.

One could object that here too "lack of evidence is not evidence of the lack" of contradictory evidence, but this would be to ignore the fact that when concerted efforts to find evidence, made by those highly motivated to find such evidence, turns out to be unsuccessful, there is important information content in this failure. It is one thing if those motivated not to find such evidence fail to find any, but quite different when highly motivated searchers fail. In reality, we know from the published volumes of rehabilitation documents that during Gorbachev's time very thorough searches of the archives were carried out with a view to finding evidence that the condemned Opposition defendants of the 1930s were falsely convicted. In the case of Iagoda, the Moscow Trials defendants, and the "Tukhachevsky Affair" we can conclude with relative confidence that no such evidence was found.

Even some Cold-War scholars who reject the validity of the Moscow Trials on principle accept these Iagoda documents at face value and have cited them as genuine without negative comment on the veracity of their contents. Evidence is not to be simply "believed" or "disbelieved" — much less rejected or disregarded — but rather must be considered in the context of all the other evidence. Even to say that Iagoda's confession may be false is also to say that it may not be false. That is, absent any information that they were false, there is no more basis for "disbelieving" than for "believing" them. In fact, not even the anticommunist scholars have rejected them as invalid.

If Iagoda's confessions were the only evidence we had of oppositionists conspiring with Germany or Japan, we would still have no grounds to discard them. On the contrary: testimony that such an illegal contact existed, while not conclusive, is far more compelling than any claims to the contrary. This is a principle of investigation so self-evident it is seldom discussed. In the case of a person accused of a crime one may expect denial in any case: by an innocent person, because he is innocent; by a guilty person because he wishes to escape the consequences of his crime. Therefore confessions of guilt are of greater interest than professions of innocence — unless there is evidence that such confessions were extracted by force, and no such evidence, in the present case, has been produced.

But Iagoda's confessions are far from the only evidence we have that the opposition was conspiring with Germany and/or Japan. They constitute just one group of documents within a large body of evidence that suggests such conspiracy. As with any confession of guilt, the existence of this testimony is prima facie evidence that the confessions are true.

They are confirmed by Iagoda's appeal for clemency published in Izvestiia in 1992, which reads as follows:

My guilt before my country is great. It is impossible to redeem it to any extent. It is hard to die. Before the whole people and Party I stand on my knees and beg you to have mercy on me and let me live.³⁷

³⁷ "Rasskaz o desiati rasstrel'nykh".

Every one of the ten persons whose confessions were reproduced along with Iagoda's insisted upon his own guilt in his appeal. Bukharin wrote that his guilt was so great he "should be shot ten times over." As we have already noted Dr. Natan Lur'e repeated his guilt:

I really did prepare the assassination of Voroshilov upon instruction from Franz Weitz, a Gestapo representative. I wished to accomplish these disgusting murders because I had been poisoned by the poison of Trotskyism during my long stay in Germany.

The appeals of many other Moscow Trials defendants have now been published including those of all but one (Rakovsky) of the defendants at the Third Moscow Trial of March 1938. All the defendants, without exception, reaffirm their guilt. We have examined them in Chapter Nine of Trotsky's 'Amalgams.'

No single piece of evidence is univocal, pointing towards a single conclusion only. One might perhaps imagine an example of an innocent person who nevertheless was persuaded to confess again and again in pretrial interrogations; to do so again at trial; to protest his innocence of certain capital crimes in vehement terms while at the same time confirming his guilt of other capital crimes; and then confessing his guilt again in his appeal. But we have to draw our historical conclusions not on imagination but evidence. There is no evidence to refute Iagoda's confessions, while they confirm and are consistent with a great deal of evidence we do have.

Chapter 4. Rakovsky, Trotsky, and the Japanese

In January 1937 the second Moscow Trial, the "Radek-Piatakov Trial," was under way. In an essay dated January 25, 1937, and titled simply "Rakovsky" Trotsky wrote the following:

In the present trial, the defendant Drobnis is playing the part of chief agent for the GPU in laying the basis for new indictments. Among others, Drobnis named Rakovsky as an accomplice in the alleged terrorist conspiracy. Rakovsky's fate is profoundly tragic. He and I were bound by ties of friendship for more than thirty years. Of all the defendants in both trials he stood the closest to me. After being sent to Siberian exile in 1928, Rakovsky held out longer and more firmly than all the others in spite of illness and age (he is now sixty). He even made an attempt to escape, was captured and wounded; in the end, he capitulated — in 1934, six years later than the rest.

At the trial of the sixteen it was "established" that I first issued instructions for terrorism in 1932. But it was altogether impossible to understand why I would have issued such instructions to capitulators, who had been waging war against me, rather than to Rakovsky, who at that time remained true to the banner of the Opposition. The very fact that Rakovsky was not named as a member of either the main center, or the "parallel" center, or the "reserve" center was in itself the most convincing proof to thoughtful people that none of these centers ever existed. The GPU has now decided to correct its original error. Drobnis has named Rakovsky. The old fighter, broken by life, goes inescapably to meet his fate. (WLT 1936-37 142)

One month later, on February 27, 1937, Trotsky returned to Rakovsky:

A few months after his capitulation, Rakovsky was sent to Japan as a representative of the USSR to the international conference of the Red Cross (which took place at the beginning of 1935, I believe, although it is very easy to find the exact date from the newspapers of the period). It is clear that while Rakovsky was sent to Japan, members of his family were held in Moscow as hostages. Nevertheless, sending Rakovsky abroad so soon after his capitulation produced some surprise at the time. The "friends" of the USSR in England — inspired, of course, by the GPU — used Rakovsky's trip to prove the sincerity of his repentance. Now we can hypothesize with some certainty that the only reason Rakovsky was sent abroad was to better catch him in the toils of the amalgam in preparation. It is quite certain that in the next trial, with Rakovsky participating as the accused, there will be charges of conspiratorial dealings between Rakovsky and the Japanese diplomats and military (under orders from Trotsky, of course). (ibid. 213)

Seven weeks after that, during the "Dewey Commission" hearings on April 15, 1937, Trotsky again returned to the subject of Rakovsky's arrest:

I can say now what it is about. It is the preparation for a new trial. I don't know the concrete circumstances. I know only that Bukharin was sent abroad in 1936, the beginning of 1936, for the factories. He was their agent. He was in Prague, a tourist. Now, I ask myself if it was not with the purpose of preparing with him a new combination. He gave a lecture in Prague, totally in the official spirit. But it is possible they sent him in order to have the possibility to affirm that abroad he entered into communications with Trotskyites and German agents. I don't know, but it is quite possible. The same with Rakovsky. Immediately, he was sent to Japan. I was a bit astonished. What was the meaning of it? It was at the end of 1934, and the British friends of the Soviet Union — the friends of the Soviet Union are everywhere — they are directed by the agents of the GPU, without their knowing; the genuine direction is everywhere in the hands of the GPU. The friends in London declared: "You see, the repentance of Rakovsky is totally sincere. The Government sent him abroad." But his family remained in Moscow, the family of Rakovsky. At that time I was of the opinion that he was sent for demonstrative purposes in order to show the whole world that he was free, his repentance was sincere. Now, I ask myself if it did not have a second purpose, to frame him afterwards — that he was connected with the Japanese military chiefs in the Government, and so forth. (CLT 338-9, 9th session, April 15, 1937)

We can see now that Trotsky was lying in the first passage. In 1980 Trotskyist researcher Pierre Broué discovered that Trotsky was indeed in a bloc with Zinoviev and Kamenev. Trotsky disguised this fact behind vociferous claims that he despised them for their "capitulation" or abandonment of opposition to Stalin and had had nothing to do with them since his exile. The "centers," or leadership collectives for the bloc, existed as well.

Trotsky had made even stronger claims about Radek, a defendant in the second Moscow Trial. Trotsky claimed that he had not and would not have anything to do with Radek because the latter was a "capitulator." He and Radek had even exchanged insults — Radek in articles published in Soviet newspapers in which he attacked Trotsky, and Trotsky in his own articles. Yet we now know that Trotsky was indeed in contact with Radek. Once again, the proclamations of disdain and claims that he had had no contact with the "capitulator" were a smokescreen behind which their collaboration had continued.

In the second quotation written a month later Trotsky made a "prediction":

It is quite certain that in the next trial, with Rakovsky participating as the accused, there will be charges of conspiratorial dealings between Rakovsky and the Japanese diplomats and military (under orders from Trotsky, of course).

Rakovsky was one of the defendants in the third Moscow trial of March 2-15, 1938. As we shall see, Rakovsky did indeed claim exactly what Trotsky "predicted" — that he had been approached by "Japanese military chiefs in the government" "under orders from Trotsky," transmitted indirectly through the Soviet ambassador to Japan Konstantin Konstantinovich IUrenev¹, who Rakovsky claimed had been a Trotskyist since the 1920s.

http://www.hrono.ru/biograf/bio_yu/jurenev_kk.php, <http://www.sakharov-center.ru/asfcd/martirolog/?t=page&id=15808>.

IUrenev was arrested the day after his "face-to-face confrontation" with Rakovsky, who had named him in one of his confession statements. It appears that the NKVD did not know about IUrenev's involvement prior to Rakovsky's naming him. This fact troubles Georgii Cherniavskii, coauthor of the recent (2014) biography of Rakovsky. We shall discuss this work below.

In contrast to Rakovsky, who got a prison sentence, IUrenev was sentenced to death and executed. This difference in treatment may well reflect that fact that Rakovsky confessed to things, and named people, about which the NKVD did not previously know. We discuss these issues later in the present essay.

Whose "Amalgam"?

In his essays about the Kirov murder Trotsky "predicted" that his name would soon appear in Soviet accounts of the investigation, and explained this prediction as follows:

There is only one way to forestall en route the amalgams that are in preparation: Expose the scheme in advance. (Emphasis in original.)²

² The Russian edition, which must be the original, reads: "разоблачить замысел заранее." See Biulleten' Oppozitsii No. 41, Section 12, at <http://web.mit.edu/fjk/www/FI/BO/BO-41.shtml>

Trotsky knew his name would soon appear because he and his Russian followers were in a political bloc with Zinoviev, Kamenev, and their followers. Therefore it was predictable that the Leningrad Zinovievites, arrested in December 1934 for the murder of Sergei Kirov, would name Trotsky, since they had already named their own leaders. So Trotsky's tactic was indeed to "expose the scheme in advance" — except that the "scheme" in question was not Stalin's but his own.

Trotsky claimed that he was being "framed" for complicity in the Kirov murder. In reality he was not being "framed." The Trotskyists, who were in a political bloc with the Zinovievites and Rightists, were thereby at least accessories to Kirov's murder whether or not they knew in advance that their partners in the bloc, the Zinovievites, were planning the assassination. By anticipating the charge against him Trotsky hoped to convince his readers that the charges were obvious lies — so obvious that they were "predictable."³

³ See the sections "Expose the scheme in advance" in Chapters 13, 14, and 15 of Trotsky's "Amalgams."

We have some evidence that Trotsky, through his supporters in the bloc, approved of the plan to murder Kirov. According to Genrikh Iagoda, Avel' Enukidze told him that the Rights (of which he and Iagoda were members) reluctantly "sanctioned" the murder of Kirov by the Zinovievists at the insistence of "the Trotskyist-Zinovievist part of the center [of the conspiracy]." If that is so, then Trotsky knew about the plan for the murder. (Genrikh Iagoda 180; 193)

However, none of the defendants in the Kirov assassination trial or in the first Moscow trial of August 1936, the Zinoviev-Kamenev trial, claimed that the Trotskyists either had prior knowledge of or played any role in the murder. If these defendants' testimony was genuine, and if Trotskyists really had prior knowledge or played a role, the defendants would have had no reason to conceal this fact. If their testimony had been "fabricated" by the prosecution, there was no reason for the NKVD, Vyshinsky, or for that matter Stalin, to refrain from putting into the mouths of the 1936 trial defendants a story that Trotsky and/or his followers were at least accessories, if not outright accomplices, to Kirov's murder. But no such accusations occurred. That leaves this particular issue in doubt.

False capitulations — false declarations of loyalty to the Party in the future — were common among members of the Soviet opposition. In 1990 leading Trotskyist scholar Pierre Broué asserted that "everybody" knew this.

Lev Sedov called the Smirnov group either the "former capitulators" or the "Trotskiite capitulators." Everybody had known, from 1929 on, that people in the Smirnov group had not really capitulated but were trying to fool the apparatus, and were capable of organizing themselves as an Opposition within the party: the fact was so universally known that Andres Nin, the Spaniard deported from the Soviet Union in August 1930, explained it openly to his German comrades of Die permanente Revolution who printed his declaration without apparent problem.⁴

⁴ Broué, Pierre. "Party Opposition to Stalin (1930-1932) and the First Moscow Trial." In John W. Strong, ed. Essays on Revolutionary Culture and Stalinism. Columbus, OH: Slavica Publishers, 1990, pp. 98-111, at p. 104. Broué had a lapse of memory here. In a later and more detailed article Broué says that Nin's article was published in "l'organe de l'Opposition de gauche allemande, Der Kommunist, du début novembre 1930." (Broué, "Ivan Nikitich Smirnov. Une conscience communiste (1881-1936)." CahLT 60 (1997) 44.

Therefore the fact that Rakovsky had openly "capitulated" is no reason to believe that this "capitulation" was genuine. Rakovsky was probably telling the truth when he testified that he had remained a loyal Trotskyist all along, that his "capitulation" was dishonest.

... in February 1934, I sent a telegram to the Central Committee of the C.P.S.U., saying that I had completely disarmed myself both ideologically and organizationally and asked to be reinstated in the Party. This telegram was insincere, I was lying.⁵

We can be reasonably confident that this part of Rakovsky's testimony at the third Moscow trial was truthful: that he had lied when he claimed that he had capitulated and that he had "completely disarmed" himself. But we would like to know more.

Were Rakovsky's dramatic confessions of having been a Japanese spy on Trotsky's behalf true or not? Whose false story or "amalgam" is in play here? Did "Stalin" — really the Soviet prosecution — invent the story of Rakovsky's connivance with the Japanese, including Trotsky's own conspiring with them, and then force Rakovsky to mouth lies? Or was it Trotsky who was lying when he claimed that this story was an "amalgam," another of "Stalin's" fabrications? The evidentiary issues that face us when we address this question are the subject of the present chapter.

Moscow Trial Testimony

In anticommunist and Trotskyist writing Moscow Trial testimony is routinely dismissed out of hand as worthless for evidentiary purposes. When a reason is given, it is normally that the testimony either was, or might have been, invented by the prosecution and the defendants were forced to repeat it.

The claim that the testimony "might have been" fabricated and therefore untruthful is an interesting one. It logically leaves open the possibility that it "might not" have been fabricated. And that suggests that the testimony ought to be evaluated in some way to determine whether it had been fabricated or not. However, in practice this is not done. The testimony is disregarded on the naive basis that if it "might" be fabricated then it is useless as historical evidence.

This reasoning is invalid. All testimony given by persons under arrest, or even by persons detained by police, anywhere, is in some sense given "under threat" or "under compulsion," since normally the persons giving this testimony would not be giving it if they had not been under police detention, which is itself a threat — of further detention or worse. Even testimony that is apparently voluntarily and freely given — say, by a person whom the police were not seeking and who had no reason to think the police might seek him or her in future — might have been fabricated by the witness him/herself for some reason, or simply misremembered.

Even the probability that evidence will be far from reliable does not normally disqualify its use in court. For example, many studies have confirmed that eyewitness testimony is notoriously unreliable under any circumstances, even when offered completely voluntarily. But no court would simply disregard it.

Testimony given by persons under arrest, by persons detained by police, and by persons not detained but merely questioned by police, by persons who volunteer their testimony (for example, by walking into a police station and offering to make a statement), eyewitness testimony — all these forms of testimony are normally subjected to various tests in an attempt to assess their validity.

This means that it is incorrect to simply reject the testimony, either pre-trial or at trial, of defendants in the Moscow trials. Rather, we need to subject this testimony to verification or invalidation.

The most obvious method is that of independent verification. We can study the testimony carefully to see whether we have independent evidence, either from within the USSR or from beyond its borders that can corroborate or disprove it.

I have not found any scholarship that undertakes independent verification — proof or disproof — of Moscow trial testimony. This fact can't be explained by any lack of independent corroborating evidence — there is a lot of it. In previous essays, and in other chapters in this book, we have cited a good deal of such evidence. Examples include the following:

* For decades Trotsky, Khrushchev-era, Gorbachev-era, Western academic scholarship, and Trotskyist writers, dismissed the allegation made at the Moscow trials that a "bloc of Rights and Trotskyites" existed. The bloc was declared to be part of a "Stalinist" frame-up. But in 1980 evidence found by Trotskyist scholar Pierre Broué in the Trotsky archive at Harvard proved that this bloc did indeed exist and that it had been formed in 1932, the same year that testimony at several of the Moscow trials claimed.

* A number of the statements made in their testimony by Moscow trial defendants about Trotsky and which Trotsky vehemently denied can also now be verified. For example, in another chapter of this book we discuss how we can now verify Karl Radek's claim that he received a letter from Trotsky in late February or early March of 1932 by means of evidence from the Harvard Trotsky archive.

* NKVD General Genrikh Samoilovich Liushkov, who defected to the Japanese in July 1938, privately told his Japanese military handlers that Aleksei Rykov, one of the chief defendants at the recent (March 1938) Moscow trial, really had been conspiring with military men against the Soviet regime.

* Liushkov also privately told the Japanese about military conspiracies that really existed, and named a number of Party leaders who had been implicated in these conspiracies. Some of these Party figure and military men had been named by Moscow trials defendants.⁶

⁶ See Grover Furr, The Murder of Sergei Kirov. History, Scholarship and the Anti-Stalin Paradigm. Kettering, OH: Erythrós Press and Media, LLC, 2013, Chapter 17.

* In February 1937 an official of the German Foreign Ministry told a Czech diplomat that Hitler was expecting a military seizure of power in the USSR which would result in a military dictatorship favorable to relations with Germany. This confirms testimony at the 1938 Moscow trial testimony, as well as the testimony by accused Soviet generals which they made under arrest in May and June 1937 and at their closed trial of June 11, 1937, that they had been secretly in league with the German military.

* Jules Humbert-Droz, a close associate of Bukharin's, revealed in memoirs published in Switzerland in 1971 that in 1928 Bukharin had told him that he and his supporters were planning to assassinate Stalin.⁷

We can also check some assertions made at the Moscow trials against information from within the Soviet Union in cases where it is highly unlikely that the confirmation is the result of fabrication. Examples include the following:

* Testimony by defendants before and at the trial of the eight military commanders accused of co-conspiracy with some of the defendants at the Moscow trials and of collaboration with Germany confirms Trotsky's collaboration with Germany as well. This testimony was made to a secret court and it remains secret in Russia today. We know about it only because it was sent out of Russia before his death by General Dmitrii Volkogonov, who had carte blanche access to secret Soviet archives.⁸

⁸ See Furr and Bobrov, "Marshal S.M. Budiennyi on the Tukhachevsky Trial. Impressions of an Eye-Witness." (in Russian). Klio (St Petersburg) No. 2 (2012), pp. 8-24. At https://msuweb.montclair.edu/~furrgr/research/budennyi_klio12.pdf

There is no evidence of any scenario according to which even this top-secret testimony was fabricated so as to confirm accusations at the Moscow trials. Moreover, the guilt of these military commanders is confirmed in a general way by Liushkov's private statements to his Japanese handlers, where the Soviet NKVD general asserted that real conspiracies among Soviet military leaders did exist.

* Grigory Zinoviev, under arrest and interrogation in July 1936, admitted continuing opposition to the Stalin regime but refused to admit to any criminal activity until finally confronted by one of his supporters in a confession that remains secret to this day but which American scholar J. Arch Getty was permitted to read.

Three days later [July 26, 1936] Zinoviev was confronted by one of his followers, [N.A.] Karev, who directly accused him. Zinoviev asked that the interrogation be stopped because he wanted to make a statement that, in the event, amounted to a full confession of organizing assassination and terror. (Getty, Yezhov, 191)

The confession mentioned by Getty came just two days before Zinoviev's confession of July 28, 1936, still secret in Russia but available in the Volkogonov Papers. We have obtained a copy of this confession.⁹

⁹ See Furr, The Murder of Sergei Kirov, 228-235.

* Zinoviev used the phrase "I am no longer an enemy" in a letter he sent before trial from prison, asking for leniency, and again in his appeal of his death sentence.¹⁰

¹⁰ See "O Tak Nazyyvaemom 'Antisovetskom Ob"edinennom Trotskistsko-Zinov'evskom Tsentre". Izvestiia TsK KPSS 8 (1989), p. 89 col. 2 (same text in RKEB 184); "Rasskaz o desiati rasstrel'nykh" ("A Story of Ten Who Were Shot"), Izvestiia September 2, 1992, p. 3 col. 1.

* A number of high-profile defendants such as Nikolai Bukharin and Genrikh Iagoda vigorously rejected some of the charges made against them by Soviet prosecutor Vyshinskii at trial. Most of Bukharin's testimony is devoted to rejecting accusations against him.

At the same time Bukharin admitted to other serious crimes without any attempt to deny them.¹¹

¹¹ For a detailed discussion of this point see Furr and Bobrov, "Stephen Cohen's Biography of Bukharin."

Iagoda refused repeatedly to admit to being an accomplice to the murder of Sergei Kirov while admitting to being what in Anglo-American jurisprudence is called an accessory to it. Iagoda insisted that he knew something was going to happen and took no steps to stop it, but was not informed in advance exactly what kind of attempt would be made to murder Kirov, when, or by whom. When the eventual assassin, Leonid Nikolaev, was detained near Kirov's home with a pistol and notes indicating he was shadowing Kirov, Iagoda's men followed his instructions and released Nikolaev. When informed of this Iagoda approved.¹²

¹² See the full discussion of this point in Furr, Murder of Sergei Kirov, Chapter 15.

This kind of vigorous, prolonged, emphatic rejection of one of the Prosecutor's central charges is inconsistent with any hypothesis that Bukharin and Iagoda confessed out of fear of torture, to spare their families, or because they had been promised leniency for a false confession.

* We now have appeals of death sentences from many of the defendants at all three Moscow trials. In every one of them the defendants insist that they are guilty. Some of these appeals were published under Gorbachev, who was in the middle of an intense campaign to blame Stalin and the Stalin-era Soviet leadership of frame-ups in all the trials. Many others were published in 2013 under the auspices of the intensely anti-Stalin "Memorial Society." If any of the defendants had appealed for clemency on grounds other than guilt and repentance — for example, on grounds that they had pled guilty in return for some promise or other (not to be executed, to spare their families, etc.) — Gorbachev and the "Memorial Society" would certainly have published them.¹³

¹³ See the sources cited in n. 11 above.

* On June 20, 1937, Stalin was handed a telegram that Trotsky had sent from Mexico to the Executive Committee of the Supreme Soviet concerning his willingness to return to the USSR under certain circumstances. On it Stalin wrote that Trotsky was a "spy of Hitler" and handed the telegram on to two of his associates, who concurred. This is evidence that Stalin believed Trotsky was guilty of conspiring with Germany. It is not compatible with a theory that Stalin, through the NKVD, had compelled any of those who, like the military commanders, had testified to this, to testify falsely. We have examined this document in an earlier chapter.

* A confession date April 11, 1939, by Mikhail Frinovskii, former assistant commissar of the NKVD under Nikolai Ezhov, has been quoted as genuine many times by Soviet and Russian officials. When the full text of Frinovskii's confession was published in 2006 it turned out that sections of the confession that had always previously been omitted confirm the guilt of a number of the major defendants at the Moscow trials. Later in the present chapter we will return to Frinovskii's confession and its implications.¹⁴

It would appear virtually impossible that all this mutually corroboratory circumstantial evidence and more like it was carefully scripted and coordinated by "Stalin" — really the NKVD and prosecution — in advance, and all the defendants, while innocent of any crimes, were forced to rehearse it until their "performances" were virtually seamless and convincing and that this massively coordinated forgery left no traces. A far more likely hypothesis, albeit one that sharply contradicts the mainstream anti-Stalin paradigm, is that the defendants really were guilty of at least those crimes to which they pleaded guilty though not necessarily to everything the prosecution accused them of.

In light of all this confirmation of statements made by Moscow trials defendants, the only hypothesis concerning the statements of both the defendants and the prosecution at the Moscow trials that is supported by evidence is that these statements are genuine — meaning that they originated from the persons who made them and from the events they described. At the same time, the prosecution's charges too are statements the prosecution believed to be truthful.

The confessions and other assertions made by the defendants either are statements that they believed were truthful or are falsehoods that the defendants chose to make, but are not fabrications by the prosecution. We do know that the defendants sometimes chose to make statements that were false in order to mislead the prosecution and the state.

Here are some examples:

* At the January 1937 trial Karl Radek claimed that he knew Marshal Tukhachevsky to be completely loyal to the USSR. This was not true, and Nikolai Bukharin, who collaborated with Radek, knew that it was not true. Radek probably also knew about Tukhachevsky's participation in the Right-

Trotskyist conspiracy but concealed it, no doubt in the hope that the military conspiracy would be successful.¹⁵

¹⁵ See Report of Court Proceedings in the Case of the Anti-Soviet Trotskyite Centre. Heard Before the Military Collegium of the Supreme Court of the U.S.S.R., Moscow, January 23-30, 1937 ...Verbatim Report. Moscow: People's Commissariat of Justice of the U.S.S.R, 1937. (1937 Trial), p. 146. This passage is not present in the shorter Russian language transcript.

* At the August 1936 Moscow trial Zinoviev and Kamenev failed to identify Genrikh Iagoda, chief (People's Commissar) of the NKVD, as a member of the network of conspiracies. In 1937, in pretrial testimony that was never intended to be made public, Iagoda confessed that he had told Zinoviev and Kamenev that they would not be executed and then made certain that they were indeed executed so as to prevent them from "saying too much" — admitting his own participation in the conspiracy.¹⁶

* Likewise, Frinovskii's statement makes it clear that Zinoviev and Kamenev knew at least about Iagoda's involvement in the Zinovievite-Right-Trotskyist conspiracy and did not reveal this during the trial.¹⁷

¹⁷ Frinovskii, 40.

* The statement of Mikhail Frinovskii reveals that Ezhov had induced Genrikh Iagoda to confess to attempting to poison Ezhov with mercury but that this confession was false. The fiction that he himself had been one of the targets of the network of conspiracies was useful to Ezhov in disguising the fact that he himself was a party to these conspiracies. Iagoda agreed to make this false confession in hopes that Ezhov would prevent his execution.¹⁸

¹⁸ Frinovskii, 48.

* Nikolai Bukharin repeatedly said that he had confessed to everything. Yet we know that he did not. He never confessed that he had been plotting to murder Stalin as early as 1928. We know this is true thanks to Humbert-Droz's memoirs.

* Bukharin and other defendants at the March 1938 trial never revealed that Nikolai Ezhov, then chief (People's Commissar) of the NKVD, was also a part of the opposition conspiracy. Mikhail Frinovskii revealed this in his confession statement of April 11, 1939.¹⁹ We will discuss this statement in more detail below. Ezhov too made extensive confessions about his conspiracy, some of which have been published.²⁰

¹⁹ Frinovskii, 47-48.

Thus there is a great deal of corroborative evidence both from within the USSR and from beyond Soviet influence that confirms the essential reliability as evidence of the defendants' confessions at the Moscow trials. We refer the interested reader to Part One of the first volume of this study, Trotsky's 'Amalgams,' which is an exhaustive verification of many of the accusations to which Moscow Trials defendants confessed.

Therefore it is more reasonable to proceed on the assumption that even confession statements that we cannot at present verify independently represent what the defendants chose to say rather than lies concocted by the prosecution — even if we hold such statements aside for future confirmation.

Another Method of Verification

We have reviewed the results of verifying the statements of Moscow trials defendants by checking them against independent evidence from both outside and within the USSR. This is the more obvious and traditional method of verifying evidence and the most reliable one.

With the release of much documentation from former Soviet archives we now have another way to check the Moscow trials testimony. We can study the attempts made during Khrushchev's and Gorbachev's time to prove that the trials were frame-ups and the defendants innocent of the charges against them. We will devote the rest of this essay to reviewing these attempts, with special attention to Rakovsky.

Khrushchev

For reasons that he never disclosed Khrushchev organized a serious and long-term campaign to disparage Stalin. This effort was first announced in Khrushchev's infamous "Secret Speech" to the 20th Party Congress on February 25, 1956.

One aspect of this campaign was to attempt to prove that the defendants at the Moscow trials, along with many other defendants at non-public trials, were innocent, framed by Stalin and his subordinates. Evidence from former Soviet archives now reveals that Khrushchev's attempt to frame Stalin preceded the "Secret Speech" and continued until Khrushchev was removed from power in 1964. Such attempts then stopped until 1987, when they resumed under Mikhail Gorbachev. Judging from the considerable documentation now available Gorbachev's associates appear to have studied and mined what Khrushchev's associates had done and also to have done some research on their own.

The reports composed by Khrushchev's and Gorbachev's associates are important in that they represent an attempt to prove that the Moscow trials were frame-ups and the defendants forced to make false confessions. As far as we can tell these reports were all fraudulent. Neither Khrushchev's nor Gorbachev's associates were able to find any evidence that any of the Moscow trials defendants were "framed," forced to falsely confess to the charges against them.²¹

The report that began this long trail of falsehoods, Khrushchev's "Secret Speech," was also entirely a fabrication. All of the charges that Khrushchev made in it against both Stalin and Beria have been proven to be false.²²

²¹ Iagoda's false confession to an attempt to poison Ezhov is a special case, though not one in which he was coerced to lie by the prosecution. For one thing, there's no evidence that Iagoda was forced to confess to this. Furthermore, it seems he did so at Ezhov's suggestion, in the hope that this would save him (Iagoda) from execution, but Ezhov double-crossed him. Second, this fabrication was of course known to Ezhov's men at the time and was disclosed by Frinovskii in April 1939. It is not a discovery by Khrushchev or Gorbachev and does not change our conclusion that the defendants testified as they chose — whether or not their testimony was the truth as they understood it.

Serov's Report of July 7, 1956

Western anticommunist scholars and Trotskyists routinely dismiss the defendants' testimony at the Moscow trials. But Soviet anti-Stalinists never did this. On the contrary, under Khrushchev and later under Gorbachev, Soviet leaders organized major research efforts to attempt to prove that the trials were frame-ups and the defendants innocent. These were substantial undertakings, for the Soviet leadership had everything at their disposal: all the investigation materials on all defendants. Teams of researchers were employed to comb the archives, collect, and study the materials and draft the reports. Most of the materials the Soviet investigators reviewed are still top secret in Russia today, unavailable to researchers.

The post-Soviet Russian government takes the same position that the Gorbachev government took — that all the trial testimonies were fabrications and all of the defendants innocent. Consequently there is no reason to doubt that any evidence that can be used to support this preconceived notion has been made public.

This effort began with Khrushchev. On April 13, 1956, not long after the "Secret Speech" Khrushchev appointed a special commission to be chaired by Viacheslav M. Molotov. Although he had voted in favor of Khrushchev's "Secret Speech" Molotov was known to be a Stalin supporter. The Commission's membership included the "Stalinists" Molotov, Voroshilov, and Kaganovich but the majority were Khrushchev supporters: Suslov, Furtseva, Shvernik, Aristov, Pospelov, and Rudenko.²³

The commission was charged to "study the materials of the public trials in the case of Bukharin, Rykov, Zinoviev, Tukhachevsky, and others." A number of the reports of this commission were published in 2003.

Serov's Reports

The July 7, 1956, report of Ivan A. Serov, head of the KGB, was published in 2013. This report remains the most comprehensive attempt known to prove that the defendants in the March 1938 Moscow trial were innocent. We will review this report here in some detail.

In 2010 Matthew Lenoë revealed that Serov had lied to the Molotov Commission in another report. Lenoë concluded that Serov did so at Khrushchev's request, in order to support Khrushchev's contention that Kirov had not been murdered by a clandestine group of Zinovievites but either at Stalin's own orders or by a "lone gunman."

Here is my discussion in The Murder of Sergei Kirov of Lenoë's account of Serov's falsification (all bolding and italics in my original):

Early in his book Lenoë explains how Khrushchev's men set out to "incriminate Stalin " (7) — in plain language, to frame him.

The 1960-1961 investigation run by the Party Control Committee (KPK) was aimed explicitly at inculcating Stalin in the Kirov murder.

To understand the positions that Serov and the USSR prosecutor's office took in their memoranda, it is necessary to see precisely what was at stake in the deliberations of the Molotov commission. The commission was charged with investigating the show trials of the later 1930s and determining whether the charges were valid. The Kirov murder and the trials of the "Leningrad Center" and "Moscow Center" that immediately followed were just the starting point of the inquiry, but everything that followed depended on these events. If the official charges in the first two trials — that former Zinoviev supporters / 592 / had conspired to murder Kirov — were entirely bogus, then the indictments in all of the succeeding show trials collapsed. The latter indictments were built on the earlier ones, albeit in a confused and illogical way. But if there was some truth to the charge that Zinovievites conspired to kill Kirov, then that preserved the possibility of arguing that the later charges were also valid, at least in part. Therefore Serov and Rudenko (or their subordinates who authored the memoranda) chose to make a clear-cut argument that Nikolaev had had no relationship at all with the ex-Zinoviev supporters convicted in the trial of the "Leningrad Center."

It appears that Serov or his boss had thought through this strategy, to deny any connection at all between Nikolaev and the Zinovievites, even before the "Secret Speech." On January 27, 1956 the KGB destroyed central records on the case file "Svoiak," the all-union surveillance operation against the Zinovievites. It seems likely that "Svoiak" contained more evidence than Serov wanted Molotov to see, either of counterrevolutionary talk among former Zinovievites and/or of Nikolaev's connections with the accused in the "Leningrad Center." Serov concealed other evidence of connections between Nikolaev and the ex-Zinovievites Kotolynov, Antonov, and Shatsky. The excerpts from Nikolaev's diaries that he released to the Molotov commission in April 1956 contained no references to these men. But we know from later releases of data that Nikolaev did mention all three in his diaries. (Lenoe 591-2.)

I have put in plain boldface above the passage in which Lenoe outlines the importance of the Kirov case for anyone wanting to understand the rest of the Moscow "show trials." Obviously, Khrushchev and his men realized that by the evidence available in the archives, these trials and the conspiracies detailed at them did not appear to have been faked. It was they themselves who would have to fake: falsify, withhold and destroy evidence, in order to build a case that these conspiracies did not take place. I have put in italic boldface the passages where Lenoe summarizes some of the falsifications that Serov, Khrushchev's man, accomplished in order to try to convince the Molotov Commission that Nikolaev was not linked to the clandestine Zinovievite conspirators. (164-5)

²⁴ Furr, Kirov 166.

Lenoe ignores, or is ignorant of, the fact that Khrushchev's "Secret Speech" was entirely falsified. But Lenoe did discover that Serov, undoubtedly acting on Khrushchev's orders, set about falsifying the reopening of the Kirov murder case by destroying evidence in January 1956, before Khrushchev's "Secret Speech." What's more, as Lenoe astutely remarks, the falsification of the Kirov murder was done in the service of falsifying the reviews of the later Moscow trials, all of which were linked to the Kirov murder.

Since Serov lied to the Molotov Commission about the Kirov murder in the service of trying to fraudulently argue that the defendants in the Moscow trials were innocent, we might suspect that Serov also lied about the March 1938 Moscow trial. In this chapter we will show that this is the case.

Serov's July 7, 1956, Report

We will not cite every bit of evidence that Serov's report of July 7, 1956, is fraudulent. Instead, we'll give details on a few important instances of Serov's falsification. Then we will proceed to study in detail Serov's attempt to prove that Rakovsky was innocent. To make it easier for readers to follow our critique we'll go through Serov's report page by page rather than by grouping Serov's falsifications in categories. All translations from Serov's report are by the present author.

As can be seen from the materials of the case, before the arrests of BUKHARIN N.I., RYKOV A.I., KRESTINSKII N.N. and others, the organs of the NKVD and of the USSR Prosecutor's Office did not possess any verified facts on organized activities of these individuals and on the existence of a so-called "Bloc of Rights and Trotskyites." (833)

This is false. By February 27, 1937, the day Bukharin was arrested during the February-March 1937 Central Committee Plenum there was a great deal of evidence against him. There had been at least two face-to-face confrontations with accusers — Piatakov and Astrov.²⁵ A great many others had accused Bukharin — he received 20 such on one day alone, February 16, 1937, as he said himself at the Plenum:

On February 16 at 6:30 in the evening I received 20 different confessions...²⁶

²⁶ Voprosy Istorii, 2-3 (1992), 30. This is Bukharin's opening statement at the February-March 1937 C.C. Plenum. Bukharin enumerates a large amount of the testimony against him at that point.

In this report Serov claims no fewer than 17 times that persons convicted and executed who had inculpated trial defendants in their confessions had already been "rehabilitated." Khrushchev referred to rehabilitations in the "Secret Speech." Few of these rehabilitation reports have been published. The present author studied the rehabilitation reports that had been published as of 2006 in Chapter 11 of Khrushchev Lied. All of them are dishonest

"whitewash" jobs. Not a single one of them proves the innocence of anybody.

In Chapter 2 of our Russian-language book 1937. Pravosudie Stalina (2010) my colleague Vladimir L. Bobrov and I published an analysis of the 1988 Rehabilitation report on Bukharin and the other defendants in the March 1938 Moscow trial, together with the evidence that this "rehabilitation" by the Soviet Supreme Court is indeed deliberately fraudulent. We will refer to it here when we consider Mikhail Frinovskii's confession of April 11, 1939, which also figures in Serov's report.

None of the rehabilitation reports yet published disproves the guilt of the person "rehabilitated." Khrushchev and, later, Gorbachev had access to all the investigation and trial materials. The fact that their researchers could not cite any evidence to exculpate any of the defendants at any of the Moscow trials means that they could not find any such evidence. Therefore, they were forced to lie.

On page 836 of Serov's report we read:

All the accused convicted in the present case pleaded guilty to the charges against them.

This is an example of "weasel words" an equivocal statement intended to give a different impression than what the words literally mean. Bukharin did plead guilty of "the charges against him" (1938 Trial, 36). But the charges in the Indictment were not brought specifically against any individual. Instead they were brought against the bloc of Rights and Trotskyites as a group (34-35).

The accused, including Bukharin, pleaded guilty on the understanding that they were all guilty of all of the acts of the bloc whether they knew about all of them or not. However, during the trial Bukharin spent a great deal of time denying certain other specific accusations that the Prosecutor tried to convict him of.²⁷

Era 'Revelations'." Cultural Logic 2010. At <https://ojs.library.ubc.ca/index.php/clogic/article/view/191531/188643>.

Serov claimed that an "agent" was kept in defendant S.A. Bessonov's cell where he heard Bessonov denounce the trial as a frame-up (838):

On May 6, 1939 / Agent "Blagin" /, who was confined with BESSONOV in Solovki prison, reported that BESSONOV responded about the trial of "anti-Soviet bloc of Rights and Trotskyites" as follows:

"The whole trial is a complete invention of the NKVD. In reality none of the accused committed any crimes..." (arch. case number 101492, Vol. 1 l.d. 27)

On April 29, 1939 / agent "Grachev" / wrote about the same subject: "Describing the trial as a "farce," prisoner BESSONOV said that everything that the accused said at the trial was coerced testimony and in fact none of them had plotted anything against Soviet power." (ibid., vol. 1, l.d. 22)

This has to be a lie. How could Bessonov know about everything that all the other defendants had done? Bukharin accepted guilt for the activities of the bloc in which he participated but claimed that he did not know everything the bloc did. Bessonov could not have known either. So if Bessonov did say this, he was deliberately lying; if he did not say it, either Serov was lying or he credulously believed and repeated something he was told by alleged agents "Blagin" and "Grachev." No matter where the gap between truth and falsehood occurred, it had to have occurred somewhere.

Serov gives no explanation as to why "agents" — evidently two different agents within a few days of one another — were being kept in Bessonov's cell after the trial, while he was serving his sentence. We will see later on that Serov was demonstrably lying when he made a similar claim about Rakovsky.

Serov made the following claim (840-841):

Another prosecution witness, speaking at the trial in the case of the anti-Soviet bloc, former member of the Central Committee of the "Left" SRs KAMKOV B.D. according to the testimony of the arrested BRIUKHANOV, held together with him in the same cell, said to him:

"All three of the recent trials are the same kind of swindle as the previous ones. There is not a drop of truth in them. Neither ZINOVIEV nor BUKHARIN was involved in any counter-revolutionary conspiratorial work. Espionage, diversion, sabotage, terrorism, killing — this is all a complete sham, fabricated by the NKVD. Confessions were extracted from the accused by torture, blackmail, beatings, threats, threats against their families, the arrests of their wives etc. by means of physical and mental pressure. At the same time they used bribery, appeasing the defendants, promises not to execute them, etc..." (arch. case number 967389, separate packet).

This is false. Thanks to Pierre Broué's research in the Harvard Trotsky archive in 1980 we know that both Zinoviev and Bukharin were indeed involved in "counter-revolutionary conspiratorial work" the bloc of Zinovievists, Trotskyists, Rightists, and other oppositionists that was formed in 1932. From Jules Humbert-Droz's memoirs we know that Bukharin and some of his followers were plotting to murder Stalin as early as 1928.

What's more, Kamkov could not possibly know whether Zinoviev or Bukharin had been involved in a conspiracy or not, because no one ever claimed that Kamkov was a part of it, so he could not have known about it. Kamkov's only connection to the 1938 Moscow trial was that he had had some conspiratorial talks with Bukharin in 1918, twenty years earlier. So if Kamkov really said this, he was lying. Most likely, though, this is another of Serov's fabrications.

Serov:

While BUKHARIN was in custody the prisoner ZARITSKII N.D. had been in the same cell and when questioned on July 3, 1956, testified:

"I spent 4-5 months with BUKHARIN before he was executed...

During the investigation, and especially during the trial, BUKHARIN expressed indignation at the injustice of the accusations against him.... He also told me that he had good personal relations with STALIN, that in a number of instances STALIN had given him and his family assistance in domestic matters, and therefore he never could even think of murdering him. (841)

If Bukharin said this to Zaritskii he was lying. We know he was involved in a conspiracy to kill Stalin by 1928 at the latest, as he told Humbert-Droz. But given Serov's other proven lies (for more, see below) we have no reason to accept this Zaritskii quote as genuine. Serov claims several times that a defendant's guilt is not "confirmed" because the defendant did not confess. For example, about Karakhan:

According to RYKOV'S testimony KARAKHAN, allegedly a member of an organization of Rights, held talks on TOMSKII's instructions with representatives of fascist Germany, to whom he made it clear that in the event the bloc of Rights and Trotskyites came to power certain concessions would be made in favor of the capitalist countries.

These confessions of RYKOV'S too have not been confirmed since KARAKHAN, brought to trial in 1937, refused to confess to any of the charges. (842)

Serov is the one lying here. A confession of Karakhan's has been published.²⁸ Moreover, just as confession of guilt is not firm proof of guilt, so a fortiori failure to confess guilt would, if genuine, not be evidence of innocence. Normally we expect that both the innocent and the guilty will usually claim innocence.

²⁸ Lubianka 1937-38 No. 102; online at <http://istmat.info/node/31227>

It might be the case that Karakhan refused to confirm his confessions at his trial. If so, this would be good evidence that he was not "pressured" in the various ways Serov claimed that others were pressured. It would not be evidence of innocence, but an attempt to force the prosecution to prove its case with other evidence.

Serov is almost certainly lying again, as he does in the case of Piatakov (see below). Ovsianikov names both Karakhan and Krestinskii in his confession.²⁹

²⁹ Lubianka 1937-38 No. 228; online at <http://istmat.info/node/32387>

Concerning Dr. D.D. Pletnev, one of the defendants at the March 1938 Moscow trial who was sentenced to prison rather than to execution, Serov states the following:

PLETNEV, who during the investigation and at trial admitted his guilt in the organization of killing A.M. GOR'KII and V.V. KUIBYSHEV on the instruction of IAGODA, after the conviction on June 11, 1939 addressed the following statement to Comrade V.M. Molotov:

"I was sentenced in the Bukharin case. During the investigation I admitted the accusations against me, and at trial I did not renounce them. I was slandered...." (846)

This is false. At trial Pletnev pleaded guilty but did indeed renounce his guilty plea and claimed that he had not taken part in any of the murders. But under questioning by Vyshinskii Pletnev conceded that he had failed to inform the authorities once Iagoda had been removed from office even though he had a year to do so.

VYSHINSKY: Why did you not refuse to be implicated in this criminal plan?

PLETNEV: There were threats on the part of Yagoda directed against me.

VYSHINSKY: Why did you attach such serious importance to Yagoda's threats?

PLETNEV: After all, he was People's Commissar of Internal Affairs.

VYSHINSKY: Well, and when he was People's Commissar no longer, what restrained you then from coming to the appropriate bodies and performing your duty as a citizen?

PLETNEV: I considered the question finished, dead.

VYSHINSKY: Dead are your victims, but the question is still alive.

PLETNEV: Now I see that it is alive.

KOMMODOV: Would your anti-Soviet sentiments be sufficient in themselves to prompt you to commit a crime in connection with your work, if there had not been Yagoda's instructions?

PLETNEV: Under no circumstances. (1938 Trial, 594, 596)

In its sentence the court accepted his claim that he had agreed to help in the maltreatment of Gorky because he had been threatened by Iagoda, chief (People's Commissar) of the NKVD. The court agreed that Pletnev had not taken part in any killing but had been a part of the conspiracy and had not informed on it when he had had the chance to do so.

PLETNEV, Dmitry Dmitrievich, as not having directly taken an active part in the causing of death of Comrades V. V. Kuibyshev and A. M. Gorky, although he was an accessory... (1938 Trial, 799).

According to Serov, Pletnev claimed that he had always been loyal to the USSR:

All my life since October of 1917 I have been loyal to the Soviet regime and under the leadership of the party have given all my strength and knowledge to my homeland. (846)

Serov is lying again. At the trial Pletnev confessed that he had been a member of the Cadet Party (K-D — Constitutional Democratic Party), an intensely anticommunist party. This has been confirmed by V.D. Topolianskii, who has published a series of articles to "rehabilitate" Pletnev's reputation.³⁰

³⁰ "Firm democratic convictions characteristic of the Russian intelligentsia of the end of the 19th and beginning of the 20th centuries, and an inexhaustible drive to serve their country brought ... D.D. Pletnev to the ... Constitutional-Democratic Party." — "Doctor D.D. Pletnev." In Prepsstrovannaia nauka. Spb.: 'Nauka' 1991, p. 307.

Pletnev's appeal for a more lenient sentence has now been published. Rather than claim innocence, in it he admits his guilt once again.

I have confessed my full guilt of the accusation against me. My deportment during the investigation and at the trial are testimony to this.

I ask the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet to mitigate the sentence imposed upon me. (Protsess Bukharina 2013, 749-50)

Serov wrote:

Questioned as a witness former NKVD man LERNER, who was involved in the investigation of this case, said the following in an interrogation in July 1956:

"I did not lead the investigation of the IAGODA case to its conclusion, the last 6-8 months I was doing other things and had no relationship with the investigation of the case. (856)

This is a lie, either by Lerner or Serov. Lerner signed the interrogation of Iagoda dated December 28, 1937, and the two face-to-face confrontations between Iagoda and Kriuchkov and between Iagoda and Pletnev, both dated January 5, 1938, less than two months before the trial began.³¹ So if Lerner, in fact, made the statement, he was lying, and either Serov did not care that Lerner was lying, or he himself was lying. Either way, Molotov would never know.

It is easy to imagine that former NKVD man Lerner wanted to place himself as far away from the investigation as possible. We discuss this matter later.

Serov's report is dated July 7, 1956. Therefore Lerner had — supposedly — made this statement only a few days earlier. If so, he probably made it expressly for Serov's report. If so, Lerner must have been persuaded to lie so his testimony would be helpful to Serov's attempt to "prove" all the trial defendants were innocent. This provable lie attributed to Lerner is good circumstantial evidence that the other NKVD men and "agents" quoted by Serov were also lying.

At the end of his report Serov claimed to the Commission that the published transcript of the 1938 Moscow had been falsified.

During the interrogation of IAGODA at the trial the question of his guilt in the murder of KUIBYSHEV was not at all explained, as can be seen from the transcript.

However, the transcript was filled out as follows: "VYSHINSKII. Do you plead guilty in the organization of the murder of KUIBYSHEV?

IAGODA. I do." (857)

In fact, Iagoda had confessed to this in pretrial interrogations.

IAGODA: Yes, I have hidden things. But now there's no point in my hiding anything.

I admit that in addition to Max, V.R. Menzhinskii, V.V. Kuibyshev, and A.M. Gor'kii were also killed in the same manner by my order.

I ask that you record that, if I am the only person to blame in Menzhinskii's death, the deaths of V.V. Kuibyshev and A.M. Gor'kii were organized on the direct command of the unified center of the Right-Trotskyist organization, which (order) was given personally to me by A.S. Enukidze, a member of this center. (Genrikh Iagoda, 210)

In a good example of "bias by omission" Serov hid this fact from the Molotov Commission.

Serov's Report and Frinovskii's Confession Statement of April 11, 1939

Mikhail Frinovskii, Ezhov's second-in-command in the NKVD until removed in late 1938, made an important confession statement on April 11, 1939. It is not an interrogation but a letter to Lavrentii Beria, the head (People's Commissar) for Internal Affairs who had replaced Ezhov in November 1938. In August 1938 Beria had been appointed Ezhov's second-in-command. This was a signal that the Politburo knew something was wrong at the NKVD and no longer trusted Ezhov.

The difference between letters of confession and interrogations is an interesting one. Letters such as Frinovskii's appear to have been a suspect's attempt to "get out in front of" the investigation. The idea was evidently to volunteer information that the prosecution did not know, thus demonstrating one's sincerity. Confessions dragged out of a suspect through interrogations or face-to-face confrontations with other accusers merely demonstrated that the suspect in question had not yet "disarmed" and would only confess to crimes when further denial was useless.

Frinovskii's letter has been repeatedly and dishonestly quoted in various Soviet documents in attempts to prove that the Moscow trials defendants were innocent but forced to falsely confess. In this letter, the full text of which was not published until 2006, Frinovskii actually testifies to the guilt, not the innocence, of the Moscow trial defendants. Serov carefully omits those parts of Frinovskii's statement and edits the rest to make it appear as though the opposite was the case.

Clearly the Molotov Commission did not have the actual text of Frinovskii's confession. A glance at it would have refuted Serov's, and therefore Khrushchev's, whole case. In the following section we will quote the passages from Frinovskii's confession that Serov quotes, and then the passages Serov omits in which Frinovskii reveals that the defendants were in fact guilty.

Serov wrote:

The investigation of the case of the so-called "Anti-Soviet bloc of Rights and Trotskyites" and its consideration at trial, conducted between 1937 and early 1938, was characterized by massive repression of Soviet citizens, by the most serious violations of socialist legality, by severe beatings of prisoners and by various and provocative techniques by means of which the investigating authorities extorted confessions from the prisoners and the courts handed down clearly unjustified sentences. (849)

Frinovskii did say this about Ezhov's practices in general. But he specifically excepted the March 1938 Trial. Moreover, he revealed that Ezhov himself was a part of the conspiracy, along with the 1938 Trial defendants.

Here is one part that Serov omitted:

The preparation of the trial of Rykov, Bukharin, Krestinskii, Yagoda and others

An active participant in investigations generally, Ezhov kept himself aloof from the preparation of this trial. Before the trial there took place the face-to-face confrontations of the suspects, interrogations, and refining, in which Ezhov did not participate. He spoke for a long time with Yagoda, and that talk concerned, in the main, of his assuring Yagoda that he would not be shot.

Ezhov had conversations several times with Bukharin and Rykov and also in order to calm them assured them that under no circumstances would they be shot.

Ezhov had one conversation with Bulanov, and began this conversation in the presence of the investigator and myself, and finished the conversation one on one, having asked us to leave.

At that moment Bulanov had begun talking about the poisoning of Ezhov. What the conversation was about Ezhov did not say. When he asked us to enter again he said: "Behave yourself well at the trial — I will ask that you not be shot." After the trial Ezhov always expressed regret about Bulanov. At the time of the executions Ezhov suggested shooting Bulanov first and he himself did not enter the building where the shootings took place.

Here Ezhov unquestionably was ruled by the necessity of covering up his own ties with the arrested leaders of the Right who were going into the public trial.

Frinovskii also confirmed the guilt of Zinoviev and Kamenev and of the Rightists, including Iagoda:

During this conversation I confided in Evdokimov and told him that I had fallen in with the Rights in my work.

In the same year, 1933, Yagoda, after I had clashed with him on an official question, began once again to bring me closer to him with the help of Bulanov. Bulanov would often call me to his dacha in the guise of going fishing and playing billiards. During one of these trips to Bulanov's on a free day at his dacha Yagoda arrived, who after dinner and drinks had a conversation with me in a separate room.

Yagoda began the conversation by saying I was not correct in opposing him and that here, obviously, the hand of Evdokimov was in play, and then he said to me: "Keep this in mind: I know that you remain a Rightist, that you are leading work, that I also know, and would it not be better for you to come to terms with the situation that exists with us in the central apparatus, to get off your high horse and obey me." And then, continuing the conversation, Yagoda asked me: "How are things in the GUPVO, you have a lot of assistants there, wouldn't it be better to get rid of somebody? What do you think — who would it be best to keep, Kruchinkin or Lepin?"

Without waiting for my answer Yagoda said that Kruchinkin was a reliable man. I understood that Kruchinkin was connected with him in some criminal activity.

At that same time, 1934, I had several meetings with Evdokimov when he came to Moscow. At these meetings he gradually disclosed to me his practical work and spoke about the work of the center of the Rights and around the USSR. In particular he told me that he had a number of people inside the apparatus of the GPU, and named Rud', Dagin, Raev, Kursky, Dement'ev, Gorbach, and others. He said that he was beginning to have contacts in the national oblasts: in Dagestan, though Mamedbekov, in Chechnya — Gorsheev or Gorshenin, and then said that the only person he had trouble with was Kalmykov, who had his own line of work, and Evdokimov couldn't cut him off in any way, but he characterized Kalmykov as a man wholly "ours", a Rightist, but evidently one who had his own line of work.

I asked him what was being done generally in the USSR? Evdokimov said that large-scale work was going on, a whole number of people who had important positions in a number of other oblasts of the USSR, had crossed over to the Rights. And here he stated: "You see how we must now conduct the struggle with the Central Committee: at one time we fought against the movement of uprisings, and now we ourselves must seek out the threads, ties to this movement and, in order to organize it, we must go down to its base. This is very complicated and dangerous work but without the base — the secretaries of the regional committees, the chairmen of the regional executive committees (RIKs) or men who have contacts with the countryside — we will not be able to lead the movement of uprisings, and that is one of the fundamental tasks that presents itself to us."

In 1935 Evdokimov began to ask me whether Yagoda's hand were in the assassination of Kirov and whether I had any facts about this? At the same time he indicated that if Yagoda had participated in this affair it was a bad move, not from the viewpoint of sympathy about the loss of Kirov, but from the viewpoint of complicating the position and of the repressions which began soon after Kirov's murder.

At the time of the trial of Zinoviev, Kamenev and others, when the testimony about Bukharin was published in the press, Evdokimov was in Moscow. He became very upset and in a conversation with me, said: "The devil only knows how he will be able to extract himself from this whole affair. I just don't understand Yagoda at all, what he is doing, why he is broadening the circle of persons for repression, or maybe the nerves of these people are weak — they will give out. But it could have been possible to direct the course of the investigation in such a manner as to leave oneself safe in any case."

Serov claimed that many trial defendants were "specially prepared" and sometimes told Ezhov that their confessions were false:

Those prisoners who were being made ready for the trial and for face-to-face confrontations to be carried out with participation by leaders of the Party and government were especially carefully prepared by the investigating authorities. Here everything was done strictly according to a developed plan and the prisoners repeatedly rehearsed "their" confessions.

As you know, some of the persons involved in the case of the Bloc of Rights and Trotskyites before their criminal prosecution were given face-to-face confrontations where prisoners previously arrested accused them of committing serious crimes against the state.

From the confessions, given after his arrest, of the former Deputy Commissar of Internal Affairs of the USSR FRINOVSKII it may be seen that specially instructed prisoners were brought forth at these face-to-face confrontations.

FRINOVSKII confessed about this:

At first the investigator, then the chief of the department, prepared the prisoners in a special way. The preparation consisted in the reading of the confessions that the prisoner had given against the person with whom the face-to-face confrontation was about to be conducted. They explained how the face-to-face confrontation would be conducted, what unexpected questions might be presented to the prisoner and how he should answer.

In essence what happened was an agreement and a rehearsal for the upcoming face-to-face confrontation. After that EZHOV would call the prisoner to himself, or pretending that he had by chance dropped in to the investigator's room where the prisoner was sitting he would speak to him about the upcoming confrontation and would ask whether he felt himself strong, would he confirm his confessions, and by the way, would mention that members of the government would be present at the face-to-face confrontation.

Usually EZHOV was nervous before such face-to-face confrontations even after he had had a talk with the prisoner. There were cases when the prisoner would state, during the conversation with EZHOV, that his confessions were not true, that he had been falsely accused. (arch. case number 975181, Vol. 2, l.d. 37-38)

As we saw above, Frinovskii explicitly stated that Ezhov did not do this in the case of the 1938 Moscow Trial.

Serov also omitted what Frinovskii said immediately before this passage: one of many acknowledgements by Frinovskii that a conspiracy did in fact exist, and that he, Frinovskii, was a party to them:

In carrying out the investigation of the case of Yagoda and the Chekist conspirators, and also in those of other arrested persons, especially the Rights, the system of "correction" of the transcripts set up by Ezhov pursued the goal of preserving the cadres of conspirators and preventing any possibility of the failure of our participation in the anti-Soviet conspiracy.

I can cite dozens and hundreds of examples when the defendants under arrest did not give up the persons who were tied to them in anti-Soviet work.

The most glaring examples were the conspirators Yagoda, Bulanov, Zakovsky, Kruchinkin and others, who knew about my participation in the conspiracy and did not confess about it. (47)

Serov could not reveal these matters to the Molotov Commission. Serov's and Khrushchev's aim was to claim that there had been no conspiracies and all the defendants had been innocent. Frinovskii's statement proves the opposite.

More of Serov's Omissions from Frinovskii's Confession

Throughout his report Serov sought to undermine the validity of the confessions of Moscow trials defendants and of other defendants — in fact, of all confessions obtained by the NKVD. In so doing Serov made heavy use of Frinovskii's confession statement of April 11, 1939, which had also been obtained by the NKVD.

However, Serov failed to cite the following dramatic passage from Frinovskii's confession:

I move now to the practical hostile work which was led by Ezhov, myself, and other conspirators in the NKVD.

Investigative work

The investigative apparatus in all departments of the NKVD was divided into "investigator-bonebreakers," "bonebreakers," and "ordinary" investigators.

What did these groups represent and who were they?

"Investigator-bonebreakers" were chosen basically from among the conspirators or persons who were compromised. They had unsupervised recourse to beating arrested persons and in a very short time obtained "confessions" and knew how to write up transcripts in a grammatical and elegant fashion.

In this category belong: Nikolayev, Agas, Ushakov, Listengurt, Evgen'ev, Zhupakhin, Minaev, Davydov, Al'tman, Geiman, Litvin, Leplevsky, Karelin, Kerzon, Iamnitsky, and others.

Since the quantity of those under arrest who confessed due to such methods grew daily and there was a great need for investigators who knew how to compose interrogations, the so-called "investigator-bonebreakers" began, each on his own, to create groups of simple "bonebreakers."

The group of "bone breakers" consisted of technical workers. These men did not know the evidence concerning the suspect, but were sent to the Lefortovo [prison in Moscow], summoned the accused, and set to beating him. The beatings continued up to the moment that the accused agreed to give a confession.

The remaining group of investigators took care of interrogations of those accused of less serious crimes and were left to themselves, without leadership from anyone.

The further process of investigation was as follows: the investigator conducted the interrogation and instead of a transcript put together notes. After several such interrogations a draft transcript was put together by the investigator. The draft went for "correction" to the chief of the appropriate department, and from him, still unsigned, for "review" to former People's Commissar Ezhov and in rare cases to myself. Ezhov looked through the transcript, made changes and additions. In most cases those under arrest did not agree with the editing of the transcript and stated that they had not said that during the investigation and refused to sign it.

Then the investigators would remind the arrested party about the "bonebreakers," and the person under investigation would sign the transcript. Ezhov produced the "correction" and "editing" of transcripts, in most cases, never having seen with his own eyes the person under arrest and if he did see him, then only during a momentary inspection of the cells or investigative rooms.

With such methods the investigations supplied the names.

In my opinion I would speak the truth if I declared, in general, that very often the confessions were given by the investigators, and not by those under investigation.

Did the leadership of the People's Commissariat, that is I and Ezhov, know about this? We knew.

How did we react? Honestly speaking — not at all, and Ezhov even encouraged it. No one bothered to find out to which of the accused physical pressure was applied. And since the majority of the persons who were employing these methods were themselves enemies of the people and conspirators, then clearly false accusations took place, we took false accusations and arrested and shot innocent people who had been slandered by enemies of the people from among those under arrest and by enemies of the people among the investigators. Real investigation was wiped out.

It is obvious why Serov omitted the passages quoted earlier where Frinovskii made it clear that the Moscow trials defendants were guilty. But why did Serov omit this passage? At first glance this omission is hard to understand since the passage above makes a strong claim that many NKVD confessions were coerced, many defendants innocent.

A possible explanation is that it focused attention not on the Moscow trials defendants but on the criminal behavior of Ezhov and his men. Emphasis on them might lead to consideration of what had happened to them — their arrests, interrogations, trials, punishment, etc. This was done by Lavrentii Beria, who replaced Ezhov as head of the NKVD in November 1938. Khrushchev hated and demonized Beria even more than he did Stalin.

Under Beria a great many sentences handed down under Ezhov were reversed. Hundreds of thousands of wrongfully-convicted people were released from camps (the GULAG) and prisons. Hundreds of Ezhov's NKVD men, who had done the dirty work of framing hundreds of thousands of innocent Soviet citizens, were arrested, investigated, interrogated, tried, and convicted. Many were sentenced to death, including both Ezhov and Frinovskii. Many others were imprisoned.

Perhaps anything that seriously involved Beria was a taboo subject among all these people, Khrushchevites and non-Khrushchevites alike. Molotov, Malenkov, Kaganovich, and Voroshilov had been parties to the illegal arrest and murder of Beria, who had been a member of the Presidium (name of the Politburo after October 1952) and a government minister. This treatment of Beria in fact amounted to a kind of coup d'état. It was a cardinal event; nothing like this had ever happened before in Soviet history. And the charges against Beria were faked, trumped-up after the fact, as even Khrushchev later admitted. In the conspiracy to oust and then to kill Beria the "Stalinists" in the Presidium were just as guilty as Khrushchev and his supporters were.

Or perhaps Serov simply did not want his Report to be "top-heavy" with quotations from Frinovskii. That might stimulate the "Stalinists" on the Molotov Commission to request a copy of Frinovskii's confession statement. Then they would have seen that Frinovskii actually testified to the real existence of the various conspiracies. And Serov could not permit that because it would have made it clear that his report was dishonest. It would have exposed Khrushchev's scheme to rewrite, by means of lies and omissions, all Soviet history of the Stalin period.

Evaluating and Using NKVD Confessions

A common practice today, even by historians who should know better, is to reject all Stalin-era Soviet political confessions. Serov could not do this, of course. All his counter-evidence against the Moscow Trials was also composed of confession materials:

- Reports by jailhouse snitches are at least as questionable evidence as confessions given to NKVD investigators. Serov relied very heavily on them in this Report. As we shall see, it appears that all of those cited as "evidence" by Serov were fabrications.
- Claims of innocence by convicted prisoners like Bessonov, Kamkov, and Pletnev, even if genuine, are highly questionable. What does a convicted prisoner have to lose by claiming innocence and compulsion? Especially when he knows that Ezhov has been ousted and charged with framing and executing a great many innocent people? Serov's report relies heavily on such claims as well. We have also shown on other grounds that these claims are faked.
- The statements by former NKVD men quoted by Serov are either proven lies or, at the very least, highly suspect. At least some of these men, like Lerner and Aronson, were questioned specifically for Serov's report. They had every reason to fear terrible retribution from Khrushchev and Serov if they did not do what was wanted of them.

Former NKVD colonel Boris V. Rodos had been arrested by Khrushchev in 1953, interrogated at length about his role in the repressions of the 1930s, and shot on April 20, 1956, less than two months before Serov questioned NKVD man Aronson. Other co-workers of Beria's were also arrested, charged with crimes, and either were shot (e.g. Solomon Mil'shtein) or had committed suicide in prison before they could be shot (e.g. Lavrentii F. Tsanava). Eight of Beria's chief assistants had been executed in December 1953 after a secret trial and on what appear to be phony charges. But Rodos, Mil'shtein, Tsanava, and others suffered their fates in 1955 or 1956, not long before Serov's report. All the materials in their cases are still top-secret in Russia today.

Pavel A. Sudoplatov, by 1953 a Lieutenant-General in the MVD (successor to the NKVD), was arrested in August 1953. By his own testimony he was asked by Roman Rudenko, Chief Prosecutor and a Khrushchev man, to make statements implicating Beria (either arrested or killed on June 26, 1953) in crimes that Sudoplatov either knew nothing about or knew were fictitious. When Sudoplatov refused he was arrested on the capital crime of treason. Sudoplatov succeeded in faking insanity, was sentenced to 15 years in prison, served his full sentence, and was released on time in 1968.

In his memoirs Sudoplatov states that he saw General Ivan I. Maslennikov, who had also worked under Beria in the armed forces of the NKVD. Sudoplatov heard that Rudenko had demanded that Maslennikov support the false story that Beria had planned to surround Moscow with MVD troops and stage a coup d'état. "Such a plan never existed in reality, and Maslennikov decided it was better to commit suicide than be arrested."³²

Former NKVD men knew what had happened to Mil'shtein, Tsanava, Rodos, Sudoplatov, and many others. What's more, all this purported material from former NKVD men comes from Serov. We know that Serov was deliberately lying to the Molotov Commission by destroying inconvenient evidence, concealing the existence of other evidence (for example, Frinovskii's confession statement), and deliberately misinterpreting yet other testimony — for example by falsely claiming that Iagoda had retracted his confession at trial.³³

Assuming that Serov really did question them, the former NKVD men would have had every reason to tell him whatever it was that Khrushchev wanted to hear.

³³ See Furr, Sergei Kirov, Chapter 15.

Evaluating NKVD Confessions

Serov would not have wanted to give the impression that NKVD confessions obtained under the reviled Beria, who had replaced Ezhov in late 1938 and was investigating Ezhov's falsifications, were more reliable than those obtained under Iagoda or Ezhov. That was, however, the implication of his using Frinovskii's statement.

If one is going to reject one set of confessions — in this case, those obtained under Iagoda and Ezhov — then why not reject those obtained under Beria as well? And that would mean rejecting Frinovskii's. After all, could not Beria's men have threatened or tortured Frinovskii to claim that the confessions obtained under Ezhov were largely false except for those involving the Moscow trials defendants? Plus that Ezhov and his men, Frinovskii included, were all criminals who had now been found out and neutralized by the clever Beria? As we have just noted, this same logic could apply to the "jailhouse snitch" statements, claims of innocence by defendants already convicted, and even to the statements of the former NKVD men which were, after all, also obtained by Serov's KGB, the successor to the NKVD.

If all confessions are to be discounted as potentially faked then the only remaining category of evidence is material evidence, where any exists. But a moment's thought reveals that material evidence too can be faked. In fact it may be easier to forge false letters, maps, passports, to plant false weapons, etc., than to force lifelong revolutionaries to falsely incriminate themselves and others. Unscrupulous investigators who will stoop to anything — to torture, maltreatment, threats against family and friends — would not scruple at forgery, planting false material evidence, and the kind of deceptions that we know Serov practiced.

But such a chain of reasoning leads to an absurd conclusion: all evidence, anywhere, should be disregarded since it might have been faked! Nothing remains, so historical research is impossible. Of course historians in other fields do not reason like this. But this kind of "logic" is common in the field of Soviet history of the Stalin period.

What other historians commonly do, but historians of the Moscow trials and the opposition conspiracies in the USSR during the 1930s seldom do, is to follow some elementary rules for dealing with evidence that help to assure an objective assessment of that evidence. Such rules include the following:

* No evidence should ever be rejected a priori. It is always invalid to say that some evidence should be disregarded because it "might" have been faked. Specific reasons are required for rejecting any evidence. We need "evidence that evidence has been faked" before it can be rejected. This includes Stalin-era Soviet confessions.

To put this another way: the statement "X might have been forced to confess falsely" is a hypothesis. All hypotheses require evidence to sustain them. That evidence must then be evaluated.

That is what we are doing in the present essay. Serov claimed — i.e. stated the hypothesis — that the confessions of Rakovsky and others were untrue, obtained by threats of some kind. In the present essay we show that Serov's evidence to support his hypothesis was itself faked by Serov.

A hypothesis that is not supported by evidence does not have to be disproven — it "falls of its own weight." If there is no evidence that supports the hypothesis that "X was forced to confess" then that hypothesis must be discarded. We must accept the confession as valid unless and until evidence that tends to disprove it should come to light. Then we must study that evidence and if necessary amend or discard our original conclusion. This is the method we have employed in this essay by studying Serov's report.

* Even when we do have evidence that a confession or other evidence is faked, it can often still provide important evidence for some other hypothesis. Serov's July 7, 1956, report is a good example. We can prove it is full of deliberately false statements. Yet important conclusions can be drawn from it. Serov's report does not do what Serov wanted it to do: it does not provide reliable evidence to support the hypothesis that Rakovsky and the other Moscow trials defendants were framed. But it does provide additional evidence for a different hypothesis: that Khrushchev and Serov were themselves trying to frame Ezhov and Stalin. (They also tried to frame Beria).

* All evidence should be verified to the extent possible by comparison with other evidence. The likelihood that numerous pieces of evidence from different sources will all have been faked in some coordinated way, yet without leaving any trace of that faking process, becomes so remote that it can be disregarded.

Therefore confessions and statements made by prisoners under NKVD investigation and other Stalin-era documents must be studied in the same way as all other evidence. We have a great deal of evidence from different sources that corroborates the guilt of many of the Moscow trials defendants. At the same time, we have no credible evidence that tends to prove they were framed. Serov and Khrushchev's aides, and later Gorbachev and his aides, tried to prove this. But we can now prove that it is they who were fabricating false evidence.

* In the case of Stalin-era research we must guard against unexamined assumptions. This is what I have called "the anti-Stalin paradigm." We should not assume that Stalin deliberately framed innocent people, or lied, or fabricated evidence. Like any hypothesis, this has to be supported with evidence. In practice, I have yet to find a single instance where Stalin did any of these things.

By contrast, even a committed Trotskyist like Pierre Broué has found many examples of Trotsky's deliberate lying. Yet I have never yet encountered an example of any scholar rejecting something Trotsky said on the grounds that "he might be lying since we know he lied in other instances." The fact that a person — say, Trotsky — provably lied in some instances does not mean that he lied, or "probably lied," in other instances or that everything he said or wrote can be disregarded. This illogical logic is only applied to Stalin himself and to Stalin-era materials like NKVD interrogations, statements by prisoners, and Moscow Trial transcripts.

To lie is a human trait. Anyone, at any time, may be either lying or telling the truth (at least what the person believes is the truth). In particular, the fact that a person is under investigation, under arrest, in prison, etc., does not mean that they are lying. Nor does it necessarily mean that they are "more likely" to be lying. Likewise, people who are not under any kind of compulsion at all also might be either lying or telling the truth. There is no formula such as, for example, "People who are under arrest are X% more likely to lie than people who are at liberty."

A statement by someone who is at liberty and free from threat cannot be assumed to be true. Likewise a statement by someone under arrest cannot be assumed to be false. There is no justification for simply discounting NKVD interrogations, letters by prisoners, Moscow Trials transcripts, etc., and no rational reason for thinking them "more (or less) likely" to be false. The only basis for routinely discounting NKVD interrogations, letters by prisoners, Moscow Trials transcripts, etc., is an unsupported belief that everything the NKVD did, at least in the Stalin era, was dishonest. But this is circular reasoning — assuming that which must have evidence to support it — or begging the question. All evidence from all persons, whether under arrest or at liberty, must be scrutinized with appropriate skepticism.

Pierre Broué found many instances where Trotsky was lying. These lies have serious implications for the study of Trotsky's works of the 1930s. Yet Trotsky's proven lies are either overlooked or given only cursory attention. By contrast it is hard to find examples where Stalin lied during this same period. And no one has yet found any evidence that Moscow Trials defendants were forced to lie either at trial or in those interrogations and letters that we have from them.

All this should be obvious. It needs to be emphasized only because so few researchers approach the subject of Soviet history of the 1930s with anything like objectivity. As regards Stalin and the Moscow Trials almost any claim that he was dishonest or that the evidence was fabricated, no matter how lacking in substance, is accepted.

Serov's Attempt to "Rehabilitate" Rakovsky

Serov's report is the most sustained attempt yet discovered to prove that Rakovsky was innocent. We will examine each passage that deals with Rakovsky.

Rakovsky was arrested after many accusations against him.

In February 1937, after EZHOV'S report to the Plenum of the Central Committee of the CPSU(b), BUKHARIN and RYKOV were arrested.

Somewhat earlier RAKOVSKY Kh. G. had been arrested on a criminal charge.

In a special communication to J.V. STALIN, asking for his consent to arrest RAKOVSKY, the NKVD of the USSR pointed out that he had been exposed as one of the active participants of the Trotsky-Zinoviev terrorist organization by the testimony of PIATAKOV, KASPAROVA, NIKOLAEV, TER-VAGANIAN and others, as well as by material from undercover agents.³⁴

In fact, there were no materials in the possession of the NKVD from agents concerning criminal activities by RAKOVSKY, while the confessions of the above-named persons were vague and uncertain in their reliability. (834)

³⁴ Lubianka 1937-1938, Doc. No.11.

Even if true — Serov, of course, cannot simply be believed — the fact that no NKVD agents had evidence against Rakovsky is not evidence that he was innocent. Nor does Serov explain what was "vague and doubtful" about the confessions.

Thus, TER-VAGANIAN, citing SMIRNOV I.N., confessed that in 1932 RAKOVSKY "wrote a new counterrevolutionary document." But there were no confessions by SMIRNOV along these lines.

Serov does not claim that Smirnov denied it, only that he did not mention it himself. If true — this comes from Serov so we can never be sure — this only means that no one asked Smirnov about Rakovsky's document. For if Smirnov had been asked about this document and had denied it, Serov would have said so.

The prisoner NIKOLAEV gave vague confessions that RAKOVSKY belonged to a reserve "especially secret center" consisting of PIATAKOV, SOKOL'NIKOV and RADEK, about which he supposedly learned from DREITSER. However, none of the individuals named by NIKOLAEV stated this in their testimony.

It appears that Serov is prevaricating here, playing with words. Piatakov testified many times about a "reserve center" of the bloc, which was then changed into a "parallel center." Nikolaev used the words "especially secret center" to refer to the same group. Piatakov, Sokol'nikov, and Radek were defendants at the second Moscow Trial of January 1937. It would be logical for them to keep quiet about any members of their leading group who had not yet been arrested. Their pretrial investigative materials are all still top-secret in Russia today.

None of these men was completely honest in their confessions. We know that Sokol'nikov had received a letter from Trotsky because the return receipt remains in the Trotsky Papers at Houghton Library, Harvard University. But at trial Sokol'nikov denied receiving any letters from Trotsky. The prosecution did not challenge him on this point. Evidently it did not know about this. Also, Karl Radek concealed Tukhachevsky's role in the opposition conspiracies.

KASPAROVA confessed that RAKOVSKY hypocritically announced his departure from the opposition, but in reality did not break with it and in 1933, outlining his anti-Soviet views, informed her in his letters about the creation on a terrorist basis of the Trotskyite-Zinovievite bloc.

We can be sure that this is true. As we have seen, Pierre Broué believed that all "capitulators" were lying and this accords with the more extensive evidence we have today. One has to wonder why Serov included these remarks in his report. He does not attempt to refute them.

Serov continued:

To RAKOVSKY's case was also attached an excerpt from the testimony of PIATAKOV in which it is stated that "RAKOVSKY has his own line of contact with TROTSKY." In reality PIATAKOV did not give any such testimony.

Serov is lying. In the "Document No. 11" which we quoted above there is such an excerpt from Piatakov's testimony. The passage in question reads as follows:

Concerning RAKOVSKY TROTSKY said that it was essential to talk with him and give him a push in his work along the lines of the Trotskyist organization. From this I deduced that RAKOVSKY had some personal line of contact with TROTSKY.³⁵

If this is the same document Serov quoted from, then he was using "weasel words." Piatakov did not state for a fact that "Rakovsky had his own line of contact with Trotsky" — he "deduced" it.

Most of Piatakov's pretrial testimony remains unavailable to researchers. However, we now have one of Piatakov's pretrial statements in which he summarizes his conversation with Trotsky during his, Piatakov's, clandestine flight to Norway in December 1935. In this statement he makes the following references to Rakovsky:

I should add that among the specific persons whose names were tossed out by Trotsky during this conversation were mentioned: RADEK, SOKOL'NIKOV, SEREBRYAKOV, MURALOV, BELOBORODOV, RAKOVSKY, Budu MDIVANI, V.M. SMIRNOV, SAPRONOV, BUKHARIN, RYKOV, TOMSKII, UGLANOV, PREOBRAZHENSII, PUTNA, PRIMAKOV, KRESTINSKII.

Concerning these persons were had the following conversations. ... About RAKOVSKY and PREOBRAZHENSII he said that it as essential to have a talk with them and spur them on in their work.³⁶

³⁶ Piatakov, Statement to Ezhov December 19-20, 1936.

Even this one document makes clear how Piatakov could have deduced that Rakovsky had "his own line of contact with Trotsky." Trotsky knew that Rakovsky was not working actively enough. This is exactly what he is quoted as having said in the document Serov quotes and in Document No. 11, above. The only thing lacking in this statement is Piatakov's deduction about Rakovsky's "own line of contact."

A lie as clearly proven as this one requires that we look with suspicion upon everything else that Serov wrote, not in order to dismiss out of hand, but rather to investigate more closely with a critical eye. So we will continue our study of Serov's report. As it happens, Serov's falsifications will lead us to some valuable evidence about Rakovsky and Trotsky.

Rakovsky in Serov's Report

Later in Serov's report we read:

All the accused convicted in the present case pleaded guilty to the charges against them. However, the verification process revealed that for the most part, these confessions had been made under compulsion and did not reflect the truth.

For example, RAKOVSKY Kh. G., who confessed his active participation in the "Bloc of Rights and Trotskyites" and his collaboration with Japanese and British intelligence / 837 / services, after the trial repeatedly protested his innocence and claimed that during the investigation he was forced to give confessions known to be false. / Agent "Anri" / who was held together with RAKOVSKY in the Orel prison, reported on March 17, 1940 that RAKOVSKY:

"completely denies his guilt and considers everything that took place at the trial and in the investigation was nothing but a farce. Sometimes he casually asserted that he gave all his testimony under pressure" (arch. case number 300956, v. 9, l.d.181 [= archival 'delo' number, volume number, page number])

Another, / agent "Dima" /, who was also with RAKOVSKY in the same cell, reported on April 2, 1941 that in conversations with him RAKOVSKY had categorically denied any involvement in the Bloc of Rights and Trotskyites, said that his interrogation protocols had been falsified and then declared "I was indignant when ARONSON (investigator) wrote the protocol that stated that we wanted to restore capitalism. Listen — I said — that is illiterate. He threw the crumpled protocol in my face. Generally, when I did not write the way they wanted me to, they always did that...." (ibid., l.d. 322)

Questioned on July 3, 1956 former employee of the NKVD ARONSON Ia.A. confirmed that the investigation against RAKOVSKY was indeed conducted in an atmosphere of serious violation of the norms of socialist legality.

After the trial RAKOVSKY, citing his advanced age and illness, repeatedly made applications in which he petitioned for clemency. However, RAKOVSKY's requests remained unsatisfied. (836-7)

Even if it were true that Rakovsky retracted his confession to his cellmates, who just happened to be "agents," that would not be good evidence that he was innocent. It is common for convicted prisoners to claim that they were innocent.

That said, there are some points of interest here:

* What were "agents" doing in Rakovsky's cell long after his conviction? We'll return to this question below.

* Rakovsky testified at trial that he was legally a participant in the bloc of Rights and Trotskyites, although he was not aware of all of activities:

I confessed to all my crimes. What would it matter for the substance of the case if I should attempt to establish here before you the fact that I learned many of the crimes, and of the most appalling crimes of the "bloc of Rights and Trotskyites," here in Court, and that it was here that I first met some of the participants? It is of no import whatever. I am connected with the "bloc of Rights and Trotskyites," of course within the limits defined by the Criminal Code, by that complicity, both political and juridical, which follows from the fact that I belonged to this bloc. (1938 Trial, 758)

Skilled conspirators do not inform all members of the conspiratorial network about all the activities of other members. They compartmentalize their information. It was natural that Rakovsky would not have been told about everything the bloc was doing, all the more so since he disagreed with the tactic of "terror," an important aspect of the bloc's activities.

* Like former NKVD man Lerner, former NKVD man Aronson must have been interrogated specifically for Serov's report, four days before the report itself was dated (July 3 vs July 7, 1956). It is Aronson's testimony during this interrogation that was no doubt given "under pressure" and "in an atmosphere of serious violation of the norms of socialist legality."

This raises the question of the case file that Serov repeatedly cites: "Archival file No. 300956," either volume 7 or volume 9. Serov cites this file number nine times, always when "agent Dima," "agent Finn," or "cellmates" are quoted. All these supposed informants are themselves quoting alleged statements of Rakovsky's to them in 1940 or 1941 in Orlov prison.

Georgii Cherniavskii is a Russian Trotskyist researcher who has published many books and articles on Trotsky and Trotsky-related subjects from a fiercely partisan pro-Trotsky and anti-Stalin standpoint.³⁷ Cherniavskii was permitted to read Rakovsky's file from Orlov prison, where Rakovsky was confined. It contains letters from his wife, from one of which, dated March 26, 1940, he quotes some lines. Cherniavskii read Rakovsky's appeals to Kalinin, Beria, and Stalin asking that his case be reviewed. Cherniavskii says that there are a number of these. All of these appeals were made on grounds of health. All were denied. Serov confirms this:

After the trial RAKOVSKY, citing his advanced age and illness, repeatedly made applications in which he petitioned for clemency. However, RAKOVSKY's requests remained unsatisfied. (837)

If Rakovsky had claimed he was innocent those documents would also be in his file. But none is. Evidently, therefore, Rakovsky never claimed he was innocent, only that he was elderly and unwell.

³⁷ Georgii Cherniavskii, Mikhail Stanchev, Maria Tortika (Lobanova), Zhiznennyi put' Khristiana Rakovskogo 1873-1941. Evropeizm I Bol'shevism: Neokonchennaia Duel'. Moscow: Tsentropoligraf, 2014.

"Solitary Confinement"

In January 1941 Rakovsky asked Beria for transfer from Orlov prison to a camp. The reasons he gave for his request were: "lack of fresh air, light, unsatisfactory food, and solitary confinement — 'odinochnoe zakliuchenie.'" (Cherniavskii, 540)

According to Rakovsky's prison file he had no cellmates! No wonder none of the "agent" or "cellmate" reports that Serov quotes are in Rakovsky's prison file. Much other material is: scraps of cigarette paper on which Rakovsky wrote what were evidently comments about politics, now unreadable (Cherniavskii, 541). Once more, Serov was lying.³⁸

³⁸ Rakovsky must have had occasional contact with other prisoners and with the prison staff. A tiuremnaia kharakteristicka or note by prison authorities about Rakovsky's behavior from 1941 states: "The prisoner shows himself to be an embittered and irreconcilable enemy of Soviet authority. He systematically spreads counterrevolutionary slander." (540)

Serov claims that Rakovsky made the following threat:

In this regard, on May 17, 1941 RAKOVSKY said to / agent "Finn" /: "I have decided to change my tactics. So far I have only asked for pardon, but have not written about my own case. Now I will write a statement calling for review of my case, with a description of all the 'secrets of the Madrid court' — Soviet investigation. At least let the people through whose hands all statements pass know how dutye [either "inflated," i.e. exaggerated, or "phony"] cases and trials are concocted out of personal political revenge. Even though I may soon die, even if I am a corpse, remember ... sometimes even corpses will begin to speak." (arch. case number 300956, v. 9, l.d. 239-240)

This is the one statement about Rakovsky in prison that has been previously published: in the journal Izvestiia TsK KPSS 1, 1989, p. 119. This journal was begun under Gorbachev and was the venue for many "revelations" and rehabilitations concerning the Stalin years. But there it is attributed not to "agent Finn" but to Aronson: "Delo [case file] Aronson, vol. 9, pp. 239-40."³⁹ According to Serov, it is with the other "agent" materials in "archival file (arkh. delo) 300956," pp. 239-40.

³⁹ Also in Reabilitatsiia. Politicheskie Protsessy 30-50-x godov. (M. Izd. Polit Literaturny, 1991), p. 240.

We do not know anything about this file. Serov never names the file from which he is quoting Aronson's statements of 1956. Were all the "agent materials" plus Aronson's testimony put into the same file? Perhaps Gorbachev's men did not really do any research of their own and just copied from Serov's report and, what's more, copied inaccurately. They had little incentive to copy correctly from these top-secret documents that no one else could see — if, indeed, this file exists at all.

Or are both sources correct and it was Aronson who was quoting "agent Finn" and, if so, no doubt "agent Dima" and Rakovsky's "cellmates" too? That would make the "agent" and "cellmate" accounts third-hand (Rakovsky to "agent/cellmate" — to Aronson — to Serov's researchers). In this scenario NKVD man Aronson was the person who "debriefed" Rakovsky's "agents/cellmates." But as we now know — Rakovsky had no cellmates: he was in solitary confinement.

Cherniavskii reproduces this "Aronson-Finn" passage from Izvestiia TsK KPSS, 1989. Evidently Cherniavskii was unaware of Serov's July 7, 1956, report which had been published the year before his own book. It also suggests that Cherniavskii did not see case file 300956 or "Delo Aronson." But Cherniavskii was given access to Rakovsky's investigative file and the file on Rakovsky from Orlov prison. And this file would have provided him with all the testimony from "agent Dima," "agent Finn," and probably from Aronson himself. Had Cherniavskii asked for this file and been refused he would surely have said as much in his book.

Therefore, we can conclude that Rakovsky's investigation and Orlov prison files do not contain these "agent" and "cellmate" reports. That means that, if they exist at all, they were produced for Serov in 1956. Given Serov's proven dishonesty, plus the fact that Rakovsky was in solitary confinement, we cannot accept these supposed reports of Rakovsky's statements in prison as genuine. They are most likely yet more falsifications by Serov and his associates. Molotov would not have known this.

Serov continues:

RAKOVSKY's testimony about his alleged criminal activity is also refuted by the fact that the men he named in interrogations as his accomplices, GVAKHARIA, BABAYAN and SABANIN have now been rehabilitated and their cases closed. BOGOMOLOV, whom RAKOVSKY named as a member of a counterrevolutionary organization, pleaded not guilty at his trial. (837)

Even if these statements are true — as we have repeatedly shown, Serov cannot be trusted — rehabilitations are not evidence. Bogomolov's failure to confess would not mean he was innocent or that Rakovsky's testimony was false.

Serov claimed that Aronson testified about threats against Rakovsky:

It should be noted that prisoners were prodded into self-incrimination and slander against others not only by direct physical violence but also by mental violence. Threats of repression against relatives, threats of beatings, cries of prisoners being beaten — the investigators used all these in order to obtain "confessions." Former investigator ARONSON testified about this:

"I personally did not use physical force against RAKOVSKY, obviously, because he did not confess to me about espionage (RAKOVSKY "confessed" himself guilty of espionage to other investigators). I admit that I might have applied other means of pressure — measures of a mental nature: threats against him personally, threats to arrest members of his family. I seem to remember, in particular, that RAKOVSKY was informed about the arrest of his wife and that her fate depended upon his confessions. Such was the system of interrogation of prisoners, introduced as mandatory methods by the leadership of the NKVD of that time."

As is evident from the report of agent "Dima" RAKOVSKY himself, in his cell at the Orlov prison, spoke about the situation of the investigation of his case as follows: "...when almost from the first day they make it clear that you have to lie about yourself and others, smear your own name and honor, then you are overcome with rage and indignation. You begin to fight, to resist, but then when they tell you, as ARONSON told me: 'Old man, do not hold out, confess,' when they tell you that they will annihilate your family, that they will shoot you, you give up. When I was told that my wife had been put into the Lefortovo, I screamed and grabbed my head — that meant she would die. Fear for your family, the consciousness that you are sending them to their deaths, fear and the desire to live, complete hopelessness, and then the party 'automatic,' the habit of obeying the party — these things make you lie and do the devil knows what. All this is a lie, there is not a drop of truth in any of these cases." (arch. case number 300956, v. 9, l.d. 321)

This Aronson statement has to be a fabrication. Cherniavskii interviewed at least two relatives of Rakovsky's concerning this period. Neither said anything about an arrest of Rakovsky's wife who, as we have already seen, mailed letters and money to Rakovsky in Orlov prison.

Cherniavskii recounts the arrest of a niece of Rakovsky's who was a Bulgarian and had been staying with him. She was arrested shortly after Rakovsky while trying to return home and remained under arrest for some months — Cherniavskii does not say how long, but suggests that she was released in late 1937. The fact that this event was remembered and recorded in Rakovsky's family makes it all but certain that an arrest of Rakovsky's wife would also have been remembered — if it had occurred.

Moreover, it had been many years — if ever — since Rakovsky, a longtime oppositionist, had "automatically," i.e. reflexively, obeyed "the Party." So the statement about "the party automatic" is a fabrication too. We noted above that Aronson had reason to fear if he did not make a confession along the lines Khrushchev and his men wanted.

Further, he [Rakovsky] also said:

"I was taken from the Butyrki [prison] to the Lefortovo, and from the Lefortovo to the Lubyanka. Every night I expected to be shot. In Lefortovo, in this horrible prison where you could hear the screams of people under torture, the moaning of women, shots during times of execution and the constant noise of aircraft engines, they suddenly cut my fingernails — I realized that they wanted to torture me. Soon I was summoned at night. I appeared before NIKOLAEV, AGAS, and another type that does the torturing. When I walked in, I was told that I was a spy. 'Me, a spy?' 'Yes, you. And you yourself will tell us about your activities.' I realized that this was the end, that the only way to salvation was through admitting the most serious charges. This is the dialectic ... Everything went into it — the Japanese and the British. I myself sometimes became confused, I said so much." (ibid., l.d. 322)

Immediately after this Bessonov is quoted as saying the same thing.

Then we are told the following about Sokol'nikov, sentenced to prison rather than execution at the January 1937 Moscow Trial.

From materials in the archives of the KGB we know that SOKOL'NIKOV was brought to Moscow from prison in the fall of 1937 to be used as a witness at the upcoming trial of BUKHARIN, RYKOV and others, but because of his refusal to testify at trial he was sent back. (853)

Apparently Serov did not realize that statements like these contradict the whole tenor of his report. If Rakovsky or anyone else made false confessions in the investigation and at trial because of threats against their families, why would they contradict their testimony just because they had been convicted and were in prison? There would be no less danger to their families after trial than before.

How then could others refuse to plead guilty, as Serov said they did? How could Sokol'nikov have refused to testify? How could Bukharin have spent half of his lengthy testimony, plus all of his closing statement, staunchly denying the Prosecutor's most serious accusations? Evidently they were not afraid of torture, threats to family, etc., when they did so.

There is not now, nor has there ever been, any evidence that any of the Moscow trials defendants were tortured. On the contrary: there is good evidence that they were not. Zinoviev stated in a pretrial letter that he was being well treated.⁴⁰ Even Steven Cohen, a world authority on Bukharin and staunchly anti-Stalin, concluded in 2003 that Bukharin was not tortured.⁴¹

⁴¹ Koen, Stiven (Cohen), "Bukharin na Lubianke." Svobodnaia Mysl' 22 (3), 2003, 58-63, at pp. 60-61.

In 1956 Anastas Mikoian told American writer Louis Fischer that "Bukharin and the other Moscow trial defendants were not tortured."⁴² Mikoian had no reason to lie about this. He claimed to believe that they were innocent, was a staunch Khrushchev man, and supported Khrushchev's attempt to "rehabilitate" them as "victims of Stalin."

⁴² Louis Fischer. Russia Revisited. A New Look at Russia and Her Satellites. Garden City, NY: Doubleday & Co., 1957, p. 70.

We have the texts of the appeals of all the defendants who received death sentences, plus that of Dr. Pletnev. In every case the defendants reiterated their guilt. Bukharin wrote two such appeals. He stated that he "deserved to be shot ten times over."⁴³

⁴³ Bukharin's appeals were first published in Izvestiia September 2, 1993, p. 2. I have put a translation online at <https://msuweb.montclair.edu/~furrgr/research/bukharinappeals.html>

How likely is it that the men who were sentenced to death reiterated their guilt, often in the strongest possible terms, and yet were innocent? Not "to protect their families" — Iagoda and, especially, Bukharin spent a lot of their testimony vigorously denying some of Prosecutor Vyshinskii's accusations against them. If there were ever a time to claim innocence it would have been in these appeals, which were never supposed to be made public. Moreover, if one surmises that they continued to insist upon their own guilt "in order to save their families," then why would the three who did not receive death sentences — Bessonov, Rakovsky, and Pletnev — not also continue to insist upon their own guilt for the same reason?

One more point in the lurid account above must be a falsification: "Every night I expected to be shot." There would have been no reason for Rakovsky to have "expected" that he might be shot without an investigation and trial. In all the cases we know about and that Rakovsky would have known about, arrested persons were imprisoned during investigation according to the Soviet (and, incidentally, the European) practice and then given a trial.

Serov, however, had every reason to depict all aspects of the investigation and trial of the 1938 Moscow trial defendants as outrageously improper. We have proven that he lied in many other instances in this report. This alleged statement by Rakovsky appears to be another of Serov's fabrications.

According to Cherniavskii, Rakovsky was given a copy of the indictment against him on April 9, 1937,

...in which it is asserted that against Rakovsky "there is sufficient evidence that he is a member in a counterrevolutionary Trotskyist organization." (499)

Thereafter Rakovsky was interrogated numerous times. This means that a normal judicial procedure was being followed. We'll look at Cherniavskii's account of them below.

More alleged testimony from Rakovsky's "cellmates":

The "processing" of prisoners in the case of the Right-Trotskyite center did not stop day or night. This was handled during the interrogations by the investigators and in the cells by specially placed people. Concerning one of these people RAKOVSKY, after his conviction, told his fellow inmates:

In Lefortovo they put Lieberman into my cell ... They let me write my confessions in my cell. When I presented them, if they did not like them, they / 853 / would tear them up and throw them in my face. When I consulted with Lieberman my confessions always satisfied the investigators. He served as the transfer authority, he dictated to me what they wanted and through him I asked their advice

In the end, I did not care, because I lied. And he could not hurt me, on the contrary, he facilitated my work. (arch. case number 300956, v. 9, l.d. 324) (852-3)

Here Serov does not even bother to name the purported "fellow inmates" of Rakovsky's who supposedly heard Rakovsky say this. Serov recounts some other stories about Rakovsky that do not speak directly to the question of guilt or innocence. The story below is evidently an attempt to account for Krestinskii's decision, between the first and second days of the March 1938 trial, to change his plea from innocent to guilty.

Concerning the circumstances surrounding KRESTINSKII'S confessions at the trial, former employee of the NKVD ARONSON has testified:

"I, like many other NKVD men, attended the trial. At the first session KRESTINSKII retracted the confessions he had given earlier and pleaded not guilty. This statement caused confusion on the part of VYSHINSKII, who was in charge of the trial.

"During the break we investigators discussed what had happened and talked about how to get out of this situation. NIKOLAEV (he was in charge of RAKOVSKY's case) then said that he would try to resolve the incident. When the accused were taken from the court they took KRESTINSKII together with RAKOVSKY. The next day KRESTINSKII pleaded guilty and confirmed all the confessions that he had given previously. I think, and the investigators said the same thing at the time, that KRESTINSKII had not been beaten, but RAKOVSKY had persuaded him. They said that RAKOVSKY, who in general had great influence on KRESTINSKII, told him something like this: 'You ought to admit guilt, all the defendants are pleading guilty, and the court will consider anyone who does not admit guilt as an unrepentant enemy and will unquestionably shoot him, while in return for the admission of guilt they will preserve your life. The family of him who confessed guilt will not suffer, but in case of rejection of guilt the family will also be repressed.' This so affected KRESTINSKII that to the end of the trial he did not try any more to reject the confessions he had given during the investigation."

Also characteristic in this regard is the behavior at trial of the public prosecutor VYSHINSKII. When the court summoned KRESTINSKII for questioning VYSHINSKII did not permit his immediate interrogation and first asked a number of questions precisely to RAKOVSKY.

KRESTINSKII was interrogated only after RAKOVSKY had given him an example — he fully admitted his guilt and named KRESTINSKII as his accomplice. (854-5. Underlined emphasis in the original.)

Even if this were true — and even Serov only claims that it was Aronson's speculation — the fact that Rakovsky convinced Krestinskii to reaffirm his initial confessions and "set an example" does not say anything about Krestinskii's or Rakovsky's guilt or innocence.

Another alleged statement by Rakovsky is given with no specific source and to no discernable purpose:

During the trial the investigators never left me, encouraged me, talked about the impression that this revolting farce was making on me. (Arch. case number 300956, v. 7, l.d. 325) (856)

The final passage in Serov's report concerning Rakovsky is the following:

After his conviction RAKOVSKY told his cellmates: "I coordinated the main points of my speech at the trial, my last words with the investigators... During this last period they were all at my service, right up to the olives [sic]." (arch. case number 300956, v. 7, l.d. 325)

This story of RAKOVSKY's is fully confirmed in archival documents of the NKVD. Moreover, they show that this situation occurred not only in relation to RAKOVSKY but also in relation to other defendants in the present case.

So, in archival files on RAKOVSKY and GRIN'KO we have found typewritten outlines of their future confessions at trial. By comparing these outlines with the confessions that RAKOVSKY and GRIN'KO gave at trial it was revealed that they are identical both structurally and in their meaning, and that some phrases in them are repeated almost word for word in the trial transcript.

Moreover, in these archival materials we have also discovered drafts of the "last words" of the accused RAKOVSKY, RYKOV and GRIN'KO, and in the materials on RAKOVSKY even two versions of "his" last words at the trial have turned up. (857)

We know the first paragraph is a lie because we know that Rakovsky had no cellmates. The other claims, even if true, do not speak to guilt or innocence.

Even if genuine this paragraph can only refer to Rakovsky's longer statements, perhaps the opening and closing statements.

No prosecution anywhere would go to any serious trial, let alone a public trial, without a fairly precise idea of what the defendants will say. However, during the trial Rakovsky challenged Vyshinskii on several points. Much of his testimony was in the form of short question and answer passages. These could not have been written down for practice in advance.

Serov and the Bloc

Throughout his report Serov appears to claim that the bloc of Rights and Trotskyites itself was a Stalin-NKVD invention and never really existed.

- Serov normally puts the words "anti-Soviet bloc of Rights and Trotskyites" in scare quotes. This is evidently a signal that he is attesting to the nonexistence of the bloc.
- He refers several times to "a so-called 'Bloc of Rights and Trotskyites.'" (833; 836; 849)
- He quotes several defendants as supposedly stating that the whole trial was "a complete invention of the NKVD" (Bessonov 838; Kamkov, 840-1)

Serov's most unambiguous claim that no bloc existed is found at the very end of the Report:

... the accusation against them that in the following years they created a bloc of Rights and Trotskyites and conducted organized anti-Soviet activities, is falsified and in this regard they are subject to rehabilitation. (858)

After the 22nd Party Congress of October 1961 during which Khrushchev and his men attacked Stalin even more ferociously than he had done at the 20th Party Congress in 1956 there was a more extensive attempt to clear the 1938 Moscow trial defendants. The "Shvernik Commission" issued two reports, the "Zapiska" or "memorandum" and the "Spravka" or "inquiry." In the longer "Zapiska" written in 1962 or early 1963 and available to

Gorbachev's aides but not published until the mid-1990s Khrushchev's aides concluded:

No "Anti-Soviet Right-Trotskyist Bloc" in reality ever existed, and those who were convicted in this case were not really guilty of counterrevolutionary activity.⁴⁴

⁴⁴ Reabilitatsiia. Kak Eto Bylo. Fevral' 1956 — nachalo 80-kh godov. T. 2. Moskva: "Materik", 2003. (RKEB 2), p. 630.

Gorbachev's men adopted the same conclusion. This is interesting because Gorbachev's men made this statement after Pierre Broué's discovery that a bloc of Rights and Trotskyites, including Zinovievites and other oppositionists, had indeed existed.

In 1986 American scholar J. Arch Getty published an article in the journal Soviet Studies in which he discusses, among other things, Broué's discovery of the bloc. Getty's article was published in Russian translation in one of the last issues of the Soviet Communist Party journal Problems in the history of the CPSU. In a special afterword Boris Starkov, an official CPSU historian, tried to explain away the significance of this embarrassing discovery. For it certainly proved that Khrushchev's and Gorbachev's aides had been lying — and this while the USSR and the CPSU were still in existence.⁴⁵

⁴⁵ Dzh. Arch Getti (Getty), "Trotskii v Izgnanii: Osnovanie IV Internatsionala." Voprosy Istorii KPSS 5 (1991), 72-83.

There was, and remains, an immense amount of evidence in Soviet archives that this bloc really existed. Broué's discovery of documents by Trotsky and his son Sedov verified this Soviet documentation. So Serov was lying here too.

Cherniavskii's discoveries

The Khrushchev and Gorbachev attempts to find evidence that the defendants in the 1938 Moscow trial were innocent have suffered total defeat. It is worth considering what this means.

The Soviets had access to everything, including vast amounts of documentary evidence that is unavailable to researchers today. They found no exculpatory evidence and so were obliged to falsify the results of their studies.

An objective, materialist approach to historical investigation demands that we draw the only conclusion permissible. The defendants in the Moscow trials — specifically, for our present purposes, the 1938 Moscow trial — were guilty. All the evidence points towards their guilt. Monumental efforts by those with strong motives to prove the opposite and all the resources at their command have failed. Truly objective students will have no problem with this conclusion. The only people who will reject it are those with powerful preconceived ideas.

We do not know all the evidence that the prosecution had against Rakovsky. Khrushchev-era, Gorbachev-era, and post-Soviet Russian leaders had and have no incentive to release this information because of the threat it poses to their anticommunist and anti-Stalin historical paradigm. However, we now have more evidence about Rakovsky than we did a few years ago. The curtain of secrecy surrounding this evidence was lifted just a crack for Georgii Cherniavskii and his coauthors who in 2014 published a biography of Rakovsky.

Cherniavskii was permitted to read Rakovsky's NKVD file as well as his file from Orlov prison. He disclosed some of what he read in his recent biography of Rakovsky. But Cherniavskii chose not to act with the objectivity of an ethical scholar. He was already convinced that Rakovsky had been innocent. Rakovsky's interrogations do not support this conclusion, so Cherniavskii did not reproduce any of them.

All Cherniavskii gives us are a few quotations from these confessions and letters. Nevertheless, some of these quotations are of considerable interest.

Though he was arrested on January 27, 1937, Rakovsky only began to confess on June 1, 1937, when he wrote a statement addressed to Ezhov. In it he wrote:

After four months of obstinate silence at the investigation I have concluded that the only correct thing to do is a fundamental change of my position. In beginning to give full and sincere confessions I wish to declare that I remained a Trotskyist until the present and have been connected with the Trotskyist underground. I promise to be sincere and truthful to the end and consider that my confessions about the counterrevolutionary work of the Trotskyist underground will help the Party and the state apparatus to root out the Trotskyist underground. (500-501)

The first interrogation transcript in Rakovsky's file is dated June 8, 1937. Cherniavskii writes:

"Having admitted" in it his adherence to "counterrevolutionary Trotskyism" Rakovsky at the same time dissociates himself from any accusation of terrorist activity.

I personally did not believe in terrorist activity and have not carried out any work along those lines.

Rakovsky does not claim that he was unaware of terrorist activity by the Trotskyist underground, only that he did not believe in or participate in such activity. We know that such activity did exist.

On June 29 Rakovsky admitted that he "shared the terrorist assumptions of the underground Trotskyist organization." He also said "I have recounted everything in my confessions and have nothing else to say."

During the next two months "Rakovsky wrote lengthy 'confessions' under the title 'My underground c-r [counterrevolutionary] work during my exile'" between 1928 and 1934. In this document Rakovsky cited the names of many persons but Cherniavskii does not mention any of them.

He claimed that after Trotsky's exile and the capitulation of a number of other oppositionists he became the primary theoretician of the opposition, conducted a large amount of analytical work....

But finally he arrived at the conclusion that the general line of the Party had led to a crisis that was becoming a catastrophe, that a return to the "pre-NEP period" was unavoidable — that is, a rejection of market relationships and a return to extraordinary measures. Rakovsky concluded that a coup had taken place in the country, that a complete transformation had taken place in the proletarian dictatorship and in the ideological structure of the Party itself; that, while remaining socialist at its base, insofar as the land and other implements and means of production remained socialized, the proletarian dictatorship had been transformed into a stratified society. The bureaucracy [sluzhebnoe soslovie] had replaced the proletariat and the working masses.

In the document now under consideration Rakovsky names two more important political works of that period [viz of his exile]: "Back to the socialist constitution, back to the Party program", and "Memoir of a Bolshevik-Leninist."

In his "confessions" Rakovsky recounted his work on his memoirs:

I collected an enormous amount of historical materials both on the history of the revolutionary movement in Russia and the Western workers' movement, of which I was a member, and on the national rebirth of the Balkan countries, and began to gradually write my memoirs, in which both the persons and the events of the history of the revolutionary working class movement of a number of countries, including Russia, were to be depicted.

Rakovsky, Trotsky, and the Japanese

Between June and August 1937 Rakovsky's testimony evidently concerned only his activities up to 1937. But on September 4, 1937, Rakovsky's statements began to change dramatically. On that day Rakovsky wrote the following:

At a time when the Soviet homeland could be facing international complications of every kind I consider it doubly my duty, both as a former member of the communist party and as a citizen of a socialist fatherland to relate honestly, fully and wholly everything that I did. (Cherniavskii 503)

According to Cherniavskii Rakovsky's confessions followed on September 8, 9, 10, 14, 16 and 17, and October 9, 10, and 12.

Rakovsky confessed that he had been recruited to Japanese intelligence by Prince Iyesato Tokugawa, chairman of the Japanese Red Cross between 1928 and 1938 and Chairman of the Standing Commission of the Red Cross and Red Crescent from 1934 to 1938. Tokugawa's name was not mentioned at trial. But it is in the draft of Vyshinskii's opening remarks which is published in the 2013 edition of the original transcript of the March 1938 Moscow trial, the same edition that contains Serov's report and the appeals of those defendants who were sentenced to death. (30)

On September 22, 1937, a face-to-face confrontation was held between Rakovsky and Konstantin IUrenev, former Soviet ambassador to Japan. IUrenev was not arrested until September 23, 1937. The near coincidence of dates suggests that the Soviet investigation did not know of IUrenev's involvement in the Trotskyist conspiracy until Rakovsky disclosed it. IUrenev said that he did not recognize Rakovsky; evidently, as the following suggests, he had grown haggard and unkempt in prison. Cherniavskii quotes Rakovsky's reply:

You did not recognize me. The prison regimen is such as the diet is moderate and does not allow one to maintain one's weight. This affected my illness negatively, but later they began to give me certain privileges in nourishment. But that is not why I have confessed... At last I understood that it was necessary to unmask myself [razoblachit' sebia] in order to unmask Trotsky and to give the Party the chance to strengthen its rear both against those who are

According to Cherniavskii, during one interrogation Rakovsky stated that Karl Radek had told him about Piatakov's secret flight to Oslo at the end of 1935 and meeting with Trotsky. (505) In a statement he made to Ezhov dated December 19-20, 1936, Piatakov stated that during his secret visit to Trotsky in Norway in 1935 Trotsky had told him to get in touch with Rakovsky by all means and tell him to work more actively. Piatakov said that he intended to meet with Rakovsky and transmit Trotsky's instructions, but was not able to do so.⁴⁶

⁴⁶ See Lubianka 1937-1938, Document No. 11, pp. 56-60; also at <http://www.alexanderyakovlev.org/fond/issues-doc/60982>

Rakovsky also stated that after he had been recruited by Prince Tokugawa his recruitment was confirmed by Japanese Minister of Foreign Affairs Koki Hirota (Foreign Minister September 1933 — April 1936) and then by Japanese Prime Minister Keisuke Okada (Prime Minister July 1934 to March 1936). (506) These names are also mentioned in the note of Gorbachev's Politburo Commission investigating the murder of Kirov, in their response to Iakovlev dated June 14, 1990.⁴⁷

⁴⁷ RKEB 3, p. 487; also at <http://www.alexanderyakovlev.org/fond/issues-doc/68180>

Convinced beforehand that Rakovsky and, for that matter, all defendants at all the Moscow trials were innocent, Cherniavskii considers it absurd that these high-ranking Japanese figures would have met with Rakovsky because such people do not meet with "spies." (506) Here Cherniavskii is grasping at a straw, for Rakovsky was no ordinary "spy." He was an agent who had once been a significant figure in the Bolshevik Party and who was closer to Trotsky than anyone else.

Rakovsky's Recruitment by the Japanese

Cherniavskii's account suggests that Rakovsky volunteered these names and the statement that he had agreed to work for Japanese intelligence to the extent of being Trotsky's representative. No one else knew about these activities. If Rakovsky had not volunteered these confessions and names they would not have figured in the charges against him or at the trial at all.

At sentencing Rakovsky was spared the death penalty on the grounds of "not having taken a direct part in the organization of terrorist, diversive, and wrecking activities." (1938 Trial, 800) Rakovsky was not convicted of espionage for British and Japanese intelligence. Espionage was mentioned only in the preamble, not in the sentence itself.

Cherniavskii read Rakovsky's confessions. Unfortunately for us he chose not to reproduce them. But Cherniavskii would certainly have told us of any sign that the NKVD investigators had invented the accusation that Rakovsky had become a Japanese spy and forced Rakovsky to confess to it. Cherniavskii says nothing of the sort.

In fact Cherniavskii thinks that Rakovsky himself invented the charge of Japanese espionage in order to make the trial look ridiculous. This means that according to Cherniavskii, the NKVD did not force Rakovsky to confess to espionage for Japan but that Rakovsky volunteered this information on his own.

Trotsky's Collaboration with the Japanese

However, there was one person who did confirm Rakovsky's spying for Japan — Trotsky himself. On February 27, 1937, just one month after Rakovsky's arrest, months before Rakovsky confessed to spying for Japan, Trotsky "predicted" that Rakovsky would do precisely that.

We recall that on February 27, 1937, Trotsky wrote:

It is quite certain that in the next trial, with Rakovsky participating as the accused, there will be charges of conspiratorial dealings between Rakovsky and the Japanese diplomats and military (under orders from Trotsky, of course).

And again on April 15, 1937, Trotsky wrote:

Now, I ask myself if it did not have a second purpose, to frame him afterwards — that he was connected with the Japanese military chiefs in the Government, and so forth.

Trotsky "predicted" that Rakovsky would confess, not to contact with agents of Japanese intelligence, but to direct contact with persons of the highest rank, with "diplomats" and "Japanese military chiefs in the Government."

And sure enough, Rakovsky said he had met with Koki Hirota and Keisuke Okada. Hirota was Japanese minister of foreign affairs. Okada was Prime Minister of Japan and also an admiral in the Imperial Japanese navy. These men perfectly fit Trotsky's description of "Japanese diplomats and military," "Japanese military chiefs in the Government."

A few defendants in the first two Moscow trials had also confessed to espionage for foreign powers. But not one of them said that he had been in contact with any persons of high rank. Only "Gestapo" agents, German professors, persons whom no one had heard of, had been mentioned.

Trotsky did not write "Rakovsky may be charged with collaboration with the Japanese (under orders from Trotsky, of course)." He did not write "Perhaps this time a defendant will be forced to admit to contact with high-ranking persons (under orders...)." Trotsky said that "It is quite certain that ... between Rakovsky and the Japanese diplomats and military." Six weeks later Trotsky was even more precise: "with the Japanese military chiefs in the Government."

How could Trotsky have been both so precise about whom Rakovsky would admit to meeting with, and at the same time so completely accurate? There is only one hypothesis that offers an answer to this question and that is consistent with Trotsky's stated practice to "expose the scheme in advance": Trotsky knew that Rakovsky had done these things.

Moreover, we also know how Trotsky knew what Rakovsky would testify: Rakovsky himself had informed him. In his trial testimony Rakovsky stated:

I wrote to Trotsky about all this — about my negotiations in Tokyo, about my conversations with Yurenev, about my meetings, and, of course, about this last proposition. (1938 Trial, 294)

How did Rakovsky manage to write Trotsky from within the Soviet Union? According to the testimony of two defendants Rakovsky had a way of contacting Trotsky that was special to himself. We have already seen that, according to Ezhov's letter to Stalin of January 27, 1937, Piatakov testified:

Concerning RAKOVSKY TROTSKY said that it was essential to talk with him and give him a push in his work along the lines of the Trotskyist organization. From this I deduced that RAKOVSKY had some personal line of contact with TROTSKY. (Lubianka 1937-1938, Doc. No. 11)

We recall that Serov denied Piatakov had really said this in his testimony. What's more, in the same report Ezhov reported to Stalin that another Trotskyist, Pavel Mill' (Okun') also knew of this:

According to confessions of PIATAKOV and MILL' (Okun') he had an independent line of contact with TROTSKY (and has effected this contact through ROSMER).⁴⁸

⁴⁸ According to a note in volume 5 of the series Arkhiv Trotskogo edited by IUrii G. Fel'shtinskii and Cherniavskii, Mill' was a pseudonym of Pavel Okun', a Soviet émigré and adherent of Trotsky's in Paris. He returned to the USSR in 1932. There are a number of letters from Trotsky to Okun' in the Trotsky Archive. See http://www.lib.ru/TROCKIJ/Arhiv_Trotskogo_t5.txt and note 504.

Serov remained silent about the fact that Mill' (Okun') confirmed Rakovsky's "independent line of contact with Trotsky." In the early 1930s Mill' (Okun') had worked with the International Secretariat of Trotsky's movement in Paris and so could have been privy to this information.

Given all the evidence we now have, the best explanation both for Rakovsky's confession that he agreed to work for Japanese intelligence, and for Trotsky's uncannily specific and accurate "prediction" that Rakovsky would admit this, is that it was true. Trotsky knew about these contacts from the Japanese, or from Rakovsky himself, or from both.

The Alternative Hypothesis

A tenet of good historiography is to "respect and welcome divergent points of view."⁴⁹ Though few anticommunist historians do so, and Cherniavskii certainly does not, it is an essential practice for anyone interested in discovering the truth. That means we are obligated to consider other possible hypotheses that might account for the evidence we have outlined here.

⁴⁹ American Historical Association. Statement on Standards of Professional Conduct. Washington, DC, 2011, 6.

In the present case, the only alternative hypothesis we can think of would be that the NKVD read Trotsky's remarks of February 27 and April 15, 1937, and, inspired by them, coerced Rakovsky to make a false confession that he had done exactly what Trotsky had said — that he had been recruited by "Japanese diplomats and military," "Japanese military chiefs in the Government." We need to examine this hypothesis to determine whether there is any evidence to sustain it.

In addition to Rakovsky's testimony at the March 1938 Moscow trial there are two independent sources for the story of Rakovsky's recruitment. The first is a letter from a Gorbachev-era Politburo commission to Aleksandr Iakovlev, one of Gorbachev's closest advisers and the leading ideological anti-Stalinist in his circle. Iakovlev had asked that researchers be tasked to gather evidence to support his hypothesis that Stalin had been responsible for having Sergei Kirov murdered on December 1, 1934. The research team had reported that there was no evidence to support this hypothesis. (RKEB 3, 202 ff.) To this Iakovlev reacted with a lengthy communication in which he asked them to look again. (RKEB 3, 325 ff.) The result was an even longer and very detailed response of over 23,000 words that occupies 48 closely-spaced pages in its 2004 publication. (RKEB 3, 459 ff.) In it the Politburo researchers demonstrate in detail to their high-ranking boss that there is simply no evidence to tie Stalin to Kirov's murder.

In the course of examining all the evidence related to the Moscow trials the commission members touched upon the March 9, 1938, closed session of the third Moscow trial. Here certain of the defendants identified the citizens of foreign countries who had recruited them for espionage. This session is mentioned in the trial transcript but is not recorded in it. Nor is it reproduced in the 2013 edition of the uncorrected transcript of the 1938 trial.

Here is what the Politburo commission said about this session, as regards Rakovsky's testimony at it:

At the closed court session of the Military collegium of the Supreme court of the USSR that took place on March 9, 1938, state prosecutor Vyshinsky questioned the participants of the so-called "Anti-Soviet Right-Trotskyist Bloc" about their espionage work for foreign states.

Rozengol'ts stated that he had been recruited by German ambassadors Dirksen and Schulenburg and confirmed his ties to German intelligence. Rakovsky confessed that when he was in Tokyo he had been recruited for espionage work for Japan by the Chairman of the Japanese delegation of the Red Cross, the Japanese prince Tokugawa, by the Minister of Foreign Affairs Hiroto, and also by the Prime-Minister of Japan admiral Okada. In addition Rakovsky confessed at this session about his ties with English intelligence to which he had been recruited by "Foreign Office" employees Lockhart and Armstrong with the knowledge of the Permanent Secretary of the English Ministry of Foreign Affairs "Sir William Tyrrell."⁵⁰

State for Foreign Affairs between 1925 and 1928. The Russian text reads Тире — "Tireh," no doubt a stenographer's error.

⁵¹ RKEB 3, 487. It appears that the Politburo Commission simply reproduced the summary of the Closed Session from the published version of the Russian-language trial transcript of 1938. Evidently they did not bother to obtain the original transcript of the Closed Session. Or perhaps this summary is the only record remaining.

The Politburo commission had all the Soviet archives at its disposal. There is no indication that Rakovsky was forced to name these names or that they were even suggested to him during the investigation. As we have already seen, Cherniavskii concluded that Rakovsky had volunteered this information of his own accord.

Cherniavskii is determined to defend his preconceived ideas that Rakovsky was innocent. Since he has no evidence at all to support this notion, he is forced to "channel" Rakovsky! Cherniavskii tries to explain Rakovsky's confessions to espionage for Japan and the persons Rakovsky named as part of a supposed "plan" to make statements so "absurd"⁵² that he himself and other supposedly "innocent victims" would be "rehabilitated" at some future time:

His main aim was to facilitate the future rehabilitation of innocent victims and, naturally, his own rehabilitation in the first place. (505)

⁵² Scare quotes around the words "plan" and "absurd" represent Cherniavskii's subjective comments, not any demonstrable intent of Rakovsky's.

Cherniavskii suggests an alternative explanation for Rakovsky's confessions:

An educated person who was fascinated by history and knew it well, Rakovsky must have remembered different episodes from various epochs when deliberately false confessions during investigations and trials had been given especially in order to undermine the whole accusation. (505-6)

Straining to find at least one example of such "different episodes" Cherniavskii cites a book about Joan of Arc published in 1991 in which the author suggests that one of Joan's prosecutors may have acted in this way. It is highly unlikely that Rakovsky would have been aware of this notion. It is also clear that Cherniavskii could not think of any other examples.

Cherniavskii read Rakovsky's investigation file. Gorbachev's Politburo commission read everything. Serov and his colleagues, who also had total access, tried hard to show that Rakovsky was framed but were unable to do so. Serov was forced to invent "agents" who were Rakovsky's "cellmates." Thanks to Cherniavskii we know that Rakovsky did not have any cellmates. We have demonstrated that Serov had to falsify a great deal of other material as well.

To sustain the alternative hypothesis that the NKVD read Trotsky's "predictions" of February 27 and April 15, 1937, and then forced Rakovsky to make false confessions conforming to what Trotsky had "predicted," one would need evidence that the NKVD did so. But all the evidence we now have is from:

- Serov's report of July 7, 1956,
- the Gorbachev-era Politburo commission,
- the Gorbachev-era Rehabilitation report of the Soviet Supreme Court,
- Rakovsky's own investigation file as described by Cherniavskii,
- Rakovsky's statements in the public part of the March 1938 trial,
- and the text of the secret session of March 9, 1938.

All this evidence is consistent only with the hypothesis that Rakovsky volunteered his testimony. There is no indication here that Rakovsky was compelled in any way to confess his ties to the Japanese.

Rakovsky's words give the appearance of a person striving to be truthful. At one point he rejects an accusation by Vyshinsky:

VYSHINSKY: I want to put the question bluntly: I have a grave suspicion that your signature on the letter which Armstrong presented to you, a letter addressed to the German intelligence service, was not forged but was actually signed by you, because you were then already an agent of the German intelligence service. Is this right or wrong?

RAKOVSKY: Absolutely wrong. (1938 Trial, 302-303)

Rakovsky also stated outright that he made his confession voluntarily and why he did so.

RAKOVSKY: I must say that I have pleaded guilty to this from the moment when I decided to give complete, exhaustive and frank testimony. For eight months I denied everything and refused to testify.

VYSHINSKY: Following the instructions and tactics of the Trotskyites?

RAKOVSKY: I will tell you what prompted me ...

VYSHINSKY: I have no objection if you will deal briefly with this, without long historical digressions. No objections, on my part.

RAKOVSKY: Very briefly. As I said, it was only in the eighth month that I began to make a clean breast of my main activities.

VYSHINSKY: Criminal activities.

RAKOVSKY: My criminal activities, of course. But before this the thought frequently arose in my mind: was I doing right in denying? Nobody will deny that imprisonment, solitude in general, makes people undertake a revaluation of values. But I remember, and will never forget as long as I live, the circumstances which finally impelled me to give evidence. During one of the examinations, this was in the summer, I learnt, in the first place, that Japanese aggression had begun against China, against the Chinese people, I learnt of Germany's and Italy's undisguised aggression against the Spanish people....

I learnt of the feverish preparations which all the fascist states were making to unleash a world war. What a reader usually absorbs every day in small doses in telegrams, I received at once in a big dose. This had a stunning effect on me. All my past rose before me. Of course this past may be reduced to naught and will be obliterated by my disgraceful actions, but as an inner motive, nothing and nobody can do anything against it. All my past rose before me, my responsibilities, and it became clear to me that I myself was a party to this, that I was responsible, that I myself had helped the aggressors with my treasonable activities. I knew that I was not alone, that I was harbouring illusions about them. Former heads of the government, former People's Commissars, former Assistant People's Commissars, former Ambassadors had become entangled in this web. And then I became a judge over myself, I sat in judgment over myself. This is a court which no one will reproach with being biased. I sat in judgment over myself. I had given myself to the labour movement from my youth, and where had I got to? I had reached a stage when I facilitated the vilest work with my actions, I had facilitated the fascist aggressors' preparations to destroy culture, civilization, all the achievements of democracy, all the achievements of the working class.

That is what induced me to speak, that is what overcame my obstinacy, my false shame born of vanity, fear for my own fate, which was not worthy of a man who had once taken part in the revolutionary movement. My rancour, which all of us harboured, some to a greater and some to a lesser extent, rancour against the leadership, rancour against particular individuals, had played a great part. Rancour and ambition fell from me. I considered that from now on my duty was to help in this struggle against the aggressor, that I would go and expose myself fully and entirely, and I told the investigator that on the following day I would begin to give complete, exhaustive testimony. I must say that the testimony which I gave here is absolutely complete, sincere and exhaustive.

Here Rakovsky states that "it was only in the eighth month that I began to make a clean breast of my main activities." This corresponds exactly with what Cherniavskii found in reading Rakovsky's investigation file. Rakovsky had already made some admissions about much earlier activity. But Cherniavskii states:

Only after almost seven and a half months from the time of his arrest did the prisoner again agree to make his confessions. (503)

Cherniavskii also outlines the reasons Rakovsky gave for finally revealing his Trotskyist activities on September 4, 1937.

On September 4 [1937] ... Rakovsky again wrote a statement to Ezhov, again permeated by "ambivalence" and internal contradictoriness, calculated so that his confessions could easily be considered false: "At a time when the Soviet homeland may face all kinds of international complications, I consider it to be doubly my duty both as a former member of the Communist Party and as a citizen of the socialist fatherland to relate frankly, fully, and completely everything that I have done." (503)

This quotation from Rakovsky's pretrial confession of September 4, 1937, recorded by Cherniavskii, is in complete accord with the following passage from Rakovsky's trial transcript:

I considered that from now on my duty was to help in this struggle against the aggressor, that I would go and expose myself fully and entirely, and I told the investigator that on the following day I would begin to give complete, exhaustive testimony. (1938 Trial, 314)

Convinced from the outset that Rakovsky and all other defendants were innocent and intolerant of all evidence to the contrary, Cherniavskii himself claims, without any evidence whatever, that Rakovsky was "broken" and wanted his confessions to be recognized as false by some future reader.

Here as elsewhere Cherniavskii has no evidence whatever for such claims, which serve only to demonstrate his own utter lack of objectivity. But Cherniavskii does make it clear that Rakovsky was not forced to confess by any maltreatment by the NKVD or by being exposed by other prisoners' testimony.

Hypotheses and Evidence

We have investigated two hypotheses to account for the evidence that Trotsky conspired with the Japanese. The first hypothesis is that Trotsky did indeed so conspire. This hypothesis accounts for all the evidence we have: Trotsky's very precise "predictions" on February 27 and April 15, 1937 that Rakovsky would be accused of conspiring on his — Trotsky's — behalf with Japanese diplomats and military men in the government; and Rakovsky's confession that he did indeed so conspire.

The alternative hypothesis is that the NKVD read Trotsky's "predictions" and, inspired by them, coerced Rakovsky to make confessions that conformed to Trotsky's statements. All the evidence in our possession refutes this hypothesis.

* In his statements Rakovsky named three prominent Japanese figures, including two in the government. But these names were not used during the trial. We only learned of them in 2004. So it is unlikely that the NKVD provided them.

* Because it is so clear that Rakovsky made his confession statements by himself, rather than prompted by anyone else, Cherniavskii was forced to suppose that they are "absurd" and so do not need to be taken seriously. In reality there is nothing objectively "absurd" about Rakovsky's confessions. This is Cherniavskii's stance whenever he is faced with evidence that contradicts his preconceived idea that Rakovsky was innocent. It is the logical fallacy known as the "argument from incredulity."⁵³

But it is also clear that Cherniavskii believes Rakovsky volunteered these statements, chose what to say and whom to name. This means that, in February and April 1937, Trotsky could only have known about Rakovsky's contact with "Japanese diplomats and military," "Japanese military chiefs in the Government," from Rakovsky himself.

⁵³ See, for example, https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Argument_from_ignorance#Argument_from_incredulity.2FLack_of_imagination

* Serov and Khrushchev's aides, and then Gorbachev's aides, were unable to find any evidence that Rakovsky was forced to confess. Serov constructed some fabrications about Rakovsky, since he had to present a report to Molotov and others who were unsympathetic to Khrushchev's idea that all the defendants in all the Moscow trials were innocent. Writing to Aleksandr Iakovlev, a person who wanted very badly to prove that Stalin had framed everybody, Gorbachev's aides were unable to cite any evidence that Rakovsky was innocent. Gorbachev's aides did not even bother to cite any of the purported statements by Rakovsky's supposed "cellmates" cited by Serov. This in itself is further reason to think that these statements are phony.

Both Serov and Gorbachev's aides had complete access to everything in the Soviet archives, including much material that is still top secret. We can assume that nothing in those still-secret archives suggests that Rakovsky was framed.

* Gorbachev's Soviet Supreme Court was tasked with "rehabilitating" the remaining defendants of the third Moscow trial, including Rakovsky. But it lacked any evidence on which to base its conclusion that the defendants had been wrongfully convicted. In its Rehabilitation report of February 4, 1988, still top-secret in Russia, the Soviet Supreme Court dishonestly cited Frinovskii's confession statement of April 11, 1939, which remained secret until 2006. As we have seen, Frinovskii's confession statement affirms the guilt of the defendants at the first and third Moscow trials as well as Frinovskii's and Ezhov's own guilt.

No evidence exists to support the hypothesis that the NKVD forced Rakovsky to structure his confessions in order to confirm Trotsky's "predictions" of February 27 and April 15, 1937. On the contrary, all the evidence we have suggests that Rakovsky confessed voluntarily without prompting from any source.

After recounting how one Japanese official told him that the Japanese government was dissatisfied with Trotsky's writings and with the activities of the Chinese Trotskyists Rakovsky said:

I wrote to Trotsky about all this — about my negotiations in Tokyo, about my conversations with Yurenev, about my meetings, and, of course, about this last proposition. (1938 Moscow Trial, 294)

That would account for Trotsky's knowing what Rakovsky might testify, and so for Trotsky's "prediction."

Trotsky Conspired with the Japanese

The only hypothesis that can successfully account for the evidence now available is that Trotsky did indeed collaborate with the Japanese. Trotsky aimed to make the charge appear so absurd and yet so obvious that he could "predict" it in advance. But we know that Trotsky frequently did this before in hopes of blunting the sting of a charge that he knew might soon be made against him because it was true.

In Trotsky's 'Amalgams' we examined the "name of Trotsky" issue in the Kirov murder case, the "restoration of capitalism," and the "armed intervention" charges. We also established that Trotsky lied a great deal. Trotsky had to lie, of course. Lying is essential in any conspiracy. But this fact means that we can never accept Trotsky's statements, including his denials, as truthful.

We have also seen how Trotsky used the stratagem of "exposing the scheme in advance" many times. We have discovered that he did this as a way to ward off, in advance, accusations that he could be reasonably certain would be forthcoming.⁵⁴ Trotsky could not prevent the Soviet prosecution — "Stalin" — from uncovering and exposing his, Trotsky's, conspiratorial activities. But he could claim that these accusations were so crude, so transparent, that he could even "predict" them in advance.

⁵⁴ See Furr, Trotsky's 'Amalgams,' Chapters 13 through 15, sections titled "Expose the scheme in advance."

In the present case Trotsky overstepped. He would have done much better to make a more general "prediction" — say, that Rakovsky would confess to some kind of clandestine contact with some Japanese figures. Instead, Trotsky stated exactly what Rakovsky would confess. This was a "prediction" so precise that the only way Trotsky could have made it is if he knew what Rakovsky would say — that is, if Rakovsky's confession was true.

Cherniavskii expresses concern that Rakovsky did not always name only persons who had already been convicted and whom therefore, his confessions could presumably not harm any further. He specifically mentions the diplomats K.K. IUREnev and D.V. Bogomolov. Rakovsky's face-to-face confrontation with IUREnev was on September 22, 1937, with Bogomolov on October 8. (507) This was before their arrests. Cherniavskii states that IUREnev and Bogomolov had already been arrested by the time Rakovsky named them, but this is not the case. IUREnev was arrested on September 23, 1937, Bogomolov on October 13, 1937.⁵⁵

It appears that Rakovsky was given credit for having freely confessed some things that would otherwise not have been known. One example was Rakovsky's confession of espionage for Japan. Rakovsky also seems to have identified some persons about whose participation in the anti-Soviet conspiracy the NKVD did not know.

Rakovsky was sentenced to 20 years in prison. Another defendant in the same trial, Dr. D.D. Pletnev, was given a 25-year sentence on the grounds that he had known of the conspiracy to murder some of his famous patients and, although he had not contributed to their deaths, he had not voluntarily informed on the conspiracy even when Iagoda had been removed from office and he had the chance to do so. By contrast, Rakovsky had given important information voluntarily.

Rakovsky's Fraudulent Rehabilitation

Rakovsky was rehabilitated by a decree of the Soviet Supreme Court on February 4, 1988. The text of the rehabilitation decree is still secret in Russia today. But in 1995 General Dmitrii Volkogonov authorized the shipment of his archive out of Russia to the West. A copy ended up in the Library of Congress. In 2000 the Volkogonov Archive became open to researchers. A careful perusal of this poorly-indexed archive turned up a copy of the rehabilitation decree. We can be sure it is the right document because a reproduction of the header of the first and footer of the last page of the original was reproduced in the 1991 book Reabilitatsiia. Politicheskie protsessy 30-50-kh godov, pp. 240-241.

This rehabilitation report is falsified. On page 7 we find the following statement:

According to the testimony of former NKVD worker Aronson, questioned in 1956, the convicted prisoner Kh.G. Rakovsky while in prison in May of 1941 also told him about the falsification of the materials of the criminal case and about his wrongful conviction.

We have already considered this alleged statement by "Aronson," also attributed by Serov to an "agent Finn." It is hearsay at best and most likely a fabrication solicited by Serov for his July 7, 1956, report. In any case, the mere claim of a defendant that the evidence against him was falsified and that he is innocent, carries no weight as evidence unless it is firmly corroborated by other independent testimony or physical evidence.

Page 6 of the rehabilitation report summarizes parts of Frinovskii's confession statement of April 11, 1939, as follows:

Former Assistant People's Commissar for Internal Affairs of the USSR Frinovskii in his statement of April 11, 1939, admitted that workers of the NKVD USSR "prepared" the prisoners for the interrogations at face-to-face confrontations, alerting them to possible questions and answers to them. Ezhov frequently talked with those to be interrogated. If the prisoner recanted his confessions he gave the investigator the order to "restore" the prisoner, that is to obtain from him his previous false confessions. According to Frinovskii's confessions Ezhov often spoke with N.I. Bukharin, A.I. Rykov, P.P. Bulanov and other defendants and tried to convince each of them that the court would spare their lives if they admitted their guilt.

The rehabilitation report conceals Frinovskii's specific statement, in his confession statement, that Ezhov took a hands-off stance towards the 1938 Moscow trial.

An active participant in investigations generally, Ezhov kept himself aloof from the preparation of this trial...

It also falsifies through omission by concealing Frinovskii's explanation of what Ezhov told the defendants: not that their lives would be spared if they confessed, but if they did not mention Ezhov's participation in the conspiracy.

Here Ezhov unquestionably was ruled by the necessity of covering up his own ties with the arrested leaders of the Right who were going into the public trial.

It also omits all the parts of Frinovskii's statement in which he makes it clear Zinoviev, Kamenev, and the defendants in the March 1938 Moscow trial really were conspirators; that he and Ezhov were involved in this conspiracy; and much more.

The "rehabilitation" report contains this passage:

Former workers of the NKVD of the USSR Frinovskii, Agranov, Nikolaev, Dmitriev, Tserpento, Ushakov, Chistov, Passov, Kogan, Gerzon, Glebov, Lulov and others, who took a direct role in the investigation of this criminal case, were later convicted for illegal arrests, falsification of evidence, and other very serious violations of law.

We know that many of these men had in fact been involved in the investigation of the defendants in the March 1938 trial.⁵⁶ The most significant falsification here is by omission. Most of these men were Ezhov's accomplices in the massive frame-ups of innocent persons. After Ezhov's removal they were investigated, arrested, tried, and shot under Beria. Of the others who can be identified and about whom we have found reliable data, Nikolaev-Zhurid was arrested October 25, 1938, tried and convicted February 4, 1939; D.M. Dmitriev was arrested June 28, 1938, tried and convicted March 7, 1939; Z.I. Passov was arrested October 22, 1938, tried and convicted February 14, 1940.

⁵⁶ Iakov S. Agranov was expelled from the Party in July 1937 and arrested on July 20, 1937, almost seven months before the trial. The editors of Genrikh Iagoda, who had access to former NKVD files now in possession of the FSB (successor to the NKVD, MVD-MGB, KGB) revealed in 1997 that Agranov was convicted of involvement in Iagoda's conspiracy and in a conspiracy with the Socialist Revolutionaries. He admitted guilt in letters to Stalin and Ezhov. A partial transcript of an interrogation of former NKVD man Trilisser in January 1939 records that Trilisser named Agranov as one of Iagoda's co-conspirators. (Genrikh Iagoda, 39-40; 531).

All these men were tried and convicted, during Beria's investigation of Ezhov's crimes. It was Stalin and his close associates who appointed Beria to replace Ezhov and then to investigate and prosecute the crimes of Ezhov and his men.

There is no evidence that the March 1938 Moscow trial involving Rakovsky and others had anything to do with the convictions of these men. Frinovskii's statement makes it clear that the 1938 Moscow trial defendants of whom he speaks, Bukharin, Iagoda, Rykov, and Bulanov, were guilty and also concealed Ezhov's participation in the conspiracy.

Rakovsky was rehabilitated as a part of the group of defendants in the March 1938 trial who had not been rehabilitated previously.⁵⁷ Other than the statement from "Aronson" which we have examined above the Rehabilitation report contains no evidence consistent with Rakovsky's innocence.

Принято к сведению сообщение председателя Верховного Суда СССР о том, что Пленум Верховного Суда своим постановлением 4 февраля 1988 г. отменил приговор Военной Коллегии в отношении осужденных Н.И. Conclusion

The main conclusion of this chapter is that Leon Trotsky did collaborate with the Japanese. This is the only hypothesis that accounts for the evidence we now have. Trotsky had a practice of anticipating charges that he surmised would probably be made against him because they were true and because persons who knew about his activities had been arrested. There is no other way Trotsky could have "predicted" long in advance that Rakovsky would claim at trial that he was mediating between Trotsky and Japanese military men in the government.

Cherniavskii read Rakovsky's file. He confirms that Rakovsky himself volunteered the information that he had agreed to what amounted to espionage for Japan — to carrying messages for Japanese intelligence to Trotsky who had some prior agreement with the Japanese. This means we can be certain that the NKVD did not learn about Trotsky's "prediction" of February 27, 1937, and then, inspired by it, force Rakovsky to confirm it and confess to espionage for Japan.

What's more, the court's verdict against Rakovsky did not even mention this espionage. Why would the NKVD — "Stalin" — fabricate a charge that Rakovsky had been Trotsky's emissary to the Japanese, supply the names of important Japanese political figures, force Rakovsky to confess to this charge and to name these names, and then insist that the names not appear in the trial testimony and Rakovsky not be convicted on the espionage charge? There is no shred of evidence to support such a vacuous and self-contradictory hypothesis.

The verdict most likely reflected the judges' determination that Rakovsky had cooperated with the prosecution by confessing to crimes that the prosecution did not know about from other sources. Rakovsky seems to have also done this when he named IUrenev and Bogomolov. IUrenev was arrested on September 23, 1937, the day after the face-to-face confrontation with Rakovsky. Bogomolov was arrested on October 13, 1937, five days after his October 8 face-to-face confrontation with Rakovsky. This implies that the NKVD did not have enough evidence against either man to arrest them until Rakovsky exposed them. Both IUrenev and Bogomolov were tried, convicted, and executed; Rakovsky was not executed.

Our conclusion that Trotsky did collaborate in some fashion with the Japanese is consistent with a great deal of other evidence of his collaboration with Germany and Japan. We study this evidence in other chapters of the present book. There is a striking lack of objectivity — in fact, a rejection of the concept of objectivity itself — in the historiography of the Stalin years, including that of the Moscow trials. Often this lack of objectivity takes the form of outright denial: "I don't believe it; therefore it is not true." This is the argument from incredulity, a specific form of "begging the question," assuming that which is to be proven, and a logical fallacy.

Lack of objectivity often takes the form of rejecting all NKVD evidence, all Moscow trial evidence, or even all Soviet evidence. To assume any evidence is invalid is once again to commit the fallacy of "begging the question." In order to argue, much less prove, that testimony is not true, that material evidence is forged, planted, etc., evidence is needed.

Lack of objectivity can also take the form of rejecting a hypothesis because evidence from some specific source or other is lacking. This too is a logical fallacy: "Lack of evidence is not necessarily evidence of lack." The fact that no documentary evidence from German or Japanese archives has been found that confirms Trotsky's collaboration is not evidence that Trotsky did not collaborate.

In this as in all historical inquiry the proper question is not "What really happened?" Instead it is: "What conclusion best accounts for the evidence we have?" All historical inquiry is in principle without time limits. We must regard all conclusions as provisional, to be amended upon the discovery either of new evidence or of a better interpretation of the existing evidence.

By the same token we must stand by the hypothesis that best accounts for the evidence we now have, even when — especially when — that conclusion contradicts or insults our strongly-held preferences, biases, or preconceived ideas. Only such an approach can be termed objective.

By these standards we are compelled to conclude that Leon Trotsky did collaborate with the Japanese and that Khristian Rakovsky was a party to this collaboration.

Chapter 5. Conclusion

Based on the nature and amount of the evidence we have we must conclude that Leon Trotsky did indeed collaborate with the Germans and Japanese.

The evidence we have cited cannot be accounted for by any processes of fabrication:

- There is far too much of it.
- Much of it was never intended to be made public.
- It comes from different sources.
- It is all mutually corroborative. Evidence about Trotsky's German/Japanese collaboration is part of a complex of evidence about other conspiracies by other persons. Those conspiracies are well supported by evidence too. This corroborates the part of that evidence that inculpates Trotsky.
- Some of the evidence — that of the Tukhachevsky Affair interrogation testimony and trial confessions, and Iakovlev's confession — is so strong that it would be sufficient to establish the fact of Trotsky's collaboration in and of itself, even if we did not have any additional archival or trial evidence.
- There is no evidence counteracting it.

During Khrushchev's time, during Gorbachev's tenure as head of the CPSU and then of the USSR, during Eltsin's time, and in fact until today, an enormous amount of effort has been devoted by the Soviet government and Party leaders and subsequently by the Russian government to find evidence in the archives that proves the Moscow Trials and Tukhachevsky Affair defendants were framed. All such searches have been fruitless. In principle all claims to historical truth remain forever subject to revision in the light of new evidence which may be discovered in the future, or of new and better interpretations of the existing evidence. But in this case it seems there is nowhere for future contradictory evidence to come from. Even though they are still top-secret and only a tiny number of researchers can see them, we know that the Soviet archives have been thoroughly searched.

It is reasonable to surmise that no evidence that exculpates the Moscow Trials defendants, or Trotsky, will be discovered in future. In fact just the opposite is the case: we can be confident that much in the archives is still classified because it would confirm the guilt of the defendants of the 1930s and disconfirm the "anti-Stalin" paradigm. This would be the "cannon shot," in Col. Alksnis's words, that would destroy the anticommunist — and, of course, the Trotskyist — historiography of the Stalin era.

Objectivity and Denial

There is only one conclusion consistent with an objective assessment of the evidence we now have. We have not reached this conclusion out of animosity against Trotsky or, for that matter, out of partisanship for Stalin. On the contrary: like other people, scholars have preconceived ideas and prejudices. In the search for historical truth as in science, scholars are obliged to form a hypothesis and put it to the test — which means they must be ready to find evidence contradictory to their hypothesis. In this case the evidence confirms our hypothesis that Trotsky did collaborate with Germany and Japan.

Some people will find this conclusion to be unacceptable to them. Few subjects during the past century have so engaged the passions of so many men and women as has the communist movement. Within that movement surely one of the most contentious issues has and continues to be the "Stalin vs Trotsky" debate. There are few "Stalinists"¹ around today though that situation may be changing somewhat, especially within Russia. There are many more supporters of Trotsky. Trotskyists are passionately devoted to a heroic version of Trotsky's life and legacy.

Anticommunists and Trotskyists are both loyal to a paradigm of Soviet history and especially of the 1930s that is utterly incompatible with the conclusions we have drawn in this essay. We predict that, regardless of the evidence, neither staunch anticommunists nor Trotskyists will ever accept that Trotsky did in fact collaborate with Germany and Japan. The "Cold War paradigm" — or, as we have called it, the "anti-Stalin paradigm" of Soviet history during Stalin's time depends upon the construction of Stalin as an evil man who was killing innocent people, orchestrating judicial frame-ups, and — for Trotskyists — destroying the communist movement. If Trotsky and, by implication, the oppositionists who worked with him were guilty of the crimes with which they were charged and to which most, though not Trotsky, confessed, then this anti-Stalin paradigm of Soviet history is dismantled.

Trotsky's and Sedov's denials cannot be taken seriously. It is true generally that denials of guilt are of little interest to any investigator. The guilty as well as the innocent can be expected to proclaim their innocence. And while even confessions of guilt should not be automatically assumed to be truthful, the same is decidedly true of professions of innocence.

It is certain that there will be readers of this essay who will deny the conclusions of this analysis, and will do so by raising one or more of the objections we will now consider.

Torture

The issue of torture is cited very often as, supposedly, an "explanation" for the confessions by all the persons whose testimony we have cited here. In fact this is a very weak explanation.

Is it possible that all the accounts by all the witnesses we have cited could have been obtained by torturing, or otherwise forcing, the witnesses to make these statements, and then carefully coordinating or "scripting" them? Is it possible that all the defendants memorized "scripted" confessions to make during the investigation, when the materials were all secret; then again at the public trial; and then again in the texts of their secret appeals for clemency to the Soviet Supreme Court — and all out of fear of "torture"?

The question of torture is an important one as it goes to the heart of our study and of historical methodology generally — namely, the question of evidence. First: it is not easy to determine whether or not a given individual was, in fact, tortured.

- It should be obvious that the mere fact that a defendant claims he was tortured does not mean that he was in fact tortured. The general principle is that no one should simply be assumed to be telling the truth, or assumed to be lying, without substantiating evidence. Falsely claiming one was tortured could be a way of explaining shameful behavior — naming others in one's confession, for example — while preserving some self-respect or dignity. During and after the Khrushchev period it became well known that defendants could often get their convictions vacated and rights restored by claiming they had been tortured.
- We can't conclude that an arrestee was tortured simply because an NKVD investigator later said that he was. This is true a fortiori if the NKVD man (or someone else) claims to know it at second hand, from someone else, rather than confessing to torturing the prisoner himself.
- We have to be skeptical of what NKVD men or other investigators wrote or testified during the Khrushchev years. During this time NKVD men were not simply threatened with serious penalties, including death, but some were actually executed on the grounds that they had beaten prisoners during the 1930s up to 1940-41, despite the fact that Khrushchev himself claimed this had been permitted by a Central Committee decision.
- Even less can we accept the "fruit of the poisoned tree" argument: "A was, apparently, tortured, and he named B and C, so ALL were, in fact, innocent."

The "fruit of the poisoned tree" logic is a judicial — legal — principle. It means that evidence obtained in an unlawful manner should not be used in court even when that evidence discloses a crime. It does not speak to the question of guilt or innocence, and guilt or innocence is what we are interested in.

- We can't conclude that an arrestee was innocent of the crimes he was charged with, or to which he confessed, on the sole grounds that he, or someone else, claims he was tortured. First, those claims may be false.

Second, the fact that someone has been tortured does not mean that they were innocent. Guilty persons can also be tortured and coerced into confessing actual crimes.

- If there were repeated written complaints of torture, coupled with retractions of confessions during the investigation, at trial, or both, that would lend credence to such complaints. If and when they are also accompanied by confessions of torture by the torturer(s) and/or their superiors, the claims would become even more credible. But we have none of these things concerning the defendants at the Moscow Trials or the Tukhachevsky Affair.

Furthermore, even if we could be reasonably assured that a defendant was tortured, that does not mean that the defendant was innocent of all crimes he was charged with. A number of defendants who claimed they were tortured made differentiated confessions, withdrawing part of their confessions on the grounds that they were false, made under duress, but not withdrawing other parts. This is strong evidence that the part of the confession not withdrawn is truthful — otherwise, why not withdraw or deny all of it?

The fact that a confession could not be used in evidence against a defendant unless it had been confirmed at trial, and that many defendants did in fact retract their confessions at trial, means that we should be hesitant to discount confessions by persons who did not retract their confessions at trial when they could have done so.

Moreover, there were a number of reasons why a defendant might withdraw his confession at trial. One would be, of course, that he was really innocent and the confession was false. But another is that doing so would force the prosecution to produce at trial other evidence of the defendant's guilt — for example, the testimony of his accusers or material evidence. And that could delay matters, perhaps winning time for an appeal. According to Aleksei Pavliukov, a recent biographer of Ezhov, it seems that Nikolai Ezhov withdrew his numerous confessions at trial for exactly this reason. (Pavliukov 2007, 530)

We can be confident — at least, until good evidence to the contrary should be discovered — that the torture of many defendants, though not of those whose statements we examine in this article, did take place because the evidence for it comes from a number of different sources. The chances that all that evidence could have been "orchestrated" — fabricated into a coherent pattern — become negligible.

For the same reason we can be confident that Trotsky did conspire with the Germans and Japanese. There is so much evidence of it, from so many different sources, and it is so consistent with other information we have, that the chances it has all been fabricated is vanishingly small.

The Charge of "Torture" As Smokescreen

Could torture have been going on "behind the scenes" so that we have no knowledge of it? Or, should we simply assume that a defendant was tortured if he confessed to serious crimes, even if we have no evidence that he was?

To this second question the response has to be: No. We must always demand evidence. Without evidence that some event occurred it is illegitimate to conclude that it did. It is not scientific to assume that something is going on unseen and leaving no trace. If in fact there is no material evidence that a given witness was lying, while evidence that corroborates some of his statements does exist, we must conclude that he was not lying. Likewise, absent evidence that a person was tortured it is illegitimate to assume that he was and legitimate to assume for all practical purposes and for the time being, that he was not.

We have no evidence that any of the defendants in the three Moscow Trials were tortured. In the best-documented case, that of Nikolai Bukharin, we know as certainly as we ever can that Bukharin was not tortured.² Stephen F. Cohen, author of the most famous and influential book about Bukharin, has concluded that Bukharin could not have been tortured. (Cohen 2003, 61) Cohen is still convinced Bukharin was innocent. But has no way of explaining why Bukharin confessed.

The issue of torture is separate from the issue of guilt or innocence. It should be obvious that guilty persons can be tortured too. "Means of physical pressure," the usual general term (and euphemism) in the USSR at this time, could be applied to defendants to induce them to confess to what they actually had done. Therefore, even if it can be proven somehow that a person actually has been tortured that does not mean he did not commit the acts he is charged with. It only means that, according at least to the rules of jurisprudence in some countries, his confession should not be used against him at trial.

In a court procedure evidence that a defendant has made statements because of mistreatment or threats is (or is supposed to be) sufficient to have the statements thrown out. This practice is necessary to protect the rights of the defendant. It's also necessary to guarantee that the investigators actually try to solve crimes instead of simply mistreating suspects until one of them confesses. That evidence of mistreatment does or does not come to the attention of the court, in many cases in many countries, is beside the present point. But we have no evidence that the Soviet courts violated this principle in the 1930s.

Historians are faced with a different situation. The question of guilt or innocence is not at all the same as that of whether a defendant received a fair trial. For instance, there is broad agreement among historians that the Haymarket defendants in Chicago in 1886 did not receive a fair trial, but there is debate about whether one of them, August Spies, may have fabricated the bomb and whether another, Louis Lingg, may have thrown it. Likewise there is a consensus that Sacco and Vanzetti did not receive a fair trial in Massachusetts in 1921, but there is some disagreement as to whether Sacco may in fact have committed the murder for which they were both executed.

A guilty person may confess guilt whether tortured or not. A guilty person may claim innocence even if tortured, or if not tortured. Likewise, an innocent person may confess guilt if tortured, but innocent persons have been known to falsely confess guilt without any compulsion at all. And an innocent person may persist in proclaiming her innocence under torture or absent any mistreatment. Among the military figures, Putna and Fel'dman may have been beaten. We do not even know that for certain. It is stated in the Shvernik Report and in the "rehabilitation" document of 1989 that draws upon it. But many of these "rehabilitation" documents are falsified. As always, there is no certain evidence.

But even if they were beaten, that does not indicate whether they were guilty or innocent. The Shvernik Report contains much evidence of their guilt. So, whether they were tortured or not, we have a lot of evidence that they were guilty. And it is guilt or innocence — what happened — rather than whether proper judicial procedure was used, that concerns us here.

The idea that not only the military men in the Tukhachevsky Affair but all the defendants in all the Moscow Trials could have been made to confess to false charges by torture or the threat of it, despite the lack of evidence of either torture or threat, is as absurd as any statement we are likely to face. But that fact is never going to stop those who want and need to believe these men were innocent from believing it.

We have no evidence that any of the other defendants in the Tukhachevsky Affair were beaten or otherwise tortured. As we have seen above in our examination of the Budennyi letter³ we have excellent evidence that these men confessed at their private trial. We know that Khrushchev-era and Gorbachev-era "rehabilitation" commissions lied and dissembled in a vain attempt to argue the innocence of these and many other defendants. We have discussed a number of examples of this in detail in an examination of Khrushchev's "Secret Speech" of 1956.⁴

³ We have studied Budennyi's letter to Voroshilov in Trotsky's 'Amalgams' Chapter 9, and in Furr, Grover, and Vladimir L. Bobrov. "Marshal S.M. Budiennyi on the Tukhachevsky Trial. Impressions of an Eye-Witness" (in Russian). Klio No. 2 (2012), pp. 8-24.

⁴ See Furr, Khrushchev Lied.

The charge of "torture" serves the purpose of deflecting attention away from the evidence that we do have. As invoked in the historiography of the Moscow Trials and Tukhachevsky Affair it is a smokescreen, a rhetorical, propaganda device to stop us from looking squarely at the large body of evidence we have. It is an attempt to make us disregard that evidence.

Lack of German or Japanese Evidence

The objection will be heard: "If there had really been such a conspiracy then some documentation of it would have been found in captured German or Japanese archives."

The principle "lack of evidence is not necessarily evidence of a lack" applies here. The lack of evidence in German or Japanese archives would not destroy the other evidence we do have, and which we have analyzed above. It would not mean that no conspiracy existed.

However, any claim that no such documentation exists would be false. We do have evidence from both Czech and German archives that during the period roughly from the end of 1936 through the first quarter of 1937 Hitler and the German government were awaiting a military coup against the Stalin regime. Thanks to a slip of the tongue by a Japanese military commander in a talk with Japanese journalists in early 1937 we know that Opposition figures within the USSR were sending the Japanese military information — that, is, committing espionage. Genrikh Liushkov privately told the Japanese that real conspiracies existed among Soviet military leaders, even naming some of those against whom other evidence exists. We also have a great deal of other evidence concerning the defendants in the Moscow Trials and the Tukhachevsky Affair that points to the guilt of the defendants. This too is consistent with the results of our present investigation.

Lack of Documentary Proof

As we discussed earlier, Getty discovered that the Trotsky Archive at Harvard had been imperfectly purged of evidence that Trotsky was in contact with his followers in the USSR. Meanwhile Trotsky and Sedov lied in denying such contact. Suppose the purging had been more competent and that all trace of this contact had been successfully removed. Would that mean that no such contact had taken place? Of course it would not. And as this essay has demonstrated, there is no lack of such evidence in other locations. In fact, in the face of such a plethora of alternative evidence, the only partially successful removal of a portion of the evidence from the Trotsky Archive is itself evidence of someone's desire to cover up Trotsky's and Sedov's guilt.

Thanks to Getty we know that there used to be some kind of incriminating documentation of Trotsky's activities in his own archive. Was there other such documentation aside from that we know to have existed — letters to his major supporters inside the USSR? We don't know. We can't legitimately conclude that there wasn't, or for that matter that there was.

It is an error in logic and method to fetishize documentary evidence. Any kind of evidence, including documentary evidence, can be faked. In fact it would arguably have been easier to forge documents inculcating Trotsky in the alleged collaboration with Germany and Japan than to coordinate a large number of confessions, particularly public ones, and then coordinate a number of secret, written appeals for clemency, all testifying to events that never in fact happened.

In order to conclude that, despite the evidence cited in this article, Trotsky did not collaborate with Germany and Japan one would be forced to assume that the Soviet authorities orchestrated a vast network of false confessions by many individuals over many months, all of which inculcate Trotsky of German and/or Japanese collaboration, and in a more or less consistent manner. There is no evidence that this kind of orchestration actually took place.

It is tacitly supposed that it all happened "behind the scenes," out of sight of the public trials. Yet now that, thanks to archival documents, we have a glimpse "behind the scenes" we can discern no such fabrication. On the contrary: the investigative materials we now have only confirm the trial testimony.

The vast majority of the investigative materials remain top-secret in Russia today. We simply do not know what kind of evidence they may hold. Some of it is certainly documentary. We don't know whether any of it is documentary evidence of Trotsky's collaboration with Germany and Japan.

The fact that we do not know about any evidence in the secret Soviet archives inculcating Trotsky does not mean such evidence does not exist. It only means we do not know about any.

We know that there is other documentary evidence of some of the conspiracies. The Shvernik Report discusses the Arao Document, a communication from a Japanese military attaché to his superior in Japan testifying to secret contact with a representative of Marshal Tukhachevsky. The Report gives the text of this telegram. Therefore it must have still existed in 1962-64 when the report was being compiled. We discuss the Arao Document in Trotsky's 'Amalgams.'

Yet Iulia Kantor does not even mention it in her two supposedly authoritative books on Tukhachevsky, though of course she knew of it. Kantor wanted to support the theory that Tukhachevsky and the rest were innocent, and this document would not have been helpful. We don't know whether the physical document still exists or not. We can be thankful that the Shvernik Report compilers transcribed and discussed it.

What kind of written documentation of a clandestine conspiracy should we expect to have ever existed? Both Radek and Tukhachevsky claim that they had notes from Trotsky which they burned. It would have been foolish in the extreme for them not to have destroyed such incriminating evidence. The Bolsheviks were experienced in working conspiratorially. They had years of practice doing so under the Tsar. They knew better than to keep written lists of fellow conspirators, written plans, and in general anything in writing that would, if discovered by the police, cause disaster to the conspiracy.

Corroborative Evidence

There are two kinds of evidence that corroborate the direct evidence of Trotsky's collaboration with Germany and Japan. The first is the testimony of those who like Nikolai Bukharin and Genrikh Iagoda admitted to participation in a bloc or alliance with others who had first-hand knowledge of Trotsky's collaboration with Germany and/or Japan but who claimed no ties with Germany or Japan themselves.

Iagoda testified that he learned of Trotsky's direct contact with the Germans from Avel' Enukidze and Lev Karakhan. We have examined Karakhan's testimony above. Most of Enukidze's investigative file is still secret. Neither of the two interrogations of Enukidze published to date mentions his contacts with Trotsky.

Concerning Nikolai Bukharin we have much more information than about any of the other defendants in the various Soviet trials. We have discovered, edited, and published his first confession of June 2, 1937. This is also the only pre-trial confession of Bukharin that we have; the Russian government continues to keep all the others secret.⁵ We have also discovered and published the falsified decree of the Gorbachev-era Soviet Supreme Court "rehabilitating" Bukharin on February 4, 1988, together with a study of it.⁶ Neither of these documents was ever made accessible to researchers, much less published, before or during Gorbachev's day; both are still top-secret in Russia today. The "rehabilitation" decree cites a quotation from a document — Mikhail Frinovskii's confession statement of April 11, 1939 — that was secret in 1988 but that has since been published. That document is cited as evidence that Bukharin was innocent. In fact it contains evidence that Bukharin was guilty.

⁵ We have discovered one additional confession of Bukharin's of February 20, 1938. This confession is still secret in Russia. It does not deal with Trotsky.

Bukharin's first confession implicates Trotsky, as does his Trial testimony. We have also examined Bukharin's appeal of his death sentence to the Soviet Supreme Court, in which he reiterates his guilt and claims that for his crimes he should be "shot ten times over."

There is no reason whatever to doubt that Bukharin was telling the truth in his pre-trial and trial confessions and in his post-trial appeal. Bukharin was very clear and explicit that Radek had told him more than once about Trotsky's involvement with the Germans and Japanese.

This is corroborative evidence. Bukharin's first confession corroborates Radek's confession at the January 1937 Trial — Bukharin confirms what Radek said, meanwhile adding a bit more detail. Bukharin's first confession also corroborates the truthfulness of his own statements at his trial in March 1938. The most striking corroboration is Bukharin's two appeals after his trial, where he confirms his guilt in the strongest possible terms.

A second kind of corroborative evidence consists of evidence from persons who claimed first-hand or second-hand knowledge of Trotsky's collaboration and who themselves were working with either Germany or Japan. According to the evidence now available three of the eight figures in the Tukhachevsky Affair — Primakov, Putna, and Tukhachevsky himself — had direct contact with both Trotsky and the Germans. The other six defendants, all officers of the highest ranks, would almost certainly have known about Trotsky's involvement.

Very little of the investigative and judicial (trial) materials in the three Moscow Trials, the Tukhachevsky Affair, and the broader military conspiracy, has been made public. The rest remains top-secret in Russia today, probably for the reasons Col. Alksnis suggests. Still, enough has leaked out that we have a great deal of evidence, some of it documentary, of German and Japanese collaboration by oppositionists, including military figures.

We also have a number of transcripts of interrogation-confessions of Nikolai Ezhov, head of the NKVD between September 1936 and November 1938. In the earliest one that we have, an interrogation dated April 26, 1939, Ezhov testifies to his own direct collaboration with German military and intelligence figures. Ezhov stated he too was in contact with General Hammerstein.⁷ Hammerstein asked Ezhov specifically how much influence the Trotskyists had in the Bolshevik Party.

Question: Did your further meetings with Hammerstein take place?

Answer: Yes, I had three more meetings with Hammerstein. At the second meeting Hammerstein expressed interest in the details related to the murder of S.M. Kirov, and about how serious the influence of Trotskyites, Zinovievites and Rights in the ACP(b) was. (59-60)

⁷ Lubianka. Stalin i NKVD — NKGB — GUKR «SMERSH». 1939 — mart 1946. Moscow: "Materik", 2006. No. 37, 52-72. The German general's interest in this subject is consistent with the considerable evidence we have seen of Trotsky's collaboration with Germany.

What kinds of corroborative evidence might be admissible in a criminal trial is a legal question. It would be decided differently according to the time of the trial and the jurisdiction or country in which the trial took place. In some jurisdictions rules of evidence in cases of conspiracy might differ from rules in other criminal cases.

In a historical study we are interested in something else: consistency. The corroborative evidence is consistent with the direct evidence. The existence of such corroborative evidence reduces even further the possibility that all the direct evidence was fabricated — a negligible possibility by itself.

Trotsky's Possible Motives

Our conclusions here are based not on any prejudice or animus for or against Trotsky but on the evidence. The late Pierre Broué, for decades a leading Trotskyist scholar, admitted on the basis of the evidence that Trotsky deliberately lied to the Dewey Commission. Yet Broué did not believe that to admit this constituted criticism of Trotsky. The present essay concludes on the basis of massive evidence that Trotsky did conspire with the Germans and Japanese. This conclusion is in itself not a criticism of Trotsky. Whether one evaluates Trotsky's collaboration in a negative light or not depends upon one's political values.

Lenin conspired with the Imperial German government and military to go through the German lines to reach Petrograd in April 1917 on the famous "sealed train." That led to the Provisional Government's accusing Lenin (and the Bolsheviks) of being a "German spy," an accusation which is still occasionally voiced by anticommunists.

In 1918 Lenin insisted upon signing the Treaty of Brest-Litovsk, an agreement which gave the Germans a lot of Russian territory and ended Germany's two-front war. Lenin was called a "German agent" by some for doing this too. It is the reason that the Socialist-Revolutionary Fanni Kaplan tried to kill Lenin and other Socialist-Revolutionaries did kill Soviet diplomat Moisei Uritskii and German diplomat Wilhelm Mirbach. They wished to sabotage this "pro-German" peace in order to promote a continuation of the war. It is the reason Bukharin and other Left Communists considered arresting Lenin, Stalin, and Sverdlov at that time.⁸

Trotsky had a complicated view of the USSR in the mid-30s. At times he seemed to think that the leading stratum of the Bolshevik Party, or Stalin at the very least, had to be removed from power in order for the revolution to be saved both in the USSR and in the rest of the world. Given this outlook, he may have reasoned that what he was doing was similar to what Lenin had done: compromise with the capitalist powers in order to save the Revolution.

By the same token, the requirements of conspiracy would have prevented Trotsky from openly acknowledging such collaboration. The Germans and Japanese would not have dealt with him openly. And to do so would have put anybody associated with him at great risk.

Additionally, most Trotskyists and sympathizers supported the Russian Revolution, were strongly anti-fascist, and had not necessarily decided that the only road to saving world communism was to change the leadership of the USSR at any cost. Knowledge of his collaboration with Germany and Japan would surely have cost Trotsky many of his relatively few adherents.

The evidence available to us today overwhelmingly supports the conclusion that Leon Trotsky collaborated with Germany and Japan in a conspiracy to overthrow the Soviet government and the Bolshevik Party leadership around Stalin, and to meet the demands of the fascists for partitioning the USSR, exiling the Comintern, opening the front to German and Japanese invaders, and making other economic and political concessions. Historians may alter these conclusions in future if more evidence comes to light. But these are facts that cannot be wished away.

Did Trotsky Lie Again?

We have already noted that only a small number of men — eight of the defendants at the three Moscow Trials plus at least three and perhaps as many as six of the military figures — claimed that they were told of Trotsky's collaboration with Germany or Japan at first hand, either from Trotsky himself or from his son Leon Sedov. We believe that there are no grounds for dismissing this testimony.

But none of these men claimed to have personally witnessed any meetings between Trotsky (or Sedov) and German or Japanese representatives. Perhaps Trotsky was lying to them? Is it possible that Trotsky did not in fact have such contacts with the Germans and Japanese but was only claiming to have them — to raise the hopes of his followers and his own prestige among them, perhaps?

The evidence suggests this was not the case. Radek, Sokol'nikov, and Iakovlev testified that they were approached by German and Japanese officials who told them about Trotsky's collaboration with their countries.

This would seem to rule out any possibility that Trotsky was simply "bragging" to enhance his reputation among his followers and within the conspiracy generally. Nor is it just their word. From his very first confession Bukharin confirmed Radek's contact with German intelligence.

Leon Sedov

Trotsky would not have conspired with either German or Japanese officials in writing. As we have discussed above, it was Bolshevik practice that such deeply secret matters should be communicated only orally. We cannot rule out the possibility that Trotsky himself could have met with German or Japanese representatives. But it seems most likely that he would have done so either chiefly or entirely through his son Leon Sedov. Sedov had the motive, means, and opportunity to be his father's main contact with German and Japanese representatives after 1929 when Trotsky left the USSR.

There is a good deal of suggestive evidence to support this hypothesis. Many of the men whose testimony about direct collaboration with Trotsky we have cited said they did so through Sedov. It was Sedov's address book containing the addresses of Trotskyists within the USSR that Getty found in the Harvard Trotsky archives (Getty Trotsky, 34 n.16). Twelve people — Gol'tsman, Ol'berg, Berman-Yurin, Piatakov, Shestov, Romm, Krestinsky, Rozengol'ts, Uritsky, Putna, Shnitman and Tukhachevsky — claimed that they were in contact with Trotsky entirely or mainly through Sedov.⁹

⁹ Romm, Krestinsky, and Bessonov claim to have also met Trotsky personally. Some of these men also claimed contact with Trotsky by letter.

There is much evidence to suggest that in early 1937 Hitler was expecting a pro-German military coup in the USSR.¹⁰ Powerful military figures would have represented the best chance of overthrowing the Soviet regime and bringing Trotsky back.

¹⁰ See Grover Furr, "New Light on Old Stories about Marshal Tukhachevskii: Some Documents Reconsidered." Russian History / Histoire Russe 13, 2-3 (Summer-Fall 1986) 293-308; at

The "Tukhachevsky Affair" military men were tried and executed in June 1937. We have studied their confessions of collaboration with Trotsky above. It may have been the destruction of this last and best opportunity to return to the USSR that impelled Trotsky to send the telegram that we examined in an earlier chapter. Shortly after this, in July 1937 Zborowski noted Sedov's descent into drunkenness, gambling, and womanizing, and his declaration to Zborowski that all was lost. Such behavior is consistent with the hypothesis that Sedov's behavior reflected the final collapse of his and his father's hopes. Zborowski, who worked very closely with Sedov, had not reported any such behavior at any earlier date.¹¹

¹¹ For this document see Trotsky's 'Amalgams,' 516-517. Trotsky's followers long believed that the NKVD caused Sedov's death on February 16, 1938, in a Paris clinic where he had undergone an appendectomy. But Zborowski's reports, confirmed by Costello and Tsarev and seconded by the memoirs of Pavel Sudoplatov who later oversaw the planning of Trotsky's assassination, all suggest that the NKVD had nothing to do with Sedov's death (Costello 1993, 283-4; Sudoplatov 1997, 95-6).

Evidence and Proof

Many people believe — mistakenly — that in historical study there must be "proof beyond a reasonable doubt" for any conclusion to be justified. This is incorrect.

In historical study the job of an historian is to formulate hypotheses in order to account for the evidence that exists. The only scientific — in the sense of objective, rational, and intellectually defensible — way to determine the truth is to find the hypothesis that best accounts for all the evidence at hand and without cherry-picking it.

The conclusion will not be "certain." I use the scare quotes deliberately because there is seldom, if ever, "certainty" in any human endeavor. For example, there is no "certainty" in criminal investigation and prosecution, with which historical research is often compared and confused.

In a criminal trial the jury is supposed to be instructed to find a defendant "not guilty" unless the evidence proves him guilty "beyond a reasonable doubt." This is an attempt to avoid depriving an innocent defendant of liberty, property, rights, or life, even though it risks exonerating a guilty defendant — something felt to be less odious.

We historians have a more pleasant job. None of the subjects of our investigations have their rights, life, or liberty at stake. All our subjects are dead, and dead people have none of the same kind of rights as the living, and certainly no life or liberty to lose. In historical investigation we can safely more closely approach the truth according to the hypothesis that best accounts for all the evidence we have. This is the only objective manner to most closely approximate the truth.

The historian must strive to be objective. This means, first and foremost, to act in a way so as to compensate for her or his own biases and preconceived ideas. Objectivity — the goal of all scientific investigation, including historical study — is an attitude of distrust of the self. Everyone has biases and preconceived ideas, and it is impossible to simply "shed" them. Instead, the historian must take active steps to subject her/his own biases and preconceived ideas to special doubt. He/she must "lean over backwards," as it were, to give an especially generous reading to evidence that appears to contradict his/her own preconceived ideas and biases. Likewise, he/she must subject to special doubt and suspicion any evidence that tends to support his/her own biases and preconceived ideas.

In the present investigation the only hypothesis that accounts for the evidence we now have is that Leon Trotsky really did collaborate with the Japanese. This will not disturb those readers who have no particular biases or preconceived ideas in play. Nor will it long trouble those historically-savvy readers who are accustomed to questioning their own preconceived ideas and are excited at the discovery of new results.

It will not trouble those students of history who welcome the fact that historical study is "disillusioning" — that it challenges one to shed one's illusions, to question received viewpoints, to change one's mind, to grow intellectually by facing the implications of truths that they did not know before and may find unpleasant. This kind of excitement and satisfaction is well known to scholars in the physical and biological sciences, as well as to many historians, when new truths and new paradigms overturn old ones.

The present study poses an interesting challenge to the many readers who are committed to the position that the Moscow Trials were frame-ups. It poses a particular challenge to Trotskyists. As with any historical study, those who have strongly held preconceived ideas that clash with the results of this study will be tempted to question this study but not to question their own biases and commitments. This is a methodological error. It is a lack of objectivity. It is in contradiction to materialism itself. Materialists base their decisions about truth or falsehood upon evidence, not upon their own preferences what they "would like the truth to be."

A great many people do not know how to be objective, to question their own biases, to sincerely consider hypotheses and evidence that suggest that their own preconceived ideas are in error and should be abandoned. There is far too little commitment to objectivity. This is nowhere more obvious than on the Left, where ancient battles still rage while vast amounts of new primary source evidence go largely ignored.

Those who are committed not to an objective search for the truth but to their subjective preconceptions, either out of bias or from ignorance of proper historical methodology, will not be "convinced" by the results of this study. But "convincing" people is not the goal of historical study. Or, rather, the reader I aim to convince is the one whom I have described above: the reader who is excited by the search for new knowledge; who is not afraid to admit that she/he does not already know the truth; who does not fear to confront her/his own ignorance but wishes to shrink the boundaries of that ignorance; the one who wants to learn something that she/he did not know before and even thought was not possible — that reader will benefit from this study, as will the entire field of Soviet history.

Deciding On The Basis of the Evidence

Given the evidence available today there is only one objective conclusion: that our hypothesis has been confirmed. The evidence forces us to conclude that Leon Trotsky did collaborate with German and Japanese officials to help him return to power in the Soviet Union. There is no basis to disregard this or to regard the evidence we have reviewed in this paper as faked, obtained by torture, or fraudulent in any other respect.

Deciding according to the evidence demands that we accept the permanently contingent nature of our conclusion. Any objective assessment of the evidence for this, or any other historical conclusion, must always be provisional. If and when new evidence is produced we must be prepared to adjust or even to abandon this conclusion if warranted by that new evidence. Historical study knows no such thing as "certainty."

By the same token the evidence compels us to conclude that Trotsky did conspire with the Hitler and Japanese militarist regimes to help him overthrow the Soviet government and Communist Party leaders in order to regain power in the Soviet Union.

Special communication of N.I. Ezhov to J.V. Stalin Concerning Kh. G. Rakovsky with appendix of excerpts from confessions concerning his case.

Jan. 25 1937 No. 55464

Urgent — Top Secret

To Secretary of the CC VKP(b) comr. Stalin

According to materials from agents and investigations RAKOVSKY Kh. G. has remained until the present one of the active members of the counterrevolutionary Trotskyist-Zinovievist terrorist organization. According to confessions of PIATAKOV and MILL' (Okun') he had an independent line of contact with TROTSKY (and has effected this contact through ROSMER).

During exile in Barnaul until April 1934, having extremely hostile positions towards the VKP(b) and its leadership RAKOVSKY maintained counterrevolutionary organizational contact with the active members of the Trotskyist organization IUDKIS, PLISO, KASPAROVA, O. SMIRNOVA, et. al. RAKOVSKY knew of the existence of the Trotskyist-Zinovievist bloc, who was in it, and their terrorist activities (from the confessions of GAVEN, TER-VAGANIAN ESTERMAN). According to confessions by KASPAROVA, NIKOLAEV, and ESTERMAN, RAKOVSKY's renunciation of Trotskyism was insincere at Trotsky's instigation and he remained as before in a position of active struggle against the leadership of the VKP(b).

KASPAROVA confessed that "the bloc of the Trotskyist and Zinovievist organizations was based upon the recognition of terrorist methods of struggle against the leadership of the VKP(b)" — she was informed of this by RAKOVSKY.

In 1934-35 RAKOVSKY was in contact with the secret Trotskyist POLLIAKOV, who several times brought TROTSKY'S bulletin from abroad for I.N. SMIRNOV.

In April 1935 RAKOVSKY gave to one of his agents the platform of the Trotskyists and two documents published illegally by the Trotskyists in 1928, for safekeeping.

According to materials from agents in the Main Directorate of State Security it is apparent that in May 1935 RAKOVSKY transmitted through KARMANENKO a directive "to remain intact until the moment of international complications which will inevitably occur in the near future."

In May of the same year, 1935, we know of a meeting between RAKOVSKY and a certain DAVIDSON who arrived from the USA and COUTS who came from London.

While in Moscow RAKOVSKY continuously maintained close ties with the Trotskyists PREOBRAZHENSKII, SOSNOVSKII, VINOGRADSKAIA, SOSNOVSKAIA, DANISHEVSKII and CHERNOBORODOV. The arrested terrorist NIKOLAEV — former worker of the Krestintern and member of the CC CP(b)U confessed that during a meeting with RAKOVSKY in Moscow in 1935, "RAKOVSKY surprised him (NIKOLAEV) with his hostility" against comr. STALIN. RAKOVSKY was glad to hear NIKOLAEV's report his meeting with I.N. SMIRNOV and asked for information about DROBNIS and RAFAEL.

"For his part RAKOVSKY promised his full support in any Trotskyist work. I considered it necessary to verify with RAKOVSKY the facts communicated to me by DREITSER about the work of the Trotskyist-Zinovievist center, who was on it, and also who was in the Moscow center. RAKOVSKY confirmed all of this to me, and also confirmed the membership of the especially clandestine center." (from NIKOLAEV's confession of December 30, 1936).

NIKOLAEV's second meeting with RAKOVSKY took place at the beginning of 1936.

"At this meeting RAKOVSKY very concretely and frankly gave me clear directions concerning the development of Trotskyist work in a warlike spirit, since 'each of STALIN's blows against the Trotskyists must be answered by a counterstroke.'" (From NIKOLAEV's confession of December 30, 1936).

At an interrogation on December 20, 1936 PIATAKOV confessed that at his personal meeting with TROTSKY in Oslo in 1935 TROTSKY told PIATAKOV that it was essential to meet with RAKOVSKY and tell him that he had to become more active. Said PIATAKOV, "I concluded from this that RAKOVSKY had some kind of special way of communicating with TROTSKY."

On January 25 of this year the accused DROBNIS confessed at trial that he was aware from the words of MURALOV that RAKOVSKY had his own direct Trotskyist lines of communication and definitely knew "about the new tactics, Trotsky's new directives concerning terror and diversion."

I consider that it is imperative that RAKOVSKY be arrested. I request your permission.

APPENDIX: Excerpts from confessions in 6 pages.

EXCERPT FROM TRANSCRIPT OF INTERROGATION OF KASPAROVA of 9/21, 10/27, and 11/5 1936

That the bloc of the Trotskyist and Zinovievist organizations had at its basis the mutual acceptance of terrorist methods of struggle against the leadership of the VKP(b) I learned from Kh. G. RAKOVSKY.

RAKOVSKY informed about this in a coded letter in Saratov in 1933 not long before my arrest.

I cannot relate the exact contents of Kh.G. RAKOVSKY's letter but I recall that in this letter, in a very few sentences, Kh.G. RAKOVSKY informed me that the basis of the bloc was the mutual terrorist activity of the Trotskyists and the Zinovievists against the leadership of the VKP(b) and, evidently knowing from I.N. SMIRNOV about my negative attitude towards terrorist methods of struggle, that there was no other way to change the leadership of the VKP(b) and, consequently, to change the regime. The letter ended with a communication of the members of the center of the bloc — ZINOVIEV, KAMENEV, SMIRNOV, and MRACHKOVSKII.

I am aware that during the whole period of his exile RAKOVSKY took a very hostile attitude in relation to the VKP(b) and its leadership.

The letters and directives that RAKOVSKY issued in rather large numbers were distinguished by their hostility to the Party's line, oriented Trotskyists towards denying that the USSR was dictatorship of the proletariat, gave the direct order to form a second party and led, as I have confessed, to directive concerning the transition to terror in the struggle against the Party leadership.

RAKOVSKY was considered by all of us as TROTSKY's "man in charge" in the USSR and since we knew about RAKOVSKY's contact with TROTSKY, which took place through I.N. SMIRNOV, we accepted all directives issued by him as TROTSKY's directives.

RAKOVSKY carried on a very intensive correspondence in code with the exiles and the political isolators. With the Saratov Trotskyist organization RAKOVSKY carried on this correspondence in the main through OL'GA SMIRNOVA. Documents were transmitted to him in the bindings of books.

I know that all the work of organizing a printing press and reproducing Trotskyist documents in the Kursk Trotskyist organization was carried out with RAKOVSKY's knowledge and permission. Active contact between him and Trotskyists who arrived in Barnaul was also conducted intensively.

I recall that in 1932 the Trotskyists PLIS used to come. He brought to us from RAKOVSKY an illegal document titled "Dictatorship is an Abstraction."

At the end of 1933 IUDKIS was coming to RAKOVSKY from the center of the Trotskyist-Zinovievist bloc.

RAKOVSKY's declaration of renunciation was a complete surprise to me..., his renunciation was a maneuver.

His renunciation of Trotskyism was effected by RAKOVSKY on the direct instructions of TROTSKY. The exiled Trotskyist MAKNIVEL'SON informed me about this in Alma-Ata.

EXCERPT FROM TRANSCRIPT OF INTERROGATION of PIATAKOV
December 19-20 1936

"We arrived at an airport near Oslo and from there drove by automobile to a cottage where I met with Trotsky in a private apartment. The meeting lasted no more than two hours.

I should add that among the individual persons whose names TROTSKY mentioned during our talk RADEK, SOKOL'NIKOV, RAKOVSKY and others were mentioned.

Concerning RAKOVSKY TROTSKY said that it was essential to talk with him and give him a push in his work along the lines of the Trotskyist organization. From this I deduced that RAKOVSKY had some personal line of contact with TROTSKY.

After the meeting with TROTSKY I intended to meet with RAKOVSKY and pass TROTSKY'S instructions on to him, but this meeting never occurred."

EXCERPT FROM TRANSCRIPT OF INTERROGATION of NIKOLAEV
from December 30, 1936

"After the return of I.N. SMIRNOV from abroad in 1932 he informed me that he had meetings with L. SEDOV and gave me a direct order about the necessity of restoring organizational contacts with the former active Trotskyists and developing activity.

Already then, in 1932, I. N. SMIRNOV had received a directive from TROTSKY through SEDOV concerning the development of terrorist activity against the leaders of the VKP(b).

In carrying out this directive I began to reestablish my contacts with the active Trotskyists RAKOVSKY, DROBNIS, BOGUSLAVSKII and others. Talks with all these persons on political subjects convinced me that they were all prepared and were all fully firm in their conviction for active work against the Party.

To my question about how to understand RAKOVSKY's renegade renunciation DREITSER informed me "that all this was done with TROTSKY'S agreement."

RAKOVSKY's renunciation was for strategic purposes while he maintained his old political convictions and he, RAKOVSKY, was even a member of the especially secret center. He [DREITSER] named as members, in addition to RAKOVSKY, PIATAKOV, SOKOL'NIKOV, and K. RADEK. This center exists in the event of the failure of the active center of the Trotskyist-Zinovievist center of the bloc. E. DREITSER suggested that I establish close organizational contact with it.

When AKIRTAVA asked me about things in Moscow and with whom in the Trotskyist leadership I was in contact I informed him about the situation in Moscow and that I maintained contact with RAKOVSKY.

I told AKIRTAVA that RAKOVSKY was a member of the especially secret center whose membership consists of, besides RAKOVSKY, PIATAKOV, K. RADEK and SOKOL'NIKOV, just as E. DREITSER had told me and as RAKOVSKY himself had at one time confirmed.

My meeting with RAKOVSKY took place during the summer of 1935 in Moscow, upon his return from Barnaul, near the post office. Having learned about my arrest in 1933 he was interested in who was in the political isolator, about their state of mind, and about my intentions about returning to the Party. To this I answered that I did not intend to return to the Party again.

I had always known RAKOVSKY to be a person hostile to STALIN and to the current Party leadership, but at our last meeting surprised even me with his hostility against STALIN. Here specifically emphasized that they were hindering him in the People's Commissariat of Health and did not allow him to utilize his abilities. In a word the fellow almost stated directly that he had counted on something bigger when he wrote his false declaration that he had moved to the Party's political positions.

For this reason he was especially satisfied at my information about my meeting with I.N. SMIRNOV during my exile. He asked about DROBNIS and whether I was in contact with RAFAIL.

On his part RAKOVSKY promised all his support in any Trotskyist work. He also informed me that he maintained regular contact with PIATAKOV.

I considered it necessary to verify through RAKOVSKY the facts about the work of Trotskyist-Zinovievist center told to me by DREITSER, about the members of the center, and also of the Moscow center. RAKOVSKY confirmed all of this to me, and also confirmed the membership of the especially secret center.

At this meeting RAKOVSKY very concretely and frankly gave me clear directions concerning the development of Trotskyist work in a warlike spirit, since "each of STALIN's blows against the Trotskyists must be answered by a counterstroke." RAKOVSKY suggested that I maintain regular contact with him."

Trotsky's 'Prediction' About Rakovsky

Rakovsky's Testimony at Trial. [1938 Trial, pp. 289-295.]

We have examined all other evidence relating to Rakovsky's confession concerning the Japanese government and Trotsky. It remains to study Rakovsky's version as given in his trial testimony on March 4 and 5, 1938.

In September 1934 I was sent to Tokyo at the head of the Soviet Red Cross Delegation to an international conference of Red Cross Societies, which was to take place there October. The day after I arrived in Tokyo, I was stopped in the corridor of the Japanese Red Cross building by a certain prominent public man of Japan. I can mention his name.

THE PRESIDENT: No, there is no need.

RAKOVSKY: Very well, I will name him at the session in camera. He invited me to tea. I made his acquaintance. He held a position which had some relation to my mission. I want to say, not my mission as one who belonged to the opposition, but my governmental mission. I accepted his amiable invitation. During the conversation this person (here I omit various compliments, commonplaces, flattering remarks) said that the interests of the political trend to which I belonged in the U.S.S.R. and the interests of a certain government fully coincided, and that he personally welcomed my arrival in Tokyo because it would give him the opportunity to discuss certain questions concerning both sides; and in particular, he declared that for a certain government and for himself my estimate of the political situation in the Soviet Union would be of extraordinary value.

I must say that I did not anticipate a conversation like this, it took me unawares. I said that, firstly, I was not, nor did I belong to or take any part in the leading circles of my country. I now occupied a very modest position, a modest post in the People's Commissariat of Public Health, and unfortunately, in this connection I could not be of any service to them. I evaded further conversation and left.

I am giving you the gist of it, of course, without vouching for every word. I wanted to ascertain the motives which prompted such a proposal. The same evening I had a talk with the Ambassador, Yurenev, whom I had known as a Trotskyite ever since 1926, when I spent a summer with him in the south of France at Saint-Jean-de-Luz. I told him of the rather strange words of the person I have mentioned. I am representing it in a somewhat more pointed form, because usually such things are wrapped up in a lot of verbiage without any pretext for protest being given. I told Yurenev that the idea here was to enlist me as a spy, as an informer for a certain government.

Then Yurenev drew a letter from his pocket and told me: "The question is decided, there is no need to hesitate." He even said: "The die is cast." He showed me Pyatakov's letter, which I myself had brought him from Moscow. It was sent to me under such circumstances that I could not know its contents.

I must tell you that when I arrived in Moscow after sending my statement to the Party, I immediately went for a cure. Then I came back, started work, and in two months left for Tokyo. During this time I had the opportunity to see only Sosnovsky, and went twice on business to the People's Commissariat of Foreign Affairs, where I met Krestinsky, with whom I exchanged a few words. I will speak of this later. But on the whole this was the period when I was trying to get back into the Party and in general avoided any meetings with known oppositionists.

Just before my departure I received by messenger of the People's Commissariat of Heavy Industry an envelope addressed to me in the People's Commissariat of Health. In this envelope there was a second envelope, addressed to Yurenev, and a note for me. The note was from Pyatakov. In this note he congratulated me on my return and asked me to take the letter to Yurenev and insist on Yurenev's compliance with his request. The letter was not coded. The contents of this letter related to the methods used in Japan for making alloys of non-ferrous metals; Pyatakov asked Yurenev to let him know what methods were used there and at the same time to send him literature on the subject available in Japan in English and German. But when after my conversation with the well-known public man I have mentioned Yurenev drew this letter from his pocket, besides the unencoded text there was another text which had been written in invisible ink. Then Yurenev read to me first of all what concerned me. Pyatakov had written to him: Rakovsky, apart from his ill health, has another reason for being cautious; this is his desire to get back into the Party; so that in this sense we must spare him, but as far as possible utilize his stay in Tokyo. Then came literally the following phrase: "It is likely that a certain government will itself take steps in this direction" (that is, in the direction of utilizing Rakovsky). Further Pyatakov wrote to Yurenev about Bogomol, the Ambassador in China, pointing out that a certain government was dissatisfied with his political line, that he was helping Great Britain more than he was the said government.

Further it was pointed out that Yurenev must try to make all possible use of Sabanin, the director of the legal department of the People's Commissariat of Foreign Affairs, while he was in Tokyo. Finally, Yurenev said, reading the letter: "But this is what I find difficult to do." The letter contained instructions that he must take advantage of the well-known negotiations concerning the sale of the Chinese Eastern Railway so that something might accrue to the benefit of the Trotskyites.

I have told you approximately the contents of Pyatakov's letter to Yurenev. Yurenev was connected with the Trotskyite underground in Moscow, with Pyatakov.

On the second or third day after my conversation with Yurenev, after a certain banquet to which all the delegates to the Red Cross Conference had been invited, at the end of the dinner somebody approached me and said that a certain personage of high standing, present at this dinner, wished to make my acquaintance.

The official personage stated that he was very pleased to make my acquaintance, etc. Then he went on to say that our interests coincided with the interests of a certain state, that an agreement had been reached between the Trotskyites in the U.S.S.R. and the representatives of a certain state, but that we did not know the exact terms of this agreement yet.

The prominent public man who had spoken to me did so, as I learnt, on the instructions of this high personage. After this I had two more meetings with the public man...

THE PRESIDENT: Excuse me, accused Rakovsky. Seeing that it is now ten o'clock and your evidence will last another hour at least, you will conclude tomorrow.

The Court is adjourned until 11 a.m.

MORNING SESSION, MARCH 5, 1938

COMMANDANT OF THE COURT: The Court is coming, please rise.

THE PRESIDENT: Please be seated. The session is resumed. Accused Rakovsky, you may conclude your evidence.

RAKOVSKY: Yesterday I concluded with the statement that, after my conversation with the high personage who was close to the Japanese government, I had three talks with the public man of whom I have spoken, the man at the head of a big public organization in Japan.

During the second and third meeting with the public man who headed a big public organization in Japan we established the nature of the information which I promised to supply to the agents of the Japanese intelligence service Moscow and also the technique of transmitting this information. While still in Tokyo, I drew into this work Dr. Naida, secretary of the Red Cross Delegation, of whom I already knew that he was a member of the underground counter-revolutionary terrorist organization. I sent Dr. Naida with my card to the public man and he arranged with him as to how and with whom Dr. Naida was to meet in Moscow; it was he who acted as liaison agent between me and the Japanese intelligence service. In Tokyo I had yet another meeting, with a third person. All such international conferences, as you probably know, are accompanied by all kinds of receptions, dinners, shows, meetings, which usually serve as a background for very serious conversations, quite legitimate, but sometimes not legitimate, I have in mind recruiting for various purposes. I was introduced to this third person by the second high personage. He asked me to take coffee with him — this was after dinner; we sat down at a table and began to talk.

I shall not reproduce the whole conversation, and it is not necessary either; I shall give it to you in substance. He started the conversation by saying: "We are aware that you are a very close friend and adherent of Mr. Trotsky. I must ask you to write to him that a certain government is dissatisfied with his articles on the Chinese question and also with the behaviour of the Chinese Trotskyites. We have a right to expect a different line of conduct on the part of Mr. Trotsky. Mr. Trotsky ought to understand what is necessary for the certain government. There is no need to go into details, but it is clear that an incident provoked in China would be a desirable pretext for intervening in China." I wrote to Trotsky about all this—about my negotiations in Tokyo, about my conversations with Yurenev, about my meetings, and, of course, about this last proposition.

I also kept Yurenev informed of all my talks. During the last week I fell ill owing to an inflammation of the veins of my right leg, and I stayed in the Embassy. I am mentioning this because it gave me and Yurenev an opportunity to see more of each other. He would come to me—the other members of the delegation were, of course, away at such times—he would come to me and we would talk about our common Trotskyite affairs. Yurenev was very much worried by one circumstance. "We have gotten," he said, "into such a mess that sometimes one does not know how to behave. One is afraid that by satisfying one of our partners we may offend another. For instance, here at present, antagonism is arising between Great Britain and Japan in connection with the Chinese question, while we have to maintain connections both with the British and Japanese intelligence services"...

VYSHINSKY: Who do you mean, "we"?

RAKOVSKY: The Trotskyites. "The Moscow centre, in this case Pyatakov, is complaining that Bogomolov is taking the side of the British. And here I have to find my bearings in all this."... I told him: you are exaggerating the difficulty of your position. What do we have to proceed from? We Trotskyites have to play three cards at the present moment: the German, Japanese and British. It was not quite clear to me, at that time at least, what the German card promised. Personally I thought that the possibility was not excluded that Hitler would seek a rapprochement with the government of the U.S.S.R. I cited the policy of Richelieu: in his own country he exterminated the Protestants, while in his foreign policy he concluded alliances with the Protestant German princes.

The relations between Germany and Poland were still in the stage of their inception at the time. Japan, on the other hand, was a potent aggressor against the U.S.S.R. For us Trotskyites the Japanese card was extremely important, but, on the other hand, we should not overrate the importance of Japan as our ally against the Soviet government. Even if Japanese aggression could force its way into the territory of the U.S.S.R., it would be lost in the vast spaces, and in the taiga. As for Great Britain, the situation was rather more serious. At that moment Great Britain was antagonistic to Japan. I am telling you about our private conversations which ought to show why we pursued one line or another. At the moment there was antagonism between ourselves and Japan, but it should not be forgotten that England once headed a coalition against the French Revolution and fought on for twenty-five years.

THE PRESIDENT: You should dwell less on the past and speak more about the Trotskyite organization.

RAKOVSKY: Thus, the conclusion was that it was necessary to maintain the connection with the British Intelligence Service, but to pay attention to the Japanese intelligence service at the present time.

VYSHINSKY: I did not quite get you. You say: it was necessary to maintain the connection with the British Intelligence Service and to pay attention to the Japanese intelligence service.

RAKOVSKY: To pay the main attention.

VYSHINSKY: Hence, to serve both the Japanese and British intelligence services, and in addition also the German.

RAKOVSKY: According to my personal opinion at the time, this latter was a mere prospect.

VYSHINSKY: From Krestinsky's evidence you saw that it was not a mere prospect.

What intelligence services were you personally connected with?

RAKOVSKY: The British and the Japanese.

VYSHINSKY: And Krestinsky? Accused Krestinsky, what intelligence service were you connected with?

KRESTINSKY: The German.

VYSHINSKY: Prospectively or actually?

KRESTINSKY: Actually.

VYSHINSKY: Actually? Proceed, please.

RAKOVSKY: I returned from Tokyo with the credentials of a Japanese spy in my pocket. In my present state of mind I do not find it difficult to say so openly, to admit openly before the people's Court what formerly I would not bring myself to admit to my own conscience. It took me a short time, only a few months one might say, to consummate that evolution of Trotskyism which it took other Trotskyites several years to consummate. (1938 Trial, 289-295)

Serov's Letter concerning the Bukharin Trial

From Protsess Bukharina 1938 g. Ed. Zh. V. Artamonova, N.V. Petrov. Moscow: Mezhdunarodnyi Fond Demokratiia, Steven Cohen and Katrina Vanden Heuvel Fund, 2012, pp. 832-858.

Report of I.A. Serov, Chairman of the Committee of State Security [KGB] attached to the Council of Ministers of the USSR, Concerning the Trial in the Case of the "Anti-Soviet Bloc of Rights and Trotskyites."

July 7 1956

Top secret

To Comrade V.M. MOLOTOV.

I hereby present to you the report concerning the questions outlined in the protocol of the Commission of the CC of the CPSU of July 2 1956.

I. Serov

July 7 1956. No. 1687-C

Report Concerning the Materials in the Case of the Antisoviet "Bloc of Rights and Trotskyites."

The origins of the case

In the case of the anti-Soviet "bloc of Rights and Trotskyites" the following persons were brought to justice sentenced by the Military Collegium of the USSR Supreme Court:

/ 833 /

- 1) BUKHARIN, Nikolai Ivanovich
- 2) RYKOV, Aleksei Ivanovich
- 3) IAGODA, Genrikh Grigor'evich
- 4) KRESTINSKII, Nikolai Nikolaevich
- 5) ROZENGOL'TS, Arkady Pavlovich
- 6) IVANOV, Vladimir IVANOVich

- 7) CHERNOV, Mikhail Aleksandrovich
 - 8) GRIN'KO, Grigorii Fedorovich
 - 9) PESHKOV, Isaac Abramovich
 - 10) IKRAMOV, Akmal'
 - 11) KHODZHAEV, Faizulla
 - 12) SHARANGOVICH, Vassilii Fomich
 - 13) ZUBAREV, Prokopii Timofeevich
 - 14) BULANOV, Pavel Petrovich
 - 15) LEVIN, Lev Grivor'evich
 - 16) KAZAKOV, Ignatii Nikolaevich
 - 17) MAKSIMOV-DIKOVSKII, Veniamin Adamovich (Abramovich)
 - 18) KRIUCHKOV, Petr Petrovich
- to the supreme criminal punishment — execution by shooting;
- 19) PLETNEV, Dmitrii Dmitrievich — to 25 years in prison;
 - 20) RAKOVSKY, Khristian Georgievich — to 20 years in prison and
 - 21) BESSONOV, Sergei Alekseevich — to 15 years in prison.

As can be seen from the materials of the case, before the arrests of BUKHARIN N. I., RYKOV A.I., KRESTINSKII N.N. and others, the organs of the NKVD and of the USSR Prosecutor's Office did not possess any verified facts on organized activities of these individuals and on the existence of a so-called "Bloc of Rights and Trotskyites."

The confessions of ZINOVIEV, KAMENEV, SOKOL'NIKOV and REINGOL'D that was available at that time concerning the criminal activity of BUKHARIN and RYKOV were rejected by the USSR Prosecutor's Office as unreliable. A. Ia. Vyshinskii, Prosecutor of the USSR, conducted a special investigation and concluded that there was no evidence against BUKHARIN and RYKOV, and in this connection on 23 September 1936 he sent for approval to J.V. STALIN a draft resolution concerning the cessation of criminal proceedings against BUKHARIN and RYKOV that had arisen on the basis of materials in the trial of the "Trotskyite-Zinovievite Center."

However, after that the NKVD began a storm of activity to collect new "evidence" of the existence of organized anti-Soviet activity on the part of the Rights and, in particular, by BUKHARIN, RYKOV and TOMSKII. During December 1937 — February 1938 participants in the so-called BUKHARIN "school" were arrested and confessions by ASTROV, TSEITLIN, ALEXANDROV and others appeared. At the same time RADEK, already convicted in another case, began to testify against BUKHARIN, RYKOV and TOMSKII.

Once they had become acquainted with the materials brought against them, BUKHARIN and RYKOV categorically denied any guilt in the conduct of anti-Soviet activities. They acknowledged only that in 1928-1929 they had fought against the party's general line but insisted that in recent years they had sincerely supported the party leadership and had no fundamental differences with it. In denying his guilt BUKHARIN, in particular, pointed out serious contradictions and absurdities in the testimony of those arrested and requested that a special commission of inquiry be appointed to verify them.

In February 1937, after EZHOV'S report to the Plenum of the Central Committee of the CPSU(b), BUKHARIN and RYKOV were arrested.

Somewhat earlier RAKOVSKY Kh. G. had been arrested on a criminal charge.

In a special communication to J.V. STALIN, asking for his consent to arrest RAKOVSKY, the NKVD of the USSR pointed out that he had been exposed as one of the active participants of the Trotsky-Zinoviev terrorist organization by the testimony of PIATAKOV, KASPAROVA, NIKOLAEV, TER-VAGANIAN and others, as well as by material from undercover agents.

In fact, there were no materials in the possession of the NKVD from agents concerning criminal activities by RAKOVSKY, while the confessions of the above-named persons were vague and uncertain in their reliability.

Thus, TER-VAGANIAN, citing SMIRNOV I.N., confessed that in 1932 RAKOVSKY "wrote a new counterrevolutionary document." But there were no confessions by SMIRNOV along these lines.

The prisoner NIKOLAEV gave vague confessions that RAKOVSKY belonged to a reserve "especially secret center" consisting of PIATAKOV, SOKOL'NIKOV and RADEK, about which he supposedly learned from DREITSER. However, none of the individuals named by NIKOLAEV stated this in their testimony.

KASPAROVA confessed that RAKOVSKY hypocritically announced his departure from the opposition, but in reality did not break with it and in 1933, outlining his anti-Soviet views, informed her in his letters about the creation on a terrorist basis of the Trotskyite-Zinovievite bloc.

To RAKOVSKY's case was also attached an excerpt from the testimony of PIATAKOV in which it is stated that "RAKOVSKY has his own line of contact with TROTSKY." In reality PIATAKOV did not give any such testimony.

From March to May 1937 BESSONOV S.A., ZUBAREV P.T., IAGODA G.G., BULANOV P.P. and KRESTINSKII N.N. were arrested.

Concerning BESSONOV there were confessions by BUKHARTSEV that he had recruited BESSONOV in 1936 into the Trotskyist organization, as well as testimony by KUSHNER that had characterized BESSONOV as

"unexposed enemy of the party", who had permitted slander against the leaders of the CPSU(b).

Against ZUBAREV before his arrest, according to the materials attached to the case, there were confessions by YULIN, MEDNIKOV and ELKOVICH. They named him as one of the leaders of the counterrevolutionary organization in the Urals.

It has not been possible to establish from the case file what materials served as the basis for the arrest of KRESTINSKII, BULANOV and IAGODA.

Between October and December 1937 on the testimony of IAGODA KRIUCHKOV and LEVIN were arrested on the basis of LEVIN'S testimony.

PLETNEV, KAZAKOV and MAKSIMOV-DIKOVSKII were arrested at the same time. They were accused of the villainous murders of V.V. KUIBYSHEV, V.R MENZHINSKII, M. GOR'KII and his son, M.A. PESHKOV.

ZELENSKII I.A., SHARANGOVICH V.F., GRIN'KO G.F., IKRAMOV A. and KHODZHAEV F., who were also defendants in the case under review, were arrested between July and September 1937.

The grounds for the arrest of ZELINSKII were the confessions of the accused LOBOV and KOMAROV (both rehabilitated at the present time) that he had attended anti-Soviet gatherings of members of the organization of Rights.

With respect to SHARANGOVICH there were in fact only the confessions of RACHITSKII, who named him among the members of an anti-Soviet organization.

KHODZHAEV was arrested on the basis of confessions of RYSKULOV and RYKOV.

RYSKULOV testified that in 1930 he and KHODZHAEV joined the anti-Soviet pan-Turkic center, which later established contact with the organization of the Rights and endorsed their terrorist plans. But RYKOV said of KHODZHAEV that he "more or less" sympathized with the Rights.

At the time of IKRAMOV'S arrest there were confessions of ANTIPOV, RUMIANTSEV (both rehabilitated), BUKHARIN, IRMATOV and BALTABAEV that he was one of the leaders of the anti-Soviet nationalist organization in Uzbekistan.

In addition the prisoner APRESOV confessed that as an agent of British intelligence he learned in 1932 about the involvement of IKRAMOV with British intelligence.

In October and November 1937 ROZENGOL'TS A.P., CHERNOV M.A. and IVANOV V.I. were arrested

LOGANOVSKII and RAKOVSKY had confessed about ROZENGOL'TS before his arrest.

LOGANOVSKII asserted that ROZENGOL'TS, as People's Commissar of Foreign Trade, maintained suspicious contacts with representatives of the Polish Embassy in Moscow and conducted sabotage activities in the field of foreign trade.

According to RAKOVSKY's testimony ROZENGOL'TS serves as an agent of British intelligence.

CHERNOV'S arrest was made on the basis of the confessions of RADCHENKO that since 1931 he had been "organizationally linked with the center of the Rights" and had been conducting sabotage activities, and of statements by GALEVIUS and GAISTER that as Commissar of Agriculture CHERNOV had extended protection to participants of an organization of agricultural saboteurs.

Concerning IVANOV there were confessions of KAMINSKII and GOROKHOV, arrested in other cases, that they knew from the words of others about his belonging to the anti-Soviet organization of Rights, and the confession of SOBOLEV that in his presence IVANOV had made anti-Soviet statements.

II. The essence of the charges

BUKHARIN N.I., RYKOV A.I., IAGODA G.G. and the others involved in the present case were convicted of the following offenses:

1. On the instructions of foreign intelligence services they ha organized a conspiratorial group called the "Bloc of Rights and Trotskyites" that set as its goal the overthrow of the existing Soviet socialist social and political system, the restoration in the USSR of capitalism and the power of the bourgeoisie, the dismemberment of the Soviet Union and the separation from it of the Ukraine, Belarus and the Central Asian republics, Georgia, Armenia, Azerbaijan, and Primorye in favor of foreign states;

2. Systematically engaged in espionage on behalf of foreign countries, providing their intelligence services with very important secret state information.

In particular, KRESTINSKII and CHERNOV were accused of belonging to the German intelligence services, ROZENGOL'TS to the German and British intelligence services, RAKOVSKY to the Brit and Japanese intelligence services, SHARANGOVICH to the Polish service and GRIN'KO to the Polish and German intelligence services;

3. Systematically organized and carried out acts of sabotage and diversion in various branches of industry, agriculture and transport;

4. Organized terrorist acts against S.M. KIROV, V.V.KUIBYSHEV, V.R MENZHINSKII, A.M. GOR'KII, his son, M.A. PESHKOV, and also attempted to accomplish the poisoning of EZHOV.

BUKHARIN, moreover, was found guilty in the fact that during the period of the conclusion of the Brest peace a group of so-called "Left" Communists headed by him, together with a group of TROTSKY's and "Left" Socialist-Revolutionaries tried to disrupt the conclusion of the peace treaty, to arrest V.I. LENIN, Ia.M. SVERDLOV, and J.V. STALIN and form a new government of Bukharinists, Trotskyites and "Left" SRs.

During the preliminary investigation and the judicial proceedings in the Military Collegium of the Supreme Court of the USSR all those arrested pleaded guilty to the charges against them.

III. / Analysis of investigative and intelligence materials /

In the course of the verification of the case against the members of the so-called "Anti-Soviet bloc of Rights and Trotskyites" the investigative materials relating to the case have been studied as have agents' materials stored at the KGB of the USSR. At the same time all the accused who were brought to trial in the present case have been verified in the state historical archives and special archives where are stored materials of the Tsarist secret police and captured archives from the German, Polish and French intelligence and counterintelligence agencies.

All the accused convicted in the present case pleaded guilty to the charges against them. However, the verification process revealed that for the most part, these confessions had been made under compulsion and did not reflect the truth.

For example, RAKOVSKY Kh. G., who confessed his active participation in the "Bloc of Rights and Trotskyites" and his collaboration with Japanese and British Intelligence services, after the trial repeatedly protested his innocence and claimed that during the investigation he was forced to give confessions known to be false. / Agent "Anri" / who was held together with RAKOVSKY in the Orel prison, reported on March 17, 1940 that RAKOVSKY:

"completely denies his guilt and considers everything that took place at the trial and in the investigation was nothing but a farce. Sometimes he casually asserted that he gave all his testimony under pressure" (Arch. case number 300956, v. 9, l.d.181 [=archival 'delo' number, volume number, page number])

Another, / agent "Dima" /, who was also with RAKOVSKY in the same cell, reported on April 2, 1941 that conversations with him RAKOVSKY had categorically denied any involvement in the Bloc of Rights and Trotskyites, said that his interrogation protocols had been falsified and then declared "I was indignant when ARONSON (investigator) wrote the protocol that stated that we wanted to restore capitalism. "Listen, — I said — that is illiterate." He threw crumpled protocol in my face. Generally, when I did not write the way they wanted me to, they always did that..." (ibid., l.d. 322)

Questioned on July 3, 1956 former employee of the NKVD ARONSON Ia.A. confirmed that the investigation against RAKOVSKY was indeed conducted in an atmosphere of serious violation of the norms of socialist legality.

After the trial RAKOVSKY, citing his advanced age and illness, repeatedly made applications in which he petitioned for clemency. However, RAKOVSKY's requests remained unsatisfied.

In this regard, on May 17, 1941 RAKOVSKY said to / agent "Finn" /: "I have decided to change my tactics. So far I have only asked for pardon, but have not written about my own case. Now I will write a statement calling for review of my case, with a description of all "secrets of the Madrid court" — Soviet investigation. At least let the people through whose hands all statements pass know how exaggerated cases and trials are concocting out of personal political revenge. Even though I may soon die, even if I am a corpse, remember ... sometimes even corpses will begin to speak." (Arch. case number 300956, v. 9, l.d. 239-240)

RAKOVSKY's testimony about his alleged criminal activity is also refuted by the fact that the men he named in interrogations as his accomplices, GVAKHARIA, BABAYAN and SABANIN have now been rehabilitated and their cases closed. BOGOMOLOV, whom RAKOVSKY named as a member of a counterrevolutionary organization, pleaded not guilty at his trial.

During the investigation KRESTINSKII stated that he was an active participant in the "anti-Soviet bloc of Rights and Trotskyites" and in October 1933 while on holiday abroad, with the assistance BESSONOV had met with Leon TROTSKY and SEDOV in the city of Meran. During this meeting TROTSKY, according to KRESTINSKII, gave him a directive on establishment in the Soviet Union of the combined forces of the Trotskyites-Rightists and military conspirators, the need to employ terror, sabotage, and subversion in the struggle, as well about the conclusion of agreements with foreign governments for the overthrow of the Soviet state system.

However, these confessions of KRESTINSKII'S are not supported by the operational materials of the Foreign Division of the NKVD, whose agents were monitoring TROTSKY abroad. In the archival documents of the Foreign Division of the NKVD there is no information about any visit by TROTSKY and SEDOV to Meran, nor is there any information about any meeting with KRESTINSKII at all.

After the publication of the materials of the trial TROTSKY declared to a correspondent of the newspaper "New York Herald Tribune" that he "...had not had any relations KRESTINSKII since 1927, and had not met, nor corresponded with him either directly or through a third party.

... he had never been to Meran and until he obtained the information today from his secretary had not known where this place was ..." (Arch. case number 13005, vol. 3, l.d.285)

BESSONOV, who had confirmed during interrogations that KRESTINSKII had met with TROTSKY and SEDOV in 1933 in Meran, declared after the trial that all his statements were false.

On May 6, 1939 / Agent "Blagin" /, who was confined with BESSONOV in Solovki prison, reported that BESSONOV responded about the trial of "anti-Soviet bloc of Rights and Trotskyites" as follows:

"The whole trial is a complete invention of the NKVD. In reality none of the accused committed any crimes..." (Arch. case number 101492, Vol. 1 l.d. 27)

On September 29, 1939 another / agent "Nikitin" / reported:

"Concerning the trial of the center of Rights and Trotskyites (1938) BESSONOV said that it was all a complete swindle and a very crude falsification. That, for example, KRESTINSKII really did take money from the German government in 1922 and subsequent years and pass it on to TROTSKY, but that all this did not represent anything counter-revolutionary since, by the Treaty of Versailles, Germany was unable to train military officers on its territory so she conspired with the Soviet Union to organize several military schools in Kazan' and other cities of the USSR and paid money for this to KRESTINSKII, the envoy, for TROTSKY, who was Commissar for the Army and Navy. This was known among the circles of Party and Soviet leaders." (Arch. case number 101492, Vol. 2, l.d. 83-84)

On April 29, 1939 / agent "Grachev" / wrote about the same subject: "Describing the trial as a "farce," prisoner BESSONOV said that everything that the accused said at the trial was coerced testimony and in fact none of them had plotted anything against Soviet power. (ibid., vol. 1, l.d. 22)

During the process of verification other facts have also been obtained that give indisputable evidence that the testimony of KRESTINSKII and BESSONOV was false.

During the interrogation of October 28 1937 KRESTINSKII, for example, testified that participants in the bloc of Rights and Trotskyites, in preparing the overthrow of the Soviet regime, discussed the information of a new government in which they intended to include their accomplices: RUDZUTAK, ANTIPOV AKULOV, LOBOV, UNSHLIKHT, KAMINSKII, BOLOTIN, KALMANOVICH, UKHANOV and ANTONOV-OVSEENKO.

These individuals were arrested and prosecuted on charges of organizing anti-Soviet activities. During 1955-1956 the cases against RUDZUTAK, ANTIPOV and the other persons named above were verified and terminated by the Military Collegium of Supreme Court for lack of evidence of criminal activity by the accused.

At the present time GAMARNIK, KNORIN, RUMIANTSEV, VEGER, and others about whom KRESTINSKII testified as "enemies of the people" have been rehabilitated.

In light of these facts the confessions of RAKOVSKY, KRESTINSKII and BESSONOV about the crimes allegedly committed by them cannot be considered truthful.

Of BUKHARIN, in addition to participation in the anti-Soviet bloc of Rights and Trotskyites, it was charged that in 1918, acting in collusion with TROTSKY and the leaders of the Left SRs, he organized a conspiracy that aimed to disrupt the Brest-Litovsk Treaty, to overthrow the Soviet government, and to arrest and kill V. I. LENIN, J.V. STALIN and Ia. M. SVERDLOV. At the same time BUKHARIN was accused of guilt in the villainous assassination attempt against V.I. LENIN by the SR F. KAPLAN.

This accusation was based on the testimony of MANTSEV, KARELIN, KAMKOV, IAKOVLEV and OSINSKII, arrested in other cases.

During the preliminary investigation, as is stated in the indictment signed by Vyshinsky, BUKHARIN "under the weight of evidence" confessed:

"I must admit that we had direct contact with the "Left" Socialist-Revolutionaries which was based on a platform of the violent overthrow of the Soviet government, headed by LENIN, STALIN, to be followed by the arrests of LENIN, STALIN and SVERDLOV and the creation of a new

The question of BUKHARIN's collusion with the "Left" SRs was under investigation even before the arrest of BUKHARIN, during which the latter categorically denied that he had ever had any criminal ties with the "Left" SRs. At the confrontation with arrested ASTROV which took place on January 13, 1937 at the Central Committee of the CPSU(b), BUKHARIN answered a question of J.V. STALIN's thus:

"What's the point of my lying about the Brest peace? Once the Left SRs came and said, "Let us form a cabinet. We will arrest of LENIN and form a cabinet." Afterwards I told this to Ilyich. "Give me your word that you will not mention this to anyone," Ilyich said. Then, when I was fighting alongside you against TROTSKY, I cited this as an example: Look, this is what factional struggle leads to. At that time it was a bombshell."

BUKHARIN changed his testimony significantly during the course of the preliminary investigation and admitted that in 1918 he had been in an agreement with the "Left" SRs. However, at the trial in his closing statement BUKHARIN made such corrections to his previous testimony that they essentially negated his admission about the intention, in a bloc with the "Left" SRs, to arrest and murder LENIN, STALIN and SVERDLOV. In particular BUKHARIN declared:

I admit that there was one conversation with KARELIN and KAMKOV in which the initiative with regard to the arrest of LENIN for twenty-four hours and a subsequent bloc with the "Left" Socialist-Revolutionaries proceeded from the "Left" Socialist-Revolutionaries. But in the first conversation the reply was negative. As regards the fact that negotiations were subsequently conducted through PIATAKOV with the "Left" Socialist-Revolutionaries and this may be considered, as Citizen Procurator, if I am not mistaken, formulated it, an attempt to overthrow the Soviet power by forcible means—this I admit; it was the case. As to plan of physical extermination, I categorically deny it, and here the logic to which the State Prosecutor referred, namely, that forcible arrest implied physical extermination, will not help in the least..." (Arch. case № 967582. Trial transcript p. 684)

The confessions of the arrested MANTSEV regarding BUKHARIN's collusion with the "Left" SRs for the overthrow of the Soviet regime and the arrest of LENIN, STALIN and SVERDLOV cannot be considered reliable because MANTSEV gave them after having been sentenced to death. According to the material in the file MANTSEV it is clear that he was arrested on October 22, 1937 on the charge of belonging to a Trotskyist terrorist organization. He pleaded guilty to this and confessed that his active anti-Soviet activity was preceded by the struggle against the party in a group of so-called "Left Communists" led by BUKHARIN. However MANTSEV did not confess anything at that time about any connection between BUKHARIN and "Left" SRs in 1918.

On December 25, 1937 MANTSEV was sentenced to death by Military Collegium of the Supreme Court. In accordance with the law of December 1 1934 the sentence against MANTSEV was to be carried out immediately, as was specifically mentioned in the text of the sentence. Nevertheless, this sentence was not carried out for a long time, and on January 31, 1938 confessions were obtained from MANTSEV that in 1918 BUKHARIN had conspired with the "Left" SRs to overthrow the Soviet regime and to arrest LENIN STALIN and SVERDLOV. After MANTSEV had given such testimony, his sentence of execution was canceled by a protest of the President of the Supreme Court and his case was remanded for further investigation. Four months after the trial of the anti-Soviet bloc of Rights and Trotskyites, where MANTSEV had acted as a witness, he was again sentenced to the supreme penalty without further investigation and was shot on August 19, 1938.

Another prosecution witness, speaking at the trial in the case of anti-Soviet bloc, former member of the Central Committee of the "Left" SRs KAMKOV B.D. according to the testimony of the arrested BRIUKHANOV, held together with him in the same cell, said to him:

"All three of the recent trials are the same kind of swindle as the previous ones. There is not a drop of truth in them. Neither ZINOVIEV nor BUKHARIN was involved in any counter-revolutionary conspiratorial work. Espionage, diversion, sabotage, terrorism, killing — this is all a complete sham, fabricated by the NKVD. Confessions were extracted from the accused by torture, blackmail, beatings, threats, threats against their families, the arrests of their wives etc. by means of physical and mental pressure. At the same time they used bribery, appeasing the defendants promises not to execute them, etc..." (Arch. case number 967389, separate packet).

After the trial of BUKHARIN et al. KAMKOV was put on trial on the charge that he belonged to an illegal terrorist organization in Arkhangel'sk and was spreading "vile slander in connection with the trials of the Rights and Trotskyites" among those in prison."

On August 29, 1938 at the review of his case in the Military Collegium of the Supreme Court KAMKOV pleaded not guilty to all charges and was sentenced to death. While BUKHARIN was in custody the prisoner ZARITSKII N.D. had been in the same cell and when questioned on July 3, 1956, testified:

"I spent 4-5 months with BUKHARIN before he was executed..."

During the investigation, and especially during the trial, BUKHARIN expressed indignation at the injustice of the accusations against him. He told me that he was accused of plotting to commit terrorist acts against the leaders of the Party and the Government, in an attempt to commit a terrorist act against LENIN.

He tried to convince me that during his last years he had been very close to LENIN, was well received in his family, was essentially in the position of a son, and that he could not even think of committing any act directed against LENIN.

He also told me that he had good personal relations with STALIN, that in a number of instances STALIN had given him and his family assistance in domestic matters, and therefore he never could never even think of murdering him.

BUKHARIN was indignant that he was being questioned about some kind of criminal ties with whom he had never known.

During the trial itself BUKHARIN told me that people were making fictitious confessions to the court, talking about the existence of center in which he was allegedly included, although he had no idea that it even existed."

Before his arrest, and under investigation BUKHARIN for a long time did not admit guilt to anything. During this time he wrote a lot of letters and petitions addressed to J.V. STALIN in which he gave his alibis. This, together with the facts cited above, suggests that we ought not to treat BUKHARIN'S subsequent confessions with confidence. Especially since the verification process has established that a significant part of his testimony has been refuted beyond doubt as false. Specifically, 15 Party and Soviet workers who appear in BUKHARIN'S confessions as his accomplices have been fully rehabilitated.

During the investigation and at trial RYKOV acknowledged that he was a leading participant in the anti-Soviet bloc of Rights and Trotskyites and was carrying out hostile activity.

However, the verification has established that these confessions of RYKOV's are, in the overwhelming majority of cases, false.

On August 9, 1937 RYKOV, for example, stated:

"In previous interrogations I testified about the reserve cadres of our organization but I did not talk about the main issue, namely that acting on a directive of the center of the Rights and specifically, on a directive that I gave to ANTIPOV, a reserve center of the organization of Rights was created. The structure of the center included: ANTIPOV, SULIMOV, UKHANOV, SYRTSOV, and KHALATOV" (Arch. case number 967582, v. 1, l.d. 138)

These confessions of RYKOV's are entirely fictional, because, as the verification process has determined, ANTIPOV, SULIMOV, UKHANOV, SYRTSOV and KHALATOV had been arrested without basis on charges of belonging to a counterrevolutionary organization of the Rights, and therefore in 1955-1956 they were fully rehabilitated. During his interrogation of 23 June 1937 RYKOV confessed:

"... The central figure in the organization of the Rights in the Urals was KABAKOV, whom we carefully kept very secret. I personally brought KABAKOV into the organization of the Rights during a process of repeated conversations... I kept KABAKOV, as a very important member of our organization, up to date with our conspiratorial plans. In particular, KABAKOV was informed by me of the plan of the so-called palace coup." (Arch. case number 967582, vol. 1, l.d. 97-99)

In 1937 KABAKOV was arrested on the basis of this evidence and sentenced to death. KABAKOV had now been rehabilitated.

During the investigation RYKOV also confirmed that a center of the organization of Rights which included ANTIPOV, LOBOV, KOMAROV, ZHUKOV, UGAROV, KODATSKII and CHUDOV had existed in Leningrad since 1928.

Upon verification it has turned out that these confessions of RYKOV'S too are untrue. All of the above persons have now been rehabilitated.

According to RYKOV'S testimony KARAKHAN, allegedly a member of an organization of Rights, held talks on TOMSKII's instructions with representatives of fascist Germany, to whom he made it clear that in the event the bloc of Rights and Trotskyites came to power certain concessions would be made in favor of the capitalist countries.

These confessions of RYKOV'S too have not been confirmed since KARAKHAN, brought to trial in 1937, refused to confess to any of the charges.

In RYKOV'S confessions comrade P. Togliatti also figures as a person who shared the views of Rights and was sympathetic to their struggle against the CC CPSU(b). The falsehood of these confessions speaks for itself.

Of those among his associates who figure in RYKOV'S testimony more than 30 people have far been rehabilitated.

Defendant SHARANGOVICH also gave unreliable confessions about criminal activity.

Thus, during the interrogation of August 13 1937 SHARANGOVICH said that he had been recruited to the organization of anti-Soviet activity in 1932 by Sulimov, and that in 1933 the former third secretary of the Communist Party of Belarus ZHEBROVSKII had recruited him to work for Polish intelligence.

Later SHARANGOVICH changed his testimony somewhat and began to claim that he had been drawn into collaboration with Polish intelligence by VNOROVSKII, an employee in the Soviet Embassy in Warsaw.

However, the verification has determined that SULIMOV and ZHEBROVSKII have now been rehabilitated as having been condemned although they were innocent. As for VNOROVSKII, no information about his links with the Polish intelligence service have been found among the archival materials of the intelligence agencies of bourgeois Poland.

In addition SHARANGOVICH claimed during the investigation that he was allegedly linked in espionage work to BOGUTSKI and SLAVINSKI. BOGUTSKI and SLAVINSKI, convicted in the past as traitors and spies, have now been rehabilitated.

Also terminated for lack of evidence of a crime are the cases of a number of individuals whom SHARANGOVICH named as members of the counterrevolutionary organization, including GOLODED, former chairman of the Council of People's Commissar's of the Byelorussian SSR.

During the investigation ROZENGOL'TS, GRIN'KO, CHERNOV, IKRAMOV, and KHODZHAEV also made confessions that do not inspire confidence.

In pleading guilty to belonging to the anti-Soviet bloc of Rights and Trotskyites ROZENGOL'TS confessed:

"After the arrest of RYKOV I maintained contact with the Rights through RUDZUTAK and partly through ANTIPOV and ZHUKOV...

I told RUDZUTAK about the sabotage that I was carrying out in foreign trade and about my ties with TROTSKY. At the end of 1936 (or early in 1937), I had a detailed conversation with RUDZUTAK about the last period of my relations with RYKOV and the blueprint of the future government agreed upon earlier." (Arch. case number 967582, vol. 6, l.d. 38-39)

As ROZENGOL'TS confessed further, RUDZUTAK proposed to include ANTIPOV, LOBOV, ZHUKOV, KODATSKII, and KOMAROV in the new government.

Those whom ROZENGOL'TS named— RUDZUTAK ANTIPOV, LOBOV, ZHUKOV, KODATSKII and KOMAROV, as already mentioned above, have now rehabilitated.

In 1955-1956 the cases against MURADYAN, ELIAVA Sh RABINOVICH, SHINDEL', BELEN'KII B.S., KANDELAKI, SUD'IN, VEITSER and others whom ROZENGOL'TS named during the investigation as his accomplices in enemy activity have been terminated for lack of evidence of a crime.

The same must be said about the confessions of GRIN'KO and CHERNOV. The latter, for example, asserted during the investigation that in the summer of 1936, at the direction of RYKOV, he got in touch with LIUBIMOV, a member of the reserve center of the Rights, and learned from him that BUBNOV and BAUMAN were part of this center... CHERNOV further confessed that in his enemy activity he contacted the Trotskyists through RUKHIMOVICH.

All these people have now been rehabilitated since it has been established that they were all convicted on the basis of false materials.

The verification established that GRIN'KO and CHERNOV signed fictional confessions concerning 46 persons were responsible Soviet and Party workers, the cases against whom have now been terminated for lack of evidence of a crime.

During the investigation IKRAMOV gave very confusing confessions. Initially IKRAMOV argued that, being one of the leaders of a nationalist organization, he had established communication with the center of the Rights in 1935 through ANTIPOV.

According to IKRAMOV, ANTIPOV then informed him that: "In struggle against the Soviet government the leadership center of the Rights considers it necessary to use all available ... means such as armed insurrection, sabotage in various sectors of the economy, diversion and terror against the leaders of the Party and the Soviet government." (Arch. case number 967582, v. 12, l.d. 94)

At the same time IKRAMOV admitted that according to his directives subversive activities on a large scale were carried out in Uzbekistan. However, attention should be paid to the fact that in some cases IKRAMOV'S confessions about specific sabotage activities were clearly far-fetched. Thus, at the interrogation October 10-12 1937 IKRAMOV said that he and his accomplices "...deliberately disrupted Party education at the expense of the Marxist-Leninist education of the masses; we advocated the need to study general subjects, or, as we said to each other, to raise the overall level without Marxism ...

We sold half of the political education book by Ingulov, published the Uzbek language, in other republics, despite the dire need it in Uzbekistan." (Arch. case number 967582, v. 12, l.d. 55)

During the interrogation of February 28 1938 IKRAMOV, without explaining why, substantially changed his testimony about the time and circumstances of the establishment of the bloc with the Rights, saying that he had established contact with the center of the Rights not in 1935 but in 1933, and not through ANTIPOV but through BUKHARIN. At the same time IKRAMOV testified that the center of the Rights was comprised of BUKHARIN, RYKOV, TOMSKII and UGLANOV.

It is well known that TOMSKII committed suicide in 1936. In his suicide letter addressed to J.V. STALIN TOMSKII stated that he had read the ruling of the court concerning including him in the investigation in connection with the testimony of those arrested in the case of the "United Trotskyite-Zinovievite terrorist center" and rejected the accusations against him as defamatory. Without denying his past political mistakes TOMSKII at the same time wrote that he could not bear being put alongside fascists and therefore was committing suicide and wished the party new victories.

Named by IKRAMOV as a member of the center of the Rights UGLANOV was arrested and confessed at trial that he had opposition activities until 1933 but after that had not carried out any anti-party work.

Serious doubts have also arisen concerning the credibility of KHODZHAEV'S confessions about his criminal activities.

that in 1928 he had been drawn into criminal work concerning the separation of Uzbekistan from the USSR by the former chairman of the State Planning Committee of the Uzbek SSR BURNASHEV.

It has been established by the verification we have conducted that BURNASHEV, referred to in KHODZHAEV'S testimony, had been convicted though innocent, in connection with which the Chief Military Prosecutor has now raised the question of his rehabilitation.

Although ZELENSKII, IVANOV and ZUBAREV pleaded guilty to all counts of the indictment, their confessions about the conspiracy of the Rights do not inspire confidence. More than 30 of the Soviet and party activists about whom ZELENSKII, IVANOV and ZUBAREV confessed to being accomplices to criminal activities, have now been rehabilitated because their innocence has been completely proven.

ZELENSKII, IVANOV and ZUBAREV, in addition to participation in the anti-Soviet bloc of Rights and Trotskyites, were also accused of collaboration with the Tsarist secret police.

It has been established by the verification that the testimony of ZELENSKII, IVANOV and ZUBAREV about their collaboration with the Tsarist secret police cannot be sufficiently confirmed by the materials in the State historical archives where the records of police and gendarme corps of tsarist Russia are kept.

According to the archival facts agent "Slepoi" — Isaiah Abramovich ZELENSKII — collaborated with the Samara provincial gendarmerie beginning in 1916. The defendant in the present case, Isaac Abramovich ZELENSKII, was exiled from Sormovo to three years under police surveillance in Irkutsk province in 1915 by order of the Special Session of the Minister of the Interior for belonging to the RSDLP.

From the documents of the State Historical Archives it may also be seen that ZELENSKII had a brother named Isaiah.

With respect to IVANOV and ZUBAREV no documents have been found in the archives that might even indirectly confirm their involvement in the tsarist secret police. However ZUBAREV was specifically accused at trial by the confessions of former police officer VASSILIEV, who testified that he had recruited ZUBAREV.

Given such materials we cannot give a definitive opinion concerning the involvement of ZELENSKII, ZUBAREV and IVANOV with the tsarist secret police at the present time. These circumstances are subject to additional verification.

In the practical criminal activity attributed to the defendants in the case of "anti-Soviet bloc of Rights and Trotskyites" the killings of A.M. GOR'KII, V.V.KUIBYSHEV, V.R. MENZHINSKII and GOR'KII's son M.A. PESHKOV, as well the attempt to poison EZHOV, occupy a very important place.

This accusation was brought against the leaders of the Bloc of Rights and Trotskyites, including IAGODA, against the well-known doctors PLETNEV D.D., LEVIN L.G., KAZAKOV I.N., former secretary of the NKVD USSR BULANOV, KRIUCHKOV P.P., secretary to A.M. GOR'KII, and MAKSIMOV-DIKOVSKII V.A., assistant to V.V.KUIBYSHEV, who were brought to justice in this case.

All the defendants named pleaded guilty to the charges. However, the available materials indicate that these confessions are invalid. PLETNEV, who during the investigation and at trial admitted his guilt in the organization of killing A.M. GOR'KII and V.V.KUIBYSHEV on the instruction of IAGODA, after the conviction on June 11, 1939 addressed the following statement to Comrade VM Molotov:

"I was sentenced in the Bukharin case. During the investigation I admitted the accusations against me, and at trial I did not renounce them. I was slandered. The indictment leveled against me is false. My mind was under compulsion. But I did not consider it possible to make this statement at trial like Krestinskii. I have been in prison since December 1937. I am suffering morally to the ultimate degree. My health has deteriorated sharply. I am already 66 years old. The point around which the indictment was built was my meeting with Iagoda, where he allegedly threatening me and my family and demanded my involvement in the killing of Gor'kii. This meeting never took place either in August or, according to the next version, in June. Altogether I saw Iagoda only once in my life during his attack of angina pectoris. I saw him only in medical consultation. I never had any conversations with IAGODA except about his illness. All my life since October of 1917 I have been loyal to the Soviet regime and under the leadership of the party have given all my strength and knowledge to my homeland. Now I am deprived of all this. I swear to my innocence by all that is holy to me. I ask for a review of my case. I ask to be interviewed for this purpose or that that I be given an opportunity to submit a detailed statement in a sealed envelope." (Supervisory production № 7343-9, l.d. 6)

This declaration was transmitted by the Secretariat of comrade MOLOTOV V.M. to Beria.

Subsequently PLETNEV repeatedly made similar statements. About one of them former USSR Prosecutor BOCHKOV informed the Secretariat of Comrade V.M. MOLOTOV:

"The arguments set out in the complaint of PLETNEV D.D. and, in particular, his retraction of his testimony, are a provocation and a continuation of his hostile work ... review of the case is denied, of which PLETNEV D.D. has been informed." (Supervisory production, № 7343-9, l.d. 26)

In confirmation of the charge of murder brought against IAGODA, PLETNEV, LEVIN, KAZAKOV, KRIUCHKOV, BULANOV and MAKSIMOV-DIKOVSKII, eminent medical practitioners V.N. VINOGRADOV, Professor N.A. SHERESHEVSKII and others were called as experts at the trial. They drew the conclusion that GOR'KII, MENZHINSKII, KUIBYSHEV and PESHKOV died as a result of the clearly wrong medical treatment applied to them by PLETNEV, LEVIN and KAZAKOV.

With regard to the attempted assassination of EZHOV the experts concluded: "...it must be taken as absolutely established that the poisoning of Comrade N. I. EZHOV by mercury absorbed through the respiratory tract, the most potent and dangerous method of chronic mercurial poisoning, was organized and put into execution." (Court proceedings, p. 547 (621))

Professor VINOGRADOV and Professor SHERESHEVSKII were interviewed in 1956 and stated that no documents were submitted to them confirming the incorrect treatment of KUIBYSHEV, GOR'KII, MENZHINSKII, and PESHKOV, that they reached their conclusion only on the testimony of the defendants, who admitted their guilt completely. Thus VINOGRADOV in particular pointed out:

"Conclusions were drawn by myself and the other experts on the basis of general questions without the presentation of any detailed documentation (medical history with detailed logs, analyses and pictures). Thus, our answers to these questions were of a purely theoretical nature. We could not assert the authenticity of this fact on the basis of the materials that were before us."

Concerning this matter SHERESHEVSKII said:

"... our conclusion was derived from the testimony of the accused and could not serve as additional proof of their guilt, inasmuch as there were no medical documents presented to us confirming fact that the patients had been treated in the way mentioned in the testimony of the accused."

At the same time SHERESHEVSKII and VINOGRADOV described PLETNEV as an outstanding scientist of world renown. And with regard to LEVIN, accused of killing GOR'KII, SHERESHEVSKII said:

"LEVIN was GOR'KII's attending physician and, as far as I know, loved him greatly. When he talked about him, he was simply transformed. And that is not at all compatible with the accusation against him of the deliberate murder of A.M. GOR'KII."

Upon verification it was also revealed that the materials on the so-called "poisoning" of EZHOV were completely falsified.

In an interrogation of April 16 1939 FRINOVSKII testified about this: "NIKOLAEV-ZHURID, with my participation and as directed by EZHOV, fabricated the case of the so-called mercury poisoning of EZHOV. NIKOLAEV personally directed the case. EZHOV gave out the idea that he was ill from poisoning, and NIKOLAEV seized on it, and under great pressure got confessions about this from BULANOV, then from IAGODA's courier ... and then from IAGODA himself.

From somewhere or other NIKOLAEV obtained a pharmacy jar with mercury, which he turned into material proof of the mercury poisoning of EZHOV. NIKOLAEV provided the corresponding expert opinion of the poisoning." (Arch. case number 975181, Vol. 2, l.d. 62)

According to verification in the special State archive of the USSR no materials have been found indicating a connection of persons in this case with foreign intelligence agencies.

Persons brought to trial in this case, as well as those in the precious public trials, were accused of carrying out their criminal activities on the instructions of TROTSKY. Concerning this, TROTSKY in his article "The outcome of the process," of March 12, 1938 wrote:

"According to the results which Vyshinsky must draw from the latest series of trials the Soviet state is revealed as a centralized apparatus for state treason.

The heads of the government and the majority of people's commissars (Rykov, Kamenev, Rudzutak, Smirnov, Iakovlev, Rosengolts, Chernov, Grin'ko, Ivanov, Osinsky, et al.); the most important Soviet diplomats (Rakovsky, Sokol' Nikov, Krestinskii, Karakhan, Bogomolov, Yurenev, et al.); all the leaders of the Communist International (Zinoviev, Bukharin, Radek); the best leaders of the economy (Pyatakov, Smirnov, Serebriakov, Lifshits, et al.); the best commanders and leaders of the army (Tukhachevsky Gamarnik, Yakir, Uborevich, Kork, Muralov, Mrachkovsky, Alksnis, Admiral Orlov, et al.); the most outstanding worker-revolutionists produced by Bolshevism in thirty-five years (Tomskii, Yevdokimov, Smirnov, Bakaev, Serebriakov, Boguslavsky, Mrachkovsky); the heads and members of the governments of the Russian Soviet Republic (Sulimov, Varvara Iakovleva); all the heads without exception of the thirty Soviet Republics, i.e., the leaders developed by the movement of the liberated nationalities (Budu Mdivani Okudzhava, Kavtaradze, Chervyakov, Goloded, Skrypnik, Lyubchenko, Nestor Lakoba, Faizul Khodzhaev, Ikramov, and dozens of others); the leaders of the GPU for the past ten years, Yagoda and his collaborators; finally, and this is most important, the members of the all-powerful Politburo, the de facto supreme power of the country, Trotsky, Zinoviev, Kamenev, Tomskii, Rykov, Bukharin, Rudzutak—all of them participated in a conspiracy against the Soviet power in the years when it was in their hands!

All of them, as agents of foreign powers, strove to rip to shreds Soviet federation they had built and to enslave to fascism the peoples for whose liberation they had fought for dozens of years!

In this criminal activity premiers, ministers, marshals, and ambassadors invariably submitted to one person. Not to an official leader, no—to an exile! It was enough for Trotsky to move a finger and the veterans of the revolution became agents of Hitler and the Mikado.

Upon the "instructions" of Trotsky through an incidental TASS correspondent, the leaders of industry, transportation, and agriculture destroyed the productive forces of the country and its culture.

Upon an order from the "enemy of the people," sent from Norway or Mexico, railway workers of the Far East organized the wrecking of military trains, and venerable Kremlin physicians poisoned their patients. This is the astonishing picture of Soviet state that Vyshinskii is forced to present on the basis of the revelations of the latest trials.

But here a difficulty arises. A totalitarian regime is a dictatorship of the apparatus. If all the key positions of the apparatus were occupied by Trotskyists who submitted to me, why, in that case, is Stalin in the Kremlin and I am in exile? (Arch. case number 13005, Vol. 3, l.d. 308-309)

IV. The situation concerning the investigation and the trial

The investigation of the case of the so-called "Anti-Soviet bloc of Rights and Trotskyites" and its consideration at trial, conducted between 1937 and early 1938, was characterized by massive repression of Soviet citizens, by the most serious violations of socialist legality, by severe beatings of prisoners and by various and provocative techniques by means of which the investigating authorities extorted confessions from the prisoners and the courts handed down clearly unjustified sentences.

Due to the fact that the vast majority of the NKVD workers who had any relationship with the so-called anti-Soviet bloc of Rights and Trotskyites were subsequently shot it is not possible at the present time to fully explore the conditions under which the investigation in this case was conducted.

Nevertheless, even those far from exhaustive materials which were obtained during the verification give evidence of the gross arbitrariness and provocation that resulted in the extraction of confessions from the prisoners.

A number of former employees of the NKVD, interrogated during course of the verification, testified to the existence in 1937-1938 of a situation whereby the mere fact that a prisoner under investigation was put into the Lefortovo prison obliged the investigator to beat him. EZHOV went at night to the investigators' rooms along with other leading workers [of the NKVD — GF] and personally showed how to "obtain the necessary" confessions."

Questioned in 1956 ARONSON Ia.A., a former employee of the NKVD who took part in the investigation of the case of the anti-Soviet Bloc of Rights and Trotskyites, testified to this:

"... The period of late 1937 and early 1938, when the case in question was under investigation, was a period of mass beatings of prisoners. I remember that during that period EZHOV often came to the prison, usually at night, and made the rounds of the investigators' rooms. His whole conversation usually boiled down to this: "Whom are you interrogating? What's the result? Give it to him properly!" Vlodzimirsky and others accompanied EZHOV and sometimes immediately showed how to give it."

ROSENBLIUM A.A., who worked in 1937-1938 as chief of the medical unit of the Lefortovo prison was questioned in 1956 and stated:

"While working in the medical unit of the Lefortovo prison I saw many prisoners serious condition after the beatings inflicted on them during the investigation. In particular, I provided medical care to MAR'IASIN, who was severely beaten during the investigation.

Former NKVD worker BLAT was in serious condition in the infirmary. He had tried to commit suicide and had also been severely beaten...

... KRESTINSKII was brought from an interrogation to us in the medical unit in an unconscious state. He had been severely beaten, his whole back was one continuous wound, there was not a single unbruised place on it. As I recall, he lay in the medical unit for three days in very serious condition.

I often dropped in to see IAGODA. Usually, he complained about his heart ... once I saw on his face a large bruise under his eye."

Other former NKVD workers also confessed about beatings of prisoners. Thus, witness LERNER N.M. who took part in the interrogations of IAGODA, stated on June 2, 1956:

"... IAGODA often complained that he was beaten during the interrogations. I did not believe him and told him so.

Once, this was in the Lefortovo prison, I questioned IAGODA. EZHOV, FRINOVSKII and KURSKII dropped in at my office and at EZHOV'S suggestion I left the office. When sometime later I was allowed to go back, I saw a black eye on IAGODA'S face. IAGODA, showing me the black eye, asked me: "Now do you believe that they are beating me?" In addition I have personally seen BULANOV with signs of beatings on his face." The above-mentioned ARONSON also confirmed that he was aware of the beating during the investigation of prisoners RYKOV, SHARANGOVICH and IAGODA, and testified:

"I myself personally heard a complaint about beating from RYKOV. There was to be a face-to-face confrontation between RYKOV and NIKOLAEVSKII. They brought RYKOV in first. He looked pitiful, depressed. Either I or LULOV, I do not remember exactly, asked him: 'What's the matter, why do you look like that?' To this RYKOV replied, I remember it very well 'I feel demoralized,' and to the next question — Why? — he replied: "They beat me."

According to cell agent "Blagin" BESSONOV told his cellmates:

"He, BESSONOV, signed the accusations against him because otherwise he was threatened with fascist reprisal. In the Lefortovo he saw former members of the Central Committee who were beaten during the investigation, and named PTUKHA, a former member of the Central Committee of the CPSU(b), LAVRENT'EV, Central Committee member and others. KRESTINSKII was subjected to a severe beating; he wore a plaster cast during the trial." (Arch. case number 101492, vol. 1, l.d. 27) The above testimony about beatings of prisoners in the case of the anti-Soviet Right-Trotskyite center, of course, does not reveal the whole picture, for this period was characterized by the greatest orgy of violence in investigation and it was precisely at this time that beatings took on such a character at killings during interrogation occurred more than once. About this matter witness ROSENBLIUM A.A. testified:

"I worked as a doctor of the Lefortovo from December 1936 to January 31, 1938. During this period of time 49 people were recorded as having died in Lefortovo prison from beatings and exhaustion." (File on the indictment of Anvel't)

As has now been established, on October 14, 1937 chief of the Science section of the Central Committee of the CPSU(b) BAUMAN K.L. was killed during the investigation; on December 1, 1937, chief of the political directorate of the People's Commissariat of Soviet Farms the old Bolshevik SOMS K.; on December 11, 1937 Comintern worker Anvel't; on May 5, 1938 the deputy head of the UNKVD of the Leningrad oblast' SOSTE M.Ia.; on November 9, 1938 Marshal of the Soviet Union BLÜCHER and others.

It should be noted that prisoners were prodded into self-incrimination and slander against others not only by direct physical violence but also by mental violence. Threats of repression against relatives, threats of beatings, cries of prisoners being beaten — the investigators used all these in order to obtain "confessions." Former investigator ARONSON testified about this:

"I personally did not use physical force against RAKOVSKY, obviously, because he did not confess to me about espionage (RAKOVSKY "confessed" himself guilty of espionage to other investigators). I admit that I might have applied other means of pressure — measures of a mental nature: threats against him personally threats to arrest members of his family. I seem to remember, in particular, that RAKOVSKY was informed about the arrest of his wife and that her fate depended upon his confessions. Such was the system of interrogation of prisoners, introduced as mandatory methods by the leadership of the NKVD of that time. "

As is evident from the report of agent "Dima" RAKOVSKY himself, in his cell at the Orlov prison, spoke about the situation of the investigation of his case as follows: "... when almost from the first day they make it clear that you have to lie about yourself and others, smear your own name and honor, then you are overcome with rage and indignation. You begin to fight, to resist, but then when they tell you, as ARONSON told me: "Old man, do not hold out, confess," when they tell you that they will annihilate your family, that they will shoot you, you give up. When I was told that my wife had been put into the Lefortovo, I screamed and grabbed my head — that meant she would die. Fear for your family, the consciousness that you are sending them to their deaths, fear and the desire to live, complete hopelessness, and then the party "automatic", the habit of obeying the party — these things make you lie and do the devil knows what. All this is a lie, there is not a drop of truth in any of these cases." (Arch. case number 300956, v. 9, l.d. 321)

Further, he also said:

"I was taken from the Butyrki [prison] to the Lefortovo, and from the Lefortovo to the Lubyanka. Every night I expected to be shot. In Lefortovo, in this horrible prison where you could hear the scream people under torture, the moaning of women, shots during times of execution and the constant noise of aircraft engines, they suddenly cut my fingernails— I realized that they wanted to torture me. Soon I was summoned at night. I appeared before NIKOLAEV, AGAS, and another type that does the torturing. When I walked in, I was told that I was a spy. "Me, a spy?" "Yes, you. And you yourself will tell us about your activities." I realized that this was the end, that the only way to salvation was through admitting the most serious charges. This is the dialectic ... Everything went into it—the Japanese and the British. I myself sometimes became confused, I said so much." (ibid., l.d. 322)

While serving his prison sentence BESSONOV categorically denied his guilt and said this about the reasons that prompted him to make false confessions:

"At first a lieutenant interrogated me, and then a major of state security warned that if I did not give the necessary confessions they would make mincemeat out of me. And indeed a few days later I was called late in the evening to some room hitherto unknown to me. Five fellows were already there and on the table lay the necessary accessories—rubber club, gloves, stick and other things.

The major, wiping his hands, asked me about confessions and I, seeing all this, became a little cowardly, because I already knew about beatings to death ... I decided to lie. Well, and that's the way I became a counter-revolutionary. And the trial was a complete farce." (Ibid, vol. II, l.d. 61)

The convicted doctor PLETNEV reported vividly from prison on the system of beatings, threats, blackmail and provocations. In a statement of June 8, 1940 he wrote: "For three years I suffered from investigation to investigation, from court to court, from one prison into another, and yet I am completely innocent...

... the case of the killing of GOR'KII and KUIBYSHEV. I spoke to you about it, but the investigative unit will not allow any talk about this, insisting several times that I withdraw my statements, which I did not do.

... the case arose on the testimony of IAGODA who, according to his own personal statement, called me in the middle of August 1934 and with threats demanded from me my complicity with doc LEVIN in the killing of GOR'KII. Upon my denial of this investigator GERSON hit me in the face. I pointed out that this fact could not have taken place, since from July 20 1934 to the beginning of October I had been on a business trip abroad. The next day my words were confirmed by a certificate from the Passport Office ... and the fact of my alibi in August 1934. Then the investigator told me: "If the top leadership assumes that you are guilty, then even if you were 100% right, you will still be 100% guilty." There followed threats against me and my wife and, finally, an alternative was suggested by chief of the Special Political Division LITVIN, chief of the investigative unit KAGAN, and investigator GERSON: either, I continued my stubbornness, life in prison and death in it, or if I "agreed" to give a "clarification" about the time of my meeting with IAGODA in June 1934 — and I only saw IAGODA for the first time in my life in 1935 — and then 2-3 months after the trial, complete freedom and scientific work — in a word, "a repetition of RAMZIN'S fate." This was indirectly confirmed by EZHOV. You know the result. I so trusted the government that the thought of such lies and blackmail on the part of anyone, especially a member of the Politburo, never could have entered my head... Help me, because I perish though innocent. I ask only that you take a personal interest, and not transfer the matter to the detention unit. There bias rules. If the NKVD has seized you, that means you are guilty. Put yourself for a moment in my position and you will see the full depth of my misery. Believe me. There is still much more I could say in my own defense ..." (private prison file l.d. 206-207)

The "processing" of prisoners in the case of the Right-Trotskyite center did not stop day or night. This was handled during the interrogations by the investigators and in the cells by specially placed people. Concerning one of these people RAKOVSKY, after his conviction, told fellow his fellow inmates:

"In Lefortovo they put Lieberman into my cell... They let me write my confessions in my cell. When I presented them, if they did not like them, they would tear them up and throw them in my face. When I consulted with Lieberman my confessions always satisfied the investigators. He served as the transfer authority, he dictated to me what they wanted and through him I asked their advice...

In the end, I did not care, because I lied. And he could not hurt me, on the contrary, he facilitated my work." (Arch. case number 300956, v. 9, l.d. 324)

In this respect the fate of the former head of the 5th department of the UNKVD of the Saratov oblast' ZARITSKII N.D. is of some interest.

ZARITSKII was arrested for crude falsification of investigative materials, fabricating fictitious confessions that allegedly confirmed the existence of the organization of Rights which in reality did not exist (that is, at that time!). In essence there was no interrogation on the charges against ZARITSKII, there was only the taking of a statement and he was sentenced to two years in prison, and then he was confined among other detainees. One after another he sat in the same cell with the former regional secretaries of party obkoms KABAKOV, RYNDIN, and KHATAYEVICH, and then for 4-5 months together with BUKHARIN.

After BUKHARIN was executed ZARITSKII's case was reviewed without further investigation. His sentence was set aside and ZARITSKII was restored in the party and to operational work in the NKVD. Such encouragement of prisoners for "services" in exposing the Rights were not uncommon.

Likewise discontinued was the case against ASTROV, who admitted to being an active participant in the counter-revolutionary terrorist organization of Rights, who was one of the first to expose BUKHARIN, including in face-to-face confrontations in the Politburo of the CPSU(b).

Likewise lives of RADEK and SOKOL'NIKOV were spared although they were formally no less guilty than their fellow defendants, who were witnesses for the prosecution against BUKHARIN and RYKOV even before they had been arrested.

From materials in the archives of the KGB we know that SOKOL'NIKOV was brought to Moscow from prison in the fall of 1937 to be used as a witness at the upcoming trial of BUKHARIN, RYKOV and others, but because of his refusal to testify at trial he was sent back.

When SOKOL'NIKOV and RADEK began in prison to expose the falsity of the previous trials they were killed.

For the same purpose was set aside the verdict against MANTSEV, who, having been condemned to death, began to give confessions about the involvement of BUKHARIN in 1918 in a conspiracy of Left SRs and about his intention to arrest LENIN, STALIN SVERDLOV. After the trial in the case of the bloc of Rights and Trotskyites, without any additional investigative actions, MANTSEV was again convicted and then executed. Now he is fully rehabilitated.

It is clear from the testimony of former employee of the NKVD TSERPENTO .P.I how prisoners gave confessions on order of the investigators.

"In the summer of 1937 LITVIN personally interrogated ANTIPOV... In the transcript of this interrogation it was written that in September 1936 ANTIPOV received from RYKOV a directive to create a reserve center of the Rights. When these confessions were presented to RYKOV, RYKOV categorically denied meeting with ANTIPOV in September of 1936 and insisted that it was in 1932.

Then in my presence LULOV persuaded RYKOV to corroborate ANTIPOV's confession and say that it would be in his, RYKOV's, interest to make such a confession...

During the preparation of the trial of RYKOV, BUKHARIN and other (at the end of 1937) I learned from GLEBOV that now ANTIPOV writing completely new confessions in which, in particular, he was saying that the reserve center of the Rights was established in 1932.

Then GLEBOV proposed that I re-interrogate RYKOV in accordance with these new confessions.

When I expressed surprise that ANTIPOV managed to fool LITVIN, by giving him inappropriate, false confessions, GLEBOV told me that this was nothing surprising, since ANTIPOV was the kind of prisoner who is ready to give any confessions and in any direction.

By GLEBOV'S arrangement before the trial I had to persuade RYKOV to affirm his first confessions, which spoke of the creation of the reserve center of the Rights in 1932, not 1936." (Arch. case number 982027, vol. 1, l.d. 222-223)

As TSERPENTO further confessed, RYKOV, signing one of the new versions of "his" confessions, said:

"One advises me not to confess against ANTIPOV, and the other (i.e. me) requires confessions against him. I do not know who to listen to." (Arch. case number 982027, vol. 1, l.d. 30-31)

As you know, at the very first meeting of the Military Collegium of the Supreme Court of the USSR on March 2, 1938 the prisoner KRESTINSKII pleaded not guilty and retracted the confessions that had been given by him during the investigation. At that time KRESTINSKII said bluntly that the confessions that he has given before were not voluntary, and that he had not retracted them during the investigation only out of concern that his statement would not reach the leadership of the party and government. (Case report, pp. 54, 58)

This failure caused confusion among members of the Military College, and the court adjourned. But the next day KRESTINSKII reaffirmed the confessions he had given during the investigation, and said that the day before he had mechanically pleaded not guilty under the influence of a sense of false shame. (ibid., p. 146)

The verification has determined that during the process of the investigation KRESTINSKII gave confessions because he had been subjected to brutal beatings, and hence his rejection of these confessions at the trial had a real basis.

Concerning the circumstances surrounding KRESTINSKII'S confessions at the trial, former employee of the NKVD ARONSON has testified:

"I, like many other NKVD men, attended the trial. At the first session KRESTINSKII retracted the confessions he had given earlier and pleaded not guilty. This statement caused confusion on the part of VYSHINKII, who was in charge of the trial.

During the break we investigators discussed what had happened and talked about how to get out of this situation. NIKOLAEV (he was in charge of RAKOVSKY's case) then said that he would try to resolve the incident. When the accused were taken from the court they took KRESTINSKII together with RAKOVSKY. The next day KRESTINSKII pleaded guilty and confirmed all the confessions that he had given previously. I think, and the investigators said the same thing at the time, that KRESTINSKII had not been beaten, but RAKOVSKY had persuaded him. They said that RAKOVSKY, who in general had great influence on KRESTINSKII, told him something like this: "You ought to admit guilt, all the defendants are pleading guilty, and the court will consider anyone who does not admit guilt as an unrepentant enemy and will unquestionably shoot him, while in return for the admission of guilt they will preserve your life. The family of him who confessed guilt will not suffer, but in case of rejection of guilt the family will also be repressed." This so affected KRESTINSKII that to the end of the trial he did not try any more to reject the confessions he had given during the investigation."

Also characteristic in this regard is the behavior at trial of the public prosecutor VYSHINKII. When the court summoned KRESTINSKII for questioning VYSHINKII did not permit his immediate interrogation and first asked a number of questions precisely to RAKOVSKY.

KRESTINSKII was interrogated only after RAKOVSKY had given him an example — he fully admitted his guilt and named KRESTINSKII as his accomplice.

Those prisoners who were being made ready for the trial and for face-to-face confrontations to be carried out with participation by leaders of the Party and government were especially carefully prepared by the investigating authorities. Here everything was done strictly according to a developed plan and the prisoners repeatedly rehearsed "their" confessions.

As you know, some of the persons involved in the case of the Bloc of Rights and Trotskyites before their criminal prosecution were given face-to-face confrontations where prisoners previously arrested accused them of committing serious crimes against the state.

From the confessions, given after his arrest, of the former Deputy Commissar of Internal Affairs of the USSR FRINOVSKII it may be seen that specially instructed prisoners were brought forth at these face-to-face confrontations.

FRINOVSKII confessed about this:

"At first the investigator, then the chief of the department, prepared the prisoners in a special way. The preparation consisted in reading of the confessions that the prisoner had given against the person with whom the face-to-face confrontation was about to be conducted. They explained how the face-to-face confrontation would be conducted, what unexpected questions might be presented to the prisoner and how he should answer.

In essence what happened was an agreement and a rehearsal for the upcoming face-to-face confrontation. After that EZHOV would call the prisoner to himself, or pretending that he had by chance dropped in to the investigator's room where the prisoner was sitting he would speak to him about the upcoming confrontation and would ask whether he felt himself strong, would he confirm his confessions, and by the way, would mention that members of the government would be present at the face-to-face confrontation.

Usually EZHOV was nervous before such face-to-face confrontations even after he had had a talk with the prisoner. There were cases when the prisoner would state, during the conversation with EZHOV, that his confessions were not true, that he had been falsely accused." (Arch. case number 975181, Vol. 2, l.d. 37-38)

Before the trial, the preparation of the prisoners proceeded along two lines. On the one hand, by means of various promises (as a rule — the preservation of life), they urged them to stand firm on specific confessions. On the other hand they formulated the prisoners' answers in advance and the prisoners again rehearsed them.

The same FRINOVSKII confessed about this:

"He spoke for a long time with IAGODA, and that talk concerned, in the main, of assuring IAGODA that he would not be shot.

EZHOV had conversations several times with BUKHARIN and RYKOV and also in order to calm them assured them that under no circumstances would they be shot.

EZHOV had one conversation with BULANOV, and began this conversation in the presence of the investigator and myself, and finished the conversation one on one, having asked us to leave.

At that moment BULANOV had begun talking about the poisoning of EZHOV. What the conversation was about EZHOV did not say. When he asked us to enter again he said: "Behave yourself well at the trial — I will ask that you not be shot." (Arch. case number 975181, Vol. 2, l.d. 39)

RAKOVSKY talked about the same thing while in the Orel prison:

"During the trial the investigators never left me, encouraged me, talked about the impression that this revolting farce was making on me." (Arch.

case number 300956, v. 7, l.d. 325)

Questioned as a witness former NKVD man LERNER, who was involved in the investigation of this case, said the following in an interrogation in July 1956:

"I did not lead the investigation of the IAGODA case to its conclusion, the last 6-8 months I was doing other things and had no relationship with the investigation of the case.

However, when the trial began, obviously, considering that I had a good relationship with IAGODA, on the instructions of the leadership of the People's Commissariat I was present at all court proceedings and during the intervals played chess with IAGODA.

During the trial, or rather during breaks in the trial, IAGODA often asked me whether they would shoot him or not.

I am also aware that before the trial IAGODA was granted a visit with his wife Averbakh. And even earlier, as directed by the leadership of the People's Commissariat, I repeatedly told IAGODA that his wife was at liberty, when in reality she had been arrested.

Therefore, before the meeting, IAGODA'S wife was given a change of clothing and was made to look so that the impression was created that she had come to the visit not from prison but as though she were at liberty. For this camouflage a hairdresser was specially invited, who dressed her up, put matching outfits on her and returned to her wristwatch which had earlier been taken from her.

From the words of the former head of the Leningrad Region UNKVD LITVIN I know that IAGODA was shot last, and before that he and

BUKHARIN were seated on chairs and forced to watch as the sentence was carried out on the other convicted prisoners."

After his conviction RAKOVSKY told his cellmates: "I coordinated the main points of my speech at the trial, my last words with the investigators... During this last period they were all at my service, right up to the olives." (Arch. case number 300956, v. 7, l.d. 325)

This story of RAKOVSKY's is fully confirmed in archival documents of the NKVD. Moreover, they show that this situation occurred not only in relation to RAKOVSKY but also in relation to other defendants in the present case.

So, in archival files on RAKOVSKY and GRIN'KO we have found typewritten outlines of their future confessions at trial. By comparing these outlines with the confessions that RAKOVSKY and GRIN'KO gave at trial it was revealed that they are identical both structurally and in their meaning, and that some phrases in them are repeated almost word for word in the trial transcript.

Moreover, in these archival materials we have also discovered drafts of the "last words" of the accused RAKOVSKY, RYKOV and GRIN'KO, and in the materials on RAKOVSKY even two versions of "his" last words at the trial have turned up.

As has been established by the verification, the falsification of documents of the investigation file was not limited to the investigation but continued at trial.

In the archives of the Committee of State Security [KGB] of the Council of Ministers of the USSR there has been found a deciphered transcript of the trial in the case of the anti-Soviet bloc of Rights and Trotskyites with various handwritten corrections and insertions.

The study of this transcript and comparison of it with the official text of the trial transcript shows that the testimony recorded in court was subsequently changed, in some cases, and that moreover these changes in some cases were in the nature of amplification and distortion of the testimony of the defendants.

Thus, the testimony of the defendant BESSONOV about his meeting with TROTSKY in 1934 when corrected was augmented by the following phrase: "TROTSKY said that he knew me very well by the letters of PIATAKOV and by what N.N. KRESTINSKII has said," by which not only was the substance of the testimony of BESSONOV changed, but it directly indicates on the part of TROTSKY contact with PIATAKOV and KRESTINSKII about which in this instance BESSONOV did not even testify.

During the interrogation of IAGODA at the trial the question of his guilt in the murder of KUIBYSHEV was not at all explained, as can be seen from the transcript...

However, the transcript was filled out as follows: "VYSHINKII. Do you plead guilty in the organization of the murder of KUIBYSHEV?"

/ 858 /

In his last words the accused RYKOV said:

"...I had a conversation in 1935 with KOTOV, who headed terrorist organizations in Moscow."

As a result of adjustments that phrase in RYKOV'S last words was recorded as follows: "In 1935 I gave the job of to KOTOV, who led the terrorist organizations in Moscow."

These same editors removed from the transcript RYKOV'S statement that SHARANGOVICH became known to him as a member of counterrevolutionary organization only at the trial.

Changes of a similar character were also made in the testimony of others, and then this distorted transcript, endorsed by Deputy Prosecutor of the USSR Roginskii, was published as the official text of the transcript of the trial of the Military Collegium of the Supreme Court.

Due to the established facts of the gross violation of law in the investigation of the case of the Right-Trotskyist center both during preliminary investigation and in court, it is worth noting that all the defendants who remained alive afterwards retracted their confessions and spoke about the trial as having been falsified by the investigation and the trial. All of them (RAKOVSKY, BESSONOV and PLETNEV) were shot on September 11, 1941 by verdict of the Military Collegium, which flagrantly violated the law and rendered this verdict not only without calling the accused into court but even without having any file on the charges against them.

Thus, as a result of the analysis of all the materials of the case and the additional verification it can be affirmed that the majority of the persons convicted in the present case did at one time take an active part in oppositional struggle but that, however, the accusation against them that in the following years they created a bloc of Rights and Trotskyites and conducted organized anti-Soviet activities, is falsified and in this regard they are subject to rehabilitation.

Some circumstances charged against individual defendants, for example, the involvement of ZUBAREV, ZELENSKII and IVANOV in the Tsarist secret police, and the nationalist activities of IKRAMOV and KHODZHAEV, etc., are subject to additional verification.

Remarks about Grover Furr's previous books, originally on the back cover:

About Trotsky's Amalgams:

It is no wonder that his work has already been translated into over a dozen languages. His work is riveting and revolutionary in its assessments. It is up to those who disagree with him to present the same kind of meticulous research.

— Anthony Gronowicz, Borough of Manhattan Community College, City University of New York; Associate Editor, The Journal of Labor and Society.

About The Murder of Sergei Kirov

Grover Furr moves with perfect ease with the Russian language and Russian archives. Without being intimidated by political correctness his research and documentation is precise, patient, meticulous. He has already proven beyond a shadow of a doubt that, as the title of one of his previous books states, "Khrushchev Lied." Now he confronts the question of Kirov's murder. The Soviet tragedy begins with the "Kirov Affair". This is one more reason to reconsider it, in the light of the important novelties in the book by Grover Furr.

— Professor Domenico Losurdo, University of Urbino, Italy

Grover Furr analyzes in detail the interrogations of Nikolaev's associates, compares them with the testimony of a number of the arrested Zinovievites and the materials of the Moscow Trials in 1936-1938. He cites sources not accessible to the Russian reader: the Volkogonov Archive, letters of Trotsky from Harvard University, books and articles published in the West that are not available in Russian.... Furr's book is not an "easy read." In the authors own words, it is "for those readers who seek critical examination and analysis.

— Igor Pykhalov, historian, St. Petersburg, Russia, author of more than a dozen books on Soviet history of the Stalin period.

About Khrushchev Lied

Grover Furr has made a worthy contribution to our understanding of post-Stalin politics and of Cold War historiography though not of the Stalin years themselves, as he is quick to point out. That is to say: Furr demolishes Khrushchev's false historical construct. But he makes it clear that much further research will be necessary to construct a new historical account to discover what really did happen. I hope we may look forward to more work by Professor Furr, and to the appearance in English of what he has already done.

— Sven-Erik Holmström, Socialism & Democracy 26:2 (2012)

Grover Furr has written an intriguing book that challenges much of the existing historiography of the Stalinist 1930s. His insights and the sources he brings to bear question many of the views held by historians for decades and deserve our consideration. This book raises issues and questions that most scholars in the West today would not and does so in a sober and penetrating manner. He reaches fascinating conclusions, debunking much of what we thought we knew about the Stalinist era.

— Jeff Jones, History Department, University of North Carolina at Greensboro.

Acknowledgements and Dedication

I would like to express my thanks to the dedicated staff of Harry S. Sprague Library, Montclair State University.

I am especially grateful for the invaluable work of the Inter-Library Loan librarians Kevin Prendergast, Arthur Hudson, and Siobhan McCarthy. Without their hard work I simply could not obtain the many hard-to-find books and articles, in many languages, that make my research possible.

My publisher, cover designer, cogent critic, and friend Mike Bessler of Erythrós Press and Media, LLC, has given me encouragement, inspiration, and help whenever I needed it, often at late night hours. I could not ask for a better publisher.

Professor Susana M. Sotillo, Ph.D., my camarada and compañera, has helped me immeasurably with her patience and affectionate encouragement more than any words of mine can express.

Yet again my colleague and friend Vladimir L'vovich Bobrov, of Moscow, Russia, has given unstintingly of his time and help to make this book a reality.. I cannot do justice to the contribution he has made to this book, as to all my research and our joint research, in the field of history of the Stalin period.

My deepest thanks to each one of you.

Dedication

I dedicate this book to my friend Bill Sacks. Bill has proofread this and several other books of mine with great care, and made excellent suggestions that have improved my work immeasurably. No one has been more encouraging, supportive, and helpful. Thank you, Bill!

Preface

Many a reader will wonder: "Why another book on the Katyn Massacre?" "And, particularly, why call it a "mystery"? For (they will think) the mystery — if there ever really was one — was solved long ago, in the early 1990s when the Soviet, then the Russian governments admitted guilt and produced the "smoking gun" documents of "Closed Packet No. 1", the primary source evidence of Soviet guilt in that atrocity.

I used to think the same thing. When I read in the New York Times that President Gorbachev of the USSR had admitted the guilt of the Stalin government at Katyn, I had no cause to doubt it. The revelation in the same newspaper a couple of years later that President Yeltsin of Russia had given these "smoking gun" documents to Lech Walesa, President of Poland, confirmed what I already thought.

I did not care very much. To me, the Katyn Massacre seemed long ago and far away. Meanwhile the number of mass murders committed by the Germans and Japanese, and the scale of mortality in the Second World War; were so great that Katyn hardly added to it. Nor were my sympathies engaged by the fates of the Polish POWs said to have been murdered at the places which, collectively, came to be known as the Katyn Massacre, or "Katyn." Why sympathize with them rather than with the tens of millions of others murdered in that war? It is simply impossible, overwhelming, even crippling, to try to truly feel for all those long-dead people.

But since the mid-1990s there has appeared research claiming that this is all wrong. That "Katyn" is a frame-up, anti-Soviet, anti-Russian and anticommunist. I was not convinced ... but thinking back, I realize today that I still did not care enough to be either truly convinced or truly unconvinced.

I did become intrigued, however. "Katyn" — a term I will use in this book without scare quotes from now on as shorthand for "the Katyn massacre" — was now a mystery. And I like mysteries! Especially historical ones.

There was more to my attraction to Katyn' than just liking a good mystery. Since my student days, when I became involved in the protest movement against the American war in Vietnam, I have been attracted to Marxism. I sympathized with the Vietnamese struggle for independence. I learned that anticommunism was not exactly a fraud — the United States government was genuinely anticommunist — but that anticommunism also served as camouflage for imperialism and for ordinary capitalist exploitation. France, then Japan, and then the United States, wanted to dominate Vietnam. In the cases of France and the United States anticommunism became the rationale for a war to preserve empire. In Vietnam and around the world it was the communists who were the major force organizing opposition to this imperialist war by the United States.

At a huge antiwar demonstration in Manhattan in 1967 an older person — an onlooker, not a participant — told me in a friendly manner that I should not be supporting the National Liberation Front of South Vietnam. Why not? I asked. Because the NLF was really led by the Vietnamese Communist Party, which was led by Ho Chi Minh. Ho had been trained by Joseph Stalin. And Stalin, he said, had murdered 40 million people.

I did not just "believe" what he said. But I did not disbelieve it either. I determined that I would look into this matter seriously once I had the time to do so, once I had my feet on the ground in teaching and my doctoral dissertation was well on the way to completion. I was confident that I possessed the tools to do this. I could read the Russian language well; it was one of my languages for my degree in Comparative Literature (Medieval English, German, Russian) at Princeton University.

I also knew that to do valid historical research the student must identify, locate, obtain, study, and draw the logical conclusions from, primary sources. I had learned this from a master teacher, D. W. Robertson, Jr. In the early 1960s his insistence on primary source research had shaken the staid field of medieval literary research to its foundations. Robertson — his students called him "Robby" — had been attacked as an enemy of scholarship, even of the Enlightenment itself, because he dared to question "received knowledge."

Robby's publications had changed the field in a definitive way. And, as he informed us, he had done it by insisting on the primacy of primary sources. He told us what that meant: to never be afraid to question, and in fact to challenge, the prevailing orthodoxy within the field, no matter how monolithic, how indestructible it appeared to be — if the primary source evidence demands it. I also embarked on the study of Soviet history as a project in self clarification. I had questions about the Stalin period in the Soviet Union that challenged my opposition to the Vietnam War, to American imperialism, and to the conventionally accepted Cold War paradigm of understanding history and politics. I had the tools. I had a little courage, learned from my participation in the antiwar movement. So I began to research the Stalin years in the USSR.

By 2006 I had read enough on Katyn to know that there was a critical mass of research that rejected what I call the "official" version of Katyn — that the Soviets were guilty. So I created a web page to which I gave the title "The Katyn Forest Whodunnit." At that time it was the only resource in the English language where one could learn about the research that challenged the "official" version. I did not endorse either version: the "official", Soviets-did-it, the "oppositional", Germans-did-it-Soviets-were-framed. I was agnostic.

I also determined that I myself would never write anything about Katyn. For almost seven years I concluded my Katyn web page with these words:

So here is my last thought, for now: SO WHAT?

I'm serious. I do not think it matters to very many people, and maybe to nobody.

"The Katyn Massacre" is not an historical question — it is a WEAPON, a CUDGEL. You use it to make war on "the other side", and that's it.

Those who say "the Soviets did it" are NEVER going to accept that they did not, no matter what the evidence.

Those who say and/or hope: "The Soviets did NOT do it" are NEVER going to shed their respect and admiration for the USSR, EVEN IF you managed to convince them that the Soviets did it. And I do not think that's going to happen either!

It's like convincing a Christian that Jesus never existed. That is, it's no longer history, it's religion.

Good luck!

So it is interesting. But at this point I confine myself to (a) reading about it; and (b) reminding those who "know" (= are sure they know, and do not want to hear otherwise) of their bad faith.

You can imagine how popular THAT makes me! But being unpopular in this way is something I'm very content to be.

I hope this has been interesting, maybe even helpful. Believe me, there is so much more to say that you do not even want to know!

("The Katyn Forest Whodunnit" April 3, 2007)

In 2006 and 2007 my conclusions were sharply challenged by Sergei Romanov. Mr. Romanov proved to me that I had made some errors in my page. I corrected them, and thanked him explicitly on that page. He also put our exchange online on his own website.¹

¹ Where it remains as of this writing (January 2017) — <http://holocaustcontroversies.blogspot.com/2007/03/and-now-for-something-not-completely.html>

Mr. Romanov also made a significant error in historical method. At the time I had not studied Katyn enough, or thought deeply enough about it, to be able to recognize his error. So I thanked him, but I refused to do what he demanded: acknowledge that the Soviets were indeed guilty.

I remained agnostic about Katyn. As it turns out, I was correct to do so. But I did not fully understand that then.

In January 2013 I learned about excavations by a joint Polish-Ukrainian archeological team of a mass murder site at Volodymyr-Volynskiy, Ukraine. I found the Polish archeologist's report on it online and studied it. I recognized the importance of the discoveries made there for any objective understanding of Katyn. Violating my own promise to myself never to write anything on Katyn (other than my web page) I set about doing some intensive study.

I found a journal willing to accept an article, which was published in August 2013. I also realized that, unless I did something to publicize it, this discovery and its importance for our understanding of Katyn would remain almost entirely unknown. So during the next eighteen months I printed up several hundred offprints of this article and mailed them around the world. After 18 months I put a link to that article on my Home Page.

The title of my article is:

² Socialism and Democracy 27(2) (August 2013): 96-129.

During the pre-publication process my very helpful editor asked me: "Why the question mark?" Once the article had been published a few other people asked me the same question. I did not have a good answer. In truth, I did not know why, except that "it felt right." Once the article was published I concentrated on mailing offprints and on researching and writing another book. When that book was published, I went on to research and write two more. It was a very busy time.

But that question mark nagged at me! Why had I put it there? At length I understood: I was still not fully convinced that the "official" version of Katyn had indeed been disproven. As much as I knew about Katyn — and I already knew more than most specialists in Soviet history — I realized that I still did not know enough.

When confronted with a mystery a detective sets out to solve it. If a crime is involved — Katyn is surely a massive crime — he, or she, doesn't care who is guilty. The detective approaches the task of solving the crime objectively, for the sake of the thing itself that is, for him, or herself. In "The Adventure of the Red Circle" we find the following exchange between Sherlock Holmes and Dr. Watson:

"It is art for art's sake. Watson, I suppose when you doctored you found yourself studying cases without a thought of a fee?"

"For my education, Holmes."

"Education never ends, Watson. It is a series of lessons with the greatest for the last. This is an instructive case. There is neither money nor credit in it, and yet one would wish to tidy it up."

Holmes' words — that is, Conan Doyle's — precisely express my deeper motive in researching and writing this book. For there is "neither money nor credit in it." On the contrary, I can be assured that I will be attacked and slandered by those who are horrified to look the truth in the face and discover that it is not at all what they want it to be. Yet "one would wish to tidy it up" or to solve the mystery.

To solve any mystery we must first identify the relevant evidence. And concerning Katyn, there is a mountain of material that is often taken to be evidence. Holmes can help here too:

It is one of those cases where the art of the reasoner should be used rather for the sifting of details than for the acquiring of fresh evidence. The tragedy has been so uncommon, so complete and of such personal importance to so many people, that we are suffering from a plethora of surmise, conjecture, and hypothesis. ("Silver Blaze")

Maria Konnikova explains:

In other words, there is too much information to begin with, too many details to be able to start making them into any sort of coherent whole, separating the crucial from the incidental. When so many facts are piled together, the task becomes increasingly problematic. You have a vast quantity of your own observations and data but also an even vaster quantity of potentially incorrect information from individuals who may not have observed as mindfully as you have?³

³ Maria Konnikova, Mastermind. How To Think Like Sherlock Holmes. New York: Viking Penguin, 2013. "Learning to Tell the Crucial from the Incidental."

This is exactly the situation that faces us in the case of Katyn, Holmes concludes:

The difficulty is to detach the framework of fact: — of absolute undeniable fact — from the embellishments of theorists and reporters. Then, having established ourselves upon this sound basis, it is our duty to see what inferences may be drawn and what are the special points upon which the whole mystery turns.

As it happens, this is a good, succinct outline of the proper method of doing historical research too. In the case of Katyn there is "too much information," "too many details." A bigger problem is that very few of the persons involved in studying Katyn are objective. They have decided that the "official" version is correct; that the Soviets killed the Polish POWs and that there is no doubt remaining about this. Moreover, they have decided that it is perverse to even raise the question. That simply to approach Katyn as a mystery implies that the solution has not been definitively determined for all time, and is therefore a dishonest thing to do, since it implies the possibility that the Soviets might not have done it. This attitude has discouraged objective study of Katyn.

So I have undertaken to solve the Katyn mystery more for self-clarification than for any other reason. "For my education, Holmes." Can I apply my own principles? Am I capable of approaching this important topic with objectivity?

Can I look with especial suspicion on all evidence that tends to support my preconceived ideas while giving an especially generous reading to evidence that tends to contradict my own ideas? In my case, can I discover the truth, even if the truth is that the Soviets — the communists, with whom I have been in sympathy ever since the Vietnam War — were indeed guilty? At a debate in October 2012 I said that I had researched alleged "crimes of Stalin" for many years and had yet to find one crime that Stalin committed. At that time I was still agnostic, undecided, about Katyn. But if the evidence demands it, am I capable of concluding that Stalin and the Soviet leadership did indeed kill the Polish POWs, as the "official" version states?

Yes, I am. I am much more interested in the mystery itself than in what the solution might be. Besides, it is more satisfying to demand objectivity of oneself than to take the coward's way out and either decide for the stronger side (and thus win a dishonest approbation) or to assert the unpopular side out of bias and prejudice, and thus know, in my own mind at least, that I am afraid to face the truth.

I agree with historian Geoffrey Roberts when he says:

In the last 15 years or so an enormous amount of new material on Stalin has become available from Russian archives. I should make clear that as a historian I have a strong orientation to telling the truth about the past, no matter how uncomfortable or unpalatable the conclusions may be. ... I don't think there is a dilemma: you just tell the truth as you see it.⁴

⁴ "Stalin's Wars," February 12, 2007, At <http://hnn.us/roundup/entries/35305.html>

My research concludes that the Germans, not the Soviets, are guilty of the mass murders known as the Katyn massacre. This is the same conclusion as is drawn by a few Russian researchers, including the late Sergei Strygin, Vladislav Shved, Valentin Sakharov, Elena Prudnikova and Ivan Chigirin. But I have not followed the method that these researchers use. Instead I have used the method that a detective would employ. A detective who did not care who was guilty, but whose aim was solely to find out the truth and report that truth — and let the chips fall where they may!

To a person less familiar with the history of the scholarship on Katyn it might well appear that, in Konnikova's words, "there is too much information to begin with, too many details to be able to start making them into any sort of coherent whole, separating the crucial from the incidental." After all, just think about that library full of books and articles on the subject! But by that time I had been studying Katyn for years. I knew that there are only a few documents that constitute the primary source evidence in this case. Once I began to systematically sort, categorize, and study this evidence, I came to the realization that there is really very little evidence to support either the "official" Soviets-did-it version or the opposite, Germans-did-it version. Upon even closer scrutiny I realized that there is even less evidence than that — in fact, only a few bits of evidence — that (for all practical purposes) cannot possibly have been fabricated or falsified in order to bias case in favour of one or the other version.

Consequently, in this study I concentrate on these few bits of what I call "unimpeachable evidence" — meaning, evidence that it is impossible to discredit as evidence (the interpretation is something else again). You, the reader, will make up your own mind whether this evidence is as clear and unambiguous, and my interpretation of it as correct, as I believe it to be. This book is written for the student of history who wants to know the truth, even when that truth is "disillusioning" in that it forces her to set aside her own illusions — her preconceived ideas — and actually change her mind. Researching and writing this book has changed my mind. I am no longer agnostic on the subject of Katyn.

I predict that those who have built their professional careers around the "official" version of Katyn will, as a matter of course, reject the conclusions of this research. They will reject it not because my method or my analysis of the evidence is faulty, but for a priori reasons — they are biased, unalterably prejudiced in favor of the view that the Soviets are guilty. No amount of evidence will change their minds. Obviously, this book is not written for them.

Before a juror can be seated on a jury in a criminal trial in the United States that juror is instructed that he or she must decide the guilt or innocence of the accused strictly on the basis of the evidence, not according to any preconceived idea, information learned outside of the courtroom, or bias. Historians too are professionally obliged to act in this way. Unfortunately, very few of those who have studied Katyn can honestly claim that they have adhered to this vital principle.

This book may not be pleasing to those students of history who are convinced that the Soviets were innocent of Katyn but think that this can be established by means that, in my judgment, are not valid — for example, by attempts to prove through internal analysis that the documents of Closed Packet No. 1 are forgeries. The defenders and detractors of Closed Packet No. 1 have argued back and forth for years. I think this is a sterile argument and explain my reasons for thinking so in these pages.

Another approach must be taken to solving the Katyn mystery. I believe it is the one I have taken here. This may seem arrogant to those historians and writers who have spent years following a quite different — and, to my way of thinking, incorrect — approach to the question.

In writing this book I do not expect praise from any side. I do expect sharper attacks from defenders of the "official" viewpoint. After all, they are not interested in the truth. In reality, they are not really interested in the Polish POWs who were killed at Katyn! If they were, they would welcome the discovery of who the real culprits, the real mass murderers, were. Instead, they are interested only in how the notion of Soviet guilt at Katyn can be used today to justify their own political, historical, and cultural projects. Despite the hundreds of millions of dollars spent on memorials, conferences, books, articles, educational materials, and indoctrination of all kinds, neither the Polish nor the Russian governments of today, nor their phalanxes of researchers, scholars, and politicians, really care about the Katyn victims. What they care about is their own political agendas.

I could claim that I do care about the men murdered at Katyn and that I demonstrate that in the only way it can be legitimately demonstrated: by solving the mystery and identifying the guilty party. But I do not make that claim. The mystery of Katyn has both intrigued and challenged me for years. That, and not concern for the victims as such, is the reason that I have done this research and written this book.

Of course, it does give appropriate respect to the victims of a murder to identify the guilty party after many years and "bring closure." However, in time the relatives and friends of the Katyn victims will pass from the scene, as all of us will. What will remain is the historical event. Now we know what happened, and what did not happen; who is guilty, and who is not. That will remain for posterity. It is that posterity, not the political purposes of yesterday or even of today, which will be served by discovering the truth about Katyn.

Introduction

The "official" version is the only version reflected in the Wikipedia article on Katyn, at http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Katyn_massacre. This page is relentlessly anticommunist and anti-Stalinist. It makes no attempt to be objective or neutral, in that it has no serious discussion of the scholarly controversy about this question. It's useful only as a short and accurate summary of the official version.

In April 1943 Nazi German authorities claimed that they had discovered thousands of bodies of Polish officers shot by Soviet officials in 1940. These bodies were said to have been discovered near the Katyn forest near Smolensk (in Western Russia), which is why the whole affair — including executions and alleged executions of Polish POWs elsewhere in the USSR — came to be called "the Katyn Massacre."

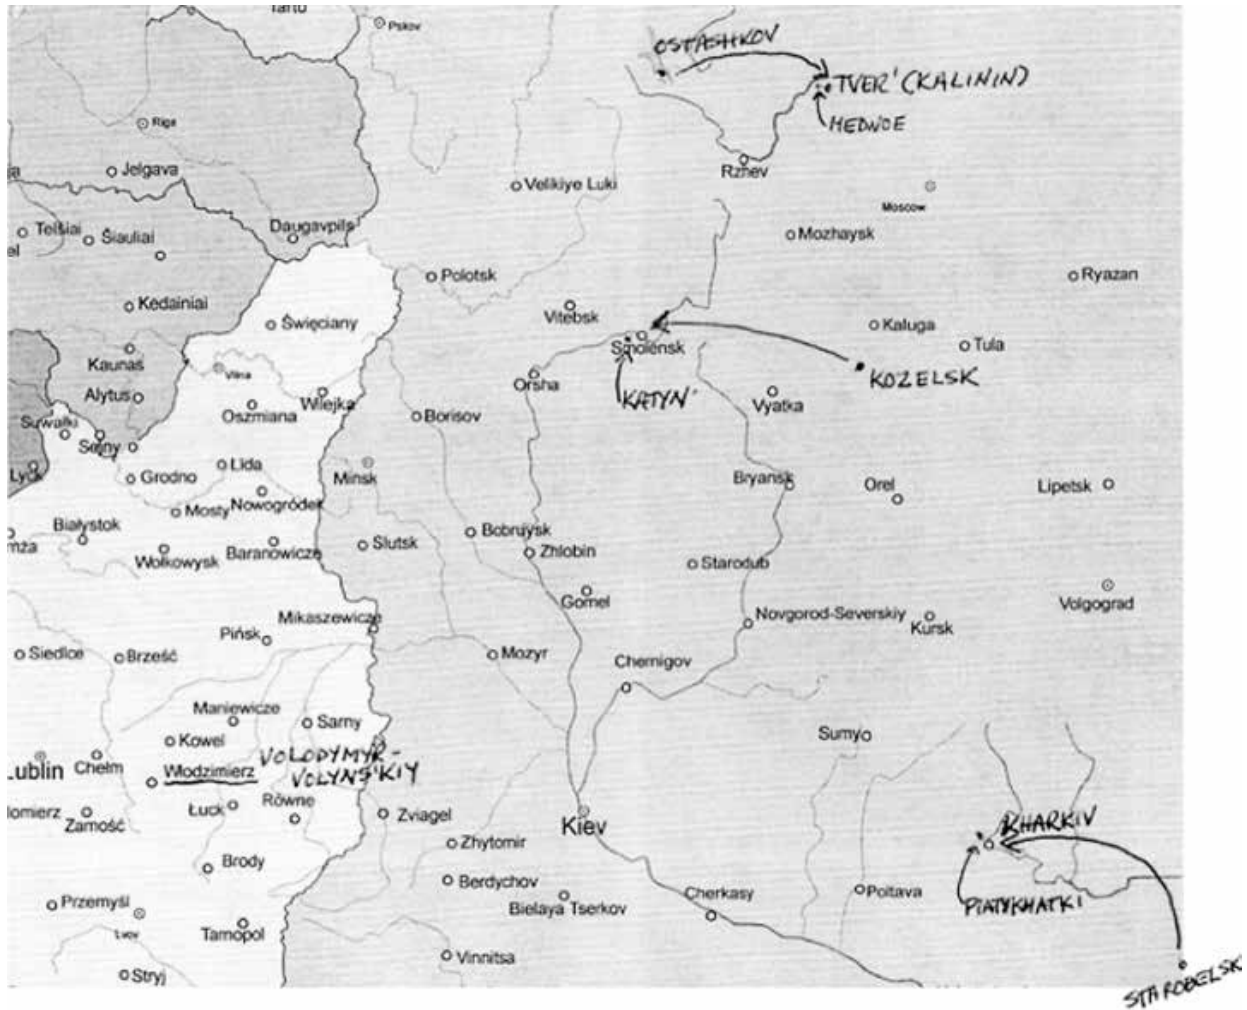

The Nazi propaganda machine, headed by Joseph Goebbels, organized a huge campaign around this alleged discovery. After the Soviet victory at Stalingrad in February 1943, it was obvious to everyone that, unless something happened to split the Allies, Germany would inevitably lose the war. The Nazis' obvious aim was to drive a wedge between the western Allies and the USSR.

The Soviet government, headed by Joseph Stalin, vigorously denied the German charge. When the Polish government-in-exile, always ferociously anticommunist and anti-Russian, collaborated with the Nazi propaganda effort, the Soviet government broke off diplomatic relations with it, eventually setting up a pro-Soviet Polish authority and Polish army.

In September 1943 the Red Army drove the Germans from the Katyn area. In 1944 the Soviet Burdenko Commission carried out a study and issued a report that blamed the Germans for the mass shootings.

During the Cold War the Western capitalist countries supported the Nazi version which had become the version promoted by the anticommunist Polish government-in-exile. The Soviet Union and its allies continued to blame the Germans for the murders. In 1990 and 1991 Mikhail Gorbachev,

General Secretary of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union and, after 1988, President of the USSR, stated that the Soviet Union under Joseph Stalin had indeed shot the Poles. According to this "official" version the Polish prisoners had been confined in three camps: at Kozel'sk, Starobe'sk, and Ostashkov and from there transferred to Smolensk, Kharkiv (Russian: Khar'kov), and Kalinin (now Tver') where they were shot and buried at Katyn, Piatykhatty, and Mednoe respectively.

1939 map showing places mentioned in the "official" Katyn narrative. Arrows from the POW camps (Ostashkov, Starobel'sk, Kozel'sk) to cities (Kalinin/Tver', Kharkiv, Smolensk) show destinations on NKVD transit documents. Burial sites in the nearby countryside (Mednoe, Piatykhatty, Katyn) are also shown, as is Volodymyr-Volyn'skiy (Włodzimierz), which is about 700 miles (1200 Km) from Kalinin/Tver' — Mednoe.

In 1990, 1991, and 1992 three aged former NKVD men were identified and interviewed. They discussed what they claimed they knew of executions of Poles in April and May of 1940. None of these executions had taken place at the Katyn Forest, site of the German exhumations.

In 1992 the Russian government under Boris Yeltsin handed over to the Polish government documents supposedly signed by Stalin and other Politburo members which, if genuine, would put Soviet guilt beyond reasonable doubt. These documents are said to have been found in "Closed Packet No. 1," where "closed" meant the highest level of classification — secrecy. I call these the "smoking gun documents," since they are conventionally assumed to be "proof positive" of Soviet guilt. However, no evidence is ever univocal and definitive; all evidence, whether documentary or material can be interpreted in multiple ways.

By 1992, therefore, the Soviet, and then the Russian, governments had officially declared the Stalin-era Soviet leadership guilty of shooting somewhere between 14,800 and 22,000 Polish prisoners to death in April and May 1940.

The Soviet "Germans-did-it" Version

On April 13, 1943, the Germans charged the Soviets with murdering the Polish POWs at Katyn. On April 16, 1943, the Soviet government responded in a press release by Sovinformburo which blamed the Germans. It explained the fate of the Poles:

The German-Fascist reports on this subject leave no doubt as to the tragic fate of the former Polish POWs who in 1941 were engaged in construction work in areas west of Smolensk and who, along with many Soviet people, residents of the Smolensk region, fell into the hands of the German-Fascist hangmen in the summer of 1941, after the withdrawal of Soviet troops from the Smolensk area.¹

In September 1943 Smolensk was retaken by the Red Army. On November 2, 1942 the "Extraordinary State Commission for Ascertaining and Investigating Crimes Perpetrated by the German-Fascist Invaders and their Accomplices" had been formed, of which Dr. Nikolai Burdenko was a member. On January 12, 1944, Burdenko was appointed chairman of the "Special Commission for Ascertaining and Investigating the Circumstances of the Shooting in the Katyn Forest by the German-Fascist Occupiers."

Known as the "Burdenko Commission" this group researched the Katyn massacres from October 5, 1943 until January 10, 1944. Its report, first published in Pravda on January 26, 1944, blamed the Germans. It claimed:

The Special Commission established that, before the capture of Smolensk by the Germans, Polish war prisoners, officers and men, worked in the western, district of the region, building and repairing roads. These war prisoners were quartered in three special camps named: Camp No. 1 O.N., Camp No. 2 O.N., and Camp No. 3 O.N. These camps were located 25 to 45 kilometers west of Smolensk.

The testimony of witnesses and documentary evidence establish that after the outbreak of hostilities, in view of the situation that arose, the camps could not be evacuated in time and all the Polish war prisoners, as well as some members of the guard and staffs of the camps, fell prisoner to the Germans.

The Burdenko Commission claimed that the Germans murdered the Poles. In the spring of 1943 the Germans:

...resolved to launch a provocation, using for this purpose the atrocities they had committed in the Katyn Forest, and ascribing them to the organs of the Soviet authorities. In this way they intended to set the Russians and Poles at loggerheads and to cover up the traces of their own crimes.²

(Henceforth BU + page number is to this edition). This translation is identical to the Soviet translation published as a Supplement to the "Soviet War News Weekly."

The Two Versions Compared

Both the "official" version and the Soviet version agree that more than 10,000 Polish prisoners were held by the Soviets at three POW camps: Kozel'sk, in Eastern Russia; Starobelsk, in Ukraine; and Ostashkov, near Kalinin (now renamed Tver'). In April and May, 1940, the Polish prisoners were shipped out of these three camps to the Directorates of the NKVD in Smolensk, Kharkiv and Kalinin respectively.

According to the "official" version the prisoners were executed there or at the burial sites, and buried at Koz'i Gory, near Katyn' (which is near Smolensk), Piatykhvatky, near Kharkiv, and Mednoe, near Kalinin, respectively.

According to the Soviet version the prisoners were sent from the three NKVD centers to camps 1-ON, 2-ON, and 3-ON near Smolensk, and others were sent to the western Ukraine. All were to do road work. All were captured by the Germans and their Ukrainian Nationalist allies in June 1941, and subsequently murdered.

Both versions agree that small numbers of Polish prisoners were sent to other camps and were not killed.

Crucial Points

The Soviet NKVD lists of prisoners shipped from the three camps to the NKVD at the three towns have been preserved and published. Everyone agrees that these lists are genuine.³

The "official" Soviets-did-it version relies on the assumption that the Polish prisoners were executed by the NKVD at the three towns named and then buried at the three burial places named. These shipments of prisoners are routinely stated to be "death transports."

The book Katyn: A Crime Without Punishment by Anna M. Cienciala, Natalia S. Lebedeva, and Wojciech Materski (Yale University Press 2007) is the definitive academic account of the "official" version. It refers to the shipments of prisoners this way (emphasis added):

The last death transport left Ostashkov for Kalinin (Tver) on 19 May...

...lists of those to be sent out of the camps to be shot (doc. 62)...

...and reporting on the number sent to their death (doc.65).

Cienciala, who did the writing in this volume, added all the language about execution. Likewise in her discussion of the documents — none of which mentions executions, shootings, killing, death, etc., at all — Cienciala continuously adds language to remind the readers that, in her interpretation, these prisoners were being transported to places where they would be executed. Here are a few examples (again, I have added the emphasis):

They were transferred to NKVD prisons... to be shot there. (154)

... the same as the order in the death transports. (156)

The first lists of victims to be dispatched to their death... (157)

The delivery of lists for dispatching prisoners to their deaths... (159)

Beria's directive of 4 April 1940 indicates the goal of extermination not only the officers and police... (160)

This is the first of many reports by the UNKVD head of Kalinin Oblast, Dmitry Tokarev, on the "implementation," that is, the murder... (162)

Soprunenko's instruction to Korolev of 6 April 1940 was, in fact, a death list... (163)

The dispatch of the prisoners of war to their deaths... (175)

This 11 April 1940 report from Kozelsk shows that 1,643 officers were murdered in nine days. (175)

... the moods of the prisoners as they were being dispatched unwittingly to their deaths. (176-177)

Most prisoners sent to Yukhnov camp... were exempted from the death lists for various reasons... (183)

By 3 May, the UPV together with the 1st Special Department NKVD and with the personal help of Merkulov, had processed the cases of 14,908 prisoners and sent out dispatch lists — death sentences — for 13,682. (187)

...it is likely that they simply signed or stamped the "Kobulov Forms" (doc. 51) with the death warrant already filled in. (187)

This report gives the number of lists of names received in the camp and the number of prisoners sent out from Kozelsk camp to their death for each date between 3 April and 11 May... (190)

A report to Soprunenko shows the number of people destined for execution to the lists received... (193)

One of the last executions of POWs from the Ostashkov camp took place on 22 May 1940. (200)

Ostashkov prisoners were still being executed that day... (200)

It is important to emphasize that not a single one of the transit documents themselves refers in any way to executions.

With very few exceptions, all the bodies identified — or supposedly identified — at Katyn' (Koz'i Gory) by both the Germans and the Soviets were identified by documents said to have been found on the corpses. No bodies identifiable as those of Katyn victims have been found at Mednoe or Piatykhvatky.

The "official" version assumes that the corpses exhumed at Katyn were all from the Kozel'sk camp, having been sent there from Smolensk. If any bodies at Katyn are those of POWs who, according to the Soviet transit lists, were sent to Kalinin or Kharkiv, the "official" version would be undermined or disproven. Likewise, any bodies of POWs from any of these three camps found at other places would also undermine the "official" version.

Chapter 1. The Evidence That Can't Be Impugned

There is an enormous amount of writing about the Katyn massacre. The books about it would certainly fill a small library. At least one journal, „Zeszyty Katyńskie," is devoted entirely to Katyn.

There are thousands of articles in historical journals, newspapers, and other periodical publications. The four-volume Polish document collection "Katyn. Dokumenty Zbrodni" (KDZ, "Katyń. Documents of the Crime") is more than 2000 pages long.

However, once I undertook to study Katyn I soon discovered that only a tiny amount of this material is primary source evidence of who killed the Polish POWs. The vast number of documents published in KDZ and a few other collections, however useful they may be for other purposes, obscure those few documents that do constitute real primary sources — the sole valid evidence — concerning the question: Who killed the Poles? All the rest concern peripheral issues. These side issues are important only for those who believe that they already know the guilty party and just want to "round out the story."

So in reality there is not much evidence. What's more, most of the evidence that does exist could have been fabricated in order to support one version or the other, either the "official" Soviets-did-it version, or the Soviet the "Germans-did-it" version. Indeed, some of it has to be fabrication.

Both the Germans and the Soviets produced reports, each with its own exhumations, autopsies, expert testimony, and witnesses. The German report concluded that the Soviets had killed the Poles, while the later Soviet report concluded that the Germans had killed them. Clearly, they can't both be correct. Nor can they both be incorrect, for there was no third party aside from the Germans and the Soviets that could have killed the Poles.

In 1992 the Russian government produced documents which it claimed had been hidden in a top-secret Soviet archive and proved that the Soviets had murdered the Poles. The documents of "Closed Packet No. 1" — I call them the "smoking gun" documents — looked genuine. For a few years it seemed that the question of "Who killed the Poles" had been solved for once and for all.

In 1995 Iurii Mukhin, a Russian metallurgist, published "The Katyn Mystery" (Katynskii detektiv). In it Mukhin argued that the "smoking gun" documents are fabrications. Mukhin's book soon gathered supporters, mainly in Russia, and started a movement. In 2003 Mukhin followed up his first book with a 750+ page work titled "Anti-Russian Villainy" (Antirossiiskaia podlost').

Some persons in the "Soviets-did-it" camp founded a website <http://katyn.codis.ru/> — devoted to promoting that position and to critiquing the opposing viewpoint. A little later some researchers adhering to the "Germans-did-it" viewpoint set up another website <http://www.katyn.ru/>. The researchers around this website, along with others, are convinced that the "smoking gun" documents are forgeries.

To sum up:

- Despite the vast amount of documentation there is in fact a very limited amount of primary source evidence.
- The evidence is contradictory. Some of it indicates the guilt of the Soviets, while other evidence supports the guilt of the Germans.
- Some of this evidence has certainly been faked — forged, fabricated.

The Document Collections

All the evidence relevant to establishing the guilty party is in one of the following four collections of documents:

A. The German Report, Amtliches Material zum Massenmord von Katyn (AM) of 1943 and related documents.

B. The Soviet Burdenko Commission Report (BU) of January 1944 and related documents.

C. "Closed Packet No. 1" (CP), the existence of which was announced in 1992.

D. The archeological report on excavations at the mass murder site in Volodymyr-Volyns'kiy, Ukraine (VV) of November 2011 and related documents of 2010-2013.

The vast majority of studies of Katyn assume the validity of AM and CP, thereby also assuming that the Soviets were the guilty party at Katyn. This is the "official" viewpoint. It is the only one tolerated in academia and in the mass and semi-popular media. In this version BU is assumed to be a fabrication and receives no serious consideration. This "official" version is so hegemonic, and the contrary version so marginalized, that even informed researchers often do not know that any other version exists, or simply assume that anyone who doubts the "official" version is willfully ignoring the evidence.

The contrary position, that BU is honest and AM and CP are fabrications, is held by a few Russian researchers. This position has received some limited attention in Russia. Outside Russia it is virtually ignored. The VV discoveries are either ignored or denied by everyone except by those few Russian researchers.

The Need for Objectivity

The only way to arrive at the truth in any investigation is to proceed with objectivity. It is impermissible to allow one's own preferences or preconceived ideas to interfere with the search for the truth.

Therefore we must be determined from the start to treat Katyn like an unsolved mystery. We have to set aside our own preconceived ideas, preferences, and prejudices. More than that: we have to recognize our own preconceived ideas and prejudices, and then take definite steps to prevent them from biasing our investigation.

We have to work out a method of looking with particular skepticism upon evidence that tends to support our own prejudices and preconceived ideas. We also need to give especially generous consideration to any evidence that tends to contradict our own prejudices and preconceived ideas.

If we fail to do this, we will do the opposite — give an especially generous reading to evidence that tends to support our preconceived ideas, and be quick to reject any evidence that tends to disprove our preconceived ideas. We will inevitably fall prey to confirmation bias. Then we will have no chance at all of discovering the truth, for even if we stumble upon it we will not recognize it.¹

¹ "Confirmation bias, also called confirmatory bias or myside bias, is the tendency to search for, interpret, favor, and recall information in a way that confirms one's preexisting beliefs or hypotheses. It is a type of cognitive bias and a systematic error of inductive reasoning." (Wikipedia, accessed 11.25.17)

Virtually all the purported research on Katyn, including every one of the book-length academic studies in all languages, is guilty of exactly this failure. Their authors make no attempt to be objective. Instead, they misinterpret some evidence and ignore other evidence in an attempt to bolster their own preconceived idea: that the Soviets were the guilty party.

Method

There are many fascinating aspects to each of the document collections A through O. To discuss them all would require yet another voluminous work. But that would sidestep the question of primary importance: Who was guilty? The present book focuses narrowly on that question. Therefore this book is not an attempt to review the history of the Katyn issue. We have set ourselves a more limited but much more important aim: to solve the Katyn mystery and to determine, on the basis of the evidence now available, who was the responsible party: the Soviets or the Germans.

What is the proper, objective method for approaching and, hopefully, solving the Katyn mystery — for determining which side, the Germans or the Soviets, murdered the Poles? As far as I can tell, up till now no one has asked this question.

Our first task must be to decide whether, in all of the materials that constitute document collections A through D, there exists any primary source evidence that cannot possibly have been fabricated, forged, or faked.

The unique value of evidence that cannot have been fabricated should be obvious. Because we want to solve the mystery, to determine who murdered the Polish POWs, only evidence that cannot possibly have been faked is worthy of our attention. The rest of the mountain of Katyn information can be used only as a mine from which to extract that limited amount of evidence whose bona fides cannot be questioned, which is the only relevant evidence. If we focus on this evidence, and do not permit ourselves to be distracted by the enormous quantity of writing on Katyn, we should be able to solve the Katyn mystery and discover who murdered the Polish prisoners.

To determine whether any such evidence exists, all of the documents in collections A through D must be carefully studied. We must also study the voluminous scholarly works on Katyn in order to review the results of previous researchers.

Primary-source evidence that cannot have been faked does exist. This evidence is of two types:

- Evidence found in a source which the authors of that source would never have fabricated because the evidence appears to contradict their bias. Therefore, they must have included such evidence because they simply could not do otherwise.
- Evidence cited by a source before its authors recognized the significance of that evidence for its own position on the Katyn matter. In at least one case the authors never did recognize the significance of that bit of evidence and so never used it.

The Evidence

What follows is the list of the evidence that almost certainly cannot have been faked² and which therefore enables us to solve the Katyn mystery. We list this evidence according to the four document collections A through D.

² I do not write "cannot possibly have been faked" because I believe absolute statements to be offputting and unwarranted. However, for all intents and purposes, the evidence here can be assumed to be genuine.

A. The German Report, Amtliches Material zum Massenmord von Katyn (AM) of 1943 and related documents.

* The spent shells found at Katyn were German.

The Germans would never have fabricated or invented this detail. In his diary Joseph Goebbels expressed dismay at the discovery of this fact. The Germans went to some trouble to argue that the Soviets could have used German bullets. We will study their argument closely.

* A badge from the Ostashkov POW camp was discovered at Katyn.

The German report AM records this detail. It sets forth the explanation that it was associated with the remains of a Polish soldier who had received it from fellow prisoners who had been previously imprisoned at Ostashkov. AM presents no evidence that any such prisoners existed. As we will see, proponents of the "Soviets-did-it" camp have not succeeded in accounting for the presence of this badge in a way that supports their contention.

* The Polish POWs whose bodies were buried at Katyn were presumed to have been in the Soviet POW camp at Kozel'sk, near Smolensk. But many POWs listed among the bodies which the Germans claimed they exhumed at Katyn had in fact been in the Starobel'sk or Ostashkov POW camps. The Germans did not remove these names. Perhaps, in a rush to complete and publish their report, they did not have time to do so. Or perhaps they could not do so because others, including the Polish observers, had already seen them; or because they did not recognize the significance of the fact that POWs from Starobel'sk and Ostashkov were found at Katyn; or because they did not know that these men had been in Ostashkov and Starobel'sk; or for some combination of these reasons.

The main point is this: the Germans would never have "faked" — invented — these names. Today both sides recognize that their presence at Katyn undermines the "official" Soviets-did-it case.

B. The Soviet Burdenko Report (BU) of January 1944 and related documents.

Like the Germans the Soviets also exhumed bodies of murdered Poles and searched them for documents. Details concerning documents found on four bodies were published in BU. A list among the Burdenko Commission materials in a former Soviet archive gives details about materials found that were not included in the final report.

One document found among the bodies is from a prisoner who was shipped from the Ostashkov POW camp to Kalinin. The Soviet investigators were unable to identify him because the first part of his last name is illegible. Therefore they did not realize that he had been in Ostashkov. They did not recognize that his presence at Katyn undermines the German report and supports the Soviet case. So they made no use of this information. Therefore they would not have fabricated it.

C. "Closed Packet No. 1" (CP), the existence of which was announced in 1992.

This collection of documents contains one document that has been faked in a clumsy manner but for some reason not discarded. There is no plausible alternative explanation for it except that it was part of a broader forgery job.

D. The archeological report on excavations at the mass murder site in Volodymyr-Volyns'kiy, Ukraine (VV) of November 2011 and related documents (VV) of 2010 — 2013.

* Badges of two Polish POWs were found in a mass grave in this town in Western Ukraine. These two men were from the Ostashkov POW camp. According to the "official" version they were shipped to Kalinin (now Tver'), Russia, where they were executed and buried at Mednoe. Their names are on memorial plaques in the Polish cemetery there.

No one, in particular the Polish-Ukrainian archeological team that uncovered these badges among the remains of many victims of execution, questions that the remains of these men must be among those murdered and buried at VV. (The Polish-Ukrainian team did not do DNA analysis of any remains.)

* Between 96% and 98% of the shell casings found at this mass execution site are of German make and are dated "1941."

* The execution method at VV was shown by the Polish archeologist to be characteristic of the Einsatzkommando, or German mass murder team, led by SS Obergruppenführer Friedrich Jeckeln, the so-called "Sardinenpackung."

* Independent research by another scholar has confirmed that German troops, aided by Ukrainian nationalist auxiliaries, shot many Soviet citizens and Jews at this place soon after the invasion in June 1941.

* Soon after the publication of the Polish archeologist's report of the findings at VV Polish and Ukrainian scholars recognized that the discoveries of these two badges endangers the "official" "the-Soviets-did-it" version of Katyn.

After the report on the discoveries at VV was published it was withdrawn. The excavation was closed and the mass murders are now attributed, without any evidence, to the NKVD.

Conclusion: The Germans Murdered the Poles

All the evidence that is of undoubted authenticity, that cannot have been faked, supports the conclusion that the Germans, not the Soviets, are guilty of the mass murders of Polish POWs that are known as the Katyn massacre. All of the unimpeachable evidence either points directly to German guilt, or contradicts the "official" and only version of Soviet guilt. None of it is compatible with Soviet guilt, provides support for the "official" version, pretends to disprove German guilt.

Therefore we must conclude that it was the Germans who murdered the Poles, The evidence simply does not permit any other solution to this mystery.

I predict that this conclusion will be rejected regardless of the evidence. It directly contradicts the "official" version which is accepted by the Polish and Russian governments, by every scholarly study since at least 1992 (except for a few studies by Russian scholars that have been largely ignored), and by a host of of the influential bodies including the United States Congress and the International Court of Justice at The Hague.

The reader may wonder: "Doesn't the agreement of so many authorities carry some weight?" Indeed it does! The all-but-unanimous agreement that the Soviets were guilty at Katyn has served to make a "closed book" of the Katyn issue. The "official" version that the Soviets murdered the Poles dominates both expert and public opinion. Dissenting views are not tolerated. Such views, and their authors, are ostracized, ridiculed, and otherwise ignored in the sense of never being cited or referred to in further writings.

But consensus is irrelevant to the question before us. That question is: what is the truth? This question cannot be decided by appeals to authority no matter how respectable or how numerous those authorities may be. It can only be decided on the basis of primary source evidence.

The evidence is unequivocal. None of the evidence that cannot have been faked supports the hypothesis that the Soviets shot the Poles. All of it supports the contrary hypothesis.

In this book we will carefully scrutinize each of the document collections A through D. In the conclusion we will address the question of why the approach employed in the present book has not been applied to Katyn before this.

Chapter 2. The German Report — Amtliches Material (AM)

The German Report Amtliches Material zum Massenmord von Katyn (AM) contains many contradictions. Several local resident witnesses whose testimony is included in it later repudiated their testimony. Its results were rejected by at least three members of the international scientific team which examined bodies at German request and who signed statements claiming Soviet guilt. Two of the separate team of Polish scientific experts also withdrew their support from it.

Each of these problems could be accounted for by assuming that the German report was faked. They might also be explained by other factors. Those local resident witnesses and scientific experts who later repudiated their statements might have done so in fear of Soviet reprisal. Or they might have made their initial statements to the Germans under threat from that side. The contradictions in the report might be due to haste and carelessness as the Germans rushed the report into print.

Various documents — diaries, calendars, notebooks, envelopes, letters, newspapers, inoculation certificates, and other kinds of documents — were found in the mass graves. According to AM none were dated after sometime in April 1940. Both the German and Polish teams falsely concluded that this meant the prisoners had been executed around this time. Of course, the Germans would not have reported, or allowed the Poles to see, any documents dated later than April or, at latest, early May 1940. The Germans, not the Polish observers, controlled this process.

And the German-Polish conclusion was false anyway. The latest date is only the terminus post quem, evidence that the victim in question was killed sometime after that date, perhaps long afterwards. Some, at least, of the Germans and Poles must have understood this elementary fact. Therefore, dishonesty was surely present from the beginning in the compiling of the report.

But the fact that AM was compiled tendentiously, with some lying, and in haste, does not in itself establish who shot the Poles. It does not establish that the Soviets were not guilty and therefore that the Germans were. The fact that AM is provably dishonest on many counts proves only that the report cannot be trusted. In a later chapter we will outline some of the more important contradictions and falsehoods in the German report.

However, our purpose is not to show that AM is a highly flawed document. Our aim is to "solve the mystery," to answer the question: Who murdered the Poles? Showing that the German report is flawed and dishonest cannot do that.

We might surmise that the Germans would not have had recourse to falsification if the Soviets really had killed the Polish POWs and all the Germans had to do was to tell the truth. But this reasoning, however suggestive, is not evidence.

The Evidence in AM That Cannot Have Been Faked and Therefore Is Genuine

1. The spent shells found at Katyn were German.

This is stated multiple times in AM:

Außerhalb der Gräber wurden eine Anzahl beschossener Pistolenhülsen mit dem Bodenaufdruck „Geco DD 7.65“ gefunden; desgleichen vereinzelt in den Gräbern zwischen den Leichen. (35)

Translated:

Outside the graves were found a number of pistol shells with the headstamp "Geco DD 7.65." Individual examples were also found in the in the graves among the corpses.

Im Grab 2 war nämlich beim Bergen der Leichen noch eine Originalpatrone auffindbar gewesen, bei der es sich um Pistolenmunition mit der Hülsenbodenprägung „Geco DD 7,65 D“ handelte. (73)

Translated:

During the retrieval of the corpses there was found in grave 2 an original cartridge, pistol ammunition with the "Geco 7,65 D" headstamp.

Die Hülsenböden weisen übereinstimmend die Prägung „Geco 7,65 D" auf, entsprechen sonach dem an der aufgefundenen unversehrten Patrone erhobenen Befund. (74)

Translated:

The headstamps have the same stamp "Geco 7,65 D", which corresponds to that on the unused cartridge that was found.

Analoge äußere Befunde boten vier weitere Geco-Hülsen, die am südlichen Rande des Grabes 1 nahe an dessen Kniewinkel aus dem gewachsenen Erdreich leicht rechtsseitlich vor einer daselbst stehenden Kiefer freigelegt worden waren. (74)

Translated:

Analogous exterior findings were four more Geco shells which had been left on the southern edge of grave 1 near its knee angle to the undisturbed earth and slightly to the right of a jawbone.

Die in Katyn nachgewiesenermaßen benutzte Pistolenmunition Geco Kaliber 7,65 mm gleicht der Munition, wie sie seit vielen Jahren in der Munitionsfabrik Gustav Genschow & Co. in Durlach bei Karlsruhe (Baden) hergestellt wird. (75)

Translated:

The Geco caliber 7.65 mm pistol ammunition used at Katyn, is the same as the ammunition which has been manufactured for many years in the ammunition factory of Gustav Genschow & Co. in Durlach near Karlsruhe (Baden).

Hieraus ergibt sich in Verbindung mit den früheren Ausführungen über die Hülsenbodenprägung "Geco 7,65 D", daß die zu den Erschießungen im Walde von Katyn verwendete Pistolenmunition 1930 oder 1931 hergestellt worden sein muß. (79)

Translated:

It follows from this, in connection with the earlier remarks on the headstamp "Geco 7,65 D", that the pistol ammunition used for the executions by shooting in the Katyn wood was produced in 1930 or 1931.

Im gleichen Untersuchungsgang wurde daselbst unter einer Nachbarleiche der untersten Schicht auf der Grabsohle auch eine Geschoßhülse (Geco 7,65 mm) aufgefunden. (87)

Translated:

In the course of the same investigation, a bullet shell (Geco 7.65 mm) was found on the floor of the grave under an adjacent corpse of the lowest layer.

The Germans claimed that only German "Geco" cartridge shells were found at Katyn. They found no other shells there. The Germans would never have freely invented this fact. Had any Soviet cartridge shells been found among the corpses, the Germans would surely have reported this. Therefore we can be confident that only German shells were found at Katyn, though not necessarily only the kind of shells identified in AM.

The Germans claimed that German cartridges were exported to the USSR in the 1920s and early 1930s. The Soviets did not deny this. But, absent countervailing evidence, German shells suggest German guilt.

Neither the Soviets nor the pro-Soviet researchers have remarked on the following two curious facts about the German report of these shell casings.

First, the Germans claimed that all the shell casings bore exactly the same "headstamp" — "Geco 7.65 D" or "Geco 7.65 DD." No matter who did the shooting it would be unusual for a team of at least a half-dozen shooters, shooting several thousand individuals during a period of about 6 weeks, to all use exactly the same shells, with the identical markings, and all at least nine years old.

At the German mass murder site at Volodymyr-Volyns'kiy (VV) three different types of German shells were discovered. The two most common types of shells found there are dated 1941 on the headstamps. The number of victims at VV was about 1/10 of the number at Katyn.

Second, none of the photographs of the shell casings in AM are of the headstamps. The headstamps are the only way the shells can be identified. AM contains side photographs only, useless for identifying the shells.

Image 2.1 AM p. 304 Bild 34, bottom.

The Germans at Katyn knew this, of course. When they sent some shell casings to the Gustav Genschow firm, manufacturers of the "Geco" ammunition, for identification the Genschow firm replied with a note showing the different headstamps that identify the ammunition produced during different years.¹

¹ This diagram raises another question. According to the Genschow firm — later, as we shall see, confirmed by Gustav Genschow himself to the U.S. Madden Commission — Genschow never manufactured any shells that said "Geco 7,65 D." Their shells either said "Geco 7.65 DD" (or "Geco DD 7.65", or "Geco D 7.65 D"). How could any German investigator have made this error if there were thousands of such shells lying in the graves?

Image 2.2 Genschow firm drawing.

Only photographs of the headstamps could provide evidence that it was precisely these shells that the Germans found in the Katyn burial pits. The Germans could have sent photographs of any shell casings they wanted and just claimed that they had been found at Katyn. But they did not. Instead the Germans took side views of the shells. They could easily have photographed the headstamps but they failed to do so.

The Germans were asking their readers to "believe" them. But then why bother with reproducing side views and views of bullets at all? It seems this can only be explained as an attempt to deceive the readers of the report.

Yet the Germans were right after all! Anticommunists have relied on the German report, which is the only evidence to support the "Soviets-did-it" version. And anticommunists have no incentive at all to be objective. To this day they have not questioned the fact that the Germans did not photograph the headstamps. We shall see that there are many more contradictions in the German report that have gone unremarked.

All accounts of Katyn accept the German claim that only these undated Geco shells were found at Katyn. This means that they accept the German AM as truthful — they believe the German report. This is an error, incompatible with a search for the truth, just as it would to "believe" the Soviet Burdenko Report (BU).

Joseph Goebbels, Hitler's minister of propaganda, clearly understood the problem that the finding of German shell casings should have posed for the German propaganda campaign around Katyn:

Unfortunately German munitions were found in the graves of Katyn. The question of how they got there needs clarification. It is either a case of munitions sold by us during the period of our friendly arrangement with the Soviet Russians, or of the Soviets themselves throwing these munitions into the graves. In any case it is essential that this incident be kept top secret. If it were to come to the knowledge of the enemy the whole Katyn affair would have to be dropped.

— The Goebbels Diaries, 1942-1943. Praeger, 1970, p.354.

Goebbels was correct. The use of German ammunition and only German ammunition at Katyn is prama facie evidence of German guilt. It is not evidence of Soviet guilt at all.

2. A badge from the Ostashkov POW camp was discovered at Katyn.

Bei einem weiteren Polen aus Grab 8 handelt es sich um Władislaw Czernuszewicz, geb. am 21. 10. 1898 in Slonim, Zamkora 75, im Zivilleben Hilfsschreiber in der Kanzlei des Kreishauptmannes im Kreis Slonim....

Abgesehen von einer mit dem Monogramm „WC“ versehenen Geldbörse, 190 Zloty in banknoten und einem Tabaksbeutel aus Leinenstoff fand sich letztlich eine ovale Blechmarke unter den Asservaten vor, die folgende Angaben enthält:

T. K. UNKWD K. O.

Stadt Ostaschkow. (AM 46)

Another Pole from grave 8 is Wladislaw Czernuszewicz, born on 21.10.1898 in Slonim, Zamkora 75, in the civilian life an auxiliary clerk in the office of the district captain of the Slonim district....

In addition to a wallet with the monogram "WC", 190 zloty in bank notes and a tobacco pouch of linen cloth, an oval sheet-metal marker was found among the exhibits that contains the following information:

T. K. UNKWD K. O.

9 4 2 4

Ostashkov.

The finding of this badge caused some confusion in the German report. The report concludes that Czernuszewicz was brought from the Ostashkov POW camp to Kozel'sk by the Soviets for some purpose and then shot.

However, no one named "Czernuszewicz," "Czarnuszewicz", "Czernyszewicz", etc. is on the list of more than 4000 bodies in AM.

- A "Władysław Czarnuszewicz" — [[cyrillic]]Чарнушевич Владислава Юльяновича — is on list 54/3 transported from the Kozel'sk POW camp on May 5, 1940 (Tucholski p. 716 #44).²
- A "Władysław Czernyszewicz" — [[cyrillic]]ЧЕРНЫШЕВИЧ Владислав Леонардович — is on the list at the Starobel'sk POW camp (Tucholski p. 980 #3668).

² Jędrzej Tucholski, Mord w Katyniu: Kozielsk, Ostaszków, Starobielsk. Lista ofiar. Warszawa: Instytut Wydawniczy Pax, 1991. This is still the official and only edition of all the Soviet NKVD transit lists and the Polish lists of victims. The Soviet lists are reprinted in the original Russia.

The volume Ubity w Katyni, a recent attempt to shore up the official "Soviets-did-it" version, tries to solve this problem by claiming, in brackets, that "Czarnuszewicz" was first held at Ostashkov and then transferred to Kozel'sk in November 1939. (811) The brackets indicate that there is no evidence for this. "Ubity" assumes that the Russian "Charnushevich" was really "Chenushevich" ([[cyrillic]]Чарнушевич) (Czernuszewicz).

Among the "Kozel'sk" POWs Tucholski (90 со l. 2) names Chernyshevich:

Czernyszewicz Władysław Ur. 21.10.1898. Pchor. Pracownik Starostwa w Słonimiu.

This only confuses matters further since this is the spelling of the prisoner not in Kozel'sk or Ostashkov but in Starobel'sk. Here is an individual named in the text of AM but not in the AM lists and about whom Tucholski and Gur'ianov (author of "Ubity") are also confused. Any honest and objective researcher should simply recognize this contradiction. But typical of dishonest scholarship those who support the "official" version, rather than seeking the truth, want that version to be "seamless," without contradictions.

In reality, no historical or criminal investigations are "seamless," without contradictions and unexplained details. Honest investigators recognize this fact. Falsifiers often strive to make their falsifications appear to be "perfect."

This is a problem for the "official," "Soviets-did-it" version. A badge at Katyn from Ostashkov suggests that Polish POWs were shipped out of Ostashkov to Kalinin not to execution but for some other purpose. For if they were to be executed, why not execute them at Kalinin where, according to the "official" version, the Ostashkov POWs were murdered?

Rather than acknowledge this difficulty "Ubity" glosses over it without resolving it. In fact one must look very carefully to notice this sleight-of-hand at all. It appears to be a clumsy contradiction, unresolved because impossible to resolve, in order to get rid of the embarrassing presence of that badge from Ostashkov.

Why did the Germans mention it at all? Possibly they would have cut it out if they had had more time to produce a carefully edited version of AM.

3. Many POWs listed among the bodies exhumed by the Germans had been in the Starobel'sk or Ostashkov POW

Through careful study of the primary sources we have established that a number of the bodies exhumed by the Germans at Katyn were of Poles imprisoned at and transported from the Ostashkov camp to Kalinin and from the Starobel'sk camp to Khar'kov. The importance of the presence of these bodies at Katyn is well summarized by Andrei Pamiatnykh, a firm proponent of the "Soviets-did-it" version.

Но в катынских могилах были также обнаружены трупы поляков, содержащихся в Старобельском и Осташковском лагерях. Эти поляки мог ли попасть из Харькова и Калинина в Смоленскую область только в одном случае — если их в 1940 г. перевезли в лагерь особого назначения под Смоленск. Расстрелять их в этом случае могли только немцы.

Translated:

"Outsiders" at Katyn are very important for supporters of the Stalin version of the responsibility of the Germans for the crime of Katyn. Their presence would mean that at Katyn were burned not only prisoners from the Kozel'sk camp, but also prisoners of other camps, and that would mean that doubts about the results of the German investigation of 1943 and the Soviet-Russian investigation of 1990-2004 are creeping in. According to the results [of these investigations] prisoners of Kozel'sk were shot and were buried at Katyn, and prisoners of Starobel'sk and Ostashkov, according to the results of the Soviet-Russian investigation, were buried at Kharkov and Mednoe respectively. Here is what Vladislav Shved and Sergei Strygin, proponents of the Stalin version, write in their main article on Katyn:

But in the Katyn graves there were also found the corpses of Poles who had been held in the Starobel'sk and Ostashkov camps. These Poles could have arrived in Smolensk oblast' from Khar'kov and Kalinin only if in 1940 they were transported to the camps of special designation near Smolensk. In that case only the Germans could have shot them.

Pamiatnykh restates this a little later in the same article:

[[cyrillic]]Случай ШКУТЫ (или, в соответствии с моей гипотезой, ШКУТЫ-СЕКУ ЛЬ!) представляется очень важным для сторонников сталинской версии об ответственности немцев за катынское преступление. А именно, если бы это был Шкута, и Шкута именно из Старобельска, это бы означало, что в Катynи погребены узники не только Козельска, но и «посторонние», а значит, закрадываются сомнения в результатах немецкого следствия 1943 года и советскороссийского следствия 1990-2004 годов — согласно этим результатам, в Катynи расстреляны погребены узники Козельска, а узники Старобельска (по результатам советского следствия) расстреляны и погребены в Харькове. (Pamiatnykh, Problem)

Translated:

The case of SHKUTA (or, according to my hypothesis, SHKUT A-SEKULA) is very important for the defenders of the Stalin version that the Germans were responsible for the crime of Katyn. Namely, if this was Shkuta, and Shkuta was from Starobel'sk, that would mean that at Katyn there were buried prisoners not only from Kozel'sk but also "outsiders," and that that would mean that doubts were creeping in about the results of the German investigation of 1943 and the Soviet Russian investigations of 1990-2004. According to these results, at Katyn prisoners from Kozel'sk were shot and buried, and prisoners from Starobel'sk (according to the results of the soviet investigation) were shot and buried at Khar'kov.

The "Outsiders"

We begin by examining Pamiatnykh's attempt to resolve the question of the identity of one of the POWs on the AM list. Number 2398 in that list reads:

2398. Szkuta, Stanislaw, Ltn. Impfschein, Mitgliedskarte d. Res.- Offiz

No prisoner by that name is on any of the Soviet Kozel'sk (Smolensk — Katyn) transfer lists. The only Polish POW by that name in the Soviet transfer lists was a Starobel'sk (Kharkiv — Piatykhvatky) prisoner.

#3729 — 3729. [[cyrillic]]ШКУТА Станислав Францевич 1913
(Tucholski p. 981)

The basic assumption of the "official" version of Katyn is that these prisoners were shot at Kalinin and Khar'kov and buried outside those cities at Mednoe and Piatykhvatky respectively. The presence of Starobel'sk (or Ostashkov) POWs at Katyn would disprove that assumption and thereby would undermine the "official" version.

Accordingly Pamiatnykh attempts to show that Szkuta was actually someone else — Sekula — whose name was spelled incorrectly by the Germans. His hypothesis is that the Soviets misread the Polish barred "l" (ł) for a "t", then the "e" for a "z" and so wrote «[[cyrillic]]Шкута» — Shkuta — for "Sekula". Pamiatnykh found a preliminary German list which appears to bear this out:

Impfschein, Mitgliedskarte d. Res.Offz.

A "Sekula Stanislaw" is named in Tucholski's Kozel'sk list:

* Sekula Stanislaw

Ur. 2.1.1903, s. Szczepana i Antoniny.

Ppor. piech. rez., 72. pp. Kierownik szkoły powszechnej w Sworzycach, pow. Radom, instruktor LOPP. (Tucholski p. 210 co 1. 2)

A "Sekula Stanislaw" is #4 on Soviet transit list 040/3 dated April 20, 1940:

4. [[cyrillic]]СЭКУ ЛА Станислава Степановича, (Tucholski p. 700)

A "Szkuta Stanislaw" is also named in Tucholski's Kozel'sk list:

Szkuta Stanislaw Marian

Ur. 7.5.1913. Ppor. art., dowódca 9. bat.

65, pal od 7.9.1939 w III dyonie 21.

pal. PCK (AM) Nr 01398. (Tucholski p, 226 co l. 2)

Here Tucholski identifies this man as number 1398 in the AM list. But no such number exists in AM! The AM list skips directly from 1397 to 1399:

1397. Uniformierter.

1399. Leutnant.

Verschiedene Zettel, Impfschein 2869

Tucholski does not explain why he states that "Szkuta" is number 01398 in the AM list when there is no such number in that list.

"Szkuta" is a problem for the "official" version because the presence at Katyn of a Starobel'sk prisoner is incompatible with the "official" version, according to which prisoners shipped from Starobel'sk to Khar'kov must have been shot there and buried nearby at Piatykhatky.

Pamiatnykh, writing in 2011, could not account for the fact that the draft German list read "Sekula" (with no barred "1") but the print version reads "Szkuta." Perhaps we can do so today.

In a later chapter we will see that the Germans captured the Soviet transit lists of POWs shipped from Kozel'sk to Smolensk, near Katyn. A "Sekula" — in Russian, "[[cyrillic]]Сэкула" — is indeed on that list. The "Sekula" reading on the draft German list must have been the result of consulting the Soviet Kozel'sk transit lists. We discuss the fact that the Germans possessed these lists in a later chapter.

When the German list was revised the reading was changed to "Szkuta." The German editor must have thought that was a more accurate reading of the material before him than "Sekula." He did not realize that the only Polish POW named "Szkuta" on the Soviet transit lists was a Starobel'sk prisoner. The Germans had captured Soviet lists of POWs shipped from Kozel'sk to Smolensk but could not have known whether or not they were complete. They did not have the lists of POWs shipped from Ostashkov and Starobel'sk.

Tucholski's "Szkuta Stanislaw Marian" to whom he gives the non-existent number AM 01398 must be an attempt to avoid the inconvenient presence of a Starobel'sk prisoner at Katyn — a fact that contradicts the "official" version. But Tucholski's entry has to be wrong. The Soviets had no "Szkuta" in Kozel'sk so they could not have transferred any "Szkuta" to Smolensk. "Szkuta" was transferred from Starobel'sk to Khar'kov. But he was not shot there. Instead he was transferred further to Smolensk, where he was eventually shot and buried.

But the "official" version of Katyn is wedded to the notion that the POWs were shot once they had arrived at the city to whose UNKVD they were shipped: Smolensk, Kalinin, or Khar'kov. According to the "official" version a Starobel'sk prisoner transferred to Khar'kov, as Szkuta was, but killed at Katyn, cannot have been shot by the Soviets.

Other "Outsiders"

In his article Pamiatnykh identifies two lists of "outsiders" — persons on the AM list who cannot be identified with a prisoner who, according to the Soviet transit lists, was at Kozel'sk. One list, that of IU. N. Zoria, is unpublished. The second list is the following:

Tarczyński Marek, "Glossa do Księgi Cmentarnej Polskiego Cmentarza Wojennego w Katyniu", in "Zbrodnia Katyńska po 60 latach. Polityka, nauka, moralność." Zeszyty katyńskie 12 (2000) pp. 191-198.

This article lists 231 "outsiders" or unidentified names in the German AM that are not on the Soviet Kozel'sk lists. I subtracted those that Pamiatnykh claims he has identified and searched for the rest in Tucholski. I succeeded in identifying 23 more Kozel'sk POWs who had not been identified by Tarczyński in 2000. These are not relevant to the present study.

I also identified four more POWs named in the AM list who are on the Soviet Starobel'sk lists and other who is on the Soviet Ostashkov lists.

Starobel'sk:

"Ubity" p. 242 claims this is "probably" [[cyrillic]]Врубель ЗыгмунтМиколай (Wróbel Zygmunt Mikolaj s. Edwarda i Anny). (Tucholski p. 611, #38) There is no other [[cyrillic]]ВРУБЕЛЬ М. on the Soviet transit lists. Tucholski p. 252 col. 1, under Kozel'sk, reads as follows:

Wróbel Zygmunt

Ppor. Prawdop. jest to:

"Ubity" p. 884, #47 lists this person as still not identified. There was no Wojnowski at Kozel'sk.

Ostashkov and Starobel'sk POWs at Katyn, from Gur'ianov

2015 saw the publication of a book that is at present the definitive account of the Katyn victims from the "official" or "Soviets-did-it" perspective. This is:

Ubity v Katyni. Kniga pamiati pol'skikh voennoplennykh-uznikov kozel'skogo lageria NKVD, rasstreliaannykh po resheniiu Politbiuro VKP(b) 5 marta 1940 goda. Moscow: Obshchestvo „Memorial" Izdatel'stvo „Zvenia" 2015. ISBN 978-5-78700-123-5

(Translation of book title: "Men murdered at Katyn. Memorial book of Polish POW prisoners of the Kozel'sk NKVD camp shot according to the decision of the Politburo of the VKP(b) of March 5, 1940.")

The academic discussion is signed by Aleksandr Gur'ianov, a "Memorial Society" researcher. "Memorial" is a strongly anticommunist organization. As one might expect, "Memorial" and this book support the "official", "Soviets-did-it" version of Katyn.

On pages 882-884 Gur'ianov names 41 persons in the AM list whom he says no one has as yet identified. I have studied all these names and have identified three POWs from the Ostashkov camp. One, Wojnowski, is identified above.

The other two Ostashkov prisoners exhumed by the Germans at Katyn are:

This is the only POW whose name contains "Budek." Moreover, his first

Yet More "Outsiders"

The Burdenko Commission identified yet more corpses as belonging to Polish POWs from Ostashkov and Starobel'sk. Most are reported in BU. One, not used in the published report, is recorded only in a working list of materials recovered from the corpses by Burdenko Commission investigators. We will examine it in the next chapter.

The mass grave of German victims at Volodymyr-Volyns'kiy, Ukraine, contains the bodies of at least two and probably more Polish POWs who had been Ostashkov prisoners who had been transferred to Kalinin. But they had not been shot there, as the "official" version requires, but instead were killed at least 15 months later and 700 miles distant from Kalinin. The "official" version cannot accommodate this, so they must have been shot by the Germans and their Ukrainian allies.

Another Piece of Unimpeachable Evidence

In Chapter 8 we examine the information about another "outsider," a prisoner from Ostashkov whose corpse was tentatively identified by the Polish Red Cross at Katyn as that of "Krzysiński."

Conclusion

The unimpeachable evidence from the German AM is:

- the German shell casings;
- the badge from Ostashkov;
- the presence of corpses of Ostashkov and Starobel'sk prisoners found at Katyn.

All this evidence points towards German, not Soviet, guilt.

Chapter 3. The Burdenko Report

The Soviet Burdenko Report (BU) of January 1944 is the main document in which the Soviet version of Katyn is set forth. Proponents of the "official" version which blames the Soviets normally dismiss it without serious criticism.

BU contains one piece of evidence that cannot possibly have been faked and so is of prime importance for determining the guilty party. We will examine it here.

In 2007-2011 Andrei Pamiatnykh published an online article titled "From the unpublished materials of the Burdenko Commission."¹ In it Pamiatnykh, a firm adherent of the "official" Soviets-did-it version of Katyn, reproduces without comment 29 pages of a list or inventory of materials found by Burdenko Commission investigators among the bodies exhumed by the Soviet commission at Katyn in January 1944.

Among these materials are documents that the Soviet investigators found on the bodies. Some of those documents postdate the time that, according to the "official" version, the Polish POWs had been executed by the NKVD. They are "proof of life" later than the time that the "official" version insists the Polish POWs had been killed — in April and May, 1940. If they are valid, the "official" version of Katyn must be false, since the "official" version states that all the prisoners were shot by the NKVD during April and May, 1940.

But are these documents valid? Or are they fakes, forgeries created to exculpate the Soviets and planted on the bodies or in the graves by the NKVD or the Burdenko Commission? In this chapter we will:

A. summarize all the documents that purport to show that some of the prisoners whose bodies were found at Katyn lived until late 1940 and into 1941.

B. list the three identifiable Polish POWs who are associated with such documents.

C. identify and discuss the one primary source that cannot possibly have been faked.

A. Documents dated later than May 1940

Numbers at the left are to the 29 pages of investigators' notes reproduced as digital photographs in Pamiatnykh's article,

5. Date of April 4, 1941. Prayer book with signature [[cyrillic]]Ядвиня (Jadwinia) and date "4.IV.41"

5. Dates of September and November, 1940. Tomasz Zigoń — dates 12.ix.40, 28.ix.40, 15.xi.40.

Zigoń's case is important. Tucholski p. 260 col 1 (Kozel'sk) reads:

Zygoń Tomasz

Ur. 7.3.1897, s. Tomasza i Urszuli. Podof. rez. Urzędnik Sekcji Prawnej Ubezpieczalni Społecznej w Warszawie, zam. Gołębki k. Waszawy.

Wymieniony w komunikacie komisji Burdenki. Kozielsk lub Starobielsk. Porównaj listę starobielską.

(Translation of boldface text): Mentioned in the Burdenko commission report. Kozelsk Starobel'sk Compare the Starobe'lsk list.

On page 519 column 2 there is exactly the same entry, except the last sentence reads: "Porównaj listę kozielską" — "compare the Kozel'sk list."

Tucholski has no record of Zigoń in the Soviet transit lists. But Zigoń is on the "Ukrainian list"!

81. /1147/ ZIGOŃ Tomasz s. Tomasza ur. 1897

ZYGOŃ Tomasz s. Tomasza i Urszuli ur. 7.3.1897 w Soborzycach, podof. rez. zmobilizowany do Włodzimierza urzędnik sekcji prawnej Ubezpieczalni Społecznej w Warszawie, zam. Gołębki, wymieniony w komunikacie Komisji Burdenki.

— Ukraiński Ślad Katynia 130.

Translated:

ZYGOŃ Tomasz son of Tomasz and Urszula born 7.3.1897 in Soborzyce, reserve under-officer mobilized to Włodzimierz direction of legal section of the Social Insurance Office in Warsaw, resident of Gołębek, named in the report of the Burdenko Commission.

This means that Zigoń was arrested in the Ukraine — the list doesn't give us any more information than that. Logically, therefore, he would have been imprisoned in Starobel'sk camp. But he is not listed on the Soviet lists as one of those transferred out of Starobel'sk in April-May 1940.

Body #92 searched by the Burdenko Commission² must be Zigoń's because there is too much personal material on it to be anybody else's. Here is the complete entry from the Burdenko Commission's text:

Letter from Warsaw, addressed to the Red Cross at the central bureau of POWs in Moscow, 12 Kuibyshev Street. The letter is written in Russian, in which Sof'ia ZIGON' asks to be informed of the location of her husband Tomash ZIGON', sergeant (vakhmistr) of cavalry. On the letter is the date September 12, 1940 (12.IX-40). On the envelope is a German postage stamp from Warsaw. IX-40 and the [cancellation?] stamp "Moscow. Post office 9, sent 28.IX-40 and a determination in red ink in Russian: "Find out which camp and send it for delivery. 15.IX-40. (signature unreadable)." (BU 246)

² I use the translation in volume 3 of the Madden Commission hearings. The Katyn Forest Massacre. Hearings before the Select Committee...Part 3 (Chicago, IL) March 13 and 14, 1952 (U.S. Government Printing Office, 1952) 228-247. (Henceforth BU + page number is to this edition). This translation is identical to the Soviet translation Published as a Supplement to the "Soviet War News Weekly."

Since this letter was found on Zigoń's body, he must have received it. By this time he must have been in another camp. Eventually he ended up in a camp near Smolensk, probably in one of the three camps 1-ON, 2-ON, or 3-ON.³ As we shall see, the existence of these three camps is documented in other materials found by Burdenko Commission investigators on other bodies.

So Zigoń was alive sometime after September 28, 1940, the latest date in Moscow. His body, along with many others, was exhumed at Katyn. This means that these men were also alive at that time, or Zygoń could not have been buried among them. Therefore they were not shot by the Soviets in April-May 1940.

That means that they were shot by the Germans and their Ukrainian Nationalist allies. This fact dismantles the "official" version of Katyn.

7. Date of June 29, 1940. Body #95 — 2 postcards dated 13.1.1940 and 29.VI. 1940.

(See more discussion below of Vladimir Araszkievicz, under "identifiable Polish POWs.")

25. Date of November 1940. Postcard no. 0112 from Tarnopol' with postage cancellation 12.X1-40 [[cyrillic]]Тарнополь 12.XI-40 [[cyrillic]]года."

27. Dates of March 14, 1941 and May 18, 194 1. See discussion below of Eduard Levandowski.

B. The three identifiable Polish POWS associated with documents placing them at other POW camps or dating from later than May 1940.

9. Receipt from Starobel'sk camp dated 26.x i.1929 [this must be 1939] in the name of "[[cyrillic]]Дзевоньского Мечислава Якубовича."

Tucholski p. 896 #24: Ostashkov list 054/2 of May 5, 1940:

24. [[cyrillic]]ДЗЕВОНЬСКОГО Мечислава Якубовича, 1895 г.р.

On p. 285 col. 1, in his Ostashkov list, Tucholski lists the only person of this surname among the prisoners:

Dziewięcki ...

Funkcj. PP, posterunek Ząbkowice, pow.

Będzin

This must mean that Dziewięcki was in Starobel'sk before he went to Ostashkov. Tucholski does not mention the fact that this receipt was found at Katyn. Most of the four thousand or so bodies exhumed by the Germans at Katyn were identified by documents only. Only a few had names on clothing. None, of course, could be identified by appearance; the bodies were far too decomposed to permit facial identification.

18. Body #46 — [[cyrillic]]АРАШКЕВИЧА Владимира Рудольфовича / Araszkievicz, — note dated 25 March 1941; receipt from camp 1-ON (1-ОН) from 6 April 1941.

Receipt from camp 1 — ON from 5 May 1941.

Araszkievicz appears on Ostashkov transit list 062/2 of May 19, 1940 (Tucholski 908 #7):

7. [[cyrillic]]АРАШКЕВИЧ Владимира Рудольфовича, 1896 г.р.

Tucholski lists Araszkievicz under Kozel'sk:

Araszkievicz Włodzimierz Marian Jan Ur. 13.9.1896, s, Rudolfa. Por, łącz. rez., CWŁącz. Mgr prawa, adwokat, radca prawny w Chodakawskich Zakładach jedwabiu, zam. Łódź,

Tucholski does not inform his readers that Araszkievicz was an Ostashkov prisoner shipped from there to Kalinin in May 1940 but obviously not killed there. Tucholski must have realized that this one fact would cast doubt upon the whole "official" version of Katyn.

27. Body #101 — [[cyrillic]]ЛЕВАНДОВСКОГО Эдуарда
Адамовича [Lewandowski]

Receipt from Kozel'sk camp dated 19.XII. 1939. On reverse, date of 14 March 1941;

Receipt from camp 1-ON dated 18 May 1941.

On page 891 #35 Tucholski lists Lewandowski in Ostashkov list 051/2, of some date in April 1940:

35. [[cyrillic]]ЛЕВАНДОВСКОГО Эдуарда Адамовича 1893 г.р.

On page 317 col. 2 Tucholski lists him again as an Ostashkov prisoner:

Lewandowski Edward

Ur. 21.2.1893, s. Adama i Walerii.

Кпт. piech. сл. ст., КОР.

Tucholski does not mention that BU lists his body as having been found at Katyn. That would cast doubt on the "official" Soviets-did-it version.

Despite the fact that the Burdenko Commission claims to have identified the bodies of Araszkievicz and Lewandowski at Katyn, both are listed in the official Polish Mednoe Cemetery book. That means that the official Polish story is that they were both shipped from Ostashkov to Kalinin — true enough, as we have seen — and then were executed there. That means that Tucholski is tacitly claiming that the BU is a fabrication.

But we have good evidence that these findings of the BU are genuine, not fabrications.

C. One Primary Source That Cannot Have Been Faked

On page 22 of the 29-page inventory of a11 materials found by the Burdenko Commission investigators at Katyn we read the following:

Image 3.1 Burdenko Commission inventory report

Expert com. PUSHKAREVA.

1. Body #2.

a) Receipt of camp "1" of November 19 1939 for a silver cigar case and "Montblanc" ballpoint pen from PRIAPUL'SKOGO (PRUTSUL'SKOOGO) Pshemyslava Boleslavovicha ([[cyrillic]]ПРЯПУЛЬСКОГО (ПРУЦУЛЬСКОГО) — Пшемислава Болеславовича)

The Burdenko investigator could not read the first part of the surname, He believed the surname ended in -[[cyrillic]]ПУЛЬСКИЙ/-pulski or -[[cyrillic]]ЦУЛЬСКИЙ/-culski. The name and patronymic are clear: in Polish, Przemysław s. Bolesław — in Russian "[[cyrillic]]Пшемислав Болеславович."

No Katyn POW from any of the camps has a surname that ends in "-pulski." There is only one POW whose surname ends in "-ulski"

(Russian: -[[cyrillic]]УЛЬСКИЙ and whose name is Przemysław and whose father was named Bolesław. He is in Ostashkov list 050/3 of some time in April 1940 (Tucholski p. 886 #36):

36. [[cyrillic]]КОЗЕТУЛЬСКОГО Пшемислава Болеславича

In fact, no other Katyn POW in any of the POW camps had the Christian name Przemysław and a father named Bolesław. This is the only one. So this has to be the man.

Tucholski identifies the only "Koziatulski," a "Jan," at all three camps!

At Kozel'sk: Tucholski p. 143 col. 2 — 144 col. 1:

Koziatulski Jan

Ur. 22.10.1899. Por. art. st. sp., oficerska

At Starobel'sk, Tucholski p. 435 col. 2:

Nevertheless, Volume 1, page 425 of the "Mednoe Cemetery Book" — Miednoje. Księga Cmentarna Polskiego Cmentarza Wojennego. (Warsaw:

Rada Ochrony Pamięci Walk i Męczeństwa, 2005) — does have an entry (though no photograph) for Przemysław Koziętulski, son of Bolesław.

Por. piech. Przemysław Piotr KOZIETULSKI s. Bolesława i Heleny, ur. 22 II 1911 w Żyrardowie. Ppor. Ze starszeństwem 15 VIII 1933, por.- 1 1 1936. W 1939 służył w baonie KOP "Stołpce"

L. 050/3 (36), 123.

Cemetery book entry recreated based upon original entry.

The editors of this book probably took this entry from the Ostashkov transit list. But in reality Koziętulski is buried not at Mednoe but at Katyn.

Despite the fact that Tucholski mentions this Koziętulski three times Gur'ianov, in "Ubity," fails to mention anyone named Koziętulski. Tucholski himself does not mention Przemysław Koziętulski, son of Bolesław, at all, despite the fact that he is in the Soviet transit list and the Mednoe cemetery book.

Together with other prisoners from the Ostashkov camp Koziętulski was shipped to Kalinin. But he — and, no doubt many or even all of his fellow Ostashkov POWs — was not executed at Kalinin (or buried at Mednoe) but was sent on to Smolensk. This fact dismantles the "official" version.

Interpretation

The most important thing about the Koziętulski receipt is that BU fails to mention it. The Burdenko Commission investigator was unable to identify the person because the Burdenko Commission did not have the transit lists from the three POW camps.

Even if they had realized that this was an Ostashkov POW they probably would not have mentioned in the report. Judging from what was included in BU the investigators were looking for documents dated later than May 1940. As we have seen, they found some. But this receipt is dated November 19, 1939. It would probably not have attracted their interest.

It is this lack of interest by the Burdenko Commission that makes it such a valuable piece of evidence.

* It cannot have been fabricated. Therefore the Burdenko Commission "expert" (investigator) really found this receipt.

* The fact that Koziatulski was in the Ostashkov POW camp and that the Burdenko Commission did not recognize this fact suggests that the other Ostashkov prisoners they identified — Dziewięcki, Araszkiewicz, and Lewandowski — are probably also genuine.

BU did not use Dziewięcki either. Once again, either they did not know that he was an Ostashkov prisoner, or they were looking only for documents dated after May 1940. This is good evidence that the Dziewięcki receipt is genuine too.

If the Koziatulski receipt were the only evidence we had of Ostashkov POWs killed and buried at Katyn we might strain for some exotic explanation to account for its presence. But in fact the opposite is the case. We have a lot of evidence, much of it independent of BU, that Ostashkov and Starobel'sk prisoners were killed and buried at Katyn.

The Koziatulski receipt supports the hypothesis that Polish prisoners from Ostashkov and Starobel'sk were killed at Katyn. They were indeed transferred to Kalinin and Kharkiv, as the Soviet transit lists show. But they were not shot there. Instead, they were further transferred to some camp or camps — again, probably the three camps 1-ON, 2-ON, or 3-ON named by the Soviets where they did road work, were captured by the Germans, and shot.

Therefore, we have these results:

- We have a good deal of solid evidence that at least some prisoners lived after May 1940, the terminus ante quem that the "official" version states they must have been killed.
- We also have unimpeachable evidence that prisoners from Ostashkov and Starobel'sk camps were transferred in April and May 1940 to execution in Kalinin and Khar'kov but not to execution and burial at Mednoe and Piatykhatky. Instead, they were transferred onward to Smolensk.

There is no alternative "official" version that would allow the Polish prisoners to have been killed after May 1940 or as late as 1941. Accordingly, the Koziatulski receipt constitutes further the proof that the "official" version of Katyn is false.

Chapter 4. Closed Packet No. 1

The documents in this folder or "packet" are said to have been given to President Mikhail Gorbachev of the USSR and then by him to Boris Yeltsin in December, 1991. On October 14, 1992 Yeltsin's representative gave them to Polish President Lech Walesa.

"Closed Packet No. 1" contains the following documents:

1. An NKVD memorandum dated March 5, 1940 and numbered No.794/E, signed by Lavrentii Beria, People's Commissar of the NKVD, and recommending that Polish prisoners be shot.
2. Excerpt from Protocol No. 13 of the Politburo session of March 5, 1940 titled "A Question of the NKVD of the USSR."
3. Pages excerpted from Protocol No. 13 of the Politburo session of March 5, 1940, point n. 144.
4. A handwritten letter No. 632-SH signed by Aleksandr Shelepin proposing to destroy all files on the operation carried out by the NKVD in connection with the Politburo resolution of March 5, 1940 with an attached draft of a resolution of the Presidium of the Central Committee of the CPSU. Shelepin was Chairman of the KGB between December 25, 1958 and November 13, 1961.

For a few years after their publication these documents were accepted as the "smoking gun," as close to definitive proof of Soviet guilt as one could wish for. Along with the German AM report they constitute the backbone of the "official" version of Katyn. Since 1995 there have been challenges to the authenticity of these documents. These challenges are either ignored or dismissed with derision by proponents of the "official" version.

We will take a closer look at the controversy over these documents in a later chapter. In this chapter we will discuss the one document in "Closed Packet No. 1" that has obviously been faked yet is usually ignored.

The Two Versions of "Excerpt from Protocol No. 13 of the Politburo session of March 5, 1940 titled 'A Question of the NKVD of the USSR'"

Excellent photographic copies of this document may be seen at the bottom of this page at the katyn.ru site:

...into the top search window, labeled "Wayback Machine," at the Internet Archive:

In fact it is already there, saved at multiple dates.¹ I will also put it on my Home Page.

For example, at

<https://web.archive.org/web/20160304112701/http://www.katyn.ru/index.php?go=Pages&in=view&id=26>

The first document is the "excerpt." It is addressed at the top to «[[cyrillic]]Тов. Берия.» — "Тов[arishch] Beria" or "To Tov[arishch] Beria."

At the bottom are the typed words «[[cyrillic]]СЕКРЕТАРЬ ЦК» — "Secretary of the CC [Central Committee]."

It is the second document that interests us here. This appears to be a carbon copy of the first document on which a few changes have been made so crudely that anyone can notice them immediately.

- The words «[[cyrillic]]Тов. Берия.» have been removed and replaced by the words «[[cyrillic]]Тов. Шелепину» meaning "To Tov[arishch] Shelepin."

- The date at the upper left has been changed from «5. [[cyrillic]]марта 1940 г.» (March 5, 1940) to «27. февраля 1959 г.» (February 27, 1959), without double spacing between the letters of the word «февраля» (of February).
- At the bottom of the document the words «[[cyrillic]]И. СТАЛИН» (= J. Stalin) have been typed in capital letters that stand clearly out from the much darker and heavier type of the carbon copy.
- At the bottom of the carbon copy but not of the original is the seal of the Central Committee of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union. The name of the Party was official changed from "All-Union Communist Party (bolshevik)" at the 19th Party Congress in October, 1952. The earlier name for the Party is on the letterhead. The form itself is from the 1930s, with "193" preprinted where the date should go.
- On the Shelepin document but not on the Beria document there is a faint stamp in the upper left corner, above the first word in the letterhead, «[[cyrillic]]Всесоюзная», in the middle of which are the words «[[cyrillic]]НЕ СЖИГАТЬ» — "Ne szhigat'," "Do not burn." See the figure below.

Image 4.1 The Shelepin document (detail)

No one has come up with a satisfactory explanation for this document.

- It is not mentioned at all by either Cienciala or Sanford. Sanford's book is an important study in English², while Cienciala and Materski is the definitive one-volume study in any language.
- In the official Polish government publication Katyn. Documents of Genocide. Documents and Materials from the Soviet archives turned over to Poland on October 14, 1992. Edited by Wojciech Materski, introduction by Janusz I. Zawodny (institute of Political Studies, Polish Academy of Sciences, 1992), it is published on pages 12-13 but without any comment whatever.

² George Sanford. Katyn and the Soviet Massacre of 1940: Truth, Justice and Memory (BASEES / Routledge Series on Russian and East European Studies). London, UK: Routledge, 2009.

Despite the fact that the documents of "Closed Packet No. 1 are the only evidence that the Soviet government ever planned to shoot the Polish POWs, this document is passed over in silence by defenders of the "official" version of Katyn. It is easy to understand this as the silence of embarrassment. This document undermines the case for the bona fides of all the "Closed Packet No. 1" documents.

Shved (384) and Prudnikova and Chigirin (518) cite Shelepin's friend Valerii I. Kharazov as saying that Shelepin did in fact learn about the Katyn documents early in his tenure as head of the KGB. Document number 4 of "Closed Packet No. 1" contains a proposal from Shelepin that all the files relating to Katyn be destroyed. According to Kharazov Khrushchev did not agree with this proposal.

So either Kharazov was mistaken and the files were destroyed, or they were not destroyed at all. At any rate it appears that this destruction, actual or only contemplated, had something to do with the stamp "Do not burn" on the Shelepin version of Document 2.

It is hard to imagine archivists giving permission to alter archival documents in the way that the Shelepin version of Document 2 has been altered. But if the Beria version of Document 2 were a forgery and carbon copies were made, then the Shelepin version might be understood as an experiment to see what further forgery was possible. But whatever the motive, the "Shelepin" document has been falsified.

The addition of Stalin's name at the bottom also suggests an attempt at forgery. Khrushchev organized an attack on Stalin over a number of years. A genuine document of 1940 signed "Secretary of the C.C." would not need to carry Stalin's name. There were a number of secretaries, any one of whom could sign a document as "secretary." In 1940 there was no longer a post of General Secretary. But by Khrushchev's day the office of General Secretary had been revived for Khrushchev himself.

An attempt to implicate Stalin in the Katyn massacres might be less persuasive if Stalin's name were not on the letter.

Conclusions

- The Shelepin version of Document 2 was certainly created during Khrushchev's time.
- The manipulation of the "Beria version" of Document 2 suggests that it may have been created at the same time and so may also be a forgery.
- The "do not burn" stamp on the Shelepin version suggests that there was a plan to burn at least some documents.
- The addition of Stalin's name suggests that this was an aborted attempt to produce false evidence in order to accuse Stalin of guilt in the Katyn massacre.

That, in turn, suggests that such documents did not already exist. For if the "Beria Letter" with Stalin's bold and readable signature had been available in 1959 there would have been no need to contemplate adding "J. STALIN" to Document 2, as the Shelepin letter does.

Kharazov's testimony, and remarks made by an aged Shelepin to investigators in the early 1990s, are good evidence that some kind of Katyn forgery was contemplated during Khrushchev's day. It is no wonder that Khrushchev did not go through with it. He himself was in the Politburo in March 1940. Khrushchev was in the Ukraine but visited Stalin's office during these months, for example on March 1, April 3, 4, and 5, and May 21 and 22, 1940.³ If Khrushchev decided to blame Stalin for the Katyn massacre he would have also implicated himself.

³ "Posetiteli kremlevskogo kabineta I.V. Stalin." Istoricheskii Arkhiv 2, 1996. ("Visitors to the Kremlin office of J .V. Stalin.")

We do not know what process led to the fabrication of the Shelepin version of Document 2 or why it was not destroyed. We are fortunate that it wasn't destroyed, since it provides solid evidence that the other documents in "Closed Packet No.1" may also have been forged. Therefore, at the very least, we cannot accept the CP documents at face value as primary source evidence.

There is a lot of other evidence that these documents are forgeries. We will examine some of the most important points of this evidence in a later chapter. But in my opinion none of the internal problems in these documents are in themselves conclusive evidence of forgery.

And — it is important to recognize this also — it is likewise impossible to prove from internal evidence that the documents in "Closed Packet No. 1" are genuine. They are of questionable validity. As such, they are useless as evidence.

On the basis of a study of the documents alone we cannot say that all the documents in "Closed Packet No. 1" are forgeries. But we can make that statement about the Shelepin version of Document 2. It is definitely a forgery. The presence of a glaring forgery in "Closed Packet No. 1" casts a shadow of suspicion over the other documents in that packet.

Chapter 5. The Excavations at Volodymyr-Volyns'kiy

In 2011 and 2012 a joint Polish-Ukrainian archeological team partially excavated a mass execution site at the town of Volodymyr-Volyns'kiy, Ukraine. Shell cases found in the burial pit prove that the executions there took place no earlier than 1941. In the burial pit were found the badges of two Polish policemen previously thought to have been murdered hundreds of miles away by the Soviets in April-May 1940 during the Katyn massacre.

The Badges

1. Józef Kuligowski

In May 2011 Polish news media reported that in the Western Ukrainian town of Volodymyr-Volyns'kiy a numbered metal badge had been unearthed which had been identified as that of a Polish policeman, Józef Kuligowski. According to the "official" or "the Soviets did it" version of Katyn it had been assumed that Kuligowski, along with thousands of other Polish POWs, had been executed by the Soviet NKVD at Kalinin (now Tver'), Russia, and buried with other such victims at Mednoe, outside of the town.¹

Czy osoby z Listy Katynskiej mordowano również na Grodzisku we Włodzimierzu Wołyńskim?! Odnaleziona przez ukraińskich archeologów odznaka Policji Państwowej o numerze 1441 / II na to wskazuje. Jak nas poinformował pan Piotr Zawilski, dyrektor Archiwum Państwowego w tym odznaka o tym numerze należała do posterunkowego Józefa Kuligowskiego z IV komisariatu w tym. Informacja o przydziale i numerze służbowym pochodzi z maja 1939 roku. Nazwisko posterunkowego figuruje na jednej z list dyspozycyjnych dla obozu w Ostaszkowie. Dotychczas uważano, że został zamordowany w Kalininie i spoczywa w Miednoje. Jak wytłumaczyć fakt, że odznaka Józefa Kuligowskiego znaleziona we Włodzimierzu Wołyńskim? Czy zginił w Kalininie, czy we Włodzimierzu?²

Were persons from the Katyn List also murdered at Grodzisk in Włodzimierz Wołyński?! This is indicated by the National Police badge number 1441 / II found by Ukrainian archaeologists. As Mr Piotr Zawilski, director of the National Archive in Łódź has informed us, the badge with this number belonged to constable Józef Kuligowski of the IV commissariat in Łódź. Information concerning the issuance and service number is from May 1939. The surname of the constable figures on one of the dispositional lists for the camp at Ostashkov. Up to now it was believed that he had been murdered in Kalinin and lies in Mednoe. How to explain the fact that Józef Kuligowski's badge has been found at Włodzimierz Wołyński? Was he killed at Kalinin or at Włodzimierz?

This account continues by identifying Kuligowski as one of the men who, according to the "official" version, were killed as a part of the Katyn massacre.

The discovery occasioned considerable discussion in the Polish press about the relationship between the Katyn Massacre and this site near the Ukrainian town of Volodymyr-Volyn's'kiy (Polish: Włodzimierz Wołyński; Russian: Vladimir-Volynskii).⁴ At that time no one doubted that this was a site of Soviet NKVD killings.⁵

then occupied by the Germans; then again part of Soviet Ukraine, and is now part of Ukraine.

(Whose graves found at Włodzimierzem Wołyńskim?) <http://wpolityce.pl/depesze/10407-czyje-mogily-odnaleziono-we-wlodzimierzem-wolynskim> This last article speaks of „ofiar pomordowanych przez NKWD w latach 1940-1941 w sowieckiej katowni na zamku we Włodzimierzem Wołyńskim" (victims murdered by the NKVD in 1940-1941 in the Soviet execution chamber in the castle at Włodzimierzem Wołyński). Many more similar articles could be cited.

The Ukrainian media also reported the excavations under the assumption that the Soviet NKVD was responsible for the killings, as in the following account in the Ukraine-wide online newspaper Tyzhden.ua of October 4 2011.⁶

Ось два жетони офіцерів польсько! поліці!, і оскільки на них є номери, то ми вже знаємо, кому вони належали: Йозефу Куліговському та Людвігу Малові. Обидва з Лодзя. За документами НКВС, одного з них розстріляно в Калініні (Твер), другого — в Осташкові біля Харкова.

And although there is as yet no official version of who these people were and why they were shot, scientists are inclined to think that the murdered people were victims of the NKVD in 1941. Polish citizens, military and civilians, the wealthy class. This is what the artifacts found at the execution site suggest.

Here are two badges of officers of the Polish police, and since there are numbers on them we already know to whom they belonged: to Józef Kuligowski and Liudvig Maloveis'kiy. Both were from Lodz. According to NKVD documents one of them was shot at Kalinin (Tver'), the other at Ostashkov [sic] near Kharkiv.⁷

⁷ The journalist has made several errors here. No NKVD documents mention any shooting.

In November 2012 the Polish members of a joint Polish-Ukrainian archaeological group published a report on the excavation of this mass murder site. In mass grave No.1, 367 sets of human remains were exhumed and examined during 2011, and 232 more sets in 2012. The locations of more mass graves were also determined. Concerning the finding of Kuligowski's badge this report reads as follows:

Była to odznaka Polskiej Policji Państwowej z numerem 1441, która należała do: Post. PP Józef KULIGOWSKI s. Szczepana i Józefy z Sadurskich, ur. 12 III 1898 w m. Strych. WWP od 20 VI 1919. 10 pap. Kuligowski was taken prisoner by the Red Army sometime after September 17, 1939, when Soviet troops entered Eastern Poland to prevent the German Army from establishing itself hundreds of miles further east at the USSR's pre-September 1939 border. He was held in the Ostashkov prisoner-of-war camp in Kalinin oblast' (province), now renamed Tver' oblast'. In April 1940 along with other prisoners he was transferred from Ostashkov to the town of Kalinin (now Tver'). After that there is no further information about him.

Kuligowski is counted as one of the victims of the "Katyn Massacre." What purports to be a record of his transfer, with the word "Mord" (Murder) added, is on one of the official Polish websites about Katyn.¹⁰

As stated in the Polish media account of May 25, 2011, Kuligowski's name is on the transfer lists of Ostashkov prisoners reproduced in the official account by Jędrzej Tucholski published in 1991.¹¹ Kuligowski is also listed in other recent Polish lists of Katyn victims.¹² Naturally the original Russian record of prisoner transfer reprinted in Tucholski's Mord w Katyniu does not contain the word "Mord" (=murder).

¹¹ Jędrzej Tucholski. Mord w Katyniu: Kozielsk, Ostaszków, Starobielsk. Lista ofiar. Warszawa: Instytut Wydawniczy Pax, 1991, p. 810. No. 15: NKVD list No. 026/1 of 13 April 1940, position 15. In spite of the presence of Kuligowski's name on this NKVD list, for some reason the alphabetical section of Tucholski (p. 314 col. 2) lists Kuligowski on its "victims list" (lista ofiar) as "probably Ostashkov" (Prawdop. Ostaszków).

¹² See "INDEKS NAZWISK — Katyń — zamordowani przez NKWD w 1940 r."

The Polish archaeologist in charge of the excavations and author of the report, Dr. Dominika Siemińska, has determined that the victims buried in the mass grave in which this badge was found were killed no earlier than 1941.¹³

Z pewnością stwierdzono, że zbrodnia została dokonana nie wcześniej niż w 1941 roku. (p. 4)

Translated:

It can be confirmed with certainty that the crime did not take place earlier than 1941.

¹³ See above, note 14.

The time period of execution was determined from the shell casings found in the graves. All but a very few were of German manufacture and are datable to 1941.

Some of the bodies were arranged in the "sardine-packing" (Sardinenpackung) formation¹⁴ favored by Obergruppenführer¹⁵ Friedrich Jeckeln, commander of one of the Einsatzgruppen, extermination teams whose task it was to carry out mass executions. A photograph of the bodies in grave no. 1 shows this arrangement of bodies.¹⁶

¹⁴ A description of this method of execution may be found on the English-language Wikipedia page on Jeckeln at http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Friedrich_Jeckeln#World_War_II_mass_murderer

¹⁵ Equivalent to a full or four-star General, the highest SS rank aside from that of Heinrich Himmler, whose rank was Reichsführer-SS.

Also, a large percentage of the bodies in the mass graves are of children. There has never been any evidence that the Soviets executed children. There is a great deal of evidence that the Germans did. So the evidence is strong that this is a site of German, not Soviet, mass executions.

This conclusion is confirmed by the recent research of other Ukrainian scholars concerning this very burial site. Relying on evidence from German war crimes trials, eyewitness testimony of Jewish survivors, and research by Polish historians on the largescale massacres of Poles by Ukrainian Nationalists, Professor Ivan Katchanovski and Volodymyr Musychenko have established that the victims buried at this site were mainly Jews but also Poles and "Soviet activists."

Katchanovski concludes that Ukrainian authorities have tried to throw the blame onto the Soviet NKVD in order to conceal the guilt of the Ukrainian Nationalist forces who are celebrated as "heroes" in today's Ukraine, including in Volodymyr-Volyns'kiy itself.¹⁷

Images 5.2 and 5.3 Jeckeln during the war (L.); in Soviet captivity (R.) He was tried and executed for war crimes in Riga, Latvian SSR, in 1946.

Kuligowski was indeed transported from Ostashkov POW camp to Kalinin in April 1940. But he was not shot until 1941 at the earliest. This means that the transportation lists, which the "official" Soviets-did-it version of Katyn assumes to be lists of victims being shipped off to be shot, are not that at all. Kuligowski was transported to Kalinin in April 1940 by the Soviets not in order to be shot but for some other reason. He remained alive, to be captured and executed by the Germans, most likely in the second half of 1941. Moreover, Volodymyr-Volyns'kiy is more than 700 miles (1200 km) from Kalinin (Tver').

This is the major deduction from this discovery that is relevant to our understanding of the Katyn Massacre case: The fact that a Polish POW's name is on one of the Soviet transportation lists can no longer be assumed to be evidence that he was on his way to execution, and therefore that he was executed by the Soviets.

2. Ludwik Małowiejski

There is evidence that more Polish POWs are buried in these same mass graves, and therefore were executed at the same time, by the Germans in 1941 or 1942. The epaulette of a Polish policeman's uniform and Polish military buttons were found in grave No. 2.¹⁸

¹⁸ Photos available at http://msuweb.montclair.edu/~furrgr/research/polskie_guziki_pagon_VV2012.jpg from the Polish archaeological report.

In September 2011 Polish media reported that police badge number 1099 / II belonging to Senior Police Constable (starszy posterunkowy) Ludwik Małowiejski had been found in the Volodymyr-Volyns'kiy mass graves.¹⁹ It had been claimed that, like Kuligowski, Małowiejski was a Katyn massacre victim whose body was buried in a mass grave at Mednoe near Kalinin, where, according to the "official" version, other Katyn victims shot by the NKVD in 1940 are buried.

Małowiejski's name is also on the recent Polish lists of Katyn victims.²⁰ Like Kuligowski he is memorialized in the "Mednoe Cemetery Book" — in this case, Volume 2, page 541:

Like Kuligowski's, Małowiejski's name is also on the Russian lists of prisoners shipped out of the Ostashkov camp.²²

In 2011 it was still claimed that the mass graves at Volodymyr-Volyns'kiy were those of victims of the Soviet NKVD. Therefore this apparent discrepancy about the place of burial of one victim received little publicity. Since then the Polish archaeological team has definitively dated the site as 1941 at the earliest and argues that it is an SS Einsatzgruppe mass murder site. This in turn means that Kuligowski and Małowiejski were killed by the Germans in 1941, not by the Soviets in 1940. Other Polish POWs — perhaps many others — claimed to have been Katyn victims may well have been shot along with Kuligowski and Małowiejski, and be buried in the mass graves at Volodymyr-Volyns'kiy or elsewhere in the Ukraine.

An article by Sergei Strygin contains photographs of the memorial tablets of both Kuligowski and Małowiejski at the special Polish memorial cemetery at Mednoe. These and the thousands of other memorial tablets at this site reflect the assumption that the "transit lists" were really "execution lists" — an assumption that the discoveries at Volodymyr-Volyns'kiy prove is false.

It is clear today that neither man's body is buried at Mednoe. The question now is: Are any of the Polish POWs whose memorial tablets are at Mednoe alongside those of Kuligowski and Małowiejskie really buried there? At present there is no reason to think so.

Images 5.4 and 5.5 The memorial plaques of Kuligowski and Małowiejski at Mednoe Cemetery. They are not buried there. (Thanks to Aleksandr Zenin of Tver' and his colleagues)

The Cover-Up

Kuligowski's name, the discovery of his badge, and the information that ties him to Katyn, are only mentioned in a footnote in the Polish archeologist report. The Katyn information is cited in such an abbreviated manner that only those expert in the Katyn issue will even recognize the connection.

For example, this is how the footnote in the Polish archeologists' report refers to the entry for Kuligowski on the Soviet transit list in Tucholski's book:

Here is the actual citation of Kuligowski's name in Tucholski, p. 810:

15. [[cyrillic]]КУ ЛИГОВСКОГО Юзефа Степановича, 1898 г.р.

The number of the transit list, 026/1, is at the top of Tucholski, page 810. Kuligowski's name is number 15 on this list. The entry "35[.6]" refers to the "delo" or case file in the NKVD list — information that is irrelevant since this file has not been found and was probably destroyed long ago.

One might assume that this, by far the most significant discovery of the whole Volodymyr-Volyns'kiy dig, would be highlighted. Instead it is "buried" in this footnote and virtually disguised with obscure words. There can be little doubt that this was done for fear that this discovery would undermine the claim that the Soviets committed the massacre at Katyn — a claim which Polish authorities want not only to keep alive, but to continue maintain is unquestionably true.

No doubt that is why, Małowiejski's name is omitted altogether from the Polish archeologist report. This important discovery is completely ignored!

These two facts: the "burying" of the reference to Kuligowski and the complete omission of the discovery of Małowiejski's badge, are good evidence that the Polish archeologists wanted to play down the Katyn connection at Volodymyr-Volyns'kiy. But in the Ukrainian archeologists' report on the Volodymyr-Volyns'kiy dig neither man's name is even mentioned!

The Shell Casings

Details of the shell casings, 150 in all, found in grave No. 1 are given in footnote 3, page 8 of the Polish report but are absent from the Ukrainian report:

1. "kam, 67, 19, 41" — 137 szt; 2. "dnh, *, 1, 41" — 7 szt; 3. Geco, 9 mm — 1 szt; 4. łuski bez oznaczeń, 7,62 x 25, wz. 30, produkcja ZSRR — 5 szt.

Translated:

1. "kam, 67, 19, 41" — 137 units; 2. "dnh, *, 1, 41" — 7 units; 3. Geco, 9 mm. — 1 unit; 4. Shells without markings, 7.62 x 25 caliber, USSR production of 1930s type — 5 units.

One hundred forty-four, or 96% of the 150 shells found, were of German make and can be dated to 1941. These identifying marks on shell casings are known as "headstamps." According to the analysis by Sergei Strygin "kam, 67, 19, 41" signifies the Hasag factory in Skarzysko-Kamienna, "67" the percentage of copper in the bullet, "19" the lot number, and "41" the year of production. "dnh , 1, 41" signifies the Dilrlach factory, "" means the shell was jacketed in brass; "1" is the lot number, and "41" the year of production.

Images 5.6 and 5.7 Artist's rendering of shells of the type found in graves No. 1 and 2

(From Strygin)

The Polish report, but not the Ukrainian report, also specifies the shells found in grave No. 2:

1. "kam, 67. 19, 41" 205 szt; 2. „dnh, *, 1, 41" — 17 szt; 3. łuski bez oznaczeń. 7.62 x 25. wz. 30, produkcja ZSRR — 2 szt; 4. luska „8, 1906"

Translated:

1. "Kam, 6 7, 19, 41" — 205 units; 2. "dnh, *, 1, 4 1" — 17 units; 3. Shells without markings, 7.62x25 caliber — US SR production of 1930s — 2 units; (one) shell "B, 1906."

Of 225 shells found in this grave, 205 are the German 1941 "Hasag" type, 17 are the German 1941 "Dürlach" type, 2 are of the unmarked 1930s Soviet type; and one is marked "B 1906."²³ Hence 98.67% of the shells are of 1941 German manufacture.

²³ "B 1906" appears to be Austrian rifle ordnance made for the Tsarist Army during the Russo-Japanese War. See the drawing at <http://7.62x54r.net/MosinID/MosinAmmoID02.htm#Austria> and the photograph obtained by Sergei Strygin at http://katyn.ru/images/news/2012-12-29-gilza_B_1906.jpg

By contrast neither of the two Ukrainian reports cites the numbers of each type of shell or the fact that German shells made in 1941 constitute the overwhelming majority of those found. The following paragraph appears word-for-word in each of the Ukrainian reports:

[[[cyrillic]]]У поховальних ямах виявлено ідентичні гільзи, головним чином калібру 9 мм. Більшість з них мають позначки dnh (виробництво заводу Верк Дурлах в КарлсруЕ, Німеччина) та kam (виробництво фабри!(И Hasag у С!(аржиці Кам'яній, Польща) 1941 р. Проте виявлені і декілька гільз радянського зразка. Все це потребує додаткових досліджень, оскільки стверджувати про те, що розстріли проводилися гітлерівцями при наявності в поховальних ямах гільз радянського зраз!(а- нее об'єктивним. Відомі факти (зокрема дані розстрілів польських військових у Катині), що радянські органи НКВС використовували при розстрілах німецьку зброю.²⁴

Translated:

In the burial pits were found identical shells, mainly of caliber 9 mm. Most of them have the mark "dnh" (Werk Dürlach production plant in Karlsruhe, Germany), and "kam" (production factory in Hasag Skarzysko Kamienna, Poland) in 1941. However, several shell casings of Soviet model were also found. All this requires more research inasmuch that it is not objective to assert that the shootings were carried out by the Hitlerites even though shells of Soviet model were found in the burial pits. Examples are known (including data of shootings of Polish soldiers in Katyn²⁵) that the Soviet organs of the NKVD used German weapons in executions.

There are some problems with the conclusion in the Ukrainian report. First, it is an example of circular reasoning. It assumes that the mass killings at Katyn, which even the Germans admitted were carried out with German ammunition, was a Soviet crime. But that is the very assumption that the discoveries at Volodymyr-Volyns'kiy call into question.

Second, it assumes that even the overwhelming preponderance of German ordnance is not enough to establish that the killings were done by the Germans, since the Soviets could also use German ammunition. No doubt this is the reason the Ukrainian report does not give the numbers of shells or the percentage of them that are German and of 1941 manufacture. (The Ukrainian reports should have added that Germans could also use Soviet ammunition. The Germans captured immense amounts of Soviet arms and ammunition in 1941.)

The Ukrainian report does note that women clutching children to their breasts were also found in the mass graves.

[[cyrillic]]Відмічено також, що вбиті часто прикривали обличчя руками, або обіймали іншу жертву (жінки тулили до себе і прикривали дітей). (Dos lizhdennia; Zvit 15)

Translated:

It is also noted that those killed often covered their faces with their hands, or embraced another victim (women hugged to themselves and covered children).

There are no examples anywhere of the Soviet NKVD shooting children.

Ukrainian archaeologist Oleksei Zlatohors'kiy (Russian: Aleksei Zlatogorskii) has pointed out the political problems raised by the Polish archaeologist's identification of the Germans as the murderers:

Неосторожные высказывания польских археологов о принадлежности останков, найденных на территории замка

Казимира Великого во Владимире-Волынском, могут поставить под сомнение уже известные преступления НКВД по отношению к польским офицерам, сообщил директор ГП "Волынские древности" Алексей Златогорский в комментарии Gazeta.ua.

Roughly half the population of today's Ukraine use Russian as their first language.

The only "already known crimes of the NKVD in relation to Polish officers" is the Katyn massacre — or, to be more precise, the "official" version of the Katyn Massacre. Prof. Zlatohors'kiy does not explain how the Polish report "casts doubt" upon the "official" version of Katyn.

The Ukrainian report cited above appears to be a shorter, perhaps Internet version of a longer report written by Zlatohors'kiy and two other Ukrainian archaeologists, S.D. Panishko and M.P. Vasheta. This report (Zvit) omits any mention of Kuligowski, Małowiejski, or their badges. Its appendix does include some photographs also found in the Polish report. Among them are a photo of the Polish policeman's epaulette and of the "sardine-packing" arrangement of bodies in Grave No. 2. (Zvit pp. 91, 92, 97).

The opening of an exhibition concerning this site at the Volodymyr-Volyns'kiy Historical Museum on March 5, 2013, was announced. The accompanying article states only that in 1997 researchers assumed that the victims buried there were Poles shot by the NKVD in 1939-1940, and suggests that this is still their conclusion.²⁷

Katchanovski and Musychenko cited evidence that the Germans killed the victims at Volodymyr-Volyn'skiy. More than 96% of the ammunition found in the mass graves is German and was manufactured in 1941. The "transit" or "shipment" lists from Kozel'sk, Ostashkov, and Starobel'sk are from April and May 1940. Kuligowski and Małowiejski could not have been killed earlier than 1941. No one has suggested that they were killed in Kalinin and Kharkiv in April-May 1940 and then their badges brought to a mass grave in Volodymyr-Volyn'skiy, hundreds of miles away, and there thrown into the burial pit.

Kuligowski and Małowiejski were indeed shipped out of their POW camps in April 1940, as recorded in the Soviet transit lists published by Tucholski in 1991. But neither of them was being sent to execution. They were killed in 1941 in Volodymyr-Volyn'skiy, Ukrainian SSR. According to the evidence now available they were killed by the Germans.

The badges and the shell casings are primary source evidence that cannot have been forged or faked in any way. The Polish archeologist would never have fabricated the badges or invented the identities of their owners. Nor would she have fabricated the fact that the shell casings found in the mass graves were not only German but were manufactured in 1941, long after the Katyn killings.

On the contrary: the Polish authorities are now denying the report of the Polish archeologist. Funding has been withdrawn; the mass graves have been filled in. A small number of victims, unidentified, have been reburied and are now officially called "victims of the NKVD." We will discuss this in more detail in a later chapter and point out that this constitutes a tacit admission by Polish authorities that the "official" version of Katyn has been disproven.

The material evidence discovered at Volodymyr-Volyns'kiy — the badges and the German shells dated 1941 — are the most important kind of evidence we could ask for. They could not have been "planted" or otherwise faked. In this they are unlike documentary evidence and personal testimony.

If we had no other unimpeachable primary evidence indicating that the "official" version of the Katyn massacre is false, these discoveries would be sufficient to establish that fact. On the basis of the badges and shell casings at Volodymyr-Volyns'kiy alone we can conclude that the prisoners shipped out of the Soviet POW camps in April-May 1940 were not being sent to their deaths. This in itself disproves the "official" version of the Katyn massacre.

Chapter 6. What the Unimpeachable Evidence Shows

In chapters 2 through 5 we have examined all of the unimpeachable evidence that we have been able to identify:

Document Collection A: The German Report (AM):

- The German spent shell casings;
- The badge from Ostashkov;
- A considerable number of bodies found at Katyn of POWs from the Ostashkov and Starobel'sk POW camps.

Document Collection B: The Soviet Burdenko Report (BU)

- The receipt from Przemyslaw Koziatulski, son of Boleslaw.

Document Collection C: "Closed Packet No.1" (CP)

- The "Excerpt from Protocol No. 13 of the Politburo" that has been altered, probably in 1959.

Document Collection D: The Archeological Report from Volodymyr-Volyns'kiy (VV).

- The badges of Jósef Kuligowski and Ludwik Małowiejski;
- The hundreds of German shell casings dated 1941.

According to the "official" version of Katyn the Polish POWs were transferred from Kozel'sk, Ostashkov, and Starobel'sk POW camps to the Smolensk, Kalinin, and Khar'kov NKVD, who oversaw their murder, and then buried them at Katyn (in fact Koz'i Gory near Katyn), Mednoe, and Piatykhatty respectively. The executions took place within a short period after the POWs arrived at the cities in question.

There has never been any evidence that the Polish POWs were shot in this way. Gur'ianov of "Memorial," a fervent defender of the "official" version, admits this in several places in his lengthy analysis in "Ubiety."

He admits that Soviet transfer lists are the only official source containing almost the full list of POWs from Kozel'sk, but that they say nothing about any shooting or Politburo decision:

[[cyrillic]]Исключительное значение списков-предписаний как доказательств обусловлено тем, что это единственный официальный источник, содержащий практически полный поименный список расстрелянных военнопленных Козельского лагеря²⁰. Однюю списки предписания не содержат каких-либо упоминаний о том, что перечисленные в них лица подлежат расстрелу на основании решения Политбюро ЦК ВКП(б). (66)

Translated:

The exceptional importance of the prescription lists as evidence is due to the fact that this is the only official source containing a practically complete list of names of the executed POWs of the Kozel'sk camp. However, the prescription lists do not contain any reference to the fact that the persons listed in them are to be shot on the basis of a decision of the Politburo of the C[entral] C[ommittee] of the VKP (b).

Therefore there is no formal connection between the (supposed) Politburo document of March 5 — the "Beria letter" — and the shooting of the POWs:

[[cyrillic]]Следовательно, если ограничиться только перечисленными советскими источниками, с формальной точки зрения связь между решением Политбюро от 5 марта 1940 г. о расстреле польских военнопленных и списками предписаниями НКВД установить невозможно. (66-7)

Translated:

Consequently, if we restrict ourselves to only the Soviet sources listed, from a formal point of view it is impossible to establish any connection between the decision of the Politburo of March 5, 1940 on the shooting of Polish prisoners of war and the NKVD prescription lists.

Gur'ianov recognizes that the lack of evidence of life after spring 1940 is the "weakest link" in "official" version:

[[[cyrillic]]]Необходимость сослаться на отсутствие признаков жизни после весны 1940 г. и общность судьбы опознанных и неопознанных по результатам эксгумации для того, чтобы считать списки-предписания НКВД списками отправки на расстрел, — самое тонкое звено в нашей формально-юридической доказательной цепочке. (67)

Translated:

The need to refer to the absence of signs of life after the spring of 1940 and the commonality of the fate of the identified and the unidentified by the results of the exhumation, in order to consider the NKVD prescription lists as lists of dispatching for execution by shooting — this is the weakest link in our formal legal evidence chain.

This is a deceptive statement — in plain language, a lie. As we have seen, there is plenty of "evidence of life" for Polish POWs after May 1940. Gur'ianov is only able to claim there isn't by deliberately ignoring the Burdenko report, the exhumation records of the BU that were published by Pamiatnykh, and the Volodymyr-Volyns'kiy discoveries. He is busy "ignoring the elephant in the living room."

If Gur'ianov were an honest historian whose purpose was to discover the truth he would acknowledge these issues and present his readers with an examination of them. That is what we have done in the present book. But Gur'ianov is not an honest historian. What he is writing is not history but "propaganda with footnotes."

Gur'ianov assumes — or, more accurately, pretends to assume — that all the remains exhumed in 1943 at Katyn by the Germans, including the unidentified remains, are of POWs from Kozel'sk.

[[cyrillic]]Мы исходим из того, что все останки, эксгумированные в 1943 г. в Катынском лесу, включая перечисленные в списке «посторонних» в Приложении," это останки значащихся в документах НКВД военнопленных из Козельского лагеря. (77)

Translated:

We proceed from the premise that all the remains exhumed in 1943 in the Katyn forest, including those listed in the list of "outsiders" in the Appendix [Gur'ianov means the appendix to his own analysis], are the remains of prisoners of war from the Kozel'sk camp mentioned in the documents of the NKVD.

Gur'ianov points out that Aleksei Pamiatnykh makes the same assumption:

Dlatego uwazam, ze w polskich mogilach w Katyniu znajdujci sie szczitki oficerów TYLKO z obozu Kozielski ego. Hipoteza ta jest glownym wynikiem mojej pracy.

Translated:

Already in 2005 Alexei Pamiatnykh came to the conclusion that "In the Polish graves in Katyn there are remains of officers ONLY from the Kozel'sk camp."

Therefore, I believe that in Polish graves at Katyn there are remains ONLY of officers from the Kozel'sk camp. This hypothesis is the main result of my work.

This "hypothesis" — really, a pretense — is false. I suspect that Gur'ianov and Pamiatnykh know it is false. Evidently, they hope that their readers will not know it. Their omission of these facts, which dismantle the "official" version of Katyn, is essential if they wish to continue to uphold the "official" Soviets-did-it version.

Gur'ianov admits that no "shooting lists" have been discovered, though he insists that they did exist.

[[cyrillic]]Как показала Н.С. Лебедева, одновременно со списками-предписаниями, которые высылались в три лагеря начальником УПВ или его заместителем, списки с теми же фамилиями военнопленных, но подписанные зам. наркома НКВД Меркуловым и содержащие распоряжение привести в исполнение ВМН в отношении перечисленных в них лиц, должны были высылаться начальникам соответствующих областных УНКВД⁸⁵. Ни один из таишх списков (назовем их расстрельными) до сих пор не обнаружен". (80)

Translated:

As N.S. Lebedeva has shown, along with the instruction list that were sent to the three camps by the head of the division of Polish POWs or his deputy, lists with the same names of prisoners of war, but signed by deputy People's Commissar of the NKVD Merkulov and containing an order to carry out the executions of the persons listed in them, were to be sent to the heads of the relevant regional NKVD Directorate. Not a single one of these lists (let us call them execution lists) has yet been found...

What Lebedeva and Gur'ianov really mean is that, if the "official" version is to be saved, such list must have existed. For Gur'ianov, "Memorial," and anticommunist researchers and writers generally, the "official" version is to be considered "true beyond any legitimate doubt" — meaning, questioned only by biased, pro-communist, and therefore "immoral" people.

This is not history. It is anticommunist ideology masquerading as history, disguised as history to fool the majority of people who rely on "experts" like these.

The Conspiracy to Defend the "Official" Version of Katyn

You, the reader, should be wondering: "If the solution to the Katyn murders is as obvious as this book makes it seem, why haven't I heard about it? What can account for the fact that the only version of Katyn that we ever hear about is the one that blames Stalin and the NKVD for murdering the Poles?"

The answer is that there is a worldwide anticommunist conspiracy to ignore the truth about Katyn, as about many other alleged "crimes of Stalin."

- The Russian researchers who have been critiquing the "official" version for more than two decades are completely ignored. None of their work is available in any language other than Russian. They are seldom mentioned even in the Russian media, and almost never mentioned outside Russia.
 - The recent 470-page book by German research Claudia Weber Krieg der Täter: Die Massenerschießungen van Katyn. Hamburg: Hamburger Edition, HIS Verlagsgesellschaft, 2015. ISBN 978-3868542868 does not mention any of them.
 - Neither does the authoritative English-language study by Wojciech Materski and Anna Cienciala, Katyn: A Crime without Punishment (Annals of Communism Series). Yale University Press, 2008. ISBN 978-0300195477
 - In Katyn and the Soviet Massacre of 1940: Truth, Justice and Memory (BASEES / Routledge Series on Russian and East European Studies). London, UK: Routledge, 2009) British professor George Sanford does devote a single paragraph to the Russian researchers who deny Soviet guilt. But he dismisses their arguments as "a method associated with Holocaust revisionist David Irving" and claims that to question Soviet guilt after Gorbachev's admission and Yeltsin's release of the NKVD evidence was a wholly perverse, and politically motivated, attempt to cloud and mitigate the issue of Stalinist guilt. (204)

Sanford is referring to Document Collection C, "Closed Packet No. 1".

It should be obvious to the reader that Sanford's position here is bankrupt and dishonest. In principle there cannot be anything wrong, much less "perverse," in subjecting any and all evidence to critical scrutiny. But the "official" version of Katyn cannot withstand such scrutiny. Therefore it must be defended by lies, insults, and threats.

There is a policy of suppression, repression, and — when that proves inadequate — slander and dismissal, of any study of Katyn that questions the "official" version. This, and not any evidentiary considerations, is the reason that criticisms of the "official" version are excluded from public and even from academic discussion.

Since 1943 anticommunist Polish nationalism has been based on the claim that the Soviet Union committed the Katyn murders. So vital is Katyn to them that the Volodymyr-Volyns'kiy exhumations are now falsified by Polish authorities because the discoveries there disprove the "official" version of Katyn.

A few Russian researchers have been investigating Katyn, reassessing the evidence already available, and discovering new evidence. We will consider some of their research in the chapters that follow. Their work has been marginalized within Russia and, when not slandered, as Sanford does, has been ignored elsewhere. This is both "politically motivated" (to use Sanford's phrase) and intellectually irresponsible.

All honest scholars know that it is never legitimate to ridicule, dismiss, or ignore evidence (as opposed to mere unsupported opinion) that tends to call one's own preconceived ideas and prejudices into question. After all, why not just refute such evidence and arguments, as historians of the Jewish Holocaust have done to Holocaust deniers? These vituperative attacks suggest that the defenders of the "official" Soviets-did-it version are unable to refute the critiques of the "official" version.

In the preceding chapters we have examined all the evidence that cannot have been fabricated. Consequently, this is the evidence that any honest researcher is duty bound to accept as evidence, and account for. As we have seen, the evidence permits only one conclusion: that the "official" version of Katyn is false. Therefore that version must be discarded by any honest, objective student.

Our analysis has not only proven that the "official" version of Katyn is false. It has also provided the evidence to prove German guilt in the Katyn murders.

- We have "evidence of life" of some of the Poles long after May 1940.
- Only German bullets were used at Katyn and at Volodymyr-Volyns'kiy.
- Kuligowski, Małowiejski, and possibly many more Polish POWs were shot by the Germans in 1941.
- There was no other party besides the Soviets and the Germans that could have killed the Poles. If the evidence excludes the Soviets then the Germans were guilty.

In the following chapters we will examine the other evidence in Document Collections A through D.

- We will see that there are so many problems, contradictions, and inconsistencies in Document A, the German Report that all objective researchers, regardless of political viewpoint, must agree that it must be disqualified as evidence.
- We will examine the objections that have been raised against Document Collection B, the Burdenko Report. We shall see that those objections are not only groundless but dishonest.
- We will see that Document Collection C, "Closed Packet No. 1," is a fabrication — a forgery.
- We will see that Polish authorities now deny all the findings of the Polish archeologist report of the VV excavations. In fact they have tacitly withdrawn the report itself! Now they claim that the killings at VV were by the NKVD. We will show that the reason for this brazen denial lies in the implications that the VV report has for disproving the "official" version of Katyn.

The Unimpeachable Evidence Is Decisive

Ours is the first study to identify the evidence which cannot have been faked and to point out that this unimpeachable evidence should be considered decisive in determining who murdered the Polish POWs. As far as I can determine, it is also the very first study of Katyn to approach the question objectively and, therefore, as not solved prior to the present study.

Most researchers who are at all concerned with the Katyn issue make no attempt at all to be objective or to consider that their preconceived notions about Katyn might be incorrect. These persons have never approached Katyn through a study of all the available evidence. This is true of the major and supposedly "definitive" studies by Cienciala / Materski, by Sanford, and of many others as well.

In fact the situation with respect to research on Katyn is even worse than the paragraph above may suggest. For the proponents of Soviet guilt have tried their best to declare Katyn a subject that is "settled" forever. By this they mean, and sometimes explicitly state, as Sanford does, that any attempt to study Katyn objectively — an effort which necessarily means subjecting all conclusions about Katyn, including the "official" Soviets-did-it position, to doubt — is perverse and even immoral.

Because Katyn has seldom if ever been studied according to the evidence, and never by the method used in this book, I think it is inevitable that some partisans of the "official," Soviets-did-it version, will ask:

"Why should the unimpeachable evidence be decisive? After all, you cannot prove that the evidence supporting Soviet guilt is false. The most you can say is that it, like a great deal of other evidence, might be false.

But suppose that at least some of it is not false? Suppose, for example, that the other documents in CP, like the "Beria Letter," are genuine? Wouldn't the genuineness of the CP documents, once established, equal or even outweigh the so-called 'unimpeachable' evidence you have cited? Wouldn't it, at the very least, leave open the possibility that the Soviets shot the Polish POWs'?"

The answer to such questions is, briefly: No. In fact, the unimpeachable evidence is also additional evidence that CP and AM are invalid as evidence.

The "official" version of Katyn is a narrative, a hypothesis concerning a supposed sequence of events:

- First the three POW camps were emptied in April and May, 1940. No one contests this fact so we may take it as true.
- Then the Polish POWs were shot by the Soviets at Smolensk or at Katyn (Koz'i Gory) or at both places; at Kalinin (or there and also at Mednoe); and at Khar'kov (or there and at Piatykhatty). But the unimpeachable evidence shows that this did not happen. Therefore, AM and CP are false.

The evidence compels us to conclude that AM was a fabrication by the Germans. We shall study AM in more detail in the following chapters and show that the evidence it supposedly contains that the Soviets shot the Polish POWs is all specious and falls apart when scrutinized. As for CP, it is a complex of documents that cannot be genuine because it contradicts all the valid evidence we have. In addition, there is much other evidence that the CP documents are forgeries.

The unimpeachable evidence firmly establishes that the "official" version of Katyn could not have taken place. But there is no other version of Katyn compatible with Soviet guilt. The Polish POWs must have been killed either by the Soviets or by the Germans because there was no third force that could have committed these mass murders. We also have evidence of German guilt in AM, BU, and VV. Therefore, on the evidence we are forced to conclude that the Germans killed the Polish POWs.

If there are any readers of this book who only want to know the solution to the Katyn "Whodunnit" — Who really murdered the Polish POWS? — they can stop reading at this point. "Whodunnit" has been determined beyond the shadow of any reasonable doubt: the Germans "did it."

But I suspect and hope that most readers will want a more detailed examination of the evidence. The remaining chapters present that more detailed study.

Chapter 7. The German Report

More research has been done on the German Report (AM) and on the documents of Closed Packet No. 1 than on the other two document collections. We'll begin with AM.

Lies and Contradictions in the German Report

Unter den übrigen Opfern findet sich unter anderem eine ganze Reihe von Geistlichen. (AM 10)

Translated:

Among the other victims there is also a number of [lit. a whole series of] clergymen.

In reality, only one ecclesiastic is listed.

In addition to two brigadier generals, among the murder victims 2250 officers of various ranks, 156 doctors and veterinarians, 406 officers whose rank could not be determined, ensigns and personnel as well as one military clergyman were immediately identified on the spot.

Several witnesses testified that the woods around the mass graves were closed off by the NKVD in 1931.

Das Waldgelände Kasi-Gory durfte bis 1931, wenn nicht gerade Erschießungen stattfanden, von jedermann betreten werden. Kinder, welche dort Pilze such ten, erzählten immer von frischen Grabhilgeln. (AM 19, testimony of Kuzma Godonov)

Until 1931 the forest area of Kozy Gory was accessible to anyone, as long as executions were not taking place. Children who were looking for mushrooms there always talk about fresh grave mounds.

Bis zum Jahre 1931 konnten wir, d. h die Dorfbewohner, in dieses Gelände gehen, um dort Pilze und Beeren zu sammeln, und auch ich habe als Junge in Kasi-Gory Pilze gesucht. ... Im Jahre 1931 wurde das Gelände von Kasi-Gory eingezäunt, das Betreten durch Warntafeln, die von der OGPU. unterschrieben waren, verboten. (AM 19, testimony of Ivan Krivozertsev)

Until 1931 we, the villagers, were able to go to this area to gather mushrooms and berries, and I too, as a boy, collected mushrooms in Kozy-Gory. ... In 1931 the area of Kozy-Gory was fenced off and entry was prohibited by warning sign issued by the OGPU.

Seit ungefähr 10 Jahren wurde das Schloß im Wald als Sanatorium für höhere NKWD.-Beamte benutzt. Das ganze Waldgelände war durch einen 2 Meter hohen Stacheldraht eingezäunt. (AM 25, testimony of Parfeon Kisselev)

Translated:

For about 10 years, the castle in the forest has been used as a sanatorium for higher NKVD officials. The whole forest area was fenced off by barbed wire two meters in height.

This was contradicted by the testimony of witness Gregor Silvestrov.

Die einen behaupteten, es wären Polen; manche aber, es wären Finnen gewesen. Ebenfalls nur gerüchtweise hörte man, die Gefangenen seien zu dem etwa 4 km von hier entfernten sogenannten „Ruhehaus der Kollektiven“ geschafft und dort erschossen worden. Dies nahm auch ich an, da zur Zeit dieser Transporte das in der Umgebung des Hauses übliche Pilzesammeln verboten war. (AM 24)

Translated:

Some said it was Poles. But many said it had been Finns. It was also rumored that the prisoners had been taken to the so-called "rest house of the collectives," some 4 km from here, and shot there. I too assumed this, because at the time of these transports the usual mushroom gathering in the vicinity of the house was forbidden.

Kisselev testified that the local people thought there were about 10,000 Poles killed by the NKVD at Koz'i Gory.

Die Leute der Ortschaften erzählten, daß es sich um zirka 10 000 Polen gehandelt haben soil. (AM 25)

Translated:

The local people used to say that it was a matter of about 10,000 Poles.

This is the same wildly inaccurate figure that the German report (AM) gives.

Für die Gesamtzahl können die endgültigen Ergebnisse der schaurigen Untersuchung und Zählung abgewartet werden; eine vorsichtige Schätzung läßt aber mit mindestens 10 000—12 000 Opfern der bolschewistischen Mordgier rechnen. (AM 10)

Translated:

For the total number we must await the final results of the gruesome investigation and census. However, a cautious estimate would be that of at least 10,000-12,000 victims of Bolshevik murder.

The only place the local people could have gotten this figure is from the Germans.

Former Polish officer Glaeser told the Germans that the Kozel'sk transits began on March 20, 1940, and ended May 9, 1940. (AM 31) This is false. According to Tucholski's book, which prints all the Soviet transit lists, there is no list earlier than April 1.

The report claims that some Starobel'sk POWs were transferred to Katyn via Kozel'sk:

Bekannt ist, daß eine geringe Anzahl von Starobielsk über Kozielsk nach Katyn gebracht warden ist. (AM 34)

It is known that a small number of Starobel'sk prisoners were brought to Katyn via Kozel'sk.

This is an interesting remark! The Germans did not identify any bodies as being of men who had been transferred from Starobel'sk. Evidently the Germans must have known that some POWs had been in Starobel'sk. There is no evidence for any "small number" having been transported from Starobel'sk to Kozel'sk before April-May 1940. The Soviet NKVD transit lists, reproduced in Tucholski, record nothing like this.

As we have seen, a number of Starobel'sk and Ostashkov POWs were indeed killed at Katyn. But these men had first been transferred to Khar'kov and Kalihin and only then to Kozel'sk.

In einem Falle, und zwar am 4. 4. 1940, wurden 2402 Offiziere abtransportiert. (AM 34)

Translated:

In one case, on April 4, 1940, 2402 officers were shipped out.

Not all the Soviet transfer lists in Tucholski are dated. But it appears that there was never anything like 2400 prisoners sent on a single day.

The Insect Question

The German Report, and proponents of the "official" version since then, have emphasized that the Germans found no insects in the mass graves "from the time of burial" (aus der Zeit der Einscharrung). They have used this fact to allege that the murders must have taken place in the spring — April and May — and so must have been committed by the Soviets. They assert that, had the murders taken place in the fall, and been committed by the Germans, there would have been insects.

Nirgends fanden sich an den Leichen oder deren Kleidung Spuren von Insektenfraß oder ihrer Ablagerung, die aus der Zeit der Einscharrung stammen konnten. Die nach der Auflegung der Leichen relativ häufig angetroffenen Lederlauhkäfer, die von Insektenmaden leben, sind erst nach der Bergung der Leichen, also sekundär, angewandert.

Translated:

Nowhere on the corpses or their garments were there any signs of insect-feeding or their deposits which might have come from the time of burial. The leather beetles, which are found frequently after the laying out of the corpses, and which live on maggots, have only arrived after the bodies have been salvaged, that is, secondarily.

Hieraus ergibt sich, daß die Erschießungen und die Einscharrungen in einer kalten, insektenfreien Jahreszeit stattgefunden haben müssen, ... (AM 52)

Translated:

From this it follows that the shootings and the burials must have taken place in a cold, insect-free season ...

Es fehlen gänzlich an den Leichen Insekten und Insektenreste, die aus der Zeit der Einscharrung stammen konnten. Hieraus ergibt sich, daß die Erschießungen und die Einscharrungen in einer kalten, insektenfreien Jahreszeit geschehen sein müssen. (AM 117)

Translated:

Insects and insect remains on the corpses that could have come from the time of burial are entirely lacking. From this it follows that the shootings and the burials must have taken place in a cold, insect-free season.

AM admits that beetles (Lederlaufkäfer) were found that live off maggots (Insektenmaden). Maggots hatch from eggs which are laid by flies. Dr. Orsós, the openly pro-German medical expert, wrote that he found no evidence of insects in one of the corpses he examined.

Insekten oder Insektenteile wie auch andere niedere Tiere ließen sich weder an der Leiche selbst noch an der Kleidung nachweisen. (AM 123)

Translated:

Insects, insect parts, and other lower animals, could not be detected either on the corpses themselves or on the clothing.

But Dr. Palmieri, an Italian member of the medical team brought to Katyn by the Germans, did find evidence of insects.

In der Kleidung eine ganze Menge toter Larven. (126)

Translated:

In the clothing a large number of dead larvae.

Die Zunge ist flach. Im Rachen eine große Menge toter Larven. (126)

Translated:

The tongue is flat. In the throat a large number of dead larvae.

Larvae develop from maggots, which hatch from eggs laid by flies. So there had been flies after all! During this testimony at Nuremberg Dr. Markov noted this contradiction in the AM:

As to the insects and their larvae, the assertion of the general report that none were discovered is in flagrant contradiction to the conclusions of Professor Palmieri, which are recorded in his personal minutes concerning the corpse which he himself dissected. In this protocol, which is published in the same German White Book¹, it is said that there were traces of remains of insects and their larvae in the mouths of the corpses. (Nuremberg Trials Vol. XVII, 354)

Failure to recognize the terminus post quem

Dr. Miloslavich, a member of the expert team called to Katyn by the Germans, wrote:

Der Tod des Obengenannten erfolgte im Frühjahr 1940, wie dies aus den an der Leiche und an vielen umliegenden Leichen vorgefundenen

Privat-Dokumenten ersichtlich ist. (133)

The death of the above-mentioned person occurred in the spring of 1940, as can be seen from the private documents found on the body and on many surrounding corpses.

The Polish Red Cross team made the same logical error in their telegram to the International Red Cross of April 21, 1943:

4. jugeant d'apres les papiers et documents trouves sur les cadavres, l'assassinat a du avoir lieu environ aux mois mars — avril 1940. (AM 137)

Translated:

4. judging from the papers and documents found on the corpses the murder must have taken place around the months March — April 1940.

In reality the latest date of documents found in the mass graves could only establish that the victims were shot after that date. This apparent error in logic — ignorance of the elementary concept of "terminus post quem" — is made multiple times in the German report. It defies credulity to believe that all the Germans, all the foreign experts, and all the Poles, could have made this error. Therefore this must be a deliberate effort to deceive — or, at least, to deceive those who wanted to be deceived, who wanted to believe that the Soviets shot the Poles.

Denial of Polish Collaboration with the Germans — While the Poles Were Collaborating

The German Report quotes the Soviet charge that some of the Poles were working hand in glove with the Germans in this propaganda campaign. It also quotes the response of the Polish government-in-exile in London to the Soviet charges.

Jede Zusammenarbeit mit den Deutschen ist verschmaht worden. Im Lichte dieser in der gesamten Welt bekannten Tatsachen haben die polnische Regierung und die polnische Nation es nicht nötig, sich gegen irgendeine Vermutung hinsichtlich einer Fühlungnahme oder einer Verständigung mit Hitler zu verteidigen. (AM 147)

Translated:

All collaboration with the Germans has been scorned. In the light of this fact, known throughout the world, the Polish government and the Polish nation have no need to defend themselves against any presumption regarding a meeting or an understanding with Hitler.

This statement was made while the Polish Red Cross team was in fact working as closely as possible with the Germans at Katyn!

In fact we know that, after Stalingrad made it obvious that Germany would almost certainly lose the war, the Polish Home Army began to collaborate with the Germans against their mutual enemy, the Soviet Union. One well-documented example of this collaboration is discussed in a recent German collection.² We will return briefly to this important point in the Conclusion.

Chapter 8. The German Report, continued. Sakharov's Article 'Secrets of Katyn'

The Research of Valentin A. Sakharov

Since 2010 Professor Valentin Sakharov of Moscow State University has published several very important research articles on the subject of the German Report at Katyn. I have never seen any of them acknowledged, much less studied or critiqued, by any of the advocates of the "official" version of Katyn. The reason for this silence about Sakharov's research appears to be that it deals yet another serious blow to the credibility of AM.

We will examine two of his articles here:

- "Tainy Katyni." ("Secrets of Katyn") Svobodnaia mysl' 1 (2013), 133-146. Online: <http://svom.info/entry/319-tajny-katyni/>
- "Germanskije dokumenty ob eksgumatsii i identifikatsii zhertv Katyni (1943 g.)." ("German documents concerning the exhumation and identification of the victims of Katyn") Online at https://kprf.ru/rus_law/79589.html

In this chapter we will examine Sakharov's first article. We will study his second article in the chapter that follows.

"Secrets of Katyn"

In this article Sakharov examines some of the documents allegedly found in the mass graves by the Germans. He provides evidence that the Germans falsified some of these documents.

In a number of cases I do not agree with Sakharov's determination that a document was falsified. Here I will only discuss those cases where I believe that falsification can be reliably established.

1. "Lemberg"

Lemberg was the German name of the city of Lwów, in Russian L'vov, Ukrainian Lv'iv. L'vov was taken by Poland from Soviet Russia in the Polish-Soviet war of 1919-1921 and ceded to Poland in the Treaty of Riga of March 1921. It was occupied by the Red Army on September 22, 1939 and reverted to the Ukrainian SSR in October 1939 as a result of the Treaty of Nonaggression between Germany and the USSR, commonly called the Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact.

It was renamed "Lemberg" by the Germans after they captured it in June 1941 during their invasion of the Soviet Union. According to the "official" version and the German Report (AM) the Polish POWs were murdered by the Soviet NKVD more than a year earlier, in April and May 1940. Therefore there should not have been any documents found in the mass graves with the name "Lemberg" on them. But according to AM such documents were found.

Here we will examine some examples of these documents. The number represents the number assigned in AM to the corpse exhumed by the Germans in April-June 1943.

892. Uniformierter.

1 Foto mit Anschrift: Hanina Gajowska, Lemberg, Zyzyinska 24. (?) 1 Medaillon. (AM 189)

«Anschrift" — "inscription" — means that these were the actual words on the photo. If genuine, this proves that the body and document were from after June, 1941, and therefore that the victim was murdered by the Germans.

If the inscription really read "Lwów" and some German, in an excess of patriotism or political correctness, changed the name to "Lemberg," the name in use at the time of the exhumations in 1943, then that would mean that the Germans were altering the documents they found. And that would compromise the bona fides of the German AM.

One entry in AM does contain the word "Lwow."

1824. Gondek, Zdzislaw, Hptm., geb. 26. 9. 08, Lwow.

1 Offz.-Ausweis, 1 Rgt-Abzeichen, Postsparbuch, Postkarten. (AM 216)

If this one mention of "Lwow" was an oversight and the Germans were changing "Lwow" to "Lemberg" wherever they found it that would mean that the Germans were altering the documents whenever they saw fit to do. If that were the case it would mean that we cannot trust any of these documents in AM, because the Germans might have altered or even invented them.

At first glance it appears that the Germans did change "Lwow" to "Lemberg" in at least one case:

867. Terpiac, Josef, Hptm.

Diplom des Kadettenkorps Lemberg, 1 Offiziersausweis, 4 Postkarten, 1 Tagebuch. (AM 189)

This man could not have graduated from the Cadet Corps after the German occupation. But this example is different from the others. The German entry does not claim that these are the words on the diploma. Rather, they are a translation into German of the words on the diploma.

1776. Chmielewski, Kazimierz, Fliegerhptm. Offz.-Ausweis, Waffenschein, Gestellungsbefehl, versch. milit. Befehle,

2 Fliegerabzeichen, 2 Briefe a. Namen: Irena Schmidt, Lemberg, ul. Bulwarska 1, adressiert an: Edward [presumably this should be "Edward"] Schmidt, Kozielsk. (AM 215)

The letter could not have been sent from "Lemberg" before June 1941 at the earliest.

781. K....., Boleslaw, Sohn des Zygmunt.

1 Foto mit Anschrift: Deine sich sehrende Frau, Lemberg, den 13. 2. 1940, Impfschein, Brief, Briefumschlag. (AM 186)

Once again, "Anschrift" means "inscription," the actual words on the photo. But here the inscription is in German rather than Polish, the date given is February 13, 1940, and the name of the city is "Lemberg." This cannot be accurate. Therefore, the Germans translated — that is, lied about — the inscription on the photograph, which in 1940 would have either "L'vov", the Russian name, or "Lwów," the Polish name, or conceivably "L'viv," the Ukrainian name, but never "Lemberg." In addition, it would have been written in Polish.

Conclusion about "Lemberg"

Either the documents cited above really read "Lwów", L'viv", or "L'vov" and the Germans altered them to read "Lemberg" even in those cases where they said these were the "Anschriften", the inscriptions on photographs; or the documents really did read "Lemberg" as stated in AM.

In the first case the bona fides of the German AM are destroyed because the Germans were making changes on the materials they found. Who knows what other changes, inventions, forgeries, etc., they may have been making that have gone undetected?

In the second case the Germans have provided "proof of life" for a number of Polish POWs who lived after the German occupation in June-July 1941, and also provided evidence that these men were murdered by the Germans, not by the Soviets. Since these men were buried among all the rest of the prisoners, this is also evidence that the Germans shot the other Polish POWs at Katyn too.

Whichever is the case, the appearance of the word "Lemberg" in AM proves that it cannot be considered any kind of honest report.

2. German-Language Materials

3708. Pufahl, Roman, Kapitan, geb. 26.1. 1894, wohnh.: Warschau, Straße des 6. August 58 m 2.

Offiz.-Ausweis, Fuhrerschein, 3 Briefe, 1 Postkarte, 1 Taschenmesser, Bescheinigung uber Militardienstzeit in deutscher Sprache. (AM 262)

Why would a Polish captain be carrying a certificate of military service written in the German language? According to the "Katyn Cemetery Book" (page 509) Pufahl had fought in the First World War. But he would have fought in the Russian army, since Poland was part of Tsarist Russia at that time. If by some chance he had served with the Austro-Hungarian or the German army in WW1 he might have had German-language papers. But why would he carry them when fighting against Germany in 1939?

It is possible that he was given this certificate in a German POW camp after the German occupation of 1941 (but see below).

4120. — — Josef, Hptm., Liebenau, Schloßstraße 6. 1 Lebenslauf in deutscher Sprache, 3 Briefe (AM 2 72)

There were a number of towns named Liebenau. None were in prewar Poland. One of them is in Lower Silesia, which between 1919 and 1945 was in Germany, not Poland. Why would a Polish captain, a resident of Germany, have a "curriculum vitae" in German on his person while fighting against Germany in the Polish army? Such documentation would leave him vulnerable to being charged with treason against Germany, where his residence was.

It seems likely that these papers were taken from a dead German. This may be the case with the certificate of military service under Pufahl's name too. In the next chapter we will see that the Germans mixed up a lot of documents, including many documents not found associated with any specific corpse.

"Krzysiński": Another Piece of Evidence That Cannot Be Impugned

439. Leutnant.

Brief in deutscher Sprache an den Kommandanten des Lagers, Oat. vom 4. 2. 1940. (AM 177)

Tucholski says this is the following person:

Krzesiński ...

Ppor. z Warszawy. PCK (AM) Nr 0439. (Tucholski p. 148 col. 1)

"PCK" means the Polish Red Cross (Polski Czerwony Krzyż). Its members at Katyn made this identification. There is no other information about this person.

It is not credible that a Polish POW would write the commandant of a Soviet POW camp in German, or have in his possession a letter in German from another prisoner to the commandant of a Soviet POW camp.

So this prisoner must almost certainly have written to the commandant of a German POW camp. That means that this soldier was taken prisoner by the Germans. It would also mean that the Germans falsified the date on the letter. We have already shown that the Germans falsified documents in AM.

I have not found any evidence that the Soviets accepted prisoners captured by the Germans in 1939. Certainly there was no reason for the Soviets to accept from the Germans any POWs whose homes were in the part of Poland occupied by Germany, as Warsaw was. Therefore this soldier must have been captured by the Germans after the German invasion of the USSR in June 1941. And that means that he was shot by the Germans.

Another important and ignored fact: the only "Krzesiński" ([[cyrillic]]КРИЕСИНСКОГО) in the Soviet transit lists was an Ostashkov prisoner (Tucholski p. 889 # 43). This man is listed on volume 1 page 449 of the Polish Mednoe Cemetery Book (Księga Cmentarna Miednoje):

Komis. PP Mieczysław Justyn KRZESIŃSKI s.Hieronima Justyny z Agopsowiczów, ur. 15 III 1878 w Czortkowie. Emerytowany (w 1934) Kmdt Pow. Kołomyja. W 1939 zamieszkały w Kołomyi.

L. 051/1 (43), 2630.

Cemetery book entry recreated based upon original entry.

In the latest study of the Katyn victims, Ubity v katyni, no prisoner named either "Krzysiński" or (Russian) [[cyrillic]]Кшесинский is mentioned at all. If the Polish Red Cross was correct in identifying this corpse he would be the sixteenth POW from either Ostashkov or Starobel'sk that we have identified.

I think that Entry No. 439 should be considered to be another piece of unimpeachable evidence. The Germans would hardly have fabricated a false claim that a Polish POW had written to the commander of a Soviet POW camp in German! As such, it would be evidence of life after May 1940 of another Katyn POW. However, I have thought it simpler to consider this evidence here, where it may be studied in the context of other doubtful statements in the German AM, rather than trying to deal with it in Chapters 1 and 2.

3. Litzmannstadt

The Polish city of Lodz (Łódz) was renamed "Litzmannstadt" by the Germans on April 11, 1940.¹ "Lodz" — we will use the English spelling — occurs 19 times in the German Report, including the letter mentioned in this entry:

3294. Oberleutnant.

Brief aus Lodz v. 24. 1. 1940 „Lieber Jurku", 1 Kruzifix. (AM 253)

¹ The Germans named it after General Karl Litzmann, whose troops captured Lodz during the First World War and who later joined the Nazi party.

Here the salutation is translated into German but not the name of the city.

"Litzmannstadt" occurs three times in AM:

678. Schreer, Joachim, Lt., Litzmannstadt, Narutowicza 48 m 2.

1 Ausweis, Mobilmachungskarte, Impfschein, 3 Briefe, Fotos. (AM 183)

1300. Frelkewicz, Jozef, Lt.

2 Briefe, 1 Karte, Absender: Frelkewicz, Litzmannstadt, Adolf-Hitler-Str. 104a. (AM 201)

2870. Krochmalski, Jan, Uniformiert, wohnh. Litzmannstadt, Allee uni 18 m 32. Notizbuch, Medaillon. (AM 242)

Checking these names in Tucholski we find the following:

Schreer:

Tucholski p. 650 #100 — 100. [[cyrillic]]ШПЕЕРА Еахима ЮльЮшевича,

Tucholski p. 646 — List 025/ 19 April 1940

Tucholski p. 210 col. 1:

Schreer Joachim

Ur. 27.11.1913. Ppor. art. rez., 10. pal.

Zam. Łódź. PCK (AM) Nr 0678.

Schreer was transferred from Kozel'sk on April 9, 1940. Lodz, in the German-occupied area of Poland, was not renamed Litzmannstadt until April 11, 1940.

Schreer could only have had identification with the name "Litzmannstadt" on his person if he had been in German captivity after April 11, 1940. That means he was captured and killed by the Germans, not by the Soviets.

Krochmalski:

Tucholski p. 676 #67 — 67. [[cyrillic]]КРОХМАЛЬСКОГО Яна Александровича, 1900 г.р.

Tucholski p. 675: List 032/414 April 1940

Krochmalski was transferred from the Kozel'sk camp three days after Lodz was renamed Litzmannstadt. His place of residence ("Wohnhaft" ="residing in") would be listed as Litzmannstadt only if it had been issued by the Germans. Therefore he too was imprisoned and shot by the Germans in 1941.

The Germans Possessed the Soviet List of Kozel'sk Prisoners

The third of the "Litzmannstadt" entries is the following:

1300. Frelkewicz, Józef, Ltn.

2 Briefe, 1 Karte, Absender: Frelkewicz, Litzmannstadt, Adolf-Hitler-Str. 104a. (AM 201)

Here are his entries in Tucholski:

Tucholski p. 677 #7 — [[cyrillic]]ФРЕЛЬКЕВИЧА Юзефа Феликсовича, 1915 г.р.

Tucholski p. 102 col. 2 — Frelkewicz Józef;

When we examine Sakharov's second article we shall see that the Germans had captured the Soviet NKVD transit lists of Polish POWs shipped from Kozel'sk to Smolensk — the same lists that are reproduced in Tucholski. This soldier's name was spelled with —kie-. But the entry on AM 201 has

"—ke." This could not have been on any postcard ("Karte") to him. No Pole would make this error.

Therefore the Germans must have transliterated this from the Russian list. The Russian letter "e" is a palatalized "ye" and corresponds to the Polish "ie." In transliterating the name from Russian, the Germans got the soft "l" correct: the Russian "ль" makes the "l" soft (the Polish hard "l" is the "barred l", written Ł ł). But the Germans did not know that the correct Polish spelling was —kie-, not —ke-, because they had only the Russian transit list.

According to the Soviet transit list in Tucholski, Frelkiewicz was transferred in convoy 035/1 on April 16, 1940. (Tucholski 677) He could not have received a card from a sender in "Litzmannstadt" in the 4 days between the renaming of the town and the departure of his convoy.

In fact the Polish POWs had been forbidden to receive mail after sometime in March, 1940. Their mail privileges were not restored until sometime in September, 1940. Therefore Frelkiewicz could not have received a letter from a sender in "Litzmannstadt."

Therefore Frelkiewicz received the letters and card after the Polish POWs' mailing privileges had been restored sometime in September, 1940. Therefore, this document is "proof of life" of a Kozel'sk POW. Frelkiewicz was alive long after May 1940. He had not been shipped out of Kozel'sk on April 16, 1940 in order to be shot. Instead, he had been sent to some other camp where he received these letters and card in September 1940 or afterwards. That means he was murdered by the Germans, not by the Soviets.

But it is also possible that the Germans fabricated all of this information about Frelkiewicz. If genuine, the two letters and the one card would have used the —kie- Polish spelling. Since the Germans transliterated his name from the Soviet NKVD transit list, they may well have fabricated all the information under number 1300. And if they did so in this case they could have done likewise in many other cases as well. This would further undermine the validity of the German AM as evidence.

Conclusion

We have studied Sakharov's article, looked a little more carefully into his results, and identified nine entries in the AM list that can demonstrate were either partially falsified or entirely faked: AM numbers 892, 1776, 781, 4120, 439, 3294, 678, 1300, 2870.

Either we have here a lot of evidence in the German AM that these men were alive months after the "official" version claims they had been killed and buried by the Soviets — which would prove that the "official" Soviets-did-it version of Katyn is incorrect. Or we have a lot of evidence that the Germans were falsifying the documents that they were supposedly recording as they took them from the mass graves.

In either case the German report (AM) is dishonest and the "evidence" it supposedly contains is invalid and cannot not be used in any honest effort to prove that the Soviets murdered the Polish prisoners.

Chapter 9. The German Report, continued: Sakharov's Article 'German Documents'

In the present chapter we review the results of Valentin A. Sakharov's second article "Germanskie dokumenty ob ekskumatsii i identifikatsii zhertv Katyni (1943 g.)."¹ In it Professor Sakharov makes and examines a number of important discoveries relevant to the Katyn issue and the German Report. Most of them are supported by archival documents, some of which Sakharov publishes here for the first time. We will take them up in turn. They are:

1. Reports of Soviet partisans giving details about German falsification of the Katyn exhumation site.
2. Evidence supporting the testimony of local residents that they were forced by the Germans to sign statements written in the German language that they did not understand.
3. Evidence that the Polish prisoners who were transferred from Kozel'sk to Smolensk were sentenced to various prison terms, not sentenced to execution.
4. The statement of the German tree expert that he did not personally collect the tree rings sent to him by the Germans at Katyn, but only reported on what had been sent to him.
5. Evidence that the Germans captured and possessed the Soviet transfer lists of POWs.
6. Unpublished documents which show that both the Poles and the Germans at Katyn acknowledge that the identifications made there were falsified because the documents were often not found associated with individual corpses.
7. Evidence that the names assigned to bodies in the German list are not based on real identifications but on the haphazard association of unidentified corpses with documents not necessarily found on those corpses.

1. Reports of Soviet partisans giving details about German falsifications at the Katyn exhumation site.

Soviet partisans testified that the Germans had dug up bodies from the Smolensk civilian cemetery and bodies of Red Army officers and men killed during the 1941 defense of Smolensk against the German invasion, and transported them to Katyn.

Sakharov publishes excerpts from five such reports. We have obtained a copy of one of them from GANISO, the State Archive of Contemporary History of the Smolensk Oblast.²

Section "How the Germans fabricated the Katyn escapade

"Prisoners of war who fled the Smolensk camp on July 20, 1943 recounted as eyewitnesses:

In order to create graves in the Katyn woods supposedly of Polish citizens shot by Soviet authorities the Germans disinterred a large number of bodies at the Smolensk civilian cemetery and transferred these bodies to the Katyn woods, which enraged the local population very much. In addition there were disinterred and transferred to the Katyn woods bodies of Red Army soldiers and commanders who had perished in defense of the approaches of the city against the German invaders in 1941, and of those who had been killed during the first days of the Patriotic war by the treacherous attack on Smolensk of the fascist aviation. The military belts, insignia, raincoats and other items of the uniform of the Red Army serve as evidence of this.

This provocative concoction of the fascist crooks is not denied even by the fascist doctors who are part of this commission of inquiry.

The doctors, who are part of the group of experts in the examination of the corpses, said in the presence of the prisoners of war who were working at the hospital that, despite all their efforts, they could not in fact determine the time of burial of the corpses, where they came from or their nationality — because of their decomposition.

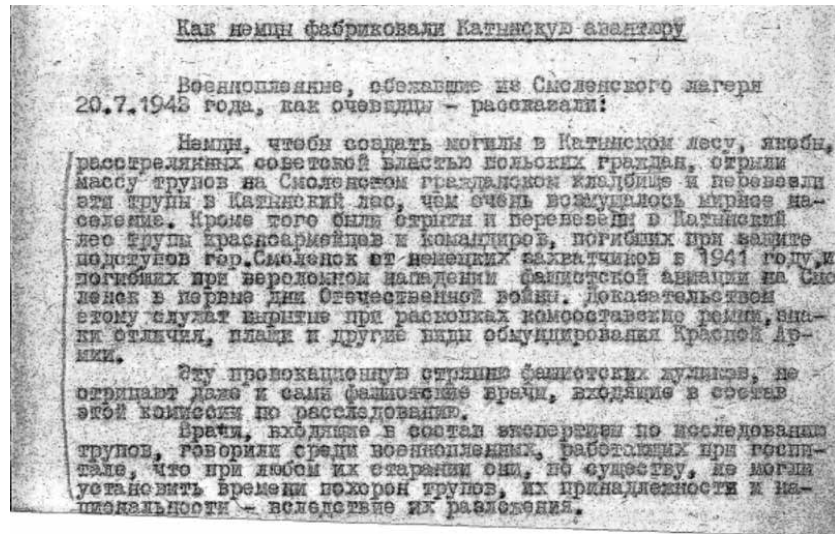

Image 9.1 "How the Germans fabricated the Katyn escapade" photocopy.

The other four documents from partisan reports tell a similar story.

These documents might be considered among the unimpeachable evidence. It seems to be almost impossible that they were fabricated in order to support the Soviet version. On July 20, 1943, the German Report (AM) had not yet been published. The partisans could not have known that the Soviet leadership would take the German allegations seriously enough to mount a full-scale Soviet investigation commission.

Moreover, the partisan documents about the Germans bringing other bodies to Katyn and so falsifying their whole investigation occur in the middle of much longer written reports about the partisans' activity. The Katyn materials, like the one above, are mentioned almost incidentally, rather than being featured as part of any effort to advocate Soviet innocence in the murders.

2. Evidence supporting the testimony of local residents that they were forced by the Germans to sign statements written in the German language that they did not understand.

Sakharov reproduces photographic copies of longer statements from five local residents who gave testimony to the Germans that the Soviets had killed the Poles, and short affidavits from 11 other similar witnesses in which they certify that their statements previously given were truthful.

Ivanov, one of the witnesses testified to the Burdenko Commission that the Germans had forced him to sign a statement in German and would not give him that statement in Russian.

... I again refused to give false testimony to the German officer. He started shouting at me, threatened me with beating and shooting, and said I did not understand what was good for me. However, I stood my ground. The interpreter then drew up a short protocol in German on one page, and gave me a free translation of its contents. This protocol recorded, as the interpreter told me, only the fact of the arrival of the Polish war prisoners at Gnezdovo station. When I asked that my testimony be recorded not only in German but also

According to this schedule, in the second quarter of 1940 this battalion convoyed 10,916 persons. Of these, 5769 had been sentenced to various terms of imprisonment («[[cyrillic]]Всего осужденных»): 1 — 3 year, 4300; 3 — 5 years, 858; 5 — 8 years, 443; 8 — 10 years, 134; 10 — 15 years, 34; more than 15 years, 0. In addition, this NKVD unit convoyed 2512 persons under investigation and 2635 persons sentenced to exile and special settlements. The whole schedule may be seen as Appendix No. 13 ("Prilozhenie No.13") at the end of Sakharov's article.

This evidence too is confirmatory only. It is not unimpeachable itself. It might be argued that the convoy troops had not been informed of the true fates of the prisoners they were transferring from Kozel'sk to Smolensk and Gnezdovo. But it is consistent with the unimpeachable evidence we have analyzed previously.

4. The statement of the German tree expert that he did not collect the treeplings sent to him by the Germans at Katyn, but only reported on what had been sent to him.

The German Report stated that small pine treeplings had been planted over the mass graves.³

An der Bodenbewachung war ersichtlich, daß, diese Hügel van Menschenhand aufgeworfen und mit jungen Kiefern bepflanzt warden waren. (AM 15)

Translated:

It was evident from the ground cover that these hills had been raised by human hands and planted with young pines.

Diese Gräber befanden sich nahe beieinander in größeren, mit einem auffällig jungen Kiefernbestand bepflanzten, nach Südwesten zu abfallenden Waldlichtungen (s. Lageskizze). (AM 39)

Translated:

These graves were located near each other in larger forest clearings planted with a conspicuous young pine grove and falling away towards the southwest.

³ Perhaps in order to conceal them, in time.

The German Report states that the treeplings were submitted to a master forester, von Herff, who concluded that they were at least 5 years old that had been transplanted to their present location three years previously — that is, in 1940, before the German invasion of the USSR.

Die Massengräber befinden sich in Waldlichtungen. Sie sind vollkommen geebnet und mit jungen Kiefernbaumchen bepflanzt. Nach dem eigenen Augenschein der Kommissionsmitglieder und der Aussage des als Sachverständigen zugezogenen Forstmeisters von Herff handelt es sich um wenigstens fünfjährige, im Schatten großer Bäume schlecht entwickelte Kiefernpflanzen, die vor drei Jahren an diese Stelle gepflanzt wurden. (AM 116)

Translated:

The mass graves are located in forest clearings. They are completely levelled and planted with young pine trees. According to the Commission members' own opinion and the statement by the forestry master von Herff, who had been brought as an expert, they were pine plantings poorly developed from the shade of larger trees that had been planted at this place three years earlier.

Sakharov located a transcription of von Herff's report in which he states that he did not collect the six tree-ring samples himself but received them from Dr. Birkle and Dr. Buhtz. This transcription is photographically reproduced as Appendix 14 of Sakharov's article.

This means that there is no chain of evidence here. The tree-rings could have been collected somewhere else before being given to von Herff. Unless we are going to simply "believe" the Germans, von Herff's conclusions concerning the tree-rings are no good as evidence.

In the fourth week of August 1943 Dr. Burdenko wrote a letter to Nikolai Shvernik, the Chairman of the Extraordinary State Commission on Establishing and Investigating the Crimes of the German and Fascist Occupiers.⁴ In his letter Burdenko described something of what he had learned in investigating a number of German mass murder sites, most recently in Orel, Russia. Burdenko described a "German signature" in their practice of mass murder that included the planting of little trees:

[[Cyrillic]]Но зато есть такое обстоятельство: в протоколе сказано: «На могиле с целью скрыть следы расстрела русские насадили деревца». Мое внимание было привлечено к следующему факту: у общей могилы в укромном углу — в застенке тюремного двора — место общей могилы тоже засажено «деревцами». Эти факты, начиная со способа расстрела и кончая засаживанием «деревцами», свидетельствуют о «немецкой системе». Из приводимых описаний является несомненным факт расстрела польских офицеров. Это — дело рук немецких фашистов, ...

Translated:

But consider this matter. In the German report [AM] it says: "On the grave the Russians planted tree-rings with the aim of hiding the traces of the executions." My attention was drawn to the following fact: at a common grave in a secluded corner — in the wall of the courtyard of a prison — a site of a common grave is also planted with "tree-rings." These facts, beginning with the method of shooting and ending with the planting of "tree-rings," are evidence of a "German system." From the cited descriptions it appears as an unquestionable fact that the massacre of Polish officers is the work of the German fascists ... (Sorokina, at note 57; Lebedeva, at note 8)

In his July 1945 talk to the Czech Medical Society František Hájek, one of the medical team that the Germans had brought to Katyn to certify their claims that the bodies had been buried for about three years and thus had been killed by the Soviets, testified that the German forester had told him, Hájek, that the tree-rings might not have been transplanted at all.

6. Dukaz petiletými borovickami.

Jako dukaz uvádí Nemci také mladé petileté borovicky, které byly nasázeny na nasypaných pahorcích. My jsme jich sami nevideli ... Zjištěno, že je nejméne petiletá a na rezu blíže středu bylo lze videti málo zratelný temnější pruh. Zavolaný lesmistr von Herff prohlásil, že takový pruh vzniká, když je rust borovicky necím zabrzděn, na pr. presazením a soudil, že borovická byla presazena pred 3 lety. Sám však uznal, že borovicky jsou špatne vyvinuté, rostoucí ve stínu velkých stromu — mohl tedy býti tento pruh zavinen také vlivem jiným a ne jen presazením.

6. The Evidence of the Five-Year-Old Pines.

As evidence, the Germans also pointed to the five-year-old young pines that were planted on the mounds. We did not see them, because the graves were already opened, they showed us only one of the pines. ... It was established that it was at least five years old and that in the cut closer to the center there was visible a scarcely noticeable little dark band. The master forester von Herff said that such a dark stripe occurs when something stops the growth of the tree, for example as a result of a transplant, and believed that the pine was transplanted 3 years ago. However, he conceded that the little pine was poorly developed from growing in the shade of other trees, and this band could thus be the result of other influences, not only as a result of a transplant.

Von Herff also stated that he was given the tree trunks and did not collect them himself from the graves.

Mir wurden von der Delegation ausländischer Gerichtsmediziner 6 Kiefernpflanzen zur Untersuchung vorgelegt, die von Her[rn] Birkle aus Bukarest und Herrn Prof. Buhtz aus Breslau in [der] nächsten Umgebung der Massengräber von Katyn persönlich [ge]nommen worden sind.

I was presented with 6 pine plants by the delegation of foreign forensic medical doctors for the purpose of examination. They had been taken from the area close to the mass graves at Katyn by Dr. Birkle of Bucharest and Dr. Buhtz of Breslau personally.

5. Evidence that the Germans captured and possessed the Soviet transfer lists of POWs.

German possession of these lists explains the occasional agreement between the order of bodies listed as found and identified at Katyn and the Soviet transfer lists.

Defenders of the "official" version have assumed that this agreement — occasional, not consistent, but still striking when encountered — was evidence that the prisoners were shot en masse as they arrived from Kozel'sk. Vladislav Shved, among others, has set transfer lists side by side with the lists of disinterred bodies in AM, presumably given in the order in which they were exhumed. He has shown that, at least in the case that he examined, there is no consistent pattern of agreement between the two lists.

However, Sakharov's article has made this line of inquiry moot. He discovered documents that prove that the Germans had the lists of POWs sent from Kozel'sk to the Smolensk NKVD. These are the same lists that are reproduced in Tucholski's book. We have confirmed this by obtaining from the Russian State Military Archive the documents cited by Sakharov here and from which he quotes some passages in Russian translation. The original documents are, of course, in German. Facsimiles of these documents may be found on the "Images" web page of this volume. They are:

- [[cyrillic]]ГАРФ. Ф.7021. ОП.114. Д.23. Л.109. (GARF. Fond. 7021. Opis. 114. Delo. 23. List 109.)
- [[cyrillic]]ГАРФ. Ф.7021. ОП.114. Д.23. Л.108.
- [[cyrillic]]ГАРФ. Ф.7021. ОП.114. Д.23. Л.102.

We saw in Chapter 8 that Józef Frelkiewicz's name was copied from the Soviet list of Kozel'sk POWs. There is at least one more entry in AM that shows that the Germans were using the Soviet list rather than documents from the graves:

3733. Liachowski, Boleslaw, (Yater Antoni), Uniformierter.

Impfzettel, 1 Brief mit Stempel, New York, Brooklyn, 1 Zettel mit Notizen.

In Tucholski, p. 153 col. 1, we read: "Lakowski-Brzuszek". But on the Soviet transit list we read:

[[cyrillic]]ЛЯХОВСКОГО Болеслава Антоновича, 1909 г.р. (Tucholski p. 682 #19)

The Soviet list uses transliterates the name ЛЯ — "L + ya". But the name in Polish begins with "La", not "Lia." The Germans could not have obtained this name from any letter or other document on this body, or found in a grave or anywhere else. Therefore the Germans transliterated this name from the Russian-language Soviet list.

So we have the documentary evidence that the Germans had the Russian list of Kozel'sk prisoners. But if we did not have it, the examples of Frelkiewicz and Lachowski would be sufficient proof of it.

6. Unpublished documents show that both the Poles and the Germans at Katyn acknowledge that the identifications made there were falsified because the documents were often not found on individual bodies.

Sakharov quotes from a meeting in Kraków of June 10, 1943 in which the main directorate of propaganda of the German General-gouvernement (the Government of German-occupied Poland during the war) stated that the identifications of bodies at Katyn that had been published in Polish newspapers were unreliable since they were accurate in only a few instances.

[16 to ГАРФ. Ф.7021. Оп.114. Д.23. Л.118.]

For example, at a meeting that took place on July 10 1943 in Krakow it was affirmed by the main directorate of propaganda of the government of the General-gouvernement: "The lists of bodies identified at Katyn that have been presented up to this point and published in the Polish press are unreliable, since they correspond to reality in only a few cases.

According to Sakharov representatives of the Polish Red Cross also participated in this meeting.

[[cyrillic]]В одном из писем ПКК, в частности, говорилось: «Из до сих пор поступавших списков мы лишь в немногих случаях можем считать данные достаточным основанием для информирования родных, так как при таком большом количестве имен отсутствуют личные данные, допускающие несомненное опознание умерших (выделено нами. — В.С.)» [17 to ГАРФ. Ф.7021. Оп.114. Д.38. Л.9.]

Translated:

In particular, one of the letters of the PRC states: "Of the lists available to this point we can only in a few cases consider the data a sufficient basis for informing relatives, since for a large number of names we lack personal data that would permit us to identify the dead with certainty."

7. Evidence that the names assigned to bodies in the German list are not based on real identifications but on the haphazard association of unidentified corpses with documents not necessarily found on those corpses.

In a letter of July 27, 1943 to the German Red Cross the Propaganda Section of the German Generalgouvernement admitted that the documents from different bodies were often mixed up and the documents of a single person were scattered among 12 different envelopes.

Andererseits wurden durch die verschiedenen Beschichtungen der Dokumente die Papiere durcheinander gebracht und zudem die zu einer Leiche gehörigen Dokumente bei Verpacken auf verschiedene Umschläge verteilt. So fanden sich z.B. die Papiere eines Offiziers in 12 verschiedenen Umschlägen.

Translated:

Also through the different layerings of the documents the papers have been mixed up and in addition the documents belonging to one corpse have been divided in the packing-up process among different envelopes.

So for example the papers of a single officer were located in 12 different envelopes.

Sakharov reproduces a photographic copy of this document as Appendix 16. It is also attached as an appendix to the present chapter. The documents were all mixed up, names either false or "entstellt geschrieben" — written in a disfigured, inaccurate manner.

The Polish Red Cross agreed. On October 12, 1943 the Technical Commission of the Polish Red Cross sent a lengthy letter to the International Committee of the Red Cross in Geneva in which they reported, among other things, the following:

Andererseits selbst wenn das PRK sämtliche Ergebnisse der Exhumation und Identifikationsarbeiten einschließen der Dokumente und Andenken besäße könnte es offiziell und in endgültiger Form nicht bescheinigen daß der betreffende Offiziere in Katyn gestorben ist. Der unerkennbare Zustand der Leichen, die Tatsache, daß in vielen Fällen bei 2 Leichen Dokumente vorgefunden worden sind, die zweifellos einer einzigen Person angehörten, die minimale Zahl der Kennmarken, der einzig einwandfreien Beweisstücke, die auf den Leich en gefunden wurden, endlich der der Mordtat vorangegangene Zustand, das die in Katyn ermorderten Militärpersonen nicht auf dem Schlachtfelde, sondern nach einer Zeitraum fielen, in welcher der Wechsel der Uniform, das Verkleiden und die Fluchtversuche an der Tagesordnung waren, alle diese Urstände berechtigen das DRK nur bescheinigen zu können, daß die betreffenden Leichen, gewisse Dokumente getragen hat.

Translated:

On the other hand, even if the PRC were in possession of all the results of the exhumation and identification work of the documents and memorabilia, it could not officially and definitively certify that the officer in question died in Katyn. The unrecognizable state of the corpses, the fact that, in many cases, documents were found on two corpses that doubtless belonged to a single person, the very few [literally, minimal number of] distinguishing marks, the only flawless evidence, found on the corpses, and finally the state of affairs preceding the murder, that the soldiers killed at Katyn did not fall on the battlefield, but after a period of time during which changes of uniform, dress, and attempts at escape were the order of the day, all these circumstances entitle the PRC only to certify that the corpses in question carried certain documents.

[[Cyrillic]]— ГАРФ. Ф.7021. ОП.114. Д.23. Л.31 — 38 at l. 38.

The entire document is also reproduced in the original German in the volume Nemtsy v Katyni. Dokumenty o rasstrele pol'skikh voennoplennykh osen'iu 1941 goda. (The Germans in Katyn. Documents concerning the shooting of Polish POWs in the Autumn of 1941.) Moscow: Izdatel'stvo ITRK, 2010, 106 — 117.

In a previous letter of August 16, 1943, to the International Committee of the Red Cross the leadership of the Polish Red Cross admitted that:

a part of the documents found which belonged to a single individual were found in the pockets of the uniform of one corpse, and others either in the sand of the grave or on other corpses.

Therefore, the PRC leadership considered that the list of names of Polish victims "should be regarded as provisional" subject to follow-up activity "in connection with the official results of the forensic medical expert examination under way in Cracow." (Sakharov, at note 27)

The report of the Technical Commission of the Polish Red Cross was published long ago. But it does not mention either of these letters at all. Nor are they mentioned in the four-volume official Polish collection Katyn'. Dolwmenty Zbrodni. They are simply omitted.

This omission conceals the unreliable nature of the identification of bodies and of the documents in the German report (AM). But AM is the central evidentiary document that sustains the "official" version of Katyn, that the Soviet killed the Poles.

Sakharov draws the following conclusion:

[[cyrillic]]На основании вышеизложенного мы можем утверждать, что находившиеся в руках германской полиции какие-то документы, бумаги и даже предметы, использовались ею, во-первых, в качестве заменителей реально не существующих трупов и, во-вторых, для «идентификации» трупов, изначально фигурировавших как «неопознанные».

Translated:

On the basis of the aforementioned evidence we can affirm that some documents, papers, and even objects in the hands of the German police were utilized in place of bodies that in reality did not exist and for the "identification" of bodies which had originally been classed as "unidentified."

This implies that some of the documents found on bodies may have really belonged to that person — but we have no idea which do and which do not.

We do not know how the Germans determined the nationality of bodies dressed in civilian clothes. Some are listed as "in uniform" without specifying what uniform. In light of the statements by Soviet partisans recorded in the summer of 1943 these could have been bodies not of Polish but of Soviet soldiers. Appendices 2 through 5 of Sakharov's article reproduce these accounts of partisans. All accuse the Germans of disinterring bodies of Soviet soldiers as well as of civilians. There is no basis to question the genuine nature of these documents. We have obtained one of these documents and reproduced it above.

Conclusion

Sakharov concludes his article with the following remarks:

The manipulation cited above of the corpses and materials by the German authorities who had "researched" the "Katyn affair" exclude any "taking on faith" of any fact, taken by itself, of establishing a connection between them [the bodies and the materials].

Sakharov's research, the contradictions internal to AM, and the identification of many of the corpses found at Katyn (Koz'i Gory) as POWs who were shipped to Kalinin or Khar'kov but clearly not shot there — all these results deal a fatal blow to the bona fides of the German Report (AM) as an objective body of evidence. These results also mean that, because it relies heavily upon the German Report (AM), the "official" version of Katyn loses its evidentiary foundation.

Chapter 10. The Burdenko Commission Report

In this chapter we begin to consider the accounts of the Katyn massacre that appeared between the German AM of 1943 and the emergence of CP in 1992, and in which new evidence was set forth. These are: the report of the Burdenko Commission (BU) of January, 1944; the Nuremberg trial of 1946; and the Madden Committee of 1952. We begin with the report of the Burdenko Commission.

The Burdenko Report (BU)

The works that set forth the "official" version of Katyn say little about the Burdenko Commission and refer the reader to other critiques. In several cases they assert that these other critiques are "devastating" to the Burdenko Commission's findings.

Here we examine the two major studies by Cienciala and Sanford, and the critiques of BU to which they refer: an essay by M. IU. Sorokina; an essay by Natalia Lebedeva; a chapter in a book by Henri De Montfort; and the chapter on BU in the book Katynskaia drama.

We begin with a brief consideration of an essay by Sorokina. This essay has been put online by two prominent Russian supporters of the "official" Soviets-did-it version, Sergei Romanov and Aleksei Pamiatnykh. Presumably they have made it available because they believe it is worthy of consideration.

Sorokina:

M.IU. Sorokina. "Operatsia 'umelye ruki', ili chto uvidel akademik Burdenko v Orle." ("Operation 'Skillful Hands', or what Academician Burdenko Saw in Orel."), 2005¹

Sorokina's 2005 essay is an attempt to discredit Burdenko's contention that the Germans were the guilty party at Katyn. Burdenko reached this opinion by comparing the German AM with his own experience investigating sites of German mass murders, including in Orel.

Sorokina accepts that the "official" version of Katyn is true without questioning it. She is sarcastic, even contemptuous, of Burdenko and his commission. But she is unable to present any evidence at all that Burdenko's analysis was at fault in any respect.

The whole essay is an exercise in logical fallacies: "begging the question" (accepting the "official" version without questioning it); argument by scare quotes instead of by evidence; ad hominem argument by attempting to find negative information about Burdenko and the other commission members — although she is finally unable to find any such material.

Her only real conclusion is that, based on his broad experience with German mass murder sites, Burdenko himself was indeed convinced that the Germans had shot the Poles. Burdenko wrote:

[[cyrillic]]Я в бытность мою в Орле, как член Правительственной комиссии, раскопал почти 1000 трупов и нашел, что 200 расстрелянных советских граждан имеют те же самые ранения, что и польские офицеры. Достаточно тщательно сопоставить описание немецких протоколов и протоколов наших вскрытий, чтобы убедиться в тождестве и обнаружить "умелую руку". Таким образом, установленное тождество "метода" убийств в Орле и Катынском лесу является знаменательным и дает несомненное доказательство, что "умелая рука" была одна и та же и обличает немцев как виновников катынской трагедии.

Translated:

When I was in Orel, as a member of the Government Commission, I unearthed almost 1000 corpses and found that 200 Soviet citizens shot to death have the same wounds as the Polish officers. It is enough to compare the description of the German protocols and protocols of our autopsies to make sure of identity and to discover the "skillful hand" ... Thus, the established identity of the "method" of murders in the Orel and Katyn forest is significant and gives unquestionable evidence that the "skillful hand" was the very same and exposes the Germans as the perpetrators of the Katyn tragedy.

Sorokina fails to point out that Burdenko had the very experience — that of examining numerous sites of mass murder — that the members of the commission of medical experts brought to Katyn by the Germans lacked.

De Montfort

Sanford writes as follows:

De Montfort, Masakra w Katyniu, pp. 109-19 unravels the inconsistencies and falsehoods in the Soviet report very convincingly. (Sanford, 153 n. 93)

Here Sanford cites the Polish translation of the book by Henri de Montfort, Le massacre de Katyn: Crime Russe au Crime Allemand? (Paris: Editions de la Table Ronde, 1966). For some reason Sanford cites the French edition, not the Polish translation, in his bibliography on page 240.

De Montfort discusses the Burdenko report in Chapter X, pages 117-130 of the original French book. This is also Chapter X (Rozdział X), pages 109-119, in the Polish translation. I have obtained the Polish translation of de Montfort's book and have verified that it is simply a translation of the French original, so here I will use the French text.

De Montfort did not study AM carefully. He says there were 4145 bodies. (109) In fact there are many gaps in the numbers assigned to corpses in AM.

De Montfort certainly did not read the BU carefully either. He states:

Elle prit donc le parti de soutenir que les documents recueillis par Jes enquêteurs d'avril et de mai 1941 étaient taus, sans exception, des documents falsifiés. (119)

Translated:

It [the Burdenko Commission] therefore decided to maintain that the documents collected by the [German] investigators of April and May 1941 [sic; de Montfort must mean 1943] were all, without exception, falsified documents.

As evidence for this statement he cites his own translation of BU:

...ils retirèrent des vêtements des officiers polonais, tués par eux, tous les documents portant une date postérieure à avril 1940, date à laquelle, selon la thèse provocatrice des Allemands, les Polonais auraient été tués par les Bolcheviks...

...they [the Germans] removed from the Polish officers' clothing, killed by them, all documents bearing a date after April 1940, the date on which, according to the provocative thesis of the Germans, the Poles were killed by the Bolsheviks...

Here, in de Montfort's own translation, we read that BU accuses the Germans of removing all documents dated after April 1940. But then de Montfort says this:

Comment les Allemands auraient-ils pu faire fabriquer à l'avance des documents aussi divers, aussi variés, que ceux trouvés sur les cadavres? (119)

Translated:

How could the Germans have produced in advance documents as diverse and varied as those found on corpses?

De Montfort repeats this accusation:

Si, par simple hypothèse, j'admettais momentanément la véracité de la thèse présentée par la Commission d'enquête soviétique, c'est-à-dire l'exécution, par les Allemands, des prisonniers de guerre polonais, entre septembre et décembre 1941, puis l'exhumation des cadavres de ces prisonniers en mars 1943 pour substituer de faux papiers portant des dates antérieures à avril 1940 à leurs vrais papiers portant des dates postérieures à avril 1940... (123-124)

Translated:

If, by mere hypothesis, I were to admit for a moment the veracity of the thesis presented by the Soviet Commission of Inquiry, that is to say the execution by the Germans of the Polish prisoners of war between September and December 1941, then the exhumation of the corpses of these prisoners in March 1943 to substitute false papers bearing dates before April 1940 for their real papers bearing dates after April 1940...

...les Russes ont formellement accusé les Allemands d'avoir fabriqué ces documents ... (127)

Translated:

...the Russians formally accused the Germans of having fabricated these documents ...

De Montfort accuses BU of claiming that the Germans falsified in advance the documents found on the corpses. Chapter XI of his book is titled "Impossibilité d'introduire de faux documents sur les cadavres" ("impossibility of placing false documents on the corpses").

But BU never states any such thing. Even in de Montfort's own translation BU states that the Germans removed documents later than 1940 — "retirèrent des vêtements des officiers polonais ... tous les documents portant une date postérieure à avril 1940."

De Montfort goes on to accept the claim in AM that no insects were found on the corpses:

l'absence sur un cadavre de ce que le Professeur Lacassagne appelle « Jes travailleurs de la mort » est « une indication aussi précieuse que leur présence et permet d'établir que la mort a eu lieu pendant l'hiver.»

On voudra bien se rappeler que la Commission des Représentants des Instituts de Médecine légale et de Criminologie a certifié dans son rapport qu'elle n'avait trouvé, sur Jes cadavres des fosses qu'elle avait visitées, aucune trace de ces insectes que le Professeur Lacassagne appelle « les travailleurs de la mort». (134-135)

Translated:

The absence on a corpse of what Professor Lacassagne calls "the workers of death" is "an indication as valuable as their presence and makes it possible to establish that death took place during the winter."

It will be remembered that the Commission of Representatives of the Institutes of Forensic Medicine and Criminology certified in its report that it had not found on the bodies of the graves which it had visited, any trace of these insects that Professor Lacassagne calls "the workers of death."

De Montfort is in error. In our discussion of AM we have seen that there was clear evidence of insects in the corpses examined by two of the doctors.

As a critique of BU de Montfort's chapter is both dishonest and incompetent. That Sanford believes it to be "very convincing" shows that he has been blinded by his own bias. Cienciala, to whose study we turn next, does not mention de Montfort's book at all.

Cienciala:

Anna M Cienciala; N S Lebedeva; Wojciech Materski. Katyn: a crime without punishment. New Haven: Yale University Press, "Annals of Communism" series, 2007.

This book represent the most authoritative account of the "official" version. At 561 pages it is also the longest. Hence we devote more attention to it. We will refer to it as "Cienciala."

For the next forty-seven years successive Soviet governments claimed that the Germans were guilty of the Katyn massacre. They engaged in a series of cover-ups, the most elaborate of which were the fabricated report of the Soviet Commission of Inquiry into the Katyn Massacre (the Burdenko Commission) in January 1944 and the fabricated Soviet case for German guilt at the International War Crimes Tribunal held at Nuremberg in 1945-1946. Although the Soviet charge was disproved,

German guilt was proclaimed by all Soviet and other communist governments for almost half a century. (Cienciala 2)

This claim by Cienciala is false. Cienciala cites no evidence that anything in the BU was falsified in any way, that the Soviet case at Nuremburg was "fabricated," or that "the Soviet charge was disproved."

It is worth noting that most of the locals who gave testimony to the Germans and the IMC reversed themselves under NKVD pressure when they "testified" before the Soviet State (Burdenko) Commission in January 1944. (135)

Here Cienciala employs the propaganda technique of "argument by scare quotes." The scare quotes signal that Cienciala wishes to suggest that the witness testimony to the BU was deliberately false — fabricated by the Soviets or by the witnesses themselves, perhaps after being threatened. But Cienciala has no evidence that this was so. By implication Cienciala also assumes that that the witnesses' testimony to the Germans as true — another example of "begging the question" by assuming that which should be proven, not assumed.

Nor does Cienciala have any evidence that the BU witnesses were lying. So, rather than admitting this, she uses "scare quotes" in hopes that the reader will not notice that she has no evidence to support her accusation.

Cienciala's bias could hardly be more blatant. In Cienciala's account only the Soviets "pressured" the witnesses — though she has no evidence at all that they did so. Cienciala fails to inform her readers that the BU witnesses who also testified for the Germans said that they did so because the Germans threatened and beat them. She does not put the witness testimony on behalf of the Germans into scare quotes.

The details of this NKVD preparatory work became known in 1990, when the investigators of the Russian Federation Main Military Prosecutor's Office learned that the operational workers sent from Moscow had prepared forged documents with dates later than May 1940 and placed them in the clothes of selected victims. (227)

Note 55 to this paragraph, which is on page 500 of Cienciala, reads: "On the NKVD preparation of documents and witnesses, see KD2, pp. 430-432." On p. xxiv Cienciala identifies "KD2" as the volume Katyn: Mart 1940 g.- Sentiabr 2000 g.

Here is the relevant part of that source:

[[cyrillic]]Следователи Глав ной военной прокуратуры (ГВП) Российской Федерации в начале 90-х гг. самым тщательным образом изучили методы проведения предварительного расследования, предшествовавшие работе Комиссии Н.Н. Бурденко. Они доказали, что прибывшие из Москвы оператишш1ш изготовили поддельные документы с более поздними датами, подложили их в извлеченные из могил останки, а также подготовили лжесвидетелей. (KD2 430)

Translated:

Investigators of the Main Military Prosecutor's Office (GVP) of the Russian Federation in the early 90's studied in the most painstaking manner the methods of conducting the preliminary investigation, which preceded the work of N .N. Burdenko. They proved that operatives arriving from Moscow produced counterfeit documents with later dates, put them in the remains of the graves, and prepared false witnesses.

This is an important conclusion! But KD2 gives no evidence for this statement. Cienciala, of course, knew this.

Furthermore, we know that this statement is false — a deliberate lie. Pamiatnykh has published the notes of the Burdenko investigators about the documents they found on the corpses. As we have seen one of them — that of Kozetulski — is so fragmentary that the investigators read it incorrectly, failed to recognize its importance for the Soviet case and so never used it. It is one of the pieces of our "unimpeachable evidence." It cannot have been "planted" by the Soviets.

Therefore "KD2" is lying. Cienciala should have checked this, as we have done. It is the job of every responsible scholar to double-check her sources.

According to a Soviet decree of 19 April 1943, these people were liable to the death penalty for the crime of "cooperating with the enemy," so when interrogated by NKVD officers, they agreed to say whatever they were told. (227)

There was such a decree — naturally enough. Collaboration with the enemy was illegal in every country.² But Cienciala is dishonest here as well. There is no evidence that any of the Burdenko Commission witnesses were threatened with prosecution. Moreover, by the same logic she should have discounted the testimony of the witnesses who confirmed the German version.

² For an article in Russian discussing this decree see [https://ru.wikipedia.org/wiki/\[\[cyrillic\]\]Указ_«О_мерах_наказания_для_немецко-фашистских_злodeen...»](https://ru.wikipedia.org/wiki/[[cyrillic]]Указ_«О_мерах_наказания_для_немецко-фашистских_злodeen...») For the text of the decree see: [https://ru.wikisource.org/wiki/\[\[cyrillic\]\]Указ_президиума_ВС_СССР_от_19.04.1943_№_39](https://ru.wikisource.org/wiki/[[cyrillic]]Указ_президиума_ВС_СССР_от_19.04.1943_№_39)

There are contradictions in the testimony of the witnesses in the German AM. Witness testimony to the Burdenko Commission claimed German threats and beatings. Valentin Sakharov has published the signed witness statements prepared by the Germans. All are in German, not in Russian. This corroborates the testimony of one witness that he had to sign something he did not understand. We have discussed all this in a previous chapter.

Between 5 October 1943 and 10 January 1944, NKVD investigators interrogated ninety-five persons and "verified" (that is, formulated) seventeen statements later made before the special state commission.⁵⁵ (227)³

³ Cienciala's note 55, pn p. 500, contains no evidence for this statement that the NKVD investigators "formulated" — composed, fabricated — the testimony of the witnesses they called.

More argument by scare quote! Moreover, this statement is a logical fallacy: it "begs the question" — assumes that which must be proven. Cienciala has no evidence that the witnesses' testimony was faked or the result of threats. Therefore, Cienciala is lying. Why not likewise assume the Germans threatened their witnesses?

It is not known how many of its members knew or suspected the truth at the time, but Burdenko may have done so. Shortly before his death in 1946, he reportedly admitted to a family friend—Boris Olshansky—that as a doctor, he knew the graves were four years old, which would have dated them to 1940. He also said he believed the NKVD comrades had made a "great blunder." Burdenko's daughter-in-law allegedly confirmed this statement to Yuri Zoria, son of the Soviet deputy prosecutor at the Nuremberg Trials, who died a mysterious death at Nuremberg in May 1946.⁵⁶ (228)

At note 56 (page 500) we read:

On Burdenko's admission to Boris Olshansky, Jr., see Zawodny, Death in the Forest, pp. 158 and 167 n. 57. Burdenko's daughter-in-law told Yuri Zoria that when Burdenko was very sick, he admitted that the NKVD had falsified documents, including the dates of the Katyn crime; see Inessa Jazborowska, Anatolij Jabłokow, and Jurij Zoria, Katyń: Zbrodnia Chroniona Tajemnicą Państwową [Katyn: The Crime Protected as a State Secret] (Warsaw, 1998), p. 299. This is a more popular, Polish version of the later Russian work by Inessa S. Yazhborovskaia, Anatolii Yu. Yablokov, Valentina S. Parsadanova, titled Katynskii Sindrom.

This tale is also noted by Sanford (139-140). Let's check this story.

Katyń: Zbrodnia Chroniona... p. 299:

Sam Burdenko, ciężko chory, wyznał pófoiej, że NKWD sfalszowało dokumenty, między innymi daty zbrodni katyńskiej. Potwierdziła to synowa Burdenki w rozmowie z Jurijem Zorią.

Burdenko himself, seriously ill, confessed later that the NKVD falsified documents, including the date of the Katyn massacre. This was confirmed by Burdenko's daughter-in-law in an interview with Yuri Zoria.

No source is cited for this rumor. Moreover, we know that it is false. As we have seen, Sorokina shows that Burdenko himself was firmly convinced of German guilt. Natalia Lebedeva too concludes that Burdenko believed the Germans were guilty:

[[cyrillic]]Первое заседание Комиссии открылось 13 января в 13 часов в здании Нейрохирургического института в Москве (ул. Ульио-говск0го 1 д. 19). Председательствовал Николай Бурденко, который, по всей видимости, верил в то, что катынск0е преступление было совершено гитлеровцами.

Translated:

The first session of the Commission opened on January 13 [1944] at 1300 hours in the building of the Neurosurgical institute in Moscow (Ul'ianovskii Street, 19). It was chaired by Nikolai Burdenko who, from all appearances, believed that the crime of Katyn had been perpetrated by the Hitlerites. (Lebedeva, at note 39)

Burdenko himself said none of Burdenko Commission members had any doubts of German guilt:

[[cyrillic]]В тот же день Бурденко отправил Меркулову письмо, в котором разъяснял слова Колеснишва, сказанные тем несколькими днями ранее в разговоре с наркомом. Колесников тогда заявил, что «уже найденными документами от конца 1940 года полностью опровергнута версия немцев о том, что поляки убиты русскими весной 1940 года. ... Бурденко писал, что «поэтому он (Колесников — Н.Л.) и сказал, что очень важно, если мы найдем документы более позднего периода. Так0вые к счастью и нашлись. Ни у одного из членов Комиссии не получилось ложного впечатления». Катынь 1940 — 2000. С. 512-513.

Translated:

The same day Burdenko sent a letter to Merkulov in which he explained Kolesnikov's words, spoken a few days before in conversation with the People's Commissar. Kolesnikov then stated that "the version of the Germans that the Poles were killed by the Russians in the spring of 1940 is fully refuted by the documents we have already found from the end of 1940." ... Burdenko wrote that "therefore he (Kolesnikov — N.L.) said to that it was very important to find documents dated from a later period. Fortunately, such documents have been found. Not a single one of the members of the Commission received a false impression." — Katyn' 1940-2000, pp. 512-513 (Lebedeva, note 78).

Cienciala cites Lebedeva's essay, so there is no excuse for her to have inserted this rumor that she had to know is contradicted by Lebedeva. One could hardly wish for a clearer example of the fundamental dishonesty of Cienciala's book.

The O'Malley Report

Cienciala:

Sir Owen O'Malley, ambassador to the Polish government-in-exile, had made a convincing case of Soviet guilt three years earlier in his letter of 24 May 1943 to Foreign Secretary Sir Anthony Eden and wrote a devastating critique of the Burdenko Commission report in February 1944.⁶⁶ (232)

The note to this passage:

⁶⁶ Ambassador O'Malley's letters to Foreign Secretary Eden on Katyn in May 1943 and on the Burdenko Commission Report in February 1944 were first published in January 1972, in a pamphlet titled Katyn—Dispatches of Sir Owen O'Malley to the British Government (London, 1972), with a preface by Lord Barnby, a supporter of the Polish cause, and an introduction by the American journalist Louis FitzGibbon. FitzGibbon also published them in his three books, The Katyn Cover-Up (London, 1972), Unpitied and Unknown (London, 1975), and The

Katyn Massacre (London, 1977). See also the British publications listed in the next note. (501)⁴

⁴ The O'Malley report of May 24, 1943 is available online at <http://www.polandfirsttofight.besaba.com/malley1.html> and several other places. The O'Malley report of February 11, 1944 is online at <http://www.nspm.rs/files/Owen.pdf>

O'Malley was a fanatical anticommunist as witness, for example, the ferocity of his diatribe against Stalin in his May 1943 report.⁵ In his February 1944 report, the one in which he briefly discusses BU, he states:

The Russian story gives no explanation of why in these circumstances not a single one of the Poles who were allegedly transferred from Kozielsk, Starobielsk and Ostashkov to the labour camps Nos. 1 O.N., 2 O.N., and 3 O.N. has ever been seen or heard of alive again.

⁵ See paragraph 17 of the May 1943 report.

O'Malley was the U.K. ambassador to the Polish Government-In-Exile (GIE). He accepts their version of events and repeats their reasons for rejecting the BU:

- that it was up to the USSR to explain why no Polish POWs escaped the German "round-ups" of Poles after the German capture of the camps;
- that nothing was heard from any of the Polish POWs after they were transferred out of the three POW camps;
- that the Soviet government said nothing about their transfer to Camps 1-ON, 2-ON, and 3-ON before the German announcement about Katyn in April 1943.

In reality we do not know that "nothing was heard from any of the Polish POWs after they were transferred out of the three POW camps." This is the position of the Polish Government In Exile (GIE). Did they check? If so, how? Where is the documentation of their checkup?

More important: how do we know they were telling the truth? After all, if we are going to "believe" the Polish GIE we have already abandoned objectivity and the search for the historical truth just as surely as if we had decided to "believe" the Soviet government.

Were the Germans even delivering mail from the USSR to German-occupied Poland after September 1940, when the Polish POW's mail privileges were restored? O'Malley did not know. Evidently he did not care. He simply took the word of the Polish GIE.

Far from presenting a "devastating critique" of the BU, as Cienciala claims, O'Malley made no valid criticisms at all of the BU. These are "arguments from silence." O'Malley ignores what the BU did say, and instead concentrates on what it did not say. This is precisely the argument of the Polish GIE.

"The Polish Historians' Expert Assessment"

Cienciala writes:

At the suggestion of a member of the Soviet group, Professor Oleg Rzheshesky, who wanted to delay discussion of the Katyn question, the Polish historians analyzed the Burdenko report, and in May they unexpectedly delivered to their Soviet colleagues a devastating critique that deprived it of any credibility...¹¹¹ (247)

This statement is, quite simply, false. We discuss this critique fully below.

Here is Cienciala's note to the passage above:

¹¹¹ Maciszewski, Wydrzeć Prawdę, p. 97; the author gives the Polish side of the story, while the chairman of the Soviet group, Professor Georgy Lukich Smirnov, gives his in Uroki Minuvshevo [Lessons of the Past] (Moscow, 1997). For another account of the Soviet group and its problems, see Yazhborovskaia, Yablokov, and Parsadanova, Katynskii Sindrom, chap. 4; also Jazborowska, Jablokow, and Zoria, Katyń: Zbrodnia Chroniona, chap. 2. Yazhborovskaia was a member of the Soviet group. (p. 506)

Cienciala again (248-249):

The Polish media now increased their pressure for the truth about Katyn. The Polish Party historians' devastating critique of the Burdenko Commission report of 1944, handed to their Soviet colleagues in May 1988, was summarized in the 19 August 1989 issue of Polityka. Here, Polish historians related the known history of the Katyn crime, concluded that the Burdenko Commission findings were undoubtedly false, and claimed that the NKVD bore full responsibility for the extermination of the Kozelsk prisoners at Katyn, as well as the extermination of the prisoners of Starobel'sk and Ostashkov, even though their burial sites could not be established without access to Russian documents.¹¹³

The footnote to this passage:

¹¹³ Polityka, 33/1685 (1989), pp. 13-14. For the full text of the Polish historians' expert assessment of the Burdenko Commission report, see Jarema Maciszewski, comp. and ed., Zbrodnia Katyńska: Z Prac Polskiej Części Wspólnej Komisji Partyjnych Historyków Polski i ZSRR [The Crime of Katyn: From the Work of the Polish Part of the Joint Commission of Soviet-Polish Party Historians] (Warsaw, 1990; offset); see the Russian text in Yasnova, Katynskaia Drama, pp. 179-201. (p. 506)

Sanford states the same thing (139):

The weaknesses and inconsistencies in the Burdenko Report were dissected in full in the April 1989 Report of the Polish members of the Joint Polish-Soviet Historical Commission established to examine 'Blank Spots' in their relationship.⁹⁶

n. 96 p. 153: 'Ekspertyza', Polityka, 19 August 1989, pp. 13-14.

Cienciala and Sanford cite the same issue article in Polityka. Cienciala says we can use the Russian text in Katynskaia Drama. Just to be certain, I have checked the Russian text both against the Maciszewski book Zbrodnia Katyńska: Z Prac... cited by Cienciala and against the Polish version in Polityka of August 19, 1989, which both Sanford and Cienciala cite.

Maciszewski Zbrodnia Katyńska: Z Prac... 15-36 (= 'Ekspertyza', Polityka); Katynskaia Drama pages 179-201 (Maciszewski = M; Katynskaia Drama= KD)

We saw above that Cienciala (248) also calls this a "devastating critique" of BU. This statement is false. As we shall demonstrate, what Cienciala calls "the Polish historians' expert assessment" offers no valid critique of BU at all.

It does make some interesting statements.

* M 21 point 4; KO 184:

"4. Zwłoki z grobów I-VII ubrane były w odzież zimową."

"4. The Corpses from graves I-VII were dressed in winter clothing."

That means the Polish POWs had been provided with winter clothing by the Polish Army when captured in September 1939. They would also have had it whether they were shot in April — May 1940, as the Germans claimed, or in September — December 1941, as the Soviets concluded.

No one captured in Russia — or, for that matter, Western Ukraine or Western Belorussia — would ever abandon winter clothing, no matter what time of year it was. When they were transferred from any camp to any other camp or place — say, to execution at Koz'i Gory — they would have taken their winter clothing with them. If they had no baggage — no account, German, Soviet, or Polish, says anything about baggage — they would have worn what they had.

* M 22 point 8; KO 185:

W grobach katyńskich znalazły się dokumenty osobiste pozwalające zidentyfikować 2730 zwłok na ogólną liczbę 4151. Radziecka Komisja Specjalna, dokonując ponownej ekshumacji, nie znalazła dalszych dokumentów osobistych.

Translated:

In the graves at Katyn were personal documents which made it possible to identify 2730 of the remains out of a total of 4151. The Soviet Special commission, when it carried out a second exhumation, did not find any other personal documents.

That this statement is false is obvious to us today since we now have a list of documents found by Burdenko Commission investigators and published by Pamiatnykh. But it was recognizably false in 1989 too! The final section of BU is titled "Documents Found on the Bodies." This section refers to letters, postcards, a Catholic prayer book, and receipts found. These are "personal documents."

* M 23 point 12; KD 186:

... fakt użycia w egzekucjach amunicji produkcji niemieckiej, co potem wyjaśniono masowym eksportem tej amunicji do ZSRR

(do roku 1932) oraz do Polski i krajów nadbałtyckich.

Translated:

... the fact of the use in the executions of bullets of German manufacture, which was later explained by a massive export of these bullets to the USSR (before 1932) as well as to Poland and the Baltic countries.

This too is a false claim. What's more, the writers of this chapter had to know that it is false. At the Madden Commission Hearings in 1952 Gustav Genschow, president of the company that manufactured the "Geco" ammunition that the Germans found at Katyn, said that there had been only very small sales of Geco ammunition to the USSR after 1928.

Mr. Flood [of the Commission]. Do you know what caliber of ammunition was used and what kind of pistol was used by the NKVD or the GPU from the year 1933 until the end of the war?

Mr. Genschow. No; I do not know that also, because since 1928 we did not export large quantities of pistol ammunition to Soviet Russia;

Mr. Flood. Did you export any quantities of 7.65 pistol ammunition to Soviet Russia?

Mr. Genschow. Yes; before 1928, somewhat larger amounts. But I wish to point out that at that time the stamp on the bottom of the cartridge was different from the one I stated before, and after 1928 the quantities which were exported were small.

Mr. Flood. But there were some quantities shipped to Soviet Russia after 1928, of 7.65 ammunition bearing the "Geco" trade-mark?

Mr. Genschow. Yes.

I wish to point out that the trade-mark which was used before 1933-34, when the latest trade-mark was introduced, also had the word "Geco" in it and "7.65." There was only the addition of two D's slightly underneath the right and left end of the word "Geco." (Madden V 1578-9)

On page 35 of AM we read:

Außerhalb der Gräber wurden eine Anzahl beschossener Pistolenhälsen mit dem Bodenaufdruck „Geco DD 7.65" gefunden..."

Translated:

Outside the graves were found a number of used pistol shell casings with the headstamp "Geco DD 7.65 ..."

The shells mentioned in AM were the 1928-1931 type shown in the middle drawing. Genschow said that the larger exports to the USSR were before 1928, when the word "Geco" did not appear on the shells, and were small after that, when the "Geco DD 7.65" shells were made.

The authors of "the Polish historians' expert assessment" knew this. They also knew that very few, if indeed any, of those who read their work in 1988 would have had the ability to check the Madden Commission hearings, which were at that time available only in very large libraries in the United States and which must have been much scarcer than that in Eastern Europe.

The "Vetoshnikov" question

A Major Vetoshnikov testified to the Burdenko Commission about the unsuccessful evacuation of Comp 1-ON in July 1941. "Drama" repeatedly suggests that there was no one named Vetoshnikov:

Wśród wymienianych przez nich urzędników nie było mjr. Wietosznikowa, przedstawionego jako komendanta Nr 1 — ON. (M 23; KD 187)

... z załogi ujawniony został tylko świadek mjr Wietosznikow, z którym żładen z internowanych polskich oficerów, który przeżył obozy, nie zetknął się. (M 24; KD 188)

Potwierdzeniem tego mają być zeznania bliżej nieznanego mjr Wietosznikowa, szefa obozu Nr 1 — ON. (M 27; KD 1909)

Translated:

Among the men in authority named by them [former Polish POWs] the name of Major Vetoshnikov, presented [in the BU) as the commander of camp No. 1-ON, is not mentioned.

... of the personnel [at camp 1-ON) presented there was only the witness Major Vetoshnikov, with whom not a single of the Polish officers imprisoned in the camps, had ever come into contact.

As confirmation of this were to serve the statements of a Major Vetoshnikov, commander of camp No. 1-ON, who was not known to anyone.

Writing years later, Lebedeva also claims that Vetoshnikov never existed:

[[cyrillic]]Еще одним сфальсифицированным документом был рапорт якобы начальника лагеря № 1-ОН «майора государственной безопасности» В.М. Ветошникова от 12 августа 1941 г., направленный де начальнику УПВИ «майору госбезопасности» Сопруненко.

Сам Ветошников не фигурирует ни в одном из документов УПВИ или другого управления НКВД. Тем не менее, в сообщении Специальной комиссии имеется ссылка на показания этого мифического майора госбезопасности³².

Translated:

One more falsified document was the report supposedly by the commander of camps No. 1-ON "Major of State Security" V.M. Vetoshnikov of August 12, 1941, sent, so it was said, to the commander of the UPVI "Major of State Security" Soprunenko.

Vetoshnikov himself does not figure in a single one of the documents of the UPVI or of any other directorate of the NKVD. Nevertheless, in the report of the Special commission [the BU] there is a reference to the statements of this mythical major of State Security.³²

But in footnote 32 Lebedeva says something different:

[[cyrillic]]В справке Меркулова и Кобулова он, правда, фигурирует как лейтенант госбезопасности (Военно-исторический архив. 1990. № 11. С. 29).

Translated:

In the report by Merkulov and Kobulov he [Vetoshnikov], it is true, figures as a lieutenant of State Security (Voенно-istoricheskii Arkhiv [sic!] 1990, No. 11, p. 29).

Here is that citation, from Voенно-Istoricheskii Zhurnal (not "Arkhiv") 11 (1990), p.29:

[[cyrillic]]Начальник лагеря № 1-ОН лейтенант госбезопасности Ветошников В. М., давая объяснения о судьбе порученного ему лагеря, в своём рапорте на имя началька Управления по делам военнопленных и интернированных НКВД СССР от 12 августа 1941 года пишет: «После того, как я получил от Вас указание подготовить лагерь к эвакуации, я принял к этому необходимые меры.

Translated:

The commander of camp No. 1-ON Lieutenant of State Security Vetoshnikov V.M., explaining the fate of the camp entrusted to him, in his report to the chief of the Directorate of POW and Internee Affairs (UDVI) of the NKVD of the USSR of August 12, 1941, writes: "After I received from you the order to prepare the camp for evacuation, I took the essential measures."

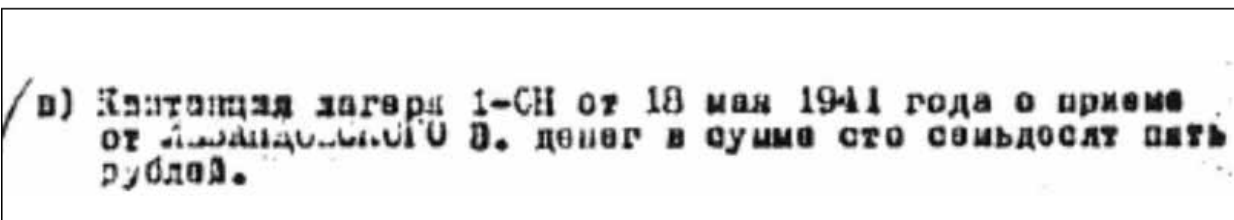

This is good evidence that Vetoshnikov did exist and was indeed the commander of Camp 1-ON in July 1941. It is not likely that, in this document marked "top secret" Merkulov and Kobulov would have fabricated the existence of this man, called him a lieutenant rather than a major, mentioned this fictional person once, and never again.

It is only necessary to assume that Vetoshnikov did not exist if one has previously also assumed that no camps 1-, 2-, and 3-ON existed. The Polish "official" version does make this assumption. But the existence of these camps is documented in the list of documents found on the corpses by the Burdenko Commission investigators and published on the Internet by Aleksei Pamiatnykh, a fervent advocate of the "official" Soviets-did-it version:

б) Квитанция лагеря 1-ОН от 6 апреля 1941 года о приеме от АРАБАЕВИЧА денег в сумме 200 руб.;

г) Квитанция лагеря 1-ОН от 5 мая 1941 года о приеме от АРАБАЕВИЧА денег в сумме сто два рубля.

The Account of Boris Men'shagin

Boris Men'shagin was a lawyer in Smolensk who was appointed Mayor by the Germans and served in that post until captured by the Soviets. According to the BU Men'shagin's notebook (bloknot) was found after the Soviets liberated Smolensk in September 1943. Some strategic passages from it are reproduced in the BU.

At the end of this Merkulov-Kobulov document we read the following:

[[[cyrillic]]]Фотоснимки с записей Меньшагина из его блокнота при этом прилагаются.

Translated:

Photocopies with Men'shagin's notes from his notebook are attached herewith.⁷

Most of these notations deal with the persecution and impending murder of Jews. Only one concerns the Polish POWs:

[[cyrillic]]13. Ходят ли среди населения слухи о расстреле польских военнопленных в Коз[ьих] Гор[ах] (Умнову).

Translated:

13. Are there any rumors among the population concerning the shooting of Polish war prisoners in Kozy Gory (for Umnov).⁸

⁷ "Bibil Iar pod Katyniu? Voенно-Istoricheskii Zhurnal 11 (1990), p. 35 col. 2.

⁸ Ibid. Also in BU 234.

Men'shagin did not write "shooting by the Germans." Perhaps someone could argue that Men'shagin might have been asking about shootings of Poles by the Soviets. The context — the rest of the note has to do with German actions — makes this very unlikely. But it speaks to the authenticity of this note by Men'shagin. If the Soviets had faked a note by Men'shagin, would they have made it so short and so laconic that it did not directly implicate the Germans? Why would the Soviets have fabricated a lengthy account of shooting of Jews by the Germans and left the question of who shot the Polish POWs to a very brief and ambiguous mention at the end?

Concerning "Umnov" BU continues as follows:

Umnov, who is mentioned in the note, was the chief of the Russian police in Smolensk during the early months of its occupation. (BU 234)

After serving a 25-years sentence for collaboration Men'shagin was released from a Soviet prison and wrote his memoirs, which were published by the YMCA Press in Paris in 1988.

If Men'shagin had affirmed what his former assistant mayor Bazilevskii had testified at Nuremberg — that Men'shagin knew that the Germans had killed the Polish prisoners — there would be no "Katyn mystery." Instead Men'shagin says that Bazilevskii's remarks "completely do not correspond to reality." But Men'shagin does say that Bazilevskii's remarks about Men'shagin's wanting to get a friend of his released from the Russian camp were accurate.

BAZILEVSKY: In the camp for Russian prisoners of war known as "Dulag 126" there prevailed such a severe regime that prisoners of war were dying by the hundreds every day; for this reason I tried to free all those from this camp for whose release a reason could be given. I learned that in this camp there was also a very well-known pedagogue named Zhiglinski. I asked Menschagin to make representations to the German Kommandantur of Smolensk, and in particular to Von Schwetz, and to plead for the release of Zhiglinski from this camp.... Menschagin answered my request with, "What is the use? We can save one, but hundreds will die." However, I insisted; and Menschagin, after some hesitation, agreed to put this request to the German Kommandantur. (Nuremberg XVII 325).

Bazilevskii testified that Men'shagin told him that the Germans had told him that the Polish POWs would be killed. Two weeks later, at the end of September, Men'shagin told him that the Germans had now killed the Poles.

In his memoirs Men'shagin responded strangely.

Эти сведения, сообщенные Базилевским, совершенно не соответствуют действительности. Случай его ходатайства за Кожуховского действительно имел место в августе 1941 года. И я возбуждал ходатайство об его освобождении, и через дня три-четыре после этого ходатайства Кожуховский лично явился, освобожденный, и находился в Смоленске после этого, имея свою пекарню все время немецкой оккупации города, а впоследствии я его видел в Минске в 44-м году, где он точно так же имел ондитерскую. Кожуховского этого я лично знал, так как он проходил свидетелем по делу хлебозавода № 2, разбиравшемуся Смоленским областным судом в марте 1939 года. (131)

Translated:

And this Bazilevsky said that he learned about the murder of the Poles from me, that in 1941 he learned that his acquaintance Kozhukhovsky was taken prisoner and was in the German camp in Smolensk. And he asked me if I could request his release. He said that I willingly agreed to this, wrote a petition and took it myself to the commandant's office. Returning from the commandant's office, I said: "Nothing will come of it, because in the commandant's office I was told that all Poles would be shot." A few days later, having come from there, I again told him: "They have already been shot." These are the facts that Bazilevsky had.

This information, reported by Bazilevsky, is completely untrue. The case of his petition for Kozhukhovsky really did take place in August 1941. And I filed a petition for his release, and three or four days after this petition, Kozhukhovsky personally appeared, released, and was in Smolensk after that, running his bakery all during the time of the German occupation of the city, and subsequently I saw him in Minsk in '44, where he also had a confectionery. I knew this Kozhukhovsky personally, as he had been a witness in the case of Bakery No. 2, which the Smolensk Regional Court had examined in March 1939.

The editors of Men'shagin's memoirs note that there is no record of any Kozhukhovskii, whereas Zheglinskii (with an "e" instead of an "i"), the name cited by Bazilevskii, is known. Zheglinskii was released from the German camp "undoubtedly through the efforts of Men'shagin." Zheglinskii became involved in the pro-Soviet underground, was found out by the Germans, and killed in September 1942 (226-227). Either Men'shagin's memory about these events was not good or he was dissimulating for some reason.

As for our main interest, the deaths of the Polish POWs, Men'shagin claimed that, when he was interrogated by NKVD investigators during his imprisonment first in Smolensk and later in the Lubianka prison, he had told them that he did not know who had killed the Poles. (132) But the editors of his memoirs set forth evidence that this is not the full story either.

In 1970 Men'shagin, while still in a Soviet prison, was called as a witness in the case of a certain Sviatoslav Karavanskii, who was charged with anti-Soviet agitation and propaganda. Karavanskii had written a "testament" and "farewell" in Men'shagin's name but without telling Men'shagin about this. In them he had stated that the Soviets had murdered the Poles.

At Karavanskii's trial Men'shagin testified as follows:

[[cyrillic]]Свидетель Меньшагин Б.Г. Показал, что связи с заключенным Караванским он не поддерживал и писать от своего имени провокационные заявления по так называемому «Катынскому делу» Караванскому не поручал. Далее Меньшагин пояснил, что ему как бывшему бургомистру города Смоленска обстоятельства уничтожения польских военнопленных офицеров в 1941 году не известны, однусо он убежден, что польские военнопленные были расстреляны немецкими фашистами. (149-150)

Translated:

Witness Men'shagin B.G. testified that he had no connection to the prisoner Karavanskii and did not ask Karavanskii to write in his [Men'shagin's] name the provocational declarations about the so-called "Katyn affair." Men'shagin further explained that he, the former mayor of the city of Smolensk, did not know the circumstances of the annihilation of the Polish officer POWs in 1941. However he was convinced that the Polish POWs had been shot by the German fascists.

Men'shagin claimed that he did not know the circumstances of the murder of the Poles but was convinced that the Germans had done it. This statement is consistent with Men'shagin's statement in his memoir. It also does not contradict point 13 in his notebook that he was asked to report to Umnov whether there was "rumors among the population about the shootings of Polish POWs in Koz'i Gory."

Stanisław Kuczynski

In criticism of BU's account of bodies with documents dated after May 1940 Maciszewski writes:

Jeden z tych dowodów to nie wysłana, kartka pocztowa, napisana z datą 20 czerwca 1941 r., a nadawcą miał być Stanisław Kuźnyski. W istocie rotmistrz tego imienia i nazwiska, wnuk emigranta polskiego, jednego z organizatorów armii tureckiej, przebywał wprawdzie w obozie starobielskim, ale już w listopadzie 1939 r. wywieziony został w nieznanym kierunku, zaginął o nim wszelki śluch. (33)

Translated:

One of these pieces of evidence is an unsent postcard dated June 20, 1941, the author [literally "sender"] of which was Stanisław Kuczynski. In fact a colonel of cavalry ("rotmistr" in Russian, "rotmistrz" in Polish) with this first and last name, the nephew of a Polish emigrant, one of the organizers of the Turkish army really was in the Starobel'sk camp, but he had been sent out of it in November 1939 to an unknown destination, after which nothing is known about him.

This is another deliberate deception. For indeed there is another Stanisław Kuczyński listed as killed in the Katyn murders. He was a prisoner at Ostashkov. In his Ostashkov list Tucholski records the following (314 col. 1)

Kuczyński Stanisław

Ur. 31.3.1908, s. Antoniego i Stanisławy.

Funkcj. PP, posterunek Pruszków, pow. Warszawa. Prawdop. Ostaszków.

The Soviet transit lists record that Stanislaw Kuczyński was No. 87 in list 037/3, transferred from Ostashkov on April 20, 1940. (Tucholski p. 851 #87):

[[cyrillic]]87. КУЛЖИНСКОГО Станислава Антоновича, 1908 г.р.

Maciszewski's book is early; perhaps he did not know this. But Cienciala had to be aware that this Stanislaw Kuczynski was a prisoner at Ostashkov and that the finding of this 1941 document of his at Katyn constitutes a serious blow to the "official" version, according to which all Ostashkov prisoners were shot at Kalinin and buried at Mednoe. No doubt this is the reason that she withholds this information from her readers.

Tucholski also records the "Turkish" Stanislaw Kuczynski mentioned in "drama" at Starobel'sk. (939) This was a different man.

[[cyrillic]]1414. КУЧИНСКИЙ-ИСКИНДЕР БЕЙ Станислав Стан.
1903

It appears that like Cienciala the authors of "Drama" wanted to conceal the fact that the body of an Ostashkov prisoner was found at Katyn, and therefore had not been shot by the Soviets NKVD at Kalinin, as the "official" version demands.

Jan Załuska

Maciszewski writes:

Są w spisie ewidencyjnym pomyłki czy fałszerstwa; m.in. znalazł się na liście niemieckiej jeden dziś żyjący (Remigiusz Bierzanek) i kilku zamordowanych w okupowanym kraju (np. Płk Jan Załuska), ale nie podważa to wiarygodności podstawowego zestawu nazwisk ofiar. (M 34)

Translated:

In the said list there are errors or falsifications. In particular, in the German list there occur: one person living today (Remigiusz Bierżanek) and several men killed in occupied Poland (for example, Colonel Jan Żaluszka). However, this does not undermine the reliability of the basic list of victims' names.

For the sake of space we will not examine the case of Remigiusz Bierżanek. Everyone agrees that he was put on the list of Katyn victims when in fact he was alive and well in Poland.⁹

⁹ See Witold Stankiewicz, "Jak żyjący Remigiusz Henryk Bierżanek znalazł się na liście ofiar katyńskich (Głosa do pracy Czesława Madajczyka, Dramat katyński, Warszawa 1989)." Dzieje Najnowsze XXVIII, No. 4 (1995), 127-130.

But we will consider the case of Jan Żaluszka. The text mentions "several [POWs in the German list] killed in occupied Poland (for example, Colonel Jan Żaluszka)." He is cited in Tucholski as a Kozel'sk prisoner (626 #82):

[[[cyrillic]]]82. ЗАЛУСКА Яна Александровича, 1889 г.р.

Żaluszka Jan Ur. 25.5.1889, s. Aleksandra. Płk piech. sł. st., dowódca obrony plot. DOK II, legionista. PCK (AM) Nr 03488. (Tuch. 255 col. 1-2)

He is in AM on p. 257:

3488. Żaluszka, Jan, Oberst, geb. 25. 6. 89, wohnh.: Lublin.

Postsparbuch, Visitenkarten, Orden „Virtuti-militari”.

The author of this 1988 document, Jarema Maciszewski, says that he knows not only about Bierżanek and Żaluszka but about "several" men who are on the German list but were not killed at Katyn but, rather, in occupied Poland. Unfortunately he identifies only Żaluszka.

After the publication of Maciszewski's book Żaluszka goes unmentioned in the accounts of the "official" version of Katyn. He is listed in the official

"Katyn Cemetery Book" (p. 723) without any indication that he was not shot at Katyn:

Płk Jan ZUŁUSKA s. Aleksandra i Agnieszki Kawalków, ur. 25 V 1889 w majątku Rachodoszcze, pw. zamojski. Żołnierz I i III Brygady Leg. Uczestnik bitwy pod Kostiuchnówką. Cemetery book entry recreated based upon original entry.

Col. Zaluska is also in Gur'ianov, Ubity v Katyni (2013) on p. 338:

There is no mention here either of his being killed in occupied Poland, as stated in the text recommended by Cienciala.

Cienciala and Sanford certainly knew about this claim of Maciszewski's that Col. Zaluska and other men named in the German AM list were in fact not killed at Katyn but in occupied Poland. But they do not mention it. Why? Why, for example, don't they contest it? They could have claimed that Maciszewski was mistaken, and explained what they believed the real situation to be.

Certainly the Polish proponents of the "official" Soviets-did-it version must have discussed this potentially embarrassing statement by Maciszewski. But they pass over it in silence. This suggests that they do not want anyone to notice it. That is quite likely. An admission that Maciszewski was mistaken would require investigation into what the basis of his statement was. It is yet another admission that the German AM list is not correct.

But the whole "official" version rests upon the reliability of the German AM! Logically a reader would conclude that if Zaluska and "several others" on the German AM list, including Remigiusz Bierzanek, were not shot at Katyn, others on the German AM list might not have been shot there either. Such an admission would threaten to dismantle the "official" version of Katyn.

Alternatively, Cienciala and Sanford could suggest that Maciszewski's statement is incorrect. But that would call into question Cienciala's repeated claim that Maciszewski's document is a "devastating critique" of the BU.

In either case, Cienciala's and Sanford's silence about this statement by Maciszewski, which counters their claims, is intriguing. It is certainly a sign that they wish to hide something.

False charge of falsification

Maciszewski states:

Czy dokumenty tysięcy ofiar mogły zostać generalnie sfałszowane, jak mogłoby wynikać z "Komunikatun Komisji Specjalnej?

Translated:

Was it possible [for the Germans] to falsify the documents of thousands of victims, as that can be inferred from the Report of the Special commission [that is, BU]?

De Montfort made the same false accusation. As we have already shown, BU does not at all imply that the Germans "falsified documents of thousands of victims." Rather, BU implies that the Germans took from the corpses all the documents they could find that were dated after April-May 1940.

Moskovskaia's BU statement

Burdenko Commission witness A. M. Moskovskaia stated that she hid an escaped Soviet POW named Nikolai Yegorov in her shed and fed him. Yegorov told Moskovskaia that he and other Soviet POWs were assigned to take all the documents out of the pockets of the corpses at Katyn and then replace them. Yegorov was captured by the Germans. When interrogated by them Moskovskaia told the Germans that she knew nothing of the Soviet POW's presence in her shed and was released.

"Drama" states the following about Moskovskaia's testimony:

Zeznanie A.M. Moskowskiej powtarzajcice relację M. Jegorowa, radzieckiego jeńca wykorzystanego rzekomo przy obróbce trupów, nie jest przekonywajcice i nie ma potwierdzenia w innych zeznaniach. (M 35)

Translated:

The testimony of A.M. Moskovskaia, which repeated the account of M. Egorov, a Soviet prisoner, who was allegedly employed in work with the corpses, is unconvincing and is not confirmed by other testimony.

It is true that Moskovskaia's story is not directly confirmed. But that does not mean it is false. Rather, it suggests an important question: Can anything in the Burdenko Commission testimony be independently confirmed? The answer is: Yes.

Testimony that the Germans Trucked In Bodies from Elsewhere

Testimony that the Germans had trucked towards Katyn corpses from other sites is given in BU by three witnesses: P.F. Sukhachev, Vladimir Afanasievich Yegorov, and Frol Maximovich Yakovlev-Sokolov. (BU 241-242)

This is confirmed by four archival documents cited by Valentin Sakharov from Soviet partisan groups attesting to reports by escaped Red Army POWs that the Germans had dug up bodies from a Smolensk cemetery, including bodies of Red Army soldiers killed in the defense of Smolensk in 1941, and trucked them to Katyn. Three reports are dated late July 1943. All four documents report the same thing. In a previous chapter we examined a document that we independently verified by obtaining a photocopy directly from the State Library of the Smolensk Oblast'.

Evaluating this evidence

The partisan reports do confirm the testimony of the three witnesses recorded in the BU. No objective student would conclude that the partisan reports are a fabrication, concocted by the Soviets in a far-sighted attempt to provide documentation for a future attempt to counter the German AM. The paragraphs cited occupy less than a page in a 10-page long report of partisan activities. In July 1943 the Germans were still in Smolensk and also in Katyn, which is about 25 miles to the west of Smolensk. The partisans were still engaged in fighting the German occupation. Smolensk was not liberated until September 25, 1943.

Yet if one does not take the position — unsupported by any evidence — that the partisan reports are fabrications, the genuineness of the German AM is destroyed. And this confirms other evidence that negates any claim to evidentiary validity of the German AM.

Therefore, the partisan reports are confirmatory evidence that the German AM has been seriously falsified and is not valid evidence for the "official" version of Katyn. At the same time, the partisan reports are confirmatory evidence in favor of the credibility of BU.

Conclusion about Maciszewski and "The Polish Historians' Expert Assessment"

Cienciala calls this essay a "devastating critique of the Burdenko Commission report." (248; 337; n. 113 p. 506) Sanford (139) echoes this claim. But this claim is entirely without validity.

It is hard to believe that Cienciala and Sanford could really have believed that this document was any kind of critique of the BU, let alone a "devastating" one. But a powerful desire to believe and remain loyal to a preconceived idea — in this case, the "official" version of Katyn — can cloud the reason of otherwise intelligent persons. If one's bias dictates that the "official" version must be true, has to be true, than it follows that the BU must be false.

It appears that Cienciala and Sanford were deliberately deceiving their readers, counting on the fact that not one in a thousand would study this essay, whether in Maciszewski's book, in Polityka, in Dramat Katyński, or in Russian in "Katynskaia drama" in order to check to see whether their statements about it were accurate. So one might conclude that Cienciala and Sanford are deliberately lying, deceiving their readers.

But I think it is also possible that, blinded by their bias, they saw what they wanted to see, like the onlookers in the story "The Emperor's New Clothes." Or, perhaps, both. Whatever the case may be, their works are a good negative example of how a lack of devotion to objectivity, to discovering the truth no matter whose preconceived ideas are shattered, ruins any possibility of good research.

Kathleen Harriman's Letter

During the Burdenko Commission investigations Kathleen Harriman went to Katyn with her father Averell Harriman, U.S. ambassador to the USSR. On January 28, 1943, she wrote a long account of her trip in a letter to her sister Mary and to Pamela Churchill:

The Katyn Forest turned out to be a small measly pine tree woods. We were shown the works by a big Soviet doctor who looked like a chef in white peaked cap, white apron, and rubber gloves. With relish he showed us a sliced Polish brain carefully placed on a dinner plate for inspection purposes. And then we began a tour to each and every one of the seven graves. We must have seen a good many thousand corpses or parts of corpses, all in varying degrees of decomposition, but smelling about as bad. (Luckily I had a cold, so was less bothered by the stench than others.) Some of the corpses had been dug up by the Germans in the spring of '43 after they'd first launched their version of the story. These were laid in neat orderly rows, from six to eight bodies deep. The bodies in the remaining graves had been tossed in every which way. All the time we were there, the regular work of exhuming continued by men in army uniform. Somehow I didn't envy them! The most interesting thing, and the most convincing bit of evidence, was that every Pole had been shot through the back of the head with a single bullet. Some of the bodies had their hands tied behind their backs, all of which is typically German. Next on the program we were taken into post mortem tents. These were hot and stuffy and smelt to high heaven. Numerous post mortems were going on, each and every body is given a thorough going over, and we witnessed several ... personally. I was amazed at how whole the corpses were. Most still had hair. Even I could recognize their internal organs and they still had a good quantity of red colored "firm" meat on their thighs ... You see, the Germans say that the Russians killed the Poles back in '40, whereas the Russians say the Poles weren't killed until the fall of '41, so there's quite a discrepancy in time. Though the Germans had ripped open the Poles' pockets, they'd missed some written documents. While I was watching, they found one letter dated the summer of '41, which is damned good evidence.¹⁰

¹⁰ Quoted in Goeffrey Roberts, "The Wartime Correspondence of Kathleen Harriman." Harriman Magazine, Winter, 20015, p. 18.

She must be referring to the Stanislaw Kuczynski letter:

9. On body No. 53: An unmailed postcard in the polish [sic] language addressed Warsaw Bagatelia 15, apartment 47, to Irene Kuczinska, and dated June 20, 1941. The sender is Stanislaw Kuczinski. (BU 246-247)

Kathleen Harriman repeated this in the formal report she made after visiting Katyn:

Despite the thoroughness of the pocket ripping by the Germans, out of the seven hundred corpses the Commission have so far investigated 146 items have been found. The earliest date was found on a postcard—March 1940—and the latest—an unmailed postcard dated June 20, 1941. (Madden Vol. 7 p. 2138)

Averell Harriman confirmed this in his memoirs published in 1975.¹¹

¹¹ W. Averell Harriman and Elie Abel. Special Envoy to Churchill and Stalin 1941-1946. New York: Random House, 1975, p. 302.

At the Congressional Madden Commission hearings held in 1952 — a blatantly anticommunist affair that set out to prove the Soviets guilty — Kathleen Harriman (here called by her married name, Kathleen H. Mortimer) did not admit that she had personally seen the document in question removed from the corpse.

Mr. Machrowicz. But these exhibits that you referred to as having been found on the corpses, were not taken from the corpses in your presence, they were in a museum at the time?

Mrs. Mortimer. That is right—in Smolensk, which was some distance away.

There is no reason to think that Kathleen Harriman lied in the letter to her sister and to Pamela Churchill of January 1944. Rather, there is every reason to suppose that at the Madden Committee she bent her testimony to the winds of the Cold War, which were blowing hard in 1952. Her father does not mention his daughter's Madden Commission testimony in his memoir account.

Sanford states:

The silly Harriman girl, however, allowed herself to be used by Roosevelt and the State Department, subsequently, in support of the thesis of German guilt. (139)

To call Harriman's report "silly" is a dishonest attempt at an ad hominem argument. Kathleen Harriman's report of January 1944 is quite critical of the Soviet attempt to persuade the correspondents and others present, and rather skeptical of the Soviet performance in general. She was certainly no "dupe."

Neither Cienciala nor Sanford can explain the documents found on the corpses except to suggest that they were "planted." We have demonstrated that the Koziatulski documents could not have been planted, and that this fact strongly suggests that the rest of the documents found on the bodies by the Burdenko Commission investigators are also genuine.

Conclusion on the Burdenko Commission

Both Cienciala and Sanford claim that the BU has been refuted. This is a false claim. There have been several attempts to refute it. All are incompetent, dishonest, or both, and can be shown to falsify and prevaricate, as we have done here.

In reality, BU has never been disproven on any essential points. It remains the single most accurate account to date of the mass murders of Polish prisoners at the Katyn (Koz'i Gory) site.

Chapter 11. Nuremberg, the Madden Commission

Nuremberg

Dr Marko Markov of Bulgaria had been one of the medical experts in the team assembled by the Germans to go to Katyn and endorse their version of events. He testified at the Nuremberg trials on July 1, 1946.

Cienciala:

...three witnesses were heard for the prosecution: the former deputy mayor of Smolensk, Boris Bazilevsky, a professor of astronomy; the Bulgarian forensic medicine expert Professor Anton Marko Markov, who had testified in support of Soviet guilt in 1943 but now testified in support of German guilt; and Victor Prozorovsky, a Soviet professor of forensic medicine and a member of the Burdenko Commission.
(232)

The statement in boldface above is false. Markov did not "testify in support of Soviet guilt in 1943." Here is everything that Markov stated in the German Report (AM):

Aus den Zeugenaussagen, den bei den Leichen aufgefundenen Briefschaften, Tagebüchern, Zeitungen usw. ergibt sich, daß die Erschießungen in den Monaten März und April 1940 stattgefunden haben. (118)

Translated:

From the witness testimony and the correspondence, diaries, newspapers, etc. found on the corpses, it follows that the shootings took place in the months of March and April 1940.

This is not testimony of any kind, let alone scientific testimony based on examination of any of the corpses. At Nuremberg Markov stated that he neither spoke to any of the witnesses nor read any of the documents. Here he and the other scientists simply repeated what the Germans clearly demanded from them.

Here is Markov's only conclusion in the German Report based on his examination of a corpse:

Wegen der teilweisen Verseifung der Leiche muß man annehmen, daß der Tod um mehr als 1 Jahr zurückliegt. (128)

Translated:

Because of the partial saponification of the corpse, one must assume that death had occurred more than one year earlier.

"More than one year" could indicate either German or Soviet guilt. We shall see below that Markov really thought that the body could not have been buried for more than 18 months. He could hardly write this when he was at the mercy of the Germans. And even if, careless of his own safety, he had done so, the Germans certainly would not have printed it.

Cienciala had to know all this. It is hard to avoid the conclusion that she was deliberately lying here. She had studied the German report, so she knew that Markov had never "testified in support of Soviet guilt."

But Cienciala says nothing about the testimony of any of the three Nuremberg witnesses who supported German guilt at Katyn. In particular she has nothing to say about Markov's testimony, which is indeed devastating — but to the "official" version, not the Soviet, case.

Markov's Nuremberg Testimony¹

¹ Markov's testimony is in Trial of the Major War Criminals Vol. XVII. It is available online: <http://avalon.law.yale.edu/imt/07-01-46.asp> (towards the end) and <http://avalon.law.yale.edu/imt/07-02-46.asp>

In his Nuremberg testimony Markov dispelled any illusions about the supposedly scientific evidence given in the report by the medical experts called to Katyn by the Germans.

1. Only eight corpses in all were examined.

The only part of our activity which could be characterized as a scientific, medico-legal examination were the autopsies carried out by certain members of the commission who were themselves medico-legal experts; but there were only seven or eight of us who could lay claim to that qualification, and as far as I recall only eight corpses were opened. Each of us operated on one corpse, except Professor Hájek, who dissected two corpses. Our further activity during these 2 days consisted of a hasty inspection under the guidance of Germans. It was like a tourists' walk during which we saw the open graves; ...

2. The scientific team never examined any of the documents from the graves.

The documents which we saw in the glass cases had already been removed from the bodies before we arrived ... We did not carry out any scientific examination of these papers. As I have already told you, these papers were exhibited in glass cases and we did not even touch them.

3. Markov concluded that the bodies had been buried for no more than 12-18 months.

MR. COUNSELLOR SMIRNOV: I would like you to answer the following question. Did the medico-legal investigations testify to the fact that the corpses had been in the graves already for 3 years?

MARKOV: As to that question I could judge only from the corpse on which I myself had held a post mortem. The condition of this corpse, as I have already stated, was typical of the average condition of the Katyn corpses. These corpses were far removed from the stage of disintegration of the soft parts, since the fat was only beginning to turn into wax. In my opinion these corpses were buried for a shorter period of time than 3 years. I considered that the corpse which I dissected had been buried for not more than 1 year or 18 months.

... Yes, quite right. I had the impression that they had been buried for not more than a year and a half. (Trial 337-8)

4. Markov could not say this while at Katyn because it would have contradicted the German version.

MR. COUNSELLOR SMIRNOV: Was a deduction contained in the record you made regarding the autopsy?

MARKOV: My record of the autopsy contained only a description without any conclusion.

MR. COUNSELLOR SMIRNOV: Why?

MARKOV: Because from the papers which were given to us there I understood that they wanted us to say that the corpses had been in the ground for 3 years ... Inasmuch as the objective deduction regarding the autopsy I performed was in contradiction with this version, I did not make any deductions.

MR. COUNSELLOR SMIRNOV: Consequently you did not make any deduction because the objective data of the autopsy testified to the fact that the corpses had been in the ground, not 3 years, but only 18 months?

MARKOV: Yes, that is quite correct.

MARKOV: Most of the members of the delegation who performed the autopsies in the Katyn wood made their deductions without answering the essential question regarding the time the corpses had been buried ... The only one who gave a definite statement in regard to the time the corpses had been buried was Professor Miloslavich from Zagreb, and he said it was 3 years. However, when the German book regarding Katyn was published, I read the result of his impartial statement regarding the corpse on which he had performed the autopsy. I had the impression that the corpse on which he had performed the autopsy did not differ in its stage of decomposition from the other corpses. This led me to think that his statement that the corpses had been in the ground for 3 years did not coincide with the facts of his description.

Dr. Ferenc Orsós and his Notion of "Pseudocallus"

Dr Ferenc Orsós was the only medical expert whom the Germans called both to Katyn and to Vinnitsa, the Ukrainian city where the Germans staged a similar exhumation with expert witnesses and a report.

We noted above that Orsós was "pro-German." In fact he was a pro-Nazi fanatic. According to István Deák, himself a very anticommunist historian:

Orsós was not only a medical expert but also an outright fascist and an anti-Semite, who demanded that there be no Jewish doctors at all in a profession about one half of whose members were Jews. Nor was Professor Orsós satisfied with fighting the Jewish threat.

On July 18, 1941, during a debate in the Hungarian Upper House on the third anti-Jewish Law forbidding marriage as well as sexual intercourse between Jews and Christians, Orsós demanded that the ban be extended to marriage and intercourse between Gypsies and Hungarians. In presenting his case, Orsós used the typical National Socialist argument that while "pure" Gypsies were Aryans and therefore members of an acceptable race, Gypsies of mixed blood turned out to be the worst criminals, and therefore their procreation must be stopped. As we know, the SS deported and killed during the war mostly such Gypsies whom it judged to be of mixed racial heritage.

Unfortunately for Orsós, the largely aristocratic members of the Upper House made fun of his argument, and did not take action against Gypsy-Hungarian love affairs. Nor was the anti-Nazi Minister of Interior Ferenc Keresztes-Fischer amenable to Orsós's call that Jewish doctors be kept away from christian patients. Jewish doctors remained free to treat Christian patients until after the German occupation of Hungary on March 19, 1944. Orsós and the MONE then submitted to the Gestapo a list of Jewish doctors, many of whom died as a result.

As in Nazi Germany, the Hungarian medical profession was heavily Nazified, whereas the legal profession, for instance, remained considerably more independent throughout the war.

One might think that Professor Orsós deserved some punishment for his deeds, perhaps even the execution that, according to Professor Thuróczy, was his regrettable fate. In fact, however, Orsós was not executed. On December 6 1 1944, he left Budapest with the retreating German army and settled in Halle am Saale, from where he moved to the University of Mainz in West Germany in 1946. There he lived as a respected Professor of Artistic Anatomy until his retirement in 1955. Orsós died in Mainz on July 25, 1962.²

² Letter to the editor, New York Review of Books, March 24, 1994.

This criminal history did not prevent the Madden Commission from calling the Nazi Orsós as a witness.

Neither Cienciala, nor Sanford — nor, to my knowledge, any of the other works that set forth the "official" Soviets-did-it version of Katyn — even mention Orsós' Nazi collaboration. To do so would compromise the supposed "objectivity" of the conclusions of the medical commission, headed by Orsós, which was called by the Nazis to Katyn.

It is clear from AM that Orsós was summoned because of a single article he had published in a Hungarian medical journal in 1941. In it he concluded that the presence in the skull of a corpse of a hard substance he called "pseudocallus," formed from the decomposition of brain matter, proved that the skull had been buried for at least three years.³ This fact, and even the word "pseudocallus" itself, was unknown to Markov and, Markov believed, to all the other scientists as well.

SMIRNOV: [Turning to the witness.] Were there many skulls with signs of so-called pseudocallus shown to the members of the commission? Will you please give an exact explanation of this term of Professor Orsós.

MARKOV: Professor Orsós spoke to us regarding pseudocallus at a general conference of the delegates. That took place on 30 April, in the afternoon, in the building where the field laboratory of Dr. Butz in Smolensk was located.

Professor Orsós described the term pseudocallus as meaning some sediment of indissoluble salt, of calcium, and other salts on the inside of the cranium. Professor Orsós stated that, according to his observations in Hungary, this happened if the corpses have been in the ground for at least 3 years. When Professor Orsós stated this at the scientific conference, none of the delegates said anything either for or against it. I deduced from that that this term pseudocallus was as unknown to the other delegates as it was to me.

MR. COUNSELLOR SMIRNOV: Tell me this, please. Did you notice any pseudocallus on the skulls of the corpses on which you and your colleagues performed autopsies?

MARKOV: On the skull of the corpse on which I performed an autopsy, there was some sort of pulpy substance in place of the brain, but I never noticed any sign of pseudocallus. The other delegates after the explanation of Professor Orsós likewise did not state that they had found any pseudocallus in the other skulls. Even Butz⁴ and his co-workers, who had examined the corpses before our arrival, did not mention any sign of pseudocallus.

Later on, in a book which was published by the Germans and which contained the report of Butz, I noticed that Butz referred to pseudocallus in order to give more weight to his statement that the corpses had been in the ground for 3 years.

MR. COUNSELLOR SMIRNOV: That is to say, that of the 11,000 corpses only one skull was submitted to you which had pseudocallus?

MARKOV: That is quite correct.

decalcification, callus, and pseudocallus on bones.") I obtained this article from George F. Smith Library of Rutgers University Medical School in Newark, NJ. My thanks to my friend Laszlo Berkowitz, who orally translated this article for me in 1988. Since then I have located and studied this article in its German translation from 1954: F. The Conditions under which Markov Signed the Report

Markov stated that he felt he had no choice but to sign the report.

MR. COUNSELLOR SMIRNOV: Yes, Mr. President.

I would ask you, Witness, to interrupt the reply to this question and to answer the following one: At the time you signed this general report of the commission, was it quite clear to you that the murders were perpetrated in Katyn not earlier than the last quarter of 1941, and that 1940, in any case, was excluded.

MARKOV: Yes, this was absolutely clear to me and that is why I did not make any deductions in the minutes which I made on my findings in the Katyn wood.

MARKOV: Around noon we arrived at the airport which was called Bela. The airport was apparently a military airfield because of the temporary military barracks I saw there. We had dinner there and immediately after dinner, notwithstanding the fact that we were not told that the signing of the minutes would take place on the way to Berlin, we were submitted copies of the protocol for signature. During the signing a number of military persons were present, as there were no other people except military personnel on this airfield. I was rather struck by the fact that on the one hand the records were already completed in Smolensk but were not submitted to us for signing there, and on the other hand that they did not wait till we arrived in Berlin a few hours later. They were submitted to us for signing at this isolated military airfield. This was the reason why I signed the report, in spite of the conviction I had acquired during the autopsy which I had performed at Smolensk.

MR. COUNSELLOR SMIRNOV: That is to say, the date and the locality which are shown in the protocol are incorrect?

MARKOV: Yes, that is so.

DR. STAHLER: Did you consider the task you had to carry out there a political one or a scientific one?

Markov Noted that the German Report Lied about Insect Remains

We have already noted the issue of insect remains as one of the many contradictions in the German Report (AM). Markov noted this too.

MARKOV: As to the insects and their larvae, the assertion of the general report that none were discovered is in flagrant contradiction to the conclusions of Professor Palmieri, which are recorded in his personal minutes concerning the corpse which he himself dissected. In this protocol, which is published in the same German White Book, it is said that there were traces of remains of insects and their larvae in the mouths of the corpses.

Markov Testified He Had Signed the Report Under Duress

DR. STAHLER: Witness, at the beginning of my examination you stated that you were fully aware of the political significance of your task. Why, then, did you desist from protesting against this report which was not in accord with your scientific conviction?

MARKOV: I have already said that I signed the protocol as I was convinced that the circumstances at this isolated military airfield offered no other possibility, and therefore I could not make any objections.

DR. STAHLER: Why did you not take steps later on?

MARKOV: My conduct after the signing of the protocol corresponds fully to what I am stating here, I repeat. I was not convinced of the truth of the German version... Because of the political situation in which we found ourselves at that moment, I could not make a public statement declaring the German version was wrong.

There is no evidence that Markov was "forced" to testify at Nuremberg. If he had wanted to do so he could have claimed political asylum while he was in West Germany. He did not, so there is no reason to think that his testimony at Nuremberg was compelled in any way. Markov states repeatedly that he felt compelled to sign the report in AM which concluded that the Katyn corpses had been buried three years earlier although this contradicted his own view.

Cienciala certainly knew that Markov's testimony was indeed devastating — but to the German and Polish anticommunist version that the Soviets were guilty. If Cienciala had been an objective, responsible historian she would have examined Markov's testimony, conceded that it contradicts the "official" version, and moved on. Instead, she dishonestly conceals this from her readers, who will not know it.

Hájek

Cienciala does not mention Dr. František Hájek's testimony at all! His name does not even appear in her book. Yet Hájek, a member of the German Commission, published a book with his criticisms of the German Report:

František Hájek Důkazy Katynské [Katyn Evidence]. [Praha], [Spolek českých lékařů], [1946]⁵

⁵ OCLC #14747046 It can be downloaded in a dual-language Russian-Czech side by side version at http://katynbooks.narod.ru/Hájek/Hájek_rus_cz.html

Hájek repeated the main points of this 1945 book in shorter form in an interview of March 9, 1952 in the Czech newspaper Lidova demokracie, in which he criticized the US Congress's Madden Commission hearings. It was reprinted in the Soviet newspaper Pravda on March 12, 1952.⁶

⁶ The Russian translation of this article was reprinted in the Soviet journal Voенно-Istoricheskii Zhurnal 8 (1991) pp. 68-69, now online at http://www.katyn-books.ru/archive/vizh/1991-08_01.html

Hájek's criticism of the German AM could accurately be described as "devastating." Neither Cienciala nor Sanford discuss it or Markov's critiques of the German report. Neither Hájek's book nor his interview have been published in English translation.

Some sources claim that Hájek was arrested by Soviet authorities and forced to write the book in which he refutes the German report. I can find no evidence that this happened. Evidently, Hájek himself never made this claim, for surely the anticommunist Czech writers on Katyn would have mentioned it. But Hájek did claim that he acted out of fear of the Germans, both at Katyn and upon his return to German-occupied Czechoslovakia.

Here I reproduce a few quotations from Hájek's book and his 1952 article that show how damaging Hájek's testimony is to the "official" version of Katyn.

Snad nekdo namítne, že moje úvaha nemá také významu, ponevadž z vdecnosti k Rusum, kteri nás národ osvobodili, nemohu jinak mluvíti. Mne však jde o to, aby historik, který by chtel otazku katynskou resiti, mel podklad v duvodech, které uvedu. Kdybych mlcel, zdálo by se, že souhlasím s Nemci a že tedy trvam na svem podpisu, t. j. na tom, že popravy polskych dustojniku byly provedeny na jare 1940. (6)

Translated:

Perhaps some may argue that my idea is not important because, in gratitude to the Russians who liberated our nation, I cannot speak otherwise. But my point is that the historian who would like to solve the issue of Katyn, has a basis in evidence that I will cite. If I had remained silent, it would seem that I agree with Germans and maintain with my signature [on the expert report in AM], i.e. the fact that executions of Polish officers were carried out in the spring of 1940.

Ve výpovedi tohoto svedka je plno rozporu. Jiní svedkové udávali, že lesík byl ohrazen 2 m vysokym dratem, že byl strežen ozbrojenou stráží a nikdo nemel do neho prfstupu. Tento svedek tvrdí, že v okolí zámku se nesmely v ony dny sbíratí houby. Ostatne je težko veriti, že by v dub nu nebo v kvetnu v tech místech rostly houby. Také je nepravdepodobne, že by ze vzdálenosti 50 m vecer nebo v noci mohl rozpoznati typicky židovské obliceje. (10)

In the confessions of this witness there were many contradictions. Other witnesses testified that the little woods was secured by two-meter barbed wire, guarded by armed men, and that no one could enter it. This witness asserts that around the castle in those days one could gather mushrooms. Also, it is hard to believe that in April or May there were mushrooms growing there. It is also unlikely that a distance of 50 m in the evening or at night one could recognize a typically Jewish face.

It is also strange that the German administration, despite the fact that they devoted so much work on this affair, did not seek out the 10 Polish workers who first found the graves in the summer of 1942, and

6. The evidence of the five-year-old small pine trees As evidence the Germans also refer to the small five-year-old pine trees that had been planted on heaped-up mounds. We did not see them ourselves because the graves were already opened, we were only shown one little pine. A section of the pine was examined with a vertical illuminator. It was determined that the treeling was at least five years old and in the section near to the center was a faint dark stripe. The forestry expert von Herff who had been summoned stated that a dark stripe like this arises when something stops the treeling's growth, for example, in the case of transplanting, and assumed that the little pine had been transplanted three years earlier. However, he also admitted that the treelings were poorly developed, were growing in the shade of other trees, and that the stripe in question could therefore arise from other causes and not only from transplantation.

[Concerning the diary of Adam Solski]

Tento deník jsem sám neviděl. Poslední jeho prave popsána stránka byla uveřejněna v Bílé knize. Jedosti podezřelý svým obsahem a v rozporu s výpověďmi svědka i jinými okolnostmi. 9/4. Mluví o tom, že přišli do lesa v 8.30 ráno, ač podle svědka Silvestrovova byli do lesa odvázeni večer a v noci. Podezřelý jest, že mohl být psán až takřka do posledního okamžiku před popra-[va]. Nema uveden rok, nýbrž jen den a měsíc. Ma dvakrát datum vou, nehlede ani k tomu, že deníky se psávají večer o událostech předcházejících ch. Take není podán důkaz, že byl psán vlastní rukou. (16)

I did not see this diary myself. The last page of it, reproduced above, was published in the German Report [lit. "White Book."] Its contents are rather suspicious and are in contradiction to the testimony of witnesses and other circumstances. 9/4 states that they arrived in the woods at 8:30 a.m., although according to the confessions of the witness Sil'vestrov they were carried off into the woods in the evening and at night. It is also suspicious that the diary could have been written in, so to speak, until the last moments before execution. No year is given, only the day and month. One date is entered twice, despite the fact that diaries are normally written in the evening about the events of the past day. There is also no evidence that it was written in the hand of the [stated] author.

I když připustíme, že pro menší množství vzdušného kyslíku byl proces oxidace v katynských mrtvolách zpomalen, přece nelze připustit, že by byly ležely v hrobech 3 roky. Stav mrtvol by poukazoval, že tam ležely několik měsíců a vzhledem k menšímu množství vzdušného kyslíku a zleněnému procesu oxidace, že jím ležely nejvýše 1.5 roku. (18)

Translated:

While acknowledging that because of smaller amounts of atmospheric oxygen the oxidation process was slowed in the Katyn corpses, one cannot concede that they were lying in the graves for three years. The condition of the corpses would suggest that they had lain there a few months and, due to the reduced amount of oxygen in the air and the slower process of oxidation, that they had lain there 1.5 years at most.

Rozsah adipociru rovněž svědčí, že mrtvoly ležely v hrobu asi 1.5 roku Nalez na satstvu a na kovových součástkách i cigaretach mluví rovněž proti tomu, že by mrtvoly byly bývaly ležely v zemi 3 leta. (31)

The extent of adipocere also indicates that the corpses lay in the grave for about 1.5 years Analysis of the garment and of the metal parts and cigarettes also speak against the corpses having lain in the earth for three years.

Hájek too rejected Dr. Orsós' idea of "pseudocallus" as evidence that a corpse had been buried for at least three years:

Prof. Orsós z Budapešti upozorňoval na to, že v lebce jedné mrtvoly našel na povrchu mozkové kase tvrdou, jako vápenatou, vrstevnatou inkrustaci, která podle jeho zkušeností je pozorována teprve po 3 letech pobytu mrtvoly v hrobu.

Translated:

Prof. Orsós from Budapest pointed out that in the skull of one corpse he found on the surface a brain mush hard as a calcium deposit, which in his experience is observed only after the corpse has lain 3 years in the grave.

Tomu však nebývá až po 3 letech, nýbrž někdy i mnohem dříve, neboť záleží na množství a koncentraci kyselin, které způsobují odvápení a změknutí kostí a koncentrace ta je určite různá. Prof. Orsós prohledl radu lebek a jen v jedne nalezl podobne zmeny v nepatrnem stupni, u jinych nikoliv.(20)

Translated:

But this happens not just after three years, but sometimes much earlier, since it depends on the amount and concentration of acids that cause decalcification and softening of the bones and this concentration varies. Prof. Orsós looked at a series of skulls and in only one of them found such changes in a slight degree, and not in others.

Hájek Testified that His Real Opinion Was Censored

Kdyz jsem se vrátil a úředně byl uveřejněn Katynský protokol, dostavili se ke mně redaktori tehdejších deníků „Polední list“ a „Večerní České slovo“. Právili, že dostali pokyn, aby si u mě vyžádali rozhovor, že mé odpovědi budou uveřejněny ve všech denních listech. Zodpověděl jsem jim jejich otázky a řekl po pravdě, co jsem v Katyně viděl a slyšel, ale následujícího dne jsem byl velmi roztrpčen, když jsem četl něco zcela jiného a když mi byly dány do (1st) výroky, jichž jsem vůbec neucínil a učiniti nemohl. (21)

When I returned [from Katyn] and the Katyn protocol was officially published the editors of the dailies "Poledni list" and "Vecerní České Slovo" came to me. They said they had been instructed to interview me and that my answers would be published in all daily papers. I answered their questions and told the truth about what I had seen and heard at Katyn, but the next day I was very embittered when I read something totally different and when remarks were put into my mouth which I had not made and could not make.

Za několik dní jsem byl požádán tiskovým šéfem pro t. zv. protektorát, Wolframem von Wolmarem, abych o svých zkušenostech přednášel před zástupci tisku v Presseklubu. Učinil jsem tak, ale opět jen objektivne a po prednasce vytkl jsem dosti ostre zmfnenym redaktorum jejich zpusob psanf, jak take nynf konstatovala ceska tiskova kancelar. (Viz „Prace“ ze dne 11. cervence 1945.) Zduraznoval jsem tehdy, fo lekar nema prava dotykati se viny nebo nevinu obvinenych, nybd podavati vecny posudek, spadajicf do lekarskeho oboru. Redaktori poukazovali na censuru. (21)

Several days later I was asked by the press chief of the so-called Protectorate, Wolfram von Wolmar, to lecture about my experiences before the press in the Press club. I did so, but again only objectively, and after the lecture I criticized the editors rather sharply for their way of writing, as the Czech News Agency has recently confirmed. (See "Prace" of 11 July 1945). I pointed out then that a doctor has no right to judge the guilt or innocence of defendants but give an objective judgment within the medical field. The editors referred to the censorship.

Hájek Was Forced to Sign the German Report

Na treti otazku, proc jsem podepsal katynsky protokol, jsem odpovedel:

„Kazdemu z nas bylo jasno, kdybychom protokol, ktery vypracovali prof. Buhtz z Vratislavi a prof. Orsós z Budapesti, nepodepsali, ze by se letadlo s nami urcite nebylo vratilo. (22)

Translated:

To the third question, why I had signed the Katyn protocol [the expert statement in AM] I answered:

"It was clear to all of us that if we did not sign the protocol composed by Prof. Buhtz of Bratislava and Prof. Orsós of Budapest, our airplane would certainly not return."

In his 1952 article Hájek added that when he tried to beg off the trip to Katyn on grounds of illness he was threatened by the Ministry of Internal Affairs of the "Protectorate of Bohemia and Moravia," the puppet state under German occupation, with being accused of "sabotage" and sent to a concentration camp.

Hájek also stated that a number of the medical experts called to Katyn by the Germans did not know German very well. Buhtz, the German professor, wrote the report, read it out loud, and the rest of the scientists signed it.

Polish Observers at Katyn Who Retracted Their Testimony

Sanford claims in one sentence that Dr. Adam Szebista and Edmund Seyfried, who had been members of Polish delegations at Katyn, retracted their testimony after the war. (206)

Seyfried was imprisoned by the postwar pro-communist government for collaboration. The article concerning Seyfried by Stanislaw Jankowski, to which Cieniala refers, states that he had made some kind of statement at the request of the Germans:

Edmund Seyfried przyznaje, że przed opuszczeniem miejsca ekshumacji uczestnicy delegacji „na prośbę Niemców opowiedzieli swoje wrażenia”...⁷

Translated:

Edmund Seyfried admits that before leaving the place of exhumation the members of the delegation "stated their opinions at the request of the Germans..."

⁷ Stanisław M. Jankowski, "Pod Specjalnym Nadzorem, przy Drzwiach Zamkniętych: Wyroki Sądowe w PRL za Ujawnienie Prawdy o Zbrodni Katyńskiej" [Under Special Surveillance, with Doors Closed: Sentences in People's Poland for Revealing the Truth about Katyn], in Marek Tarczyński, ed., Zbrodnia Katyńska: Polskie Śledztwo [The Crime of Katyn: The Polish Investigation], Zeszyty Katyńskie, no. 20 (Warsaw, 2005), 106 n. 44.

A document of the Polish underground reproduced in translation in volume 4 of the Madden Commission hearings states the following:

Seyfried, after inspecting the graves, with the permission of the Germans, made the following speech, whose contents were affirmed by another delegate: "I call upon you gentlemen to take off your hats, bow your heads, and pay tribute to these heroes who gave their lives that Poland might live." The Germans saluted. The entire proceedings were filmed, photographed, and sound-recorded. The participants have expressed * * * a sound recording was also made. (Madden Vol. 4 p. 717; confirmed on p. 846. The three asterisks are in the original)

Neither Cienciala nor Sanford give any indication where Seyfried's retraction can be found. It would be interesting to read both what Seyfried said or reported in 1943 and what he said in his retraction, evidently in 1945.

Seyfried was apparently jailed in 1948. We do not know whether his role at Katyn was the only charge against him, or whether he was charged with other instances of collaboration with the Germans. We do know that the Polish delegations that visited Katyn at German invitation in April 1943 could not have had any more evidence of Soviet guilt than the Germans did. As we have seen, even months later, when the German Report was published, the Germans did not have any such evidence either.

Sanford helpfully identifies Dr. Szebesta's retraction (152 n. 56). Sanford claims that Szebesta was "forced to recant his wartime testimony." Sanford gives no evidence that this testimony was "forced." But he does identify an interview with Szebesta in the Polish communist newspaper Trybuna Ludu of March 20, 1952, which I have obtained. In this interview Szebesta said that the Germans had obviously demanded and staged the visit of the Polish officials as a propaganda stunt.

Szebesta claimed that he was sent by the German authorities straight to the airport, without being able even to say goodbye to his wife. He stated that they were always accompanied by some Germans, always under guard, and had no freedom of action at all. In fact, he said that they were at Katyn for only one hour! They were continually told by the Germans that only the Soviets could have done such a terrible thing. Szebesta thought it particularly ironic that the Germans told him that Germans could never have committed such a massacre!

He says that the German doctor who accompanied them told him that the cartridge shells found at Katyn were of the caliber of weapons used by the Soviets.

Oprowadzajcicy nas lekarz niemiecki pokazywał różne przestrzelone czaszki tłumacząc, że kaliber broni odpowiada tej, jaka jest używana w ZSRR.

Translated:

The German doctor who accompanied us showed us various used shells and explained that the caliber of weapons corresponded to that used in the USSR.

This is evidence that the Germans had initially planned to claim that Soviet guns were used to shoot the Polish prisoners at Katyn. Szebesta and the other Polish delegates were at Katyn in early April. It was not until the end of the month that the Germans decided that they had to admit that German shells had been found at Katyn.

Goebbels thought that the presence of German shells in the Katyn graves should have been enough to convince the Allies that the Germans had shot the Poles at Katyn. But Goebbels was mistaken! The issue of the German shells has been blithely passed over by all those eager to blame the Soviets, beginning with the Polish GIE. Goebbels underestimated the Allies' anticommunist zeal.

Like other witnesses Szebesta was convinced that the corpses and the other materials in the graves were far too well preserved to have been buried three years earlier, in 1940. Szebesta's remarks about the corpses are similar to those of Markov and Hájek.

Cienciala and Sanford are bluffing — in plain language, lying — about Seyfried and Szebesta. Did the Germans, or the Soviets, or both, "force"

Seyfried and Szebesta to make whatever statements they made? Were their retractions compelled by the Nazis, or the communists? Or were made voluntarily and out of conviction? An objective study would identify and examine the circumstances surrounding them, in an attempt to determine which, if any, of their statements were valid, and if unsuccessful, would say as much. But neither Sanford nor Cienciala does.

The Phillimore Note

Lt Col Harry Phillimore was Secretary of the British War Crimes Executive (BWCE) at Nuremberg. He reported to Patrick Dean, legal adviser to the Foreign Office. His report is available online.⁸

⁸ I have put the Phillimore report online at <http://msuweb.montclair.edu/~furrgr/research/phillimore.pdf> It was formerly available at <http://collection.europarchive.org/tna/20070206143611/http://fco.gov.uk/files/kfile/annexf.pdf> and is still available at the Internet Archive: <https://web.archive.org/web/20160913024024/http://collection.europarchive.org/tna/20070206143611/http://fco.gov.uk/files/kfile/annexf.pdf>

Neither Cienciala nor Sanford mention Phillimore's note of July 6, 1946. This omission is probably due to the fact that Phillimore concluded that the Soviet case set forth at Nuremberg was a convincing one, particularly as set forth by Professor Prozorovsky of the Burdenko Commission,

The third witness was the principal member of the Soviet investigation [Prozorovsky]. He was undoubtedly a most effective witness and testified to having personally exhumed some 5,000 bodies at Kiev, Kharkov, Smolensk and other places. He spoke in great detail of the condition of the bodies and of the very careful investigation made. His commission had made a most careful autopsy of 925 bodies, only 3 of which had apparently been perfunctorily examined previously. He explained the condition of the clothing, which had been searched and gave details of a few documents found. They included receipts dated April and May 1941 and a letter from a wife to the Soviet Red Cross, bearing a Warsaw and Moscow postmark in September 1940 as well as postmark with the stamp of the Tarnopol Post Office dated 13 November 1940. He has personally discovered a letter dated 20 June. His mastery of the details of these documents was complete and his evidence delivered confidently and quickly, but obviously not parrot wise. He went on to deal with the bullet cases, which were found in the graves, which were those of a calibre which the German witnesses had admitted applied to the German pistols and which, he stated, bore the initials of a German firm GECO. This evidence was greatly fortified by a captured document produced by the Americans being a telegram dated May 1943 from an official of the Government General to the defendant Frank's office in Poland stating that members of the Polish Red Cross who had been visiting Katyn at the invitation of the Germans had been very much disturbed at finding bullet cases marked GECO, a well known German firm. The conjunction between this document showing German bullet cases found in the graves in May 1943 by the Poles and by the Soviet commission a year later in January 1944, was most convincing. He went on to give reasons why the bodies could not have been buried as early as 1940 and concluded by comparing the method of killing with that in the many other cases which he had personally investigated where German action was not disputed. Altogether, although not of course conclusive the evidence emerged strongly in favour of the Soviet case and the German report was largely discredited and their evidence unimpressive.

Sanford:

The most important Soviet witness, Dr Markov, the Bulgarian member of the International Commission, agreed to all Prosecutor Smirnov's leading questions.¹⁰⁹ His evidence that the International Commission had been presented with already exhumed bodies and had signed only under German pressure was to be refuted later by Drs Naville and Tramsen. (140)

This statement by Sanford is a lie. It is a reference to Naville's and Tramsen's testimony to the US Madden Commission in 1952 (neither testified at Nuremberg). There they did not refute anything that Markov said. We discuss their testimony below.

The Madden Commission

Cienciala says little about the Madden Commission and nothing about the testimony given there. In particular, she does not point out the following testimony:

- Gustav Genschow, whose armaments firm manufactured the Geco 7.65 DD ammunition found at Katyn, testified that only small amounts of this ammunition were exported to the USSR — "only two to three thousand rounds" after 1928, a truly insignificant quantity. (Madden V, 1578-9)
- Dr. Francois Naville of Switzerland, the only medical expert at Katyn who was from a neutral country, discounted Dr. Ferenc Orsós's theory of "pseudocallus". (Madden V, 1612) This was the sole medical evidence set forth by the Germans that the bodies had been buried for three years, and even Orsós claimed to have found it in only one corpse.
- Kathleen Mortimer, Averill Harriman's daughter, had been at Katyn. As we have seen, she had attended the Burdenko Commission investigation and had written a private letter in which she stated that she had witnessed a document dated the summer of 1941 as it was taken from the pocket of a corpse.

It is notable that in her testimony to the Madden Commission she did not deny this. She was not directly asked about it because this detail was not in her 1944 report from Katyn. Nor did she volunteer it. She did insist that she had been present at post-mortems, and that the documents she saw at a museum in Smolensk "had been taken from bodies that had been buried a considerable length of time." (Madden VII, 2145) This partially corroborates what she wrote to her sister.

The importance of this, once again, is that the presence of documents dated in the second half of 1940 or any time in 1941 proves that the Soviets did not shoot the Poles, regardless of any other evidence. The "official" Soviets-did-it version assumes that all the Polish POWs were shot shortly after they were transferred from the three POW camps to the NKVD in Smolensk, Kalinin, and Khar'kov in April and May, 1940.

Sanford

Dr Palmieri confirmed that all the signs indicated that the Poles had been killed between March and May 1940. (142-3)

Sanford is lying again. In reality Palmieri said he based his conclusion on Orsós's conclusion alone.

Mr. Machrowicz. Was Dr. Orsós' conclusion that the deaths occurred not later than April or May 1940?

Dr. Palmieri. Yes.

Mr. Machrowicz. Did you agree?

Dr. Palmieri. Yes, based on the researches that Dr. Orsós had made.

Palmieri specifically declined to reach any conclusion based on his own experience.

Mr. Machrowicz. From your own experiences and experiments at Katyn did you come to any conclusion as to the time of death of the persons found in these graves?

Dr. Palmieri. I can say no more than when a person is buried between 18 and 30 months to establish the exact time of burial is difficult. (Madden V 1619)

The Germans' claim — now the "official" version — is that the Poles POWs had been shot and buried in April and May, 1940, between 35 and 37 months prior to the April-June German excavation. That means that here Dr. Palmieri explicitly refused to confirm that, as Sanford claims, "all the signs indicated that the Poles had been killed between March and May 1940." On the contrary: Palmieri's statements support the Soviet account! But the Madden Commission members failed to mention this fact.

Sanford:

Dr Tramsen testified that the mummification of the bodies caused by the pressure of sand and of other bodies on them confirmed beyond all doubt that the Poles had been buried in the winter clothing in which they had been killed. (Sanford 143)

Tramsen did say that (Madden V 1455). But it proves nothing. The Poles had been captured in September, 1939. Therefore, they had their winter clothing with them at that time. Therefore they could have been wearing it in the fall — September to December 1941 — as well as in April or May 1940. The fact that some of the Poles whose corpses were disinterred at Katyn were dressed in winter clothes says nothing about the time of year they were murdered.

Of the Madden Committee report Sanford states:

The British FO deprecated the inconclusive, one-sided and contradictory evidence on which it was based. The committee had 'an obvious political bias and has not been drawn up in an exclusively judicial fashion'. ... The Republicans used Roosevelt's conspiracy of silence, and worse, over Katyn as part of their 1952 election campaign designed to win over East European ethnic voters away from the Democrats. (143-144)

Cienciala more or less agrees:

The Madden Committee failed to achieve its main goal, a trial of the Katyn case by the United Nations or some other international tribunal.... the Madden Committee was unpopular in Democratic circles not only because it seemed to align itself with McCarthy, but also because many prominent members of the Roosevelt and Truman administrations were charged with suppressing information on Katyn. The same circles also had a generally negative attitude toward the exiled Polish government in London, which was pushing for a trial of the Katyn case. For all these reasons, the hearings received wide publicity in Polish-American but not in mainstream American media. (239)

Conclusion

BU has not been called into doubt in any way by the defenders of the "official" version of Katyn or in any of the critiques they have cited. Much less has it been refuted.

BU remains the most accurate account of the killings at Katyn. Cienciala and Sanford have been blinded by their anticommunist bias; are deliberately lying; or both. Despite their repeated claims, none of the documents they cite refute the BU or the Soviet case as it was set forth at Nuremberg.

Chapter 12. The Excavations at Volodymyr-Volyns'kiy

On August 27, 2014, the following story appeared in The Telegraph of London, UK:

"Stalin-era mass grave found in Ukrainian castle"

Polish and Ukrainian scientists have unearthed a mass grave containing up to a thousand victims of Stalinist terror in a castle once used as a secret police prison.

Among the victims found in the grave are Polish soldiers, and the Polish press has already called the find a "new Katyn" in reference to a massacre of thousands of Poles by Stalin in 1940. The Katyn massacre still clouds Polish-Russian relations.

The grave was found in the grounds of the Kazimierz the Great castle in the town of Volodymyr-Volynsky in western Ukraine, close to the Polish border.

Although the NKVD had a base on the remains of the 13th-Century castle from 1939-1956—except when it was occupied by the Germans—scientists say the victims were killed between 1940 and 1941.

<http://www.telegraph.co.uk/news/worldnews/europe/ukraine/11059224/Stalin-era-mass-grave-found-in-Ukrainian-castle.html>

In the fall of 2013, a few months after my article in *Socialism and Democracy*¹ was published, the end of the excavations at Volodymyr-Volyns'kiy was announced. According to newspaper reports the chief Polish archeologist, Dr. Dominika Siemińska, said that 57 bodies had been exhumed and reburied. In a video interview of Dr. Siemińska two additional badges of Polish policemen are shown. They are badges 1154/III and 639/VII. The first is from the Kiel police district, the second from the Pomorsk district. The Polish language video interview is here:

<https://youtu.be/gPGFcvETG1Q>

¹ Grover Furr, "The 'Official' Version of the Katyn Massacre Disproven? Discoveries at a German Mass Murder Site in Ukraine." Socialism and Democracy 27(2) (August 2013): 96-129.

The important issues here are the following:

* The Polish report by Dr. Siemińska has been taken off the Internet. The Report was originally online here:

<http://www.kresykedzierzynkozle.home.pl/attachments/File/Rap.pdf>

It is still available at the Internet Archive:

<https://web.archive.org/web/20130203224105/http://www.kresykedzierzynkozle.home.pl/attachments/File/Rap.pdf>

* Polish and Ukrainian media accounts continue to identify this as a Soviet NKVD mass shooting. The fact that 96%-98.67% of all the shell casings found there are German and manufactured in 1941 is no longer mentioned. Instead the claim is made that shell casings from the Soviet Tokarev pistol have been found, though no evidence or even numbers are given to substantiate this claim.

The Claim that Soviet Pistol Shells Were Found at V-V

Dr. Siemińska:

Znalezione na miejscu luski z pistoletu TT wskazują, że zostali zabici przez NKWD w 1940 i 1941 roku.

Translated:

Shells from the TT² pistol found at this place show that they were killed by the NKVD in 1940 and 1941.

content/uploads/2015/03/Dziennik_Kijowski_2_2015.pdf (TT = Tokarev pistol. See Wikipedia entry at https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/TT_pistol)

Both the Polish and the Ukrainian archeological reports from V-V state that the shells found in the mass graves were overwhelmingly from 9 mm. weapons.

In the video interview given as the excavations were being completed Dr. Siemińska stated that the ammunition found in Grave No. 4 is "smaller than 8 mm."

W przebadanych do tej pory... um, ponad dwustu czaszkach... eh, z mogily numer cztery... eh, jest okolo sto piedziesieciu... eh, no, sladow, wlotow ... eh, um ... po pociskach... no, i swiadczq one o tym, ze amunicja, ktora te osoby zostaly rozstrzelane to jest kaliber mniej niz osiem milimetrow, bo te otwory majq okolo — wlotowe — okolo osmiu milimetrow, wiec zostaly zrobione... eh, amunicja ponizej osmiu milimetrow.

Translated:

In the more than two hundred skulls examined up till this time ... eh, from grave number four ... eh, there are about one hundred fifty ... he, well, traces, entry holes ... eh, well, after missiles ... well, and they testify to the fact that the ammunition with which these people were shot is of a caliber less than eight millimeters, because these openings have entry holes of about eight millimeters, and so they were made by ammunition of less than eight millimeters.

— <https://youtu.be/gPGFcvETG1Q>

The Tokarev TT pistol takes a 7.62 mm cartridge. This is clearly an attempt to place the blame on the Soviets. She says that "few shell casings were found" in this grave ("Również dość mała ilość łusek znalezionych"). But they are not identified. This too is a false statement. As we have already seen, the Polish archeologist's report counts several hundred shell casings, more than 96% of them German and dated 1941.

As late as September, 2013 Polish reports were still admitting that the victims were shot by Germans in 1941, although the archeologists were expecting to find NKVD victims:

Znaleziono wówczas szczątki 343 osób, a podczas prac w roku kolejnym — 512 osób. Byli to jak oceniamy w większości miejscowi Żydzi, prawdopodobnie zamordowani przez Niemców latem 1941 r. po wejściu do miasta. Generalnie poszukiwaliśmy w tym miejscu ofiar NKWD, jednak podczas oględzin szczątków okazało się, że sposób mordowania wskazuje na Niemców. Są tam pogrzebane całe rodziny, w większości kobiety i dzieci, czego NKWD jednak raczej nie robiło, wysyłając ich zwykle na Syberie. Szczątki były niemal pozbawione ubrań i przedmiotów osobistych. Wskazywałoby to na Niemców, którzy rozstrzeliwali ludzi wpedzonych do dołu śmierci. Sprawstwo hitlerowskie wydaje się też potwierdzać odnaleziona niemiecka amunicja z 1941 r. — opowiadał naczelnik wydziału zagranicznego Rady Ochrony Pamięci Walk i Męczeństwa Maciej Dancewicz.³

Translated:

They found at that time the remains of 343 people, and during the work in the next year — 512 people. They were as we believe, mostly local Jews, probably murdered by the Germans in the summer of 1941 when they entered the city. Generally we were looking for the victims of the NKVD at this site, but during the examination of the remains it turned out that the manner of killing points to the Germans. There are buried entire families, mostly women and children, what the NKVD did not do; they usually sent them to Siberia. The remains were almost devoid of clothes and personal items. This would point to the Germans, who shot down people whom they drove to the death pit. Nazi perpetration also seems to be confirmed by German ammunition from 1941 that has been found. — said the head of the foreign department of the Council for Protection of Memory of Combat and Martyrdom Maciej Dancewicz.

In Nasz Dziennik of September 24, 2013 Dr. Siemińska is still talking about "the identification of a person on the Mednoe list" and that "most shell cases are also of German production":

The Polish archeologists' report, written and signed by Dr. Dominika Siemińska herself in November 2011 is simply not mentioned. That report concluded that the mass murders at Volodymyr-Volyns'kiy were committed by the Germans, not by the Soviets,

* Two more badges of Polish policemen were found before the excavations were shut down.

Images 12.1 and 12.2 Additional Polish policemen's badges unearthed at Volodymyr-Volyns'kiy. Polish officials have refused to identify them.

But the owners of these badges have not been publicly identified by Polish authorities. Earlier, before the significance of the Volodymyr-Volyns'kiy excavations for the Katyn issue was fully recognized, Ludwik Małowiejski's and Jozef Kuligowski's badges were quickly associated with their owners.

We should remember that the badges of Kuligowski and Małowiejski were found in the same mass graves in 2010 and 2011. According to the "official" version these two Polish policemen were shot at Kalinin (now Tver') and buried nearby at Mednoe. Memorial plaques bearing their names are displayed at the memorial graveyard at Mednoe along with more than 6300 other such plaques. The discovery of their badges at Volodymyr-Volyns'kiy, Ukraine, 700 miles (1200 km) away, led to some publicity. This in turn led to the initial article by Sergei Strygin, in Russian, and my own more detailed article in English, pointing out that this discovery undermines the "official" version of Katyn.

Today a "curtain of silence" has descended over these discoveries. There are many more than 57 bodies in these mass graves — hundreds, in fact. But the excavations have been ended. The evidence that the victims were murdered by the Germans and Ukrainian fascists, not the Soviets, is hushed up. Soviet guilt is simply stated as a "fact" rather than investigated. The question of the shell casings is no longer mentioned.

This revealing sentence can be found in an article in a Lublin (Poland) newspaper dated October 21, 2013, at the same time that the excavations at Volodymyr-Volyns'kiy were concluded:

Archeolodzy odnaleźli pojedyncze policyjne odznaki z numerami funkcjonariuszy, ale te, które odnaleziono do tej pory, należały do policjantów, którzy, jak wskazują zachowane dokumenty, zostali zabici przez Sowieców w zupełnie innym miejscu — w Twerze.

⁴ "Wojskowe guziki w masowej mogile. Odkrycie na Wołyniu." Gazeta.pl Lublin October 21, 2013. At http://lublin.gazeta.pl/lublin/1,48724,14812213,Wojskowe_guziki_w_masowej_mogile_Odkrycie_na_Wolyniu.html

This story appeared at the same time as the interview with Dr. Siemińska, the Polish archeologist — the same interview where the two additional Polish policemen's badges, numbers 1154/III and 639/VII are pictured (see above).

It is possible that these badges too belong to supposed "Katyn massacre" victims. If they are not, then why haven't the policemen to whom these badges belonged been publicly identified?

But this information has not been made public. The whole matter is being hushed up, kept quiet. This in itself is evidence, if not a virtual admission, that the Polish and Ukrainian governments know that the "official" Soviets-did-it version has been seriously compromised by the discovery of these badges.

All the newspaper articles that report on the ending of the excavations at Volodymyr-Volyns'kiy claim, without evidence of any kind, that the Poles who were shot there were shot by the Soviet NKVD while the Jews and other civilians were shot by the Germans. As we have seen, according to all the evidence the Poles too were murdered by the Germans and their Ukrainian allies. Most articles from the fall of 2013 ignore the Katyn connection completely.

A joint Polish-Ukrainian ceremony presented the bodies as victims of the NKVD, despite a multitude of evidence strongly indicating that these were victims of the Germans and their Ukrainian nationalist collaborators. These collaborators are celebrated as national heroes by today's Ukrainian state.

The YouTube interview of Dr. Siemińska carries the following paragraph:

Znalezione polskie odznaki policyjne w kolejnych mogilach we Włodzimierzu Wołyńskim mogą pomóc w ustaleniu nazwisk ofiar. Odznaka o numerze 1154 należała do policjanta z okręgu kieleckiego, natomiast o numerze 639 to policjanta z okręgu pomorskiego. Skala mordów, odkrywane nowe pochówki powodują, że badania polskich i ukraińskich archeologów muszą być kontynuowane w przyszłym roku. Tematem jest również zainteresowana Fundacja Niepodległości, która wspiera prace poszukiwawcze ofiar komunizmu w Polsce.

Translated:

The Polish police badges found in subsequent graves in Volodymyr-Volyns'kiy can help in establishing the names of the victims. The badge number 1154 belonged to a policeman from the Kieck district, while number 639 was a policeman from the Pomeranian district. The scale of murders and the new burials discovered mean that the research of Polish and Ukrainian archaeologists should be continued next year. This topic is also of interest to the Independence Foundation, which supports the search for victims of communism in Poland.

It appears that the Polish and Ukrainian governments do not want to find more "Katyn victims" where they are not supposed to be.

* The excavations and exhumations have been stopped.

*No DNA testing has been reported.

* The names of Kuligowski and Małowiejski are not mentioned any longer in connection with the Volodymyr-Volyns'kiy excavations. This despite the fact that the discovery of their badges is by far the most historically significant, as well as the most newsworthy, aspect of this excavation.

* It is now conceded that Jews shot by the Nazis were also buried in these mass graves. But the fact that the Polish materials, including the policemen's badges, were buried in the same mass graves, is now passed over in silence.

* The claim is now made that the Poles were shot by the NKVD as the German army was advancing. This claim, like any claim, requires demonstration — evidence, proof — not a simple assertion. But no evidence is given.

* The "Sardinenpackung" form of burial of the victims in one mass grave, characteristic of the Nazi Einsatzkommando group led by Jeckeln, identified by the Polish archeologist Dr. Dominika Siemińska in the now-suppressed Polish archeological report, and clearly evident in the photograph reproduced in that report, is no longer mentioned.

This cruel method of execution and burial, in which victims were forced to lie down in rows on top of other victims who had been executed before and were then shot, was characteristic of a German SS killing squad's methods.

*We noted in a previous chapter that Ukrainian archeologist Oleksei Zlatohors'kiy protested this finding because it cast doubt on the preconceived notion that the NKVD had murdered the Polish POWs at Katyn.

The vital point is that Kuligowski and Małowiejski were in Volodymyr-Volyns'kiy in 1941 at all. Their presence means that the Polish POWs named in the Soviet "transit" or "shipment" lists, published by Tucholski, of Poles shipped out of the three POW camps in April and May 1940 were not being shipped to execution.

The "official" version of the Katyn massacre rests on the assumption that the POWs were shipped to execution and were executed in April and May 1940. This is only an assumption. The corpses of those supposedly shot by the Soviets at Kalinin (Tver') and Kharkiv have never been found, much less counted or identified. Kuligowski's and Małowiejski's memorial tablets remain at Mednoe outside of Tver' even though they were in fact murdered more than a year later and more than 700 miles away in Volodymyr-Volyns'kiy and the Polish authorities, who know this, have not removed them. They are "pretending" that the discoveries at Volodymyr-Volyns'kiy never happened.

The fact that their bodies are not there suggests that the bodies of the other Polish POWs are not there either. There is no evidence that any of these men whose names are recorded on the thousands of memorial tables at Mednoe and Piatykhvatky, were in fact executed there and are buried there.

The fact that Kuligowski and Małowiejski were buried in a mass grave associated with German ammunition dated 1941 and in a location associated with German mass executions of Jews and others constitutes very strong evidence that they and others were shot by the Germans. But no matter who shot these Polish policemen in Volodymyr-Volyns'kiy in 1941, they were not shot at Kalinin (Tver') in April-May 1940. This alone fatally undermines the "official" Soviets-did-it version of the Katyn massacre.

We should understand this cover-up, this "conspiracy of silence," as an admission that the Volodymyr-Volyns'kiy excavations have dismantled the "official" version of the Katyn massacre. There is no other version involving Soviet guilt.

The only other version of the massacres of Polish POWs that is known as "Katyn" is that of the Burdenko Commission, which concluded that the Germans shot the Polish POWs at Katyn. At this point, the only hypothesis supported by the evidence now available is that the Germans were guilty of the mass murders known as the "Katyn massacre."

As the "official" version of Katyn becomes more and more called into doubt there may be some attempt in the future to "reinterpret" the Volodymyr-Volyns'kiy discoveries to try to account for the presence of Kuligowski's and Małowiejski's badges. Documents may be fabricated and brought forward in a fraudulent attempt to "prove" that Kuligowski and Małowiejski were among a small number of "exceptions" who were not executed at Kalinin in 1940. Or some other attempt will be made to salvage the "official" version.

Whatever subterfuge may be invented in future, we can confidently predict that the truth will be denied. The "official" version is too valuable as a stick with which to beat Stalin, the Soviet Union and the communist movement, to let the truth get in the way.

Chapter 13. The 'Ukrainian Trail of Katyn'

Cienciala introduces the "Ukrainian trail" as follows:

While much is known about the fate of the prisoners of war in the three special camps, the same does not apply to those held in the NKVD prisons of the western regions of Ukraine and Belorussia who were transferred to NKVD prisons in Kiev, Kharkov, Kherson, and Minsk following Beria's order of 22 March 1940 (doc. 53). According to Beria's resolution, approved by the Politburo on 5 March, these prisoners were also to be shot. Beria stated that out of a total of 18,632 persons arrested and held in the NKVD prisons, 10,685 were Poles (doc. 47). However, in a document of March 1959, the number of those shot in the prisons was given as 7,305 (doc. 110). The lists of victims shot in Ukraine have been found; the total number is 3,435, more than 2,000 of whom have been identified. Their burial sites are unknown, but since Beria ordered them to be moved to NKVD jails in Kiev, Kharkov, and Kherson, presumably they were buried in or near each of these cities.²⁷ The lists must have included at least some of the prisoners whom Merkulov ordered on 22 February 1940 to be taken out of the three camps and transported to NKVD prisons (doc. 42). Most, however, seem to have been arrested and jailed in western Ukraine (East Galicia), which was part of interwar Poland. (Cienciala 136)

Note 27, page 481 to this passage reads:

27. See Zuzanna Gajowniczek, ed., Ukraiński Ślad Katynia [The Ukrainian Trail of Katyn] (Warsaw, 1995); the identifications were made by Gajowniczek. This publication, made possible by the cooperation of the Ukrainian and Polish Security Services, contains thirty-four lists of victims. The lists were sent with a cover letter dated 25 November 1940 by GB 1st Lieutenant Feodor A. Tsvetukhin to the head of the NKVD 1st Special Department, Moscow, GB Major Leonid F. Bashtakov. Tsvetukhin, head of the 1st Special Department, Ukraine, 1939-1940, wrote that he was enclosing 3,435 files in five sacks (p. xxii). The list numbers are from the same series as those for the three special camps that Gorbachev gave to General Jaruzelski in Moscow on 13 April 1990, when the Soviet news agency TASS admitted Soviet guilt for the Katyn massacre (doc. 117).

Document 53 (Cienciala 154-156) is Beria's order of March 22, 1940, to transfer 3000 prisoners from prisons in the Western Ukraine to prisons in Central Ukraine. There is, of course, nothing said about murdering them. Nor does it even say that the prisoners are Poles. As we shall see, many of them were not.

Western Ukraine, part of Poland since 1921 when it was taken by the Polish army from a weakened Soviet Russia, was reunited with the Eastern Ukraine in October 1939. The population was made up of Ukrainians, Poles, Jews, and a smattering of other nationalities, with Poles being a minority.

Beria's order of March 22, 1940, unlike the "Beria Letter" (document 47), which is one of the forgeries in CP, is not concerned with the nationalities of the prisoners at all. It does contain this interesting passage:

6) USSR Deputy People's Commissar of Internal Affairs, Divisional Commander Com. Chernyshov, shall within ten days' time remove from their NKVD places of imprisonment in the Ukrainian SSR and send to USSR NKVD correctional labor camps 8,000 convicted prisoners, including 3,000 from the Kiev, Kharkov, and Kherson prisons.

Józef Kuligowski and Ludwik Małowiejski, Polish policemen who had been transferred out of Ostashkov POW camp to the NKVD in Kalinin, Russia, ended up in the Western Ukraine, where they were killed by the Germans and their Ukrainian Nationalist allies. They were probably in a correctional labor camp, along with other Polish POW, perhaps many of them, who are now fraudulently listed as "Katyn victims."

The "Beria Letter" in CP states:

In the prisons of the western ob lasts of Ukraine and Belorussia a total of 18,632 arrested people (including 10,685 Poles) are being held...

However, the "Shelepin Letter" of March 1959 — also one of the CP documents — gives a different the number of persons shot in western Ukraine and western Belorussia:

On the basis of the decision by the special Troika of the NKVD USSR, a total of 21,857 persons were shot; of these ... 7,305 persons were shot in other camps and prisons of western Ukraine and western Belorussia. (Cienciala 332)

It is no wonder that 11,000 (or 10,685), the number of prisoners in W. Ukraine and W. Belorussia to be shot according to the "Beria Letter", and 7305, the number "shot" according to the "Shelepin Letter," are very different. All the evidence we have suggests that these two forgeries were done at very different times: the "Beria Letter" during the Gorbachev years, the "Shelepin Letter" during Khrushchev's time.

Cienciala states: "The lists of victims shot in Ukraine have been found." This is false. There is no indication in the book in question, Zuzanna Gajowniczek, ed., Ukraiński Ślad Katynia, that the prisoners on these lists were shot. These are simply lists of names, many of them recognizably Ukrainian.

The only thing that suggests any relation to what we know as "Katyn" is the fact that the NKVD list numbers are in the same sequence as the NKVD file numbers of the Polish POWs shipped out of Kozel'sk, Starobel'sk, and Ostashkov. But we know that the prisoners shipped to the Smolensk, Khar'kov, and Kalinin NKVD were not shot there, because many of the Starobel'sk and Ostashkov prisoners turned up dead at Katyn, and at least two Ostashkov POWs turned up dead in Volodymyr-Volyns'kiy.

The list numbers appear to be related to NKVD Convoy troops. Abarinov discovered that Convoy battalion No. 136 transported prisoners to Ukraine as well as to Smolensk. According to Abarinov:

[[cyrillic]]ИЗУЧАЯ НИГУ ПРИКАЗОВ ПО 136-МУ БАТАЛЬОНУ, Я ИЗУМИЛСЯ ЧИСЛУ КОНВОЕВ, ОТПРАВИВШИХСЯ В АПРЕЛЕМАЕ 1940 ГОДА ПО ОДНОМУ И ТОМУ ЖЕ МАРШРУТУ: СМОЛЕНСК ЗАПАДНЫЕ ОБЛАСТИ УКРАИНЫ И БЕЛОРУССИИ.¹

Translated:

Studying the book of orders of the 136th battalion I was struck by the number of convoys that set out in April-May 1940 on one and the same route: Smolensk to and from Western Ukraine and Western Belorussia.

There are actually two editions of this "Ukrainian trail of Katyn." Listy Katyńskiej Ciąg Dalszy (Warsaw: Zeszyty Katynskie, 1994), and the Gajowniczek book mentioned above, Ukraiński Ślad Katynia (Warsaw, 1995). The first gives the names of the prisoners in alphabetical order, citing the list number in each case as well. The second orders them according to the list number.

The SBU List

We are fortunate to have yet one more list, albeit a partial one. This is an original archival list from a branch state archive of the Ukrainian SBU, the Security Service of Ukraine, the equivalent of the Russian FSB. It contains a little more than 900 names. But it gives much more detail than the two published lists above. Sergei Romanov, who discovered this list, has helpfully scanned it and made it available online for downloading.²

² At <http://katynfiles/content/gdasbu-1.html>

We can learn a lot about the nature of this "Ukrainian list" by comparing Romanov's archival SBU list with the two published lists we have. The SBU list has page numbers in the upper right-hand corner. We will refer here to these numbers for reference. For the Ukrainian list we will use Gajowniczek, ed., Ukraiński Ślad Katynia, abbreviated US, and Listy Katyńskiej Ciąg Dalszy, abbreviated LK.

Romanov notes that 4 of the 6 men mentioned as Trotskyists on SBU 17-18 "are on the Ukrainian list." In reality 5 are on the Ukrainian list: Stefan Bojko (#243, LK 8, US 174); Michal Jacuszko (#3453, LK 34, US 171); Włodzimierz Kuliniak (# 1593, LK 50 US 173); Iwan Jurkiw (#3378, LK 37 US 171). Iwan Kozar' is also on the list (#1459, LK 46 US 114).

Five of these six men are listed as "Ukrainian." All are identified as, and were no doubt arrested as, "active members of a Trotskyist organization in the Dorogobych raion."

So the so-called "Ukrainian list" contains names of persons who were not even Poles. There is also no evidence that they were shot. Only investigations and interrogations about their Trotskyist activities are mentioned.

Clearly, none of these men had anything to do with Katyn. This invalidates the whole idea of a "Ukrainian list." But we would never know this from the entries in LK and US. We know it only because Romanov found this later archival documentation.

In LK the published "Ukrainian list" is subtitled:

LISTA OBYWATELI POLSKICH ZAMORDOWANYCH NA
UKRAINIE NA PODSTAWIE DECYZJI BIURA POLITYCZNEGO
WKP (b) I NACZELNYCH WŁADZ PANSTWOWYCH ZSRR Z 5
MARCA 1940 ROKU.

Translated:

List of Polish citizens murdered in Ukraine on the basis of the decision of the Politburo of the AUCP(b)³ and the government of the USSR of 5 March 1940.

³ All-Union Communist Party (bolshevik), the formal name of the Bolshevik party from December 1925 until October 1952.

This subtitle is yet another lie. There is no evidence that these men were killed. The Polish editors chose this name so that it would appear to confirm the "official" version.

The archival document (p. 18) states that on May 5 and 7, 1940, the six accused Trotskyists were transferred from the Ukrainian NKVD to the NKVD of the USSR. Thereafter, whatever happened to them happened outside the Ukraine.

Page 78 of the archival list concerns Vladimir Filaretovich Perventsev who, along with his case file, was transferred to the NKVD of the USSR — again, outside the Ukraine. He is in LK 72, US 203. He is described on the archival list, p. 197, #233, as a "leader of Russian nationalists." A two-part article online about Russian émigrés in Poland identifies Perventsev as a regional leader of an anti-Soviet Russian organization.⁴

⁴ Sergiy Tkachov, "Rossiiskaia emigratsiia v mezhvoennom Pol'she." (The Russian emigration in Interwar Poland), at <http://www.mochola.org/russiaabroad/tkachref1.htm> and following. Perventsev is mentioned at <http://www.mochola.org/russiaabroad/tkachref4.htm> and <http://www.mochola.org/russiaabroad/tkachref5.htm>

Romanov says that Perventsev was "shot as a Polish citizen. " This is a lie. There is no evidence that he was shot, or of what became of him. Whatever happened to him most likely happened because he had been a leading organizer of an anti-Soviet group of Russian émigrés, not "as a Polish citizen."

Page 100 of the archival document identifies two persons who were not shot: Boleslav Vladimirovich Turovskii and Vladimir Iosifovich Goninchak. Turowski, U k. Li st #2989 (LK 100 US 16) was not shot. A note on LK 100 states that Turowski was sentenced on March 8, 1941, to 5 years in a corrective labor camp and later released "for permanent residence."

Goninchak is, more accurately, Haninczak. He is also on the "Katyn" Starobel'sk list published by Tucholski: (p. 929 #929 [sic] and p. 415 col. 2):

[[[cyrillic]]]929: ГАНИНЧАК Владимир Юзефович

Haninczak Włodzimierz

Prezes lub wiceprezes Sądu Okręgowego

we Lwowie (President or Vice President of the District Court in Lwów.).

This entry from Tucholski is reproduced on page 159 of the "Khar'kov Cemetery Book," Księga Cmentarna Charkow (Warsaw, 2003).

Włodzimierz HANINZAK s. Jósefa, ur. 1883. Preyes lub wicepreyes Sądu Okręgowego we Lwowie, bdd.

L.S. 929, J. Tucholski, Mord w Katyniu.

So, according to the "official" version Haninczak was murdered at Khar'kov and buried at Piatykhatky. The Polish Wikipedia article on him also claims that he was killed "in the Spring of 1940" (https://pl.wikipedia.org/wiki/Włodzimierz_Haninczak) This is another example of how dishonest the whole "official" version of Katyn is.

There is no evidence that Haninczak was executed at all! Quite the contrary: page 100 of the archival document states that there was an investigative file on Haninczak dated February 24, 1941, which has been destroyed. This suggests that Haninczak was still alive as of about that date. We know that Turowski, who is discussed on the same page, was not shot at all.

Moreover, there is no evidence that any of the persons on this list were executed! This is simply "assumed" by defenders of the "official" version.

Persons on the Archival List Arrested Long After the "Beria Letter"

At least 9 prisoners on this archival list, and on the "Ukrainian list," were arrested in late 1940 or in 1941. They are:

- Uk. list #285 (LK 285 US 14) — Filimon BOJAR, this list p. 171 #312. Arrested October 20 1940 as a "Polish spy"

- Uk. list #286 (LK 9 US 31) — Wawrzyniec Brazuk, this list p. 202 #286 [sic]. Arrested December 21 1940 as a "former officer of the White Army."
- Uk. list #3089 (LK 12 US 50) — Wiktor CHAJES, this list p. 203 #295 — arrested November 15 1940 as a member of an organization of "Zionists" (quotation marks in original).
- Uk. List #2329 (LK 74 US 191) — Edward Podgórski, this list p. 205 #6. Arrested October 10 1940 as a (civilian) Polish policeman.
- Uk. list #3292 (LK 96 US 16) — Karol Szykowski, this list p. 206 #12. Arrested December 3 1940 as a former White émigré.
- Uk. List #2441 (LK 78 US 198) — Stanislaw Ratajczak, this list p. 223 #149. Arrested September 18 1940 as a (civilian) Polish policeman.
- Uk. List #2502 (LK 78 US 52) — Kazimierz Rodziewicz, this list p. 232 #224. Arrested September 26 1940 as "an agent of the Polish police."
- Uk. List #930 (LK 18 US 187) — Josef Dolbniak, this list p. 144 #37. Arrested April 21 1941 as a Polish policeman.
- Uk. List missing (not in LK or US) — Mechislav Kulianda, this list p. 236 #258, Arrested November 30 1940 as a "large-scale merchant and member of the "OZN" party.

All the men listed above were arrested much later than March 5, 1940. One, Josef Dolbniak, was not even arrested until April 1941. Obviously none of them could have had nothing to do with any decision taken on March 5 1940 even if the "Beria letter" were genuine.

In addition, one prisoner, arrested in 1939, was charged with a criminal offense (Uk. list #3418; LK 38 US 197) — Bołestaw Janicki, this list p. 207 #19. Arrested on October 7 1939 "as a participant in a counterrevolutionary Polish organization, a police agent, who committed a murder [of someone] for revolutionary activity, transferred to the NKVD of the USSR on May 28, 1940."

US does not mention the reason for Janicki's arrest. It just states that he was "a gymnasium teacher in Tarnopol" (Ukraine). This appears to be a cover-up — an attempt to make an accused murderer look like an innocent victim.

List Numbers

Boleslaw Janicki is #46 in on list 64/1 (US 197). He was arrested on October 7, 1939. Stanislaw Ratajczak is #60 on the same list, 64/1. He was arrested on September 26, 1940, almost a year after Janicki.

Since these numbers are those of the NKVD convoys — the defenders of the "official" version say they are, and it is logical to assume this — that means that all 100 of the men on this list were alive as of late September — early October 1940. (US 143-148)

Edward Podgórski is #98 on list 66/2. He was arrested on October 10, 1940. Josef Dolbniak is #20 in list 66/2. He was arrested on April 21 1941, more than six months later than Podgórski. They were both in the same convoy, therefore, and this convoy did not depart until May 1941 or later. That also means that everyone on the list — 100 men — was alive as of May, 1941. (US 186-191)

The same conclusion must be drawn for everyone whose name is on a list with one of the men above who was arrested long after March 1940. What's more, there is no evidence that any of these men were executed at any time.

Naturally, these lists of names could not have had any relation to the "Beria Letter," which complains about anti-Soviet sentiments among prisoners as of early March 1940. We know from other evidence that the "Beria Letter" is a fake.

Other Matters of Interest:

* Uk. List #29 (LK 2 US 44) — Edmund Ambicki, this list p. 202 #284. Arrested as a German spy. This detail is not mentioned in LK or US.

* Uk. List #1016 (LK 36 US 26) — Wladislaw Jedrzejewski — this list p. 202 #287. Arrested in Lvov as "leader of a fascist military plot." US says "organizer of the civic guard in Lwów in September 1939."

The Polish Wikipedia page on him — http://pl.wikipedia.org/wiki/Władysław_Jędrzejewski_\(generał\)) — claims he either died in Prison in Lwów in March 1940 or was shot in 1939. This is simply a lie. The Poles have no information about any of this. It is part of the fictional "official" version of Katyn.

* Uk. List #2184 (LK 71 US 135) — Abrasim Pawelka — this list p. 208 #28 — Uk. Sład p. 135 #3 — "former OUN organizer, took part in Jewish pogroms" Neither LK nor US say anything about him.

Not only viciously anti-Semitic, the OUN was murderously anti-Polish. In 1943 OUN forces murdered about 100,000 Polish civilians in Western Ukraine in order to "ethnically cleanse" it of non-Ukrainians.

This little-known mass murder — an instance of true genocide, as it was an attempt to wipe out the Polish population — is called the "Volhynia Massacre" (Polish: rzeź wołyńska). To this day the Ukrainian nationalists prefer to call this the "Volhynian Tragedy" ([[cyrillic]]Волинська трагедія), as though it were some unfortunate event other than Ukrainian nationalist mass murder. The forces that committed this genocide are officially declared "heroes" of the Ukrainian nation today.

* Uk. List p. 73 #2311 (LK 73 US 193) — Stefan Piśmienny — this list p. 234 #249. Arrested as "chief of the military chancellery of the Petliura government, chief of a Polish counter-revolutionary organization." ([[cyrillic]]«начальника военной канцелярии правительства Петлюры, начальник польской к-р организацию».) US identifies him as "zam. wieś Żarzyńca pow. Równe" — a resident of the village of Zarzyn in the county (powiat) of Równe. That is, just an ordinary citizen.

This appears to be another cover-up. Simon Petliura was leader of an anti-Bolshevik nationalist army during the Civil War. His forces organized a number of pogroms against Jews. He was assassinated by a Jewish man whose family had been killed in anti-Jewish pogroms and who considered Petliura responsible. Ukrainian nationalists consider him a hero. The Bolsheviks considered him a criminal. They would naturally have considered Pismienny a criminal too.

Who Are the People On This List?

My study of the 900 or so entries on the archival list published online by Romanov shows that the following are the most common identifications of the persons arrested:

Policemen; Polish army officers or former army officers; members of Polish nationalist groups (OZON, Związek Strzelecki, Związek Walki Zbrojnej, ZWZ)⁵; members of Ukrainian nationalist groups (OUN, Petliurists); Polish General Staff; employees of the Polish judicial system (e.g. judges); jailers; border crossers; members of other "c-r [counterrevolutionary] groups"; business and factory owners; landowners; merchants; Polish intelligence; Polish government employees; former White officers; Zionists; people who were actively anti-Soviet; osadniki; Polish politicians.

Plus: one Russian nationalist; one German spy (Ambicki, above)

For "Związek Strzelecki" see https://pl.wikipedia.org/wiki/Związek_Strzelecki ; https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Riflemen's_Association

For Związek Walki Zbrojnej see https://pl.wikipedia.org/wiki/Związek_Walki_Zbrojnej ; https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Union_of_Armed_Struggle

The osadniki, or "settlers," were persons, often military men, sent to "settle" Western Belorussia and Western Ukraine after they had been taken from Soviet Russia in the Polish-Soviet war of 1918-1921. These areas had a minority Polish population. These "settlers" constituted the imperialist infrastructure sent to "polonize" — "make more Polish" — these areas. They were in charge of the intense cultural and political oppression conducted by the prewar Polish government against the native Belorussian, Ukrainian, and Jewish populations. After the Soviets retook these areas in September 1939 and reunited Belorussia and Ukraine they deported the "settlers" and their families.

Conclusion

This so-called "Ukrainian List of Katyn" list is a fraud. It has nothing to do with Katyn. It is not a list of persons executed or to be executed. It is just a list of persons who were convoyed from one place to another. It is not comprised only of Poles. There are many non-Poles — Ukrainians and Jews — on it, including anti-Polish persons (OUN members) and anti-Semites.

The occupations given on this list suggest that this is largely a partial list of the many Poles residents who were considered to be part of the Polish imperialist infrastructure within Western Ukraine. This is the kind of people the Soviets arrested and deported after they retook possession of the Western Ukraine in September 1939.

Forged "Ukrainian Documents of Katyn"

In the summer of 2009 on the official internet site of the Ukrainian State Security (SBU) there appeared three documents that purport to be letters of high officials of the 1960s Ukrainian KGB. These were published by the "Memorial Society," a ferociously anticommunist organization whose officials have been involved in a number of falsifications.

http://memorial.kiev.ua/images/stories/2009/06/05_001_arhivna_sprava.pdf

http://memorial.kiev.ua/images/stories/2009/06/05_002_harkiv_shelest_u_1969.pdf

http://memorial.kiev.ua/images/stories/2009/06/05_005_andropov_harkiv.pdf

http://memorial.kiev.ua/images/stories/2009/06/05_008_andropov_znyschennia_slidiv.pdf

In two of the letters, under the stamp "Top Secret, Eyes Only" (sovershenno sekretno, tol'lw lichno) the Chairman of the KGB of the Ukrainian SSR V. Nikitchenko informs Petro Shelest, first secretary of the Central Committee of the Communist Party of the Ukraine and the Chairman of the KGB of the USSR Iurii Andropov that in the woods near the village of Piatykhatky children had accidentally discovered "a mass grave." Nikitchenko also states that it had been "determined that in this place in 1940 the UNKVD of Khar'kov oblast' had buried a considerable number / several thousand / officers and generals of bourgeois Poland who had been shot..."

In the third letter, also marked "Top Secret" (sov. sekretno), dated June 1959, general-major P. Feshchenko, chief of the Directorate of State Security of Khar'kov oblast', informs Nikitchenko about the destruction of the graves at Piatykhatky by means of caustic soda (sodium hydroxide), capable of completely dissolving human remains, clothing, and documents. However, during exhumations in the 1990s at the special cemetery of the UNKVD at Piatykhatky Polish archeologists did not find any traces of caustic soda. Moreover, they remarked on the "amazingly good" preservation of the remains of uniforms and of paper documents found in the graves.

Nevertheless, supporters of the "official" version judged these letters to be evidence of traces of the Katyn killings in Ukraine. Evidently none of them noticed that in the left corner of Feshchenko's letter there is the following handwritten resolution of Nikitchenko's: "reported to Comrade Shelest P.E." and dated, in the same handwriting, 2008!

The date (enlargement, at right) reads "2008 gd" — "the year 2008." These documents are definitely a fraud. Perhaps one of the forgers had a guilty conscience over this fabrication and deliberately made an error to embarrass the falsifiers?

These letters are a good example of how easily a modern state, with all its resources, can falsify official documents. If it were not for this obviously bogus date these documents would still be cited by supporters of the "official" version as evidence of "the Ukrainian trace of Katyn."

Chapter 14. Conclusion — The Katyn Forest Mystery Solved

The primary source evidence is unambiguous. The Germans, not the Soviets, shot the Polish POWs in the various mass murders known to history as "Katyn."

The reader who knows little about Katyn may suspect that I have biased this study "by omission." Bias by omission involves leaving out, remaining silent about, ignoring, not informing the reader of, evidence that does not support the writer's preconceived conclusion. That reader may suspect that I have simply omitted the evidence that the Soviets were guilty, or that the Germans were innocent.

To such a reader I say: Inform yourself! Start with the Wikipedia page on Katyn: Read the "mainstream" books on Katyn. Read Cienciala and Sanford! If you can find better, more complete, more recent studies that assert the "official" version — I don't know of any — read them. Only then you will be an informed reader. And only then will you know that I have not omitted any evidence that supports the "official" Soviets-did-it version.

Readers who come to this book with some knowledge of Katyn but yet — and this is essential — are able to question what they have heard and to be objective, what is often called "open-minded" — will see that I have discussed the evidence they have heard about, and a lot of material that they probably did not know existed.

But they will still wonder: How is it possible that so many people could have been so mistaken for so long?

Everybody knows that a murder mystery requires a careful, objective investigation during which the investigator gathers all the facts, identifies and collects all the evidence, studies it in a scientific manner, and draws conclusions based on the evidence. The "Katyn Forest Murder Mystery" is no different.

The first prerequisite for any investigator of this or any other mystery is objectivity. It is inevitable that anyone who seriously approaches the Katyn mystery will not only have heard about it but will also have formed some idea about it. Almost inevitably, that idea will be that the Soviets are guilty, because that is the version of Katyn that has dominated scholarly, political, and public discourse about it since at least 1992.

Since there is no way to "erase" one's preconceived biases and ideas from one's brain, a serious investigator has to consciously adopt an attitude of objectivity. She must recognize that she inevitably has a bias. This can only be done by clearly articulating — stating — that bias, first of all, to herself.

Then she has to adopt an attitude of constant mindfulness. She has to employ a strategy of compensating for her bias by giving an especially generous reading to any evidence that seems to go counter to what she already believes about the case — for she does already believe something. Likewise, she must develop a strategy of giving an especially skeptical reading to evidence that tends to support her bias or preconceived idea.

Historian Michael Schudson has said: "Objectivity is an ideology of the distrust of the self." (Schudson 71) This is vital. It is no use to claim to be objective without operationalizing that determination to be objective in the way one identifies, gathers, studies, and draws logical conclusions from, the evidence.

If one is not determined to do everything in one's power to be objective, then one will not be objective. And then what you discover will not be the truth. The history of the "official" version of Katyn illustrates this clearly. Both the Germans and the Polish Government-In-Exile were interested only in a conclusion that indicted the Soviets. Neither made any effort to be objective, and neither were. The Nuremberg Trial produced some testimony that contra-dicted the German AM but little else. The Madden Committee hearings were never a serious attempt to be objective.

The Gorbachev regime believed that blaming the Stalin-era USSR would help to improve relations with a still-friendly Poland. Today's anticommunists embrace the notion of Soviet guilt at Katyn as good propaganda for their cause. For Polish nationalists, Katyn is one of the foundation stones for their reconstruction of a right-wing version of nationalism and a cover-up for atrocious actions of the prewar Polish regimes, the wartime Home Army, and the post-war underground anticommunist terrorists.

Why the "Official" Version of Katyn Is Wrong

Some readers will wonder how it can be that the "official" Soviets-did-it version is false. The scholarly world and the governments of all the countries involved assert just the opposite: that the Soviets, not the Germans, are the guilty party. In the spheres of scholarly, political, and public discourse, the "official" version of Katyn is a "closed case." Soviet guilt — "Stalin's" guilt — is accepted so universally that it is almost never questioned.

Our analysis of the definitive accounts of the "official" version, Cienciala/Materski and Sanford, reveals that they never attempted to "solve the mystery" — to determine just who it was who murdered the Polish prisoners. Instead, they committed the logical fallacy of petitio principii or "begging the question:" they assumed that which they should have been attempting to prove. In effect, they assumed that someone else had already done the job of examining all the evidence and, on that basis, proved Soviet guilt.

Having assumed — rather than demonstrated — that the German Report was truthful and that the Burdenko Commission report had been refuted, they and all other accounts that support the "official" version have simply declared the Soviet case to be false and the evidence supporting it to be fraudulent.

* They ignored the contradictions in the German Report. Likewise they ignored or slandered, but never analyzed, all the evidence not contained in the German Report that proves how invalid it is.

* They assumed that the Soviet citizens who testified for the Germans told the truth while those who testified for the Soviets had been forced to lie.

* They dismissed or ignored altogether the testimony of Drs. Markov and Hájek, both of whom denounced the German Report after the war.

* They ignored or distorted the testimony given at Nuremberg and at the Madden Committee that undermined the case for Soviet guilt.

* They declared that the critiques of BU by defenders of the "official" version are "devastating." In reality these critiques are not only invalid but dishonest. There is still no evidence that BU investigation is faulty, let alone fraudulent in any way.

* They ignored the fact that a number of Ostashkov and Starobel'sk POWs were killed at Katyn, including a number of those named in the German Report itself. They had all the evidence necessary to uncover this fact — all the evidence we have today. But they either never investigated this question at all, or they hushed it up.

*They knew about the suspicious origins of "Closed Packet No. 1" and about the arguments of some researchers that these documents are forgeries. But they never seriously investigated the possibility of forgery. They failed to acknowledge the obvious fact that although the documents cannot be proven false by analysis of the documents alone, neither can they be proven genuine. Much less ought they be assumed to be genuine.

Cienciala and Sanford committed these offenses against responsible scholarly practice because they did not set out to discover who had murdered the Poles in the first place. They never made any attempt to be objective. From the outset they chose to "believe" the Polish anticommunist version—which means they believed the German Nazi version. Then they set out to collect all the arguments they could to support this preconceived idea and to ignore any and all evidence inconsistent with it. This is called "cherry-picking" or the fallacy of incomplete evidence, similar to confirmation bias¹ — and they did it with a vengeance.

After that it was all downhill. They continued to look with special favor upon everything that seemed to be evidence supporting Soviet guilt. They distorted, belittled, dismissed, or ignored anything that appeared to be evidence pointing away from Soviet guilt.

Given their determination to abandon objectivity and their strong anti-Soviet and anticommunist bias it was impossible for Cienciala and Sanford to arrive at the truth in this mystery. They refused to understand that it is a mystery in the first place. Once a researcher commits the cardinal error of deciding the result of the investigation in advance, she is trapped.

All recent books on Katyn, including all of those mentioned in this book, contain a great deal more information than is in the present book. In particular, the works by Shved, Prudnikova and Chigirin, and Mukhin, and the excellent website formerly maintained by the late Sergei Strygin, <http://www.katyn.ru/>, have detailed comparisons and criticisms of the documents in "Closed Packet No. 1".

I have argued that it is not possible through internal analysis alone to tell whether these documents are forgeries or are genuine. However, now that we know that the version of Katyn reflected in them is a false one, the contradictions in them that careful internal examination reveals confirm that which, without that external evidence, we could only suspect — that these documents are fabrications. This analysis is interesting, and some of it is brilliant.

For the person unable to read the Russian works I have cited a page from the "Mythcracker" website. I do not agree with all of the points made there. But it gives an idea of the kind of analysis that has been carried out. I have omitted this kind of analysis here because it is not essential to identifying the guilty party. This book is a "Whodunnit." The mystery had to be solved and the guilty party identified through the collection and study of other evidence.

This book does not offer a point-by-point examination and critique of every false assertion in Cienciala/Materski's and Sanford's books. I have included only the amount of criticism of these works that I think is necessary for the purpose of solving the mystery of Katyn. Both of these books contain a great many more false statements, lies, and fallacious conclusions than can be examined here. A detailed critique of either of these works would be of some interest in itself since they enjoy a high reputation that is utterly undeserved. But such a detailed critique is beyond the limits of this book.

I look forward to reading the reactions, positive and critical, from scholars who, like myself, have been fascinated by what I have irreverently called the "Katyn Forest Whodunnit." In future editions of this book I will include corrections, with my thanks to the readers who have pointed them out.

By the same token those who are interested not in the truth (though they will never admit it) but in arraigning Stalin and the Soviets will condemn and attack me. This is called "shooting the messenger," an all-too-common fallacy among those who do not wish their illusions shattered.

But shattering our illusions is what honest research is all about. For this reason I anticipate such attacks as indirect recognition of the research I have done and welcome criticism from all readers.

Appendix 1. Testimony of Soprunenko, Syromiatnikov, Tokarev

During 1990 — 1992 the Soviet prosecutors' office located three aged and long-retired NKVD men who were involved in some way with the Polish POWs. They were:

- Petr Karpovich Soprunenko, in 1940 Chief of Office for Prisoners of War and Internees;
- Mitrofan Vasil'evich Syromiatnikov, in 1940 senior supervisor in the block of the inner prison of the Directorate of the NKVD of Khar'kov district with the rank of lieutenant;
- Dmitrii Stepanovich Tokarev, in 1940 Acting Chief of the Directorate of the NKVD of Kalin in region.

Before the publication of Closed Packet No. 1 these confessions were the only evidence that the Soviets had shot the Polish POWs, aside from the German Report (AM).

In 1990-1992 each of these men were questioned by representatives of the Soviet, and then of the Ukrainian, investigative services. In addition Syromiatnikov was interviewed by Polish writer Jerzy Morawski.

We do not have the former NKVD men's exact words. Although the interrogations were all conducted in Russian they are available only in Polish translation. The Russian originals have never been made public.¹ In addition, the Polish transcript was made from sound recordings. In the Polish text there are several lacunae where the sound recording was indecipherable to the persons who transcribed the interrogations.

In Tokarev's case there was at least one interrogation that took place before the one we have. No transcript or any information about that interrogation has been published. We do not know whether there are, or were, unpublished interrogations of Soprunenko and Syromiatnikov. However, the sole interrogation we have of Soprunenko bears the subtitle "Pierwsze przesłuchanie" — "first interrogation." This suggests that other interrogations of Soprunenko did take place. But we do not have them.

These confessions are very contradictory in ways that often do not reinforce the "official" version. None of these men was at Katyn where the 4000+ bodies of Polish POWs were unearthed by the Germans in 1943, and none of them has anything to say about this, the most famous of the execution/burial sites subsumed under the rubric "the Katyn massacre."

All three men were threatened repeatedly with criminal prosecution if they failed to "tell the truth." In addition, they were told that Soviet guilt had already been established. In reality, this was a lie. In 1990 — 1991 there was no evidence other than the German AM Report alleging Soviet guilt. The documents from "Closed Packet No. 1" had not yet been published.²

² There is at least one account by an alleged actual witness — that of Petr F. Klimov. It was published in the November 16, 1990 issue of the newspaper Moskovskie Novosti. Cienciala calls it an "alleged" account and Polish sources do not use it.

It is therefore possible that out of fear of prosecution the former NKVD men gave answers they believed their interrogators wanted. So it does appear that the confessions of these three old men were not entirely voluntary. Many of the interrogators' questions were "leading" questions. Of course this is common in criminal investigations. But it would have been obvious what answers the investigators wanted to hear. That kind of atmosphere is fatal to obtaining trustworthy testimony.

The Polish translations of the interrogations of Soprunenko, Syromiatnikov, and Tokarev were published in Polish journals and then republished in the official Polish government collections Zeszyty Katyńskie and Katyń. Dokumenty Zbrodni (KDZ) volume 2. One additional interrogation of Syromiatnikov was published by Jerzy Morawski, a director of documentary films, in one of his books. These interrogations are seldom referred to any longer. Perhaps this is due to the problems that we identify in this chapter.

Soprunenko October 25, 1990

Soprunenko, who was in overall charge of the Office of POWs and Internees, should certainly have been one of those who knew about the executions, if they had taken place. Many documents signed by him relating to the Polish POWs survive. They are reprinted in the Polish-language KDZ series and in a similar Russian-language collection. None of these documents mention anything about Poles being executed.

Soprunenko's testimony is very contradictory. On the one hand he claimed that he knew nothing about any NKVD orders to shoot the Poles (428) and knew nothing about any shootings. (430) In fact he claimed that he only heard about the Katyn shootings in April 1990, when Polish President General Jaruzelski visited Moscow. (429) On the other hand Soprunenko also said that in 1940 he had heard "rumors" (śluchy and pogłoski) about a Central Committee decision signed by Stalin that had been the basis for shooting the Poles.

The sole interrogation that we have of Soprunenko is titled „Pierwsze przesłuchanie”, "first interrogation." This suggests that there were more of them. But only this one, dated October 25, 1990, has been published.

Syromiatnikov

There are six interrogations of Syromiatnikov. We use the five from KDZ volume 2, and the sixth from Jerzy Morawski's book Ślad Kuli (Warsaw and London, 1992). In the following, page numbers preceded by the letter M denote pages in Morawski's book; numbers alone denote pages in KDZ volume 2.

Syromiatnikov testified that he had just heard about the Katyn massacres from the mass media. (475, 476) He said that, when the Poles were brought down to the cellar of the NKVD building, there was always a prokuror

(prosecutor) present. (477; 484; M 113, 124) Syromiatnikov also said that the Polish prisoners whom he accompanied were interrogated. (M 124)

The prokuror and interrogations imply the charge of a criminal offense, an investigation, and an attempt to make sure that the individual being executed was the person against whom a sentence had been passed. It does not fit the notion of a mass killing of all POWs. Syromiatnikov stated several times that he was told that the Polish prisoners had been involved in a rebellion in a Soviet camp. (478; M 110, 120)

Syromiatnikov stated repeatedly that only about 200 (385) or 300 (487) prisoners were shot while he was working at the prison. Thereafter he fell sick and when he returned the Poles were no longer there. (M 117-9) When two of the Russian interrogators, Snezhko and Tretetskii, insisted that 4000 Poles were killed at Khar'kov Syromiatnikov said that he did not know how many Poles were involved in all but thought that neither the Khar'kov NKVD prison nor, more to the point, the burial site at Piatykhatky could hold 4000. (M 121-2)

In an interesting contradiction Syromiatnikov first testified that one woman was among the Polish prisoners and that she was certainly shot (480; 489) But in the later interview with Morawski Syromiatnikov retracted this statement and claimed that he did not know whether the woman was a Pole or a Russian (M 114)

Syromiatnikov's testimony is consistent with the idea that some Poles were tried and executed for some anti-Soviet crimes or other. He claimed to know about executions of only 200-300 Poles. In short, Syromiatnikov's testimony does not confirm the "official" version of the Katyn massacre.

Tokarev October 25, 1990

Dmitriy S. Tokarev was Acting Chief of the Directorate of the NKVD of Kalinin region and directly in charge of the prison in Kalinin to which Polish POWs from Ostashkov camp were sent. Tokarev's interrogation is the longest and most interesting since Tokarev claims that he knew that the Soviets had shot the Polish prisoners. We'll briefly review what he says.

Problematic aspects and contradictions in his account include the following issues:

- Tokarev clearly refers to a previous interrogation (433, 446) that we do not have. Why don't we?
- In this previous interrogation Tokarev repeatedly says he was told about a Politburo decree, "postanovlenie Politbiuro." (433, 435, 447; 468) His Soviet interrogators agree with him.

This would appear to be impossible. The "Politburo decree" is in "Closed Packet No. 1" which was not even discovered until late in 1991 (according to Gorbachev). Yet here is Tokarev stating, and the Soviet interrogators agreeing, that he was told about it in a previous interrogation, i.e. previous to October 25, 1990, when the present interrogation took place.

There's no reason to believe that Tokarev is lying here, especially since the Russian interrogators agree with him. This means that somebody knew about the Politbiuro decree long before Gorbachev or his right-hand man Iakovlev supposedly knew about it. It appears that someone knew that the Politbiuro decree would be forthcoming.

How can this be? Unless the forgery was in the process of preparation and would be produced at some point, and that the Soviet investigators knew this. This is further evidence suggesting that "Closed Packet No. 1" is a forgery.

* Tokarev claimed that he did know that 14,000 Polish POWs were to be shot. First he said that Bogdan Kobulov told him this. (435) A few pages later he claimed that Soprunenko told him. (447) But Soprunenko claimed that he did not know anything about any shootings.

* Tokarev stated twice that he knew that 6000 Polish policemen were shot at Kalinin. (462, 471) He even argues with Iablokov, one of the Soviet interrogators. Iablokov claimed that 6287 Poles were shot at Kalinin but Tokarev said that he remembered the number 6295.

We know that many Ostashkov POWs who were shipped to the NKVD in Kalinin — that is, to Tokarev — were not shot there because their bodies turned up in the German and Soviet exhumations at Katyn and at Volodymyr-Volyns'kiy, Ukraine. Therefore Tokarev must have been lying to please his Soviet interrogators who insist that all the Ostashkov POWs were shot at Kalinin and are buried at Mednoe.

Why would Tokarev lie? Probably because he was warned of serious consequences — criminal prosecution — if he did not tell the truth, and because he had been informed that the Soviets were guilty. As we have seen, he was also told that a Politburo decree had ordered that the Poles be shot, even though no such decree was known when Tokarev was interrogated.

Therefore something else must have taken place before this interrogation as a result of which Tokarev had decided to say what his interrogators wanted him to say. We should recall that prior interrogation to which Tokarev refers but which has never been made public.

* Tokarev testified (441-442) that NKVD executioner Blokhin arrived at Kalinin with a "suitcase full of Walthers [German automatic pistols]."

It is sometimes stated in books about Katyn that this meant Blokhin did not have confidence in the Soviet pistols, the Tokarev "TT" and Nagan (the latter is a revolver). In fact it means the opposite. A single pistol of average quality should be capable of shooting 6000 shots. The Tokarev automatic was famous for being very rugged.

In short, there was no reason for an NKVD man to use Walthers at all, much less many of them. However, only German ammunition was found in the mass graves at Katyn. Presumably it was useful to enhance the credibility of the "official" version that there be at least one more instance of the Soviet NKVD using German weapons. We already know that Tokarev lied about the number of Polish POWs shot at Kalinin. Evidently he lied about the "Walthers" as well.

* Interrogator Iablokov did not seem to know that in 1940 the "Osoboe Soveshchanie" ("Special Commission") of the NKVD did not have the authority to sentence anyone to execution.

Jablokow: Dmitriju Stiepanowiczu, wyjasnijcie, kto kierowal sprawy sledcze przeciwko polskim jencom wojennym, glównie rozpatrywal sprawy sledcze do decyzji Kolegium Specjalnego? Kto mógł to kierowac? (445)

Jablokow: Dmitriju Stiepanowiczu, znacie taki tryb wykonania wyroków, Se zwykle odczytywana jest decyzja. Wówczas byla decyzja uchwały Kolegium Specjalnego. Czy im odczytywano uchwałę Kolegium Specjalnego? (446)

Yablokov: Dmitriy Stepanovich, please explain who led the investigation of the case against the Polish prisoners of war, who chiefly dealt with the matter of investigation before the decision of the Special Commission? Who could it have been?

Yablokov: Dmitriy Stepanovich, you know the mode of execution of the judgments that usually is read the decision. Then there was a decision of a resolution of the Special Commission. Did they read the resolution of the Special Commission?

Is it possible that Iablokov, a military procurator and lieutenant colonel of Justice, did not know that in 1940 the "Osoboe Soveshchanie" could not sentence defendants to more than eight years of confinement?

* Tokarev said that he saw no bodies of anyone who was shot. (458) This would be hard to believe if 6300 men had in fact been shot at his facility. He said that no officers were shot (448) and that hardly any of the Poles were in uniform. (451) By "officers" he may mean military officers, and this was true — the prisoners at Ostashkov were policemen, not military. However, Polish policemen wore uniforms too. All but a few bodies disinterred by the Germans at Katyn were in uniform, while shreds of Polish uniform were found in the mass graves at Volodymyr-Volyns'kiy.

* Tokarev was asked whether treelings were planted over the mass graves at Mednoe. (461) Iablokov asked him, presumably because, according to the Germans, treelings were planted over the mass graves at Katyn. Iablokov probably did not know that Burdenko wrote that the planting of treelings over the mass graves of their victims was a feature of the German mass murders he had investigated (see chapter 9)

* During the interrogation of Tokarev Col. Iablokov quoted from a number of case files of Polish POWs who were, according to Iablokov's remarks, charged with criminal offenses. These case files might be important, since they indicate an individualized approach to the Polish POWs that contradicts the notion that all of them were sentenced to death with either minimal or no investigation at all. But none of these criminal case files have been published.

Conclusion

None of these interrogation-confessions can withstand careful scrutiny. The witnesses had been threatened, and either claimed to remember too much (Tokarev) or hardly anything (Soprunenko, Syromiatnikov) There are many unanswered questions about them: previous interrogations that are not published; whereabouts of the transcripts of the Russian originals; and the many contradictions and outright falsifications contained in them. They are seldom cited today. Certainly the "official" version of Katyn cannot be based on them alone.

Corrected Edition April 2019

About Grover Furr's research, originally on the back cover:

It is no wonder that his work has already been translated into over a dozen languages. His work is riveting and revolutionary in its assessments. It is up to those who disagree with him to present the same kind of meticulous research.

— Professor Anthony Gronowicz, Borough of Manhattan Community College, City University of New York. Associate Editor, The Journal of Labor and Society

Grover Furr moves with perfect ease with the Russian language and Russian archives. Without being intimidated by political correctness his research and documentation are precise, patient, and meticulous.

— Professor Domenico Losurdo, University of Urbino, Italy

About The Mystery of the Katyn Massacre. The Evidence, The Solution

For a long time academics believed the Nazi propaganda that the Soviets were the guilty ones. Not so, and the evidence from original documents is right here in Professor Grover Furr's book.

— Joseph Hancock, Los Angeles

About Leon Trotsky's Collaboration with Germany and Japan

In this extraordinary book, Professor Furr refutes many of the anti-communist lies about the Moscow trials in the Soviet Union in the late 1930s. In particular, he exposes the lies about the leaders of the Opposition. He shows that the defendants were indeed guilty of treason.

— William Podmore, author of British Foreign Policy Since 1789 and The War Against the Working Class

Preface

Read Me First

The present book is an exhaustive critique of Stephen Kotkin, Stalin. Waiting For Hitler, 1929-1941 (New York: Penguin, 2017). This is the second volume of what Kotkin, a professor of history at Princeton University and a Fellow at the Hoover Institution, intends to be a three-volume work and the definitive biography of Joseph Stalin.

This book is written primarily for those who will never read Kotkin's book. It has to be — because very, very few people will in fact read this humongous tome (= a large book) — humongous in size, and also in dishonesty.

The reader will not learn the history of the Soviet Union during 1929-1941 from Kotkin's book. Kotkin's book is completely unreliable. It is filled with false statements and unsupported assumptions.

It is dedicated to convincing the reader that Joseph Stalin was a monster, a mass murderer and all-round evil person, and that the Soviet Union during his day was little short of a hell on earth. It is also devoted to trashing the idea of communism itself, partly through associating the communist movement with the monster Stalin, partly by smuggling in the notion that market capitalism is a far better form of political and social organization.

Kotkin has not attempted to write an accurate, objective account of Stalin's life during these years. Instead, he cherry-picks phony evidence to try to "prove" his very negative views about Stalin, the Soviet Union, and the communist movement.

Few readers will read this huge book. Of the very few readers who do manage to make it through the text, only a tiny fraction will read more than a small handful of the footnotes. And of those, how many will actually check the references in the footnotes, in order to see whether they do, in fact, provide evidence for the statements Kotkin makes in the text alleging crimes by Stalin?

If you think "No one will," you are almost correct. For this is what I have done.

The book in your hands (or on your screen) contains the results of my careful check-up of Kotkin's claims of criminal and/or atrocious acts by Stalin and the Soviet leadership.

I have written this book so that you don't have to read Kotkin's. You can find out what Kotkin has to say about Stalin and the events of Soviet history from 1928 to 1941, and how Kotkin falsifies the history of this period. And you can do all this in fewer than 400 pages.

The chapters are organized according to the major historical events of the Soviet 1930s, as Kotkin deals with them. You can select the topics that interest you most. When you read a chapter in my book, you will learn what Kotkin has to say about the events in question; how he falsifies them; and get a brief account of what the real state of affairs is as demonstrated by the best evidence available today.

You should read this book instead of reading Kotkin's book. If you haven't bought his book, don't bother! If you have bought it, then you can consult it if you should ever doubt my analysis of this or that incident. Then you can use it for a doorstep.

You should read this book if you want to know how Soviet history of the Stalin period is distorted, falsified, mangled, by mainstream historiography. You can learn about the Anti-Stalin Paradigm — the false and dishonest model of Soviet history to which mainstream historians are expected to conform and to which almost all of them do in fact conform.

You can use this book as a kind of reference work. What does the best available evidence show about these events? How is the mainstream, "official," history wrong about them?

If you have suspected that this or that event of the Soviet 1930s may have been distorted by mainstream historians, you can read up on it here.

If you have trusted the mainstream historical portrait of Stalin and of the Soviet 1930s, you are in for a big shock!

I've written this book for those who will read Kotkin's book and for those who won't manage to get through it.

But I have written it especially for those who never intend to even try to read Kotkin's monstrosity.

If you have not yet decided to read Kotkin's book, take my advice: Don't waste your time! Read this book instead. You'll not just learn more — what you learn will be true. Read Kotkin, and what you learn will be all wrong and you will have to unlearn it — by reading this book.

Introduction

"The Right To Lie In The Service Of Power"

The right to lie in the service of power is guarded with considerable vigor and passion. This becomes evident whenever anyone takes the trouble to demonstrate that charges against some official enemy are inaccurate or, sometimes, pure invention. The immediate reaction among the commissars is that the person is an apologist for the real crimes of official enemies.

— Noam Chomsky¹

¹ "Interview" by James Peck. The Chomsky Reader. Pantheon: New York. 1987. 37.

The first volume of Stephen Kotkin's biography of Joseph Stalin is titled Stalin. Volume One. Paradoxes of Power, 1878-1928. It was published in 2014. As the title suggests, in it Kotkin discusses Stalin's life up to late in the year 1928.

The last chapter of the book is titled "Coda: If Stalin Had Died." Much of this chapter is about the collectivization of agriculture in the Soviet Union. But this subject is not dealt with in Volume One!

It is reserved for the opening chapters of Volume Two, the volume that we examine and critique here.

If this "coda" was supposed to somehow argue that Stalin's life up to 1928 made the policy of agricultural collectivization inevitable, or possible, or something, it fails. In it Kotkin does make the claim that agricultural modernization would have been both possible and less costly under a market capitalist system. But he does not even try to demonstrate how that might be done. His depiction of collectivization as a brutal failure is not only not proven — it is unargued, simply assumed.

I did not read this "coda" until I had read volume one itself, almost a year after its publication. In November 2014, the same year as the book's publication, Kotkin published an abbreviated version of the "coda" in the New York Review of Books.² A friend sent me this essay as soon as he received the issue. Of course that magazine could contain no evidence for the assertions made in it, and I did not expect any. But I was puzzled by the fact that the essay started with an event not covered in the book — collectivization. Moreover, I also knew that his depiction of collectivization runs counter to the best research on the subject. It did not augur well for the yet-to-come Volume Two.

² "If Stalin Had Died ..." NYRB November 6, 2014, 34-35,

When, a few months later, I did read Volume One I was surprised again. After reading Kotkin's terribly inaccurate depiction of collectivization and his praise of capitalism and markets — de rigueur for a "fellow" of the right-wing anticommunist propaganda mill that is the Hoover Institution — I found that Kotkin's depiction of Stalin in Volume One was relatively objective, without any phony allegations of "crimes."

On several topics — for example, the question of the forgery of "Lenin's Testament" — Volume One breaks from the pattern of anti-Stalin polemics that normally passes for history in mainstream Soviet studies. Still, that "coda" was a clear sign that Volume Two would be very different, lacking in objectivity, gravid with unproven accusations of "crimes" of Stalin.

And so it is! Volume Two was published in October, 2017. Having spent many years researching Soviet history of the 1930s, I immediately saw that this second volume repeats a number of falsehoods about major political events, in conformity with the dominant and all-too-familiar model in mainstream Soviet historiography, the model that I call the "Anti-Stalin Paradigm." (ASP)

I saw too that there were many specific incidents discussed in Volume Two that I had not come across before. The first of these was a tale of minor importance: "Klim — There were no mistakes..." (See the first section of Chapter 11). Here Kotkin accuses Stalin of — what? A peccadillo, at most?

Perhaps this story was true, then? So I researched it. It was difficult to obtain the materials to do so (I suspect that Kotkin never bothered).

At length I was able to verify that, sure enough, it is a phony story, with no evidence behind it. At this point I thought: "What if the whole book is like this?" I was hooked! I realized that I had to know.

I have done similar research projects before.

* Between 2005 and 2011 I researched and wrote a book proving that Nikita Khrushchev's famous "Secret Speech" is made up of lies from beginning to end. That speech to the XX Party Congress of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union on February 25, 1956, the speech in which Khrushchev depicted Stalin as a brutal dictator who had committed many murders and other crimes, had shocked the world and fatally undermined the international communist movement. Yet it is a tissue of falsehoods. (Furr, Khrushchev Lied)

* Between 2010 and 2013 I checked all the references in Matthew Lenoe's massive 820+ pages) tome The Kirov Murder and Soviet History (Yale University Press, 2010). I did so because while studying it I noted many errors of reasoning and many logical fallacies in this work, which comes to the conventional, acceptable conclusion that Sergei Kirov, First Secretary of Leningrad, was killed by a "lone gunman." I spent years in checking Lenoe's evidence, and then in compiling much evidence that Lenoe and others had omitted. In the end I reached the conclusion — inevitable, given the evidence — that the Soviet courts had gotten it right: Kirov was indeed killed by a clandestine conspiratorial group of followers of Grigory Zinoviev. This important case led inexorably to the uncovering of the widespread anti-Soviet conspiracies uncovered in the later 1930s. (Furr, Kirov)

* In 2011-2014 I checked every single allegation of wrongdoing of any kind by Stalin, the Soviet Union, and communists generally, in Yale professor Timothy Snyder's award-winning book Bloodlands. At the end of 30 months of research I concluded that Snyder's book too contains not a single accurate allegation of crime of any kind by Stalin. Every one of such allegations is false, a fabrication, either by Snyder himself or by the intensely anticommunist scholars, mainly Polish and Ukrainian, whose works Snyder relied on. (Furr, Blood Lies)

So I set out to do likewise with Kotkin's Volume Two, with one difference. The book is too long, 1154 pages long: 909 pages of text; 160 pages of triple-columned footnotes in tiny type; and 51 pages of bibliography, also triple-columned in tiny type, plus an index. Therefore, unlike Khrushchev's speech and Snyder's much shorter book, it would not be possible to check every fact-claim in it. But not necessary, either.

Procedure

- I have selected ten issues in the high politics of Soviet history during the 1930s, and thoroughly researched Kotkin's account of each of them.
- I have added another two chapters of various allegations of lesser importance where Kotkin alleged some kind of misdeed, criminal or moral, by Stalin.
- A Chapter on "strategies of misdirection in Kotkin's book" is an attempt to analyze the different techniques and also the errors of method and logic — perhaps intentional, perhaps due to incompetence — which Kotkin utilizes in order to create the wildly distorted portrait of Stalin and Soviet policies that he promotes in this meretricious book.
- I have also added two chapters on central problems concerning Kotkin's research: his lack of source criticism, and his use of bias by omission.

This book deals with all the alleged crimes and atrocities that Kotkin charges Stalin with. It includes all the passages where Kotkin alleges any kind of reprehensible behavior or even insensitivity on Stalin's part.

The "Klim — There were no mistakes..." story is an example of something we will see a great many times in this book: Kotkin cannot be trusted to use his sources accurately or honestly. When Kotkin makes an assertion of fact, or fact-claim, about some crime or misdeed involving Stalin, the sources for this fact-claim must be double-checked.

Upon checking Kotkin's source we normally find either (1) that his source does not support what Kotkin's text says or implies that it does; or (2) that the source does reflect what Kotkin says in his text but that source itself is dishonest, in that (a) it does not reflect what its own evidence states or (b) its source is yet another secondary source which, when it is examined in turn, does not support the fact-claims given; or (c) it cites no evidence at all.

Devoid of Integrity

The present book presents a detailed, heavily documented critique of Stalin, Vol. Two. In it I document my conclusion: Every one of Kotkin's charges of crimes or atrocities alleged by Kotkin against Stalin is false. I demonstrate this by checking the evidence Kotkin cites; by including when appropriate the evidence which Kotkin's sources cite; and by citing other evidence that he omits.

Here is an important paragraph from the document "Statement on Standards of Professional Conduct (updated 2018)," by the American Historical Association.

Historians should practice their craft with integrity. They should honor the historical record. They should document their sources. They should acknowledge their debts to the work of other scholars. They should respect and welcome divergent points of view even as they argue and subject those views to critical scrutiny. They should remember that our collective enterprise depends on mutual trust. And they should never betray that trust.³

³ Cited at <https://www.historians.org/jobs-and-professional-development/statements-standards-and-guidelines-of-the-discipline/statement-on-standards-of-professional-conduct>

It is the professional responsibility of historians to acknowledge disputes and disagreements in the fields they research. But Kotkin never informs his readers about the scholarly disputes that exist over many of these issues, whether it be the famine (except in the footnotes only), the Ezhovshchina or "Great Terror," the Katyn massacre, the Moscow Trials, the Tukhachevsky Affair, the Spanish Civil War, or others. Every time Kotkin repeats an anti-Stalin position without any qualification.

It is an historian's responsibility to document her sources. Kotkin routinely violates this tenet of the historian's craft. A great many of his footnotes — the form his documentation of sources normally takes — are phony. They appear to be the evidence of careful research. But, as I prove in this book in sometimes painstaking detail, they do not give evidence for Kotkin's fact-claims about the crimes he attributes to Stalin.

It is not only that many statements in Kotkin's book are factually false. These false statements do not occur randomly. There is a systematic quality to all of these falsehoods: every one is tendentiously anticommunist. I realized that I would have to carefully check, one by one, every factual statement about the Soviet leadership or Soviet actions that had a negative tendency, every allegation of a crime or an atrocity.

My working hypothesis was as follows: I would find that many of Kotkin's anti-Stalin or anti-Soviet assertions or "fact-claims" were false, not supported by the evidence Kotkin cites or indeed by any evidence. My further hypothesis was that the secondary sources Kotkin cites in support of these statement would either not support Kotkin's fact-claims, or would themselves be fallacious, unsupported by the evidence (if any) that they cited.

My research has fully corroborated both of these hypotheses. In fact, I discovered that my initial hypothesis was too cautious. I have found not that many, but that all of Kotkin's fact-claims of an anti-Stalin tendency are false. In this book I present the results of that research.

Organization of This Book

The chapters in this book adhere to the following method of presentation. After an introductory section I quote every passage in which Kotkin makes a fact-claim that accuses Stalin of some crime or that tends to reflect negatively upon Stalin. Then the evidence Kotkin cites to support his statement(s), normally found in a footnote, is identified and, where possible, reproduced. Then each of the sources in that footnote, whether primary or secondary, is checked and verified in order to assess whether that source provides support for Kotkin's fact-claim.

In the case of secondary sources I have checked further for the primary sources that these secondary sources use. This is essential because the fact that one historian agrees with another does not constitute evidence. Only primary sources are evidence.

In each instance where Kotkin cites another secondary source in a footnote I have obtained and studied the primary source evidence upon which that secondary source relies. This procedure continues until we reach the primary sources upon which all the other secondary sources are based, or until we discover that, in reality, there is no primary source evidence supporting the series of fact-claims, which are thereby revealed to be falsifications. This method is essential in order to verify Kotkin's fact-claims concerning Stalin's "crimes" — or, as it turns out, in order to demonstrate that they are, without exception, false.

Whenever possible I have given a summary title or subheading to each of the passages from Kotkin's book. The purpose of this subheading is to aid the reader in deciding whether he or she wants to examine these fact-claims, or wishes to pick and choose, examining some and passing over others.

At the time of this writing (January, 2019) no one else has taken the trouble to do this. This would not be a bad thing if Kotkin's book were generally ignored. Historians of the USSR, like historians generally, should spend their time doing honest research and discovering the truth, rather than double-checking every fact-claim and allegation made by other historians. But Kotkin's book is very influential, as are his published articles in semi-popular journals and the YouTube videos of his talks. Kotkin's fact-claims about crimes of Stalin are normally assumed to be true, while the reality is that they are always false. Through books such as Stalin, Vol. Two falsehoods become accepted as truths, the current of historical understanding polluted.

The Anti-Stalin Paradigm

In the present book I demonstrate, using Kotkin's own sources and other evidence, that not a single one of the accusations that Kotkin levels against Stalin is true. Such a conclusion demands explanation, and I outline my own views in the final chapter. One important element of that explanation is what I call the "Anti-Stalin Paradigm," (ASP) about which a little should be said here.

Khrushchev Lied

In February, 1956, at the XX Congress of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union, Nikita Khrushchev, First Secretary of the Party and leader of the Soviet state, gave a "secret speech" in which he accused Stalin (and Lavrentii Beria) of great crimes. At the XXII Party Congress in 1961 Khrushchev and other Party leaders under him went even further in their attacks on Stalin. After that and until Khrushchev's ouster in October 1964 a flood of pseudo-scholarly Soviet works were published in which accusations about Stalin's "crimes" multiplied wildly.

Since the Bolshevik Revolution itself the academic field of Soviet history has been dominated by anticommunist bias. Khrushchev's 1956 "Secret Speech," the anti-Stalin speeches at the XXII Party Congress and the ensuing torrent of Khrushchev-orchestrated fabrications, became the basis for the avalanche of anti-Stalin books that followed. Notable among them was, for example, Robert Conquest's tome The Great Terror, which drew heavily upon these Khrushchev-era materials (although Conquest also used, indiscriminately, any and all anti-Stalin works he could find, including many that preceded Khrushchev's speech).

In an earlier article Vladimir L. Bobrov and I examined the last chapter of Stephen F. Cohen's book Bukharin and the Bolshevik Revolution (1973), one of the most influential anti-Stalin books based on Khrushchev-era materials. There we showed (a) that Cohen relied entirely upon Khrushchev-era "revelations" in this chapter on Bukharin's life between 1930 and 1938; and (b) that every single "revelation" Cohen makes in that long chapter is demonstrably false.⁴

Gorbachev Lied Too

The Khrushchev-era Soviet works were not simply the result of bias. Rather, they were deliberate lies.⁵ Khrushchev and his men had all the evidence of the Soviet archives everything we have today plus much, much more. The same is true of Mikhail Gorbachev's people, who churned out an even bigger avalanche of anti-Stalin falsehoods after 1987, an avalanche that continues to the present day.

⁴ Furr, Grover and Vladimir L. Bobrov. "Stephen Cohen's Biography of Bukharin: A Study in the Falsehood of Khrushchev-Era 'Revelations'." Cultural Logic, 2010. At <https://ojs.library.ubc.ca/index.php/clogic/article/view/191531/188643>.

⁵ Alexander Solzhenitsyn was one writer who got his start, and considerable fame, thanks to Khrushchev. Michael Scammell, author of a recent biography, calls Solzhenitsyn "a truth-teller." Nothing could be more false! Solzhenitsyn's works, valuable as anticommunist propaganda during the Cold War, are worthless as history and are rightly ignored even by mainstream historians today.

The academic field of Soviet history of the Stalin period has been constructed around the more or less uncritical acceptance of, first, Khrushchev-era, and second, of Gorbachev-era and post-Soviet-era lies. These lies cannot be sustained in the face of the evidence now available from former Soviet archives. However, to admit this would imply that the works of dozens of historians of the USSR, during several generations, are poisoned at the root — as, indeed, they are.

Therefore the "Anti-Stalin Paradigm," as I call this model of Stalin-era Soviet history, goes unchallenged. As long as it continues to serve anticommunist ideological purposes, and as long as the truth can be ignored, buried, hidden, or otherwise disregarded, the demonization of Stalin, the Soviet leadership of his day, and the communist movement continues to perform its useful function in the economy of anticommunist propaganda, propped up by the prestige of academic experts in many countries. This is the tradition that has produced works like Kotkin's Stalin, Vol. Two.

The authors of such books do not have to fear that their falsehoods will be exposed by their peers in the field of Soviet history, because anti-Stalin lies are very seldom exposed as such. In such an atmosphere, where the historian can accuse Stalin and the USSR of almost any crime, can say virtually anything as long as it has an anti-Stalin bias, a kind of "Gresham's Law" comes into play. Bad research drives out the good or — at the very least — makes the honest researcher very cautious, very careful not to challenge the prevailing paradigm. This is the academic and political environment that makes fraudulent works like Stalin, Vol. Two possible.

Concerning the portrayal of Stalin by anticommunist historians like Kotkin, Professor Domenico Losurdo of the University of Urbino, Italy, writes:

Les philosophes aiment à s'interroger en évoquant non seulement les événements historiques mais aussi les catégories avec lesquelles nous interprétons ces événements. Aujourd'hui, quelle est donc la catégorie avec laquelle on interprète Staline? Celle de folie sanguinaire. Cette catégorie a été déjà utilisée contre Robespierre, contre la révolution de 1848, contre la Commune, mais jamais contre la guerre, ni contre Louis XVI, ni contre les Girondins ou Napoléon. Pour ce qui concerne le XXème siècle, nous avons des études psychopathologiques sur Lénine, Staline, Trotski, Mao, mais pas, par exemple contre Churchill. Or, tout le groupe dirigeant bolchevik se prononçait contre l'expansionnisme colonial, tandis que Churchill écrivait « la guerre est un jeu auquel il faut sourire. » Il y eut ensuite le carnage de la Première Guerre mondiale, le groupe dirigeant bolchevik, Staline compris, est contre ce carnage, mais Churchill déclare encore : « la guerre est le plus grand jeu de l'histoire universelle, nous jouons ici la mise la plus élevée, la guerre constitue l'unique sens aigu de notre vie ». Alors, pourquoi l'approche psychopathologique dans un cas et pas dans l'autre?⁶

Translation:

In their discussions philosophers like to evoke not only historical events but also the categories with which we interpret these events. Today, what is the category with which Stalin is interpreted? That of bloodthirsty madness. This category has already been used against Robespierre, against the Revolution of 1848, against the Paris Commune, but never against war, or against Louis XVI, or against the Girondins or Napoleon. Regarding the twentieth century, we have psychopathological studies of Lenin, Stalin, Trotsky, Mao, but not, for example, of Churchill. However, all of the Bolshevik leaders spoke up against colonial expansionism, while Churchill wrote: "War is a game at which one should smile." Then there was the carnage of the First World War. The Bolshevik leadership group, including Stalin, was against this carnage, but Churchill said again: "War is the greatest game in world history, here I play with the highest stakes, war is the sole acute sensation of our lives." So why the psychopathological approach in the one case and not in the other?

Khrushchev, Gorbachev, and Phony History

All historians of the Soviet Union know that Khrushchev and the "historians" whose works he sponsored, and Gorbachev and the "historians" he sponsored, were lying. If they do not know that, they are utterly incompetent to do Soviet history. The documents from former Soviet archives that have been published since the end of the USSR permit no other conclusion.

In the case of Khrushchev's and Gorbachev's men the word "lie" is completely justified — in fact, is essential — because these people had all the evidence: everything we now have that has been published from former Soviet archives, plus much, much more.

It is hard indeed to imagine that Kotkin is ignorant of these basic facts. But he never tells his readers about this. Of course, if he did so he would not be able to use dishonest Khrushchev- and Gorbachev-era secondary sources as his "evidence."

Fabrications, Falsifications, and Lies

It will shock many readers to learn that a major work by a prominent historian can be, at base, a chain of untruths, its scholarly trappings a demonstrable fraud, a trap intended to lure the unwary or the hopelessly biased into believing falsehoods. Rightly so — we should be shocked and outraged by this kind of historical fraudulence. Yet Stalin, Vol. Two is precisely such a book. That is the inevitable conclusion of my study.

It will appear to readers that many of Kotkin's fact-claims are almost certainly "lies" in the strict sense. That is, they must have been made with conscious decision to deceive rather than as the expression of bias coupled with ignorance. At the same time many readers will assume that the word "lie" should only be used when deliberate dishonesty by a writer can be clearly demonstrated.

For this reason I am reluctant to have recourse to the word "lie." In all cases where deliberate intent to deceive cannot be clearly demonstrated by the evidence I use another term such as "fabrication" or "falsification" that connotes something made up, not contained in any of the evidence cited. As I have written elsewhere,

[I]t is easy to underestimate the power of a well-established, privileged preconceived framework of analysis on the minds of any researcher who is himself seriously biased. The pressures, both psychological and academic, to reach a conclusion acceptable to leading figures in the field of Soviet history, as well as to officials in Russia who control access to archives, are considerable indeed. Consequently, the disadvantages, professionally and otherwise, of reaching a conclusion that, no matter how well demonstrated, will be displeasing to powerful forces in the archival, political, and academic communities, are clear to anyone who is familiar with the highly politicized nature of the field of Soviet and indeed of all of communist history. (Furr, Kirov 7)

Accordingly I consider the word "lie" to be appropriate only when the evidence clearly shows that Kotkin has made a statement in flagrant disregard for the truth, such as a statement that is not supported in the source Kotkin cites in support of it or is even contradicted by that source. Yet even in such cases we should not rule out the power of a preconceived framework plus a strong bias to "blind" a non-objective historian like Kotkin to evidence and conclusions that are incompatible with the ASP.

Objectivity and the Truth

It is a commonplace today that Stalin committed mass murders and gross atrocities. This belief is like the notions, almost universal before the 20th century (and by no means dead even today) that women and non-whites are "intellectually inferior." Those notions were "common sense," taken for granted by almost every "white" male of European ancestry, including scientists. They were questioned by few, firmly rejected by fewer still. Yet they were never true. They were (and are) avidly promoted because they served (and, in some circles, still serve) definite political and economic interests.

An objective study of the evidence now available shows that, contrary to "what everybody knows" — what I call "the Anti-Stalin Paradigm" — none of the mass murders, atrocities, and other crimes alleged against Stalin can be verified by the evidence. Not one of them! On the contrary: the evidence now available proves that Stalin was not guilty of even a single one of the crimes Kotkin is eager to arraign him for.

Because this conclusion will shock many readers, the evidence supporting it must be more fully expounded than is normally the case in historical studies. After all, a major conclusion of this book is that, on any important matter, the fact-claims even of renowned historians should never be simply "believed" — accepted as true. Instead they must be verified. Why, then, should any reader accept the fact-claims in this book — namely, that some statement in Stalin, Vol. Two is false — when the same book cautions them not to believe Kotkin?

Accordingly, the footnotes, references, and — where necessary — the primary documents essential for any reader to check my conclusions, are reproduced here. This adds to the length of this study. But there is no other way to document such a travesty of historical scholarship as Stalin, Vol. Two presents us with.

The aim of the present study is to examine the allegations by Kotkin against Stalin. Although at many points Stalin, Vol. Two reads something like a "prosecutor's brief" against Stalin and the USSR, the present study is fundamentally different. My book is not a "defense attorney's brief." It is not an attempt to prove either guilt or innocence. Rather, it is an attempt to find the truth.

I have tried hard to do what an investigator does in the case of a crime in which he has no bias, no parti pris, but only wishes to solve the crime. This is what all historians are supposed to do, and what most historians who investigate the more distant past do all the time. I wish to persuade the fair-minded, objective reader that I have carried out a competent, honest investigation. Namely, that I have done the following:

- collected all the evidence that Kotkin has cited to prove his allegations against Stalin, and also any "negative" evidence that contests those allegations;
- studied all this evidence carefully and honestly;
- drawn my conclusions on the basis of that evidence.

Political prejudice predominates in the study of communism and in particular of Soviet history. Conclusions that contradict the dominant Anti-Stalin Paradigm are routinely ignored or dismissed.

Conclusions that cast doubt upon accusations against Stalin or whose implications tend to make him look either "good" or just less "evil" than the predominant paradigm holds him to have been, are called "Stalinist." Any objective study of the evidence now available is bound to be called "Stalinist" simply because it must reach conclusions that are politically unacceptable to those who have a strong anticommunist bias, those who are in thrall to the false "Anti-Stalin Paradigm."

I wish to persuade the objective reader that I have reached my conclusions on the basis of evidence and its analysis and not on any other basis such as political bias. My aim is neither to arraign or "convict" Kotkin nor to "defend" Stalin. I assure the reader that I remain ready to be convinced that Stalin et al. did commit the atrocities alleged by Kotkin if and when evidence is disclosed that supports that conclusion and that evidence can withstand the scholarly scrutiny to which all evidence should be subject.

Evidence

Before proceeding to study the relevant evidence we must briefly consider the question of evidence itself. Whereas "documents" are material objects in our case, writing on paper "evidence" is a relational concept. In the present study we are concerned with investigating Kotkin's allegations in Stalin, Vol. Two of criminal, atrocious activity by Stalin.

There is no such thing as "absolute" evidence. All evidence can be faked. This point can hardly be overstressed since many people, including historians, believe that confessions of persons under arrest can be more readily faked than other kinds of evidence. But this is not so. Any statement — a confession of guilt, a denial of guilt, a claim that one has been tortured, a claim that one has not been coerced in any way — may be true or false, an attempt to state the truth as the speaker (or writer) remembers it or a deliberate lie. Documents can be forged and, in the case of Soviet history, often have been. False documents have on occasion been inserted into archives in order to be "discovered." Or it may be alleged that a given document was found in an archive when it was not. Photographs can be faked. Eyewitnesses can lie, and in any case eyewitnesses are so often in error that such evidence is among the least reliable kind.⁷ In principle there can be no such thing as a "smoking gun" evidence that is so clearly genuine and powerful that it cannot be interpreted in more than one way.

⁷ As I write these lines a New York Times article relates a striking example of flagrant inaccuracies in eyewitness accounts and cites one of the foremost experts on this subject, Professor Elizabeth Loftus. "Witness Accounts in Midtown Hammer Attack Show the Power of False Memory," at <https://nyti.ms/lbTghAm>

The Primary Importance of Objectivity

Identifying, locating, gathering, studying, and interpreting evidence are skills that can be taught to anyone. The most difficult and rarest skill in historical research is the discipline of objectivity. In order to reach true conclusions statements that are more truthful than other possible statements about a given historical event a researcher must first question and subject to doubt any preconceived ideas she may hold about the event under investigation. It is one's own preconceived ideas and prejudices that are most likely to sway one into a subjective, inaccurate interpretation of the evidence. Therefore, the researcher must take special steps to make certain this does not happen.

This can be done. The techniques are known and widely practiced in the physical and social sciences. They can and must be adapted to historical research as well. If such techniques are not practiced the historian will inevitably be seriously swayed from an objective understanding of the evidence by her own pre-existing preferences and biases. That will all but guarantee that her conclusions are false even if she is in possession of the best evidence and all the skills necessary to analyze it.

Nowhere is a devotion to objectivity more essential or less in evidence than in the field of Soviet history of the Stalin period. As it is impossible to discover the truth absent a dedication to objectivity, the present study strives to be objective at all costs. Its conclusions will displease, even outrage, a good many persons who are dedicated not to objectivity and the truth but to promoting some anticommunist narrative or to defending the Cold War-anticommunist paradigm of Soviet and European history.

The Role of Appropriate Skepticism

Throughout this essay I have tried to anticipate the objections of a skeptical critic. This is no more than any careful, objective researcher should do. In the body of the essay I follow each presentation of evidence with a critical examination.

"Propaganda With Footnotes"

I have taught American history for 27 years at a university, and I open every class with a standard lecture that focuses on the three kinds of history: what actually happened, what we are told happened and what we come to believe happened. This is important because we live in a world in which what people believe happened is all that matters, and trying to get to the facts sadly appears less relevant.

— Professor Stephen D. Engle, historian, Florida International University⁸

⁸ Letter to the Editor, The New York Times. November 3, 2017, A30.

Scholarship is the attempt to ascertain the truth. Arguments that proceed not from an objective search for truth but from some other motive, such as an attempt to attack or defend some specific allegation or historical paradigm, may fairly be labeled "propaganda." When accompanied by the trappings of scholarship — references, bibliography, fraudulent assurances of objectivity — such writing in reality constitutes not scholarship but "propaganda with footnotes." It is the conclusion of the present study that Stalin, Vol. Two is precisely such a work.

Method of Presentation

The present book takes upon itself the task of examining and checking every statement in Stalin, Vol. Two that has an anti-Stalin tendency, and reporting the results of this research of verification. It presents for the reader's consideration the proof that every fact-claim of an anti-Stalin tendency in Kotkin's book is false.

Most people rely upon the statements by supposedly "authoritative" figures such as Kotkin. They trust that scholars from respected institutions of learning, with renowned academic reputations, do not falsify important historical events. It is this trust that enables false scholarship to shape opinion on important historical questions.

It is no exaggeration to state that, as concerns Stalin and therefore, for the most part, Soviet history of the 1930s, Kotkin's Stalin, Vol. Two is a work of falsification from beginning to end. I have established that this is so through an exhaustive process of checking every footnote, every reference that Kotkin cites in support of any fact-claim or statement of an anti-Stalin tendency.

The "Big Lie" Technique

A normal practice for those who intend to deceive others is to mainly tell the truth, and smuggle in the falsehoods intermingled among the true statements. But on the historical issues studied and analyzed in the present book Kotkin employs a different method: that of "The Big Lie." Though it is ostensibly not a work of propaganda Kotkin's book follows the technique of propaganda recommended by Adolf Hitler in Mein Kampf, such as the following:

The function of propaganda is, for example, not to weigh and ponder the rights of different people, but exclusively to emphasize the one right which it has set out to argue for. Its task is not to make an objective study of the truth, in so far as it favors the enemy, and then set it before the masses with academic fairness; its task is to serve our own right, always and unflinchingly.⁹

⁹ Adolf Hitler, Mein Kampf. Volume One: A Reckoning. Chapter VI: War Propaganda. At http://www.hitler.org/writings/Mein_Kampf/mkv1ch06.html

The "Big Lie" was not original with Hitler. He learned of it by studying the anti-German propaganda put out by the Western Allies during the First World War. After that war a number of books were written, often by shocked and deceived journalists, exposing these Allied falsifications.¹⁰ Thus there was no need for Kotkin to learn the "Big Lie" technique from Hitler. That Kotkin does utilize this technique is beyond question. The present book establishes this fact by carefully checking every one of the references Kotkin uses to support his anti-Stalin fact-claims.

Kotkin makes no attempt at objectivity. Indeed, his anti-Stalin hostility at times boils over in passages of heated rhetoric, fervent moralizing, and moral condemnation that serve no analytical purpose. Yet objectivity is first among the requirements of any historian worthy of the name. If one does not strive for objectivity from the outset of one's study one will never discover the truth. The truth was never Kotkin's goal in the first place.

Hitler also succinctly explained why the "Big Lie" technique is so effective:

In this they [skilled liars — GF] proceeded on the sound principle that the magnitude of a lie always contains a certain factor of credibility, since the great masses of the people in the very bottom of their hearts tend to be corrupted rather than consciously and purposely evil, and that, therefore, in view of the primitive simplicity of their minds they more easily fall a victim to a big lie than to a little one, since they themselves lie in little things, but would be ashamed of lies that were too big. Such a falsehood will never enter their heads and they will not be able to believe in the possibility of such monstrous effrontery and infamous misrepresentation in others; yes, even when enlightened on the subject, they will long doubt and waver, and continue to accept at least one of these causes as true. Therefore, something of even the most insolent lie will always remain and stick a fact which all the great lie-virtuosi and lying-clubs in this world know only too well and also make the most treacherous use of.¹¹

A full professor of history at Princeton University, publishing with a major American commercial publisher, can rely on "credibility" — the only coin in the propagandist's purse. The present study shows this coin to be counterfeit.

In this book all boldface emphases are by me, unless otherwise noted.

Chapter 1. Collectivization and Famine

Like other ideologically anticommunist writers Kotkin insists that the Soviet famine of 1932-33 was caused by Stalin in some manner that makes Stalin personally responsible for all the deaths and suffering that resulted. But Kotkin cites no evidence that Stalin's policies or actions caused the famine.

Researchers have given the following causes for the famine:

- Ukrainian nationalists claim that Stalin deliberately caused the famine in order to punish Ukrainians for their nationalism. This explanation gained some notoriety in the west through Robert Conquest's 1986 book Harvest of Sorrow, and has since been revived by Anne Applebaum's Red Famine.¹ Like all other researchers Kotkin rejects this "deliberate famine" hypothesis. Even Conquest ultimately retracted it.²
- The famine was caused by disruptions in agriculture caused by collectivization. Kotkin, who has no sympathy with collectivization, cites it as one cause of the famine.
- The famine was caused by the program of rapid industrialization. Kotkin assumes that this was another cause.
- The famine was due to environmental causes that peasants, local officials, and the Soviet government, including Stalin, were slow to recognize. This hypothesis has been set forth by Professor Mark Tauger of West Virginia University in many research articles and monographs. Kotkin barely mentions it, and then only in footnotes. Yet this explanation is the only one that is supported by evidence.

¹ See Mark Tauger's review of Applebaum's book on the History News Network, July 1, 2018, at <https://historynewsnetwork.org/article/169438>

² See the Conquest quotation and the sources for it in Furr, Blood Lies 47.

"Stalin's Famine"?

Kotkin repeatedly blames Stalin for the famine:

Stalin's Famine (subtitle, 127)

Stalin's famine, involving extirpation of capitalism and denomadization, was incomparably worse. (127)

All of these actions were woefully insufficient for avoiding the mass starvation in the countryside caused by his policies, in the face of challenging natural conditions. (128-9)

Once Stalin had caused the horror, even complete termination of exports would not have been enough to prevent famine. (129)

Stalin had caused a domestic calamity and rendered the Soviet Union vulnerable in the face of Japan's expansionism ... (129)

Marxist imperatives of transcending capitalism—combined with inordinate willpower—brought apocalypse. (191)

Failing to cite any evidence that Stalin had caused the famine, Kotkin accuses Stalin of blaming the peasants for it.

Many contemporaries, such as the Italian ambassador, who traveled through Ukraine in summer 1933, deemed the famine deliberate.⁴⁷¹ Monstrously, Stalin himself made the same accusation accusing peasants of not wanting to work.⁴⁷² (128)

Kotkin's note 472 is to an article by Michael Ellman. But there Ellman only states that, according to a doctor in Kiev province, "leaders and rank-and-file workers" — not Stalin — were blaming peasants who did not want to work for their own starvation. Ellman notes that, in a letter to Soviet writer Mikhail Sholokhov, Stalin said that some peasants had refused to work, thereby threatening to starve urban workers and the Red Army.

In this same article Ellman states:

Stalin's idea that he had faced a peasant strike was not an absurd notion indicating paranoia. It seems that there really were numerous collective refusals by collective farmers to work for the collective farms in 1932; see Kondrashin & Penner, Golod, chapter 3. (Ellman, note 9, p. 837.)

Chapter 3 of the Kondrashin-Penner book is titled "They raised, but they did not harvest."

So Stalin's statement was not "monstrous" after all! Kotkin, who has read Ellman's article, knows this. But Kotkin's readers will not know it — and Kotkin does not tell them.

In dismissing the "deliberate famine" fiction Kotkin blames collectivization for the famine:

Nonetheless, the famine was not intentional.⁴⁷⁴ It resulted from Stalin's policies of forced collectivization-dekulakization, as well as the pitiless and incompetent management of the sowing and procurement campaigns, all of which put the country on a knife-edge, highly susceptible to drought and sudden torrential rains.⁴⁷⁵

But in note 474 Kotkin quotes Davies and Wheatcroft, who write:

We regard the policy of rapid industrialisation as an underlying cause of the agricultural troubles of the early 1930s, and we do not believe that the Chinese or NEP versions of industrialisation were viable in Soviet national and international circumstances.

This quotation offers no support for Kotkin's claim that collectivization caused the famine. On the contrary, in ruling out the other paths towards industrialization, it appears to tacitly endorse the Soviet program.³

³ As we shall see, Tauger disagrees with Davies and Wheatcroft here.

Kotkin:

[Stalin] twice deluded himself — partly from false reporting by frightened statisticians⁴[my note, GF], partly from his own magical thinking—that the country was on the verge of a recovery harvest. (128)

⁴ Kotkin cites no evidence of any "frightened statisticians." Evidently he has imagined them.

This is not just a "cheap shot"; it is false as well. A good harvest for 1932 was not a product of any "magical thinking" of Stalin's — it was what agricultural experts predicted.

Tauger writes:

The fact that rust was difficult for nonspecialists to detect helps to explain the numerous claims in memoirs and testimonies of a good 1932 harvest.

Soviet agronomic literature and other published and archival sources from the 1930s, however, which no previous scholarship on the famine has discussed, indicate that in 1932 Soviet crops suffered from an extraordinarily severe combination of infestations from crop diseases and pests.

During their travels in summer 1932, Cairns and Schiller observed widespread rust infestations and spoke with Soviet agronomists who confirmed these impressions in Ukraine, in the North Caucasus (including the large sovkhozy Verblud and Gigant), Belorussia, the Central Blackearth oblast', and the Volga region. The Soviet agricultural newspaper even acknowledged major rust infestations, though without explaining in any detail their extent and consequences.

The fact that rust was difficult for nonspecialists to detect helps to explain the numerous claims in memoirs and testimonies of a good 1932 harvest. Famine survivors in the Volga region whom the Russian historian Viktor Kondrashin interviewed, however, remembered that in the 1932 harvest the ears were somehow "empty," the characteristic one would expect from rusted grain.

Nonetheless agronomists and other personnel in central offices and local branches of NKZ detected the infestation and made efforts to survey it and combat it. Their investigations found that rust had become the most widely distributed disease and caused the most harm to agriculture in Ukraine and in the Soviet Union generally. One study found that brown rust of wheat seriously affected crops in the North Caucasus and Ukraine in 1932, where it destroyed up to 70 percent of the harvest in some regions, especially near rivers, reduced the weight of grain 40-47 percent and the number of seeds in ears by 20-29 percent. Wheat sowings had serious rust infestations in all the grain regions of the USSR in 1932, and rust reduced the wheat harvest in the North Caucasus by 50 percent. These losses help explain why the famine was so severe in that region.⁵

⁵ Mark Tauger, Natural Disaster and Human Action in the Soviet Famine of 1931-1933, Carl Beck Papers No. 1506. Pittsburgh, PA., 2001, pp. 12-15.

Kotkin cites this very study in his bibliography (1111). So he knows his "magical thinking" statement is false. But he put it in anyway. How many of Kotkin's readers are going to be familiar with Tauger's study and realize that there were "numerous claims in memoirs and testimonies of a good 1932 harvest"?

Kotkin asserts:

Once Stalin had caused the horror, even complete termination of exports would not have been enough to prevent famine. (129)

Then Kotkin states:

The regime had no strategic grain reserves left, having released them.⁴⁸⁵ (129)

Note 485 (942) is to Davies et al., "Stalin, Grain Stocks, and the Famine of 1932-33," 653. There we read:

Only more aggressive purchases of food abroad and open appeals for international assistance could have averted many (and perhaps most) of the deaths.

But on pages 128-9 Kotkin had already written:

Always grudgingly, Stalin approved, and in some cases initiated, reductions in grain exports, beginning already in September 1931; in 1932 and 1933 he signed reduced grain collection quotas for Ukraine, the North Caucasus, the Volga valley, Crimea, the Urals, the Central Black Earth region, the Kazakh autonomous republic, and Eastern Siberia on nine occasions.⁴⁷⁶ The 1933 grain procurement target fell from 24.3 to 19.6 million tons; the actual amount collected would be around 18.5 million tons.^{477, 478} Altogether, the regime returned about 5.7 million tons of grain back to agriculture, including 2 million tons from reserves and 3.5 million from procurements.

So Kotkin admits that Stalin reduced grain exports and grain collection quotas! But why "always grudgingly"? For one thing, because the cities were starving too:

Stalin also approved clandestine purchase of grain and livestock abroad using scarce hard currency.⁴⁷⁹ Just between February and July 1933, he signed or countenanced nearly three dozen small allocations of food aid to the countryside, primarily to the North Caucasus and Ukraine, as well as the Kazakh lands (which necessitated sharp reductions in the bread rations for city dwellers, many of whom were put on the brink of starvation). (128)

But what about Davies and Wheatcroft's claim that the Soviets "could have avoided many (and perhaps most) deaths" by "more aggressive purchases of food abroad and open appeals for international assistance"? A 2016 study argues that the importation of more foodstuffs was impossible by 1933:

[[[cyrillic]]]В отличие от 1931-1932 гг., когда у государства еще была возможность импортировать зерно, во втором квартале 1933 г. импорт был невозможен.

In contrast to 1931-1932, when the state still had the opportunity to import grain, in the second quarter of 1933, imports were impossible.

[[cyrillic]]Пик валютного кризиса в первой половине 1933 г. делал импорт продовольствия в СССР невозможным.

The peak of the economic crisis in the first half of 1933 made the import of food in[to] the USSR impossible.⁶

Kotkin himself admits this — though his admission is buried in a long footnote on page 942:

Instead of an anticipated 5.426 billion gold rubles of revenue from all exports (grain, timber, oil) over the course of the Five-Year Plan, the Soviets managed to bring in 3.283 billion. Industry was short 1.873 million rubles, including 832 million just in 1932. The Soviets ran out of convertible currency even for purchases of foreign military technology.

Kotkin writes:

Stalin had caused a domestic calamity and rendered the Soviet Union vulnerable in the face of Japan's expansionism, while contributing significantly to the ascent in Germany of Hitler, who threatened expansionism, and provoking blistering internal critiques.⁴⁸⁶ (129)

A serious accusation! But Kotkin gives no evidence that Stalin "caused" the famine, and cites no reference to crop failures or to any environmental causes. Note 486 reads (in part):

... Davies, rightly, discounts militarization and instead blames absurd plan targets. Davies, Crisis and Progress, 176ff; Davies, "Soviet Defence Industries," 266. (942)

This is simply false. Davies, Crisis and Progress, does not state anything like this, either on pp. 176 ff. or anywhere else.⁷ Davies does state this, at pp. 146-7:

... we do not know whether Kuibyshev and Ordzhonikidze consistently advocated more realistic plans in the course of 1932. And it is by no means certain that they were opposed by Stalin and Molotov; some evidence shows that Stalin and Molotov were also prepared to accept reductions in the plans (see p. 124).

⁷ Davies, "Soviet Defence Industries," is an "unpublished discussion paper" from 1987 (1078), far too old to be useful today. If Davies had kept to that view, he would have repeated it elsewhere.

Pages 123-4 relate that Stalin was willing to reduce the plan for pig-iron in the Second Five-Year Plan.

Stalin to Kaganovich in Sept. 1934, not Sept. 1933

Kotkin:

Resolute in extremis, Stalin ordered the forced return of peasant escapees, the blacklisting of entire counties (they would suffer the highest mortality), and the banning of fishing in state waters or even private charity—anything that would have made it possible to avoid the collectives.⁴⁸⁹ The OGPU arrested 505,000 people in 1933, as compared with 410,000 the year before.⁴⁹⁰ (130)

Note 489 (942) reads:

489. When Kaganovich demonstrated a bit of leniency toward procurements in Ukraine in Sept. 1933, Stalin rebuked him. Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 479 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 85, l. 44-5), 479-80 (f. 81, op. 3, d. 100, l. 76-82).

Kotkin is writing about 1933 here. But the Stalin to Kaganovich letter he cites here is dated a year later, in September, 1934! Stalin i Kaganovich 479 contains two letters dated in September 1934, not 1933. And the famine was basically over by September, 1933.⁸

⁸ Document (not page) No. 479 in the same book — just in case this is a mistake by Kotkin — is a letter dated August 21, 1934 about the reorganization of the People's Commissariat for Army and Navy.

Nor is there any evidence here about "the highest mortality" being in the "blacklisted counties." Kotkin has either fabricated this factoid himself or copied it from some other source that has made it up.⁹

Kotkin:

Stalin: Waiting for ... The Truth

The peasants, in their land hunger and separate revolution, had made possible the advent of a Bolshevik regime in 1917-18; now enslaved, the peasants saved Stalin's rule.⁴⁹⁵ (130)

Kotkin does not cite any evidence to support his outrageous contention that peasants in collective farms were "slaves" — because, of course, they were not.

Here is his note 495 (942):

Famine conditions persisted into late fall 1933 and, in some places, would last through summer 1934. Ammende, Human Life in Russia, 80-4. In fall 1933, the regime was pressing for workers to cultivate gardens to grow their own food, on the example of Ukraine's Donetsk region. Pavlov, Anastas Mikoian, 71 (citing RGASPI, f. 84, op. 2, d. 19, l. 125-6). Kazakhstan would be given 18,000 tons of food aid by decree on Nov. 28, 1933. Antipova et al., Golod v SSSR, 507 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 15, l. 142, 145, 148)."

Ewald Ammende was a Baltic German who was in the USSR in 1934 and claimed — wrongly — that a new famine would kill millions in 1934-1936.

Pavlov, Anastas Mikoian, merely documents the fact that Soviet workers were encouraged to plant vegetable gardens.

Kotkin concludes:

Marxist imperatives of transcending capitalism—combined with inordinate willpower brought apocalypse. (131)

But he then tells us that the industrialization drive did not, in fact, withdraw resources from the countryside or peasantry:

During the first Five-Year Plan, the volume of investment quadrupled, to 44 percent of GDP by 1932 (measured in 1928 prices), but none of the massive net increase in investment came from higher agricultural surpluses.² Grain exports did not end up paying for imports of machinery.³ Soviet agriculture made no net contribution to industrialization; on the contrary, it was a net recipient of resources during the plan. True, a key driver of the industrial spurt was new labor power from villages, but the statist system used those workers grossly inefficiently. Another key driver of the spurt was brutally suppressed consumption (reinforced by that thief called inflation). (131)

Other scholars agree: the peasants were not exploited to fund industrialization. But that means that "Marxist imperatives" did not cause the famine ("apocalypse"). As for "brutally suppressed consumption" — certainly: there was a serious famine! But the "suppressed consumption" was not caused by Stalin or the Soviet government.

Kotkin gives no evidence, nor even an argument, for his assertion that the labor of former peasants was used "grossly inefficiently." But it can't be true, for what is the basis of comparison? Surely the real "gross inefficiency" was the idle labor in traditional peasant agriculture. Collective farms (kolkhozy) and Soviet farms (sovkhozy) grew more crops with far less labor, and many peasants went to the cities to find work.¹⁰ In other words, increased efficiency in the use of labor.

¹⁰ Kotkin's notes 2 and 3 in the quotation above simply document these facts.

Kotkin makes this claim (n. 4. p. 943):

Robert Allen argues that per capita consumption, after falling in the early 1930s, increased significantly, being perhaps a fifth higher in 1937 than a decade earlier, but he has rightly been taken to task separately by Davies and Ellman. Allen, Farm to Factory, 147-50, 185-6; R. W. Davies (http://eh.net/book_reviews/farm-to-factory-a-reinterpretation-of-the-soviet-industrial-revolution); Ellman, "Soviet Industrialization."

This claim of Kotkin's is false as well. In the online review Kotkin cites, Davies says that the disagreement about consumption in the 1930s "needs further investigation," but concludes as follows:

But it is certain that, contrary to popular preconceptions, in the Stalinist period as a whole, between 1938 and the mid-1950s, consumption per head increased substantially in spite of the disastrous impact of the Second World War.

The feat that continues to astound the world is that the USSR became an industrialized nation in a decade entirely without foreign capital. During the same decade the Soviet Union modernized its agriculture to the point that the thousand-year cycle of devastating famine was eliminated forever. All this was accomplished simply through the labor of its own people, planned and organized by the Bolshevik Party. Naturally, this is a bone in the throat for Kotkin and for all anticommunists.

Kotkin admits that:

... [t]he industrialization and accompanying militarization began to revive the Soviet Union as a great power, a necessity for survival in the international system ...

Despite this admission Kotkin still insists that "collectivization was not 'necessary' to 'modernize' a peasant economy or industrialize." (131)

However, he does not outline any alternative.

The Thousand-Year Cycle of Famine Broken

This brings us to the basic dishonesty of Kotkin's account of Soviet agriculture and the Soviet famine. Kotkin fails to confront — indeed, he completely ignores — the real reason for collectivization. This was the desperate need to put an end to the thousand-year cycle of devastating famines, recurring every few years.

According to Tauger:

Russia has a long history of famines, from its earliest history in the tenth century through the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. In virtually all cases these famines resulted from natural disasters that caused crop failures, shortages, and deaths from starvation and famine-related diseases. In addition to the environmental factors, grain traders, nobles, and others often exploited crop failures to take advantage of high prices, and thereby frequently worsened conditions for poor and vulnerable groups.¹¹

¹¹ Tauger, "Famine in Russian History." Supplement to the Modern Encyclopedia of Russian and Soviet History, vol. 10. Gulf Breeze Florida, Academic International Press, 2011, 79.

The Environmental Causes

Tauger has spent his scholarly career in studying Russian and Soviet agriculture and famines. His research, drawing upon extensive Soviet-era primary sources and Soviet and Russian scholarship, argues that the famine of 1932-33 was caused by an environmental catastrophe.

Tauger's view is frequently attacked or ignored altogether by anticommunists simply because his research does not lend itself to blaming Stalin and the Bolsheviks for the famine. For example, Anne Applebaum and Polish researcher Robert Kuśnierz, both stridently anticommunist, repeat the outrageous lie that Tauger does not cite any evidence!¹² Their obvious motive is to discourage their readers from ever looking at Tauger's heavily-documented research, which utterly refutes their own falsifications.

¹² Applebaum, Red Famine. Stalin's War on Ukraine. (New York: Doubleday, 2017), 419. For quotation in Polish and English from Kuśnierz's book see Furr, Blood Lies 102-103.

Kotkin takes a different approach to Tauger's research. During 2016-2017 Kotkin conferred with Tauger at Princeton University about the famine. But in the text of his mammoth book Kotkin does not even summarize, much less critically evaluate, Tauger's evidence and arguments. As we have seen above, Kotkin simply asserts that, somehow, Stalin "caused" the famine — though he can cite no evidence to support this claim.

In his footnotes, however, Kotkin's tone is different. There he sets forth important aspects of Tauger's research and conclusions.

Kotkin, text (75):

... in 1931, a cold spring followed by a summer drought—a fatal combination—struck the Kazakh steppes, Siberia, the Urals, the Volga, and Ukraine.⁴⁸

In his note 48 (924), Kotkin does acknowledge the world-wide drought of 1930-1932:

Drought, in different ways, affected other world regions around this time. In the United States the "great southern drought" of 1930-31, which coincided with a price collapse and banking failures, inflicted hardship across twenty-three states from West Virginia to Texas; ... French West Africa suffered drought, locusts, and its worst famine ever; the French authorities did not relent on tax demands. Mortality in French West Africa was disproportionately higher (in an immensely smaller area and overall population) than in the Soviet Union. China in 1931-32 suffered the opposite problem: large snowmelt and tremendous rainfall that inundated an area equivalent in size to England and half of Scotland, flooding some 52 million people, and killing as many as 2 million from drowning and especially starvation. Tauger, "Natural Disaster," 8, citing Woodruff, Rare as Rain.

Kotkin, text (86-7):

... the worsening terms of trade and tariffs did force the Soviets to curtail imports of consumer and even capital goods.¹³¹ But the Soviets meticulously paid their debts. The pressure to do so partly explains the regime's continued export of grain despite fears for the harvest and low global prices.¹³² Only state-imposed deprivation allowed the USSR to avoid external default.

Kotkin, note 131 (928):

... The year 1932 would turn out to be the worst in the history of Soviet foreign trade because of higher tariffs abroad and decreased credit availability.

Kotkin, note 132 (928):

... See also Tauger, "1932 Harvest," 88n52.

Here is the text of Tauger's important note:

According to the commercial counselor of the British Embassy in Moscow, writing in late 1931, "failure [by the Soviet government] to meet its obligations would certainly bring disaster in its train. Not only would further credits cease, but all future exports, all Soviet shipping entering foreign ports, all Soviet property already in foreign countries would be liable to seizure to cover sums due. Admission of insolvency would endanger the achievement of all aspirations based on the five-year plan and might indeed imperil the existence of the government itself" (PRO FO 371\5607 N7648/167/38, 6—7). German Chancellor Bruening told a British diplomat in Berlin in early 1932 that if the Soviets "did not meet their bills in some form or other, their credit would be destroyed for good and all" (PRO FO 371 16327 N456/158/38). Dohan notes that the country's major creditors began to reduce their credit offerings to the Soviet Union in 1931-1932, despite Soviet efforts to pay, "Origins of Economic Autarky," 630...

This information is vital to any accurate understanding of the famine. Yet Kotkin hides it from his readers by omitting it entirely from his text and even from his footnotes. To find it one has to obtain this work of Tauger's and then read this footnote. Few, if any, of Kotkin's readers will do so.

Kotkin, text (100):

Tractive power, seed grain, and fodder were scarce. The spring sowing season had proved short, and wheat sown beginning in late May always produced lower yields and was more susceptible to August rains, which would descend torrentially as early as the beginning of the month. Rust epiphytotics damaged a significant part of the wheat harvest, to the surprise of officials who had failed to identify it.²⁵⁴

Kotkin, note 254 (933):

Peasants could not distinguish between rust and other diseases, a Soviet agronomist reported. But as Tauger has demonstrated, local officials, too, did not understand plant disease and, at harvest time, when they would discover that the crop had been rotted out, would wrongly blame social causes. Tauger, "Natural Disaster," 15 (citing Nazachitu urozhaia, 1933, no. 10: 14-6: S. E. Grushevoi; and RGAE, f. 7486, op. 37, d. 237, l. 388), 40-5.

Kotkin, text (106):

In September 1932 ... [t]he 1932 harvest was coming in at fewer than 60 million tons, and possibly as low as 50 million, which was close to the horrific result in the famine year of 1921.²⁹³

Kotkin, note 293 (935):

Tauger, who stresses the natural causes of the famine, carefully showed that the annual reports from the collective farms for 1932 implied an extremely low harvest, and that not only the official figure for the 1932 harvest but revised figures given by Davies and Wheatcroft were likely too high. Ultimately, the size of the 1932 harvest remains uncertain, but the annual report data from 40 percent of the collective farms which are the only actual harvest data so far discovered imply a harvest on the order of 50 million tons. Tauger, "1932 Harvest." Davies and Wheatcroft estimate the 1932 harvest at 58-60 million, but that is based on pre-harvest forecasts. It should be noted, however, that Wheatcroft, who has rejected Tauger's views, often stridently, subsequently allowed 50 million as the lower band of the estimate without then citing Tauger.

Kotkin, text (130):

Resolute in extremis, Stalin ordered the forced return of peasant escapees, the blacklisting of entire counties (they would suffer the highest mortality) ...

Tauger, in "Natural Disaster and Human Action" — a work we cited above and one that Kotkin cites elsewhere but not here — states:

The Ukrainian Central Committee found that the "blacklisting" of villages (closing down trade outlets for consumer goods) for failure to meet procurement quotas had had little effect, because the countryside was "saturated" with consumer goods. (62)

There's nothing here about "entire counties" being blacklisted — the source cited by Snyder says that the blacklist was confined to six villages!¹³ And what did "blacklisting" mean? Kotkin doesn't tell us, but it "sounds bad," right? It simply meant withholding manufactured goods normally exchanged with the peasants for grain.

¹³ See Furr, Blood Lies 81-85.

Consequently, there is no evidence whatsoever for the claim that "blacklisting" resulted in "higher mortality," as Kotkin asserts.

Kotkin, text (130):

Officials concluded that they had broken the peasants' will, indirectly suggesting the regime had partnered with famine to achieve subjugation.⁴⁹³

This statement is simply untrue. Here is the text of Kotkin's note 493 (942):

Stalin would later boast in a discussion of five historical turning points —1905, 1917, the Brest-Litovsk peace of 1918, the Russian civil war, "and especially collectivization"—that the latter entailed "a completely novel, historically unprecedented event." Banac, Diary of Georgi Dimitrov, 69 (Nov. 11, 1937).

Neither in this note nor anywhere else does Kotkin cite any evidence of "officials concluding that they had broken the peasants will."

Kotkin, text (130):

Indeed, it was the famished peasants who would lift the regime and the country out of starvation, producing between 70 and 77 million tons of grain in 1933, a bumper crop comparable to the miracle of 1930.⁴⁹⁴

Kotkin, note 494 (942):

The degree to which the regime contributed to the bumper harvest, by the distribution of tractors, seed aid, and food relief, remains a matter of intense controversy. ... Tauger, seeking to place the Soviet story in a broader one of agricultural modernization, emphasizes how the collective farm system facilitated Soviet relief efforts and the peasants' ability to generate the harvest that saved them and the country. Tauger, "Soviet Peasants"; Tauger, "Stalin, Soviet Agriculture, and Collectivization," 109-42.

Here at least we see the crux of the problem for Kotkin: Tauger's research shows that the collective farm system worked! It not only facilitated overcoming the famine of 1932-33. By putting an end to the medieval system whereby individual peasant families — at least, those who possessed any land at all (a large percentage of peasants had no land) — cultivated narrow strips of land, often far apart from each other, collectivization made possible large-scale, mechanized farming modelled on large American Midwest farms.

And this meant that the famine of 1932-33 was the last Soviet famine. Weather conditions did not change — years of bad weather continued to occur every few years. Local food shortages and even limited starvation would sometimes happen.

But with one exception — the famine of 1946-7 — disastrous famines would never recur.¹⁴ Four such widespread famines, with hundreds of thousands or millions of deaths, had occurred in just the previous fifteen years: in 1917-18, 1920-23, 1924-25, and 1927-28. Thanks to collectivization and the modern, large-scale, mechanized and scientific agriculture it permitted, there were no more famines.

¹⁴ Stephen G. Wheatcroft, the latest student of this famine, concludes that it was caused by catastrophic weather conditions that affected much of the world, "the most serious global food shortage in modern history." In the Soviet Union, its effects were exacerbated by the huge destruction of the war. Wheatcroft is firm that the famine was not caused by Soviet policy. See Wheatcroft, "The Soviet Famine of 1946—1947, the Weather and Human Agency in Historical Perspective." Europe-Asia Studies 64 no. 6 (2012), 988-1005.

It is obvious from Kotkin's text that he strongly disagrees with this analysis. Kotkin consistently blames Stalin's policies, whether collectivization or industrialization, for causing the famine.

But he never engages the argument to environmental causation in his text. If his readers do not know about it already, they will never know that such an explanation exists. If his readers are already familiar with Tauger's research they will note that Kotkin pointedly ignores it. "Pointedly," because Kotkin acknowledges Tauger's research — but only in his footnotes. Tauger's research is cited fifteen times in Kotkin's footnotes (some of which we have quoted above). But Tauger's name does not occur even once in the text of Kotkin's book.

In conclusion: Kotkin never cites any evidence to support his often-stated contention that the famine was caused by Stalin.

Chapter 2. Kirov and the Kirov Murder

GIGO!

Kotkin argues that Stalin framed the men convicted and executed in the Kirov murder trial of December 28-29, 1934 and that Leonid Nikolaev, Kirov's murderer, acted alone. But it appears that Kotkin has not researched the question of the Kirov murder at all! He simply copies from books by Alla Kirilina and Matthew Lenoe. Neither of these two books is either competent or honest. In my own study of the Kirov murder I have devoted a great deal of attention to analyzing them and exposing their dishonesty. (Furr, Kirov)

But Kotkin does not even see what is of value in Lenoe's book. This is Lenoe's proof that Khrushchev's men were lying about the Kirov murder back in the 1950s — lies that Gorbachev's men simply picked up, dusted off, and recycled in the late 1980s, and that Kirilina, Lenoe, and others pass on to unsuspecting readers.

Why all the dishonesty? As usual, it is in service to the Anti-Stalin Paradigm. In the corrupt field of Soviet history it is considered unacceptable to find Stalin not guilty of some crime that he has been charged with. In the introduction to his own book (pp. 16-17) Lenoe apologizes profusely for his conclusion that Stalin did not have Kirov murdered. This despite the fact that Gorbachev's men had already reached this conclusion with equal reluctance more than 20 years earlier.

False Claim Of Tension Between Kirov And Stalin

On February 10, 1934, Stalin and his inner circle met, apparently before the Central Committee plenum that evening, and he proposed that Kirov relocate to Moscow as a Central Committee secretary. "What are you talking about?!" Molotov later recalled of Kirov's response. "I'll be no good here. In Leningrad I can do as well as you, but what can I do here?" Some evidence suggests that Orjonikidze supported Kirov's refusal, Stalin stalked out, and Kirov went to mollify him.²²⁰ (161-2)

Note 220 (952): Chuev, Sto sorok, 307-8, 478; Chuev, Molotov, 375-6; Krasnikov, Kirov v Leningrade, 187-8; Rosliakov, Ubiistvo, 28-9.

There is some ambiguity as to whether the Kirov incident took place in a narrow circle or at the Central Committee plenum.

So Kotkin knows exactly what happened at this "meeting" and even the exact words spoken by Kirov, but doesn't know where the "meeting" took place? What nonsense! This is a phony footnote. Neither version of Chuev's conversations with Molotov (Sto sorok besed s Molotovym and Molotov. Poluderkhavnyi Vlastelin) documents Stalin's "stalking out" or "Kirov going to mollify him."

Rosliakov claims this happened at a Politburo meeting. But he, a minor official in Leningrad, had no way of knowing what went on in the Politburo and is, at best, repeating a rumor — if he didn't invent it himself. So Rosliakov's account is useless as history and Kotkin has no business citing it. But how are Kotkin's readers to know that?

Krasnikov's account does not support, but rather contradicts, Kotkin's story that Kirov protested a transfer to Moscow. According to Krasnikov, Stalin urged Kirov to travel to Kazakhstan to help organize the harvest and then to move to Moscow.

[[cyrillic]]Предложение о поездке в Казахстан Киров воспринял как должное, а от перехода на работу непосредственно в аппарат ЦК ВКП(б) тактично уклонился, упросив оставить его в Ленинград до конца второй пятилетки и завершения реконструкции города. (187-188)

The proposal to travel to Kazakhstan Kirov accepted as a necessity, but he tactfully evaded the transfer to work directly in the apparatus of the Central Committee of the CPSU (b), requesting to remain in Leningrad until the end of the second five-year plan and the completion of the reconstruction of the city.

That's it! Nothing about any disagreement, argument with Stalin, "Stalin stalking out," etc. Yet another phony citation by Kotkin of a source that does not provide any evidence at all for a fact-claim in the text of his book.

What "Witnesses"?

Concerning the December 28-29, 1934 trial of the Zinovievist group to which Nikolaev belonged, Kotkin states:

In Leningrad, Ulrich opened the closed trial on December 28 at 2:20 p.m., and read the guilty verdicts before dawn the next morning: death penalty. Not a single Smolny witness had been summoned to the trial. (213)

This is nonsense, and dishonest to boot. Neither Kotkin nor anyone else has seen the trial transcript — it is still secret. What's more, there were no "Smolny witnesses" to call! Kirov's bodyguard, Mikhail Borisov, was too far behind Kirov to see Nikolaev shoot him, and had been killed in an auto accident on December 4. Aside from the assassin Nikolaev himself, no one had witnessed the murder.

Kotkin's "Smolny witness" business is a dishonest blind. Does Kotkin want us to believe that there was no "due process," or something? The trial was not about whether Nikolaev had shot Kirov — he had been caught on the spot and never denied it. The question was whether Nikolaev's thirteen fellow members of the Zinovievist underground were co-conspirators in the murder. None of these men were present when Nikolaev killed Kirov. So "Smolny witnesses," — had there in fact been any — would have been irrelevant to this question.

Kotkin:

(Nearly fourscore of them—every witness to the events that day and many others—would soon be transferred to other work, expelled from the party, or exiled.) (213)

Kotkin cites no evidence to support this. Of course! There were no "witnesses to the event" at all!

Khrushchev-Era GIGO Again

"Nikolaev shouted, 'Severe,'" according to one of Agranov's soft-pedaling telegrams to Stalin, which failed to report that Nikolaev and others recanted their testimony.¹⁴⁴

Note 144 (963): 144. Vinogradov, Genrikh Iagoda, 396-404 (TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 2, d. 60, l. 48-56, 33); Lenoe, Kirov Murder, 358-77. Others have Nikolaev supposedly falling to the ground and shouting, "You cannot shoot me. Comrade Stalin promised..." Kirilina, Rikoshet, 67.

Lenoe states that in 1956, during Khrushchev's campaign of attacking Stalin, a number of the surviving participants in or witnesses to the trial claimed that Nikolaev first recanted, then reaffirmed, his testimony implicating others. All this is rumor and/or deliberate falsification. Kirilina, on whose book Lenoe relies heavily, does not contain this supposed claim of Nikolaev's. Lenoe notes that these Khrushchev-era accounts "may be embellished." (Lenoe 370)

Khrushchev's goal was to find evidence that Stalin had Kirov murdered. Unable to do this, his men fell back on the theory that Nikolaev was a "lone gunman." Aleksandr Iakovlev, Politburo member and Gorbachev's specialist in spreading anticommunist and anti-Stalin lies, twice demanded that Gorbachev's special commission come up with evidence to charge Stalin with Kirov's murder. But despite heroic efforts in scouring the archives they were unable to do so. So they fell back once again on the "lone gunman" theory.

Lenoe's book is highly dishonest in many respects, as we have demonstrated in great detail. (Furr, Kirov) But Lenoe shows convincingly that Khrushchev and his KGB (the former NKVD) chief, Ivan Serov, lied about the Kirov murder to try to blame Stalin. Twenty-five years later, Gorbachev's men dusted off these old Khrushchev-era lies and fabricated some new ones of their own.

Lenoe convincingly explains the reason why Khrushchev and Serov lied about the evidence that Nikolaev had indeed been a member of the Zinovievist conspiracy.

The [Molotov] commission was charged with investigating the show trials of the later 1930s and determining whether the charges were valid. The Kirov murder and the trials of the "Leningrad Center" and "Moscow Center" that immediately followed were just the starting point of the inquiry, but everything that followed depended on these events. If the official charges in the first two trials — that former Zinoviev supporters had conspired to murder Kirov — were entirely bogus, then the indictments in all of the succeeding show trials collapsed. The latter indictments were built on the earlier ones.... But if there was some truth to the charge that Zinovievites conspired to kill Kirov, then that preserved the possibility of arguing that the later charges were also valid, at least in part. Therefore Serov and Rudenko (or their subordinates who authored the memoranda) chose to make a clear-cut argument that Nikolaev had had no relationship at all with the ex-Zinoviev supporters convicted in the trial of the "Leningrad Center."

It appears that Serov or his boss had thought through this strategy, to deny any connection at all between Nikolaev and the Zinovievites, even before the "Secret Speech." (Lenoe 591-2; cf. Furr, Kirov 164-5)

The evidence is overwhelming that the clandestine Zinovievist conspiratorial group who were tried, convicted, and executed along with Nikolaev, were guilty as charged. I demonstrate this in detail in my book. But Lenoe goes on to "believe" Gorbachev's men even though they were clearly lying just as Khrushchev's men had been doing.

As Lenoe points out in the passage quoted above, the Kirov murder leads inexorably to the three Moscow Trials. This threatens to dismantle the Anti-Stalin Paradigm of Soviet history. According to this paradigm, all the defendants in the three Moscow Trials of 1936, 1937, and 1938 must have been innocent, "framed" by Stalin for some reason or other. Therefore, the Kirov defendants must have been innocent too, and also "framed" by Stalin.

Concocting A "Lone Gunman" Theory

Kotkin:

The executions were carried out within an hour; ... Kotolynov was shot last. "This whole trial is rubbish," he had told Agranov and Vyshinsky. "People have been executed. Now I'll be executed, too. But all of us, with the exception of Nikolaev, are not guilty of anything."¹⁴⁶ (213)

Note 146 (963): Sedov et al., "Spravka"; Kirilina, Neizvestnyi Kirov, 302-3; Lenoë, Kirov Murder, 370-1 (RGANI, f. 6, p. 13, d. 24, l. 51-68).

Sedov et al. is the report sent by the Politburo special commission to Gorbachev's main expert on ideology, Aleksandr Iakovlev. Iakovlev had tasked this high-level commission to find evidence that Stalin had had Kirov murdered. When they reported to him that they were unable to do so, he sent them back to try again. This "Spravka" is their final response, in which they conclude that Nikolaev was a "lone gunman." But they give no evidence that this was the case! As for these supposed last words by Kotolynov, they do not even cite a source.¹

In fact this is what Katsafa testified to Khrushchev's men on April 3, 1956. Even Lenoë doubts that it happened, saying: "If this conversation actually took place..." Why would Katsafa, an NKVD guard, have been present?

Kirilina cites Iurii Sedov, in Trud Nov. 25, 1990. Sedov, whom both Lenoë and Kotkin cite, is dishonest, though Lenoë calls him "a reliable researcher." My Kirov book contains a whole chapter on Sedov and his falsifications.

Katsafa's motive in fabricating such testimony is clear. His earlier testimony, that Nikolaev had implicated his fellow Zinovievists by talking in his sleep, had been important to the investigation. Khrushchev was busy executing, after phony trials, NKVD men who failed to implicate Stalin and Beria in crimes.²

² A well-known example is that of Boris Rodos, whose case we discuss briefly in a later chapter. For the case of Pavel Sudoplatov, see Chapter 15 of the present book.

Lenoe calls Katsafa's testimony about Nikolaev's sleep talk "a schoolboy lie." (Lenoe 283) But Lenoe is "bluffing" here — he has no evidence to support this. It is simply inconvenient for the Gorbachev-Lenoe notion that Nikolaev was a "lone gunman," so Lenoe wishes to dismiss it.

Iagoda's Collaboration Covered Up

Kotkin writes:

Hundreds more would be shot, none of whom had any link to the murder. (Union-wide, as many as 6,500 people might have been arrested and charged under the December 1 anti terror law in the first month alone.)¹⁴⁷

Note 147 (963): Maslov and Chistiakov, "Stalinskie repressii i sovetskaia iutsitsiia," 105

Maslov and Chistiakov, publishing in an official journal of the Gorbachev Communist Party, give no evidence whatever for this statement. They also use the term "repressed" (repressirovany) which can mean anything from demotion in one's job or being transferred to another post, to arrest.

However, it is an interesting and important fact — though Kotkin does not mention it — that some dozens of terrorists — mainly White Guardists, apparently — were shot during the first days after the Kirov murder, when Genrikh Iagoda, chief of the NKVD, and others were spreading the story that the murder was the work of these émigré groups.

After his arrest in March, 1937, Iagoda testified that he had tried to deflect attention away from the conspiratorial groups as much as possible, since he was himself involved in the leadership of the Rightist conspiracy. Iagoda had opposed the assassination of Kirov but at length compromised and agreed not to hinder it. This testimony is in the Vinogradov book Genrikh Iagoda. Kotkin cites this book many times, but he does not inform his readers about this.

Phony Claim of "Phony Confessions"

Kotkin:

The NKVD had been planning a second public trial of eight "Zinovievites" willing to incriminate themselves, with Draule testifying about their links to Nikolaev. In the event, she would be tried in camera, while several high-profile Zinovievites were added to the eight unknowns for a public trial, which took place January 15-16. The nineteen defendants, now headlined by Zinoviev himself, Kamenev, and Grigory Yevdokimov, were charged with fostering a "moral atmosphere" conducive to the terrorism that had resulted in Kirov's death. They had been promised their lives if they fulfilled their party duty and publicly confessed. (218-219)

The sentence in boldface is a fabrication. Not even Kirilina or Lenoë make this claim. No wonder Kotkin cites no evidence — not even, as he so often does, phony "evidence" — to support this statement. There is no evidence that any of these men had been "promised their lives" if they "fulfilled their party duty and publicly confessed."

Kotkin omits the unsupported rumor that Nikolaev killed Kirov because the latter was having an affair with Draule. But Kotkin can't resist accusing Kirov of "womanizing":

Kirov was also an infamous womanizer, whose carousing was a matter of citywide gossip. ... To what extent she knew of her husband's extramarital affairs ballerinas, young women in the apparatus— remains unclear, but they were certainly Medved's worry: he had to help conceal them, even as he was under severe pressure from Pauker in Moscow to strengthen Kirov's protection.⁴⁶ (194)

Note 46 (960): Tumshis and Papchinskii, 1937. Bol'shaia chistka, 37-8.

Tumshis and Papchinskii claim that Kirov had affairs but cite no evidence whatever, not even rumors (which of course are not evidence either). So Kotkin has no evidence whatever that Kirov had any extra-marital affairs. He does not even document the "city-wide gossip." We'll return to Kotkin's omissions about Draule in Chapter 14.

To Kotkin's Disappointment, Zinoviev And Kamenev Confessed

Kotkin:

Zinoviev admitted that he'd had conversations with people whom the NKVD called the Leningrad Center, for example with Vladimir Levin back in 1932, during his work in livestock requisitions. Kamenev at first refused to go along with the canard that his private conversations signified participation in a so-called Moscow Center or had somehow inspired acts of terrorism.¹⁸¹ (219)

Notes 181 (964): Iakovlev et al., Reabilitatsiia: Politicheskie protsessy, 162, 166. [In fact this statement of Kamenev's is on p. 164, not p. 166 — GF]

Just before the trial Zinoviev wrote a long, detailed confession in which he confirmed that there had indeed been a "Moscow Center," in contact with the "Leningrad Center" that had murdered Kirov. This confession is reprinted in Reabilitatsiia — Politicheskie Protsessy (1991), a book that Kotkin references here and several more times. But Kotkin conceals the existence of Zinoviev's confession from his readers.

In July and August, 1936, confronted with accusations from their own followers, Zinoviev and Kamenev finally conceded that they had indeed helped to plan Kirov's murder. We now have pretrial confessions from both of them, along with the extensive pretrial confessions by Iagoda, to confirm this. I quote some of these pretrial confessions in Chapter Twelve of The Murder of Sergei Kirov.

According to Arch Getty,

By 23 July (1936] Kamenev was admitting membership in a counterrevolutionary center that planned terror, but he denied being one of the organizers; he implicated Zinoviev as being closer to the matter. Three days later Zinoviev was confronted by one of this followers, Karev, who directly accused him. Zinoviev asked that the interrogation be stopped because he wanted to make a statement that, in the event, amounted to a full confession of organizing assassination and terror.³

³ J. Arch Getty, Oleg Naumov. Yezhov. The Rise of Stalin's "Iron Fist." New Haven: Yale University Press, 2008, p. 191.

Zinoviev and Kamenev admitted their guilt again at the public First Moscow Trial in August, 1936, and yet again in their appeals clemency, which were not published until 1992.

False Claim Of "Falsification"

Kotkin:

Yagoda had no issues with framing Zinoviev and "Zinovievites," a scenario that Stalin, in any case, did not come to immediately ... The fabrications, moreover, exacerbated the professional degradation of the secret police, which enraged Stalin, and for which he had recently abolished the OGPU in favor of the NKVD. The fabrications also hurt the USSR's reputation internationally, to which Stalin had become more sensitive.

There is no evidence whatever that Zinoviev and the Zinovievists were "framed" for the Kirov assassination. All the evidence we have supports the hypothesis that Zinoviev and Kamenev were guilty of planning Kirov's assassination. See Zinoviev's confession-interrogation of July 28, 1936, in the Volkogonov Papers, which Kotkin often cites. This has long been online:

- in Russian at <http://tinyurl.com/zinoviev28jul36>, and
- in English translation at <http://tinyurl.com/zinoviev072836>

We also have Zinoviev's appeal of his death sentence, in which he repeats his confession of guilt:

⁴ "Rasskaz o desiati rasstrelliannykh." ("Story of Ten Who Were Shot.")
Izvestiia, September 2, 1992, p. 3

We have no evidence that the confessions of the defendants at the Kirov murder trial were in any way fabricated, faked, dictated to them, or made under compulsion, threats, or with promises of any kind. No one — not Kirilina, Lenoe, or Kotkin — has any such evidence either.

All the evidence now available — and there is a great deal of it — supports the hypothesis that Kirov was indeed murdered by a clandestine terrorist Zinovievist group which was allied with a similar secret terrorist group of Trotskyists, and that Zinoviev, Kamenev, and their Moscow-based group collaborated with the Leningrad-based Zinovievist group in planning the murder.

Chapter 3. Ordzhonikidze's death

Sergo Ordzhonikidze, an Old Bolshevik (Party member since before the Revolution) and longtime close associate of Stalin's, was People's Commissar (= Minister) of Heavy Industry from January 5, 1932, until his death during the night of February 17-18, 1937. Kotkin's account of Ordzhonikidze, his death, and his relations with Stalin and Beria, are false from beginning to end. In part, this is due to the fact that Kotkin has clearly never studied this question.

But why hasn't he studied it? Because he thinks he already knows the conclusion: "Stalin was responsible!" This has been the only officially acceptable explanation since Nikita Khrushchev's day. It makes a good anti-Stalin story, so why question it?

There is no way to make Ordzhonikidze's death appear the least sinister unless you falsify it. So, instead of studying it himself — the responsibility of all historians — he cherry-picks fact-claims from rumors, phony studies, and dishonest secondary sources from anticommunist writers.

Kotkin has chosen to believe these lies and foist them upon his readers. It's the "safe" thing to do. Not to do this might leave him open to being called "an apologist for Stalinist crimes," or something. Not Kotkin!

Kotkin has taken the general shape of his false account of Ordzhonikidze's death from Nikita Khrushchev's "Secret Speech" to the XX Party Congress of February 25, 1956. There, as part of his attack on Stalin and Lavrentii Beria, Khrushchev stated:

Beria also handled cruelly the family of comrade Ordzhonikidze. Why? Because Ordzhonikidze had tried to prevent Beria from realising his shameful plans. Beria had cleared from his way all persons who could possibly interfere with him. Ordzhonikidze was always an opponent of Beria, which he told to Stalin. Instead of examining this affair and taking appropriate steps, Stalin allowed the liquidation of Ordzhonikidze's brother and brought Ordzhonikidze himself to such a state that he was forced to shoot himself.¹

There are many translations of Khrushchev's infamous "Secret Speech."

We know today that Khrushchev's "Secret Speech" was a lie from beginning to end. Can Kotkin really be unaware of this?

Of Two Sources, Choose the Phony One

Kotkin relies principally on two dishonest sources. The first is the 1963 biography of Ordzhonikidze by Ilia M. Dubinskii-Mukhadze, which outlines — without sources or evidence of any kind — the story that Stalin and Ordzhonikidze had a quarrel, after which Ordzhonikidze shot himself.

But Kotkin has to be aware that the 1967 edition of this same book omits all of this — simply leaves it out! If he doesn't know this, he is incompetent to write about Ordzhonikidze at all. Khrushchev was ousted in October 1964. Under Leonid Brezhnev the anti-Stalin lies promoted under Khrushchev (and by Khrushchev directly) were significantly toned down.

Kotkin's second dishonest source is the book In Stalin's Shadow: The Career of "Sergo" Ordzhonikidze by Oleg Khlevniuk. Khlevniuk is a shameless falsifier without any shred of objectivity, fanatically anti-Stalin and anticommunist. Khlevniuk too uses only the 1963 version of Dubinskii-Mukhadze's work. Khlevniuk also fabricates certain details himself.

Kotkin also ignores the 2008 article by Vladimir Bobrov.² In it Bobrov shows that there is no reason whatever to doubt that Ordzhonikidze died of a heart attack, as was announced at the time. Khrushchev and Mikoian, the two sources for the suicide version, each say that the other one told them about the suicide! They also contradict themselves. For example, Khrushchev said in 1961 that he learned of Ordzhonikidze's suicide "after the war" while later, in his memoirs, he claimed he learned it "during the war."

² "The Mystery of Ordzhonikidze's Death." (2008) English translation at <https://msuweb.montclair.edu/~furrgr/research/bobrov-ordzhon08eng.html> ;

Russian original at <https://msuweb.montclair.edu/~furg/research/bobrov-ordzhon08.html> (text encoding Windows-1251).

Bobrov shows that the suicide story, which may have originated as a Moscow rumor, was introduced by Khrushchev himself into his infamous "Secret Speech" at the XX Party Congress on February 25, 1956. Here I will treat this question briefly. I have discussed it more fully in my book Khrushchev Lied, section 48, pp. 114-116 and 387-388.

No "Strained Relations"

Kotkin:

Relations with Orjonikidze had become strained ... (237)

Kotkin cites no evidence at all to support this claim. And for the best of reasons: there is no such evidence. But this lie is central to Oleg Khlevniuk's dishonest portrayal of Ordzhonikidze's death, which Kotkin adopts.

Kotkin:

In October 1936, Stalin had Orjonikidze's elder brother Papuliya arrested, a first for a relative of a sitting politburo member.

Orjonikidze demanded to see his brother, but Lavrenti Beria, the policeman turned party boss in Georgia, where Papuliya worked, said he could allow that only after concluding the investigation.²²⁴

Orjonikidze understood that it was not Beria but Stalin who was behind the incarceration.²²⁵ On October 8, Stalin had Kaganovich's deputy Yakov Livshits removed as deputy commissar of railways and, six days later, arrested.²²⁶ (348)

Note 224 (987): 224. Izvestiia, Nov. 22, 1963.

This is all false. This is a Khrushchev-era article that echoes the lies in the first edition, later withdrawn, of Dubinskii-Mukhadze's book. But how could Kotkin's readers know this? And — wait a minute — who uses newspaper articles as primary source evidence for a historical event?

Note 225 (987): 225. Knight, Beria, 73-4; Vaksberg, Neraskrytye tainy, 123.

Knight, Beria, 73-4, says that this arrest did not disturb Beria's and Ordzhonikidze's friendship! And neither of these sources has anything about Sergo "knowing Stalin was behind the incarceration."

By Vaksberg's own admission, what he writes is only hearsay — rumor. In any case, there is nothing about this subject in Vaksberg, page 123. Moreover, Vaksberg states on page 124 that Papulia was arrested in November, not October.

Arkadii Vaksberg was a strongly anticommunist journalist and author of potboilers who had no way of knowing what Ordzhonikidze "knew" and doesn't claim to know here. No decent historian would ever Vaksberg as a source. But Vaksberg writes what Kotkin wants, so in it goes — GIGO!

More Phony References

Kotkin prints a number of lies about Beria and Ordzhonikidze:

He [Pavlunovsky] was arrested on June 28, part of Orjonikidze's "clan" that Stalin was extirpating.⁷³ (511)

Note 73 (1010): 73. Already back on Oct. 21, 1933, Stalin had written to Kaganovich: "Pavlunovsky destroyed the artillery. Orjonikidze must be given a scolding for having trusted two or three of his favorites. He was ready to give state benefits to these imbeciles." Stalin to Kaganovich, RGASPI, f. 81, op. 3, d. 100, l. 38-9. Pavlunovsky would be shot on Oct. 30, 1937.

There's nothing here about Stalin "extirpating" Ordzhonikidze's "clan" (whatever that means).³

³ According to one of the reports Ezhov gave to Stalin, Pavlunovsky was involved in a conspiracy to murder Ordzhonikidze! Lubyanka-Golgofa, 116.

Another such lie is the following:

Gamsakhurdia ... shared Beria's loathing of Orjonikidze ... But Gamsakhurdia had been among those deported to Solovki in connection with the 1924 uprising, and after his release and return, Beria had had him rearrested for an affair with a young publishing executive arrested for Trotskyism. But then Beria pardoned him, observing that sexual intercourse with enemies of the people was permitted.⁸² (513)

Note 82 (1010): 82. Rayfield, "Death of Paolo Iashvili," 636, 647; Rayfield, Literature of Georgia, 247. Countless others were executed, including Dimitri Shevardnadze, a painter who had established the country's national gallery in 1920 (and had co-designed the emblem of Georgia's Menshevik-dominated republic of 1918-1921); he had led opposition to a proposal by Beria to tear down Tbilisi's ancient Metekhi Church (which would survive).

There's nothing in the Rayfield article about any of Kotkin's statements, and nothing about Beria's "loathing of Ordzhonikidze." On the contrary, Sergo Beria writes that his father and Ordzhonikidze were best friends! Sergo says he was named after Ordzhonikidze, who was his godfather and "very close to my father his whole life."⁴

According to the Russian Wikipedia page on Gamsakhurdia, it was Beria who freed him from arrest for ties with Lidia Gasviani, "exposed as a Trotskyist." The story in Rayfield (page 249 in the 2013 edition) about Beria releasing Gamsakhurdia, who "slapped him on the back and told him that sexual relations with enemies of the people were permitted" is undocumented — evidently, a rumor.

...And More Phony References

Kotkin:

Also on December 4, 1936, in a memo circulated to all politburo members, Stalin dressed down Orjonikidze for having hidden long-ago correspondence with Beso Lominadze, who had been pronounced a posthumous enemy after committing suicide, while party boss, in Magnitogorsk the year before. The accusation of having concealed information from "the Central Committee" was one of Stalin's most threatening. What also rankled was that Lominadze's suicide note had been read over the telephone to Orjonikidze by Lominadze's deputy in Magnitogorsk, and that Orjonikidze was providing a pension to Lominadze's widow and money to their son (named Sergo, in Orjonikidze's honor). Stalin had reports that Orjonikidze was bad-mouthing him behind his back to his cronies Mamiya Orakhelashvili and Shalva Eliava.²⁸¹ At the plenum, Orjonikidze joined in the vicious attacks against Bukharin. (358)

Note 281 (1006): 281. RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 132, l. 132; Khlevniuk, Khoziain, 277.

This is all dishonest. This "memo" is Stalin's letter to Politburo members of December 4, 1936 pointing out that Lominadze had told Ordzhonikidze in 1929 about his oppositional views and Ordzhonikidze had not informed the Central Committee.⁵ As a result Lominadze was appointed First Secretary of the Trans-Caucasus committee of the party. Therefore, Stalin was indeed criticizing Ordzhonikidze here.

⁵ I would like to thank my Moscow-based colleague Vladimir L'vovich Bobrov for obtaining for me a copy of this archival document.

But Kotkin omits the fact, known since 1980, that Lominadze was expected by Trotsky's son Leon Sedov, writing to Trotsky in 1932, to join the Bloc of Rights, Trotskyists, and other oppositionists before long.⁶ This is objective information, from Trotsky's own papers in the Harvard Trotsky Archive. It could not possibly have been fabricated to falsely implicate Lominadze. So Stalin was correct — Ordzhonikidze's keeping silent about Lominadze's anti-party sentiments was indeed a serious political error.

⁶ Pierre Broué, "Trotsky et le bloc des oppositions de 1932." Cahiers Léon Trotsky 5 (Jan-Mar 1980), pp. 5-37. The Russian original, together with my translation, are in Furr, Trotsky's 'Amalgams', Appendix, Document 1, 504 ff.

Moreover, Lominadze lied even in his suicide note to Ordzhonikidze, which was read out to the latter in a telephone conversation by Lominadze's second-in-command. In it Lominadze continues to claim that he is being slandered. But now we know that he was lying, even here in his suicide note. Khlevniuk quotes this directly, in a book cited by Kotkin (1091). But Kotkin fails to inform his readers about it.⁷

⁷ Khlevniuk, O.V. Politbiuro. Mekhanizmy politicheskoi vlasti v 1930-e gody. (1996), p. 171.

On pp. 271-2, not 277, Khlevniuk reports, from his own book, that in September 1937, long after Ordzhonikidze's death, Orakhelashvili admitted that Ordzhonikidze had listened to Lominadze attack Stalin. Khlevniuk's source is the 1991 work Beria. Konets Kar'ery, page 387.

That essay is by Popov and Oppokov, two Gorbachev-era writers who composed a long series of articles attacking Beria. P. and O. cite very few sources, all of them from secret and unpublished documents, so no one could check them. But no sources at all are given here. So this fact-claim is, at best, a rumor. Rumors are not evidence, nor are collections of rumors, history.

Kotkin's claim that "Stalin had reports" is an especially flagrant falsehood. For Khlevniuk states plainly that we do not have any reports:

[[cyrillic]]Пока мы не располагаем донесениями НКВД Сталину по поводу настроений его соратников. Но велика вероятность

того, что сигналы о встречах и разговорах закавказцев, собиравшихся у Орджоникидзе, докладывались Сталину. (272)

While we do not have reports of the NKVD to Stalin about the mood of his comrades-in-arms, there is a high probability that the signals about the meetings and conversations of the Transcaucasians who gathered at Ordzhonikidze were reported to Stalin.

Evidently, Kotkin has simply invented the "Stalin had reports" business. As for Shalva Eliava, Khlevniuk does not even mention him.

Kotkin's claim of "attacks against Bukharin" at the December 1936 Central Committee Plenum is false too. The materials we have from that Plenum contain no "vicious attacks" against Bukharin by anyone, and not a word by Ordzhonikidze on any subject.

Was Piatakov Literally A Skeleton?

Kotkin:

On the evening of the 29th, Orjonikidze visited his former first deputy Pyatakov in prison for the last time and observed his utterly smashed face. (373)

There is no reference here for this statement. Presumably Kotkin has in mind Bukharin's alleged remark to his wife, Larina, that Kotkin quoted earlier in the text (370):

Meanwhile, Stalin had Bukharin summoned to a confrontation with Radek and Pyatakov, who were delivered from prison. Bukharin told his wife that Radek had denounced him as a spy and terrorist with whom he had plotted Stalin's murder, and that Pyatakov resembled a "skeleton with its teeth knocked out."³⁴⁵

Note. 345 (990): 345. Larina, This I Cannot Forget, 312

Kotkin's statement is absurd. Piatakov's face was certainly not literally "smashed." Larina doesn't even claim that it was, any more than she claimed Piatakov was literally a "skeleton." Ordzhonikidze was present at the Bukharin-Piatakov confrontation, the text of which been published.⁸ Nothing was mentioned there about any injury to Piatakov. A little more than a month later Piatakov was a defendant at the public Moscow Trial of January, 1937, where he testified at length. No one in the large audience, including many foreign observers, mentioned any injuries to Piatakov's face.

⁸ [[cyrillic]]"Стенограммы очных ставок в ЦК ВКП(б). Декабрь 1936 года." Вопросы истории 2002. №4. С.3-12.

What's more, it is quite possible that Bukharin never used these words. Larina claimed to be remembering what Bukharin had told her many years before. She first drafted her memoir during the Khrushchev years, when she was trying unsuccessfully to have Bukharin "rehabilitated." It contains other false statements.⁹ It reflects the fact that under Khrushchev the best way to get someone "rehabilitated" was to slander Stalin and Beria as much as possible.

A Confrontation That Never Was

Kotkin refers to a "confrontation with Radek and Piatakov." This too is false, for there was no such confrontation. Bukharin had a face-to-face confrontation with Piatakov on December 7, 1936. His confrontation with Radek was more than a month later, on January 13, 1937.

The Falsified Tale of Sergo's Death

Kotkin:

On February 17, 1937, Orjonikidze arrived at his commissariat, across the way from Old Square, at 12:10 p.m., two hours later than usual; he seems to have gone over to talk to Stalin, being one of the few people who could enter the dictator's Kremlin apartment.⁵⁰ Upon returning to his own Kremlin apartment, in the same Amusement Palace,
Orjonikidze evidently had a shouting match over the telephone with Stalin, with profanities in Russian and Georgian.⁵¹ The NKVD had been searching Orjonikidze's apartment, an obvious provocation.⁵² The remainder of Orjonikidze's day was occupied with meetings, including a politburo meeting at 3:00 p.m. to go over the plenum reports. Stalin hand-corrected Orjonikidze's draft resolution on sabotage, inserting passages about "Trotskyite wreckers." In the early evening, Orjonikidze made his way back to the commissariat for more meetings, leaving for home at 12:20 a.m. (February 18). Later that morning, he did not emerge from his bedroom to take breakfast. When one of his subordinates came by in the afternoon, he refused to receive him. At around dusk, his wife, Zinaida, heard a gunshot in the bedroom. Orjonikidze was dead.⁵³ (384)

After leaving the commissariat, Orjonikidze might have spoken again with Stalin. Dubinskii-Mukhadze, Ordzhonikidze, 6.

Sergo and Stalin "evidently" had a shouting match? So, where's the "evidence"? The fact is that not one of these statements of Kotkin's is true. A characteristic error is Kotkin's misreading of Larina's memoir, page 333, as saying that Ordzhonikidze was "returning to his apartment." (note 50) Actually, it was Larina who was returning home and Ordzhonikidze who was leaving.

[[cyrillic]]Подойдя к дому, я увидела, что из соседнего с нашим подъезда, ближе к Троицким воротам, вышел Серго Орджоникидзе и направился к машине. (333)

As I was approaching our home I saw that Sergo Ordzhonikidze came out of the entrance next to ours, closer to the Trinity Gate, and headed for the car.

They were already in the Kremlin. Heading for a car meant that Ordzhonikidze was leaving, not arriving. Khlevniuk has invented Ordzhonikidze's last evening of life. He has based his account on the dishonest first edition of Dubinsky-Mukhadze's book, which relates the completely undocumented tale about Ordzhonikidze's shouting match with Stalin, etc. As we pointed out above, the second edition of 1967 takes all this out.

There is no evidence that Ordzhonikidze's apartment was searched or that he had a "meeting ("tete-a-tete") with Stalin. Or, indeed, that he committed suicide at all.

Praise = "Ridicule": Kotkin

Kotkin (about the February-March 1937 Central Committee Plenum):

On the morning of February 28, Molotov, in place of Orjonikidze, delivered the report on sabotage in industry, and ridiculed Orjonikidze's counterinvestigations that minimized wrecking. (368)

This is false. In fact, the truth is just the opposite. Molotov praised Ordzhonikidze's anti-sabotage ("wrecking") activities multiple times (e.g. Voprosy Istorii 8 (1993), p. 16). Nor did Molotov "ridicule" Ordzhonikidze's investigations. Molotov said that the Ginzburg-Pavlunovsky investigation begun at Ordzhonikidze's order was mistaken in finding that "sabotage at the site did not attain a significant development." Molotov said that he trusted them, but yet they had been unable to uncover sabotage ("wrecking").

Kotkin:

Orjonikidze had confided thoughts of suicide to Kaganovich and Mikoyan.⁶¹ (386)

61. Mikoian, Tak bylo, 327-33. (992)

This is chapter 24 in Mikoian's autobiography. But Vladimir Bobrov has proven that Khrushchev and Mikoian lied big-time about Ordzhonikidze's death.

Kotkin Hopes You Don't Know What Kaganovich Really Thought

Kotkin:

In published photographs taken near the body, Kaganovich was seen expressing visibly strong emotions: grief, anger. He had lost his soul mate, and he knew Stalin had been sadistically pressuring the infirm Orjonikidze. Kaganovich tough as nails, explosive was spiritually broken. (386)

This has to be false. Kotkin gives no evidence for anything like this about Kaganovich.

* It is not in Mikoian's autobiography, the nearest footnote.

* Kaganovich himself says nothing about this in his interviews with Felix Chuev. On the contrary, he says that Sergo was his closest friend (62); that Sergo supported the attacks against enemies (162); that Sergo never talked about suicide: (162); and that he, Kaganovich, never heard of any arguments between Stalin and Sergo, and calls such stories a lie (163). Kotkin knows this work, which refutes his unsupported claim. But Kotkin hides it from his readers.¹⁰

Mikoian's autobiography is itself unreliable. It was published years after his death by his son, and has some probable insertions, as Michael Ellman has suggested.¹¹ It was clearly written to support Khrushchev's "line" against Stalin. Mikoian had been the first Party leader to attack Stalin during the XX Party Congress, days before Khrushchev's "Secret Speech."¹²

Another Lie From Mikoian

Kotkin:

Stalin went on to break Mikoyan, summoning him in 1937 to discuss the arrest of his subordinate in the food industry commissariat, Mark Belenky, then, after Mikoyan supposedly protested and Stalin called him blind in matters of personnel, summoning him again to show him protocols of Belenky's "confession." "Have a look: he confessed to wrecking," Stalin said. "You vouched for him. Go and read it!" Mikoyan called it "a blow against me."⁶² (386)

Note 62 (992): 62. Mikoyan was in Stalin's office on Nov. 2 and 14, 1937, both times with Yezhov. Mikoian, Tak bylo, 318-9; Na prieme, 224.

Mikoian did write these words. But there's nothing here about "breaking" Mikoian.

Belenkii was arrested on November 9, 1937, so Stalin's informing him of Belenkii's confession could well have occurred on November 14. But Kotkin fails to inform us that Belenkii had been under suspicion since at least September 25, 1937. In a report of that date to Stalin from NKVD man Litvin, writing from Erevan, Armenia, we read the following:

[[cyrillic]]После, переходя на работу в Баку, АКОПОВ в 1934 году был привлечен к троцкистской работе БЕЛЕНЬКИМ и состоял в руководящем составе троцкистской организации в Баку. Как участников руководящего состава троцкистской организации, АКОПОВ называет следующих лиц: БЕЛЕНЬКОГО, АМАТУНИ, СЕФ, БОНДАРЕНКО, НАРИМАНОВА.

Then, turning to work in Baku, АКОПОВ in 1934 was involved in the Trotskyist work of BELEN'KII and was in the leadership of the Trotskyist organization in Baku. As members of the leadership of the Trotskyist organization, АКОПОВ names the following persons: BELEN'KII, AMATUNI, SEF, BONDARENKO, NARIMANOVA.¹³

There are more allegations of conspiratorial activities by Belenkii:

[[cyrillic]]По своей подрывной работе в Наркомпищепроме ДУКОР был связан с бывшим заместителем наркома пищевой промышленности БЕЛЕНЬКИМ (арестован).

ДУКОР показал, что организация правых и троцкистов в пищевой промышленности, в лице БЕЛЕНЬКОГО, была связана с контрреволюционной правотроцкистской организацией в Наркомвнуторге, в лице ВЕЙЦЕРА и ХЛОПЛЯНКИНА.

In his subversive work in the People's Commissariat for Food, DUCOR was associated with the former deputy food addict Belenkii (arrested).

DUCOR showed that the organization of Rightists and Trotskyists in the food industry, represented by BELENKII, was associated with a counter-revolutionary right-wing Trotsky organization in the People's Commissariat of Foreign Trade, represented by Veitser and Khlopyankin.

— A summary of the most important testimonies of those arrested by the GUGB of the NKVD of the USSR for February 10, 1938. Dated February 13, 1938, No. 100890.

This is in the important document collection Lubyanka-Golgotha, 95. Belen'kii is also named in reports on pages 101 and 111. Kotkin never cites this important collection of investigative documents.

But the important thing is this: these were reports to Stalin, not fabrications by Stalin in order to "break" Mikoian. It would have been irresponsible for Stalin not to have informed Mikoian about serious charges against his subordinate.

Therefore, Stalin had sufficient reason to suppose that Belenkii might have been guilty. We have no evidence that he was "framed." We do not know whether Belenkii was guilty. We don't have his NKVD investigative file or the rehabilitation report on him, if there was one. In his autobiography Mikoian had ample opportunity to discuss the charges against Belenkii and refute them. But he never mentions Belenkii again after this passage.

"Dictator"? "First Among Peers"? How About "Despot"?

Kotkin:

Members of the inner circle were no longer comrades of the ruler. Stalin was no longer first among peers, but a despot.⁶³ (386)

Note 63:

As one scholar explained, "Up to 1936, the leading group was held together by shared convictions in a shared project, but after 1937 the nature of the group changed." Rees, "Stalin as Leader, 1937-1953," 207. (992)

What nonsense! Up to this date — February, 1937 — Stalin was not a "dictator" but only "first among peers"? Then why has Kotkin been calling him a "dictator" before this point in his book? Rees, as we shall see, is in error.

Documents Against Kalinin and Rudzutak?

Kotkin:

Mikoyan and Beria, assigned to comb through Orjonikidze's personal archive, discovered two sealed folders (received back when he headed the Central Control Commission), which held compromising tsarist police materials on politburo members Kalinin and Rudzutaks.¹⁴ Orjonikidze had marked the folders "Do not open without me." Kvashonkin, Sovetskoe rukovodstvo, 9-10 (RGASPI, f. 85, d. 2, l. 1-30). (992)

¹⁴ For some reason Kotkin uses the Latvian spelling. In scholarship, however, the Russian spelling "Rudzutak" is used.

Here is the text from the introduction to Kvashonkin's book.

[[cyrillic]]После гибели в феврале 1937 г. Г. К. Орджоникидзе, А. И. Микоян и Л. П. Берия, разбиравшие по поручению Политбюро архив покойного, обнаружили два запечатанных сургучной печатью конверта с надписью рукой Орджоникидзе: «Без меня не вскрывать»б. В этих конвертах находились несколько документов

из архивов Департамента полиции, изъятых из следственных дел ряда большевистских деятелей. Так, 25 марта 1929 г. из Ленинградского обкома партии в Москву на имя Орджоникидзе прислали копию показаний М.И. Калинина, данных им на допросе в феврале 1900 г. Протокол допроса начинался со слов Калинина: «Будучи вызванным на допрос вследствие поданного мною прошения, желаю дать откровенное показание о своей преступной деятельности». Далее следовал подробный рассказ о контактах с пропагандистами и участии в работе нелегального кружка. Помимо копии протокола допроса, в конверте Орджоникидзе сохранились также подлинники этого протокола и прошения Калинина на имя министра юстиции, поданного из петербургского дома предварительного заключения. Эти документы, видимо, были изъяты из подлинных архивных дел и присланы в Москву чуть позже⁷

Вместе с документами Калинина в конверте хранилась архивная справка о Я. Э. Рудзутаке, осужденном в конце 1909 г. к 10 годам каторги по делу виндавской организации Латышской социал-демократической рабочей партии. Справка показывала, что во время следствия Рудзутак раскрыл группу членов организации и по названным им адресам были произведены обыски и изъято оружие и пропагандистская литература. Эта архивная справка была направлена из Центрального исторического архива в Ленинграде в адрес Центрального совета Всесоюзного общества политкаторжан в декабре 1928 г.⁸

After the death in February, 1937, of G.K. Ordzhonikidze, A.I. Mikoyan and L.P. Beria, who, on the instructions of the Politburo, were analyzing the archives of the deceased, discovered two envelopes sealed with wax seal with the inscription in Ordzhonikidze's hand: "Do not open without me."⁶ In these envelopes were several documents from the archives of the Police Department, seized from the investigation cases of a number of Bolshevik figures. Thus, on March 25, 1929, a copy of the testimony of M.I. Kalinin, from an interrogation of February 1900, was sent from the Leningrad Regional Party Committee to Moscow in the name of Ordzhonikidze. The interrogation protocol began with the words of Kalinin: "Being summoned for questioning as a result of my petition, I want to give frank testimony about my criminal activities." Then followed a detailed account of contacts with propagandists and participation in the work of the illegal circle. In addition to the copy of the interrogation protocol, the originals of this protocol and Kalinin's petition to the Minister of Justice, filed from the St. Petersburg pre-trial detention center, were also kept in the envelope of Ordzhonikidze. These documents, apparently, were removed from the original archive files and sent to Moscow a little later.⁷

Along with Kalinin's documents, an archival certificate was kept in the envelope about Ya. E. Rudzutak, convicted at the end of 1909 to 10 years of hard labor in the case of the Vindav organization of the Latvian Social-Democratic Labor Party. The inquiry showed that during the investigation Rudzutak disclosed a group of members of the organization and the police searched the addresses he had given and seized weapons and propaganda literature. This archival reference was sent from the Central Historical Archive in Leningrad to the Central Council of the All-Union Politkatorzhan [political prisoners] Society in December 1928.⁸

This is the text from Kvashonkin, Sovetskoe rukovodstvo, 9-10. (Notes 6-8 are to the archival document.) However, as so often with Kotkin's sources, there are problems.

There's nothing at all about this in Mikoian's autobiography Tak Bylo. Why not? What's more, Oleg Khlevniuk writes as follows:

нелегального кружка. Из архивной справки по делу Рудзутака, осужденного к десяти годам каторги в 1909 г., следовало, что во время допросов он раскрыл группу членов организации. По названным им адресам были произведены обыски, изъято оружие и пропагандистская литература.¹

Thanks to the new documents, we know that in 1928 in the archives of the police department compromising materials on M.I. Kalinin and Ya. E. Rudzutak were found. In the report of Kalinin's police interrogation of February 1900, it was said: "Being summoned for questioning as a result of my petition, I want to give frank testimony about my criminal activities." Kalinin, according to this protocol, told the police in detail about the work of the illegal circle. From the archival certificate in the case of Rudzutak, convicted of ten years of hard labor in 1909, it follows that during the interrogations he disclosed a group of members of the organization. At the addresses given to them, searches were carried out and weapons and propaganda literature were seized. (Khlevniuk, Stalin. Zhizn' odnogo vozhdia. Moscow, 2015, p. 155-6).

In his introduction Kvashonkin says that these documents were discovered in February, 1937, by Mikoian and Beria, in envelopes — not folders, as Kotkin states — in Ordzhonikidze's archives, with a message that clearly intended to keep them secret. Kvashonkin's book was published in 1999.

But in his 2015 book Khlevniuk states that the documents were discovered in 1928. Khlevniuk goes on to suggest — as usual, without evidence — that Stalin had used these documents to blackmail his supporters. (158) Kvashonkin (9-10) says that both the document about Kalinin and that about Rudzutak were sent in 1929 to Ordzhonikidze.

Both Kvashonkin and Khlevniuk cite the same archival identifiers, so they are talking about the same documents (RGASPI, F. 85 Novye postuplenia. D. 2. Ll. 1-11, 28-30). Why do they disagree so sharply about them?

- If Stalin had known about them in 1928, why did they end up in Ordzhonikidze's archive?
- If they did, would that not mean that Ordzhonikidze was very close to Stalin? Instead of fearful and hostile, as Kotkin, copying from

- Khlevniuk and Dubinskii-Mukhadze's 1963 edition, has it.
- Why do both Kvashonkin and Khlevniuk quote only one sentence — the same sentence — from just one of the documents, when there are clearly 14 pages (1-11, 28-30)? This fact suggests that either Khlevniuk, Kvashonkin, or both, had not actually read the document in question but had only seen a selection from it. Or, perhaps, Kvashonkin read it and Khlevniuk just copied from Kvashonkin. One thing is clear: Kotkin has not read it.
 - Why haven't these documents been published? Kvashonkin claims to have seen them as early as 1999. Yet in 2015 Khlevniuk only quotes the same one sentence from them.

Do these documents exist at all? If they do exist, are they genuine, or forgeries? It is the job of scholarship to recognize problems like this and either to resolve through, through research, or at least to alert readers to them. Kotkin does neither.

Chapter 4. Trotsky and the Bloc

I have published two books on Leon Trotsky's activities during the 1930s. Trotsky's 'Amalgams' uncovers and examines the lies by Trotsky and his son, Leon Sedov, about the bloc of Trotskyists, Rights, and other oppositionists. Kotkin also touches on this important issue. It is the subject of the present chapter.

In the same book I also devote twelve chapters, more than half of the book, to examining the testimony at the Moscow Trials, in an attempt to determine whether that testimony should be accepted as what it appears to be — what the defendants chose to say — or whether the defendants' testimony was fabricated, "scripted" by the prosecution, forced from them by threats or promises, and therefore should not be considered to be valid evidence. This section is now published separately as The Moscow Trials As Evidence.¹

On the basis of the evidence now available to all researchers I prove that Trotsky lied consistently about virtually everything concerning his own activities and about events in the Soviet Union. I also show that, whenever we can check a fact-claim made by one of the trial defendants against evidence that is independently obtained, we find that the trial testimony is valid. Therefore, the testimony in the Moscow Trials is valid evidence, and should be used as such in historical study.

In my second book, Evidence of Leon Trotsky's Collaboration with Germany and Japan, I gather and study the evidence now available about this important charge against Trotsky, which was featured in the Second and Third Moscow Trials of January, 1937, and March, 1938 respectively. I conclude, as any objective student must, that, on the basis of the evidence now available, we must affirm that Trotsky did indeed collaborate with Germany and Japan.

I cannot summarize these two book-length studies here, and refer the interested reader to them. Therefore, the present chapter will be short.

All the evidence available to me and which I study in these books is available to all researchers. But Kotkin either ignores it — bias by omission — or, as we shall see, falsifies it. To do otherwise — to recognize that Trotsky lied, and did indeed collaborate with the Axis, utterly dismantles the Anti-Stalin Paradigm of Soviet history that Kotkin bends all his efforts to uphold.

In the First Moscow Trial of August, 1936, Trotsky was accused of forming a "bloc of Rights and Trotskyites." By "bloc" was meant a political alliance for concerted action between clandestine opposition groups operating illegally within the Soviet Union. The aim of the bloc was the overthrow of the Stalin leadership.

Trotsky always denied that any such bloc existed or that he would have ever considered forming such a bloc with what he called "capitulators" — those who had publicly renounced their support of the Trotskyist opposition and promised future support for the Bolshevik Party line. Since Khrushchev's day the existence of this bloc has been denied by the Soviet, then the Russian, governments, and by all scholars of Soviet history whether Soviet, Russian, Western anticommunist, or Trotskyist.

In January, 1980, the Trotsky Archive at Harvard University was opened to researchers. Almost immediately a research team directed by Pierre Broué, in his day the foremost Trotskyist historian in the world, discovered that a bloc of Rights, Trotskyists, and other oppositionists, had indeed existed and that Trotsky had approved it.

Shortly thereafter, American scholar Arch Getty discovered other documents in the Harvard Trotsky Archive that proved that Trotsky wrote to former oppositionists — "capitulators" — in 1932, undoubtedly to urge them to return to opposition. Trotsky swore that he had not contacted them and would never do so. Again, Trotsky lied. Throughout the '80s and '90s Broué went on to discover other lies by Trotsky.

Kotkin cites Broué's research. He must also know Getty's 1985 article on the Trotsky Archives, which was published in Soviet Studies, the foremost vehicle in the world for research in Soviet history. But Kotkin does not inform his readers what this research proves — that during the 1930s Trotsky lied consistently about his activities. Trotsky lied in his Bulletin of the Opposition; in all his articles and books; in his supposed "refutation" of the 1936 Moscow Trial, the Red Book. Trotsky lied to the 1937 Dewey Commission, and the Commission members believed him.² Kotkin conceals all this from his readers.

Is This A "Lie"? If Not, What Is?

Note 19 (912): Stalin had the OGPU blackmail or entice Trotsky supporters internally exiled in the USSR to denounce him in the Soviet press. Radek signed a denunciation of Trotsky that was published in Pravda (July 13, 1929). See also Broué, "Bolshevik-Leninist Faction," 140; Deutscher, Prophet Armed, 390; Volkogonov, Trotsky, 281; Yaroslavskii, "Etot son knochen [this should be "konchen" — GF]," 2; RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 782, l. 9. Even Beloborodov and Ivan Smirnov would publicly break with Trotsky. Pravda, Nov. 3, 1929. Rakovski, in Astrakhan, nearly alone remained loyal; Trotsky kept a photograph of him on his desk.

Kotkin has fabricated this — literally made it up! There is no evidence that the OGPU compelled Trotskyists to "denounce him." Neither Deutscher, loc. cit., nor Broué, loc. cit., say anything about this.

Broué, "Bolshevik-Leninist Faction..." was published in 1988. It has nothing at all about the OGPU [after 1934 renamed NKVD] either "enticing" or "blackmailing" oppositionists to "capitulate," must less to denounce Trotsky. On the contrary: by 1990 Broué had concluded that the "capitulations" were false.

Lev Sedov called the Smirnov group either the "former capitulators" or the "Trotskiite capitulators." Everybody had known, from 1929 on, that people in the Smirnov group had not really capitulated but were trying to fool the apparatus, and were capable of organizing themselves as an Opposition within the party: the fact was so universally known that Andres Nin, the Spaniard deported from the Soviet Union in August 1930, explained it openly to his German comrades of Die permanente Revolution who printed his declaration without apparent problem.³

³ Pierre Broué. "Party Opposition to Stalin (1930-1932) and the First Moscow Trial." In John W. Strong, ed. Essays on Revolutionary Culture and Stalinism. Columbus, OH: Slavica Publishers, 1990, pp. 98-111., 104. (Broué, POS)

Kotkin cites this very article! So Kotkin knows that the supposed "capitulations" were phony. That means that Kotkin's claim that "Stalin had the OGPU blackmail or entice Trotsky supporters internally exiled in the USSR to denounce him in the Soviet press" constitutes deliberate deception of his readers — there is no other way to explain it. If this isn't a lie, what is?

Why would Kotkin, like Khrushchev's men and then Gorbachev's men, do this? No doubt because the existence of the clandestine "bloc of Rights and Trotskyists" was one of the central charges in the Moscow Trials, and Trotsky had consistently denied that any such bloc existed or could exist. Therefore, to acknowledge that it really did exist would dismantle the allegation, universal among Trotskyists and anticommunists, that the Moscow Trials were frame-ups fabricated by Stalin.

Antisemitism in Kotkin's Use of Names

Kotkin, Note 22 (912): Deutscher, Prophet Outcast, 67. At Stalin's behest, the propagandist Miney Gubelman, who went by the name Yemelyan Yaroslavsky, answered with an essay, "Mr. Trotsky at the Service of the Bourgeoisie, or L. Trotsky's First Steps Abroad"—published in Russian in the Soviet press, essentially a salve for Stalin's ego. Bol'shevik, 1929, no. 5 and 9.

What's the point of using Yaroslavskii's birth, "Jewish" name? As recorded in the memoir of the well-known Soviet writer Konstantin Simonov, Stalin himself said that doing so was anti-semitic:

A person has the right to write under a pseudonym he has chosen for himself. But, obviously, somebody wants to emphasize that this person has a double name, to emphasize that he is a Jew. Why emphasize that? Why do that? Why spread anti-Semitism? Who benefits from that?⁴

⁴ Konstantin Simonov. Glazami cheloveka moego pokoleniya. Moscow: Novosti, 1988, p. 216. Also online at http://www.hrono.info/Iibris/lib_s/simonov16.php

Kotkin does not call Grigorii Zinoviev by his birth, "Jewish" name Ovsei-Gersh Aronovich Radomysel'skii. He does not call Lev Kamenev by his birth, "Jewish" name Rozenfel'd. He does not refer to Karl Radek by his birth, "Jewish" name Sobel'son. And he doesn't refer to Leon Trotsky by his birth, "Jewish" name Leiba Bronshtein. Evidently Kotkin's antisemitism is restricted to people he does not like — supporters of Stalin.

Yaroslavskii's brother kept his birth name Gubel'man, was a lifelong Bolshevik and died full of honors in 1966. Yaroslavskii's son kept the name Yaroslavsky and became a Major-General, famous pilot, and hero of World War II.

Trotsky and the Bloc

Kotkin:

Sedov wrote to his father—in invisible ink—that a "bloc" had formed inside the USSR of "Zinovievites, the Sten-Lominadze group, and Trotskyites," an apparent reference to the small Ryutin conspiracy. ...²⁹¹ (106)

Note 291 (935): Trotsky received the letter on Oct. 4, 1932: Trotsky archive, Harvard, T 4782; Davies, Crisis and Progress, 246-7, citing conversations with Pierre Broué, editor of Trotsky's notebooks in French.

This is another falsehood by Kotkin — in this case, "bias by omission." The text of Sedov's letter makes it clear that the bloc was not small. Davies, 246, notes that the bloc "consisting of 'Zinovievites, the Sten-Lominadze group and Trotskyists (former [capitulators])'." Moreover, it had nothing to do with Riutin. No "small Riutin conspiracy" existed. Riutin was simply one member of the Rightist conspiracy that entered the bloc in 1932.

Here is the relevant part of the letter ("Z" and "K" are Zinoviev and Kamenev):

[The bloc] has been organized. In it have entered the Zinovievists, the Sten-Lominadze group and the Trotskyists (former "capitulators"). The group of Safar. Tarkhan. has not formally entered yet — they stand on too extreme a position; they will enter in a very short time. — The declaration of Z. and K. concerning their enormous mistake in '27 was made during negotiations with our people concerning the bloc, immediately before the exile of Z and K. —⁵

⁵ Furr, Trotsky's 'Amalgams', 506 ff.; my translation.

This is the "bloc of Oppositionists" the same bloc referred to in the Moscow Trials. Broué admits this in his 1980 article, which Kotkin footnotes elsewhere, though not here. Kotkin is deliberately deceiving his readers by withholding this information from them.

Evidence of Trotsky's Conspiracy with Germany and Japan

In the Second and Third Moscow Trials a number of defendants testified at length about Trotsky's conspiracy with Hitler's Germany and militarist-fascist Japan against the Soviet Union. Trotsky, of course, denied any such thing. But this means nothing since he would do so whether he were guilty or innocent.

We now have a lot of evidence that Trotsky did in fact collaborate with Germany and Japan. As we have seen, Kotkin has not simply denied that the bloc of Rights, Trotskyists, and other oppositionists really existed, but has also falsified the evidence. It should be no surprise that Kotkin ignores entirely the evidence of Trotsky's collaboration with the Axis even though it is in document collections that he himself uses.⁶

⁶ For this evidence, see Furr, Trotsky's Collaboration.

We also have a great deal of evidence that Trotskyists within the USSR were doing just what the Trotskyists in the Second and Third Moscow Trials testified that they were doing: planning assassinations and sabotage and were working with German agents.⁷ At present we have evidence in two forms: pretrial interrogations and confessions of people involved in Oppositional activities within the Soviet Union; and confessions, including now the actual trial transcript, of Marshal Mikhail Tukhachevsky and the seven other top-level military leaders arrested, tried, convicted, and executed.

⁷ For this evidence, see Furr, Trotsky's 'Amalgams'. Volume 3 of my Trotsky studies will have much more such evidence.

Chapter 5. First Moscow Trial

Kotkin's principal methods of misdirection and falsification in this chapter are:

- Bias by omission — ignoring evidence that disproves Kotkin's fact-claims but which his readers will not know about.
- Argument by scare quote;
- The use of phony references that do not provide evidence for the statements Kotkin makes in his text.

It appears that Kotkin has not bothered to actually research any of these topics himself! At best he relies on secondary sources: works of research, or what appear to be research, although many of those whom he cites are phony researchers. Kotkin also relies on works that are not even secondary sources, works that contain fact-claims that are not supported by any evidence at all, not even phony evidence.

Fallacy #1: Begging The Question

Kotkin prefaces his chapters on the trials of the 1930s this way:

Stalin instigated an epic version of the time-honored authoritarian device of trumped-up conspiracies linking internal with external "enemies," but the Soviet case differed in more than just scale.³⁰ (306)

Note 30 (982) 30. Rees, "Stalin as Leader, 1937-1953," 202-3.

Rees' pages contain no evidence whatever! Like Kotkin, Rees simply assumes that the conspiracies were fabrications — the logical fallacy of "begging the question."

Roy Medvedev, author of the other monumental work on the terror (1971, 1989), endeavored to separate Stalin from the sacred Lenin and depicted him as a traditional tyrant, but he similarly asserted that Stalin was motivated by "lust for power, boundless ambition," as if all tyrants murdered their own elites not just on such a scale but also with forced confessions to fantastical crimes they had not committed.³¹ (306-7)

Note 31 (982): 31. Medvedev, Let History Judge, 585. Volkgonov [sic] largely echoed Medvedev. Lars Lih argued that Stalin pursued an "anti-bureaucratic scenario," but also that Stalin recognized the necessity of the state, an unresolved paradox. Lib, Introduction to Stalin's Letters to Molotov, 1-63.

The phrase "lust for power, boundless ambition" is indeed on Medvedev, 585. But Kotkin either does not realize, or pretends not to realize, that Medvedev's book contains almost no evidence! It is mostly based on Khrushchev-era attacks on Stalin which have since been disproven with primary documents from the Soviet archives.¹

Fallacy #2: The Argument From Incredulity

Kotkin again:

... the conspiracies in the Soviet Union were invented. (313)

This is Kotkin's position throughout. He cites no evidence to support this claim. Naturally — because it is false.²

² It is also logically invalid to say that "there were no conspiracies." The purpose of a conspiracy is to not leave evidence. A successful conspiracy goes undetected. Therefore, the most one can say is "There is no evidence of a conspiracy." But in this case there is an abundance of evidence.

His readers will not know of the mountains of evidence we now possess that the conspiracies did indeed exist and posed a grave threat. It is Kotkin's obligation, as a historian, to inform his readers about this evidence. But to do so would dismantle the whole purpose of his book!

Hiding The Evidence Against Valentin Ol'berg

Kotkin:

"Trotskyites" had also seized attention. Valentin Olberg, a provincial teacher who happened to have just returned from Germany, was arrested by the NKVD (January 5, 1936), which extracted "testimony" from him that he had come back with a special task assigned to him by none other than Trotsky: a "terrorist act" against Stalin. Olberg named other "terrorists" he had "recruited"; arrests followed.²⁴⁵ By spring the NKVD would arrest 508 "Trotskyites," one of whom was found in possession of Trotsky's personal archive for 1927. Stalin ordered the NKVD to furnish Yezhov with copies of all documents pertaining to Trotskyites and freed him from overseeing party organs, a task passed to Yezhov's deputy, Georgy Malenkov (b. 1902). Yezhov now oversaw the NKVD full time.²⁴⁶ (279)

Note 245 (976):

It is not out of the question that the NKVD tasked the Swiss-born Olberg, who had been expelled from the German Communist party in 1932 for Trotskyism, with infiltrating Trotskyite circles in Europe, then decided he needed to serve another purpose. On Olberg, see Chase, Enemies within the Gates? 134 (citing RGASPI, f., 495, op. 175, d. 105, l. 9). Vyshinsky wrote to Stalin and Molotov (Jan. 8) of a separate case of a "Trotskyite group" just turned over to the courts with supposed plans for a "terrorist" act against the dictator Stalin on Red Square back during the Revolution Day parade, while Yagoda and Vyshinsky together wrote to him (Jan. 11, 1936) about the liquidation of a Zinovievite organization of thirty-four people, asking how should they be tried. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 715-6 (APRF, f. 3, op. 58, d. 230, l. 65-65ob.), 716-20 (l. 68-76), 723 (l. 64).

Either Kotkin hasn't researched Ol'berg, or he is concealing the evidence from his readers.

Chase's fine book, published in 2001 and now seriously out of date, does document Ol'berg's Trotskyism and expulsion from the German CP. Direct correspondence of Ol'berg with Trotsky is preserved in the Harvard Trotsky Archive — a fact that Kotkin fails to mention.

Kotkin also omits any mention of the draft of a pamphlet on Ol'berg by Austrian Trotskyist Kurt Landau, also preserved in the Harvard Trotsky Archive. Landau confirmed that Ol'berg really was a Trotskyist. Moreover, Landau said that Ol'berg had given him the impression that "the technical work that the Russian comrades wanted him for was more important than [his work] for us."³

³ Hans Schafranek, Das kurze Leben des Kurt Landau (1988), 387, 421.

There has never been any evidence to doubt Ol'berg's confession that he planned to murder Stalin. On the contrary: we now have much more evidence to confirm Ol'berg's guilt, including confessions by his wife Betty and his brother Pavel', both of whom knew about and abetted his conspiracy.⁴ The collection of documents in which these confessions are printed was published in 2013, in plenty of time for Kotkin to have made use of it. But he ignores it. I will discuss this evidence in detail in volume three of my Trotsky studies.

⁴ [[Czech text]] In Politbiuro i Lev Trotskii: (sbornik dokumentov, 1923-1940 gg. Prague (Czech Republic), Sociosféra-CZ, 2013, volume 2.

If the Anti-Stalin Paradigm (ASP) is to be upheld, the charges at the Moscow Trials must be deemed fabrications and all the defendants, like Ol'berg, victims of a frame-up. So Kotkin suppresses the evidence.

As for the Khaustov book, the documents in it are indeed very important! As usual, Kotkin says nothing about them. These investigators' documents discuss contacts between the Trotskyists and Zinovievists arrested in early January, 1936, and the underground Zinovievist group in Leningrad that murdered Kirov on December 1, 1934. These documents specifically discuss the contacts with Kotolynov, one of the leaders of the Zinovievite group that murdered Kirov. The document on page 723 of this book shows that some of these people were not executed but given prison sentences.

Fallacy #3: Argument By Scare Quote

Note 246 (976): Jansen and Petrov, Stalin's Loyal Executioner, 46-8.

These pages — also full of scare quotes — contain no evidence that the defendants were innocent. Ol'berg is not even mentioned.

Note Kotkin's use of Argument by Scare Quote. Kotkin uses this dishonest rhetorical ploy when he wishes to conceal from his readers that he has zero evidence to support his anticommunist conclusions.⁵

⁵ I examine argument by scare quotes as a technique of deception in Furr, Kirov, 87 ff.

Kotkin:

Stalin pressed for wider arrests, using the unique instruments only he commanded: he dispatched a secret circular (July 29, 1936)—drafted by Yezhov and edited by the dictator—to party organizations, which was to be read aloud to all party members and which quoted the "testimony" of the various accused "Trotskyites." (325)

Argument by Scare Quote yet again! This circular of July 29, 1936, is largely made up of quotations from confessions of conspirators. There is a lot of evidence that they are genuine.⁶

⁶ See Furr. Moscow Trials.

So Far "Behind The Scenes" That It Vanishes

Kotkin:

The five-day trial of the Trotskyite-Zinovievite center commenced on August 19, in the October Hall of white Corinthian columns in the House of Trade Unions.¹⁰⁴ The spectacle followed an extended period of behind-the-scenes torture, scripting, and rehearsing, and this time it would result not in mere exile or imprisonment. The defendants, besides the five German Communists who "confessed" to Gestapo ties, were eleven prominent Bolsheviks of the 1926-27 opposition.¹⁰⁵ Ten of the sixteen happened to be Jewish (this received no special attention). Invited audience members numbered some 150 people, including 30 handpicked foreign journalists and diplomats, as well as many plainclothes NKVD operatives, but not the relatives of the accused. Despite slipups that betrayed the fabrication, the defendants, all Communists, publicly confessed to being wreckers, spies, terrorists.¹⁰⁶ (Kaganovich made sure to add himself and Orjonikidze to the list of targets.)¹⁰⁷ "I, Kamenev, together with Zinoviev and Trotsky, organized and guided this conspiracy," Stalin's former close associate stated. "I had become convinced that the party's —Stalin's—policy was successful and victorious. We, the opposition, had banked on a split in the party, but this hope proved groundless. We could no longer count on any serious domestic difficulties to allow us to overthrow Stalin's leadership." (331)

This is all false. In reality, there is no evidence whatsoever that any of the defendants were "tortured," nor of any "scripting" or "rehearsing" at all. So, naturally, Kotkin doesn't cite any evidence.⁷

To H—L With Reality — Let's Quote Orlov Again!

In giving his one example of "slipups that betrayed the fabrication" Kotkin shows his own incompetence. Kotkin's note 106 reads:

Testimony about a 1932 meeting that had allegedly taken place with Trotsky in Copenhagen's Hotel Bristol ignored that the building had been torn down in 1917 (the NKVD fabricators confused two sites). Orlov, Tainaia istoriia, 70. (985)

This too is all wrong. The Hotel Bristol was never "torn down." In fact, the building that was once the Hotel Bristol still stands in the center of Copenhagen.⁸ Ironically, it is this "slipup" of Kotkin's that betrays his falsification. It would be hard to believe that Kotkin did not bother to find out that this story is false — except that there are so many other examples of his incompetence.

⁸ See https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Hotel_Bristol_\(Copenhagen\))

Gol'tsman's NKVD file has now been declassified.⁹ It shows that the NKVD did not "fabricate" or "confuse" anything. Rather, the NKVD men checked up on Gol'tsman's statement about the Hotel Bristol, discovered his error, and suggested to Gol'tsman that he had gotten the name of the "Bristol" pastry shop confused with that of the hotel next door. Gol'tsman admitted that he might have been done this.

⁹ TsA FSB R-33833 Delo No. 3257. My thanks to my colleague Vladimir Bobrov for providing me with these archival documents. I will publish it in connection with volume 3 of my Trotsky studies.

But the most important point is this: Gol'tsman made the same error at the trial! We know now that the prosecution knew he had made a mistake. Yet Vyshinsky did not correct him! The Prosecution permitted Gol'tsman to testify as he chose to do even though they knew he was in error. Therefore, this "slip-up" — on Gol'tsman's part — is strong evidence that the trial was not fabricated in any way.

Instead of researching this issue Kotkin relies upon Orlov's long-discredited book. More than thirty years ago American scholar Arch Getty exposed Orlov's book as untrustworthy on pages 211-212 of his classic study Origins of the Great Purges. John Costello and Oleg Tsarev also cite many demonstrable lies by Orlov.¹⁰

¹⁰ John Costello and Oleg Tsarev. Deadly Illusions. NY: Crown, 1993.

How Dare Kaganovich Tell The Truth!

Kotkin writes:

(Kaganovich made sure to add himself and Orjonikidze to the list of targets.)¹⁰⁷

Note 107 (985): Iakovlev et al., Reabilitatsiia: politicheskie protsessy, 187-8.

Another falsehood! The Iakovlev book (R-PP) states that Kaganovich inserted his and Ordzhonikidze's names into the sentence. But even R-PP does not claim that he or anyone had inserted them into the confessions of the accused.

Mrachkovsky, one of the defendants in the trial, had stated that Stalin, Voroshilov, and Kaganovich were to be assassinated (1936 Trial, 41). Reingol'd named these three plus Ordzhonikidze, Postyshev, Kosior, "and others." (55) Zinoviev admitted that his group planned to assassinate Stalin, Voroshilov, and Kaganovich. (153)

Therefore Kaganovich did not fabricate anything, but simply corrected the text of the sentence by inserting his own name. But how could Kotkin's readers know this, since he conceals it from them?

"Begging The Question" Yet Again

Kotkin:

Bukharin, hiking the Pamirs in Central Asia, had hurried back to Moscow to find Stalin away on holiday, and would write the dictator a letter, which also found its way into the holiday mailbag, rabidly endorsing all the fabricated charges of the trial, except those about himself ("I embrace you, for I'm clean").¹¹¹ (332)

Note 111 (985): Stalin had afforded Bukharin an opportunity to defect: in Feb. 1936, he had appointed Bukharin to lead a commission to purchase a Marx-Engels archive in France, leaving the trip's duration up to Bukharin and permitting the pregnant Larina to join him. But his father, brother, first wife, second wife, and daughter lived in Moscow, and the trip to France had taken place before Zinoviev and Kamenev had been executed. Cohen, Bukharin, 4 72; Liebich, "I Am the Last." See also Dan, "Bukharin o Staline," 181-2; and Nicolaevsky, Power and the Soviet Elite.

This is a phony footnote. It contains no evidence that the charges were "fabricated." And for the best of reasons: there simply is no such evidence anywhere!

What's more, it appears that Kotkin has simply copied this footnote from Cohen, Bukharin, 472, where Cohen cites the very same passages in Dan and Nicolaevsky. As for Nicolaevsky's book, Getty demolished it as being itself a fabrication — see Origins 214-216.

Ignore The Evidence and Any Problem Remains "Unanswerable."

Kotkin:

On the eve of Kamenev's execution, Stalin wrote to Kaganovich that Kamenev, through his wife, had sounded out the French ambassador about supporting a possible Trotskyite-Zinovievite government. "I believe Kamenev also sounded out the English, German, and American ambassadors," Stalin added. "This means Kamenev was supposed to reveal to these foreigners the plans for the conspiracy and the murder of the leaders of the party. This also means Kamenev had already revealed the plans to them, for otherwise the foreigners would not have begun talking about the future Trotskyite-Zinovievite 'government' with him."¹¹⁷ Did Stalin believe this? Was he straining to justify his political murders to Kaganovich? These questions remain unanswerable. (333)

Note 117 (985): Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 642-3 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 93, l. 77-80)¹¹

¹¹ This letter of Stalin's to Kaganovich is also online at <http://istmat.info/node/36927>

This is a problem for anyone who, like Kotkin, assumes, a priori and contrary to all the evidence, that the trials were frame-ups. Rather than consider the evidence, Kotkin calls the trial "political murders" and says that the problem "remains unanswerable." Of course it is only "unanswerable" if one ignores the evidence and assumes a priori that Kamenev was innocent, as Kotkin does. Once again, Kotkin commits the logical fallacy of "begging the question" — assuming that which must be proven, not assumed.

In reality, these remarks of Stalin's are good evidence that Stalin believed Kamenev's confessions, and therefore that those confessions were genuine. Stalin's remarks make it clear that he (Stalin) believed that Kamenev had really been guilty of the conspiracy of which he was charged and to which he had confessed.

Kotkin Overlooks Evidence That Kamenev Was Guilty

Kotkin has also omitted an important section from this same letter to Kaganovich:

... Second. From Reingol'd's confessions it is clear that Kamenev, through his wife Glebova, was feeling out the French ambassador Al'fand concerning possible relations of the French government with / a future "government" of the Trotskyite-Zinov'evite bloc. ... Obviously, Glebova is well informed about all this sordid material. We must bring Glebova to Moscow and submit her to a series of meticulous interrogations. She might reveal many interesting things.

This passage is strong evidence that Stalin did not know in advance what Reingol'd was going to confess at the trial and was drawing conclusions based on those confessions at the time. In other words, Stalin was trying to figure out what was really going on. Once again, that means that Stalin had not stage-managed Kamenev's confession.

Oleg Khlevniuk, the Russian editor of this collection, an anticommunist historian to whom the practice of objectivity is completely foreign, appears to have realized this and tried to twist Stalin's words into an attempt at fabrication:

[[cyrillic]]Одна из шифровок (см. документ No 763) показывает, каким образом Сталин руководил фабрикацией таких дел. В этой телеграмме Сталин не только приказывает Кагановичу дополнительно допросить уже арестованную жену Каменева, но

прямо перечисляет какие показания должны быть у нее получены: о связях Каменева с послами западных стран в Москве и информированности западных дипломатов о планах «заговора и убийства вождей ВКП». (Stalin i Kaganovich, 620)

One of the ciphers (see document No. 763) shows how Stalin supervised the fabrication of such cases. In this telegram, Stalin not only orders Kaganovich to interrogate the already arrested wife of Kamenev, but directly lists what testimony should be extracted from her: about Kamenev's connections with Western ambassadors in Moscow and Western diplomats' awareness of plans for "plotting and killing the leaders of the CPSU."

Khlevniuk is lying — or, perhaps, deluding himself (and his readers). We know — and Khlevniuk and Kotkin must know too — that Glebova was not framed. Instead, she was let off (temporarily) with the help of NKVD conspirators. Here, quoted from a volume that Kotkin cites elsewhere, though not here, is NKVD man D.M. Dmitriev's confession concerning this event:

I remember the following cases:

1. The case of Tat'iana KAMENEVA. She was the wife of L.E. KAMENEV. We had information that Tat'iana KAMENEVA, on instructions from L.B. KAMENEV, went to the French ambassador in Moscow AL'FAND with a proposal to set up a meeting with L.B. KAMENEV for counterrevolutionary discussions concerning help by the French government to underground Trotskyites inside the USSR.

I and CHERTOK interrogated Tat'iana KAMENEVA and "steered away" from this accusation, making it possible for her to avoid testimony about this fact during the investigation.¹²

Rather than evidence that Stalin was fabricating confessions, this is strong evidence that he was not doing so! On the contrary, conspirators within the NKVD were deceiving Stalin in cooperation with the bloc, including Kamenev's wife.

Since this is good evidence that Stalin was not fabricating these trials, it is logical that Khlevniuk and Kotkin withhold it from their readers. But it is dishonest for them to do so.

Shame On Stalin For Not Violating Soviet Law!

Kotkin:

Stalin supervised the trial from afar, sternly instructing Kaganovich that the sentences had to mention Trotsky and Sedov. ("This carries enormous significance for Europe, both for the bourgeoisie and for the workers.")¹¹⁸ A few hours after the court had adjourned on August 24, Ulrich, at 2:30 a.m., pronounced the defendants guilty and condemned all but one to death. Later that day, the regime staged a grand aviation display at Moscow's Tushinsky Aerodrome ("Glory to Stalinist aviation and the Stalinist falcons"). Planes flew difficult maneuvers. Parachutists dropped from the sky. "The enemies' schemes," a teacher in the Institute of World Economy and International Relations recorded in his diary, "cannot stop our enormous successes."¹¹⁹ Kamenev and the others wrote appeals for mercy in the predawn hours. (Only one defendant expressly refused to do so.) Perhaps, as would be rumored, Stalin had promised them their lives in exchange for public "confessions" to crimes they had not committed.¹²⁰ But well before the end of the seventy-two-hour period for appeals specified in Soviet law, Kamenev, Zinoviev, and the rest were executed in the cellars.¹²¹ Yezhov retrieved the bullet casings as souvenirs. (333)

Note 118 (985): Stalin forbade mention of the fact that there would be no appeal ("these words are superfluous and would give a bad impression"). Khlevniuk et al., Stalin i Kaganovich, 642 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 93, l. 62-4)¹³

¹³ This document is also online at <http://istmat.info/node/36926>

Stalin did write this concerning the appeals. But either he changed his mind, or he was overruled — according to Kotkin he was still only "first among equals" at this point! — because, as Kotkin's text recognizes, appeals were in fact permitted. The appeals of Kamenev, Smirnov I.N., Zinoviev, and Lur'e, Natan L. have been published (Izvestiia, September 2, 1992, p. 3). All repeated their confessions of guilt in the strongest terms, while also asking for clemency.

Note 120 (985):

Eduard Gol'tsman wrote a note that he would not seek clemency. Volkogonov, Lenin, 276 (citing AMBRF, archive no. R-33833, t. 41, l. 256).

This passage in Volkogonov reads:

All of the sixteen condemned men, except one, wrote begging for mercy. The exception was Eduard Solomonovich Goltsman, eleventh on the list, who wrote a note declaring that he would positively not ask for mercy.⁹⁵

This is true: a note about Gol'tsman's refusal to appeal is in the Volkogonov Papers. But Volkogonov fabricates as badly as Kotkin. On the same page Volkogonov wrote:

Both Kamenev and Zinoviev still cherished some hope; Stalin had indeed promised to spare their lives if they would make a full 'confession' and repent. They had not realized that everything had been predetermined.

Volkogonov is lying here. There is no evidence to support this claim that "Stalin had promised to spare their lives for a confession." As with Kotkin and all those who adhere to the Anti-Stalin Paradigm a priori and in defiance of all the evidence, Volkogonov has to try to explain why the accused confessed if, as the Anti-Stalin Paradigm demands, they were all innocent.

Never Trust Volkogonov

Volkogonov's historical works are dishonest. Arch Getty has written:

We CAN judge them [Russian scholars], it seems to me, according to two criteria: how well were/are they able to communicate significant historical information and interpretation DESPITE prescribed controls, and how good is their research.

In this admittedly idiosyncratic definition, I think Volkogonov fails on both counts, First, his writing, both in the Soviet era and the post-Soviet time faithfully mimics, without nuance or Aesopian message, exactly what his employers want to hear. Others managed to do otherwise. Second, because of my interest in similar topics, I have had occasion to check and verify several of Volkogonov's more important archival footnotes in his Triumf i tragediia. I can report that a substantial number of them do not refer to the documents they purport to cite, even by the most generous paraphrase. Often, his notes cite documents wholly unrelated to the matter at hand. Some of this, of course, can be explained by innocent mistake or clerical accident, of which we are all guilty at one time or another. Some of it can be explained by the fact that Volkogonov himself almost never darkened the door of an archive; in good Soviet style, he headed a team of hungry but, to us, anonymous juniors who actually did the research, selected the documents, and presented them to the mandarin for approval. I have it, first hand, that he worked this way. But even with these caveats, there can be no excuse (to take only one example) for citing Stalin's order to torture prisoners to a stenogram of Zhdanov's speech on elections. Such examples are legion.¹⁴

¹⁴ H-Russia list, September 26, 1998.

This assessment of Volkogonov's scholarship is as accessible to Kotkin as it is to me or to anyone.

Note 121 (985): But well before the end of the seventy-two-hour period for appeals specified in Soviet law, Kamenev, Zinoviev, and the rest were executed in the cellars.

Yet another falsehood! The trial ended on the evening of August 23. Seventy-two hours were indeed permitted for appeals. But each of the four appeals we now have is dated August 24, 1936. That means that the defendants had appealed within about 24 hours.

Therefore, far from being broken, the law was adhered to. But it is evidently important to Kotkin to claim that Stalin violated Soviet law, so he falsifies this issue.

For some reason Kotkin claims that "Yezhov retrieved the bullet casings as souvenirs." This statement is not accurate; the reality was far more gruesome. Iagoda retrieved the bullets themselves, extracted from the skulls of the executed men! See the following article:

[[[cyrillic]]Пули, которыми были убиты два видных большевика, в качестве своего рода сувениров хранил у себя шеф НКВД Генрих Ягода. Когда через полтора года пришел его черед идти к расстрельной стенке, пули перекочевали к его преемнику Николаю Ежову, расстрелянному, в свою очередь, еще два года спустя.¹⁵

The bullets which had killed the two prominent Bolsheviks, were kept as a kind of souvenir by the chief of the NKVD, Genrikh Iagoda. When, after a year and a half, his turn came to the firing squad, the bullets moved to his successor Nikolai Yezhov, who was shot, in turn, two years later.

One would think that this macabre bit of information would help Kotkin make the trial and execution "look bad." It seems that incompetence alone can explain this omission by Kotkin.

Chapter 6. Second Moscow Trial

We now have overwhelming documentary evidence that the defendants in the Second Moscow Trial were guilty, and that Leon Trotsky did indeed conspire with the Nazis and the Japanese militarists against the USSR. Kotkin has this evidence too. But Kotkin's readers will not learn about it. Kotkin conceals it from them in order to argue, without evidence of any kind, that the Trial was a frame-up.

We have already examined this quotation of Larina's in Chapter Three:

... Stalin had Bukharin summoned to a confrontation [^{GFnote 1}] with Radek and Pyatakov, who were delivered from prison. Bukharin told his wife that Radek had denounced him as a spy and terrorist with whom he had plotted Stalin's murder, and that Pyatakov resembled a "skeleton with its teeth knocked out."³⁴⁵ (370)

Note 345 (990): Larina, This I Cannot Forget, 312.

¹ "Confrontation" is short for "face-to-face confrontation," a right accorded prisoners to confront and question their accusers. Kotkin does not inform his readers of this. There was no joint confrontation with both Radek and Piatakov — they were separate confrontations more than a month apart.

The transcript of the confrontation with Piatakov has been published. In it, Piatakov fully confessed his guilt at this confrontation. According to Larina, Bukharin told her that Ordzhonikidze wanted to hit Piatakov. Small wonder! Piatakov had been his trusted zam, second-in-command in the Commissariat of Heavy Industry.

There is a great deal of evidence against Piatakov! For a discussion of it, including non-Soviet evidence that is surely well-known to Kotkin see Trotsky's 'Amalgams,' especially Chapter 8.

We also have Sergo Ordzhonikidze's speech of February 5, 1937, to leading members of the Commissariat of Heavy Industry, where Piatakov had been his assistant. It is clear from this speech that Ordzhonikidze believed Piatakov guilty. (Getty & Naumov 292-294)

[[cyrillic]]Вы думаете, что если я имел первого заместителя, человека вроде Пятакова, который в промышленности работал полтора десятка лет" имел огромные связи со всеми людьми, что этот человек не мог подбросить нам 1-2 людей? Конечно, мог и подбросил. Некоторых нашли, других не нашли. Вы же слышали о методах борьбы, которую они вели. Кто-либо поставил вопрос, чтобы проверить у себя главке, как у него дело обстоит? Ни один даже не ставил и мимо даже не проходил. Как же вы хотите [дело] делать? И сейчас, имейте в виду, при этих затруднениях будут хныкать и ничего не делать.

Вы думаете, что вредитель тот, кто ходит с револьвером в кармане и ждет, чтобы кого-нибудь застрелить? Ничего подобного. Кто-либо мог себе представить, что Пятаков может быть вредителем? А он оказался вредителем, и еще, красноречивый, рассказывал, как он [это] делал.²

You think that if I had as my first deputy a man like Piatakov, who had worked in industry for the past 15 years, who had tremendous connections with all sorts of people, you think that this person couldn't possibly sneak one or two of his people in. But sneak them he did! Some of them were found out, others were not. You have, after all, heard of their tactics. Who among you has raised the question of finding out how things are going on in your chief directorate?

You think that a wrecker [vreditel'] is someone who walks around with a revolver in his pocket, someone who hides in some dark corner somewhere, waiting for his victim? Who could imagine that Piatakov could be a saboteur, and yet he turned out to be a saboteur, and, more still, a fine talker. He told how he did it.

² The Russian version of Ordzhonikidze's speech was not available when Getty and Naumov wrote in the late '90s. It was finally published in 2011 and is now online at <http://istmat.info/node/48634>

Ordzhonikidze went on to explain how he had Todorskii, someone whom Piatakov had named, expelled from the Party.³ Ordzhonikidze further explained how the Party had reprimanded him for expelling Todorskii on these grounds — presumably, without a Party hearing or trial.

³ In the published transcript of the January 1937 Moscow Trial Todorskii is named by Rataichak, another of the defendants, not by Piatakov. (1937 Trial 420) Piatakov must have named him in an interrogation not made public.

Bukharin confirmed that Piatakov had confessed his guilt to Ordzhonikidze. Bukharin did not tell Larina that he thought Piatakov was lying — if he had done so, Larina would certainly have said so.

"Begging The Question" Again: "Torture"

Kotkin:

On January 23, 1937, a second trial in Moscow of a parallel "Anti-Soviet Trotskyite Center" opened, like the first, in the October Hall, after Stalin had hand-edited the charges.³⁴⁸ Ten of the seventeen defendants worked in Orjonikidze's heavy industry commissariat.³⁴⁹ "And here I stand before you in filth, crushed by my own crimes," Pyatakov publicly confessed, "bereft of everything through my own fault, a man who has lost his party, who has no friends, who has lost his family, who has lost his very self." Yezhov had personally forced his erstwhile drinking buddy, in thirty-three days of torture, to capitulate to accusations of Trotskyism and plotting with Germany.³⁵⁰ (Yezhov was finally named to the highest rank, "general commissar of state security.")³⁵¹ Radek, in court, delivered a tour de force fabricated history of Trotskyism. His "features," an American correspondent observed, "seemed curiously out of focus, his teeth charred and uneven, his eyes very much alive behind thick glasses."³⁵² Soviet newspapers and radio afforded wire-to-wire coverage, accompanied by orchestrated meetings at factories and farms. "Why such a great fuss over the trial?" Feuchtwanger would ask Dimitrov. "Incomprehensible. An atmosphere has been created of extreme unrest among the population, mutual suspicion, denunciations, and so forth. Trotskyism has been killed—why such a campaign?"³⁵³ (373)

Note 348 (990): Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i glavnoe upravlenie, 9-19 (APRF, f. 3, op. 24, d. 269, l. 38-58, 80).

Stalin added literally only a few words to this draft indictment, reproduced on page 19 of the Khaustov volume.

Note: 350 (990): Report of Court Proceedings, 54; "O tak nazyvaemom 'parallel'nom antisovetskom trotskistom tsentre": 30-50.

This is a phony footnote that conceals another of Kotkin's falsification. It contains no evidence for any of the statements Kotkin makes here.

Specifically, it contains no evidence for Kotkin's claim that Piatakov, or anyone else, was tortured at all, much less for thirty-three days. No such evidence exists. Nor is there any evidence that Radek's story of Trotskyism was "fabricated" — indeed, Kotkin never bothers to tell us what he means by this.

In his testimony at the January 1937 Moscow Trial Karl Radek had ridiculed the notion of torture:

RADEK: When I found myself in the People's Commissariat of Internal Affairs, the chief examining official realized at once why I would not talk. He said to me: "You are not a baby. Here you have fifteen people testifying against you. You cannot get out of it, and as a sensible man you cannot think of doing so. If you do not want to testify it can only be because you want to gain time and look it over more closely. Very well, study it." For two and a half months I tormented the examining official. The question has been raised here whether we were tormented while under investigation. I must say that it was not I who was tormented, but I who tormented the examining officials and compelled them to perform a lot of useless work. (1937 Trial 549)⁴

⁴ For a more detailed discussion of this question see Trotsky's 'Amalgams 450-451.

Anyone who reads the transcript of the Radek-Piatakov trial can see that it would be hard to imagine anyone cooler under pressure than Radek.

Better Hide It From the Kiddies

The text that Kotkin cites, "O tak nazyvaemom ...," is the official Gorbachev-era attempt to discredit the trial. The only reference to "torture" in this document is this:

[[cyrillic]]Вся система допросов была рассчитана на морально-психологическое и физическое изматывание подследственных. Об этом свидетельствовал в 1938 г. и бывший заместитель наркома внутренних дел СССР М. П. Фриновский. Он, в частности, показал, что лица, проводившие следствие по делу так называемого «Параллельного антисоветского троцкистского центра», начинали допросы, как правило, с применения физических мер воздействия, которые продолжались до тех пор, пока подследственные не давали согласия на дачу навязывавшихся им показаний. (40)

The entire system of interrogations was designed for the moral, psychological and physical exhaustion of suspects. This was testified in 1938 by the former deputy People's Commissar of the USSR, M.P. Frinovsky. In particular, he showed that the persons who conducted the investigation in the case of the so-called "parallel anti-Soviet Trotskyite center" started interrogations, as a rule, with the use of physical measures of influence, which continued until the persons under investigation had agreed to give the confessions of those who were forcing them.

This is an admission that there is no evidence of torture in this case. But it is of interest to us anyway as it contains an instructive falsification — in this case, another example of "bias by omission" by Kotkin.

For in the confession — dated not in 1938, but in April, 1939, which shows how carelessly Gorbachev's "rehabilitation" materials were compiled — Frinovsky confirmed the guilt of Piatakov, Lifshits, and the other defendants in this trial.

At one of these meetings during horseback riding Lifshits said to me: I heard about you from Evdokimov. Frankly, I did not suspect that you were also with us. Good for you!" I began to speak with Lifshits — and how about you? He answered: "Evdokimov has already told you that I am doing work" I asked him again — are you doing important work? He said that he was doing important work, he had contact with the conspiratorial center through Pyatakov, had a large number of people ...

I had that conversation with Deribas, and Deribas was interested, in the main, in the names of the people who had already been repressed and the people who were mentioned in the [investigative] materials. I told him about Lifshits and Pyatakov who were on the point of being exposed.⁵

Frinovsky's confession-statement was not published until 2006. The Gorbachev-era text cited by Kotkin, "O tak nazывaemom ...," was published in 1989, at a time when no one could compare the false claim in it with what Frinovsky actually said.

Here we have very strong evidence of Piatakov's guilt. Kotkin knows this. He cites texts from this volume many times. As we will see in future chapters Kotkin cites this very document — Frinovsky's confession statement many times. But Kotkin simply refuses to tell his readers what Frinovsky said!. Presumably because Frinovsky's confession demolishes Kotkin's notion that the Moscow Trials were frame-ups of innocent men.

We now have a great many interrogations and confessions by the defendants at this trial and by others who implicate them, in volume two of the 2013 collection Politbiuro i Lev Trotskii. We will examine them in a future volume of our ongoing Trotsky research.

Kotkin ignores all this evidence too. Of course! This evidence dismantles Kotkin's fable about the supposed "frame-up" of the Moscow Trials. Better hide this evidence!

Notes 351 and 352 contain no evidence relevant to the Trial.

"Arguing From Incredulity" — Again

Kotkin:

Feuchtwanger found the allegations preposterous. And yet the oppositionists had organized a conspiratorial meeting, in summer 1932, at Zinoviev's dacha, where expelled party members of the Leningrad opposition had discussed reviving their old links to Trotsky. A message from Trotsky to join forces had been carried into the Soviet Union. Stalin was also correct that the NKVD (then the OGPU) had missed these contacts, which was evidently part of the basis for his statement, in the September 1936 dismissal of Yagoda, that the NKVD was four years behind.³⁵⁴ Of course, this was a pathetic "bloc" incapable of consequential action (Smirnov, a supposed organizer of the conspiracy to murder Kirov in 1934, had been in prison since 1933).³⁵⁵ But the meeting was not an invention. The "terror" charges, too, contained the minutest kernel of truth. (371-2)

This paragraph contains some interesting falsehoods. For one thing, Feuchtwanger did not find the trial "preposterous" at all! He only thought that the charges of Trotsky's collaboration with Germany and Japan were weakly supported. Here is the passage from Dimitrov's diary, cited in Kotkin's note 353:

2 February 1937

— Feuchtwanger to see me (Comintern).

... On the trial:

1. Diversionary actions, espionage, terror proved.
2. Also proved: that Trotsky inspired and directed.
3. Trotsky's agreement with Hess¹²⁴ and the Japanese is based only on the confessions of the defendants.

— No evidence whatsoever!

4. The fact that Radek and Sokolnikov were not sentenced to be shot will be exploited abroad as evidence that they furnished such testimony deliberately in order to save their lives.

5. The abuse hurled at the defendants leaves a disturbing impression.

They are enemies, deserving of destruction. But they did not act out of personal interest, and they should not to have called them scoundrels, cowards, reptiles, etc.

6. Why such a great fuss over the trial. Incomprehensible. An atmosphere has been created of extreme unrest among the population, mutual suspicion, denunciations, and so forth. Trotskyism has been killed—why such a campaign? (Dimitrov, 51)

Feuchtwanger found the principal charges credible but complained that the only evidence of Trotsky's conspiracy with the Germans (Hess, Hitler's deputy in the Nazi Party) and the Japanese was based on confessions.

Trotsky's Conspiracy with Hitler's Germany

But Feuchtwanger was in error. He did not ask himself what other kind of evidence could possibly exist. What did he expect — a letter about the conspiracy signed by Hess and Trotsky themselves?

There is a great deal of evidence, from various sources, that Trotsky was indeed in conspiracy with German and Japan to defeat the USSR in a war.⁶ We will present a lot more evidence of Trotsky's conspiracy with Germany in the third volume of our study of Trotsky's activities.

⁶ See Furr, Trotsky's Collaboration.

The fact that Feuchtwanger, or anyone else, does not believe the charges is not evidence that the charges were false. Such reasoning is called the argument from incredulity (sometimes called the "fallacy of personal incredulity").⁷ It applies to Kotkin, too. Kotkin rejects — i.e., refuses to believe — the charges against the defendants in this and the other trials. But he has no evidence whatsoever that these charges were false. And it is evidence, not whatever Kotkin, or anybody else, "believes," that is decisive.

The Bloc Did Function

Kotkin:

Of course, this was a pathetic "bloc" incapable of consequential action (Smirnov, a supposed organizer of the conspiracy to murder Kirov in 1934, had been in prison since 1933).

This is false. In Trotsky's 'Amalgams' we have cited and discussed evidence that the bloc continued to function at the Suzdal' political "isolator" (prison with especially good conditions), where Smirnov was confined. (Furr, Trotsky's 'Amalgams' 72, 74)

In 2017 yet more evidence of vigorous political activity by prisoners from the Opposition was discovered hidden at the political "isolator" at Verkhneural'sk.⁸ Here we can just refer the reader to the confession-statement by Mikhail Frinovsky cited above, and its online English translation — which Kotkin ignores.

<http://www.wsws.org/en/articles/2018/08/27/left-a27.html> There are a number of articles about this discovery on the Russian-language internet.

Nor was Smirnov accused of organizing the conspiracy to murder Kirov in 1934, as Kotkin falsely claims. Smirnov was accused of being a leader of the bloc, and members of the bloc who were not in prison organized Kirov's murder. Smirnov specifically denied having had anything to do with "terrorist" (assassination) activities, though he admitted that he was an organizer of the bloc that did carry out such actions. He was, however, accused of a more active role by his admitted co-conspirators.

Vyshinsky: Was the centre organized on the basis of terrorism?

Smirnov: Yes.

Vyshinsky: Were you a member of that centre?

Smirnov: Yes, I was.

Vyshinsky: Consequently, those instructions were meant for you too?

Smirnov: Yes, they were communicated to me.

Vyshinsky: They were not only communicated through you but were also instructions for you?

Smirnov: They were forwarded as instructions.

Vyshinsky: Did you accept them?

Smirnov: Yes.

Vyshinsky: How can you maintain, then, that Trotsky, from whom these instructions originated, was not an authority for you? ...

Smirnov: I listened to those instructions and communicated them to the centre. The centre accepted them, but I took no part in its work. (First Moscow Trial, 83)

"Remove Stalin!"

Kotkin:

After a decree had rescinded Trotsky's Soviet citizenship, he had written a spirited open letter to the central executive committee of the Soviet (which had nominal jurisdiction over citizenship) asserting that "Stalin has led us to a cul-de-sac It is necessary, at last, to carry out Lenin's last insistent advice: remove Stalin."³⁵⁶ Trotsky had not written "remove by assassination," but how else could it be done?³⁵⁷ (371-2)

Note 356 (990): Trotskii, "Otkrytoe pis'ma." [This should be "Otkryoe pis'mo" — GF]

Trotsky's words are: "ubrat' Stalina." ("Надо, наконец, выполнить последний настойчивый совет Ленина: убрать Сталина.") "Ubrat'" was the word used by all the conspirators.⁹ Kotkin is correct to suggest that it meant "kill" because there was no other way. At the Second Moscow Trial of January, 1937, Radek said that he understood that Trotsky meant Stalin should be killed though Trotsky never used a word like "kill."

Note 357 (990): ... the NKVD agent Zborowski managed to report that, on Jan. 22, Trotsky's son Lev Sedov had told him apropos of the accusations, "now there is no longer vacillation, Stalin should be killed." Volkogonov, Trotskii, II: 197 (citing Arkhiv INO OGPU-NKVD, f. 31660, d. 9067, t. 1, l. 98). Although, in an article (Oct. 1933), Trotsky had written that "the only way to compel the bureaucracy to hand over power to the proletariat is by force," in a subsequent article on the Kirov murder he wrote that assassinating Stalin would accomplish nothing, because he would just be replaced by "one of those Kaganoviches." "Klassovaia priroda sovetskogo gosudarstva (problemy chetvertogo internatsionala)," Biulleten' oppozitsii, no. 36-7 (October 1933): 1-12 (at 9-10); Trotskii, "Stalinskaia biurokratiia i ubiistvo Kirova"; Volkogonov, Triumf i tragediia, 11/i: 270.

For a thorough discussion of Sedov's statement to Zborowski, see Trotsky's 'Amalgams', 292 ff., "Trotsky and Terror." There we demonstrate that this and other statements by Sedov constitute strong evidence that Trotsky and his son were lying when they were assuring the world that they opposed assassinating Stalin and others.

Of course they would deny it, whether or not they were actually planning assassination! Conspiracy necessarily involves lying. Therefore, their denials mean nothing. We have much evidence that Trotsky counted on using force against Stalin and his supporters. But Trotsky could not say so publicly.

Chapter 7. Spanish Civil War

Why Not Some New Falsehoods?

Has Kotkin actually researched this topic himself? If he has, why does he repeats old falsehoods, mainly from Cold War-era anticommunist research? The primary sources available today, many available for decades, prove that Kotkin's claims of nefarious actions by the Soviets in Spain are false down to the last one. Kotkin relates how Andreu Nin, formerly a secretary (political advisor) of Trotsky's, became a leader of the POUM (Workers Party of Marxist Unification) in Spain, publicly broke with Trotsky and Trotsky, also publicly, with him, and that Trotsky's position was that there should be a "full-bore anti-capitalist revolution" in Spain. This latter position meant opposition to the Spanish Republic, a bourgeois-democratic regime, and with Soviet policy, which was to support such governments in order to gain as large a united front against fascism as possible.¹

In Stalin's worldview, Nin's hoary link to Trotsky alone rendered the POUM "Trotskyite." (345)

¹ The Soviets wanted a Popular Front government willing to work with them. But they did not want to scare off the anticommunist capitalist powers France, the U.K., and the USA. The Soviets knew that, unless the blockade against the Spanish Republic by these powers was dropped, the Republic was doomed. Also, the Soviets and the Spanish communists were realistic. They realized that no Bolshevik-type communist revolution was possible with Nazi Germany and Fascist Italy arrayed against the Republic.

As we saw in Chapter Four, we have good reason to think that Nin's and Trotsky's supposed "break" — scare quotes deliberate here — was a cover for continued collaboration just as Radek, Piatakov, and many other Trotskyists admitted. The Soviets certainly must have assumed that. Given the materials that he claims he has read, Kotkin must know it too.

There was also the POUM's independence, criticizing the Stalinist line while claiming the mantle of Marxism. Some members of the POUM, moreover, openly admired Trotsky, and some of its officials discussed inviting him to take up residence in Barcelona. Sometimes fabricated nightmares have a way of coming true. (345)

Here Kotkin wants it both ways. On the one hand, Kotkin insists that the POUM was not really Trotskyist. This is evidently what he means by Stalin's "fabricated nightmare" and by ignoring Nin's, Erwin Wolfs, and Landau's ties to Trotsky. But on the other hand Kotkin concedes that POUM acted like a Trotskyist party would be expected to act.

Kotkin:

Throughout Europe, significant doubts reverberated among leftist intellectuals about the alleged treason of the executed Bolshevik revolutionaries, but in Republic Spain, the POUM's La Batalla was almost the only newspaper to detail, let alone condemn, the Moscow showcase trial, labeling the Soviet Union a "bureaucratic regime of poisonous dictatorship." Tit for tat, the lead editorial in the September 1936 issue of The Communist International, issued in multiple European languages, condemned the POUM as fascist agents masquerading as leftists, with ties to Trotsky, Kamenev, Zinoviev, Franco, Mussolini, Hitler. 184 (343-344)

Here too Kotkin shows that POUM used Trotsky's own terminology to condemn the First Moscow Trial, thus tacitly conceding that POUM acted as though it were a Trotskyist party.

Note 184 (986) Dimitrov, "Zashchishchat' podlykh terroristov" (no. 14), 3-6, (no. 15), 17-8. In the same issue, Palmira Togliatti presented Stalin's retrospective criminalization of long-ago factional activity as "an act to defend democracy, peace, socialism, and the revolution." Ercoli, "Uroki protsessa," 37, 43. "The Moscow trial has had a catastrophic effect and has dreadfully compromised the policy of the Popular Front," the Austrian Marxist Rudolf Hilferding had lamented in Aug. 1936. McDermott and Agnew, Comintern, 156.

This is all wrong. What's more, Kotkin knows it. Mikhail Frinovsky, Yezhov's second-in-command, stated in April 1939 that the Moscow Trials defendants really were guilty.

At the time of the trial of Zinoviev, Kamenev and others, when the testimony about Bukharin was published in the press, Evdokimov was in Moscow. He became very upset and in a conversation with me, said: "The devil only knows how he will be able to extract himself from this whole affair. I just don't understand Yagoda at all, what he is doing, why he is broadening the circle of persons for repression, or maybe the nerves of these people are weak — they will give out. But it could have been possible to direct the course of the investigation in such a manner as to leave oneself safe in any case." (Frinovsky, 40)²

² Frinovsky's statement to Beria is online in English translation at <https://msuweb.montclair.edu/~furr/research/frinovskyeng.html> We return to it in a later chapter.

Today we have a great deal of evidence that Zinoviev, Kamenev, et al. were guilty. Their factional activity was not of "long ago" and had by no means ended. Kotkin knows about this evidence too.

There has never been any evidence that any of the Moscow Trials (only the first Moscow Trial is at question now) were frame-ups, the defendants innocent, tortured, threatened, or otherwise forced or cajoled to make false confessions.³ This is the bottom-line reason that Kotkin has recourse to unsupported statements ("the defendants were tortured," etc.). Lies and unsupported fact-claims — as though "this is so obvious that no evidence is needed" — are his only resort.

Ironically enough, since all the evidence we now have supports the hypothesis that the Moscow Trials defendants were indeed guilty and Trotsky really was collaborating with the Nazis and Japanese, it turns out that Togliatti's statement that the First Moscow Trial was "an act to defend democracy, peace, socialism, and the revolution" was true. Anti-Trotskyism really was anti-Fascism — even though few Trotskyists outside the USSR knew it.

³ See Furr, Trotsky's 'Amalgams' Chapters 1-12; Furr, Moscow Trials.

Communist "Massacres"?

Kotkin discusses the Paracuellos massacre of Nationalist supporters in 1936 and then describes it as "the worst of the many massacres in the Republic's zone perpetrated by leading Spanish Communists and their Soviet advisers, Gorev, Orlov, and Koltsov.²³⁸" (351) Paul Preston, whose book Kotkin footnotes at this point, gives the figures of Nationalist victims as "somewhere between 2,200 and 2,500."

Note 238 (978): Preston, Last Stalinist, 70-88.

The men killed were in fact fascists. They were General Mala's — that is, Francisco Franco's — "Fifth Column."

But Kotkin is bluffing again. He does not identify a single one of what he calls the "many massacres." Preston says nothing about "many massacres" either, nor about any involvement in these or in any "massacres" by Gorev or Kol'tsov. In fact the Paracuellos massacre is the only such massacre by the Republicans.

Kotkin's Utter Lack of Objectivity

If a historian were to claim that the 1967 My Lai Massacre of 500-600 Vietnamese civilians — a real atrocity that included rape-murder and the use of children for target practice — was just "the worst of many massacres" by America soldiers, many or most other historians and readers would cry "foul" and demand:

"Where's your evidence for these many other massacres?" And, obviously, they would be correct to do so!⁴

Same here! Kotkin should give evidence for this claim, instead of relying on his readers' anticommunism to let him skate by with the kind of utterly unsupported allegation of "many massacres" that would never be tolerated if the charge had been made against American soldiers.

⁴ In fact there is reliable evidence for many other massacres by American soldiers in Vietnam. There is no such evidence for many massacres by communists in the SCW.

The Barcelona "May Days" Revolt

Kotkin:

Koltsov also wrote how Trotsky was supposedly giving directives to the POUM and how the POUM "had restructured in the usual Trotskyite fashion" in order to engage in "terrorism" ("provocations, raids, and murders"). (364-5)

In reality we know that Trotsky was indeed "giving directives to the POUM" — and Kotkin has to know it too. Trotsky's secretary Erwin Wolf went to Spain as the emissary of the International Secretariat of the IV International, Trotsky's organization, and therefore as Trotsky's own emissary.

Other Trotskyists, like Andreu Nin and Kurt Landau, continued to act consistently with Trotsky's ideas. As we explained in Chapter Four, the Soviets would naturally have assumed that their "break" with Trotsky was phony, as both Piatakov and Radek, and later Khristian Rakovsky, testified that their public "breaks" with Trotsky had been, and as Andreu Nin himself had said that all such "retractions" were.

Erwin Wolf had not even pretended to "break" with Trotsky. He had come straight from Trotsky in Norway to Spain with only a brief stop-over in Belgium and France.⁵ According to Trotskyist historian Pierre Broué, whose works Kotkin cites, *Trotsky's supporters reported to him in 1936 that most POUM "militants" in Barcelona were in fact Trotskyists.*⁶ No wonder Trotsky dispatched an emissary — Wolf.

The Barcelona "May Days" uprising was an attempt at an anarchist-Trotskyist seizure of power in Catalonia in the midst of the war. On May 5 the insurgents even declared a provisional government. The Spanish communists and Soviet NKVD would certainly have understood the presence of leading Trotskyists like Wolf and Landau as additional evidence that the "May Days" uprising had been planned in advance. It is significant that neither Wolf nor Landau was arrested and "disappeared" until long after the "May Days" uprising.

⁵ There his partner, Hjørdis Knudsen, joined him. She was the daughter of Konrad Knudsen, the Norwegian politician at whose house Trotsky was staying.

What Kol'tsov Really Wrote

Kotkin:

Koltsov ... accused the POUM "Trotskyites" of attracting only riffraff and scum.³¹⁹

Tens of thousands of workers and people's militias who were sacrificing their lives to save the Republic were cowards and fascist hirelings. (364-5)

Note 319 (989): Kol'tsov, "Agentura trotskistov v Ispanii." See also "Ispanskii dnevnik," Novyi mir, no. 4 (1938): 5 (Jan. 21, 1937).

Yet another false statement by Kotkin, though you'd never know it unless you checked Kol'tsov's articles, all in Russian and how many of Kotkin's readers are going to do that? Kol'tsov wrote that all the scum flock to Trotsky, not that all of the POUM fighters were scum.

[[cyrillic]]Куда бы ни протянулась гнусная рука Троцкого, она сеет ложь, предательства и убийства ... Всё тёмное, злое, преступное, все подонки, вся мразь людская слетается на его зов для гнусных разбойничьих дел.

Wherever the vile hand of Trotsky is stretched it sows lies, betrayals and murder ... Everything sinister, criminal, all scum, all the human scum flies to his call for vile thuggish acts. (Kol'tsov, "Agentura trotkistov v Ispanii," Pravda, December 14, 1936)

In his January 21, 1937 article in "Ispanskii dnevnik" (Spanish diary) Kol'tsov draws a clear distinction between Nin and "a few other persons" in the POUM leadership, and everybody else.⁷ Kol'tsov wrote this before Radek's dramatic disclosure, during the Second Moscow Trial of January, 1937, that Trotskyists were indeed active in Spain, and before the Barcelona "May Days" revolt, which was nothing if not a stab in the back against the Spanish Republic.

⁷ http://militera.lib.ru/db/koltsov_me/07.html

POUM Was A Trotskyist Front

Kotkin:

Meanwhile, the January 1937 editorial of The Communist International, written in Stalin's signature style of questions and answers, pointedly noted that "the Spanish Trotskyites conduct themselves like the advanced guard of the notorious 'fifth column' of Franco insurgents. Is it possible to support the heroic struggle of the Spanish popular masses without fighting against the traitorous Trotskyite band? No, it is impossible."³³⁴ La Batalla, the POUM's organ, responded that "Stalin is destroying, without looking back, everything that opposes him....Stalin maintains his incontestable power with terror."³³⁵ (368)

Note 335:

AVP RF, f. 05, op. 17, d. 49, p. 131, l. 59-60 (La Batalla, Jan. 21, 1937). Orlov seems to have pushed in Jan. 1937 for approval for an armed uprising in the Nationalist rear, in Spanish Morocco, but the Spanish Republican government did not support the idea, wary of overly antagonizing France given the proximity to French Morocco. Costello and Tsarev, Deadly Illusions, 274, 467n21 (citing ASVRR file 17679, I: 54). Orlov finally became official NKVD station chief in Spain in late Feb. 1937.

Here the POUM paper "La Batalla" was writing about the Second Moscow Trial, the Trotskyist trial which began on January 21, 1937. Today we have much more evidence that the conspiracies to which the Trotskyists in this trial confessed were real conspiracies. Of course, this evidence is also available to Kotkin. But he never tells his readers about it.

Articles like this one and many others from the POUM newspaper would have been taken by the Soviets as proof that POUM was a Trotskyist front. And it turns out that the editors of the Comintern journal were correct! POUM leaders, including Kurt Landau, had tried to organize in Barcelona a conference of anti-Soviet forces to discuss the overthrow of the Spanish Republican government, culminating in the "May Days" revolt. Meanwhile in article after article the POUM newspaper echoed Trotsky's attacks on Stalin and the USSR; Nin was in the POUM leadership; Wolf was an advisor to POUM; and Landau was one of its activist-propagandists.

Fascists Prepared Barcelona Revolt

Kotkin:

Later, Franco would boast that his agents had provoked the Barcelona anarchist uprising so as to disorganize the Republic's rear. No doubt his agents did try. (408)

But Kotkin fails to cite the evidence that the Fascists had provoked the uprising. According to General Wilhelm Faupel, Hitler's ambassador to Spain, Franco himself claimed that agents of his were also involved in instigating the Anarchists to revolt.

As for the disorders in Barcelona, Franco informed me that the street fighting had been started by his agents. As Nicolás Franco further told me, they had in all some 13 agents in Barcelona. One of these had given the information a considerable time ago that the tension between the Anarchists and Communists was so great in Barcelona that he would guarantee to cause fighting to break out there. ... Actually the agent had succeeded, within a few days of receiving such instructions, in having street shooting started by three or four persons, and this had then produced the desired result.⁸

Kotkin also never mentions the most important fact — that the Nazis themselves were also involved in planning the "May Days" revolt. Here is a part of the 1942 accusation by a Nazi court against Harro Schulze-Boysen, a Soviet spy in the Nazi Luftwaffe:

At the beginning of 1938 [an error for 1937 — GF], during the Spanish Civil War, the accused learned in his official capacity that a rebellion against the local red government in the territory of Barcelona was being prepared with the co-operation of the German Secret Service. This information, together with that of Pöllnitz, was transmitted by him to the Soviet Russian embassy in Paris.⁹

⁹ Norbert Haase, Das Reichskriegsgericht und der Widerstand gegen die nationalsozialistische Herrschaft. Berlin: Druckerei der Justizvollzugsanstalt Tegel, 1993, 105.

Either Kotkin knows about this evidence and hides it from his readers; or he does not know about it. In the first case, he is being dishonest — lying by omission. In the second case, he is incompetent to write about this topic at all.

The NKVD Did Not "Instigate"

Kotkin:

The NKVD, too, had infiltrated the POUM to instigate an attempted "seizure of power" as a pretext to crush it.¹⁸³ (408)

Note 183 (995): Sharapov, Naum Eitingon, 57.

This is another phony citation by Kotkin, for Sharapov does not say that the NKVD were trying to "instigate" anything. Here is what he writes:

[[[cyrillic]]]С декабря 1936 года агенты резидентуры НКВД, внедренные в ПОУМ, сообщали о подготовке поумовцами и анархистами вооруженного выступления в Барселоне.

Since December 1936, NKVD agents introduced into the POUM had been reporting preparations by the POUMists and anarchists of an armed uprising in Barcelona.

"Reported" — soobshchali — not "instigated."

Nazi Agents Infiltrated Trotskyists

Sharapov goes on to cite Schulze-Boysen's intelligence that German agents had penetrated "Trotskyist circles" in Barcelona in order to foment a putsch.

[[[cyrillic]]]В начале 1937 года берлинская резидентура ИНО НКВД получила анонимное сообщение (как впоследствии оказалось, от сотрудника министерства авиации Германии Харро Шульце-Бойзена, одного из будущих руководителей нелегальной резидентуры ИНО НКВД в Германии «Красная капелла») о том, что германские агенты проникли в троцкистские круги в Барселоне с намерением в ближайшее время организовать путч. Также поумовцами готовились теракты против активистов компартии и комсомола Испании. Так был убит известный каталонский коммунист Антонио Сессе. Позднее, в феврале 1938 года был убит капитан интербригад Леон Нарвич, агент Орлова в ПОУМ, выходец из России.

In the beginning of 1937, the Berlin residency of the Foreign (INO) Division of the NKVD received an anonymous message (as it later turned out, from an employee of the German Ministry of Aviation, Harro Schulze-Boysen, one of the future leaders of the illegal residence of the INO NKVD in Germany, the "Red Orchestra") that German agents had infiltrated the Trotskyite circles in Barcelona with the intention in the near future to organize a coup. Also terrorist attacks against activists of the Communist Party and the Young Communist League of Spain were being prepared by the POUMists. In this way the well-known Catalan communist Antonio Sesse was killed. Later, in February 1938, Leon Narvich, a captain of the International Brigades, a communist, and Orlov's agent in the POUM, a native of Russia, was killed.

Kotkin knows about this — after all, he cites Sharapov's book. But he conceals it from his readers.

Grigulevich's Activities

Kotkin:

He [Grigulevich] also liquidated "Trotskyites."¹⁹³ (409-10)

Note 193 (995): Andrew and Mitrokhin, Mitrokhin Archive, 114. (Later Grigulevich would be one of many tapped to assassinate Trotsky in Mexico.) Sudoplatov, Special Tasks, 193; "V Madrde ia rukovodil gruppoi" (Grigulevich interview); Primakov, Ocherki, III: 148-54.

More phony citations by Kotkin. There is nothing about this on page 114 of Mitrokhin Archive, which deals with World War II. On page 87 the book breezily claims that Grigulevich "had taken a leading role in liquidating Trotskyists during the Spanish Civil War." But it cites no evidence, or even names. It's not evidence. In the interview cited by Kotkin Grigulevich himself did not claim to have "liquidated Trotskyites." For the Primakov citation, see the next section.

What "Death Squad"?

Kotkin:

Grigulevich had arrived in Barcelona with his death squad on May 3, 1937.¹⁹⁴ (409-10)

Note 194 (995): Primakov, Ocherki, III: 153. With Orlov, Grigulevich participated in the kidnapping and murder of Nin.

Yet another falsehood by Kotkin! Here is the text from Primakov III, 153:

[[cyrillic]]Важной вехой испанской биографии Макса явилось его участие в подавлении с оружием в руках мятежа в Барселоне в мае 1937 года. Партии анархистов и троцкистов (ПОУМ), располагавшие собственными воинскими формированиями, сняли свои части с фронта, ввели их в Барселону и 2 мая попытались захватить власть. Уже 3 мая Макс в составе спецотряда из 10 сотрудников Сегуридад прибыл в Барселону. Перед ними стояли задачи: немедленно остановить кровопролитие, определить местонахождение и при возможности арестовать руководителей мятежа и командиров оставших воинских подразделений. Частично это удалось сделать в первый день, а окончательно на следующий, при поддержке прибывшего подкрепления.

An important milestone in the Spanish biography of Max [Grigulevich's code name] his the part in the suppression of the armed mutiny in Barcelona in May 1937. The parties of the anarchists and the Trotskyists (POUM), which had their own military formations, withdrew their units from the front, brought them to Barcelona, and on May 2 tried to seize power. Already on May 3, Max, as part of a special squad of 10 Seguridad workers, arrived in Barcelona. Before them were the following tasks: immediately stop the bloodshed, and locate and, if possible, arrest the rebel leaders and commanders of the rebel military units. In part, this was done on the first day, and finally on the next, with the support of the incoming reinforcements.

So this passage in Primakov, III, 153, concerns how Grigulevich helped to suppress the anarchist-Trotskyist (POUM) "May Days" uprising in Barcelona. There is nothing here about any "death squad" and nothing about any involvement of Grigulevich in the kidnapping and murder of Nin.¹⁰

¹⁰ In fact there is some testimony that Grigulevich was involved in the Nin affair, but Kotkin doesn't cite it. See Boris Volodarsky, Stalin's Agent. The life and Death of Alexander Orlov. Oxford University Press, 2015, 285 ff.

Nin Not Tortured

Kotkin:

After Nin was arrested, Orlov's thugs kidnapped him from Spanish prison and took him to a secret place of confinement maintained by the NKVD at Alcalá de Henares, the birthplace of Cervantes. There, they tortured him to get him to confess he was a "fascist agent." With much of the POUM leadership awaiting trial, such testimony was thought necessary to persuade the public to support death sentences. Nin refused to confess to treason, Trotskyism, or other crimes. He was executed in secret by Grigulevich's death squad on the Alcalá de Henares highway and buried there.¹⁹⁶ (410)

Note 196 (995): Sharapov, Naum Eitingon, 53. See also Costello and Tsarev, Deadly Illusions, 291-2.

That the NKVD kidnapped, interrogated, and then killed Nin is not in doubt. Their reasons were clear: Nin had been a leader of a "stab-in-the-back" revolt against the Republican government, in the midst of a war against the fascists.

Moreover, through Schulze-Boysen the NKVD knew that the Nazi secret service was involved in the revolt. The Soviets either knew or suspected that Nin was still an emissary of Trotsky's, as Erwin Wolf certainly was. They knew that Trotsky was in league with the Germans. The Soviets knew too that Landau and Wolf were working with the POUM leadership, which included Nin as a leading member.

What is in question here is whether Nin was "tortured" as Kotkin claimed. Here Kotkin is repeating fascist disinformation. He has no evidence that Nin was tortured because there is none. Paul Preston, the most objective historian of these matters and one cited by Kotkin, says that Nin was not tortured:

Before being transferred to Alcalá de Henares, Nin was questioned in Madrid four times by Jacinto Rosell as secretary of the Brigada Especial on 18, 19 (twice) and 21 June. Nothing about Rosell's questions or Nin's answers in the transcript signed by Nin and published by the POUM itself suggests anything other than a legally conducted interrogation without torture. The often unreliable Jesús Hernández claimed that Nin was tortured and interrogated by Orlov and others for several days, in an effort to make him sign a 'confession' of his links with the fifth column. This is highly unlikely; a confession was needed as the basis for a trial and, for that, Nin would have to be seen to be in good physical shape and testify that he had not been tortured.¹¹

¹¹ Preston, Spanish Holocaust, 411.

Neither Sharapov, Naum Eitingon, nor Costello and Tsarev mention "torture." Moreover, neither claim that Grigulevich had any role in Nin's kidnapping or in his murder. Costello and Tsarev do not mention Grigulevich's name at all! This is simply more disinformation foisted upon Kotkin's readers.

Chapter 8. Third Moscow Trial

Kotkin butchers and falsifies his account of the Third Moscow Trial of March 2-15, 1938, much as he has the first two, by the omission of important evidence and outright fabrication. We begin with a flagrant and indicative example of omission, and then a blatant falsehood.

Bukharin and Jules Humbert-Droz: Kotkin's Bias By Omission

In footnote 13 on page 912 Kotkin writes the following:

Jules Humbert-Droz, the Swiss Communist who met Bukharin in early 1929, later claimed that Bukharin mentioned getting rid of Stalin. Humbert-Droz, Mémoires, 356, 379-80.

Humbert-Droz's name does not appear in Kotkin's index. Presumably only names that occur in the text of the book, not in the footnotes, are indexed. So unless you carefully read every page of this monster book — 909 pages of text plus 159 page of triple-column footnotes in tiny type — you will never see this reference.

This gives Kotkin the scope for more dishonesty — not that he needs it. For Bukharin did not, as Kotkin delicately puts it, "mention getting rid of Stalin." What Bukharin told his friend Humbert-Droz is that he and his followers had decided to murder Stalin:

Boukharine me dit aussi qu'ils avaient décidé d'utiliser la terreur individuelle pour se débarrasser de Staline.¹

Bukharin also told me that they had decided to use individual terror [= assassination] in order to rid themselves of Stalin.

Humbert-Droz published these memoirs in Switzerland in 1971. He was long out of the Comintern and under no pressure from the Soviets. Moreover, this passage occupies only a few lines in a memoir of more than 500 pages.

Bukharin's words to his friend Humbert-Droz expose as dishonest his letter to Stalin of December 10, 1937, his testimony during the Third Moscow Trial, and his two appeals for clemency. Although Bukharin claimed that he had completely "disarmed" — confessed and repented all his crimes — he still concealed the fact that he had been planning to kill Stalin as early as 1929.

We — the scholarly world — now possess a great deal of evidence not only about Bukharin's activities in the clandestine terrorist Opposition bloc, but about his specific crimes. These primary documents and this research are as available to Kotkin as they are to everyone else. One must assume that Kotkin knows about them and decided not to inform his readers about them. That would constitute deliberate deception.²

² E.g. Vladimir Bobrov and Grover Furr, "Nikolai Bukharin's First Statement of Confession in the Lubyanka." Cultural Logic 2007; <https://ojs.library.ubc.ca/index.php/clogic/article/view/191745/188745>; Grover Furr and Vladimir L. Bobrov. Humbert-Droz's revelation makes nonsense of Kotkin's claim here:

... Stalin charged Bukharin and his allies with "deviation" from the party line. Thus did the dictator fashion for himself and the regime a new high-profile internal foe.¹⁰ (11-12)

Note 10 (912) is to a very old book, Robert Tucker, Stalin as Revolutionary, a terrible "psycho-history." But Tucker was one of Kotkin's mentors, so Kotkin gives him a few undeserved citations.

As we've seen above, Kotkin is aware that Bukharin was plotting to murder Stalin as early as 1929 or even earlier but suppresses this, as he does on page 58: "Stalin's persecution of his friend Bukharin in 1929-30 revealed new depths of malice, as well as self-pity."³⁶¹³

³ Note 361 p. 922 records Trotsky's much-later claim that Kamenev had warned him in 1926 that Stalin might kill him. Kotkin concedes that Kamenev never confirmed that publicly and Trotsky had said nothing about it at the time.

The "Riutin Platform" Was Really The "Bukharin Platform"

Kotkin:

Stalin constantly urged more public trials. ... That included Martemyan Ryutin, author of the devastating⁴ internal condemnation of forced collectivization and Stalin's dictatorship. ... The Ryutin Platform had come up at the second Moscow trial in late January 1937, but it had not been a central aspect.²⁵³ Whereas Ryutin had been the actual implacable opponent and Bukharin had never joined a party opposition, Bukharin was the preeminent symbol.²⁵⁴ (477)

⁴ I pass over Kotkin's description of this document as "devastating." In fact, the intellectual poverty of this long, rambling document, shown by its relentless personal attack on Stalin and the paucity of realistic political program, demonstrates the bankruptcy of the Opposition. For an English translation by an admirer of Riutin see Sobhanlal D. Gupta, ed., The Ryutin Platform (Kolkata: Seribaan, 2010).

Kotkin refers to the "Ryutin (or "Riutin") Platform" about a dozen times in this book. But he never informs the reader that — as has long been known — Riutin did not write this document at all! It was really written by Bukharin and Aleksei Rykov, the main defendants at the Third Moscow Trial, along with two others, Mikhail Tomskii and Nikolai Uglanov.

We can be sure that Kotkin knows this because he cites the Lubianka 1937-1938 volume of documents numerous times. In it, in the interrogation of Valentin Astrov, a student and follower of Bukharin's, we read:

[[cyrillic]]Рютинская платформа по существу явилась документом не РЮТИНА, а центра правых ... Слепков рассказал о содержании этой платформы и, в частности, сказал, что она содержит в себе требование применения всех средств борьбы против сталинского руководства, вплоть до террора.

Он также сказал, что главными авторами этой платформы являются Бухарин, Рыков, Томский и Угланов и что в организации условлено, в случае провала этой платформы, объявить ее частным делом отдельных групп правых, именно группы Рютина. (Lubianka 1937-1938, 36)

The Riutin Platform in essence was not a document by RIUTIN, but by the center of the Rights. ... Slepkov spoke about the content of this platform and, in particular, said that it contains the demand for the use of all means of struggle against Stalin's leadership, including terror.

He also said that the main authors of this platform are Bukharin, Rykov, Tomsy and Uglanov, and that in the organization it is agreed, in the event of the failure of this platform, to declare it a private matter of separate right groups, namely the Ryutin group.

In this same document Astrov also testifies about Bukharin's leadership of an opposition group.

Bukharin admitted this during the Third Moscow Trial:

BUKHARIN: ... Perfectly true is the assertion made by the accused Ivanov to the effect that I kept him informed of the stand of the Right centre, from the Ryutin platform to the latest stands, of which the Court is fairly well informed. (128)

BUKHARIN: The fixation of the question about insurrectionary organizations that was approved by the Right centre was first indicated in what is called the Ryutin platform. (132)

RYKOV: ... As regards lines of principle, the so-called Ryutin program was characteristic of the period 1930-33. This Ryutin program was discussed twice in 1932 at Tomsy's summer residence with my participation. In addition to myself, there were present at the first meeting Bukharin and Tomsy and a number of other persons, among them Vasily Schmidt and Uglanov.

VYSHINSKY: Was Bukharin there?

RYKOV: Bukharin was at the first meeting, when the original theses were drawn up. (162)

RYKOV: ... The platform was called after Ryutin, because it was published by supporters of the Rights, the Ryutin group, from Uglanov's Moscow organization. During the investigation instituted in connection with this platform, this group took the whole responsibility upon itself. This had been decided on beforehand, so that we ourselves should not be called to account for the platform. We managed to do this thanks to the fact that Yagoda was at the head of the O.G.P.U.

VYSHINSKY: So Yagoda shielded you?

RYKOV: And to make it easier to do this, the program itself contained a phrase which expressed a certain sense of aloofness from Bukharin, Tomsy and myself; it said something to the effect that these three were waste steam. This was done from motives of double-dealing. (163)

BUKHARIN: I reported to the Court in your presence that actually the orientation on terrorism, strictly speaking, was already contained in the Ryutin platform. (377)

This evidence makes clear the fact that there was no "small Riutin group" — the words Kotkin uses when describing Trotsky's agreement to form a "bloc" with the Rights and other Oppositionists (see Chapter Three, above). Kotkin certainly know this. But he hides it all from his readers. In doing so he falsifies the whole issue.

Kotkin quotes from the Riutin Platform on page 70 as well. As elsewhere he attributes it to Riutin, though he surely knows that it was not written by him but by Bukharin and others. Why? Apparently because Kotkin thinks it necessary to continue to claim that Bukharin had never been in any opposition group.

We can be sure about Astrov's testimony about Bukharin's leading role in the Right Opposition and co-authorship of the "Riutin Platform" because Astrov lived until 1993, and published two articles about these events, one of them published even after the end of the USSR. Astrov had the opportunity to retract his statements about Bukharin. But he never did so.⁵

⁵ See the detailed discussion of Astrov and his testimony in Furr, Moscow Trials 41 ff., and Trotsky's 'Amalgams' 40, 64 ff.

A Series Of Falsifications

Kotkin:

On March 2, 1938, the third Moscow trial finally commenced, like the first two, in the October Hall of the House of Trade Unions, in front of nearly 200 spectators, including the usual handpicked foreign journalists and diplomats. It lasted eighteen sittings. A total of twenty-one defendants, nine of whom had sat in the Central Committee, were in the dock. Three were doctors of the Kremlin medical staff. Stalin had edited chief procurator Vyshinsky's script. (Vyshinsky would also edit the transcript, removing remarks exculpating the accused and discussions of the law by the defense lawyers.) The accused had spent long hours memorizing their testimony. Bukharin, Krestinsky, Rykov, Cristian Rakovski—staunch Bolsheviks—confessed that they had plotted to assassinate Lenin and Stalin since 1918; had murdered Kirov, Meżyński, Kuibyshev, Gorky, Gorky's son Maxim; had conspired with Nazi Germany, Japan, and Great Britain to partition the Soviet Union, hand over territory (Ukraine, Belorussia), and abolish collective farms.²⁵⁵ Yezhov had falsely promised at least some defendants their lives in exchange for self-incrimination.²⁵⁶ NKVD interrogators sat in the first row, a reminder that "re-interrogation" could take place between sessions.²⁵⁷ Krestinsky had been "beaten horribly," according to the head of the Lefortovo prison's hygiene department. "His entire back was a wound."²⁵⁸ Still, on the first day, Krestinsky repudiated his confession and pleaded not guilty, causing a sensation. That night he was re-interrogated—he had a wife and children—and on the second day he nodded his assent when asked if he was guilty.²⁵⁹ "It is now clear why there are interruptions of supplies here and there, why, with our riches and abundance of products, there is a shortage first of one thing, then of another," Vyshinsky thundered. "It is these traitors who are responsible for it."²⁶⁰ (478)

Kotkin squeezes a long series of falsifications into this one paragraph! We distinguish among them above by alternating underlining and boldface.

Falsehood #1: There is no evidence whatsoever that "the accused had spent long hours memorizing their testimony." This is a complete fabrication on Kotkin's part, invented out of thin air without even a phony footnote.

"Bukharin, Krestinsky, Rykov, Cristian Rakovski—staunch Bolsheviks confessed that they had plotted to assassinate Lenin and Stalin since 1918 ..."

Falsehood #2: Only Bukharin was accused of plotting to assassinate Lenin and Stalin. Even he was charged not "since 1918" but in 1918. (Trial, p. 29; See Bukharin's testimony on pp. 127 ff.; 377 ff.)

Some Left Socialist-Revolutionaries testified that his plot had been genuine. Bukharin denied that he had plotted to assassinate Lenin and Stalin, but he agreed that he had been part of two plans to arrest — but not kill — Lenin. Stephen Cohen, Bukharin's biographer, put it his way:

When opponents of the triumvirate pointedly compared current norms with the free discussions during the Brest controversy, Bukharin tried to discredit the earlier period by disclosing that Lenin's arrest had been discussed by Left Communists and Left Socialist Revolutionaries in 1918 ... (Cohen, Bukharin, 156. n. 112, p. 420: "112. Pravda, January 3, 1924, p. 5.")

Kotkin:

... confessed that [they] ... had murdered Kirov, Męzyński, Kuibyshev, Gorky, Gorky's son Maxim; had conspired with Nazi Germany, Japan, and Great Britain to partition the Soviet Union, hand over territory (Ukraine, Belorussia), and abolish collective farms.

Falsehood #3: Only Iagoda confessed to being a party to these murders. Krestinsky confessed to working with Tukhachevsky and the other military commanders to help defeat the USSR in a war with Germany. Rakovsky confessed to spying for Britain and Japan. Rykov confessed to being part of the Right-Trotskyite bloc.

Moreover, by 1938 none of these men were "staunch Bolsheviks" any longer. Kotkin knows this, of course.

More False Claims

Here are some details about Kotkin's phony documentation. All these notes are on page 1006 of Kotkin's text:

Note 255: The indictment was presented for an international audience by Yaroslavsky, Meaning of the Soviet Trials. The defendants' biographies had been rewritten to make them descendants of capitalists and priests.

Falsehood #4: Even this trivial factoid is a fabrication. None of the defendants are described this way either in the Trial transcript or in Yaroslavskii's booklet.

Note 256: On Yagoda's attempt to negotiate for his life, see the prison snitch's report: Vinogradov, Genrikh Iagoda, 233-5 (TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 5, d. 318, l. 113-4: V. Kirshon).

Lie #5: Vinogradov, Genrikh Iagoda 233-5 is V.M. Kirshon's report on Iagoda in prison. But there is nothing here about any "attempt to negotiate for his life." Nor does Iagoda claim that he was innocent. On the contrary, Iagoda affirms his guilt.

Note 257: Conquest, Reassessment, 341-98; Maclean, Escape to Adventure, 59-83; Hedeler, "Yezhov's Scenario," 34-55.

Falsehood #6: The Conquest and Maclean pages are simply their whole chapters on the 1938 Trial. Only Hedeler (48) claims that NKVD interrogators "sat in the first row of seats." But he cites no evidence that they did so.

Note 258: Sokolov, "N. N. Krestinsky," 120-42; Trud, May 26, 1988.

Falsehood #7: There is nothing in Sokolov, "N.N. Krestinsky," about any beating. Sokolov merely says: "One may only guess what kind of 'working up' he suffered, what physical and moral torments he had to endure..." (142). "Trud" was the national trade union newspaper of the USSR.

As Sokolov's article is from 1989, I assume he would have cited the Trud 1988 article if it had contained any evidence that Krestinsky had been tortured. And since when is a trade union newspaper article "evidence"? See below for the proof that the story of Krestinsky's beating is a lie.

Note 259:

259. Conquest, Reassessment, 352; Попов, "Byl i ostaius' kommunistom," 244-51.

Falsehood #8: This lie is more interesting! Conquest is able to cite only rumors. Попов, however, says the following:

[[cyrillic]]Методы «восстанавливания» подобных упрямцев теперь уже достаточно известны. Вот показания бывшего начальника санчасти Лефортовской тюрьмы НКВД СССР Розенблюма, данные им в 1956 году:

«Крестинского с допроса доставили к нам в санчасть в бессознательном состоянии. Он был тяжело избит, вся спина представляла из себя сплошную рану, на ней не было ни одного живого места ...»

Нетрудно представить себе, как постарались палачи, выбивая из Крестинского (в буквальном смысле слова!) мучительное для него лжепризнание.

Translation:

The methods of "restoring" such stubborn people are now well known. Here is the testimony of the former head of the medical section of the Lefortovo Prison of the NKVD USSR Rosenblum, given to them in 1956:

"Krestinsky, from interrogation, was brought to our hospital in an unconscious state. He was severely beaten, the whole back was a complete wound, there was not a single uninjured place on it ...

"It is not difficult to imagine how the executioners tried, knocking out from Krestinsky (in the literal sense of the word!) a painful false confession.

This is reaffirmed, without quotation, on in RKEB 2, 463, the Khrushchev-era reinstatement of Krestinsky's party membership:

[[cyrillic]]Выяснилось, что показания о вражеской деятельности его получены были от Крестинского путем жестоких истязаний, что подтвердила врач Лефортовской тюрьмы т. Розенблум А.А.

It turned out that the testimony about his hostile activities was obtained from Krestinsky by cruel tortures, which was confirmed by the physician of the Lefortovo prison, Comrade Rozenblum A.A.

This is hearsay, without any documentation. Moreover, it cannot be true.

Between March, 1954, and December, 1958, Ivan Serov was Khrushchev's head of the KGB. Serov's letter about the Third Moscow Trial, dated July 7, 1956, knows nothing about any beating of Krestinsky after he had retracted his confession on the first day of the trial.⁶ Serov quotes NKVD man Aronson who quoted NKVD man Nikolaev saying that they had put Rakovsky together with Krestinsky, and Rakovsky had convinced Krestinsky to confess. (855)

⁶ Serov's report is published in Protsess Bukharina. 1938 g.: Sbornik dokumentov (Moscow: MDF, 2013), 852-858. It is online at several sites, including at <http://istmat.info/node/46740>

Obviously, if Krestinsky had been beaten the NKVD men would know — they would have done it! Serov would have put this much more dramatic accusation in his report if he had known about it. But he knew nothing about it. And Serov would have known about it — if it had happened. Therefore, the story about the "beating" of Krestinsky is a fabrication. Kotkin knew, or should have known, about this too.

In conclusion: Kotkin's account of the Third Moscow Trial is false in every respect. We have a great deal of evidence today that the defendants in all three Moscow Trials were guilty of at least those crimes to which they confessed.

Chapter 9. Tukhachevsky Affair

Today we have a great deal of evidence that Marshal Mikhail Tukhachevsky and the seven other high-ranking military commanders who were tried, convicted, and executed with him on June 11-12, 1937, were guilty, as charged, of conspiracy with the Nazis and Japanese, and with Leon Trotsky, to defeat the Soviet Union in a war.

Indeed, we have so much evidence that a single volume with appropriate commentary could not hold all of it. My Moscow colleague, Vladimir L. Bobrov, and I are planning such a volume of documents plus commentary to set forth this evidence.

But the "official" viewpoint — the only one acceptable in academic, political, and public discussion because the only one consistent with the Anti-Stalin Paradigm (ASP) — is that Tukhachevsky and all the rest were innocent, victims of a "frame up" by Stalin for reasons unknown. In order to sustain this viewpoint, all the evidence must be either dismissed as "faked" in some way or simply ignored. Kotkin chooses the latter strategy: he ignores the evidence.

In addition Kotkin has recourse to argument by scare quote. He puts scare quotes around words like "confession" when they contradict the ASP. But he has no evidence to refute them.

Let the reader not be fooled! Argument by scare quote is the refuge of those who refuse to question their own preconceived ideas and biases but have no evidence to support those biases. No honest, competent historian falls back on this tawdry, deceptive insult to the reader's intelligence.

Has Kotkin ever seriously researched the Tukhachevsky Affair and related military purges? I doubt it, because of the many erroneous references he makes. We will point out some of them below.

Kotkin:

Failing that, he [Artuzov] wrote to Yezhov on January 25 that NKVD foreign intelligence possessed information from foreign sources, dating back many years but never forwarded to higher-ups, revealing a "Trotskyite organization" in the Red Army. Sensationally, the documents linked Marshal Tukhachevsky to foreign powers.³ (377)

Note 3 (991): Lebedev, "M. N. Tukhachevskii i 'voenno-fashistskii zagovor,'" 7-20, 255; Voennye arkhivy Rossii, 111; Khaustov, "Deiatel'nost' organov," 188-9.

Here and elsewhere "Lebedev" is the journal Voенно-Istoricheskii Arkhiv, vypusk (issue) 2, 1997. This is the "Spravka" of the Shvernik Commission. It has been published several times in a number of different places. We shall point out below that Kotkin cites this same text but in different printed editions, as though he were citing different sources, though in reality they are all the same source.

For example, Voennye Arkhivy Rossii, 111, is the same document and the same passage! Why quote them both? To give readers the false impression that they are different sources that confirm each other? Dishonest — but what other reason could there be?

There is nothing about any of this in Khaustov, "Deiatel'nost' organov," 188-9. This is Khaustov's doctoral dissertation, available at Yale. Pages 188-9 do not mention Tukhachevsky at all! This is a phony reference.

Kotkin:

Artuzov knew full well how such compromising materials had been planted in Europe in order to make their way back to Moscow: in the 1920s he had helped lead just such an operation ("The Trust").⁴ (377)

Note 4 (991): Mlechin, KGB, 162-3.

Mlechin does suggest that Artuzov, who had directed the "Trust" disinformation operation in the 1920s, had framed Tukhachevsky. But Mlechin cites no evidence whatever! Naturally, Kotkin's readers will not know this.

So this is yet another phony footnote. It is dishonest of Kotkin to cite Mlechin's unsupported speculation as though it were evidence. The veracity of one person's unsupported opinion — Kotkin's, in this case — is not confirmed by the equally unsupported opinion of one, or of any number, of other persons — in this case, Mlechin.

No Evidence of "Fabrication"

Kotkin:

Now, to these fabricated documents he appended a list of thirty-four "Trotskyites" in military intelligence. His cynical efforts at ingratiation and revenge would not save his own life, but Artuzov had guessed right about Stalin's intentions.⁵

Note 5 (991): Radek at his public trial on Jan. 24, 1937, had mentioned Tukhachevsky's name as a co-conspirator. Radek then tried to retract, but the deed had been done. Report of Court Proceedings, 105, 146. After the first Moscow trial, Werner von Tippleskirch, a German military attaché in Moscow, had reported to Berlin (Sept. 28, 1936) the speculation about a pending trial of Red Army commanders. Erickson, Soviet High Command, 427 (citing Serial 6487/E486016-120: Report A/2037).

Yet another phony footnote! There is nothing about "Stalin's intentions" in these works, nor could there be. Kotkin is "channeling" the spirit of the long-dead Stalin!

Nor is there any evidence that these documents were "fabricated," as Kotkin claims — not only none in the works he refers to, but there is no such evidence anywhere. Nor is there any evidence that Artuzov "planted" these documents.

As for the list of thirty-four Trotskyites — note the argument by scare quote — this is in all of the editions of the "Spravka" of the Shvernik Commission, since all are identical. In "Lebedev" (Voенно-Istoricheskii Arkhiv, 1997) it is on pages 11-12:

[[cyrillic]]Артузов направил Ежову 25 января 1937 года записку, в которой доложил ему об имевшихся ранее в ОГПУ агентурных донесениях < > о «военной партии.» К своей записке Артузов приложил «Список бывших сотрудников Разведупра, принимавших активное участие в троцкизме» (в списке 34 человека). На записке Артузова Ежов 26 января 1937 года написал:

«т. Курскому и Леплевскому. Надо учесть этот материал. Несомненно, в армии существует троцкистск[ая] организация. Это показывает, в частности, и недоследованное дело «Клубок». Может, и здесь найдется зацепка».

Artuzov sent a note to Yezhov on January 25, 1937, in which he reported to him about the agent's reports on the "military party" that had previously existed in the OGPU. To his note Artuzov appended "A list of former employees of the Razvedupr (Intelligence), who took an active part in Trotskyism" (34 people in the list). On a note by Artuzov Yezhov wrote on January 26, 1937:

"Comrades Kursky and Leplevsky. It is necessary to take into account this material. Undoubtedly, a Trotskyite [organization] exists in the army. This is also evident, in particular, from the "Tangle" case, not fully investigated. Maybe there's a clue here too."

"Claptrap?" Look In The Mirror!

Kotkin:

Explanations for Stalin's rampage through his own officer corps have ranged from his unquenchable thirst for power to the existence of an actual conspiracy.⁶ Nearly every dictator lusts for power, and in this case there was no military conspiracy. (377)

Note 6 (991): Wollenberg, Red Army, 224; Erickson, Soviet High Command, 465; Conquest, Great Terror: Reassessment, 201-35; Ulam, Stalin, 457-8; Tucker, Stalin in Power; Volkogonov, Stalin: Triumph and Tragedy. Assertions of a real plot go back to the time and have persisted: Duranty, USSR, 222; Davies, Mission to Moscow, I: 111. The claptrap persists: Prudnikova and Kolpakidi, Dvoinoi zagovor.

This is true nonsense! By definition, there can be no evidence that "there was no military conspiracy," so Kotkin cannot possibly know this. Even if there were no evidence of a conspiracy, that would not prove that no conspiracy had existed, for the point of a conspiracy is to leave no evidence.

The most any historian could say is: "We have no evidence that such a conspiracy existed." But Kotkin can't say this! — not honestly, anyway. For in the case of the Tukhachevsky Affair there is an enormous amount of evidence that the conspiracy existed. Moreover, we have no evidence that this evidence was faked. Kotkin is no one to accuse others of "claptrap!"

Here is a passage from Davies, Mission to Moscow concerning what Davies learned from "the head of the Russian desk at the German Foreign Office":

Had an extended conference with the head of the "Russian desk" at the German Foreign Office. To my surprise he stated that my views as to the stability of internal Russian political conditions and the security of the Stalin regime would bear investigation. My information, he thought, was all wrong: Stalin was not firmly entrenched. He stated that I probably would find that there was much revolutionary activity there which might shortly break out into the open. (17)

There's much other evidence along these lines. Kotkin does not mention this passage. He does cite another one, from Davies' letter of June 28, 1937, to Sumner Wells:

... the best judgment seems to believe that in all probability there was a definite conspiracy in the making looking to a coup d'état by the army not necessarily anti-Stalin, but anti-political and anti-party, and that Stalin struck with characteristic speed, boldness, and strength.

Note that the passage Kotkin omits contains evidence that the Germans expected a revolt against the Stalin government, while the one he cites contains no such evidence.

Again, No Evidence

Kotkin:

... out of approximately 144,000 officers, some 33,000 were removed in 1937-38, and Stalin ordered or incited the irreversible arrest of around 9,500 and the execution of perhaps 7,000 of them.¹⁴ (378)

Note 14 (991): Reese, Stalin's Reluctant Soldiers, 134-46. From 1937 to 1938, 34,501 Red Army officers, air force officers, and military political personnel were discharged, either because of expulsion from the party or arrest; 11,596 would be reinstated by 1940. As Voroshilov noted, some 47,000 officers had been discharged in the years following the civil war, almost half of them (22,000) in the years 1934-36; around 10,000 of these discharged were arrested. Few were higher-ups, however. Confusingly, sometimes the totals include the Red Air Force, and sometimes not. "Nakanune voiny (dokumenty 1935-1940 gg.)," 188; Suvenirov, Tragediia RKKA, 137. In 1939, when Stalin turned off the pandemonium, 73 Red Army personnel would be arrested.

The bottom line: Kotkin offers no evidence for his claim that "perhaps 7000" officers were executed. Reese's 1996 book is far too old for the flood of Soviet documents available since then. A well-known study by Gerasimov¹ published in 1999, states:

[[[cyrillic]]]В 1937 году было репрессировано³ 11034 чел. или 8% списочном численности начальствующего состава, в 1938 году — 4523 чел. или 2,5%⁴. В это же время некомплект начсостава в эти годы достигал 34 тыс. и 39 тыс. соответственно⁵, т.е. доля репрессированных в некомплекте начсостава составляла 32% и 11%.

3. К репрессированным автор относит лиц командноначальствующего состава, уволенных из РККА за связь

"с заговорщиками," арестованных и не восстановленных впоследствии в армии.

4. РГВА.-Ф.4.-Оп.10.-Д. 141.Л.205.

5. См.: Мельтюхов М.И. Указ. Соч.- С. 114.

In 1937 11034 persons were subjected to repression or 8% of the listed size of the command staff [officers — GF]; in 1938 — 4,523 persons, or 2.5%. At the same time, a shortage of command staff in these years reached 34 thousand and 39 thousand, respectively, i.e. The proportion of repressed of the shortage in the command staff was 32% and 11%.

3. By "repressed persons" the author refers to command personnel dismissed from the Red Army for ties "with conspirators," arrested and not restored later to the army.

5. Cf. Mel'tiukhov, M.I., p. 114.

Gerasimov states that a total of $11034+4523=15,557$ officers were "repressed," not "executed."

("The actual influence of the repressions of 19'37-1938 on the officer corps of the Workers and Peasants Red Army.") Rossiiskii Istoricheskii Zhurnal 1 (1999), This important article is online in several places, including at http://www.hrono.ru/statii/2001/rkka_repr.html

Gerasimov references Mel'tiukhov's article from Otechestvennaia Istoriia 5 (1997), 109-121. In that article Mel'tiukhov notes that there is insufficient evidence for any definite conclusion. That was also the situation three or more years earlier, when Reese researched his article.

[[cyrillic]]Углублению изучения этих вопросов препятствует недостаточно широкая источниковая база. Несмотря на довольно бурное обсуждение этой проблематики в конце 80-х - начале 90-х гг., введение в научный оборот документов было не столь значительно, как можно было бы ожидать. Появившиеся документы, хотя и конкретизировали некоторые аспекты, но не позволили всесторонне рассмотреть данную проблему. В результате в литературе сохраняется разногласия по основным вопросам темы. (118)

An in-depth study of these issues is hindered by an insufficiently wide source base. Despite the rather stormy discussion of this problem in the late 1980s and early 1990s, the introduction of documents into scientific circulation was not as significant as one would expect. The documents that did appear, although they specified certain issues, did not allow a comprehensive study of this problem. As a result, disagreement over the main issues of this topic remains.

Did Stalin "Tutor" Yezhov?

Kotkin:

In the Little Corner, the despot tutored Yezhov on portraying a conspiracy with a shadow government, ready to take over: Yagoda as head of the Council of People's Commissars, Tukhachevsky as defense commissar, Bukharin as general secretary of the party ... (397) [next note is 123]

Note 123: Khaustov, "Razvitie sovetskikh organov gosudarstvennoi bezopasnosti," 362 (citing TsA FSB, f. 3, op. 45, d. 29, l. 246). Peterson would be shot on Aug. 21, 1937.

This is a phony footnote. There is nothing in Khaustov whatever about Stalin "tutoring" Yezhov. Evidently Kotkin invented this.

As for Peterson, he had been the commandant of the Kremlin guard, a crucial position for those plotting any coup d'état. There is a great deal of evidence available against Peterson. For example, N.S. Cherushev cites a lot of it in his book Komandanty Kremliia ("Commanders of the Kremlin").

Cherushev proceeds from the assumption that all the officers were innocent. However, as a military historian, Cherushev had access to a great many documents that no other scholar could see, and he often quotes extensively from them. He does so in Peterson's case, and the evidence he cites strongly supports Peterson's guilt.

Kotkin cites this very book by Cherushev. But he never mentions any of this evidence, and never returns to Peterson.

The Arao Telegram

Kotkin:

Also in April 1937, the NKVD intercepted and photographed a communication from the Japanese military attaché in Warsaw to the general staff in Tokyo. NKVD foreign intelligence could not read the Japanese and had to go to Lefortovo prison for assistance from R. N. Kim, a Soviet counterintelligence agent on Japan who had been arrested as a foreign spy. The document was composed in the hand of the Japanese attaché's aide handwriting well known to Kim and conveyed that "contact had been established with an emissary of Marshal Tukhachevsky." This secret message for Tokyo had been sent not by ciphered telegram but by diplomatic pouch, which traveled from Poland to Japan through the Soviet Union. Japanese intelligence appears to have intended the "secret" document to be "intercepted."¹⁸⁰ (407)

Note 180:

Lebedev, "M. N. Tukhachevskii i 'voenno-fashistskii zagovor,'" 30-3. Stalin could have had the "information" delivered into the hands of the Japanese in Warsaw, in order to have it "leaked" back through foreign channels, perhaps to persuade Voroshilov.

Once again, "Lebedev" is Voенno-Istoricheskii Arkhiv, vypusk 2, 1997. This is a rare journal, available at only a few research libraries (I happen to have a copy). So, very few of Kotkin's readers will know that this is the same

"Spravka" of the Shvernik Commission, completed "not later than July 26, 1964."

The "Spravka" is available in RKEB 2, 753 ff. This volume is available at many more libraries, and therefore this, rather than previous versions in hard-to-find journals, is the usual source cited for this document.

* The "Spravka" has long been available online at http://perpetrator2004.narod.ru/documents/Tukhachevsky/Tukhachevsky_Report.rar

* I have now put it online at

<http://msuweb.montclair.edu/~furrgr/research/Spravka.pdf>

The "Spravka" has never been translated into English. For a number of years an edition of the Shvernik Report was said to be under preparation at the Yale University Press "Annals of Communism" page.

This project has apparently been abandoned. No wonder! The Report exposes the desperation Khrushchev's men felt when they were tasked to come up with evidence that the Tukhachevsky Affair defendants were innocent but failed to find any such evidence.

Not only were they unable to do what Khrushchev & Co. assigned them to do, but they came up with evidence, such as this "Arao Telegram," that the "Tukhachevsky Affair" commanders were in fact guilty! No wonder the "Spravka" was never published under Khrushchev! A quarter-century later Gorbachev's men used it, without attribution. It was not published until the USSR was no more.

Kotkin's notion that Stalin "set up" the Arao Telegram simply shows how desperate he is to "explain away" any evidence that points to Tukhachevsky's guilt — in this case, guilt of conspiring with the Japanese. We have a good deal of additional evidence that Tukhachevsky conspired with both Japan and Germany, but Kotkin ignores all of it. Did he think that there was too much of it to "explain away"?

Concerning the Arao Telegram, I refer the reader to my own detailed study in Trotsky's 'Amalgams', Chapter Ten, 218 ff. There I study and expose the lame, transparent Khrushchev-era attempt to argue that the Arao Telegram is a fake. I have done nothing clever here — anyone who takes the trouble to study these few pages from the "Spravka" could see the same things I saw. But Kotkin never bothered — or, if he did, he conceals that fact from his readers.

More Scare Quotes

Kotkin:

Corps commander Primakov, nine months in Lefortovo, had refused to admit his "guilt," but finally on May 8, 1937, he "confessed" and implicated others.²⁰² (411)

Note all the scare quotes — a dead giveaway that Kotkin has no evidence!

Note 202 (995): "Delo o tak nazyvaemoi 'antisovetskoi trotskistskoi organizatsii' v Krasnoi armii," 47-8; Artizov et al., Reabilitatsiia: kak eto bylo, II: 678 (Aleksandr Avseevich, 1962); Pravda, April 29, 1988 (B. Viktorov). Primakov (a Bolshevik since 1914) had served as military attaché in Afghanistan (1927-29) and then Japan (1930); in 1928 he had been forced to declare a break with the Trotskyites. Zdanovich, Organy, 320 (citing TsA FSB, delo R-9000, t. 4, l. 53).

Kotkin is using argument by scare quotes in the hope of covering up the fact that he has no evidence that Primakov's confession is false. In reality, we have is no reason to doubt Primakov's confession. Here are Primakov's words, from the source cited by Kotkin, "Delo o tak nazyvaemoi ..." pages 47-8:

[[cyrillic]]«В течение 9 месяцев я заперся перед следствием по делу о троцкистской контрреволюционной организации. В этом заперательстве дошел до такой наглости, что даже на Политбюро перед тов. Сталиным продолжал заператься и всячески уменьшать свою вину. Тов. Сталин правильно сказал, что „Примаков — трус, заператься в таком деле это трусость.\" Действительно, с моей стороны это была трусость и ложный стыд за обман. Настоящим заявляю, что, вернувшись из Японии в 1930 г., я связался с Дрейцером и Шмидтом, а через Дрейцера и Путну с Мрачковским и начал троцкистскую работу, о которой дам следствию полные показания».

For 9 months I was in denial before the investigation in the case of the Trotskyist counterrevolutionary organization. In this denial I came to such impudence that even at the Politburo before Comrade Stalin I continued to deny and in every possible way to minimize my guilt. Comrade Stalin correctly said that "Primakov is a coward, to remain in denial about such a matter is cowardice." Indeed, for my part, it was cowardice and false shame over my deception. I hereby declare that when I returned from Japan in 1930, I contacted Dreitser and Schmidt, and through Dreitser and Putna, Mrachkovsky, and began Trotskyite work, about which I will give full testimony to the investigation.

Kotkin's citation of RKEB 2, 678, is another phony reference. It contains no evidence that Primakov's confession was not genuine. As for the passage in Zdanovich, Organy, 320, it states this:

характера, продолжая фактически оставаться на своих троцкистских позициях».

In August 1933, in the 8th section of the OGPU's Special Political Division, which dealt exclusively with the struggle against the opposition within the CPSU(b), a memorandum was prepared on V. Primakov. The SPD staff noted that "in June 1928, he filed an application for a break with the opposition of a double-dealing nature, in fact continuing to keep his Trotskyite positions."

This does not confirm but contradicts what Kotkin has written. No doubt Kotkin believed that no one would check.

Viktorov the Swindler

As for Viktorov's article in Pravda, which Kotkin cites here — since when is a newspaper article evidence? Newspapers are at best "the first rough draft of history," not historiography itself. And Pravda, the official paper of the Communist Party, never made any claims to objectivity or devotion to the truth, especially since Khrushchev's day. Once again, Garbage In, Garbage Out!

Viktorov was a former prosecutor who had been involved in Khrushchev-era "rehabilitations." He published many articles in historical journals and at least one book, Bez grifa 'sekretno' (1990). Kotkin cites Viktorov's book, though not here. In this book Viktorov repeats, normally without evidence of any kind, the Khrushchev-Gorbachev anti-Stalin version of events.

This specific article by Viktorov, from Pravda of April 29, 1988 — to be precise, from page three of that issue — illustrates Viktorov's dishonesty in a number of ways. Two examples will suffice. First, Viktorov states that the transcript of the June 11, 1937 trial of Tukhachevsky and the rest is only a few pages in length:

[[[cyrillic]]]Стенограмма состоялась всего из несколько страниц.

The transcript consisted of just a few pages in all.

(column two, middle of column)

On page 231 of Viktorov's 1990 book Bez grifa 'sekretno' ("Without the stamp 'secret'") we read:

[[cyrillic]]Стенограмма содержала всего несколько страниц ...

The transcript contained just a few pages ...

Viktorov was lying. The transcript was declassified in May, 2018. It is 172 pages in length. So either Viktorov knew this, and lied about the number of pages to make the trial appear to be perfunctory; or Viktorov did not know how long the transcript was — was not allowed to see it himself — and just passed along this lie to the readership.

Viktorov also quotes from Frinovsky's confession statement of April 11, 1939. Therefore, he has been allowed to read it, though it was not published until 2006. But Viktorov omits Frinovsky's admissions that the defendants in the Moscow Trials, plus Yezhov and he himself, were indeed conspiring against the Soviet government.

So Viktorov deliberately suppressed these damning sections. Or, he was only given excerpts, but implied to his readers that he was fairly summarizing the document. But Kotkin has read the whole of Frinovsky's confession statement, and Kotkin is still concealing it from his readers!

So Viktorov's article and his book are fraudulent. They are useful examples of how Gorbachev and his assistants, building upon Khrushchev's falsifications, lied wholesale about Stalin and the events of the 1930s. Gorbachev's totally dishonest version is the Anti-Stalin Paradigm. It is still the "official version" of Soviet history of the Stalin period.

It's Kotkin's responsibility to know about this and to inform his readers. So why doesn't he do this? Because like Viktorov Kotkin is retailing the Anti-Stalin Paradigm, not trying to discover the truth and tell it. If Viktorov's book and article are a fraud — and they are — Kotkin's book is a fraud on a much bigger scale.

Kotkin:

Stalin received Tukhachevsky in the Little Corner on May 13, in the presence of Voroshilov, Molotov, Yezhov, and Kaganovich, and reassured the marshal that everything would be sorted out, mentioning a problem with Tukhachevsky's lover, Yulia Kuzmina, who supposedly was a foreign agent.²⁰⁴ (411-2)

Note 204 (995): Voennye arkhivy Rossii, 41; Lebedev, "M. N. Tukhachevskii i 'voenno-fashistskii zagovor,'" 182; Na prieme, 209; Viktor A. Aleksandrov, Delo Tukhachevskogo.

VAR, 41 is — once again — the "Spravka" of the Shvernik Commission. So is Lebedev — the very same document. The passage noted by Kotkin here reads:

[[cyrillic]]13 мая 1937 г., как это установлено по книге регистрации, Сталин лично принял в Кремле маршала Тухачевского. Никаких материалов о существовании разговора Сталина с Тухачевским обнаружить в архивах не удалось.

May 13, 1937, as established by the book of registration, Stalin personally received Marshal Tukhachevsky in the Kremlin. We have not been successful in finding in the archives any materials concerning the subject of Stalin's and Tukhachevsky's talk.

Kotkin's own sources says that there is nothing about the subject of this talk. Yet Kotkin claims he can tell us what the talk was about!²

² Curious readers can find out more about Iulia Kuz'mina, Tukhachevsky's lover, at [[cyrillic]]https://ru.openlistwiki/Кузьмина_Юлия_Ивановна_\(1903\)) and in Julia Kantor, Voina i mir Mikhaila Tukhachevskogo, 315; 454 ff.

As for Victor Aleksandrov's book, it was published in Paris in 1959, then in several languages, including English (Prentice-Hall, 1964). The Russian edition is 1996. It has long been dismissed as a pot-boiler fabrication: see Paul Blackstock, "'Books for Idiots': False Soviet 'Memoirs'," Russian Review 25, 3 (1966), 290 ff.

Once Again, No Evidence Of Torture

Kotkin:

Around this time, August Kork, head of the Frunze Military Academy, was arrested and beaten into testifying. On May 15, Boris Feldman, head of the Red Army cadres department, was arrested, and, under severe torture, he incriminated Tukhachevsky (who the next day departed for his new posting in the rear, the city of Kuibyshev).²⁰⁵ (411-12)

Note 205 (995): Khaustov and Samuelson, Stalin, NKVD, 115-6 (TsA FSB, ASD P-4615, l. 258-61; ASD N. 15301, tom 2: 37-8); Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChk, 170-6.

This is another dishonest citation. Khaustov and Samuel'son, 114-15, has nothing about beatings and torture, as Kotkin surely knows. Khaustov and Samuel'son simply claim, without any evidence, that Kork and Fel'dman were beaten or threatened.

[[cyrillic]]От Путны и Примакова побоями были добыты дополнительные показания о военном заговоре, на их основании 14-15 мая были арестованы Корки Фельдман. Протокол допроса Фельдмана от 19 мая Ежов направил 20 мая Сталину, Молотову, Ворошилову и Кагановичу. Благодаря политике кнута и пряника Фельдман согласился показать, что в Красной Армии существовал военно-троцкистский заговор, возглавляемый Тухачевским. В течение последней недели мая с 22 по 29 число были арестованы Тухачевский, Эйдеман, Якир и Уборевич.

From Putna and Primakov, additional testimonies about the military conspiracy were obtained by beatings. On this basis on May 14-15 Kork and Feldman were arrested. On May 20 Yezhov sent the protocol of Feldman's interrogation of May 19 to Stalin, Molotov, Voroshilov and Kaganovich. Thanks to the policy of carrot and stick, Feldman agreed to confess that there was a military-Trotskyist conspiracy in the Red Army headed by Tukhachevsky. During the last week of May, from 22 to 29, Tukhachevsky, Eideman, Yakir and Uborevich were arrested.

Here Kotkin gets his references to Khaustov confused. He cites Lubianka 1922-1936 (Lubianka. Stalin i VChK-GPU-OGPU-NKVD, ianvar' 1922-dekabr' 1936. Moscow: Mezhdunarodnyi fond Demokratiaa, 2003). In reality, Boris Fel'dman's confession is in the next volume in the series edited by Khaustov, Lubianka 1937-1938 (Lubianka. Stalin i glavnoe upravlenie gosudarstvennoi bezopasnosti NKVD, 1937-1938. Moscow: Materik, 2004), on pp. 170-176.³

It is interesting that Kotkin fails to mention that at note 25, p. 641, to this document, Khaustov et al. claim that Fel'dman and others were tortured. But they have no evidence to support that claim and Kotkin, of course, has none either. He has invented it, covering his own falsification with phony footnotes.

When In Doubt — Invent!

As for Khaustov and Samuel'son's "carrot and stick" — do they think that police in the West do not act in this way? But the real point is this: they have no evidence even for this statement! They are lying, in the service of the Anti-Stalin Paradigm.

Note, too, that Kotkin escalates Khaustov and Samuel'son's "carrot and the stick" not just to "torture," but to "severe torture." When in doubt, be creative — just make it up! And Kotkin accuses Stalin of fabricating!

Artuzov's Important Confessions

Kotkin:

On May 20, Artuzov was arrested in his office (no. 201) on the second floor of Lubyanka and accused of being a rightist alongside Yagoda, as well as concealing material implicating Tukhachevsky (the very material he had forwarded to Yezhov). His interrogation protocols, which he signed with his own blood, would also assert that Yagoda had told him of widespread NKVD dissatisfaction with the Soviet leadership, "whose despotism stands in crying contradiction to declarations of Soviet democracy."²¹⁶ (413)

Note 216 (996): Rodina, 1995, no. 2: 87; Pogonii, Lubianka, 2, 203; Tumshis and Papchinskii, 1937, bol'shaia chistka, 404-6, 445-51. Artuzov would be executed on Aug. 21, 1937.

This is a classic example of Kotkin's "bias by omission." Tumshis and Papchinski, 445-451 give the text of a letter by Artuzov to Yezhov of March, 1937, long before his arrest in May. "Rodina, 1995, no. 2" is Boris Sopel'niak, "'Chestneishii tovarishch? Rasstreliat!'," Rodina 2, 1995, 83-88.

But, according to this article Artuzov confessed completely! The article reproduces much of his confessions. This means that the Sopel'niak article does, in fact, contain valuable evidence.

But it is evidence that supports the real existence of the Opposition conspiracy. So Kotkin neither uses it nor tells his readers that Artuzov's confessions are there. Artuzov also confessed at his trial, which guaranteed his conviction and execution.

Artuzov Signed What???

Kotkin writes:

His interrogation protocols, which he signed with his own blood ...

Even this is false. According to Kotkin's own source, Sopel'niak's article, Artuzov left a note written in his own blood in which he denied being a German spy.

Pogonii, Lubianka, 2, 203, is not at all a work of scholarship. It is a coffee-table book by the FSB, the successor to the GPU-OGPU-NKVD-MVD-KGB. But it has great photographs and document reproductions! It even has a color photographic reproduction of this very note of Artuzov's. It is written on the back of some kind of "prison receipt" (kvitantsiia), as the accompanying note to Veinshtok, Chief of the tenth section of the GUGB of the NKVD, states.⁴

⁴ The note reads as follows: [[cyrillic]]«Гражданину следователю привожу доказательства, что я не шпион. Если бы я был немецкий шпион, то: 1. Я не послал бы в швейцарское консульство Маковского, получившего мои документы. Я сохранил бы документы для себя. 2. Я позаботился бы получить через немцев какой-либо транзитный документ для отъезда за границу. Арест Тылиса был бы к тому сигналом. Документ...» Translation: "Citizen investigator: I cite evidence that I am not a spy. If I were a German spy, then: 1. I would not have sent to the Swiss embassy Makovskii, who received my documents. I would have kept the documents for myself. 2. I would have arranged through the Germans to get some kind of transit document to travel abroad. The arrest of Tylis would have been a signal for that. The (or a) document ..." The note is unfinished. According to the accompanying note Artuzov got the blood from his nose.

How could Kotkin have gotten this wrong — a note on a receipt instead of a signature on an interrogation transcript (protocol)? Carelessness? Did he think that no one would ever bother to check? Did Kotkin even see this page? In any event, Artuzov also confessed to espionage for other foreign governments, and did not retract those confessions in this note.

Artuzov's confessions are of great interest. He confirms the conspiracies by Rykov, Bukharin, and Tomskey, and that of Tukhachevsky. Artuzov's second confession is partially reproduced by Sopol'niak here, and also partly reproduced in the volume Genrikh Iagoda 487-499. (This last is online at <http://istmat.info/node/36059>)

Artuzov's confessions present strong evidence that the conspiracies did exist. Kotkin does not mention this fact. Nor does he quote those parts of Artuzov's confessions. It's a measure of Kotkin's contempt for his readers that he dared to cite this article at all, since anyone who reads it will immediately see Kotkin's dishonesty.

Good Evidence of German Spies

Kotkin:

In an internal memorandum that day, addressed to Yezhov and Voroshilov, the despot ordered that all Soviet agents abroad and their handlers be rechecked, because "military intelligence and its apparatus have fallen into German hands." Stalin's memo noted that "from the point of view of intelligence, we cannot have friends; there are immediate enemies and potential enemies," and deemed the Czechoslovaks — with whom the Soviet Union had a mutual assistance pact — "the enemies of our enemies, nothing more." He ordered Soviet personnel not to share intelligence secrets with Czechoslovakia or any other country, and "to fully assimilate the lesson of the cooperation with the Germans," whereby "Rapallo, close ties, created the illusion of friendship. The Germans have remained our enemies, and they penetrated us and implanted their network." He added, "We have had enormous victories, we are stronger than all politically, we are stronger economically, but in intelligence we have been smashed. Understand, they smashed us in intelligence."²¹⁹ (413-4)

Note 219 (996): Stalin also underscored the need to portray Soviet spies as "genuine patriots, heroes, of their country," in order "to attract youth, talented people, girls, scientists" to intelligence work, but warned that "the enemy's strong intelligence and our weakness are a provocation to war." Petrov and Jansen, Stalinskii pitomets, 290-3 (TsA FSB, f. 6, op. 5, d. 25, l. 208-10). See also Vinogradov, "Tret'ia reform organov bezopasnosti," II: 76-96, esp. 93. One account has Stalin going in person, on May 22, 1937, to military intelligence HQ: Gorbunov, "Voennaia razvedka v 1934-1939 godakh" (no 3.), 57. On the consequences, see also Alekseev et al., Entsiklopediia voennoi razvedki, 508-9.

Although Kotkin gets the date wrong — it was on May 21, not May 22, 1937 — Gorbunov does reproduce the common quote from Stalin telling the foreign intelligence service that it had been penetrated by the Germans. Stalin again elaborated on this fact in his talk on June 2, 1937, before the expanded meeting of the Military Council.

This is good evidence that Stalin believed that German penetration had indeed occurred, and that he also believed the confessions of the military men when they admitted that they had spied for Germany. Stalin got to see all the evidence — much more than we have now, and we now have a lot! To any objective student this is further evidence that the military conspiracy was genuine.

Yet Again, No Evidence of Torture

Kotkin:

Civil defense followed. Its head, the ethnic Latvian Roberts Eidemanis (shortened to Eideman), was arrested on May 22 and, under torture, "incriminated" twenty others. Yezhov had the interrogation protocols on Stalin's desk quickly. The despot wrote on them, "All those people named by Eideman in civil defense (center and periphery) immediately arrest"²²⁰—no verification of their specific spying activities and any damage caused. (414)

Note 220 (996): Voennye arkhivy Rossii, 44; Lebedev, "M. N. Tukhachevskii i 'voenno-fashistskii zagovor,'" 88. See also Pankov, Komkor Eideman, 103. Voroshilov had recommended promoting Eideman to head of anti-aircraft, arguing that it needed someone of "major authority." Whitewood, Red Army, 212 (citing RGVA, f. 4, op. 19, d. 18, 1. 176).

VAR, page 44, is the "Spravka" of the Shvernik Commission again! So is Lebedev, 188 (it should be 187-188) — yet again, the very same document.

Plus, this is yet another phony footnote! Kotkin cites this document as though it offered evidence that Eideman was tortured — but it doesn't.

Khrushchev's men interrogated — or claimed to have done — Karpeiskii, a former NKVD man, who testified that the Lefortovo prison was a terrifying place. But Karpeiskii refused to state that Eideman had been beaten or tortured. He could have done so, and Khrushchev's men would no doubt have liked him to do.

Pankov is a 1965, Khrushchev-era book with no evidence whatever. During Khrushchev's time books like this one were published about all the Tukhachevsky Affair defendants, as well as about others. None of them have any evidence. Kotkin does not seem to realize that their sole value is as witness to the fact that Khrushchev would not even allow his own "house" historians to have access to archival evidence⁵, and that they had no evidence that these men had been innocent victims of a frame-up.

⁵ See the discussion and reference by Petr Pospelov to a conference of historians in 1962 in Furr, Khrushchev Lied 206 and note.

Bloodstains on a Tukhachevsky Confession?

Kotkin:

In the cellars on May 26, a mere four days after his arrest, Tukhachevsky began to sign whatever interrogators put in front of him. Zinovy Ushakov, who prided himself on obtaining confessions no other investigator could extract, mercilessly beat Tukhachevsky, whose blood dripped onto the pages of a confession to crimes he did not commit. By some accounts, Tukhachevsky's teenage daughter, Svetlana, was brought to the prison, where the interrogators told him they would rape her.²²³ (414)

Note 223 (996): Kantor, Voina i mir, 386-7; Svetlana Tukhachevsky's statement in Yuliya Kantor, Mikhail Nikolaevich Tukhachevsky: www.pseudology.org/colonels/Tukhachevsky.htm. The Central Committee, without a plenum, expelled Tukhachevsky as well as Rudzutaks from the party and handed them over to the NKVD. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i glavnoe upravlenie, 190 (APRF, f. 3, op. 24, d. 304, 1. 112); Getty and Naumov, Road to Terror, 448. Ushakov would be executed in Jan. 1940.

Kotkin is — well, let us say, being less than truthful when he states that Tukhachevsky "began to sign whatever interrogators put in front of him." Here's how we know that.

The Kantor article he cites at the Pseudology site is the text, without the illustrations, of an article Kantor originally published in the Russian newspaper Izvestiia of February 21, 2004, pp. 10-11. One of the illustrations in the Izvestiia article is of a corner of a Tukhachevsky statement of May 26, 1937 in which he states that he headed the antisoviet conspiracy and which shows the so-called "bloodstains." Kantor also mentions the handwriting on this statement on page 377 of her book Voina i mir Mikhaila Tukhachevskogo, which Kotkin cites.

From the illustration we can tell that Tukhachevsky's handwriting, on the page with the supposed "blood drops," is very even. As for the supposed bloodstains — if that's what they are, and if they are Tukhachevsky's — Kantor reproduced a photograph of them in her Izvestiia article. I have put it online here:

https://msuweb.montclair.edu/~furrgr/research/tukh_confess_with_blood.jpg

I have included my own examination of this so-called evidence, titled "Bloodstains on a Tukhachevsky Confession," as an Appendix to the present chapter.

No Evidence Of Alleged Rape Threat

The same Pseudology article quotes an official of the central archive of the FSB (successor to the KGB — MGB/MVD — NKVD) that there is no documentary evidence to support the rumor about any threat to rape his daughter.

[[cyrillic]]— Дочь Тухачевского, Светлана, вспоминала, что во время следствия ее • тогда подростка — привели к арестованному отцу и угрожали изнасилованием, если он не подпишет признания ... Это правда?

И слышу безупречный по корректности ответ:

— Документальных данных, подтверждающих такой эпизод, нет.

— Tukhachevsky's daughter, Svetlana, recalled that during the investigation she — then a teenager — was brought to the arrested father and threatened with rape if he did not sign a confession ... Is this true?

And I hear the strictly correct answer:

— There is no documentary evidence supporting such an episode.

Kotkin is eager to include this rumor. But he is equally eager to hide from his readers the fact that there is no evidence to support it. There is no mention of any such thing in Elena Kantor's 600-page book Voina i mir Mikhaila Tukhachevskogo (2004), which Kotkin cites three times in his book and also in his bibliography (1090). Kantor had the cooperation of Tukhachevsky's family, photographs of some of whom appear in her book.

It's obvious why Kotkin includes this rumor. He is grasping at straws, looking for anything that might suggest that the confessions of Tukhachevsky and the other military leaders were false, made under torture, threats to family, etc. But he can't find any such evidence, so he has to hide the truth.

As for the following statement in note 223, it is yet another falsehood by Kotkin:

The Central Committee, without a plenum, expelled Tukhachevsky as well as Rudzutaks from the party and handed them over to the NKVD.

The source and page Kotkin cites contains two documents: the motion by the Politbiuro to expel Tukhachevsky and Rudzutak from Party membership and to submit their cases to the NKVD (for further investigation), dated May 24, 1937, and the corresponding text of the Central Committee Plenum resolution, dated May 25-26, 1937, of the resolution of the Plenum of the Central Committee confirming this. The text, only partially published, of the June 1937 C.C. Plenum states that this resolution was passed by "opros" — poll, either by telephone or by telegram.⁶

Begging The Question Of Torture Again

Kotkin:

Even as he had the Soviet military brass tortured for being agents of fascism ... (414)

False! Here again Kotkin commits the logical fallacy of "begging the question" — assuming that which must be proven, not assumed. As we have noted several times, there is no evidence that any of the Tukhachevsky Affair defendants were tortured.

Krivitsky As Evidence???

Kotkin:

Germany's military attaché in Moscow, General Ernst Köstring, was sending constant updates to Berlin, as Stalin knew. In Berlin's diplomatic circles, German officials "confidentially" whispered how not all of their spies in the Soviet armed forces had yet been caught, egging Stalin on.²²⁵ (414)

Note 225 (996): Krivitsky, In Stalin's Secret Service, 234.

Krivitsky's book was ghost-written by professional anticommunist liar Isaac Don Levine. According to the exceptionally thorough biography of Krivitsky by the anticommunist author Gary Kern⁷ Krivitsky was upset at this. On this page, however, Krivitsky reveals that one of his superiors in the intelligence service had evidence that the Germans were indeed conspiring with Tukhachevsky. There is no evidence that this was false — that the Germans were "egging Stalin on," as Kotkin claims.

⁷ Gary Kern, A Death in Washington. Walter G. Krivitsky and the Stalin Terror. Revised and enlarged edition. New York: Enigma Books, 2004.

By now it should be clear to the reader that no conceivable evidence would ever convince Kotkin that Tukhachevsky et al. were guilty. Kotkin is simply not interested in the truth.

Gamarnik's Suicide

Kotkin:

On May 28-29, Yakir and Uborevičius were arrested. On May 30, eight days after Gamarnik had inscribed "in favor" on the post-facto arrest order for Tukhachevsky, he himself was dismissed. The next day he killed himself in his apartment on Bolshoi Rzhevsky Street.²²⁶ (414-5)

Note 226 (996): Volkogonov, Triumf i tragediia, I/ii: 263; Krasnaia zvezda, June 4, Aug. 13, 1964. Pravda announced his suicide on June 1, 1937. There were nearly 800 suicides in the Red Army in 1937, and more than 800 the next year. Khlevniuk, 1937-i, 207. Gamarnik had been parroting the Stalin line, telling a party meeting in the military (March 13, 1937), for ex.: "Comrades, the Japanese-German Trotskyist agents, spies, and wreckers are in a full range of our army organization, in the staffs, the institutions, the academies, the military-training institutions." He repeated this in more speeches before his arrest for being the phenomenon he was warning against. Whitewood, "Purge of the Red Army," 296, citing RGVA, f. 9, op. 29, d. 319, l. 2.

Gamarnik certainly did commit suicide. But this is not evidence of innocence any more than it is of guilt.

Kotkin cites Khlevniuk, 1937-y, 207, who writes:

In the Red Army alone in 1937, according to O.F. Suvenirov, 782 cases of suicides were registered, and in 1938 (excluding the Navy) — 832 cases.

Khlevniuk's note 2 reads:

[[[cyrillic]]]2 См: Коммунист. 1990. № 17. С. 73.

The suicide figures are in Suvenirov, Kommunist No. 17 (1990). But Suvenirov says:

[[cyrillic]]В целом по РККА в 1937 году зарегистрировано 782 случая самоубийства и покушения на самоубийство, а в 1938 году (без ВМФ) — 832. (73)

In all, the Army registered 782 cases of suicide and attempted suicide in 1937, and in 1938 (excluding the Navy) — 832. (73)

So there were not "nearly 800 suicides in the Red Army in 1937, and more than 800 the next year, but suicides and attempted suicides. Khlevniuk lied about what Suvenirov wrote, and Kotkin followed Khlevniuk.⁸

⁸ For some reason Suvenirov omits any totals for suicides and/or attempted suicides in his much longer 1998 book Tragediia RKKA.

Kotkin cites Cherushev, Udar po svoim, elsewhere and in his bibliography (1077, col. 1). But did he read it? For these figures are repeated in N.S. Cherushev, Udar po svoim (2003), p. 179, with reference to an archival document. While Kotkin gets it wrong, Cherushev gets it right — [[cyrillic]]"самоубийства и покушения на самоубийство" / "suicides and attempts at suicide."

Good Evidence That Conspiracies Existed

Kotkin:

Stalin dictated, edited, and pored over the interrogation protocols, then circulated and referred to them as if they were factual.²²⁷ (415)

Note 227 (996): Minakov, Za otvorotom marshal'skoi shineli, 249-358.

Either this is a bluff or there is no such thing as a bluff. Minakov's book contains no evidence for Kotkin's claim that "Stalin concocted false confessions" and "then circulated and referred to them as if they were factual." And if it did, it could hardly be spread over 110 pages! Moreover,

Minakov is the author of several books in which he claims, with much evidence, that the Military conspiracy did indeed exist!

The main point here is this: the fact that Stalin carefully studied and annotated the transcripts of the interrogations and, in Kotkin's words, "referred to them as if they were factual," is strong evidence that Stalin believed they were, indeed, factual — that is, genuine. How are Stalin's actions to be explained otherwise?

When You Don't Know, Assume!

Kotkin:

And yet, in the end, he [Lion Feuchtwanger] ended up justifying the trials he knew to be falsified, on the basis of cultural snobbery (Russia was backward) and the political imperative to close ranks against fascism.²⁴⁰ (418)

Note 240 (996) is simply to Feuchtwanger's book. There's nothing in it about "knowing the trials to be falsified" — because, of course, he could not possibly "know" this, since (a) he had no evidence that they were falsified, and (b) we know today that there is no such evidence exists — all the evidence suggests that the trials were not falsified. So how can Kotkin make such a statement? (We have already discussed another Kotkin falsehood about Feuchtwanger and the trials in Chapter 6.)

Argument From Incredulity

Kotkin gives us a classic example of the Argument from Incredulity, a logical fallacy:

Instead, attendees were compelled to spend the first day reading interrogation protocols about a fantastic homegrown fascist military plot. (417)

By calling the conspiracy "fantastic" Kotkin is simply saying: "It is unbelievable" — that is, "I, Stephen Kotkin, cannot believe it."⁹ So what?

Whether Kotkin or anyone else "believes" a statement is true or not is irrelevant to whether that statement is true or false.

⁹ See https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Divine_fallacy;
<https://www.logicallyfallacious.com/tools/lp/Bo/LogicalFallacies/196/Argument-from-Incredulity>

Tukhachevsky's Confessions

Kotkin:

NKVD interrogator-torturers had compelled Tukhachevsky to compose a post-facto war "plan of defeat," which amounted to a version of the sophisticated doctrines he had been advancing for years and the Soviets had been successfully practicing at maneuvers.²⁷³

Note 273 (997): Volkogonov, Triumf i tragediia, I/ii: 264-5. A facsimile of Tukhachevsky's "confession" and a copy of the "plan of defeat" are in: "Pokazaniia marshala Tukhachevskogo."

Note the heavy reliance on Argument by Scare Quote! And this is another "bluff" — i.e. a tactic of deception. For there is no evidence here that "torturers had compelled Tukhachevsky," etc. There is no evidence that Tukhachevsky's confession — "plan of defeat" — published in Molodaia Gvardiia 10-11, 1994, was scripted or dictated by the NKVD, or is anything other than what Tukhachevsky himself chose to write.

As so often, Kotkin can cite no evidence that Tukhachevsky was tortured or in any way compelled to write a false "plan of defeat." So he simply asserts that Tukhachevsky was tortured. This is the logical fallacy of "begging the question" again.

Kotkin also conceals the important testimony in Tukhachevsky's article about the conspiracy and its ties to the Rights and to Trotsky. Here is one such passage:

In 1932, on more than one occasion, I talked to Fel'dman, criticizing the army's leadership and the policies of the Party. Feld'man expressed great misgivings about the policies of the Party in relation to the countryside. I told him that this should warn us, military workers, to be on our guard and suggested to him to organize a military group, sharing the views of the Rightists, which would be able to discuss these matters and take the necessary steps. Feld'man agreed and thus was begun the creation of the anti-Soviet military Trotskyist conspiracy. I told Feld'man that I already had established links with Enukidze, who represented the leadership of the Rightists.

There are many more such important passages. An English translation of Tukhachevsky's "Plan of defeat" (plan porazheniia) has in fact been published and is readily available. Kotkin fails to inform his readers about it.¹⁰

¹⁰ Steven J. Main, "The Arrest and 'Testimony' of Marshal of the Soviet Union M.N. Tukhachevsky (May-June 1937)." Journal of Slavic Military Studies 10, No. 1 (March 1997), 151-195.

Kotkin "Discusses" A Transcript He Never Read

Kotkin:

At the "trial," Yakir acknowledged the existence of the "center" but shifted blame onto Tukhachevsky. Feldman did the same. When Kork tried to absolve himself and attack the others, they incriminated him, calling him a liar and provocateur. Primakov had volunteered an additional handwritten denunciation of commanders not yet arrested. Dybenko pressed Tukhachevsky for details about his planned palace coup, and Blyukher pressed Yakir to elaborate on Gamarnik's counterrevolutionary Trotskyite plotting.²⁷⁹ (424)

Note 279 (997): Zen'kovich, Marshaly i genseki, 510-1 (citing the eleven-page trial transcript). Five of the seven military men sitting as judges with Ulrich would soon be executed themselves, except for Budyonny and Shaposhnikov.

First, the scare quotes: there was an actual trial, not a "trial." Second: as of May, 2018, the full transcript of the trial of Tukhachevsky et al. has been declassified and is available to scholars. It provides yet more compelling evidence that the military conspiracy was real and that Tukhachevsky and the rest were guilty of at least what they confessed to.

Also, Kotkin is, at best, in error here — yet again. Zen'kovich is quoting from Belov's letter to Voroshilov, not from the trial transcript. Kotkin has also misunderstood Zen'kovich's statement, not on page 510 but on page 508, where he says that Fel'dman's statement — not the whole trial transcript — occupied 12 pages!

How could Kotkin have made such an elementary error? Was he so eager to depict the trial as a very brief "kangaroo court" that he misread Zen'kovich? Or did Kotkin do this deliberately, knowing that almost no one would ever check the reference? Incompetence? Or deliberate fraud? As so often in Kotkin's book, either is possible.

Yakir's Letter to Stalin

Kotkin:

Everything had taken place behind the scenes. On June 8, prison wardens had presented the eight defendants with their formal indictments, and the next day Yakir had addressed a petition for mercy to "Our Own Close Comrade Stalin," who wrote on it, "He is a scoundrel and a whore." Other politburo members had to read it as well. ("A perfectly precise definition. K. Voroshilov." "A scumbag and a whore, deserves only one kind of punishment, death. L. Kaganovich." Molotov affixed his name without elaborating.) After collecting the signatures, Stalin wrote on the document, "My archive."²⁶⁹

"Behind the scenes?" What "scenes"? Is Kotkin complaining that there wasn't a public trial? Are military tribunals "public" in the "Free World"? Nonsense. This is just a cheap shot, one of many in Kotkin's book. But it is only the proverbial "tip of the iceberg" concerning Yakir's letter.

A World Record? Same Source Cited 3x In One Footnote

Note 269 (997): Voennye arkhivy Rossii, 50; Lebedev, "M. N. Tukhachevskii i 'voenno-fashistskii zagovor,'" 194; Artizov et al., Reabilitatsiia: kak eto bylo, II: 688.

The attentive reader who actually peruses footnotes will think these are three different source. But they aren't. Once again these are all the same source — the "Spravka" of the Shvernik Report prepared for Khrushchev — cited in three different publications. The third, RKEB 2, is the citation universally used today, since this is a standard, important source book. The first two (VAR, Lebedev) are never cited any longer, since they are very hard to find. Moreover, this document is available online, so why not give that reference for the reader's convenience?

As for "Everything had taken place behind the scenes," ironically it is Kotkin who conceals the following important facts:

- That Iakir confesses to treason in this letter.
- That Marshal Zhukov in 1957, and then Khrushchev's KGB chief Aleksandr Shelepin in 1961, quoted this letter but omitted Iakir's confession. They did so in order to give the impression that Iakir was claiming that he was innocent.

The complete text of Iakir's letter has now been declassified. I reprint a translation below so that the reader can see the section that Kotkin is concealing, in boldface.

"Dear, close comrade Stalin. I dare address you in this manner because I have said everything, given everything up, and it seems to me that I am a noble warrior — devoted to the Party, the state and the people, as I was for many years. My whole conscious life has been passed in selfless, honest work in the sight of the Party and of its leaders — then the fall into the nightmare, into the irreparable horror of betrayal. And during that short period of my life there were always within me two persons: one who had worked much and honestly for the army, the soviets, the party, and another, who thought up and was preparing vile acts hostile to the country. The investigation is completed. I have been formally accused of treason to the state, I have admitted my guilt, I have fully repented. I have unlimited faith in the justice and propriety of the decision of the court and the state. The investigation has been completed. I have been accused of treason to the state; I have admitted my guilt, I have fully repented. I have unlimited faith in the justice and appropriateness of the court and the government. I know that there can and must be only one sentence — death. I am prepared for this sentence. Nevertheless I appeal to you and to the government and beg you, beg you to believe in the possibility of my correction, to believe that I can still be of use to the state, to which I dedicate my whole being. Perhaps you will consider and decide to allow me to go somewhere in the far North or East, in Kolyma, to work and on rare occasions to learn about the magnificent Land of the Soviets, mine again. I ask you to permit me, even though rarely, to take up "Pravda" and to see, by the amount of the sowing, the production, the transportation, the victories of the party, of the soviets, and of the people, whom I have betrayed.

I beg you and I understand that I do not have any right to do so. Now I am honest in my every word, I will die with words of love for you, the Party, and the country, with an unlimited faith in the victory of communism."¹¹

¹¹ The whole text, with what Khrushchev, Zhukov, and Shelepin concealed, is in Furr, Trotsky's Collaboration 9-10.

A 'Cheap Shot' To Distract Readers

Kotkin:

The single-day trial of the military men took place in camera, near the Kremlin, on the second floor of the three-story military collegium building (October 25 Street).²⁷⁵ In the chamber, collegium members could avail themselves of sausages, black caviar, pastries, chocolates, fruit. Chief military judge Vasily Ulrich was known to enjoy a brandy.²⁷⁶ (423-4)

Note 276 (997): Jansen and Petrov, "Mass Terror and the Court."

Yet more falsehoods! The "food and drink" business is from a Khrushchev-era statement of "a former orderly at Lefortovo [prison]" and a crude 1991 Gorbachev-era smear of V.V. Ul'rikh, the chief judge of the military tribunal. What's more, neither is referring to this specific trial. Jansen and Petrov take the "cognac" story from a 1991 article (by Chistiakov and Maslov) which contains no evidence whatever!

Kotkin has obviously cited this smear job in an attempt to poison his readers' minds, in order to deflect our attention away from the fact that it is Kotkin himself who is concealing the evidence that Tukhachevsky, Yakir and the rest were in fact guilty of conspiring with Germany and Japan.

Bias By Omission Again

Kotkin:

Budyonny reported that day to Voroshilov ("only personally"), in a nineteen-page memorandum, that "from the testimony of Tukhachevsky, Kork, Yakir, and Uborevicius it is evident that they decided to work out first on their own initiative the plan for the defeat of the Red Army during the war and only after that to clear it with the German general staff ... [but] because of their arrest they did not finish." Still, Budyonny concluded, "I consider that nonetheless they passed it on to German intelligence" (parroting Stalin's closed-door speech of June 2).²⁸⁰ (424)

Note 280: RGVA, f. 33 987, op. 3s, d. 828, Volkogonov papers, Hoover, container 17. In his account for Stalin (June 26), Budyonny noted that although Tukhachevsky had shaken his head "no" during the reading of the charges and testimony, and denied passing any classified documents to the Germans, in the end he pronounced himself guilty. Voennye arkhivy Rossii, 55-6; Lebedev, "M. N. Tukhachevskii i 'voenno-fashistskii zagovor,'" 199-200; APRF, f. 3, op. 24, d. 310, l. 170-83. See also the report of another "judge," I. P. Belov, in Cristiani and Mikhaleva, Le repressioni, 192-8. (997)

Budyonny's report was addressed to Voroshilov, not to Stalin. This looks like a careless error since the archival copy in the Volkogonov Papers is indeed 19 pages long and does have the archival identifier numbers cited by Kotkin. It has been published in Russia at least twice and is online in Russian.¹²

¹² At <http://istmat.info/node/22536>

An English translation of Budyonny's letter is also available online.¹³ The interested reader can consult it and see for herself what Kotkin omits. Like Yakir's letter, the text leaves no room for doubt that the military commanders, and Trotsky as well, were guilty of conspiring with the Nazis. Kotkin conceals all this from his readers.

¹³ At <https://msuweb.montclair.edu/~furg/research/budiennyiltr.html>

It is no surprise, then, that Kotkin does not quote the relevant parts of these documents. Just as Kotkin ignores Frinovsky's statement of April, 1939; all of Yezhov's confession statements; the appeals of the Moscow Trials defendants; and all the rest of the primary source evidence that shows that these conspiracies were real, not fabrications by an "evil Stalin."

When You Don't Know Invent!

Kotkin:

Just before midnight, Ulrich sentenced all eight to death; the men were led down to the cellar, where the NKVD's head executioner, Vasily

Blokhin, used German Walther pistols to execute the fascist hirelings.282 (424)

Note 282 (997): Blokhin was assisted by Ignatev. Lebedev, "M. N. Tukhachevskii i 'voenno-fashistskii zagovor,'" 199.

This is a falsification. There is nothing in "Lebedev" — really, the "Spravka" of the Shvernik Report, as we have seen — about who the executioner was. The "Spravka" (and Lebedev, on the same page 199) simply states that Vyshinsky, Ul'rikh, Tsesarskii, Ignat'ev, and "NKVD commandant Blokhin" were present at the execution and signed the document verifying that the executions had been carried out.¹⁴

¹⁴ Kotkin does not tell us who "Ignatev" was. According to the "Spravka," this was a Captain Ignat'ev, commandant of the Military Collegium of the Supreme Court of the USSR.

Perhaps Kotkin says that Blokhin was the executioner, and that he used German Walthers, because in the "official" — and dishonest — version of the Katyn Massacre, which falsely blames the Soviets, it is claimed that Blokhin was the executioner and used German Walther pistols. As we have shown in The Mystery of the Katyn Massacre: The Evidence, The Solution,¹⁵ the evidence is very clear: the Soviets cannot possibly have committed the Katyn massacres, so it follows that Blokhin did not shoot the Polish POWs. As for using German Walthers, the Germans did that.

¹⁵ Kettering, OH: Erythrós Press and Media, LLC, 2018.

Why would Kotkin fabricate an insignificant detail like this one? To convince his readers that he is thorough? Whatever the reason, he did make it up — or, perhaps, copy from someone else who did.

Kotkin Cites A Letter Two Years Late

Kotkin:

Incarcerated Red Army men inundated the defense commissar with desperate letters about their torture, begging—begging—for his help. "Kliment Yefremovich! You must check how the cases against the commanders of the Red Army are being handled," a group of civil war comrades wrote to him. "You will find that materials are extracted from the arrested by means of force, threats, and turning men into limp rags."²⁹⁸ (303)

Note 298 (998): Afanas'ev, Oni ne molchali, 380'

In Afanas'ev — a dishonest book as we shall see — this quotation is dated May 15, 1939, twenty-three months after the Tukhachevsky trial and executions; six months after Yezhov had resigned and Stalin and the Politburo had ordered NKVD repressions to be stopped.

Argumentum E Silentio

Kotkin:

In fact, evidence indicates that Voroshilov knew full well the charges were a lie.³⁰² (303)

Note 302 (998): Just one of many examples: between May 7 and 10, Voroshilov issued a plan for liquidating wrecking check all warehouses, all construction sites, all secret information storage holdings, all military units but he did so without naming a single example of actual wrecking in the army. Khaustov and Samuelson, Stalin, NKVD, 75 (APRF, f. 3, f. 401, 1. 107-9).

This passage is in Khaustov and Samuelson, page 75 — but it is not evidence that Voroshilov "knew the charges were a lie." This is "argument from silence," a logical fallacy. But see the following passage.

But He Did Believe ...

Kotkin:

"The authority of the army in the country is shaken," Voroshilov wrote, again in notes to himself. "The authority of the commanding group has been shaken ... This means that the methods of our work, the whole system of governing the army, my work as commissar, has suffered a shattering crash."³⁰³ (303)

Note 303 (998): Suvenirov, "Narkomat oborony," 29 (citing RGVA, f. 33987, op. 3, d. 1023, l. 22, 24, 26: June 1937). Notes to himself for his Nov. 1938 speech to the Main Military Council show how far Voroshilov had come. Suvenirov, Tragediia RKKA, 74-5 (citing RGVA, f. 33987, op. 3, d. 1137, l. 3, 5, 6).

The quotation in Kotkin's text at this footnote is indeed in Suvenirov, "Narkomat oborony," page 29. But in the second Suvenirov citation in Kotkin's note, Tragediia RKKA 74-5, Suvenirov says that Voroshilov sincerely believed that the armed forces were full of spies, etc., (74) thus contradicting what Kotkin has just said! No wonder Kotkin omits this fact!

How could he cite a source that not only fails to support his fact-claim, but says the direct opposite of what Kotkin claims it says? Evidently because for Kotkin these citations are "window-dressing," a sham to fool the rubes — us, his readers. He is so sure that no one will check and find him out.

The Far Eastern Conspiracy Was Real

Kotkin:

NKVD bigwig Vsevolod Balytsky had been transferred from Ukraine to fabricate a Trotskyite-fascist conspiracy in the Soviet Far Eastern Army, the country's critical line of defense against Japan ... (432)

This is a particularly flagrant falsification. Elsewhere in his book Kotkin cites the late professor Alvin D. Coox's two articles "The Lesser of Two Hells." (1078) Coox discovered that Genrikh S. Liushkov, the NKVD general who replaced Balytsky in the Far East and then defected to the Japanese, told his Japanese handlers that there really was a conspiracy in the Far Eastern Army, naming names. This is evidence of this highest importance since it confirms the real existence of the military conspiracy.¹⁶

¹⁶ I have examined Coox's articles in Chapter 17 of Furr, Kirov.

What's more, this is non-Soviet evidence, since Liushkov was in Japanese hands when he said it. Kotkin conceals all this fascinating and important stuff from his readers this.

Another Series Of Falsehoods

Kotkin:

Stalin's war preparations also bore the mark of his executions of thousands of loyal officers, especially top commanders like Vasily Blyukher, whose eye had been deposited in his hand before he died under torture, and the gifted Mikhail Tukhachevsky, whose blood had been splattered all over his "confession" to being a German agent just before Stalin signed the Pact.⁴⁰ (893)

Note 40 (1068): Stepanov, "O masshtabakh repressii."

This footnote is a fraud. No specific pages, or even the number of the issue, are cited. Do you wonder why? And this is a four-part article in Voенно-Istoricheskii Zhurnal, 1993, Nos 1, 2, 3 and 5. What's more, the article in issue 1 is not by Stepanov, but by A. T. Ukolov and V.I. Ivkin.

But in his bibliography Kotkin lists them all as by Stepanov. And those that are by Stepanov, Nos. 2, 3, and 5, are simply yet another publication of the "Spravka" of the Shvernik Commission, which Kotkin has cited elsewhere, in at least five other different editions! Why cite the same document here again in yet another separate publication? To create the appearance of thorough scholarship?

The "Spravka" says that Bliukher died "in custody," not "under torture." As for Bliukher's eye, the "Spravka" just states: [[cyrillic]] "около глаза был огромный синяк" — "near his eye was a huge bruise." Where does the "whose eye had been deposited in his hand" come from? Not from the sources Kotkin cites. Did Kotkin dream up this macabre bit of gory detail himself in order to make Stalin, et al. "look bad"?

Concerning the falsehood about "the gifted Mikhail Tukhachevsky, whose blood had been splattered all over his "confession" to being a German agent just before Stalin signed the Pact," see the Appendix to this chapter.

Here Kotkin adds yet another falsehood. Tukhachevsky et al. were executed on June 11, 1937. The Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact was signed ("Stalin signed the Pact") on August 25, 1939 — 26 months later, not "just before."

Blyukher

Kotkin:

On October 22, 1938, NKVD operatives appeared at Voroshilov's dacha, where the thirty-nine-year-old Blyukher and his twenty-three-year-old wife were staying. They arrested the couple and took them to Moscow.²⁷⁹ Yezhov had signed the order, but Beria oversaw the interrogation in Lefortovo. Back in summer 1937, Stalin had said that Tukhachevsky and Gamarnik, on orders from the Japanese, had tried to remove Blyukher from command of the Soviet Far Eastern Army; now, in fall 1938, Stalin had Blyukher accused of being a spy for the Japanese since 1922. Under "interrogation," Beria's men reduced Blyukher's face to a bloody pulp—he lost an eye—yet the marshal refused to confess. Blyukher would die under torture. Beria telephoned Stalin with the news, after which the marshal was cremated.²⁸⁰ (549-550)

Note 280 (1015): Blyukher died on Nov. 9, 1938. He would be convicted and sentenced to death posthumously, on March 10, 1939. Dushen'kin, Ot soldata do marshala. His wife received eight years in the Karaganda camp complex.

The Dushen'kin book was published in 1960 in an edition of 150,000 copies, and republished in 1964 in another 100,000 copies, as part of the Khrushchev-era anti-Stalin campaign. It contains no evidence to support its conclusions and is useless for research. Under Khrushchev similar books were published about Tukhachevsky, Yakir, Primakov, Eideman, and others.

Kotkin fails to cite the 2008 book by Nikolai Velikanov, Izmena Marshalov, "Betrayal of the Marshals." No doubt this is because Velikanov's book contains evidence that Bliukher and others were guilty.

Kotkin does cite the two articles by Coox which contain similar important evidence. But he conceals that evidence from his readers. Coox relates that Liushkov told his Japanese military handlers that Bliukher had indeed been conspiring against the Soviet government.

Omitting The Evidence Of Bliukher's Guilt

Bliukher also admitted being in touch with Rykov, who had offered him a position:

Blyukher told Gulin that before the removal of Rykov he was in connection with him and had often written that the 'right wing' wished to see him at the head of the armed forces of the country. (Coox 1, 158)

Publicly Liushkov was saying that all the conspiracies were fabrications by Stalin. But at the same time he was privately informing the Japanese that serious conspiracies did in fact exist. Moreover, what Liushkov told the Japanese is consistent with the charges at the January 1937 and March 1938 Moscow Trials (the guilt of Rykov) and with the charges against the military conspirators, both the Tukhachevsky Affair figures (Gamarnik) and those against military and Party officials in the Far East.¹⁷

¹⁷ Quoted in Furr Kirov, 348.

We also now have a few selections of interrogations of Bliukher in 1938. In one of them Bliukher explicitly mentions a letter from Rykov that stated exactly what, according to Coox's research, Liushkov told the Japanese:

The beginning of my contact with the Rights took place in 1930 ... These political waverings and unsteadiness of mine became known to Rykov and permitted Rykov in 1930 to write to me an anti-Party and anti-Soviet letter, which I hid from the Party, and in which he spoke of his desire to see me at the head of the military ...

This agrees with Coox's account of what his Japanese informants told him about Liushkov's words, already quoted above. Other snippets of interrogations of Bliukher implicate Deribas, Lavrent'ev, Pokus, Aronshtam, and other figures whom Liushkov identified as participants in the military conspiracy in the Far East. Liushkov's statements to the Japanese confirm them. By the same token, Liushkov's statements to the Japanese refute the notion that these statements were false, the result of torture, threat, or simple NKVD fabrication.

Excerpts from Bliukher's interrogations are contained in Velikanov's book on pages 342-344. Of the 26 pages of Bliukher's handwritten confession Velikanov reproduces a few paragraphs only. But in them Bliukher confirms that he joined the conspiracy of the Rights in 1930.

Conclusion

This critique has established that Kotkin has extensively falsified the evidence about the Tukhachevsky Affair in order to create the false appearance that Stalin and his associates framed innocent men. We now possess far more evidence of the guilt of Tukhachevsky and the other military commanders executed with him than I outline above.

As of May, 2018, the transcript of the trial of Tukhachevsky et al. of June 11, 1937, has finally been declassified and made available on the Internet.¹⁸ As of November, 2018, most of the NKVD investigation file on Tukhachevsky has been declassified as well. The testimony given there by the defendants will remove any doubt in the mind of the objective reader that these men were guilty of the crimes to which they confessed.

¹⁸ At <http://istmat.info/node/59108>, with PDF file at http://istmat.info/files/uploads/59108/rgaspi_17.171.392_process_tuhachev

skogo.pdf It is also available at a Ukrainian, Russian-language site:

But Kotkin, in company with many or perhaps even most scholars of the Stalin era, is anything but objective. No conceivable evidence can change his mind, or theirs. Denial of the evidence is the rule, and objectivity is the exception, in the corrupt field of Soviet history of the Stalin era.

Chapter 9a. Appendix: The "Bloodstain" Question

On page 414 Kotkin writes the following:

In the cellars on May 26, a mere four days after his arrest, Tukhachevsky began to sign whatever interrogators put in front of him. Zinovy Ushakov, who prided himself on obtaining confessions no other investigator could extract, mercilessly beat Tukhachevsky, whose blood dripped onto the pages of a confession to crimes he did not commit.

The claim that these bloodstains prove that Tukhachevsky was beaten into false confessions is repeated by many other writers.

For example:

... Yezhov's investigators tortured the officers mercilessly until they confessed. Analysis many years later showed that there were bloodstains on the confession signed by Tukhachevsky. (Getty, Road to Terror, 447-8)

Their reference is to Izvestiia TsK KPSS n. 4, 1989, p. 50. This is in fact the "Spravka" of the Shvernik Commission, prepared for Khrushchev in 1963 but not published until Gorbachev's anti-Stalin campaign. In the authoritative publication of the "Spravka" in the volume RKEB 2 it is on page 682.

Here is that passage:

попадании крови с предмета, находящегося в движении, или при попадании крови на поверхность под углом ...».

In the process of studying the case of M.N. Tukhachevsky, spots of a brownish color were found on separate sheets of his testimony. In the conclusion of the Central Forensic Laboratory of the Military Medical Directorate of the Ministry of Defense of the USSR of June 28, 1956 it is stated: "Blood has been found on stains and smears on sheets 165, 166 of case No. 967581 ... Some bloodstains have the form of an exclamation mark. This form of bloodstains is usually observed when the blood falls from an object in motion, or when blood falls to a surface at an angle ..."

Khrushchev "rehabilitated" Tukhachevsky et al. in 1956-57. In the early 2000s Iulia Kantor was given permission by the Tukhachevsky family to view his interrogation file. She published two books about this, both cited by Kotkin. Kantor was utterly unable to find any evidence that Tukhachevsky was innocent, although she is certain that he was, and she covers up this fact with lots of assertions.

On February 21, 2004, Kantor published an article in Izvestiia, still a Russian newspaper. In that article she reproduced a photo of the place in one of Tukhachevsky's confessions that has the stains.

Years ago, I put this photograph online:

https://msuweb.montclair.edu/~furrgr/research/tukh_confess_with_blood.jpg

It is important to note a few details here:

* These are the same stains that are identified in the "Spravka" of 1963. The stain in "the form of an exclamation mark" is at the lower left corner.

* This confession is a carbon copy. I thought it looked like this, and it has been confirmed by my Moscow colleague Vladimir Bobrov, who has been working in the FSB (formerly the KGB-NKVD archive).

* Tukhachevsky's signature is visible. Normally, each page of a confession is signed. That was the custom with all interrogation transcripts.

This discovery was made by Khrushchev's men when Khrushchev was falsely "rehabilitating" lots of people and blaming Stalin, after his February 25, 1956 "Secret Speech." I have written about these false "rehabilitations" in Khrushchev Lied, Chapter 11. Later, Gorbachev's men often just copied the unpublished Khrushchev material stuff verbatim.

*Why should we trust Khrushchev and his men? We shouldn't! In anything! They lied big-time. So, we don't know whether these stains are blood or not.

* Assuming they are blood, are they Tukhachevsky's blood? Khrushchev's men may or may not have had the technology to determine that in 1962-3. But by 1989, and certainly today, the technology exists, and many Tukhachevsky family members are still around.

If it were Tukhachevsky's blood, wouldn't Khrushchev and Gorbachev tell us that? But they do not mention it. Maybe they "do not want to know," in case the test shows that it is not Tukhachevsky's blood?

Imagine a courtroom in which this is presented as evidence against somebody — say, Zinovy Ushakov, Tukhachevsky's interrogator. The defense attorney could make mincemeat of this so-called "evidence," get it excluded from consideration. That's because it proves nothing.

* Even if these stains are blood — and even if they are Tukhachevsky's blood (let's remember, this has not been established) — they are on a carbon copy. That means that Tukhachevsky has already made the confession, and it has been typed up.

So why would they still beat him? To force him to sign each page? But look at the signature. It's a regular signature, nothing shaky or hesitant. It's like he is signing an order or a check.

* Most important: Is this "blood spatter"? Read the Wikipedia page on this:

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Bloodstain_pattern_analysis

This is not "blood spatter." There is no "spatter" at all. But if Tukhachevsky were being beaten, there would be "spatter." A blow produces spatter, not drops.

Let's assume these are bloodstains. What might have caused them? A nosebleed. A paper cut. Whose blood? It could be anybody's: the interrogator's; the secretary-typist's; from one of the archivists handling the document. Or, it could be Tukhachevsky's.

What it cannot be is the sign of a beating. A beating produces "blood splatter," which these stains are not.

There is nothing ingenious or obscure about either this evidence or the analysis of it here. Khrushchev's and Gorbachev's men could have done it. But they didn't. They had been tasked by their bosses to find evidence that Tukhachevsky was innocent. So they did not look too closely.

Kotkin could have done it too. But, like Khrushchev's and Gorbachev's men, Kotkin was not looking for the truth either. Like Khrushchev and his men, Kotkin was looking for a good anti-Stalin story. So he turned off his critical faculties and fabricated a beating. And not just any beating, but a "merciless beating."

Pure invention! And yet Kotkin is a renowned historian!

Chapter 10. Yezhov's Conspiracy

Interestingly, in January 1939, S. Mironov-Korol' [S.N. Mironov's full name] was arrested, and almost immediately testified that in July 1937 in a private conversation Frinovskii told him of Ezhov's intention to come to power on the basis of their group in the NKVD.¹

In conformity to the Anti-Stalin Paradigm Kotkin takes the familiar — indeed, the obligatory — position that the mass executions of 1937-1938 were planned by Stalin, and that Nikolai Yezhov, the chief of the NKVD, was only carrying out Stalin's orders. In the words of the title of a book by two leading anti-Stalin falsifiers (and therefore a book often cited by Kotkin) Yezhov was "Stalin's loyal executioner."²

² The updated Russian edition of this book is titled Stalinskii pitomets, "Stalin's nursling," or "pupil."

This is all wrong. No evidence supports it. Therefore, Kotkin can cite none. It is only possible to make this claim at all by ignoring the primary source evidence now available and relying heavily on secondary sources by anti-Stalin researchers who, of course, can give no evidence either. Long, detailed footnotes give Kotkin's account the superficial appearance of being well-documented. But this is a sham. As we shall see, many of Kotkin's footnotes do not provide evidence for the fact-claims he makes.

Bias by omission is perhaps the most powerful of the tools in the bag of the historical falsifier, because only a specialist who is familiar with the available sources will know what is omitted. Kotkin takes full advantage of this technique of falsification. We devote a full chapter to Kotkin's abuse of this tool of deception.

I have written a book-length study of Yezhov's conspiracy and mass murders: Yezhov vs. Stalin. The Truth About Mass Repressions and the So- Called 'Great Terror' in the USSR. In it I examine the primary-source evidence. For brevity's sake I will refer to that book rather than reprint its contents here.

Kotkin completely ignores all the evidence of Yezhov's conspiracy against the Soviet government! Because he deals with Yezhov's mass murders in several different sections of his book, our discussion here has to jump around in Kotkin's text to follow him.

The Basic Falsehood Stated

Kotkin:

Through it all, the NKVD never broke down, let alone rebelled. The ease with which Yagoda was destroyed proved that there was no threat whatsoever to Stalin's rule. The secret police, even under assault, remained an utterly reliable instrument of his will, a testament to both the limits of the feared yet despised Yagoda's authority and the strength of Stalin's as supreme leader. (394)

No evidence given for these outrageous statements. No wonder! We have a great deal of evidence that the NKVD leaders, both Iagoda and then Yezhov, were indeed conspiring against Stalin and the Soviet government and Party. My book, Yezhov vs. Stalin, reproduces a great deal of this evidence. Much of it is taken from Jansen and Petrov, and the revised Russian edition by Petrov and Jansen, as well as other sources that Kotkin cites — but not here. His readers will not know this.

Here is just one quotation from a book that Kotkin cites many times.

Evdokimov gave similar evidence. According to him, in September [1938 — GF] he discussed the threatening situation after Beriia's appointment with Yezhov, Frinovskii, and Bel'skii. Allegedly, they agreed to prepare an attempt on Stalin and Molotov. Yezhov was also said to have had plans to murder Beriia. ... According to Iu. K. Ivanov, an NKVD executive from Evdokimov's circle, as early as late July, after a visit to Yezhov, Evdokimov had alluded to terrorism against the Party leadership. Involved in the conspiracy first of all were people originating from North Caucasia (Evdokimov's home base), Dagin, Nikolaev-Zhurid, and others. But the action, planned for 7 November [1938], did not take place because Dagin was arrested beforehand.³

³ Mark Jansen and Nikita Petrov. Stalin's Loyal Executioner. People's Commissar Nikolai Yezhov 1895-1940. Stanford: Hoover Institution Press, 2002, 156. There is a great deal more evidence of "NKVD rebelling" against Stalin and the Party. Kotkin hides it from his readers.

Omitting The Evidence

Kotkin:

Franco, therefore, had nothing to teach him, except that a military-led putsch, assisted externally by fascists, could try to seize a whole country, a scenario that Stalin was manipulating to justify his own savage domestic counterinsurgency against an imaginary insurgency. (401— no footnote)

Yezhov, some of his NKVD men, and some Party First Secretaries, claimed that there were serious insurgencies afoot. We have discussed this, and quoted the texts in English translation, in Chapter Five of Yezhov vs. Stalin. This primary-source evidence was, of course, available to Kotkin too. But he never tells his readers about it.

From the evidence we now have it seems that they were lying, at least in large part. But Stalin and the central leadership in Moscow were relying on the Party and NKVD leadership around the vast country to inform them.

There is no question that Stalin believed that these alleged insurgencies were real, as the editor of one of the document collections admits. That editor is V.N. Khaustov, one of the compilers of several important document collections and a very anti-Stalin researcher.

And the most frightening thing was that Stalin made his decisions on the basis of confessions that were the result of the inventions of certain employees of the organs of state security. Stalin's reactions attest to the fact that he took these confessions completely seriously.

(Lubianka Golgofa, 6)

What is important here?

- That Khaustov admits the existence of a major conspiracy by Yezhov.
- That Khaustov concedes that Stalin was deceived by Yezhov. Yezhov admits as much in the confessions of his that we now have.
- That Khaustov admits that Stalin acted in good faith on the basis of evidence presented to him by Yezhov, much of which may, or must, have been false.

Kotkin, who cites at least six books written or edited by Khaustov, does not cite or use this very important collection of documents.

It is important to ideologically anticommunist researchers that these mass murders be seen as Stalin's plan and intention. Khaustov is honest enough to admit that the evidence supports the opposite conclusion. Some of the confessional and investigative documents Yezhov sent on to Stalin and the Soviet leadership must have been falsified. But Khaustov himself has no idea which were fabrications and which were not. (Furr, Yezhov vs Stalin, 64)

The Falsehood About "Quotas"

Kotkin:

In summer 1937, he vastly expanded the arrests and executions to nonelites [non-elites]. There was no "dynamic" forcing him to do so, no "factional" fighting, no heightened threat abroad. The terror was not spiraling out of his control. He just decided, himself, to approve quota-driven eradication of entire categories of people in a planned indiscriminate terror known as mass operations.³ (433)

Note 3 (999) is to Solzhenitsyn and an even older book by Weissberg. Of course, neither could have any evidence to support Kotkin's claim. This is a falsification, and a particularly flagrant one at that. As American scholar Arch Getty has pointed out:⁴

Order No. 0044 7 established limits [limity] rather than quotas, maximums, not minimums ... The word's meaning was well known: it never meant 'quotas'. Reflecting Stalin's concern that locals might go out of control (or out of his control) Order No. 00447 twice warned that 'excesses' in local implementation of the operation were not permitted. (Getty, Fever 232-233)

⁴ I discuss this issue in Yezhov vs Stalin 72-3.

Getty repeats this in a recent book:

One of the mysteries of the field [of Soviet history — GF] is how limity is routinely translated as "quotas." (Getty, Practicing 340 n. 109)

Kotkin knows this, of course. But his readers will not know it. Why not? Because he hides it from them.

Kotkin falsely attributes the Bolsheviks with a passion for "quotas" elsewhere too:

[On January 11, 1930] Yagoda asked his top subordinates how many people could be interned in existing labor camps and where new camps might be quickly established, encouraging them to "think creatively."¹⁵⁶ The upshot was that each territory would have a deportation quota.¹⁵⁷ (36)

Note 157 (916): 157. Ivnitskii, Kollektivizatsiia i raskulachivanie, 108-9.

But there is nothing about quotas of any kind on these pages of Ivnitskii's book.

The Nonsense of "Psychohistory"

Kotkin:

There could have been no such terror without the Communist party and its ideology, but there would have been no such terror without Stalin, and his profoundly dark personality, immense strength of will, and political skill.³²¹ (490)

Let's pause for a moment to consider the first clause in this sentence. Can it really be that Kotkin is ignorant of the massive terror by capitalist countries in many parts of the world? Or does he just hope his readers will be ignorant of them? Conquest, quoted in note 321 (1007) by Kotkin, was an avid supporter of the immense terror, which included the massive use of torture, of the American war in Vietnam. What about American terror in Korea, the Philippines, Latin America, Iraq, Afghanistan? British atrocities in Kenya and India? The French massacre of African soldiers in Senegal?⁵

⁵ For this last atrocity see https://fr.wikipedia.org/wiki/Massacre_de_Thiaroye.

As for Kotkin's psychologizing of Stalin here ("profoundly dark personality") — it is of course an error to try to explain historical events in this way, despite how often anticommunist writers have recourse to it.⁶ It is also an example of the logical fallacy known as the nominal fallacy — giving something a name ("dark personality"), then assuming that you have explained it.⁷

⁶ See the essay by Geoffrey Roberts, "Stalin, Trump, and the Politics of Narcissism: A Response to Rose McDermott's 'The Nature of Narcissism.'" H-Diplo, June 29, 2018. At <https://issforum.org/roundtables/policy/1-SBG-Stalin>

⁷ For one discussion of this fallacy see
<http://www.indiana.edu/~p1013447/dictionary/nomfall.htm>

As we shall see, Kotkin has no evidence whatever to support his view that the massive executions of 1937-8 were planned by Stalin. But since he rejects the explanation that is supported by all the evidence we now have, cheap "psychologizing" is all Kotkin has left. Plus Robert Tucker, Kotkin's professor at Princeton, was an avid proponent of "psychohistory."⁸

⁸ See Robert C. Tucker, Stalin as revolutionary, 1879-1929: a study in history and personality (New York: Norton, 1973). The "personality" part is Tucker's phony psychohistory.

Frinovsky's Confession Statement

Kotkin:

Yezhov's NKVD ... was riven with distrust. When informing Frinovsky that he wanted to appoint him first deputy commissar, Yezhov asked him to recite his accumulated sins. "You have so many sins, you ought to be arrested right now," Yezhov told him, adding, "Well, so what, you'll work, and you'll be my person 100 percent."²³³ Frinovsky further testified that "Yezhov demanded that I find investigators who were utterly dependent on us or had sins on their records, and they knew they had sins, which could be held over them."²³⁴ (415-6)

Note 233 (996):

http://www.hrono.ru/dokum/193_dok/19390413beria.php (APRF, f. 3, op. 24, d. 373, l. 3-44: protocol of Frinovsky interrogation, Beria to Stalin April 11, 1939). Frinovsky and Yezhov were not close. "I had multiple clashes at work with him," Yezhov would later observe of Frinovsky. "I cursed him out, and called him a fool to his face, because no sooner would he arrest someone among the NKVD operatives than he would run to me and shout that it was all fabrication [lipa], that the person was wrongly arrested." "Poslednee slovo Nikolai Yezhova."

Note 234 (996):

http://www.hrono.ru/dokum/193_dok/19390413beria.php (APRF, f. 3, op. 24, d. 373, l. 3-44: protocol of Frinovsky interrogation, sent by Beria to Stalin April 11, 1939); Afanas'ev, Oni ne molchali, 218.

There are a number of falsehoods here. For starters, Frinovsky's confession is a statement, not an interrogation.

But more important, Frinovsky asserts that the Moscow Trials defendants were guilty. Kotkin ignores this. I have put an English translation of Frinovsky's statement online so the reader may see for herself.⁹

⁹ At <https://msuweb.montclair.edu/~furrgr/research/frinovskyeng.html>

Oni Ne Molchali Is A Fraud

As for "Afanas'ev, Oni ne molchali, 218" — this is interesting! It is a very short excerpt from Frinovsky's statement. This book, published in 1991, was a part of Gorbachev's truly gigantic attack on Stalin that facilitated his turning the USSR towards capitalism, civil conflict, and dissolution. It was published in an edition of 75,000 — an enormous printing of what is a dry and, supposedly, scholarly book.

The full text of Frinovsky's statement was published in 2006 and is cited above by Kotkin. It shows how dishonest Oni ne molchali is, since that Gorbachev-era book does not mention the fact that Frinovsky strongly and repeatedly attests to the guilt of the Moscow Trials defendants and the existence of Yezhov's conspiracy.

The editors of this 1991 book, doing Gorbachev's bidding, concealed this from their readers. And now Kotkin is concealing it from his readers!

More Dishonest Use of Frinovsky's Confession Statement

Kotkin cites Frinovsky's confession statement a number of times, and falsifies it every time.

Kotkin, note 278 (967) to page 234 of the text: In 1935, Yefim Yevdokimov evidently asked Frinovsky if he had any information about the hand of Yagoda in the murder of Kirov (insinuating Stalin's involvement). Protocol of Frinovsky interrogation, Beria to Stalin,

April 11, 1939 (APRF, f. 3, op. 24, d. 373, l. 3-44), http://www.hrono.ru/dokum/193_dok/19390413beria.php.

This is yet another of Kotkin's blatant falsehoods. Evdokimov's question about Yagoda did not "insinuate Stalin's involvement" at all. Quite the contrary! Evdokimov, Frinovsky, and Yagoda were all in the Rightist conspiracy. This is made clear in Frinovsky's statement, though Kotkin never informs the reader of this. For example:

Evdokimov also said that in a number of regions of the North Caucasus his people had succeeded in leading some groups of rebels, and that the purge of the party that was taking place at that time might help in the sense of recruitment of people.

At the time of the trial of Zinoviev, Kamenev and others, when the testimony about Bukharin was published in the press, Evdokimov was in Moscow. He became very upset and in a conversation with me, said: "The devil only knows how he will be able to extract himself from this whole affair. I just don't understand Yagoda at all, what he is doing, why he is broadening the circle of persons for repression, or maybe the nerves of these people are weak — they will give out. But it could have been possible to direct the course of the investigation in such a manner as to leave oneself safe in any case." (40)

http://www.hrono.ru/dokum/193_dok/19390413beria.php (APRF, f. 3, op. 24, d. 373, l. 3-44: protocol of Frinovsky interrogation, Beria to Stalin April 11, 1939). Frinovsky and Yezhov were not close. "I had multiple clashes at work with him," Yezhov would later observe of Frinovsky. "I cursed him out, and called him a fool to his face, because no sooner would he arrest someone among the NKVD operatives then he would run to me and shout that it was all fabrication [lipa], that the person was wrongly arrested." "Poslednee slovo Nikolai Yezhova." (996)

Frinovsky's confession statement shows that Frinovsky was indeed "close" to Yezhov, though Kotkin's readers will not know this, since he provides no link to the English translation.

Frinovsky continued:

Soon after starting work in my new position as vice-commissar Yezhov began to bring me close to himself, to select me from among the remaining vice-commissars, to hold franker conversations with me in the evaluation of the other vice-commissars, to express some dissatisfaction with Agranov. Before the division of duties among the vice-commissars, besides the fact that I continued to be the chief of the GUPVO, Yezhov proposed that I become involved in operative questions also, and in 1937, after Yagoda's arrest, he began to hold talks with me in relation to my possible appointment as first vice-commissar. During one of these talks Yezhov told me: "I have decided this question, but I want to talk it over with you, only look — be honest, there are some sins on your account."

At first I was completely taken aback. I thought — I'm done for. When he saw my dismay Yezhov began to speak: "Don't be afraid, speak honestly." Then I told him about the story with the Sokol'nichesky affair, about my ties with Yagoda, ties with Evdokimov, and through him with Lifshits. Then Yezhov said: "There are so many sins to your name that we could throw you in prison right now, but never mind, you will keep working, you will be my man 100%." I looked at him in dismay and tried to refuse the appointment to the position of first vice-commissar, but he said: "Sit down, get to work, we'll work together and take the responsibility together." (41-42)

I have put a translation of Yezhov's last words ("Poslednee slovo Nikolaia Yezhova") online.¹⁰

Imaginary "Kremlin Bodyguards"

Kotkin:

Peasants had rebelled en masse against the violence of forced collectivization and dekulakization, and even some party officials had protested. But the terror? A group of Kremlin bodyguards had been carrying loaded pistols on Red Square during the 1937 May Day festivities, within shooting distance of Stalin and the entire leadership; within a few months, they went meekly to their deaths, liquidated as an alleged "assassin corps" working for foreign agents.²⁴³ (543)

What about the story of the Kremlin bodyguards who went meekly to their deaths?

Note 243 (1014, to Kotkin passage above): Rybin, Riadam so Stalinym, 73. See also Medvedev, Let History Judge, 587.

Yet more phony references! The story of the "group of Kremlin bodyguards" is simply not in either of these sources. Or, perhaps Kotkin has misunderstood a passage in Rybin's memoir where he notes that, after the arrest of Yagoda (March 1, 1937) and some of the other conspirators, the four bodyguards who had been assigned to Red Square for May Day "disappeared." Rybin assumes they were part of the plot to kill Stalin, and says "No wonder that, when gathering in Red Square on May 1, they feverishly shoved four or five pistols each into their field coats."

Few Peasants Rebelled

As for peasants, some did rebel — but what does "en masse" mean? Mark Tauger, a world expert on Russian and Soviet agriculture and famines, notes that there was relatively little peasant protest: According to an OGPU (police) report of March 1931, right in the midst of collectivization, about five per cent of the peasant population was involved in protests. This also means that the vast majority of peasants was not involved in such protests. Most of these protests were settled peacefully; the OGPU reported that they had recourse to force in fewer than 2% of them.

Tauger points out that many peasants actually supported collectivization. For them, it was not "forced." Many peasants actively supported collectivization. This number increased when local activists were experienced or sensitive enough to patiently explain the purpose of collectivization to the peasants. Some peasants spontaneously form[ed] kolkhozy and consolidated their fields.

Finally, what about the other 90 per cent of peasants who did not rebel? Some peasants did not reject collectivization and even supported it ... An OGPU report quoted one middle peasant in Shilovskii raion (district), Riazan okrug, in November 1929 to the effect that 'the grain procurements are hard, but necessary; we cannot live like we lived before, it is necessary to build factories and plants, and for that grain is necessary' In January 1930, during the campaign, some peasants said, 'the time has come to abandon our individual farm. It's about time to quit those, [we] need to transfer to collectivization.' Another document from January reported several cases of peasants spontaneously forming kolkhozy and consolidating their fields, which was a basic part of collectivization ...¹¹

End of Yezhov Era

The day after Uspensky's flight, Stalin, receiving his minions in the Little Corner, had a decree approved disbanding the assembly-line death sentence troikas.¹⁴³ (578)

Note 143 (1020): RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 24, l. 62.

An archival source! What is a reader supposed to make of this kind of thing? Especially since Kotkin knows that this document has been published in several places, including Tragediia sovietskoi derevni vol. 5, part 2, 306-7, and Pavliukov, Yezhov, 473. Kotkin cites both of these works in his book. It is even online at the Istmat site (<http://istmat.info/node/36067>) It is partly translated in Getty and Naumov,

The Road to Terror, 531-2. Why didn't Kotkin help his readers by pointing this out?

For the falsehood of "assembly-line death sentences" see the section "Lies About The Lists" later in this chapter.

Here is my translation:

Directive of the Council of People's Commissars and the Central Committee of the VKP(b) concerning a halt to the review of cases sent for review of troikas, military tribunals, and the Military Collegium of the Supreme Court of the USSR, in the order of special instructions:

15 November 1938

To People's Commissars for Internal Affairs of the Union and Autonomous Republics, commanders of the oblast' and krai directorates of the NKVD, to prosecutors of the kraiss, oblast', autonomous and union republics, prosecutors of the military regions, of railroad and water transportation, chairmen of the Supreme Court of the USSR, the supreme courts of the union and autonomous republics, the Military Collegium of the Supreme Court of the USSR, chairmen of the tribunals of the military districts:

It is ordered in the strongest possible terms:

1. To halt as of 16 November of this year pending further order examination by the troikas, military tribunals, and by the Military Collegium of the Supreme Court of the USSR, of all cases sent to them for their review as special orders or in a different, simplified order ...
2. To require prosecutors of military districts, territories, regions, autonomous and union republics to monitor the exact and immediate fulfillment of this order. Report its fulfillment to the USSR NKVD and Prosecutor of the USSR Chairman of the Council of People's Commissars (SNK) V. Molotov,

Secretary of the CC of the VKP(b) J. Stalin.

Why does Kotkin cite only the archival location, which none of his readers can consult? This should serve us as a reminder that Kotkin strives to hide, rather than disclose, the evidence.

Tied The World Record!

On November 17, he summoned Vyshinsky for a "report," after which the despot issued another decree in the politburo's name, justifying the terror but blaming the NKVD for "a host of major deficiencies and distortions."¹⁴⁴ (578)

Note 144 (1020): Kostrychenko [sic — should be "Kostyrchenko"] and Khazanov, "Konets Kar'ery Yezhova," 125-8 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 1003, l. 85-86); Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i glavnoe upravlenie, 607-11 (APRF, f. 3, op. 58, d. 6, l. 85-7); Getty and Naumov, Road to Terror, 532-7. On Yezhov's anger at being accused of lawlessness, when he was following Stalin's instructions, with which Vyshinsky had colluded, see Ushakov and Stukalov, Front voennykh prokurorov, 70-2.

The first three are all the same document: "On Arrests, Supervision by the Procuracy and the Conduct of Investigations." Why cite Kostyrchenko and Khazanov, 1992, when the same document is published in the Lubianka 1937-1938 volume that Kotkin cites so often?

Getty and Naumov is a partial translation of this document. I have translated the whole document into English and put it online.¹²

¹² No. 362. Decree of the Politburo of the CC VKP(b), "On Arrests, Supervision by the Procuracy and the Conduct of Investigations." November 17 1938. At <https://msuweb.montclair.edu/~furrgr/research/onarrestseng.html>

The book by Ushakov and Stukalov is an interesting example of falsification. It purports to be the memoirs, edited by Ushakov, of military prosecutor Nikolai P. Afanas'ev, who died in 1979.

This book is of more than dubious validity. In it the words of Yezhov's that Afanas'ev supposedly quotes echo documents published by the year 2000, when this book was published. On the very pages 70-72 cited by Kotkin here, Afanas'ev claims that Tukhachevsky denied his guilt. But we know that is a lie, because we now have Tukhachevsky's confessions, plus those of his associates who also accuse him, plus Tukhachevsky's own testimony at the June 11, 1937, trial.

In 2000, the year their book was published, Ushakov and Stukalov had some of these documents too. But — assuming that they really did reprint Afanas'ev's memoirs and did not simply fabricate them — they do not inform their readers that Afanas'ev was wrong.

Omitting The Struggle Against Yezhov

Just like that, without public acknowledgment, with a few pieces of paper in the Little Corner, the mass terror was halted. Coincidence? The terror supposedly was aimed at rooting out enemies lying in wait for a war, but then, at what would appear to be maximum international war danger for the USSR, Stalin suddenly moved to end the mass arrests. Had he become less paranoid? Was it just that he had been waiting for completion of a Short Course? Or was he jolted by events portending actual danger?¹⁴⁵ We cannot definitively establish his motivations. (579)

Note 145 (1020): "The fear of war had spawned mass terror," wrote Ulam. "But terror in its turn increased Stalin's fear of war." This appears to be exactly backward: Stalin's fear of war seems to have ended the mass terror. Ulam, Stalin, 491-2. On Oct. 16, 1938, the politburo resolved to demobilize and return the forces called to the western borders: 330,000 troops, 27,500 horses, and 5,000 vehicles. RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 24, l. 17.

The last sentence here is copied word for word from Oleg Khlevniuk's book Stalin. Zhizn' odnogo vozhdia, page 230, where the exact same archival reference is also given. Has Kotkin even looked at this archival source? There is no reason to think he has. But hey — archival references give the appearance of serious scholarship, right? What's more, even Khlevniuk is not sure that this movement of forces was due to the Munich sellout of Czechoslovakia by Britain and France, since "these forces, while not small, were hardly decisive."

Presumably Kotkin wants us to think he is grasping for some explanation of the end of the "mass terror." As for Ulam's book, it was published in 1973, long before the flood of Soviet documents now available.

As for this gem:

Just like that, without public acknowledgment, with a few pieces of paper in the Little Corner, the mass terror was halted. Coincidence?

Kotkin doesn't even mention the real and provable reason for the end of the mass arrests and executions ("the terror") — the growing suspicion by Stalin and others that Yezhov was acting improperly, and Yezhov's resignation under pressure.

[[cyrillic]]И вот третий, последний акт этой долгой процедуры: 23 ноября Ежов опять вызван к Сталину, где уже находились Молотов и Ворошилов. Мне пришлось держать в руках документ, который Ежов писал явно под их диктовку. Написан он на трех страницах, все разных размеров, то есть хватали первые подвернувшиеся под руку бумажки и подсовывали их Ежову, лишь бы тот не прекратил писать. Формулировка его отстранения от должности меняется дважды: видимо, он сопротивлялся, возражал. А надото было вырвать от него решение уйти «по собственному желанию»! Тут же пишется проект постановления, который звучит как гарантия: «Сохранить за т. Ежовым должности секретаря ЦК ВКП(б), председателя Комиссии партийного контроля и наркома водного транспорта.» Наконец заявление написано и подписано: «Н. Ежов.» Вот с этого и началось устранение «ежовщины». Политбюро послало на места телеграммы с прямым текстом: немедленно прекратить репрессии и распустить «тройки.» Снова, перехватив инициативу, сталинская группа уже в конце 1938 года добилась проведения первых судебных процессов над работниками НКВД, обвиненных в фальсификации и надуманности дел, по которым почти целый год судили, ссылали и казнили тысячи людей. Так удалось остановить большой террор.

And here is the third, final act of this long procedure: on November 23, Yezhov was again summoned to Stalin, where Molotov and Voroshilov were already present. I have held in my hands the document that Yezhov wrote, obviously under their dictation. It is written on three pages, all of different sizes — that is, they grabbed the first pieces of paper that came into their hand and slipped them to Yezhov, if only to keep him writing. The formulation of his dismissal is changed twice: apparently, he resisted, objected. But it was necessary to wrest from him the decision to leave "at his own request"! There and then the draft resolution was written, which sounds like a guarantee: "To retain the post of Secretary of the Central Committee of the CPSU (B.), Chairman of the Commission for Party Control and the People's Commissar for Water Transport, for Comrade Yezhov." Finally the statement was written and signed: "N. Yezhov." This is how the end of the "Yezhovshchina" began. The Politburo sent around telegrams with the text itself: immediately stop the repression and disband the "troikas." Once again, having seized the initiative, at the end of 1938 the Stalin group achieved the first trials of NKVD officers accused of falsifying and contrived cases, by which for almost a year they had tried, exiled and executed thousands of people. This is how they succeeded in stopping the great terror.¹³

¹³ Zhukov, "Zhupel Stalina." Komsomolskaia Pravda November 20, 2002.

Kotkin has read and cites Iurii Zhukov's work but ignores it here. No doubt he does so because the evidence, and Zhukov's analysis of it, disprove the false allegation that Stalin "planned" Yezhov's mass murders. Likewise, they prove that Stalin was not at all an all-powerful "dictator" scare quotes deliberate here that Kotkin, and the Anti-Stalin Paradigm, demand that he be. But these are obligatory elements of the ASP. So Kotkin keeps quiet about them.

Kotkin:

On November 19, 1938, the "politburo" summoned the NKVD commissar to the Little Corner, where, from 11:10 p.m. until 4:20 a.m., they discussed a denunciation of him that Beria had orchestrated from a provincial NKVD boss (Viktor Zhuravlyov).³¹

Note 31 (1021): Zhuravlyov's denunciation followed the formation of the commission on the NKVD. Beria had passed the letter to Stalin on Oct. 13, 1938. Khaustov and Samuelson, Stalin, NKVD, 249-50; Naprieme, 245-6. See also Shreider, NKVD iznutri, 237. Zhuravlyov briefly got a promotion to Moscow, but Beria would send him to run the Karaganda camps. Yezhov's response—accepting guilt, claiming poor health, confessing he "had taken badly the appointment of Beria as my deputy. I saw in this an element of lack of trust towards me," and requesting to resign—is misdated as Sept. (rather than Nov.) 23, 1938. Kostrychenko [sic — should be "Kostyrchenko"] and Khazanov, "Konets Kar'ery Yezhova," 129-30 (RGASPI 1 f. 17, op. 3, d. 1003, l. 82-4); Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i glavnoie upravlenie, 552-4 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 1003, l. 82-4); Petrov and Jansen, Stalinski pitomets, 355-9 (RGASPI, f. 671, op. 1, d. 265, l. 16-26ob.).

The fact-claims in the Khaustov and Samuel'son passage (249-50) cite no evidence. Instead, Khaustov and Samuel'son "channel" Stalin to tell us what he was "thinking." Plus they tell at least one glaring lie:

[[cyrillic]]Сталин, читая записку Журавлева, отметил некоторые факты, свидетельствующие о подозрительном поведении руководящего состава НКВД. В записке он оставил свои пометки, которые свидетельствовали о том, что Сталин, может быть, начинал открывать для себя некоторые теневые стороны деятельности руководства НКВД.

Stalin, reading Zhuravlev's note, noticed some facts indicating suspicious behavior by the NKVD leadership. He left some notes on Zhuravlev's letter, which showed that Stalin was perhaps beginning to discover for himself some shady aspects of the activities of the NKVD leadership.

Stalin briefly summarized the contents of Zhuravlev's letter (the letter itself has not been found) in a coded telegram of November 25, 1938 to Party leaders.¹⁴ It is clear that this was not the "beginning" of Stalin's suspicions of Yezhov. In August, 1938, Lavrentii Beria had been made Yezhov's second-in-command, replacing Frinovsky. Yezhov recognized this as a sign of mistrust.

¹⁴ Lubyanka 1937-1938 No. 364 pp. 611-2.

NEW World Record!

Kostyrchenko and Khazanov, "Konets kar'ery Yezhova," 129-130, is a 1992 publication of Yezhov's letter of resignation. Why cite it here, in a hard-to-find journal, when it is published in the Lubyanka 1937-1938 volume that Kotkin cites so many times, as well as online? In fact, Kotkin may never have read the Kostyrchenko-Khazanov article, since it is footnoted on page 554 of the Lubyanka 1937-1938 volume.

Khaustov et al., Lubyanka 552-4 is another text of Yezhov's letter of November 23, 1938. So is Kotkin's Note 32, to Petrov & Jansen, Stalinski pitomets 355-9.

Three different citations of the same document! Actually, four — because Kotkin's note 32 to "Petrov and Jansen, Stalinski pitomets, 355-9, at 357," is simply a long quotation from the very same document! More phony scholarship. Shreider, 237, contains only Shreider's attacks on Zhuravlev because the latter had built a case against Shreider himself. It is irrelevant to the present discussion.

At the end of this long footnote Kotkin writes:

See also Sudoplatov and Sudoplatov, Memoirs of an Unwanted Witness, 59. This is another example where Sudoplatov's memoir comports with archival materials.

What "archival materials" is Kotkin talking about here? Viktor Zhuravlev is not even mentioned in Sudoplatov's memoir. But Kotkin is wrong anyway.

Sudoplatov's memoir was published in 1995, long after the publication of Yezhov's resignation (1992), from which Sudoplatov may well have copied. So much for "comporting with archival materials." Finally, we can't rely on Sudoplatov's memoir because it was altered after its first Russian-language edition, probably by its American editor, Jerrold Schechter.

The "Edit" That Wasn't

Kotkin:

On November 23, Yezhov was again in Stalin's office, where he had logged nearly 900 hours over the previous two years, but these three and a half would be his last: Stalin edited Yezhov's resignation.³³ (587)

Note 33 (1021): Kostyrchenko and Khazanov, "Konets Kar'ery Yezhova," 131 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 1003, l. 34-5); Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i glavnoe upravlenie, 611 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 1003, l. 34-5).

This is a phony reference. Kostyrchenko and Khazanov, 131, only note that this document, the Politburo decision to accept Yezhov's resignation, has a "facsimile" of Stalin's signature. Khaustov et al., Lubianka 611 is the text of Yezhov's note of resignation. This is the very same document, but here there is no claim that it bears a facsimile of Stalin's signature. Moreover, the latter text claims that it is the "original," while Kostyrchenko and Khazanov state that theirs, the one with the facsimile of Stalin's signature, is a "copy."

In neither source is there any indication that "Stalin edited it." Why does Kotkin falsify even this detail? To create the impression that Stalin was "in control," stage-managing everything?

On November 25, the despot sent a telegram to all regional party secretaries referring to Zhuravlyov's denunciation of NKVD errors and noting that "the Central Committee had granted Yezhov's request to resign."³⁴ Pravda printed a delayed announcement, on its back page (December 8). Executing the NKVD chief could throw into doubt the mass arrests and executions. For now, Stalin retained Yezhov as a Central Committee secretary, chairman of the party Control Commission, and water transport commissar. (587)

Note 34 (1021): Petrov and Jansen, Stalinski pitomets, 354-5 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 11, d. 58, l. 61-2); Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i glavnoe upravlenie, 611-2; RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 1003, l. 35 (appointment of Beria). Petrov & Jansen, and Khaustov et al., Lubianka, both reprint the same document: Stalin's telegram about the "unsatisfactory situation" in the NKVD and acceptance of Yezhov's request to resign.

Lies About the Lists

Kotkin:

At least 383 execution lists signed by him have survived, containing the names of more than 43,000 "enemies of the people," mostly the highest-level officials and officers. The terror was centrally implemented by Nikolai Yezhov and Mikhail Frinovsky of the NKVD.³²² (490)

Note 322 (1007): Khlevniuk, Politbiuro, 291.

Note 34, above, continued (1021): The last of the infamous execution lists for 1938 was dated Sept 29: APRF, f. 3, op. 24, d. 409-19: <http://stalin.memo.ru/images/intro.htm>. But Volkogonov, citing military archives, claimed that Stalin, having received some 383 extended lists of names for execution in 1937-38, received yet another on Dec. 12, 1938, containing 3,167 names, albeit without even the charges or the results of any "investigation." Volkogonov, Triumf i tragediia, I/ii: 301 (citing TsAMO, f. 32, op. 701323, d. 38, l. 14-6).

The business about "execution lists," like Kotkin's statement about "quotas" (see above), is all false. For one thing, these lists are not execution lists. They were sent to the Secretariat "for review." Consequently, many persons on these lists were not executed. This is made clear on the very web page

— <http://stalin.memo.ru/images/intro.htm> — that Kotkin cites here. The word rassmotrenie — "review" — occurs over and over again. This same web page cites the first mention of the lists, in a note from Minister of the MVD Kruglov to Khrushchev of February 3, 1954, that makes it clear they were for "review":

[[cyrillic]] Докладываю Вам, что в архивах МВД СССР обнаружено 383 списка "лиц, подлежащих суду Военной Коллегии Верховного Суда СССР." Эти списки были составлены в 1937 и 1938 годах НКВД СССР и тогда же представлены в ЦК ВКП(б) на рассмотрение.

I report to you that 383 lists of "persons subject to the trial of the Military Collegium of the Supreme Court of the USSR" have been found in the archives of the USSR Ministry of Internal Affairs. These lists were compiled in 1937 and 1938 by the NKVD of the USSR and at that time submitted to the Central Committee of the CPSU (b) for review.

According to the editors of these lists many people whose names are on them were not in fact executed, and some were freed.

[[cyrillic]] Например, выборочное изучение списка по Куйбышевской области, подписанного 29 сентября 1938 г., показало, что ни один человек из этого списка не был осужден ВК ВС, а значительная часть дел была и вовсе прекращена.

For example, a selective study of the list for the Kuibyshev oblast' signed on September 29, 1938 has shown that not a single person on this list was convicted by the VK VS (the Military Collegium of the Supreme Court), and a significant number of the cases were dismissed altogether.

Kotkin cites this web page, so he knew that these are not "execution lists." For more about the lists see Furr, Khrushchev Lied, 70-73; Furr, Yezhov vs Stalin, Chapter 7, 67-72.

It appears that these lists were sent to Stalin and the Secretariat along with investigative reports by the NKVD about the supposed progress of the fight against anti-Soviet forces. Many such reports have been published in the Lubyanka 1937-1938 volume, which Kotkin cites many times.

Many more such reports are published in the volume Lubyanka Golgofa, the valuable collection of archival documents edited by Khaustov which Kotkin never mentions. Why? Did Kotkin omit this important volume because the existence of these reports makes it clear that Yezhov and his men were lying to Stalin, duping him into believing that they were successfully combatting dangerous anti-Soviet plots? This appears to be the most likely explanation for such an omission.

Volkogonov, Triumf i Tragediia, is in error. Volkogonov wrote before the lists had been published. A summary page gives the date of the 3167 names as November 12, 1938.¹⁵

Beria Purges Yezhov's NKVD

Kotkin:

Beria, even as deputy NKVD chief, had arrested 332 NKVD leadership personnel between September and December 1938, including 140 in the central apparatus and 18 of the NKVD commissars in Union and autonomous republics. NKVD operatives still on the job became disoriented.³⁵ (588)

Note 35 (1021): Khaustov and Samuelson, Stalin, NKVD, 255-6. Of the 14,500 new NKVD employees in 1939, around 11,000 came from the party apparatus or Communist Youth League. Of the 3,460 newcomers in the central NKVD, 3,242 were party apparatchiks and Komsomol. Petrov and Skorkin, Kto rukovodil NKVD, 491-502.

Khaustov and Samuel'son document real concern by NKVD men who, serving under Yezhov, had followed orders and committed crimes against defendants. This is important material! It is a shame that Khaustov and Samuel'son did not publish the documents they refer to in their footnotes.

Petrov and Skorkin, 491-502, give a number of tables. I don't see how the figures 3460 and 3242 can be derived from them, but maybe they can be.

No "Societal Rebellion"?

The next part of this footnote is interesting!

There was no hint of societal rebellion. In early 1939, the police discovered a self-styled "fascist organization" in Moscow. Evidently, its handful of youthful members had fashioned a flag and put up seventy posters on the eve of Red Army Day, drew some graffiti, and wrote poems. They also seem to have discussed Nazism, anti-Semitism, and Russian nationalism. Four arrests were made; three of them turned out to have been nineteen years old when they joined the group, and the organizer was seventeen. The NKVD produced five volumes on the case. Rittersporn, Anguish, 174 (citing GARF, f. 5446, op. 81a, d. 335, l. 109-14).

We can't be certain that there was "no societal rebellion." This was the reason that Yezhov and at least some First Secretaries gave Stalin at the June, 1937, Central Committee Plenum for requesting the awful "special powers" that they were granted in July and that inaugurated Yezhov's mass arrests and executions.

But take another look at the quotation from Khaustov and Samuel'son, pp. 249-50, that we have cited above (p. 218) As far as I can tell, this is the only place in Kotkin's entire book that he acknowledges — even though very partially here — that Stalin was misled, duped, lied to. It undercuts his whole thesis — that the "terror" was all Stalin's idea and that he was "in control" all the time.

Rittersporn discusses, albeit very briefly, this and another conspiracy of young people. Of course, the NKVD could not have known in advance that the conspiracies involved only young people. Judging from Rittersporn's brief account, these were real conspiracies.

Kotkin:

Regime officials who had once looked to Yezhov as someone who would clean up the antiparty actions and mistakes of his predecessor viewed Beria as someone who would do the same. Releases of some people arrested under Yezhov reinforced such illusions. Stalin got credit for correcting his mistaken trust in Yezhov, and for a new, vigorous, loyal top official.⁴⁰ (588-9)

Note 40: Simonov, Glazami cheloveka moego pokoleniia, 58 (dated Feb. 27, 1979)."

This passage is actually on pp. 69-70. Simonov was a famous Soviet writer. His book on Stalin, in which Simonov puzzles over the anti-Stalin stuff he had been told since Khrushchev's day, and the much more positive opinion he had gotten during Stalin's life, was not published until the Gorbachev era.

Kotkin:

Beria's power came to exist on a completely different plane from Yezhov's or Yagoda's. Stalin, however, made sure to have non-Beriaites inserted into key positions (Sergei Kruglov, who had been on Malenkov's list of possible NKVD first deputy chiefs, got the critical post of head of NKVD personnel).⁴¹ Stalin also directed Beria to turn in the documents regarding his role in the Musavat; Beria had Merkulov collect and deliver them.⁴² (588-9)

Note 41 (1021): The Georgia NKVD was given to Avksenti Rapava, Beria's minion who had helped pulverize Abkhazia. Guruli and Tushurashvili, Correspondence, 89 (Beria to Stalin, Oct. 21, 1937).

This document is online (though not easy to find) and is completely irrelevant. It simply records Rapava's appointment. Nothing whatever is said about "pulverizing Abkhazia." Nor does Kotkin mention anything about "pulverizing Abkhazia" anywhere in this huge book. Rapava was executed under mysterious circumstances by Khrushchev in 1955.

Note 42 (1021): The transfer took place in Aug. 1938, with Beria's promotion. Merkulov: RGANI, f. 5, op. 30, d. 4, l. 76-7: letter, to Malenkov, July 23, 1953; "'Khochetsia prokliast' den' i chas moego znakomstva s Beriia,'" 101 (APRF, f. 3, op. 24, d. 465, l. 2-28); Tumshis, VChK, 211.

Merkulov's letter to Malenkov, originally published in Istochnik No. 4, 2002, has more recently been published in the collection Politbiuro i Delo Beria. Sbornik dokumentov. (M. Kuchkovo Pole, 2012), 139-151. The passage in question is on pp. 145-146. The letter is also online at the Istmat.info site: <http://istmat.info/node/22188>

Unless it too is a fabrication, like some other documents in this volume, Merkulov wrote it when he was trying to save his life by distancing himself from Beria, whom Khrushchev et al. had either murdered outright or had illegally arrested, and would try and execute in December, 1953 — along with Merkulov and others. Stalin never did anything like this judicial murder!

The Beria — Andreev — Malenkov Report

Two days later, Stalin informed USSR procurator general Vyshinsky that he wanted a public trial of those arrested in the NKVD.⁷⁹ "The enemies of the people who penetrated the organs of the NKVD," the commission on the secret police internally reported to Stalin—as if the secret police rampage had somehow occurred without his directives —"consciously distorted the punitive policy of Soviet power, conducting a mass of baseless arrests of people guilty of nothing, and at the same time protecting the activities of enemies of the people.... They urged that prisoners offer testimony about their supposed espionage activity for foreign intelligence, explaining that such invented testimony was necessary for the party and the government in order to discredit foreign states." The despot circulated the report to the inner circle: they needed to know how to interpret the terror, as the result of the infiltration of "spies in literally every [NKVD] department."⁸⁰ (595)

Note 79 (1022): Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i NKVD, 9 (APRF, f. 3, op. 57, d. 96, l. 110).

Kotkin is correct: Stalin demanded public trials for the guilty NKVD men, but the trials never took place. We don't know why. It is a great pity that such trials were not held. Yezhov's conspiracies, and his responsibility for the mass murders of the "terror," would not have become the mystery, and occasion for anti-Stalin falsification, that they are.

Note 80: Petrov and Jansen, Stalinski pitomets, 359-63 (TsA FSB, f. 3-os, op. 6, d. 1, l. 1-6); APRF, f. 3, op. 58, d. 409, l. 3-9). The commission concluded its work on Jan. 10, 1939; the report was dated Jan. 29. (1022)

The boldfaced clause in the quotation above is a false statement. The "secret police rampage" had indeed "occurred without his — Stalin's — directives," as Khaustov admitted (see quotation above).

This report by three Politburo members close to Stalin outlines their uncovering of the massive murder and torture campaign that was Yezhov's "great terror" — in Russian, the "Yezhovshchina." Petrov and Jansen, Stalinski pitomets, 359-363, is the text of the report in Russian. But who of his readers will be able to read it?

I discuss this important text fully in "The Yezhov Conspiracy," Chapter 10 of Yezhov vs Stalin. I have also translated the whole text of the report and put it online. The Russian text is also available online.¹⁶ Kotkin could have put references to these online sources for his readers but did not do so. The text of the report refutes Kotkin's notion that the Yezhovshchina was Stalin's idea.

No Evidence Of Torture Again

Kotkin:

The interrogator-torturers, who before had followed orders from Frinovsky, had set to beating out of him testimony against Yezhov, including how the latter had ordered that suspects be beaten to provide false testimony. Within a week Beria would send Stalin a forty-three-page confession written by Frinovsky; Stalin made notes on it 209 (618)

Note 209:

Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i NKVD, 33-50 (APRF, f. 3, op. 24, d. 373, l. 3-44); Petrov and Jansen, Stalinski pitomets, 204 (citing APRF, f. 3, op. 24, d. 374, l. 3-47); Stepanov, "O masshtabakh repressii" (no. 5), 61-2.

Once again Kotkin has invented this "fact" — made it up. None of these sources — or any other sources — even claim (much less contain evidence) that Frinovsky was beaten. Is Kotkin lying? Let the reader decide!

Khaustov et al. is the text of Frinovsky's statement to Beria of April 11, 1939, which we have discussed earlier in this chapter. Petrov and Jansen say nothing about any beatings or torture, only that Evdokimov, arrested in November, 1938, refrained from confessing until April 14, 1939. It's possible that, like Bukharin in his first confession of June 2, 1937, Evdokimov held out until the investigation had shown him so much evidence against him that he was convinced further resistance was futile.

The Stepanov article (Voенно-Istoricheskii Zhurnal 5, 61-62, is simply the "Spravka" of the Shvernik Commission, once again referred to in yet another published version. As we have already noted several times, it is dishonest of Kotkin to keep referring to the same document in different places, thus giving the impression that he is referring to different documents.

Here the "Spravka" briefly mentions Frinovsky's statement, while once again concealing the fact that Frinovsky reveals in this same statement that the conspiracies were genuine. Stepanov could get away with this dishonesty because his article was published in 1991, under Gorbachev, while Frinovsky's statement was not published until 2006.

Stepanov, and the "Spravka," also say nothing about any torture of Frinovsky. So this is yet another phony footnote by Kotkin. It is not just Stepanov who is covering up the fact that Frinovsky confirms that the conspiracies were real. Kotkin quotes him, and continues the cover-up of Frinovsky's revelations.

My own full translation of Frinovsky's statement has been available online since 2010.¹⁷

¹⁷ At <https://msuweb.montclair.edu/~furrgr/research/frinovskyeng.html>

Kotkin fails to refer to it. I urge readers to study it.

What "Massacre"?

Kotkin:

Altogether, more than 100 of the highest-ranking Yezhovites were massacred all of his deputies, almost all department heads in the center, almost all NKVD heads in Union republics and provinces.²¹⁴ (619)

Note 214 (1025): Nikolai P. Afanasev, USSR deputy general procurator, recalls this as taking place at Lefortovo, but all other sources indicate Yezhov was held in Sukhanovka. Ushakov and Stukalov, Front voennykh prokurorov, 69.

No one was "massacred." All of those executed, were shot after investigation and trials. There is nothing in Afanas'ev about the numbers of Yezhov's NKVD men executed. As we have noted above, Afanas'ev's text lies about other matters too and is useless as a historical source.

NKVD File On Stalin

Kotkin:

In the [Yezhov's] desk the NKVD investigator found four bullet casings, marked ZINOVIEV, KAMENEV, and SMIRNOV (two). Perhaps the greatest discovery was that in Yezhov's apartment and not in his Lubyanka safe he had kept a cache of documents from the tsarist-era Tiflis gendarmerie on "Koba." Whispers of a "file on Stalin" circulated throughout the upper ranks of the regime.²¹⁵ (619)

Note 215 (1025): Viktorov, Bez grafa [sic — should be 'grifa'] "sekretnosti," 326.

Another phony reference. There is nothing here about any "file on Stalin," talk about it, "bullet casings," etc.

Kotkin:

The nature of this file in Yezhov's possession remains unknown. For Beria, it was unclear which was more dangerous: to turn the material over to Stalin, and thus indicate that he had seen it, or to not turn it over.²¹⁶ (619)

Note 216 (1025): "Vospominaniia: memurary Nikity Sergeevicha Khrushcheva," 87; Piliatskin, "'Vrag naroda'"; Pavliukov, Yezhov, 513; Polianskii, Yezhov, 216-7. Others suggest these documents which disappeared need not have been compromising, but could have been flattering material Yezhov collected for a Stalin museum. Petrov and Jansen, Stalinski pitomets, 228.

Khrushchev does say that Stalin mentioned such information at a meeting. As for Piliatskin, there's nothing relevant in this long newspaper article, the subject of which is the attempt by Yezhov's relatives to have him "rehabilitated" in 2010.

Pavliukov mentions a file from the Tsarist secret police, or 'Okhranka,' consisting of the search for "Koba" (Stalin's revolutionary code name) and other members of the Transcaucasian organization of the Bolshevik Party. Pavliukov admits that nothing is known about what was in the file. Polianskii, 216-7, concerns a report by NKVD man Shchepilov of the contents of the search of Yezhov's apartment on April 11, 1938. It has nothing about any file on Stalin.

Petrov and Jansen, 228, suggest that Yezhov might have intended this file for a museum devoted to Stalin, rather than an attempt to find evidence that Stalin was an Okhranka informer. But Petrov and Jansen always insist that Yezhov was faithful and loyal to Stalin. This is necessary for their preconceived notion that Yezhov always did just what Stalin wanted him to do, and that therefore it was Stalin, not Yezhov, who was guilty of the mass murders.

Kotkin:

Stalin supposedly flashed the material Yezhov had gathered on him at a politburo meeting, as if Yezhov had been acting on his own in the terror's excesses.²¹⁷ (619)

Note 217 (1025): Briukhanov and Shoshkov, Opravdaniiu ne podlezhit, 132-3. Malenkov's son would assert that when his father had Yezhov's safe opened, they discovered dossiers on Malenkov as well as Stalin; the latter included the recollections of an old Bolshevik that Stalin had prerevolutionary links to the tsarist okhranka. Malenkov, O moem otse Georgii Malenkove, 34.

Briukhanov and Shoshkov, 312, has exactly the same contents as Polianskii, 216-7, already cited in the previous note. So what's the point in citing it from a different source? Malenkov, O moem otse, 34, mentions a note in a file in Yezhov's office "from an old Bolshevik" about suspicions of Stalin's ties to Tsarist Okhranka. Malenkov's son, the author of this book, was of course not present, so this is just a rumor at best.

No Evidence Of Torture — Again!

Kotkin:

... Beria delivered still more pleasing news: on April 13, 1939, Merkulov, his first deputy, finally managed to produce testimony with the signature of the stout Yefim Yevdokimov. Beria had personally gone to arrest him at his apartment on Grand Kisel Lane, 5, off Great Lubyanka, but Yevdokimov had held out for seven months, through broken legs and unceasing torture, which had continued in the prison hospital.²¹⁹ (619-20)

Note 219 (1025): Artizov et al., Reabilitatsiia, kak eto bylo, 330.

This is from the "rehabilitation report" on Evdokimov. It contains a claim — but no evidence — that he had been "tortured," which is typical of Khrushchev-era "rehabilitation" reports. But even in this report there is nothing about "broken legs and unceasing torture, which had continued in the prison hospital." Kotkin's falsifications just keep rollin' along!

Evdokimov features prominently as one of the leading conspirators in Frinovsky's statement of April, 1939. Wheatcroft, author of the most recent and most complete study of Evdokimov (2007), says nothing at all about his being tortured.¹⁸

¹⁸ Wheatcroft, Stephen G. "Agency and Terror: Evdokimov and Mass Killing in Stalin's Great Terror." Australian journal of Politics and History 53:1 (2007) 20-43.

Kotkin:

Note 220: "Tumshis and Papchinskii, 1937, 68. The former colleague was Sergei Schwarz." (1026)

This book repeats exactly what is in the source in the previous note, 219. So why use it at all, if not to create a phony appearance of scholarship?

Kotkin:

Stalin's former NKVD chief confessed to working for a veritable world gazetteer of enemy intelligence services: Germany, Britain, France, Japan, Poland. (Yezhov had in fact liquidated the Polish Communist party, on Stalin's orders.) (620)

Kotkin does not bother to cite even phony evidence for this falsehood of his. Stalin did not "order" the dissolution of the Polish Communist Party. He agreed with the decision of the ECCI¹⁹ of November 28, 1937. Stalin even complained that the decision was two years late, which suggests that he had not "ordered" it — additional evidence that Stalin was no "dictator." See Chase, Enemies Within the Gates, pp. 287-289 for more about this.

¹⁹ Executive Committee of the Communist International.

Ignoring Yezhov's Confessions

Kotkin:

On April 24, 1939, Yezhov "testified" about his "pederasty," meaning homosexual relations. ... (620)

Of all Yezhov's detailed confessions about his conspiracy against Stalin and the Soviet government, collaboration with the Germans, and mass murders of innocent Soviet citizens, Kotkin cites only this one confession about his homosexuality! Talk about bias by omission!

In note 222 (page 1026) Kotkin does refer to Yezhov's interrogation of April 26, 1939, in this way:

For Yezhov's interrogation on April 26 (by Kobulov and others), see Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i NKVD, 52-72 (APRF, f. 3, op. 24, d. 375, l. 122-64).

But Kotkin doesn't bother to summarize what Yezhov says in this confession or in the many others whose texts we now have, and have had for years. Nor does Kotkin he inform his readers that the Russian text of this interrogation of Yezhov's is online at multiple sites.²⁰

²⁰ Including the following:

<https://msuweb.montclair.edu/~furrgr/research/Yezhov042639ru.html> ;
<http://www.alexanderyakovlev.org/fond/issues-doc/58654> ;

<http://stalinism.ru/dokumentyi/soobschenie-l-p-berii-i-v-stalinu-o-n-i-ezhove-s-prilozheniem-protokola-doprosa.html>

Nor does he refer his readers to my English translation of Yezhov's April 26, 1939, confession, available since 2010.²¹ At the time of this writing (October, 2018) the only study of Yezhov's and Frinovsky's statements and confessions is my book Yezhov vs. Stalin: The Truth About Mass Repressions and the So-Called 'Great Terror' in the USSR (2016), in which I devote the whole of chapter twelve to this interrogation.

²¹ At <https://msuweb.montclair.edu/~furrgr/research/Yezhov042639eng.html>

Yezhov's confessions, like that of Frinovsky, are damning. No wonder Kotkin hides them from his readers! Here is just one example, from Frinovsky's statement to Beria of April 11, 1939.

An active participant in investigations generally, Ezhov kept himself aloof from the preparation of this trial. Before the trial the face-to-face confrontations of the suspects, interrogations, and refining, in which Ezhov did not participate. He spoke for a long time with Yagoda, and that talk concerned, in the main, of assuring Yagoda that he would not be shot.

Ezhov had conversations several times with Bukharin and Rykov and also in order to calm them assured them that under no circumstances would they be shot.

Ezhov had one conversation with Bulanov, and began this conversation in the presence of the investigator and myself, and finished the conversation one on one, having asked us to leave.

At that moment Bulanov had begun talking about the poisoning of Ezhov. What the conversation was about Ezhov did not say. When he asked us to enter again he said: "Behave yourself well at the trial — I will ask that you not be shot." After the trial Ezhov always expressed regret about Bulanov. At the time of the executions Ezhov suggested shooting Bulanov first and he himself did not enter the building where the shootings took place.

Here Ezhov unquestionably was ruled by the necessity of covering up his own ties with the arrested leaders of the Right who were going into the public trial.²²

Kotkin cites Frinovsky's statement many times. So he has deliberately withheld this and other such passages from his readers. No wonder! These confessions dismantle the Anti-Stalin Paradigm and the myth that Stalin was the architect of the Yezhovshchina and controlled it all the time.

Once Again, No Evidence Of Torture — Or Fabrication

Kotkin:

Around this time, death sentences based upon fabricated evidence were implemented for cultural figures, as well as former NKVD first deputy Mikhail Frinovsky, former deputy foreign intelligence chief Spigelglas, former intelligence chief and Comintern operative Trilisser, Yefim Yevdokimov, and Redens, Stalin's ethnic Polish brother-in-law (part of a "Polish diversionary-espionage group"). ... Under interrogation-torture, Redens had admitted his complicity in the annihilation of innocent people while working atop the NKVD in Ukraine, Moscow, and Kazakhstan. His wife—Anna Nadya's sister—and their two boys were not touched, and the family continued to live in the elite House on the Embankment and were allowed to visit Svetlana at Zubalovo (but not the Kremlin).²⁰⁴ (742)

Note 204 (1041): Zhukovskii, Lubianskaia imperia NKVD, 214-5.

Another falsehood! Kotkin has no evidence that the evidence against Frinovsky was "fabricated," any more than he does that Frinovsky was "beaten."

These pages in Zhukovskii's book are about Evdokimov, another of Yezhov's killers. Kotkin must mean pages 217-8, which are about Redens. Zhukovskii, 214-5, contains what are evidently portions of Evdokimov's statement to the court retracting his confessions. But is a person "innocent" if he retracts his confessions? Of course not! No more than a person is "guilty" because he confesses guilt.

What Evdokimov could not retract was the testimony of other witnesses against him. Both Yezhov and Frinovsky incriminated Evdokimov heavily and repeatedly.

Below we quote some of what Jansen and Petrov, two highly anticommunist and anti-Stalin authors, write in a book published by the anticommunist propaganda institute the Hoover Institution. Kotkin often quotes and cites this book. But he omits this passage:

He [Yezhov] testified himself that after arrests began within the NKVD he, together with Frinovskii, Dagin, and Evdokimov, made plans to commit a "putsch" on 7 November, the October Revolution anniversary, during the demonstration in Red Square. The plan was to cause a commotion and then in the panic and confusion to "drop bombs and kill someone of the government members."

Evdokimov gave similar evidence. According to him, in September he discussed the threatening situation after Beria's appointment with Yezhov, Frinovskii, and Bel'skii. Allegedly, they agreed to prepare an attempt on Stalin and Molotov. Yezhov was also said to have had plans to murder Beria. ... According to Ju. K. Ivanov, an NKVD executive from Evdokimov's circle, as early as late July, after a visit to Yezhov, Evdokimov had alluded to terrorism against the Party leadership. (Jansen and Petrov 155; 156)

If Kotkin had dared to cite the English translation of Frinovsky's statement to Beria of April 11, 1939, or even give its online location, his readers could see how thoroughly Frinovsky had implicated himself and many others, including Stanislav Redens, in mass murders.

The Redens File

Thanks to the efforts of researcher Vladimir L. Bobrov of Moscow, we now have Redens file from FSB archive. He was certainly guilty. Redens was "rehabilitated" in 1961 under Khrushchev and evidently at Khrushchev's command. In 1988-89, under Gorbachev, the Soviet Prosecutor's office reaffirmed his guilt and crimes. But the statute of limitations had long expired, so Redens' "rehabilitation" stands.

Redens' file has now been declassified and contains much useful evidence. See Yezhov vs. Stalin, Chapter 15: "The Testimony of Stanislav Frantsevich Redens." Redens testified at length and in detail about Yezhov's conspiracy against Stalin and the Soviet government. Redens also implicates Evdokimov. Kotkin does not mention any of this.

If Kotkin had quoted from, or even cited, the English translations of Yezhov's confessions, which have been available on the Internet since 2010, his readers would see some of the evidence that Yezhov, not Stalin, was responsible for the massive torture and executions of hundreds of thousands of innocent persons.²³

²³ Grover Furr, "The Moscow Trials and the "Great Terror" of 1937-1938: What the Evidence Shows." At https://msuweb.montclair.edu/~furrgr/research/trials_Yezhovshchina_update0710.html

Links to all of Yezhov's interrogations and confession statements that were available in 2010, in Russian and in English translation, are at the end of this article.

But Kotkin wants to hide these matters from his readers. No doubt this is because they dismantle the "Anti-Stalin Paradigm."

When You Don't Know — Invent!

Kotkin:

The principal executioner was usually Vasily Blokhin (b. 1895). The son of a poor peasant from central Russia, he had risen to become the NKVD's head executioner already in the mid-1920s and was known to insiders by his signature brown leather cap, brown leather gauntlets above the elbow, and brown leather apron. He had survived the transition from Yagoda to Yezhov, and then to Beria, although the latter had evidently tried to have him arrested as a Yezhovite, assembling the requisite compromising materials.²⁰⁵ To Blokhin fell the honor of executing Yezhov.²⁰⁶ (742)

Note 205 (1041): <http://alya-aleksej.narod.ru/index/0-181>; Voronov, "Palach v kozhanom fartuke"; Nikita Petrov, "Chelovek v kozhanom fartuke lichno rastrelial bolee desyati tysiach chelovek" <http://discussiya.com/2010/08/26/blokhin-executioner>. Stalin signed the list, containing 457 names, including Yezhov's, on Jan. 17, 1940: APRF, f. 3, op. 24, d. 177, l. 116-36.

This note is all false. Kotkin has no evidence that Blokhin shot Yezhov. There is no evidence at all for Kotkin's fact-claims at the URL he cites here, which is just a brief biographical note on Blokhin. The Voronov article is just a narrative, without any evidence. The Petrov article of 2010 claims that Blokhin shot Yezhov, but Petrov has no evidence either. And in any case, what does it matter who the executioner was?

A Shameful Article Cited

Note 206 (1041): Ushakov and Stukalov, Front voennykh prokurorov, 75 (USSR deputy military procurator Nikolai Afanasev, who was present). Among the many rumors that would circulate inside the NKVD about Yezhov's execution, one had Beria ordering that Yezhov undress and be beaten before being shot, just as Yezhov had done to humiliate his predecessor Yagoda. Kamov, "Smert' Nikolai Yezhova."

The liars had not coordinated their stories! In memoirs edited after his death — unreliable, if not simply fabricated, as we have seen earlier in this chapter, — Afanas'ev claimed that he was present at Yezhov's execution. But he says nothing about Kamov's claim that Yezhov being stripped and beaten. Kotkin does not seem to recognize — or, perhaps he hopes his readers will not recognize — the contradiction here.

Kamov does not even claim that his disgusting story about Yezhov being stripped naked and beaten is a rumor. It's just Kamov's own salacious imagination. This article is a disgrace, full of crude insults and wrong in the few instances where Kamov makes a statement (Yezhov's term of service, lack of a trial for Yezhov — both wrong.)

Kotkin has no business using such nonsense in a scholarly work. More evidence that Kotkin does not bother with source criticism. If it's viciously anti-Stalin — in it goes!

Chapter 11. Miscellaneous Topics

This chapter is concerned with Kotkin's falsifications about subjects that do not clearly fall among the topics that we have examined in previous chapters. Some of these issues, such as the Katyn Massacre, are of significant importance in themselves, while an examination of the other topics reveals that Kotkin falsifies even issues of lesser importance.

"Klim — There were no mistakes ..."

Kotkin:

Now Stalin also became the organizer of the Red Army, an innovation canonized in Voroshilov's birthday pamphlet, "Stalin and the Red Army." ... Voroshilov's draft, meanwhile, had been sent to Stalin for prior approval. The defense commissar had written that Stalin made fewer mistakes than the others. Stalin wrote back, "Klim! There were no—mistakes cut that paragraph."¹⁴⁴ (33)

Note 144 (915): Voroshilov, "Stalin i krasnaia armiiia," Izvestiia, Dec. 21, 1929, reprinted in Stalin: sbornik statei, and in Voroshilov, Lenin, Stalin, krasnaia armiiia, 41-61. Stalin himself crossed out the words that had offended him with red pencil: Voennye arkhivy Rossii, 77 (Voroshilov's adjutant Khmel'nitsky).

Though it is not an important issue in itself, this claim (in boldface above) aroused my suspicions. So I decided to check it. Voennye Arkhivy Rossii is a rare and short-lived Soviet journal from the early 1990s. Here is the passage in Voennye Arkhivy Rossii, page 77:

[[cyrillic]]Еще в рукописи Сталин был ознакомлен со статьей и сделал некоторые замечания. По утверждению Хмельницкого, бывшего адъютанта Ворошилова, в этой рукописи, которую он читал в архиве Ворошилова, написано, что в период гражданской войны «имелись успехи и недочеты, у И. В. Сталина ошибок было меньше, чем у других.» Эта фраза, как сообщает Хмельницкий, зачеркнута красным карандашом и рукою Сталина написано:

«Клим! Ошибок не было, надо выбросить этот абзац. Ст.».

Stalin was acquainted with the article even in manuscript and made some comments. According to Khmel'nitsky, Voroshilov's former adjutant, in this manuscript, which he read in Voroshilov's archive, it is written that during the Civil War "there were successes and shortcomings, and Stalin had fewer errors than the others." This phrase, according to Khmel'nitsky, is crossed out with a red pencil and Stalin's hand says: "Klim! There were no mistakes. Cut this paragraph. St."

VAR cites no source so I searched the Russian-language Internet. This tale is cited in an article in the fanatically anticommunist and anti-Stalin newspaper Novaya Gazeta.¹ An article dated February 26, 2013 is titled: "'Klim! There were no mistakes. Cut this paragraph.' How Stalin Defeated Pilsudskii."² There we read:

[[cyrillic]]Слава богу, тов. Сталин при всей его загруженности нашел время просмотреть и лично отредактировать рукопись. «Клим! Ошибок не было. Надо выбросить этот абзац», терпеливо разъясняет он на полях ворошиловского текста (И. Сталин, Соч., т. 17. Тверь, «Северная Корона," 2004 г. С. 326).

Thank God that comrade Stalin, despite all his other duties, found time to read through and personally edit the MS. 'Klim! There were no mistakes. Cut this paragraph', — he patiently explained on the margins of Voroshilov's text. Q. Stalin. Works, vol. 17. "Severnaia Korona," 2004, p. 326)

This specific edition of Stalin's Collected Works is not easy to locate! But I managed to do so. Here is what is stated there:

[[сугилlic]]Надпись на черновике статьи К.Е. Ворошилова "Сталин и Красная Армия" (декабрь 1929 года):

ПРИМЕЧАНИЕ

Речь идет об утверждении Ворошилова, что "у И.В. Сталина ошибок было меньше, чем у других."

Inscription on the draft of the article by K.E. Voroshilov, "Stalin and the Red Army (December 1929).

Klim! There were no mistakes. Cut this paragraph. St.

Voенno-istoricheskii Arkhiv. 1997. Issue 1, p. 221.

NOTE

The subject is Voroshilov's assertion that "Stalin had fewer errors than the others."

The contents of this issue of Voенno-istoricheskii Arkhiv are exactly the same as those of Voennye Arkhivy Rossii! Once again it's the "Spravka" (Report) of the Shvernik Commission. We have already seen that Kotkin cites this one document repeatedly in his footnotes in a half-dozen different publications, as though these were different sources.³

³ In the authoritative edition of this work, in RKEB 2, the passage is on page 709.

So this is a circular, and therefore dishonest, citation. There is no source, and therefore no verification — it is all hearsay, rumor. Hearsay does not become more "truthful" when repeated in various sources, and in this case it's all the same source.

Conclusion: There is no evidence that Stalin ever wrote these words on a draft of Voroshilov's article. Indeed, it seems likely that he did not, for if he did, why has the page that — allegedly — Khmelnitsky saw, not been reproduced, or its archival identifiers cited? Or, why are we not told when, where, and to whom Khmelnitsky allegedly made this remark?

And how can Kotkin accept this kind of stuff as evidence in a serious work of history?

Stalin Was No Dictator: Contested Elections

With Stalin's primary aim accomplished, the plenum switched gears. Zhdanov had reported (February 26) on the upcoming elections by secret ballot to party posts (for May), a way to mobilize pressure from below against sitting officials, as well as elections to soviets. "We lack the habits of direct elections and secret ballots," he admitted. One plenum attendee, trying to convey the immensity of the organizational undertaking, reminded the plenum of the 1917 vote for the Constituent Assembly. Stalin pointed out that the class enemy could be elected, especially given that some collective farms had no Communist party members. "Keep in mind that our country has two million Communists and a 'bit more' non-party people," Zhdanov noted of the scores of millions of non-party adults.⁷⁴ He even alluded to the days when Bolshevism had had to survive in the underground.⁷⁵ It was a surreal discussion: no one was forcing the monopoly regime to stage competitive elections by secret ballot. (368)

Here is an interesting and important matter! Stalin and the Party leadership were promoting "competitive elections by secret ballot." The most obvious interpretation of this fact is that Stalin and the Party leadership did not want dictatorship. Rather, they wanted a form of representative democracy similar to that in many capitalist states.

Surely this is worthy of some comment. Yet Kotkin — who concedes the fact — makes none! This is bias by omission. For Stalin had in fact been promoting the desirability of contested elections by secret ballot to be guaranteed in the new Constitution. What's more, Stalin and his supporters in the leadership had been campaigning for contested elections with the Central Committee.

This is the central point of discussion in Russian historian Yuri Zhukov's book Inoi Stalin, "A Different Stalin," (2002), which Kotkin cites a half-dozen times in his footnotes. Therefore, Kotkin knows that Stalin had been championing the principle of secret, contested elections for several years.

But Kotkin conceals this from his readers. No doubt he does so because this fact undermines the Anti-Stalin Paradigm, according to which Stalin must be a "dictator" or, in Kotkin's absurd term, a "despot." After all, what kind of dictator mounts a determined struggle for secret, contested elections — and then loses that struggle?

Kotkin:

In December 1937, the USSR held elections for the new bicameral Supreme Soviet, a permanent body to replace the Congress of Soviets. There were 569 seats in the soviet of the Union and 574 in the soviet of nationalities, both elected on the basis of universal suffrage.²¹⁶ The provision for multiple candidates had been unceremoniously dropped.²¹⁷ (471)

Note 216 (1005): The Soviet of Nationalities was to be filled by representatives of the union and the autonomous republics without regard to their size or population.

Note 217 (1005): Pavlova, "1937." As one soldier in the Soviet Far East aptly commented, according to an NKVD report, "So Stalin says that's the way it will be and then everything is democratic." Merritt, "Great Purges," 168.

Pavlova's long article concludes that the contested elections, even if held, could not have led to a change of power. But that, of course, is not the point. Elections in capitalist countries do not put the capitalist system "up for grabs." Pavlova does not mention this fact. Likewise, under the secret, contested elections that Stalin and his supporters envisaged, the socialist system would not have been put at risk. The winners, even if non-communists, would certainly not have been allowed to restore capitalism.

"Merritt" is a Ph.D. dissertation done under Arch Getty's direction in 2000. It is a very interesting study! At this point Merritt is examining some documents concerning the nationwide discussion about the proposed Constitution which was encouraged and which actually took place throughout the whole USSR. However, the soldier's cynical remark, quoted by Merritt, was not at all "apt." For Stalin really did support secret, contested elections.

In Inoi Stalin Zhukov explains, using primary source evidence, how Stalin and his supporters in the central leadership, including Malenkov, Molotov, and Zhdanov, failed to persuade the Central Committee of the desirability of secret, contested elections. Zhukov identifies the exact time and place Stalin capitulated — in Stalin's office on the evening of October 11, 1937.

So why does Kotkin not inform his readers of this fact? Undoubtedly because it does not fit the "Anti-Stalin Paradigm" — it contradicts the false, but obligatory, image of Stalin as "dictator."

As does the fact that Stalin lost this struggle! What kind of "dictator" supports democracy? And what kind of "dictator" loses a political struggle on a point so important to him?⁴ In fact, the form of representative democracy proposed by Stalin is both characteristic of that of Western capitalist societies, and yet more democratic than they.

⁴ A fuller discussion of this issue can be found in Grover Furr, "Stalin and the Struggle for Democratic Reform" (two parts) in Cultural Logic (2005). Kotkin Omits Yakov Yakovlev's Confession

Yakov Yakovlev had been Commissar of Agriculture, and then played a very important role in drafting the 1936 Constitution, during which time he worked very closely with Stalin. Upon seeing the subhead above readers of Kotkin's book may turn to their copy and look for Yakovlev's confession in the index. It's not there. Kotkin never breaths a word about it.

Yet this document is one of the most important documents in the Lubianka 1937-1938 volume that Kotkin cites so often. In it Yakovlev not only confesses to being a member of the clandestine bloc of Rights and Trotskyites. Yakovlev also confesses to having been a Trotskyist "sleeper" in the Party, appointed by Trotsky in 1923 to drop all ties to Trotskyists and "bore from within." Yakovlev also confesses to having been recruited by German intelligence because — as the German agent told him — the Germans were already working with Trotsky, and demanded to work with Yakovlev on the same basis.

The charge that Trotsky was collaborating with Hitler's German government had been one of the main accusations at the First and Second Moscow Trials of August, 1936, and January, 1937. In service to the ASP this charge has long been dismissed as false, a fabrication by Stalin and a slander on Trotsky. Yakovlev's confession statement, as well as Stalin's comments on it, also recorded in the Lubianka 1937-1938 volume, comprise an important item in the mass of evidence we now possess that this charge against Trotsky is true.

Why does Kotkin omit all mention of this dramatic document? No doubt because, once again, it contradicts the ASP: the notion, accepted by all "right-thinking" historians, that Stalin "fabricated" all the charges against the Moscow Trials defendants and surely must have also fabricated the charge that Trotsky was conspiring with Hitler's Germany.

On pages 86-90 of my book Yezhov vs. Stalin and on pages 112-124 of Leon Trotsky's Collaboration with Germany and Japan I study Yakovlev's confession in some detail. I include a translation of all the important sections, an analysis of Stalin's remarks on it, and a study of the evidence of Trotsky's collaboration with Hitler's Germany and militarist Japan.

Incidents in the February-March 1937 Central Committee Plenum

Kotkin devotes just a few pages to this very important, and very lengthy, Plenum. Those are worthy of study because of Kotkin's glaring falsifications and bias by omission.

Kotkin:

Turar Ryskulov, an ethnic Kazakh candidate member of the Central Committee and the long-standing deputy chairman of the Council of People's Commissars for the Russian republic, quietly tried to persuade some plenum attendees to come to the defense of Rykov and Bukharin, but he could not manage to do so.⁶⁸ (387)

Note 68 (992): Khaustov and Samuelson, Stalin, NKVD, 143.

Khaustov and Samuel'son do not have any evidence, not even an archival document, to support this statement. Kotkin just "takes their word for it" Kotkin also fails to inform his readers that a few pages earlier (135) Khaustov and Samuel'son reveal that Ryskulov was arrested in June, 1937, as a participant in the Rightist conspiracy. Ryskulov was named in a letter to Stalin of July 27, 1937, from L.I. Mirzoian, Secretary of the Kazakhstan Party, as a member of a "national-fascist organization. He was named in an interrogation-confession by P.T. Zubarev, who revealed some Socialist-Revolutionaries who were also in this conspiracy. Ryskulov features prominently in the confession of Khodzhaev, CC member and an official in the Uzbek SSR. O. IA. Nodev, head of the Turkmenistan NKVD, informed Stalin that Ryskulov was involved in a Trotskyist organization there.

All of this is in the volume Lubianka 1937-1938, which Kotkin often cites, though not about Ryskulov. (272; 283; 418; 463; 487) It explains Ryskulov's solicitousness for Rykov and Bukharin — they were leaders of the Rightist conspiracy of which he, Ryskulov, was a member. And once again, Kotkin fails to inform his readers about this.

Who Cares What You "Believe"?

A reader may think: "But probably Kotkin does not believe these accusations against Ryskulov were honest, and that's why he keeps quiet about them?" Once again, this is the argument from incredulity. What's "belief" got to do with it? A historian does not simply relate that information that s/he "believes." The historian's responsibility is to consider all the evidence in an objective manner, setting their own biases and preconceived ideas aside. Kotkin makes no attempt to do this, and it ruins his book.

Rykov's Words Invented

Kotkin:

At the plenum (February 24), Rykov denied the scurrilous accusations and called the mockery of him "a savage thing," given that he was already effectively condemned to death (he pointed out that others had confessed and been shot anyway). (387)

This statement by Kotkin is completely false. Here is the passage in question:

[[cyrillic]]"Эта ответственность на мне есть, я ее не снимаю, ответственность огромная, ибо то, что произошло теперь в партии и в стране, оно свидетельствует отнюдь не о малом. И иметь больший позор, чем тот, что многие из этих людей делали эти отвратительные штуки, ориентируясь на меня, это ужасная вещь.⁵

"This responsibility is on me, I do not remove it. An enormous responsibility, because what has happened now in the party and in the country, is no small thing. And to have a greater shame than the fact that many of these people [who] were doing these hideous things, referring to me, is a terrible thing."

Kotkin actually purveys two falsehoods here.

* It is the "shame," not the accusations, that is the "terrible thing" (Kotkin translates it as "savage" — a mistranslation; savage is "dikii," not "uzhasnyi.>").

* There is nothing here about Rykov's "pointing out that others had confessed and been shot anyway"!

Apparently Kotkin has simply invented this — made it up! But how are his readers to know, unless they check the footnotes, find Rykov's statement in the voluminous records of the February-March, 1937, Central Committee Plenum, and then read them — in Russian? They won't!

So this is a real swindle — the readers expect the truth; Kotkin gives them falsehoods. Is it "lying"? Let the reader decide.

Concealing Stalin's Leniency Towards Bukharin

Kotkin:

Stalin intervened at the plenum (February 27) to recommend a seeming middle ground whereby Bukharin and Rykov would not be immediately put on trial, but turned over to the NKVD for further "investigation." ... The pair spent the remainder of the proceedings at the Lubyanka inner prison while Stalin formed a special commission of the plenum to adjudicate their fate.⁷¹ Bukharin's expulsion from the Central Committee and his disposition to the NKVD were duly upheld by the commission, whose members included Mikoyan (chairman), Maria Ulyanova, and Krupskaya.⁷² (387)

Note 71 (992): Kosheleva et al., "Materialy fevral'-martovskogo plenuma TsKVKP (b) 1937 goda," (1994, no. 1): 12-3. Stalin's recommendation was fixed in a formal plenum resolution on March 3: RGASPI, f. 17, op. 2, d. 577, l. 4 (l. 30-3 draft with corrections).

Note 72 (992): "O partiinosti lits, prokhodivshikh po delu tak nazyvaemogo 'antisovetskogo pravotrotskitskogo bloka,'" 82-3; Stranitsy istorii (Leningrad: Lenizdat, 1990), 18; Galumov, Neizvestnye "Izvestiia," 185.

More "bias by omission." Kotkin cites Getty & Naumov, The Road to Terror, many times. But not here, though it would be helpful for his readers, since it is in English.

Getty and Naumov, 409-419, (and, in Russian, Pykhalov and Bobrov⁶) point out that Stalin did not "recommend a seeming middle ground," as Kotkin falsely claims. Rather, Stalin supported the most lenient punishment for Bukharin and Rykov: not even imprisonment but only "internal exile" to some small city. Others, including some later convicted as conspirators, were for a trial or even for execution!

In the initial polling of thirty-six members of the commission, six spoke for executing Bukharin and Rykov. Eight, including the particularly vituperative Postyshev and Shkiriakov, were for arresting and trying Bukharin and Rykov but for sentencing them to prison rather than to death. Sixteen members either expressed no opinion or their votes were not recorded.

It is the remaining group that is especially intriguing. As the first draft indicates, five members were "for the suggestion of Comrade Stalin." But what was that suggestion? In the original document, Stalin spoke against the death penalty, a prison sentence, or even a trial, and for the relatively lenient punishment of internal exile. In the final version, Stalin's modified "suggestion" had become the final decision not to send them to trial but to turn the matter of Bukharin and Rykov over to the NKVD for further investigation. ... This was the third time that Stalin had personally intervened to avoid unambiguously condemning Bukharin. (Getty & Naumov, 416)

⁶ Igor' Pykhalov, Vladimir L. Bobrov, 'Yakir i Bukharin: Spletni i Dokumenty' [Yakir and Bukharin: Rumors and Documents"], Chapter 6 in Pykhalov's book Velikii obolgannyi vozhd'. Lozh' i pravda o Staline. (Moscow: Yauza-Press, 2010), and online at multiple sites including <http://www.duel.ru/publish/new/lit/stalin/yak.htm> (For this site select Text Encoding Cyrillic-ISO; accessed 11.24.18).

Kotkin knows that it was Stalin who wanted the most lenient punishment for Bukharin and Rykov. Yet Kotkin follows the paragraph above with this sentence: "Perhaps Stalin might now be satiated?" What dishonesty!

Moreover, Stalin was out-voted and had to compromise. Some "dictator!"

What about the scholarly-looking archival identifier in note 71:

RGASPI, f. 17, op. 2, d. 577, l. 4 (l. 30-3 draft with corrections).

Did Kotkin really see it? Probably not. A facsimile of this document is in Getty and Naumov, 414-415, and the document identified in note 45 on p. 412. All Kotkin had to do was to copy it down. Then — but only if he were unusually careful — he could have checked it against other sources such as Pykhalov and Bobrov, (see previous footnote), where the same document is reproduced and the same archival identifiers given.

So why give archival identifiers at all, when Kotkin could have simply said: "See Getty and Naumov, 414-5." Because they make his book look "scholarly"?

Finally: why does Kotkin write "a seeming middle way"? What was "seeming" — i.e., specious, unreal — about Stalin's proposal, the mildest and most lenient of all the proposals? We are forced to conclude that this is just a dishonest "cheap shot" by Kotkin.

The "Torture Telegram"

Kotkin:

Stalin had some second thoughts. "The Central Committee has learned," he wrote in a telegram to all locales (January 10, 1939), "that the secretaries of provinces and territories, checking on the work of the local NKVD, have charged them with using physical means of interrogation against those arrested as if it were a crime." He informed them that the "physical methods" had been approved by "the Central Committee" and agreed to by "the Communist parties of all the republics" (whose leaders had almost all been shot as foreign agents and wreckers). "It is known that all bourgeois intelligence services apply physical coercion with regard to representatives of the socialist proletariat, and in the ugliest forms," he stressed. "One might ask why the socialist intelligence service must be more humane with regard to inveterate agents of the bourgeoisie."⁸⁴ (595)

Note 84 (1022): Khaustov et al., Lubyanka: Stalin i NKVD, 14-5 (APRF, f. 3, op. 58, d. 6, 1. 145-6); Volkogonov papers, Hoover Institution Archives, container 27; Iakovlev et al., Reabilitatsiia: Politicheskie protsessy, 40-1 (a copy of the telegram found in the Dagestan regional party committee: all such documents had to be returned to the Central Committee, so this one evidently survived thanks to negligence); Sluzhba bezopasnosti, 1993, no. 6: 2; Afanas'ev, Inogo ne dano, 561-2n2 (wrong date of Jan. 20, 1939). Kaganovich later testified (in 1957) that Stalin had written out the decree by hand. Kovaleva et al., "Posledniaia 'antipartiinaia' gruppa," 86-9.

This shows either real incompetence, or real dishonesty — or both! — on Kotkin's part. Years ago I put the archival copy of this document — this is the Volkogonov Papers reference — online.⁷ You don't need to know Russian to notice a few things.

- In Khrushchev Lied, 330-331, I translate this document, with analysis showing that it cannot be from the "Dagestan regional party committee." Kotkin has misread the text and discussion in the book Molotov, Malenkov, Kaganovich 1957, 121-2, a book that he footnotes elsewhere, though not here. That suggests that this document may well have been a forgery. See the additional discussion in Khrushchev Lied 75-80 and 328-332, "28. "Torture Telegram."
- Anyone can see that it is not signed by Stalin.
- There is a date on this supposed 1939 document of "8.II. 1956" — just prior to the XX Party Congress and Khrushchev's "Secret Speech," in which he attacked Stalin for this telegram.
- The document also carries a statement that "two additional copies were typed" on that date. That language suggests that this is also a copy. It looks like a copy. The typewriter type of the text and the date appear to be the same. Also what archivist would type directly on an archival copy of an important government document?
- The telegram is just mentioned, and one section of it quoted, in R-PP, 40-1. What's the point of citing this old, 1991 volume, published before the documents became available? Afanas'ev, Inogo ne dano (1988), 561-2 note 2, merely summarizes this telegram while falsely stating that it supports Gorbachev's October, 1987, statement that Stalin "knew about the illegal acts of the NKVD."

Once again, Kotkin's deception here is through bias by omission. For, just as Khrushchev did in his infamous "Secret Speech" to the XX Party Congress on February 25, 1956, Kotkin omits the boldfaced passage (below) from the telegram, which occurs immediately after "approved by 'the Central Committee'":

At the same time it was stated that physical pressure is permitted as an exception and, in addition, only in relation to blatant enemies of the people who, taking advantage of the humane method of interrogation, stubbornly refuse to give up their co-conspirators; who refuse to confess for months; and who strive to slow down the discovery of conspirators who are still at large; and so continue their struggle against Soviet power even from prison. Experience has shown that this policy has produced results by greatly speeding up the exposure of enemies of the people. It is true that subsequently in practice the method of physical pressure was sullied by the scum Zakovsky, Litvin, Uspensky, and others, because they turned it from an exception into a rule and employed it against honest people who had been accidentally arrested. For these abuses, they have been duly punished. But this does not invalidate the method itself, insofar as it is employed correctly in practice. (Khrushchev Lied, 331)

Why did Khrushchev omit this passage? Because in it Stalin limits the application of "the use of physical pressure" and attacks Yezhov's NKVD men, identifying three of them by name, as "scum."

Khrushchev could get away with this — the full text of this "torture telegram" was not published until Gorbachev's day. We know Khrushchev was a liar and faker. What is to be said about Kotkin?

Was Mention of Krupskaja Banned from the Soviet Press?

Kotkin writes:

As a member of the Central Committee, Krupskaya had approved the expulsions and death sentences of Trotsky, Zinoviev, Kamenev, and Bukharin.¹¹⁹ With her death, Stalin had a chocolate factory named after her. Orders went out to the Soviet press: "Do not print another word about Krupskaya."¹²⁰

To the Soviet press? Here is Kotkin's source:

Note 120 (1023): 120. Zhukov, Vsesoiuznoe soveshchanie, 260.

This is a Khrushchev-era collection of essays intended to instruct Party historians how to discuss Soviet history in light of the attacks on Stalin and his former Politburo supporters Kaganovich, Molotov, Malenkov, and Voroshilov, at the XXII Party Congress in October, 1961.⁸ In his "closing words" Petr Pospelov, a Khrushchev flunky, responded to a note from the audience:

The next note: "Why can't normal conditions for working in the Central Party Archive be arranged? They do not give out materials on the activities of the Party."

⁸ Vsesoiuznoe soveshchanie o merakh uluchshenia podgotovki nauchno-pedagogicheskikh kadrov po istoricheskim naukam. 18-21 dekabria 1962 g. M: Izdatel'stvo "Nauka," 1964.

Pospelov's response was: "I have already answered this question." (298) Here he meant his answer to the previous question, in which he had referred the questioner to the documents of the XXII Party Congress.

So even these official Party historians were not allowed into the Party Archive! And today we understand why. The release of a flood of documents since the end of the Soviet Union 1991 has shown that the primary source documents in the Party Archive prove that Khrushchev and his men were lying. For example, we know now that Aleksandr Shelepin, a high-ranking Party official and former Chair of the KGB under Khrushchev, quoted Komandarm Iona Iakir's letter to Stalin white omitting the paragraphs in which Iakir admits to committing treason.

Is it true that, as Kotkin claims, "orders go out to the Soviet press" not to "print another word about Krupaskaia"? Here is the passage from page 260, cited by Kotkin. This was spoken by Anna G. Kravchenko, who was editor of an adult-education magazine:

When Nadezhda Konstantinovna died, she was buried with honors. As you will probably remember, the urn with her ashes was even carried onto Red Square by Stalin. But then, the next day, the chief of the publishing house of the People's Commissariat of Education came to me (I was then editor of the magazine "School for Adults") and said: "Do not print another word more about Krupaskaia." (260)

So what Kotkin writes isn't true. No "orders went out to the Soviet press" not to print anything about Krupaskaia. At most, an order went out from a minor official to the editor of a minor journal of adult education.

Kotkin doesn't try to verify this statement — and he could have done so, because this journal, Shkola vzroslykh, is held by the University of Illinois at Urbana. But instead of checking it, Kotkin falsifies it, claiming that the whole Soviet press was ordered to keep silent about Krupaskaia!

This is yet another of Kotkin's phony footnotes. His readers will not locate the Zhukov volume and check the reference, so they will never know. What's more, even Kotkin doesn't believe it, for in the very next footnote, number 121, we read:

Nonetheless, Stalin would permit remembrance of the first anniversary of Krupskaya's death: see the news chronicle, RGAFKFD film 1-3163. (1023)

"German Political Refugees" Handed Over To The Nazis?

Kotkin writes:

Stalin also had Beria extradite 4,000 German political refugees sought by the Nazis. Many were Jewish, and at least 1,000 were Communists. They and their family members would be handed over in ceremonies at the frontier bridge at Brest-Litovsk. Let Hitler expend the bullets.

Kotkin's paragraph here is false in every detail.

Kotkin cites no evidence — not even phony evidence — for this claim. This anticommunist fairy-tale comes from Margarete Buber-Neumann, whose husband Hans Neumann had been arrested, convicted, and executed for participating in an anti-Soviet conspiracy. She survived World War II and wrote bitterly anticommunist books during the post-war period.

Buber-Neumann had quit the communist party before being extradited to Germany. So she was not a communist when the Soviets deported her.

One of those deported with Buber-Neumann was Betti Ol'berg, whose husband, Valentin Ol'berg, had been a defendant in the August 1936 First Moscow Trial, where he had admitted to plotting to assassinate Stalin. We now have much more evidence about him, and one confession by Betti Ol'berg herself, where she makes it clear that she knew what her husband had been planning.⁹ It is interesting that she was not executed, possibly because she had cooperated with the investigation in 1936.

⁹ "Transcript of interrogation of Betti Ottovna Ol'berg of April 26, 1936. In Politbi u ro i Lev Trot s kii: (sbornik dokumentov) 1923-1940 gg. Ed. Oleg Mozokhin. Prague: Sociosfera-CZ, 2013. Vol. 2, 239-40. This interrogation is not in the one-volume version of this collection, with the same title, published in Moscow by IstLit publishers in 2017.

Wilhelm Mensing, an anticommunist German historian, has thoroughly researched this issue. I have put his German-language article online.¹⁰ Here are a few sentences from Mensing's conclusion (translation by me, GF):

"No '500 bitter opponents of Hitler' were deported to Germany ... a little over 300 [persons were deported]..."

"The Nazi regime did not punish most of those deported." "The deportations of 1939-1941 were not aimed at communists." "There is no indication that the [Molotov-Ribbentrop non-aggression] Pact was the motivation for the deportations."

"There is no evidence that those deported from the USSR to Germany in 1939-1941 were persecuted there. On the contrary, there is evidence that some of them, including former communists, were not molested."

Kotkin claims that 4000 "German political refugees" were deported. The real number? 300! All those checked by Mensing had been convicted of some crime or other. This was part of a prisoner exchange between the Soviet Union and Germany.

Mensing's article was published in 2011, in plenty of time for Kotkin to have read it. Did he read it, and just decide not to inform his readers? Or is he ignorant of the whole issue — in which case he should not have written about it at all? Who knows?

The Katyn Massacre

Many of the falsehoods in Kotkin's book did not originate with him. Rather, Kotkin has simply lifted false accounts from other researchers. That is, Kotkin has not himself researched, or even verified, his accounts of many events in his book. Nevertheless, like any historian Kotkin is responsible for whatever he puts into his own book. He could, and should, have verified all the fact-claims and checked all references.

One such event is the Katyn Massacre, the killing of thousands of Polish officers. In 1943 the Germans, abetted by the anticommunist London Polish Government In Exile, blamed this on the Soviets. In January, 1944, the Soviets blamed the Germans. In the last years of the USSR Mikhail Gorbachev and his cronies decided to go along with the anticommunist and Polish nationalist line and blame Stalin and the Soviets. This is now the "official version."

Kotkin's version of "Katyn" is on pages 744-5. Kotkin repeats the "Soviets-did-it" version and cites only secondary sources. Kotkin cites no research of his own at all about Katyn, which has to mean that he has not done any. He simply ignores the research by Russian scholars who have been arguing for more than 20 years now that the "Soviets-did-it" version of Katyn is a fabrication.

One of the most prominent of these researchers is Professor Valentin Sakharov of Moscow University, author of a monumental study of "Testament of Lenin." In the first volume of his Stalin biography Kotkin relies heavily on Sakharov's study, checks many of Sakharov's references, and concludes that Sakharov is correct — the so-called "Testament of Lenin" is indeed a forgery.

But here Kotkin ignores Sakharov's research on Katyn, which goes far to demolish the "Soviets-did-it" version. Kotkin repeats the Polish nationalist story that when asked about the Polish POWs Merkulov and Beria told somebody — one person named is Zygmunt Berling — "we made a big mistake with them." (795) Kotkin fails to inform his readers that Merkulov derisively denied this remark when under interrogation in 1953 (Politbiuro i delo Beria, 130).

"Katyn" is one of the most heavily falsified anticommunist horror-stories, and also one of the most influential. After years of studying Katyn and becoming more aware of the contradictions in the "official" version, I published a short article about it in 2013; a short book about it in 2015; and a much fuller book-length study in 2018.¹¹ Examining all the accounts of Katyn, including all those Kotkin cites and a great many more, was a fascinating task! The result is unequivocal: The Soviets could not possibly have killed the Poles. Therefore, the Germans did it. I refer the reader to my 2018 book.

¹¹ "The 'Official' Version of the Katyn Massacre Disproven? Discoveries at a German Mass Murder Site in Ukraine!" Socialism and Democracy 27, 2 (2013), 96-129; Le massacre de Katyn. Une refutation de la version

"officielle"? Paris: Editions Delga, 2015; The Mystery of the Katyn Massacre: The Evidence, the Solution. Kettering, OH: Erythrós Press & Media LLC, 2018.

Kotkin, however, has clearly never studied the Katyn issue. He just repeats the falsified version supported by Polish nationalists and by Mikhail Gorbachev. It is the only version acceptable to the Anti-Stalin Paradigm.

The Suicide of Stalin's Wife

Stalin's wife Nadezhda (Nadya) Allilueva committed suicide in 1932. This leads Kotkin, as it has other anticommunist falsifiers, to fabricate stories about supposed tensions between Stalin and his wife.

Kotkin:

The effects of her exposure to the student milieu—young women in the city selling themselves to make ends meet; students with ties to the famine-stricken countryside remain difficult to gauge. She kept an emotional distance.³¹⁷ (109)

Note 317 (936) has nothing remotely related to "young women selling themselves." So this remark is a "cheap shot." And weren't young women selling themselves in every city in the capitalist world in 1932? Only in note 321, on page 936, does Kotkin tell us that Nadya had "several times threatened to commit suicide." In this footnote Kotkin quotes from Vladimir Alliluev's book (see below) that her suicidal threats were caused by headaches, due to a disease of the cranial sutures, not from any tension with her husband.

Though Kotkin cites Vladimir Alliluev's book on Stalin's family, he does not mention the passage where Alliluev says that Stalin and Nadya "loved each other."

[[cyrillic]]В нашей"то семье знали, что Надежда и Сталин любили друг друга.

But in our family we knew that Nadezhda and Stalin loved each other.

Stalin and his wife raised Artem Sergeev, orphan of a Bolshevik hero, in his household as one of their own children. Sergeev wrote about Nadya's migraines and how, in his view, they caused her to commit suicide.¹² He says that Nadya had been looking forward to life after graduation. Kotkin cites Sergeev's book (1107) but ignores what Sergeev wrote about Stalin's wife and her death.

¹² Artem Sergeev, Ekaterina Glushik. Besedy o Staline. Moscow: Krymskii Most 9-D Forum, 2006, 38.

Kotkin gives no evidence at all for this statement:

Svetlana's subsequent account, unreliable in most respects, rightly surmised that her father "was too intelligent not to know that people always commit suicide to punish someone."³⁴⁸ (112)

Svetlana Allilueva's memoirs are indeed not reliable on a number of topics that can be checked. But this statement is not even a fact-claim, only a subjective assessment. What's it doing here? Evidently, its purpose for Kotkin is to make it seem as though there was hostility between Stalin and his wife.

Kotkin does include the following anecdote that shows Stalin's strong love for his wife and attacks Svetlana Allilueva's credibility, though he buries it in a footnote:

One of his bodyguards recalled late in life that Stalin would sit for long periods at Nadya's grave at Moscow's Novodevichy Cemetery. Svetlana asserted that her father never visited the grave. Stalin (film by Thames Television, London, 1990); Alliluyeva, Twenty Letters, 113. (Note 348, page 937)¹³

¹³ Sergeev, 39, also testifies to Stalin's weeping and deep sadness at his wife's death.

But then Kotkin continues with another falsehood:

Some writers have asserted that a copy of Ryutin's appeal denouncing her husband was found in Nadya's room. Radzinsky, Stalin, 296 (quoting a Vlasik interview with N. Antipenko); Rayfield, Stalin and his Hangmen, 239-40. (937)

There is no evidence for this at all in Rayfield, who just asserts it on page 240 of his book. Eduard Radzinsky, whose biography of Stalin (Russian edition, as used by Kotkin), has no evidence for this claim either:

[[cyrillic]]Начальник личной охраны Сталина генерал Власик в беседе с историком Н. Антипенко рассказал: «Надежда принесла домой из Промакадемии и показала Сталину подброшенное ей на занятиях рютинское обращение к партии, где Сталина именовали агентом, провокатором и прочее.»

Further, the commander of Stalin's bodyguard, N. Vlasik, told the historian Dr. N. Antipenko that Nadezhda once brought home and showed to Stalin a copy of Ryutin's appeal to the Party which had been slipped to her in a class at the Industrial Academy, and in which Stalin was called an "agent provocateur" and much else.

But Vladimir Alliluev, whose book, Khronika odnoi sem'i (Story of one family) Kotkin cites five times, wrote this:

[[cyrillic]]А вот версия о том, что на тумбочке в спальне Надежды лежал экземпляр "Платформы Рютина," который ей мог дать сам Сталин, вполне убедительна. (31)

But the story that on the nightstand in Nadezhda's bedroom there lay a copy of the "Riutin Platform," which Stalin himself may well have given to her, is fully convincing.

Kotkin ignores this statement, though it directly addresses the issue Kotkin himself has raised. Evidently Kotkin does not wish to portray Stalin as either a loving husband or a person who would give his wife Opposition literature that contained bitter attacks on himself.

Trotsky Lied! Stalin Not So Much

From remote Prinkipo, his [Leon Trotsky's] exposure of the Soviet regime's lies reverberated around the world-and inside Stalin's office.
19 (13)

Kotkin has no evidence that there were such "lies" or that Trotsky "exposed" them. In reality it was Trotsky, not Stalin, who was lying.¹ Trotsky claimed that Stalin was lying but not a single one of his claims has been proven to be true. (We have discussed the contents of note 19 in Chapter Four).

Who "Violated the Versailles Treaty"?

Secret military cooperation with Germany, in violation of the Versailles Treaty, had been under way for years. (21)

Germany did indeed violate the Versailles Treaty. But unlike Germany, Soviet Russia/ USSR was not a signatory to the Versailles Treaty and so was not bound by its provisions. Therefore, Soviet Russia did not violate it.

Most of Kotkin's readers will not know this. He should have explained it to them. Why didn't he? In order to give the (false) impression that Soviet Russia (after December 30, 1922, the USSR) had also violated it?

Was the Shakhty Trial A Frame-up?

In conspiring with the dictator to manufacture the 1928 Shakhty trial, Yevdokimov had become an all-Union star (and in 1930 would receive his fourth Order of the Red Banner).⁸¹ (23)

Note 18 (914): 81. Papchinskii and Tumshis, Shchit, raskolotii mechom, 208-9.

Even Papchinskii and Tumshis — the very source that Kotkin cites here — say that Stalin believed this was a real conspiracy:

[[cyrillic]]Изучив документы~ Сталин объявил: «Для меня ясно, что мы имеем дело с людьми, сознательно срывающими производство, но для меня не ясно, кто ими руководит.»²

After examining the documents, Stalin declared: "It's clear to me that we are dealing with people who deliberately disrupt production, but it's not clear to me who is leading them.

How Many Specialists Sentenced?

Thousands of specialists had been sentenced.²⁵⁴ ... He [Stalin] had also written to Molotov "that two or three dozen wreckers from the [finance commissariat] must be executed." He wanted them linked to the rightists, adding that "a whole group of wreckers in the meat industry must definitely be shot and their names published in the press."²⁵⁶ (50)

Note 254 (919): "254. An estimated 3,000 engineers had been arrested in the Donbass in 1928-29. "Over the last several years we liquidated counterrevolutionary organizations almost in every sphere of the economy," the OGPU reported in May 1930. Sevost'ianov et al., Sovershenno sekretno, VIII/ii: 1140 (TsA FSB, f. 2, op. 8, por. 435, l. 169-241)."

Kotkin writes two falsehoods here. First, the text says "sentenced" but the footnotes says "arrested." Not the same thing! Second, the last line of this document Kotkin cites from Sevost'ianov (which is online at <http://istmat.info/node/27045>) reads thus:

[[cyrillic]]За последние два года мы ликвидировали контрреволюционные организации почти во всех областях народного хозяйства уголь, транспорт, тяжелая металлургия" золотая промышленность, военная промышленность и т.п.

Over the past two years we have eliminated counter-revolutionary organizations in almost all areas of the national economy coal, transport, heavy metallurgy, the gold industry, the military industry, and so on.

There is no mention of any "estimate" of "3,000 engineers." Evidently Kotkin invented this large number.

Begging the Question ... Again

On October 2, 1930, Meżyński sent Stalin interrogation materials relating to a clandestine Industrial Party. "To the OGPU, comrade Meżyński. In person only. From Stalin," the dictator wrote back, specifying the exact content of the conspiracies and demanding corroborating testimony, which, if extracted, "will be a serious victory for the OGPU." Stalin either believed or made it appear that he believed in the fabrications, instructing Meżyński's interrogators to ascertain: "1) Why was the [foreign military] intervention in 1930 put off? 2) Is it because Poland was not ready? 3) Perhaps because Romania was not ready? 4) Perhaps because the Baltic states and Romania have not yet come to terms with Poland? 5) Why have they put off the attack to 1931? 6) Might they put it off to 1932?" Stalin added that the confessions would be made available to "the workers of the world. We shall launch as broad a campaign as possible against interventionists and thwart them in their attempts for the next one or two years, which is of great significance to us. (54)

Note 277 (920): "277. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 256-7 (TsA FSB, f. 2, op. 9, d. 388, l. 270-1: Oct. 1930); Kommunist, 1990, no. 11: 99-100 (RGASPI, f. 558, op. 1, d. 5276); Kosheleva, Pis'ma Stalina Molotovu, 187-8; Lib et al., Stalin's Letters to Molotov, 195-6.

Kotkin cites no evidence that the Industrial Party trial was a "fabrication." No wonder — no such evidence exists. Kotkin simply assumes that — when he should prove it. This is the logical fallacy known as "begging the question."

The fact that Stalin believed the charges is itself evidence, though not primary source evidence. An English translation of the trial transcript, including the final statements of those accused (157 ff.) is Wreckers on Trial. Ed. Andrew Rothstein (New York: Workers Library, Printed in England, 1931). The testimony in the trial is primary source evidence.

"30,000 Heads Of Households Executed"??

All told, around 5 million people were "dekulakized"—by the police, by their fellow peasants, or by choosing to flee, with an untold number perishing during deportation or not long after. Up to 30,000 heads of households were summarily executed. (75)

The nearest footnote is note 42 (924):

42. RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 9, 1. 138. On Feb. 25, 1931, the politburo resolved by telephone poll to recommend that during the course of six months the OGPU "prepare" kulak settlements for 200,000-300,000 families near Karaganda in northern Kazakhstan. Khaustov et al., Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 263 (APRF, f. 3, op. 30, d. 149, l. 51).

Kotkin's statement here is simply false. RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 9, 1. 138 is a page from the February 25, 1931 Politburo meeting.³ There is nothing in it, or in the document on page 263 of the Khaustov collection cited, about any executions at all — much less of 30,000 people, much less of heads of households. The document published in Khaustov, 263, is online here, together with explanatory notes: <http://istmat.info/node/45960>

³ See <https://cyberleninka.ru/article/nflesnoy-eksport-sssr-v-kontse-1920-h-nachale-1930-h-gg-i-konkurenciya-na-evropeyskom-rynke>

... And the Falsehoods Keep On Comin'

... For a time, urgent requests for cheap "kulak" laborers skyrocketed, but sites that had large numbers of the deported often begged not to be sent any more: the ones they had were just dying. RGASPI, f. 17, op. 120, d. 26, l. 37 (Kuznetskstroj); Viola, Unknown Gulag, 4.

There is nothing in this document about anyone dying, either those already there or anybody else.

This document — RGASPI, f. 17, op. 120, d. 26, l. 37 — is online at <http://istmat.info/node/37271> It is a request from the chief at Kuznetskstroj not to send any more families of spetsposelentsy (exiles), since they do not have the means to house, feed, or clothe them. Kulaks and their families might be spetsposelentsy, but there's nothing here about "kulaks" or "laborers" here.

And — most significantly — it says nothing about anybody "dying." Kotkin evidently invented this too.

"Charged"? Or Just Arrested?

[In 1930-31] More than 3,000 former tsarist officers in Kharkov, Kiev, Moscow, and Leningrad were charged with conspiracy and espionage.⁶⁶ (77)

n.66 (925)

66. Artizov et al., Reabilitatsiia: kak eto bylo, II: 671-788; Z arkhiviv VUChK, GPU, NKVD, KGB, no. 1, issue 18 (2002): 209; Khaustov, Lubianka: Stalin i VChK, 212-3 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 162, d. 7, l. 188, 192); Zdanovich, Organy, 423-31. The main scholarly authority, who provides a list of names while admitting the impossibility of establishing exact figures, writes that as many as 10,000 officers might have been arrested and sentenced. Tynchenko, Golgofa, 242, 248-311. See also Berkhin, Voennaia reforma, 261.

Artizov et al. is the "Spravka" of the Shvernik Commission of 1963 — the entire text This is the text that Kotkin should have cited always, but which he in fact seldom does. The number of 3000 arrests of former Tsarist officers is on page 729. It does not state that the officers were "charged," much less with what. Zdanovich, Organy, does not cite any figure for the number of officers arrested.

"Tynchenko" — really "Tinchenko" — lists several hundred officers who were arrested. In section 2 ("razdel II") he usefully reprints confession interrogations of a number of them. Confessions of guilt are prima facie evidence of guilt — they can never be evidence of innocence, though Kotkin implies that these officers were innocent. What government would not arrest officers who were plotting against it? Tinchenko claims that "no fewer than 10,000 persons" were repressed, but he lists only a few hundred. (Tinchenko, "Vmesto predislovia," p. 3).

Berkhin's book is titled Military Reform in the USSR 1924-1925. Naturally, it says nothing about the matter Kotkin is discussing here — the arrests of officers in 1930-1. So this is yet another phony reference.⁴

"10,000 Demonstrators"? Or "X Demonstrators"?

Ten thousand demonstrators ransacked the party and police buildings ("Toss the Communists ... out the window"). Stalin dispatched Kaganovich, who mobilized local party agitators to speak with workers and himself heard out their grievances.²⁰⁵ (95)

Note 205 (931): 205. Davies, Crisis and Progress, 188-91 (citing APRF, f. 3, op. 22, d. 39, 1. 6-7).

This is a falsehood. Davies says nothing about any "ten thousand demonstrators" or any number of demonstrators. Nor does he cite the document from APRF. In fact, Kotkin appears to have simply copied this from Khlevniuk, Khoziain, page 93, which covers the same events and cites the same APRF document that Kotkin cites here. But Khlevniuk says nothing about any ten thousand demonstrators either. Did Kotkin even read this archival document? Or did he just find it in Khlevniuk's book and cite it as though he had read it?

One-Third the Casualties — And Then There Was The Famine

More than 126,000 forced laborers did the work [on the Belomor Canal], almost entirely without machines, and probably at least 12,000 died doing so, while orchestras played in the background. (134)

Kotkin gives no evidence for this figure of "at least 12,000 died doing so." No wonder! To be sure, the main source gives the figure as 12,318 — 1438 in 1931, 2010 in 1932, 8870 in 1933. See A.I. Kokurin, IU. N. Morukov, eds. Stalinskie Stroiki GULAGA 1930-1953. Dokumenty. (Stalinist GULAG Construction] Moscow: MDF — "Materik" 2005, 33-4.

However, 1932-33, the years with the higher casualties, were the years of the great famine throughout the USSR (not only, or even mainly, in the Ukraine, as Ukrainian nationalists claim). These years had the highest mortality rates throughout the USSR, including in the camps.

So the prisoners did not die "doing so" — that is, from poor or brutal conditions of work. They died from famine and from disease, as well as from other, natural causes.

The orchestras were part of the cultural and educational programs for prisoners. I have not found similar cultural activities for American prisoners during this period. In fact, a big issue in the USA at the time was the brutal conditions and high mortality in "chain gangs." And compare the horrendous — in fact, fascist — abuse and murder of black prisoners in the USA after the Civil War discussed by Douglas Blackmon.⁵

But Kamenev Didn't Say That ...

From the rostrum they issued self-flagellating calls for "unity," with Kamenev defending Stalin's personal dictatorship (in contrast to his bold denunciation of it back at the 14th Party Congress).¹⁸⁴

This is about Kamenev's speech to the 17th Party Congress in January, 1934. But Kamenev said nothing about "Stalin's personal dictatorship," or anything like it, in this speech, which is online at http://www.hrono.ru/vkpb_17/20_7.html

Maybe There Should Have Been No Scrutiny?

Local party head Eihe was empowered to approve executions on his own from September through November.¹⁷ (190)

Only the last citation, from Stalinskoe politbiuro, refers to this authority given to Eikhe. Here are the references. First, the authority is granted to the judicial troikas to use the death penalty against "armed banditism":

For some reason — carelessness? — Kotkin says that Eikhe's authority to approve executions (or, of course, to disapprove them — but Kotkin fails to point this out) ran "from September through November." But the document he cites, the second one above, clearly says "during September and October of 1934" (the boldfaced words).

Since When Does "Sabotage" Equal "Terrorism"?

On the plenum's eve, resistance to Stakhanovism had been designated as terrorism.²³⁴ (278)

Note 234 (978): 234. Damage of machinery while operating it as well as the production or supply of poor quality goods became crimes of sabotage too. Andreyev gave the main report, for which he had been copiously supplied with NKVD materials on "sabotage" of the Stakhanovite movement. Other speakers cited cases of anti-Stakhanovite "sabotage" in their regions. Davies et al., Years of Progress, 171-2 (citing RGASPI, f. 73, op.1, d. 141, l. 205; f. 17, op. 2, d. 561, l. 32: Ryndin); Pravda, December 29, 1935.

It is false — and a gross distortion of Davies' text — to claim, as Kotkin does, that "resistance to Stakhanovism" was "designated as terrorism." Here is the passage from Davies that Kotkin cites:

Davies, Years of Progress, p. 171:

Andreev, a secretary of the party central committee and Politburo member, in preparing for the central committee plenum of December 21-25, at which he gave the keynote speech, was supplied with a considerable amount of NKVD material on the resistance of "conservative and counter-revolutionary elements" to the Stakhanov movement. The material indicates that by December hundreds of cases of sabotage had already been discovered or concocted. The NKVD used the following headings to describe resistance to Stakhanovism: deliberate damage of the equipment of Stakhanovites; creation of unfavourable conditions for their work (including supplying them with poor-quality tools and materials, and allocating inappropriate personnel to Stakhanovite work-teams); illegal reduction of rates for the job and increases of norms; "deception" by economic agencies (this obviously refers to inaccurate reports); "counterrevolutionary agitation against Stakhanovite methods"; terror against Stakhanovites.⁴⁰

The main point is opposition to sabotage, not terrorism. Sabotage was not to be considered terrorism; terrorism — murdering Stakhanovites — is listed last.

If Only Kotkin Were As Truthful As Stalin!

Stalin was a liar, a chameleon, who talked out of both sides of his mouth and often said what interlocutors wanted to hear. (309)

But Kotkin cites no evidence here. In fact, Kotkin has no evidence anywhere in this massive book even of a single lie of Stalin's, or of Stalin "talking out of both sides of his mouth," or of Stalin saying — even once — "what interlocutors wanted to hear"!

This remarkable fact can only be explained in one way: that Kotkin could not find even a single example of a genuine lie by Stalin. For if he had found even one, surely he would have included it in his book. Wouldn't he?

A "Scuffle" Is Not The Same As "A Punch In The Face"

He [Stalin] had stressed the work of "checking up by punching people in the face" (September 2, 1930).⁴⁸ (441)

Note 48 (1000): 48. Lih et al., Stalin's Letters to Molotov, 210-1.

This is the English translation of the Stalin-Molotov letters. Why doesn't Kotkin quote from the original Russian edition, which he lists it in his bibliography? (p. 1092, col. 3)

Here, perhaps, is the reason. The English edition reads:

In my opinion, the leadership of Gosbank and Finance has to be replaced with people from the OGPU and the Worker-Peasant Inspection once these latter bodies have conducted some inspecting and checking up by punching people in the face. (Letter 63, 9/2/1930).

But the Russian edition — the original — reads:

[[cyrillic]]Придется, по-моему, обновить верхушку Госбанка и Наркомфина за счет ОГПУ и РКИ после того, как эти последние органы проведут там проверочно-мордобойную работу.

... after these last bodies carry out the work of a fight for verification there.

The word mordoboi here clearly means a "fight," meaning a sharp struggle. What it does not mean, as used here by Stalin, is "punching people in the face," though this is the literal meaning.⁶ The persons who were replaced were the heads of Gosbank, Briukhanov and Piatakov. Nobody was literally "punched in the face."

Stalin's Grandson Evgenii

Stalin never recognized Yevgeny as his grandson.¹⁴⁰ (523)

Note 140 (1012): "140. Galina would later deny that this was her half-brother: V. Nechaev, "Vnuchka Stalina "o belykh piatniakh v istorii svoei sem'i," Argumenty i fakty, Nov. 3, 1999."

Kotkin's own source states that it was not Stalin but Galina Dzhugashvili, Yevgeny's step-sister, who refused to recognize Yevgeny as her father's son and therefore Stalin's grandson. This is what the source in Kotkin's footnote in Argumenty i Fakty — a rumor-mongering publication and a completely unreliable source — says.

According to the Russian Wikipedia page on Evgenii Dzhugashvili, Stalin was pleased with Ol'ga Golysheva, Yakov's partner.

[[cyrillic]]Ольге Сталин был вроде бы рад. Алексей Пиманов в своей книге «Сталин. Трагедия семьи» однозначно утверждает, что «На этот раз выбор сына одобрил и отец. Он распорядился даже выделить молодым небольшую квартиру в центре Москвы.»[5]

Stalin was, apparently, happy with Olga. Alexey Pimanov in his book "Stalin. The tragedy of a family" unequivocally asserts that "this time the father also approved the choice of the son. He even arranged for the young people to be given a small apartment in the center of Moscow."

So why does Kotkin say it was Stalin who refused to recognize his grandson, when in fact it was Evgenii's step-sister who refused to do so? Because it makes Stalin appear "mean"? Something like that, perhaps.

All Soviet Workers And Their Families Starved To Death!

A Soviet worker needed to labor for sixty-two hours to purchase a loaf of bread, versus about seventeen minutes for an American ... (544)

Sometimes Kotkin's zeal to make the USSR during the 1930s look very bad goes off the rails completely. As here.

Kotkin cites no evidence for this statement. No wonder — it cannot possibly be true. It would mean that a Soviet worker could work six ten-hour days plus two hours more, and still only earn one loaf of bread. All the Soviet workers and their children would have starved to death very quickly!

Win The Battle Or Be Killed By The NKVD?

To be sure, failure for Zhukov at the Halha River [against the Japanese] could have meant death in NKVD cellars.¹⁶⁰ But then again, that was true for every Soviet commander.

Note 160 (1032): "160. Erickson, Soviet High Command, 522."

But that is not what Erickson wrote.

Zhukov could have had no illusions about this assignment; failure was out of the question. To win and win decisively, even spectacularly, would alone suffice." (Erickson, 522)

Erickson says nothing about "death in NKVD cellars," "true for every Soviet commander," etc. In fact, there is not a single example in Soviet history of a commander being executed because he failed to win a battle.

Did Stalin Say That Nazi Germany Had Become "Objectively Progressive"?

Stalin further stated in the Little Corner that "the division of capitalist states into fascist and democratic no longer makes sense." Such a division had never held much meaning for him even when, in 1935, he had allowed the Comintern to announce a popular front against fascism, which, in the form of Nazi Germany, had become objectively progressive: "Hitler, without understanding it or desiring it, is shaking and undermining the capitalist system."¹⁷⁶

Note 178 (1033): 176. Banac, Diary of Georgi Dimitrov, 115-6 (Sept. 7, 1939).

This passage reads as follows:

- Before the war, opposing a democratic regime to fascism was entirely correct.
- During war between the imperialist powers that is now incorrect.
- The division of capitalist states into fascist and democratic no longer makes sense.
- The war has precipitated a radical change.
- Yesterday's United Popular Front served to ease the position of slaves under a capitalist regime.
- Under conditions of an imperialist war, the prospect of the annihilation of slavery arises!

Nothing in this passage says or implies the absurd notion that "fascism ... has become objectively progressive."

Moreover, Stalin was right in an important way. World War II so weakened the imperialist powers that, during the 1940s through the 1970s, every colony of every imperialist power got independence. Those who won it by fighting, such as the Chinese and Vietnamese, did so against repression so vicious from the "freedom-loving" Western imperialists that the violence far outdid anything that the Soviet bloc countries had even been accused of, much less actually done. Other colonies, like Algeria (France) and Kenya (Great Britain) endured massive torture campaigns and massacres of noncombatants by the "free world" imperialists. And they were outdone in violence, terror, and torture by the US war in Vietnam.

These anti-imperialist victories did not lead to the achievement of egalitarian communist societies. But they did mean an end of the domination by Eastern (Japan) and Western (US, Belgian, French, British, Dutch, Italian) imperialist powers. To that extent, at least, Stalin was correct.

NKVD "Quotas" Again?

Despite people's evasions and self-misrepresentations, the NKVD—full of half-educated people—amassed a stunning amount of operational information, seizing local archives and personnel files, and using censuses and tax registers, to enumerate the entire population politically. The NKVD locked factory gates with the workers inside until registrations were complete, and put the onus on urban landlords, who would answer with their heads, to march whole apartment buildings to prearranged sites for "registration." In villages, volunteer or conscripted facilitators were promised rewards for meeting "quotas" of farmers delivered to in-person registrations.⁶²

Note 62 (1046) contains no evidence to support the statements in this paragraph. Specifically, it says nothing about "quotas." Kotkin merely says that he saw very detailed NKVD materials in Khabarovsk (Siberia) concerning the preparations made for exiles.

Chapter 12. Strategies of Misdirection

An Analysis of the Falsehoods in Stalin, Vol. 2.

Stalin, Vol. 2 is not an attempt to give a truthful account of the events it discusses. It is something else: an attempt to convince the reader that it is a truthful account. In other words: Stalin, Vol. 2 is a fraud — a work of propaganda disguised as a work of historical research. Stalin, Vol. 2 is a book that is designed to mislead its readers. Judging from the book reviews published as of January, 2019, it has been very successful in misleading them.

The main reason for its success is what I have called "the Anti-Stalin Paradigm" (ASP). Stalin, Vol. 2 tells its readers what they, broadly speaking, already "knew" — that is, what they thought they knew: that Stalin and the Soviet leadership were evil people who deliberately murdered a great many innocent persons. Stalin, Vol. 2 fills out the paradigm of "Stalin and the Soviets as evil" with scholarly-looking examples and documentation, much as hot air fills out a balloon.

In addition to the techniques of misrepresentation and misdirection, other factors are involved. Chief among them is the power of the ASP. This epidemic of self-imposed blindness exists because there is no powerful institution that is devoted to the pursuit of historical truth. The historical profession is supposed to be such an institution. But it is not, at least as regards Soviet history of the Stalin period. In this field falsehood is rewarded as long as it serves anticommunist purposes. Meanwhile the truth is discouraged or penalized when, as is usually the case, it does not serve those purposes.

The techniques of misdirection employed in Stalin, Vol. 2 are not original or sophisticated. Once they have been pointed out they appear almost transparent. But they have fooled many reviewers. At the time I am writing this I have yet to find a single reviewer who has identified even one of the dozens of falsifications in Kotkin's book.

If someone were to write a book accusing the American government of atrocities on the scale of those Kotkin falsely attributes to Stalin and the Soviet leadership, we can be certain that many scholars would check every statement and examine all the evidence. The fact that up to now no one has done this is, no doubt, due in part to the fact that in Stalin, Vol. 2 Kotkin is telling people that which they have assumed to be true all along.

What we have done in the present book is simply to apply to Kotkin's fact-claims, accusations, and allegations against Stalin and the Soviet leadership in Stalin, Vol. 2 the critical, scholarly examination that any careful reviewer of a book alleging crimes by the United States government and leadership would adopt. The result is devastating to Kotkin's book.

A Typology of Prevarication

In an earlier work I termed the different kinds of falsification in Nikita Khrushchev's "Secret Speech" a "typology of prevarication." In that work I was able to show that what Khrushchev stated in this infamous speech was false. In most cases I did not have enough evidence to discover what really happened. I did find enough evidence to prove that more than 40 "revelations" made by Khrushchev in that speech are deliberate lies and that 20 more are also falsehoods — probably, but not provably, deliberate.

In The Murder of Sergei Kirov I discussed the studies by Matthew Lenoë, Åsmund Egge, and Alla Kirilina. I discovered that these scholars had tortured the available evidence in order to reach the only conclusion congruent with the ASP: that Kirov's assassin, Leonid Nikolaev, was a "lone gunman" and that Stalin fabricated the criminal cases against everyone else. In the case of Kirov's murder we do have enough evidence to prove that those persons convicted of the murder by the Soviet court in December 1934 were indeed guilty. But I did not give a theoretically-informed account of the errors and methods of misdirection that these prior scholars used.

In the case of Stalin, Vol. 2 I think such an account is warranted. The fact-claims against Stalin and the Soviets are so universally false, and the failure of experienced reviewers to notice this so complete, that we are forced to admit that the techniques of falsification in Stalin, Vol. 2 have been successful. If they have fooled the reviewers, including at the time of this writing a few scholarly reviewers, they will also fool the general reader. These techniques of falsification are simple in principle. But they are only disclosed as simple in practice if one studies them closely.

The widespread acceptance of the ASP discourages any attempt to verify fact-claims that are convenient to that paradigm, since the process of verification dismantles the paradigm itself. A review of the techniques of misdirection in Stalin, Vol. 2 may prove helpful in warning the reader against naive acceptance of the ASP in other works too. Under its controlling influence every piece of evidence is bent to fit it, while everything that does not fit it is ignored, discarded, caricatured, or denied.

One conclusion stands out: no "authority," no "expert" regardless of his or her academic pedigree, should be simply "believed." Given the ideologically-charged field that is Soviet history of the Stalin period, no accusation of wrongdoing against Stalin, the Soviet leadership, or pro-Soviet forces, no matter what its source, should ever be accepted as true unless it has been thoroughly verified first. The sooner this fact is generally recognized, and the sooner the practice of verifying everything that "fits" the ASP is taken seriously, the better for those of us who wish to discover the truth.

Objectivity

In any academic discipline it is essential that the researcher determine to be objective from the outset of her study. History is no different. The historian must make every effort to survey all the primary sources that bear upon her subject, and all the secondary sources that study this evidence, whether or not these secondary sources reflect the same biases, preconceived ideas, or values as her own.

Since objectivity is, among other things, an attitude of distrust of the self¹, of one's own preconceived ideas and biases, the historian must compensate for her own limitations by trying especially hard to give a supportive reading to primary and secondary sources whose tendency is opposed to her own biases. At the same time she must determine to be especially suspicious of that evidence and those works of scholarship that tend to confirm or agree with her own biases. This practice is essential in order to counteract the natural tendency to "cherry-pick" the evidence, to look with special favor upon statements that reflect one's own views.

In her historical practice the historian must observe the tenets of objective research from the outset. If the historian does not begin with a determination to find the truth "no matter whose ox is gored"; if she does not remain vigilant, ready at every moment to discover a truth that she finds disillusioning, her research is doomed. She will never stumble across the truth by accident along the way.

Moreover, if a historian does not begin from a determination to discover the truth, we must ask the question: What, then, is her purpose in writing the book? If the historian is not out to discover the truth and report it to her readers, what is she doing?

Kotkin ignores these tenets of historical objectivity. Therefore, no one should be surprised that his book is filled with historical falsehoods. It could not be otherwise.

Methods of Falsification in Stalin, Vol. 2

Avoidance of objectivity takes many specific forms. There are many different ways to smuggle in fact-claims without evidence. Among these methods of falsification are logical fallacies.

One of them, the "argument from incredulity" or "fallacy of personal incredulity," in a sense represents the whole of Kotkin's book. For Stalin,

Vol. 2 represents what Kotkin "believes" about Stalin and the events of the 1930s. Presumably, Kotkin "believes" his account — but who cares what he "believes"? The evidence just does not support what he believes. Instead of changing what he believes to conform to the evidence, Kotkin ignores or distorts the evidence that refutes what he believes.

Analysis of the Prevarications in Stalin, Vol. 2

The success of a work as corrupt as Stalin, Vol. 2 requires explanation. How can a book that is largely composed of demonstrable, provable falsehoods have been published? Once published, how can it be praised by newspaper and magazine reviewers? How can a work utterly lacking in integrity be published in thousands of copies by a major publisher?

Part of the answer lies in the historical role of pseudo-scholarship as propaganda for anticommunist purposes. The demonization of Soviet history dates back to the Russian revolution itself. Already in 1920 Walter Lippmann and Charles Merz showed how the New York Times, "newspaper of record" then as today, "reported" the triumph of the Whites and the defeat of the Reds numerous times, always falsely. Lippmann and Merz concluded that the reporters had not deliberately lied. Rather they had reported not what they saw but what they and their bosses wanted to see.² The Times's reporters included Walter Duranty, who was later to be attacked for being insufficiently anticommunist when, during the 1930s, he insisted on reporting only what he saw or knew for a fact rather than what he had not witnessed.³

² "A Test of the News." Supplement to the August 8, 1920 issue of The New Republic. At <https://archive.org/details/LippmannMerzATestoftheNews>

³ See Furr, Blood Lies, 111-113. A few of the many dishonest books and articles attacking Duranty on these fraudulent grounds are listed in the Wikipedia page devoted to Duranty.

Stalin, Vol. 2 was published by Penguin Random House, a commercial rather than an academic publisher. Academic presses require that manuscripts submitted for publication be vetted by academic specialists in the field. This does not guarantee that falsehoods will be caught and that standards of evidence routine in other areas of history will be observed. Far from it! Nevertheless, some of the more glaring falsifications in Stalin, Vol. 2 might have been recognized as such by an academic review — unless the reviewers had been selected more for their anticommunist fervor than for excellence of research.

The praise Stalin, Vol. 2 has garnered from newspapers and magazines are understandable. All mainstream publications from right-wing conservative to liberal-left and social-democratic are dogmatically anticommunist and anti-Stalin. When it comes to hostility to Stalin there is often little difference along the continuum from Trotskyist to anarchist to left-liberal to far right. And it is publicity and promotion from these publications that determine commercial success. The author and his publisher are making a lot of money! Not a careful search for the truth but profit is the goal of commercial publication. Anticommunist bias is not a barrier for mass commercial success rather, it is a positive requirement.

Anticommunist Scholarship

Kotkin's determined flouting of objectivity would be of little consequence if it were an exception. Stalin, Vol. 2 and similar works would be rejected during the vetting process and not be published. Those works that for whatever reason managed to evade the vetting process and be published anyway would be quickly critiqued, their errors, carelessness, and deliberate dishonesty identified and exposed. Negative reviews would warn potential readers away. This is how the system of scholarly and semi-popular reviewing is supposed to work.

But in the field of Soviet history it does not work this way. Scholarship on the Stalin period in the Soviet Union is constrained by an informal but strict code of "political correctness." Stalin must be depicted as a moral monster and the Soviet Union during his time as a place of government-sponsored corruption, repression, and mass murder. No substantive deviation from this formula is tolerated. This is what I have termed the ASP.

Only rarely can one find a refutation of even the most absurd accusations of crimes by Stalin. In his 2010 study that concluded that Stalin did not have a hand in the murder of Sergei Kirov in Leningrad on December 1, 1934, Matthew Lenoe felt compelled to write a page-length profession of his anticommunist and anti-Stalin convictions. Lenoe begins by stating the credo: "Stalin was one of the deadliest tyrants of world history ..."
Naturally, no evidence is cited. For Lenoe's academic audience, no evidence is needed. Who needs evidence, when "everybody knows it?"

Lenoe admits that he did so lest someone suspect him of "apologizing for Stalin" for rejecting the view that Stalin had had Kirov killed, even though that interpretation had been abandoned by Soviet and Russian experts two decades earlier and there had never been any evidence to support it in the first place.⁴ In what other field, and about what other historical personage, would a scholar feel the need to apologize for discovering that his subject did not commit a crime? But Lenoe is correct: absolving Stalin of the accusation of some crime or other is just "not done."

⁴ Matthew Lenoe, The Kirov Murder and Soviet History New Haven: Yale U.P. 2010, 16-17.

Even this is an exception. Claims that Stalin committed some crime, no matter how poorly supported by evidence, are typically passed over in silence if really absurd and otherwise are accepted and even repeated, as Kotkin does many times in Stalin, Vol. 2. As we have suggested in the Introduction, in history of the Stalin period a kind of Gresham's Law prevails where "bad scholarship drives out the good." When good scholarship is produced it is carefully written so as not to contradict any tenets of anti-Stalinism that the researcher thinks may be an inviolable part of the ASP.

Good research is being done in the field of Stalin-era Soviet history. But it is typically confined to the close examination of primary sources, especially when newly-available sources are used. Research that is narrowly focused on specific events, places, and time periods can be very revealing. Even when marred by bias, research that reproduces new primary sources can be valuable because flawed interpretations can be critiqued and discarded and the texts of the primary sources themselves appropriated for more objective research.

An anticommunist scholarly environment or "industry" has been created where "scholars" churn out anticommunist falsehoods and then cite each other's falsehoods as evidence that the falsehoods are true. Primary sources are either distorted by misinterpretation or else ignored entirely. The "scholars" or academic practitioners in this "industry" assume in their writings that it is not primary source evidence and its interpretation, but the consensus of anticommunist researchers, that establishes a statement as "true." This is the logical fallacy of "appeal to authority."

Kotkin follows this practice with enthusiasm. Stalin, Vol. 2 is an example of what that practice produces. When Kotkin cites primary sources at all, he often gets them wrong. Kotkin often cites secondary sources by "scholars" of the anticommunist "industry" (scare quotes deliberate here. This produces a body of anticommunist pseudo-scholarship based upon bias and falsehood alone.

In addition to falsehood this system produces and reproduces ignorance. Anti-communist scholars inevitably become lazy when no one criticizes their research because it has the "correct" anticommunist tendency or "line." Why worry about the truth if what matters is not objectivity and skillful analysis and interpretation of primary source evidence, but striking the right anticommunist tone? Why bother to do the hard, time-consuming work of genuine research, of discovering the truth, when the path to academic success is to repeat anti-communist assertions with little or, often enough, no regard for the evidence?

Our study of Stalin, Vol. 2 has disclosed that Kotkin is not only biased. He is also ignorant about much of the history of which he poses as an expert. His readers should not assume that Kotkin has worked hard to discover the truth about the important issues discussed in this book, and then gone on to construct deliberate lies in order to disguise this truth.

The reverse is much more likely: that Kotkin has no idea what the truth is because he has never tried to find it. He has mastered the anticommunist position or "line" on these and, perhaps, on other issues, and this can be got from reading the works of a limited number of recognized anticommunist "scholars" without troubling oneself about primary sources or real research of any kind.

Chapter 13. Bias of Omission

Introduction: Why Believe Trotsky?

That same day, a politburo decree ordered the execution of the OGPU espionage operative Yakov Blyumkin. His fatal act had been to meet on Prinkipo with Trotsky, his former patron, who revealed that he had managed to carry out secret documents, which he intended to publish to expose Stalin, and predicted the regime's downfall, averring that the underground "Bolshevik-Leninists" needed to strengthen their opposition. Blyumkin evidently sensed that Trotsky was fantasizing, yet he had agreed to carry messages to Moscow from Trotsky, written inside books in invisible ink.¹⁰⁹ He became one of the first Communist party members executed by the Soviet regime for a political crime.

Note 109 (915): "109. Blyumkin had served as Trotsky's adjutant, then was invited to rejoin the secret police, rising to pro-consul in the Soviet satellite of Mongolia and then to undercover OGPU station chief in Istanbul. ... OGPU agents went around whispering that Radek had betrayed Blyumkin, a story that, as intended, reached Trotsky, damaging relations between him and Radek, conveniently for Stalin. Radek would not deny he had informed on Blyumkin. Trotsky is said to have received a letter detailing Radek's betrayal. "Kak i za chto Stalin rasstrelial Bliumkina" Biulleten' oppositsii, no. 9 (Feb.-March 1930): 9-11 ...

More than thirty years ago Pierre Broué, the most prominent Trotskyist scholar in the world, concluded that Bliumkin, a Soviet intelligence agent, was secretly working for Trotsky. Trotsky lied in his article about Bliumkin's execution.¹

¹ See Broué, "Complements à un article sur les trotskystes en U.R.S.S" Cahiers Léon Trotsky 1985 (24), pp. 63-72.

Kotkin does not cite Broué's article, though he cites many other articles by Broué. If, somehow, Kotkin did not know about this article, then he did not research Trotsky and Bliumkin and so had no business writing about them.

Kotkin also fails to mention a major publication about Bliumkin by Oleg B. Mozokhin, "Confession of a Terrorist" in an important historical journal in 2002.² Kotkin cites three works by Mozokhin in his bibliography, but not this one. Bliumkin, while being a Soviet agent, was working for Trotsky.

² Oleg B. Mozokhin, "Isповed' terrorista." Voенно-Istoricheskii Arkhiv 6 (2002), 25-59.

Trotsky blamed Radek for turning Bliumkin. But in his confession Bliumkin informed on Radek's Trotskyist activities! There's little doubt that Trotsky attacked Radek as a cover for his, Trotsky's, continued collaboration with Radek. According to Boris Bazhanov, a secretary of Stalin's in the 1920s who fled to the West, Bliumkin was actually betrayed by Liza (Elizaveta) Zarubina, another Soviet agent. (Mozokhin 59)

Either Kotkin did not know about this important article, and so had no business writing about Bliumkin at all, or he did know about it but hid it from his readers for the sake of a less complicated, anti-Stalin story.

A Crime, Not A Practice

Kotkin cites the following crime committed during confiscation of a kulak family's property;

A favored trick was the "auction": one new village party secretary managed to obtain a four-room house, valued at 700 rubles, for 25.¹⁷² (37)

Note 172 (917): 172. Hughes, "Capturing the Russian Peasantry," 99, citing GANO corpus 2, f. 2, op. 2-1, d. 3506, l. 2; op. 2, d. 366, l. 189-98.

In Hughes book³ — but not his article, which Kotkin quotes here — Hughes points out that this abuse was punished.

For this litany of abuses only one person was punished, removed from office and expelled from the party — the okrug plenipotentiary responsible for the area, who happened to be the Okrug Deputy-Procurator.⁵⁶ (Hughes, Stalinism 110)

³ Stalinism in a Russian Province. A Study of Collectivization and Dekulakization in Siberia. Palgrave Macmillan: London and New York, 1996.

Hughes writes:

One practice of the Biisk authorities was to refuse to accept monetary payments to the value of the grain delivery quotas; rather when there was a refusal to sell they auctioned off peasant property at cheap prices as an exemplary punishment,³⁹ (Hughes, Stalinism 103-4).

Kotkin fails to point out that this was exposed as an abuse in an official Party document.

Later in the year, in the autumn when the grain had been collected safely, party reports on the campaign became more circumspect and critical of abuses. The Rubtsovsk Procuracy condemned numerous 'illegal acts' in grain collection when plenipotentiaries enforced 'razverstka'. (Hughes, Stalinism, 104)

Kotkin also fails to tell us that the numbers of peasants whose property was sold off was small.

By the end of April approximately only half of one per cent of farms in the okrugs of Barnaul, Biisk and Rubtsovsk, and even less in Slavgorod, had property sold for failure to pay a multiple fine. (Hughes, Stalinism, 104)

So the number sold off dishonestly, as in this case, was smaller still. But back to the village party secretary who bought "a four-room house, valued at 700 rubles, for 25." This specific act was probably punished, although only a study of the archival documents could tell and Kotkin fails to give them to us. In note 56 of his book (page 235) Hughes — but not Kotkin — tells us more about this abuse.

Concern about the numerous cases when property confiscated under Article 61 was auctioned off too cheaply was also raised at a meeting of Biisk Okrug Procuracy officials and OGPU representatives on 28 May 1929: GAAK, f. 917, Op. 1, d. 10,1. 244-5.

So abuses occurred. But they were not Soviet policy. Nor is there any evidence that such abuses were tacitly permitted. Moreover, Kotkin confuses these events. The document he cites is a complaint from a peasant woman in April 14, 1929, while the events Kotkin is discussing occurred from January-February, 1930 and thereafter.

Groman And Kondratiev What's The Evidence?

A note to page 50 of Kotkin's book reads thus:

Note 256 (919: 256. Stalin singled out the tsarist-era economists Vladimir Groman and Nikolai Kondratiev (of "long wave" fame), insisted they were linked to Bukharin, Tomsy, and Rykov, and wrote that "Kondratiev, Groman and a few other scoundrels must definitely be shot." Kosheleva, Pis'ma Stalina Molotovu, 193-6; Lih et al., Stalin's Letters to Molotov, 200-1 (Aug. 6), 201n8 (RGASPI, f. 17, op. 3, d. 793, 1. 3).

Kotkin's readers will surely get the impression that Groman and Kondrat'ev were shot. But they were not shot. Kotkin omits the fact that Groman and Kondrat'ev were prominent in the Menshevik Trial of 1931. Many of the materials of this trial have been published. Groman's lengthy confessions are in Volume 1, 311-384. Kondratiev's statements are not printed, but there is a lot of testimony from others about his activities.⁴

⁴ Menshevistskii protsessy 1931 goda. Sbornik dokumentov v 2-kh knigakh. Moscow: ROSSPEN, 1999.

There is no evidence that this was a frame-up. Groman was convicted and sentenced to 10 years imprisonment, which he served in the Verkhneural'sk and then the Suzdal'sk political isolators, equivalent to minimum-security prisons in the USA. Groman died there in 1940, age 66.

Kondrat'ev was convicted in the same trial and sentenced in 1932 to 8 years imprisonment. In 1938 he was tried, convicted, and executed for "continuing counter-revolutionary activity in the Suzdal' isolator."⁵ Kotkin conceals this information from his readers.

Wife Of Kirov's Assassin Was Guilty

Kotkin:

The Kirov and Kremlin Affair investigations were now running in parallel. In Leningrad on March 10, [Milda] Draule was tried and executed, along with her sister and brother-in-law; there was no public announcement.²⁶⁴

Note 264 (966): 264. Lenoë, Kirov Murder, 287-8 (RGANI, f. 6, op. 13, d. 33, l. 49-50: Ulrich to Stalin, March 11, 1934). [The note to Lenoë is in error: it should read 387-8. — GF]

Kotkin omits to mention that, even in this excerpt from a letter of Ulrich to Stalin, Ulrich states that Draule confessed her guilt:

To the question of what goal she was pursuing when she sought a ticket to the meeting of the party activists on December 1, [...] where Comrade Kirov was to deliver his report, Milda Draule answered that she "wanted to help Leonid Nikolaev." With what? "That should have been obvious from the circumstances." (Lenoe 388)

Lenoe also states that on January 10, 1935, Draule gave damning evidence against her husband:

Milda Draule signed testimony asserting that Nikolaev had visited [Latvian consul in Leningrad] Bissenieks to discuss "the question of detaching various national regions from the USSR." (Lenoe 387)

Kotkin knows this — he cites Lenoe's book more than fifty times. But he fails to inform his readers, and so gives them the impression that Draule was executed simply because she was Nikolaev's wife.⁶

⁶ I discuss this in more detail in Sergei Kirov, pages 180-181.

Kotkin Ignores Stalin's Struggle for Democracy, I

On page 287 Kotkin discusses Stalin's interview with American newspaper publisher Roy Howard. But Kotkin makes no mention of the most remarkable, and most remarked-on, of Stalin's comments — his promise of a democratic constitution with contested seats. This is discussed in some detail in Iurii Zhukov, Inoi Stalin, pages 207-210 — a book that Kotkin cites, though not here — as well as in the Stalin-Howard interview. Kotkin clearly knows about it, but never informs his readers.⁷

⁷ See The Stalin-Howard Interview. New York: International Publishers, (1936). In Russian it is in volume 14 of Stalin's Collected Works.

Throughout this large book Kotkin avoids all mention of Stalin's energetic fight for democratic reform in the Soviet Union. See also my discussion in "Stalin and the Struggle for Democratic Reform," Part I.⁸

Kotkin Conceals Stalin's Opposition To Mass Repression

Kotkin on the January, 1938, Central Committee Plenum:

On January 13, the Kiev provincial party committee was deemed "littered with an exceedingly great number of Trotskyites," and three days later Postyshev was replaced as Kiev province secretary by Sergei Kudryavtsev, while the Kharkov provincial party boss was replaced by Nikolai Gikalo. (370) [There is no note to this passage. — GF]

Kotkin omits the fact that Pavel Postyshev was removed for massive repressions of Party members. The long quotation below is from Furr, Yezhov vs. Stalin:

The January 1938 CC Plenum

It appears that this Plenum was called in a hurry to deal with a serious situation of mass expulsions and arrests of Party members, including many Party officials.

Sometime around the beginning of the year, Politburo member A. A. Andreev was assigned the task of gathering compromising material on Postyshev's party expulsions in Kuibyshev. These documents included documentation of mass party expulsions from the Kuibyshev soviet, from the ranks of party district committee secretaries, and from other organizations. One report from the Bazarno-Syzgansky district noted that large numbers had been expelled as enemies by order of Postyshev's men, though the NKVD subsequently found reason to arrest very few of them.

... based on the materials Andreev compiled, the Politburo decided only on 7 January to use the occasion of a Supreme Soviet meeting to convene a plenum for 11 January, a lead time of only four days. (Getty & Naumov 498-499; 501)

This whole section, pp. 99-103, contains the evidence against Postyshev. Kotkin simply ignores it! He also omits it at page 475.

Here is a fuller discussion:

Postyshev was the harshest in mass expulsions, and was expelled for this at the January 1938 CC. Getty & Naumov discuss this at length on pp. 498-512. Getty quotes at length how Postyshev was raked over the coals at this Plenum for excessive repression.

Zhukov's analysis:

At the January 1938 Plenum the main report was done by Malenkov. He said that the first secretaries were brandishing not even lists of those condemned by the "troikas," but just two lines with an indication of the number of those condemned. He openly accused the first secretary of the Kuibyshev obkom of the party P.P. Postyshev: you have imprisoned the entire Party and Soviet apparatus of the oblast! At which Postyshev replied in the same vein, that "I arrested, am arresting, and will arrest, until I annihilate all enemies and spies! But he was in a dangerous solitude: two hours after this polemic he was demonstratively dismissed from his post as candidate member of the Politburo, and none of the members of the Plenum stood up to defend him.

— Komsomolskaia Pravda Nov. 19, 2002.

The document confirming Postyshev's expulsion and arrest is reprinted in Getty & Naumov, pp. 514-6. Khrushchev was one of those who spoke up forcefully against Postyshev (G&N 512). For Khrushchev's appointment to replace Postyshev as candidate member of Politburo, Stalinskoe Politbiuro... p. 167.

Rogovin's excerpt from January 1938 CC Plenum on Postyshev:

On the character of Postyshev's speech, which was in fact converted into his interrogation, the following fragment of the transcript will give an idea:

Postyshev: The leadership there (in the Kuybyshev oblast), both that of the party and of the Soviets, was enemies, beginning from the oblast leadership and ending with that of the raions.

Mikoian: Everybody?

Postyshev: How can you be surprised? ... I added it up and it comes out that enemies have been sitting there for 12 years. On the Soviet side the same enemy leadership has been sitting there. There they sat and selected their cadres. For example, in our oblast executive committee we had the most obdurate enemies right down to the technical workers, enemies who confessed to their wrecking activity and behaved insolently, beginning with the chairman of the oblast executive committee, with his assistant, consultants, secretaries — all were enemies. Absolutely all the sections of the oblast executive committee were soiled with enemies. ... Now take the chairmen of the raion executive committees — all were enemies. Sixty chairmen of raiispolkoms — all enemies. The overwhelming majority of second secretaries — I'm not even speaking of first secretaries — are enemies, and not only enemies, but there were also many spies among them: Poles, Latvians, they selected all kinds of died-in-the-wool swine...

Bulganin: Were there at least some honest people there... It turned out that there was not a single honest person.

Postyshev: I am talking about the leadership, the heads. From the leading body, of the secretaries of the raion committees, the chairmen of the raiispolkoms, there was almost not a single honest man. And how can you be surprised?

Molotov: Aren't you exaggerating, comrade Postyshev?

Postyshev: No, I'm not exaggerating. Here, take the oblast executive committee. People are in prison. We have investigative materials, and they confess, they themselves confess their enemy and espionage work.

Molotov: We must verify the materials.

Mikoian: It turns out that there are enemies below, in every raion committee.

Beria: Is it possible that all members of the plenums of the raion committees were enemies?

Kaganovich: There is no basis to say that they are all swindlers.

Stalin evaluated Postyshev's methods this way: "This is the massacre of the organization. They are very easy on themselves, but they're shooting everybody in the raion organizations. ... This means stirring up the party masses against the CC, it can't be understood any other way." (Furr, Khrushchev Lied, 283-285).

Kotkin conceals the fact that Stalin was opposed to mass repressions of Party members! That would ill comport with Kotkin's portrayal of Stalin as a bloodthirsty tyrant.

Kotkin Smears Voroshilov

Voroshilov ... had never acquired genuine military training. He had not served in the tsarist army, despite being the right age. (395)

Kotkin gives his readers the impression that Voroshilov was a "draft dodger" or some other kind of shirker. But there is no reference to this passage. No wonder! Voroshilov had been exiled for his radical political activity, which went back to 1903 and involved many arrests and several sentences of exile, from which he escaped. He was amnestied, but was unable to find work.

Voroshilov was just the sort of person the Tsarist recruiters wanted to keep out of the army. Pursued by the police, he eventually got a job in an armaments factory in Tsaritsyn after having been unable to find work in Lugansk, in the Donbass.

My source for this is the Russian Wikipedia page on Voroshilov.⁹ The corresponding English language Wikipedia page does not have this information on Voroshilov.

Workers on the Moscow-Volga Canal

On April 22, Stalin paid his third visit to a part of the eighty-mile canal linking the Moscow and Volga rivers ... The canal was built by Gulag laborers, more than 20,000 of whom likely perished. (404)

No evidence is given for this statement. Note the word "likely"! Kotkin doesn't know the number but puts one in anyway.

The primary source for this kind of information is A.I. Kokurin, IU. N Morukov, eds. Stalinskie Stroiki GULAGA 1930 — 1953. Dokumenty. [Stalinist GULAG Construction] Moscow: MDF — "Materik" 2005, 30-102. The mortality figures cited here are not for canal workers but for the "Dmitlag" camp as a whole. The total of deaths recorded in the camp between September 14, 1932, and January 31, 1938, is 22,842.

By far the highest number of deaths — 39% of the total — is recorded for 1933 — 8873. (77) This was the year of famine in much of the USSR, and also of serious typhus. There was a severely elevated death rate throughout the Soviet Union during these same years. Omitting this information gives the impression that these people were "worked to death" or died from poor conditions.

But that is not the case. According to the same source (63) the working day was 10 hours long. Breakfast lasted 45 minutes, dinner two hours, and three hours in the evening were devoted to cultural and educational activities.

These were better conditions than existed for millions of workers in the capitalist world, to say nothing of the colonies of the Western imperialist countries. And far better than for prisoners in the prisons of the West.

More Lies About Lavrentii Beria

About the June, 1937 Central Committee Plenum, Kotkin writes:

Instead of allowing discussion of Beria's past, Stalin had Kaminsky arrested and expelled that very day.⁶⁸ (510)

Note 68 (1010): 68. Pavliukhhov [sic; should be "Pavliukov"], Ezhov, 296-7.

Kotkin suppresses the fact that Pavliukov takes this testimony from the Gorbachev-era anti-Beria slander book Oni ne molchali. Then Pavliukov refutes it — proves it wrong!

We have already shown that Ont ne molchali is no good as a source. Zhavoronkov and Pariiskii is also in Oni ne molchali (199-214). They cite Khrushchev (see above), and otherwise quotes unpublished memoirs — that is, rumors. Kotkin even notes that these people did not attend the Plenum.

Kaminsky got "ten years without the right of correspondence," which meant he was executed.⁷¹ (511)

Note 71 (1010): 71. The sentence was carried out Feb. 10, 1938, at Yagoda's former dacha (Kommunarka).

This is false. According to the Russian Wikipedia page on Kaminsky and to the lists compiled by the "Memorial Society," he was sentenced on February 2, 1938, to execution for membership in a terrorist organization, not to "ten years, etc."¹⁰

¹⁰ [[[cyrillic]]See <http://lists.memo.ru/d15/fl73.htm#n122>; https://ru.wikipedia.org/wiki/Каминский,_Григорий_Наумович

Kaminsky was accused by a number of others, including Iakov Iakovlev and Krestinsky, and Kaminsky himself accused others of being part of the Right-Trotskyist bloc (conspiracy). He is named a dozen times in the materials sent by Yezhov to Stalin and printed in "Golgofa."

So Kaminsky was not arrested, much less tried, sentenced, and executed, for anything he said about Beria. In fact, Beria was not yet in the NKVD yet — that did not happen until August, 1938.

Why Was Viktorov Imprisoned?

Why Stalin let Yezhov remain at the helm for so long remains mysterious. By summer 1938, the insanity in the NKVD had gotten to the point that at least one newly appointed provincial NKVD chief released large numbers of prisoners and wrote to Lubyanka about the outrageous falsifications.²²⁵ (540)

Note 225 (1014): "225. One example was Mikhail Viktorov (Novoselov), newly named as NKVD chief in Sverdlovsk, who turned up a shocking state of affairs, even by standards of the terror, in the work of his predecessor (Dmitriev). Viktorov freed a large number of prisoners and sent Lubyanka a long analysis of local falsifications of cases. Pavliukov, Ezhov, 444-5 (citing TsA FSB, sledstvennoe delo no. R-24334, t.1, l. 67-8). Viktorov would be arrested on Jan. 22, 1939, and sentenced to fifteen years; he died in a camp in 1950."

Kotkin fails to say why Viktorov was arrested and imprisoned. But there is a report on Viktorov, in the so-called "Stalin shooting lists."¹¹ Viktorov was convicted of being a participant in Yezhov's conspiracy to overthrow the government. He was named by others in the conspiracy including Yezhov, Uspensky, Nasedkin, and Bel'sky.

¹¹ At <http://stalin.memo.ru/spravki/13-063.HTM>

In 1941 Viktorov was sentenced to 15 years imprisonment. He is listed as "Category 1" in the "shooting lists," which means that the NKVD recommended that he be executed if found guilty. But he was not executed. Instead, he was sentenced to 15 years and died in a prison camp in 1950.¹²

¹² [[cyrillic]]See

https://ru.wikipedia.org/wiki/Викторов,_Михаил_Петрович

This is yet another example that the so-called "Stalin shooting lists" were not "shooting lists" at all, but recommendations by the NKVD to the Procuracy (prosecutor) of sentences in the event the accused was convicted. (See "Lies About The Lists" in Chapter 10, above). Viktorov was one of many cases in which the recommendation was not followed by the court.

Kotkin Ignores Stalin's Struggle for Democracy, II

On October 11-12, 1938, he [Stalin] convened a two-day expanded session of the politburo (an ersatz Central Committee plenum), (575)

Kotkin mentions nothing about the abandonment of contested elections, which is discussed in Zhukov, Inoi Stalin, 475-6. Stalin was outvoted even in the Politburo! Some "dictator"! Was Adolf Hitler ever "outvoted" by his own Party leadership? 'Nuff said!

Kotkin suppresses all this. Why? At least two reasons: (1) Stalin was struggling for a kind of representative system, with contested elections, that Kotkin's readers would recognize as democratic and sympathize with; (2) since Stalin was defeated by his own Politburo, it would be clear to Kotkin's readers that Stalin was not a dictator.

Was Gnedin Innocent?

"Beria and Kobulov put me on a chair and sat on either side and punched me in the head, playing 'swings,'" recalled Yevgeny Gnedin, the press officer of the foreign affairs commissariat. "They beat me horribly, with the full force of their arms, demanding I give testimony against Litvinov."²⁶⁰

Note 260 (1027): "260. Gnedin, Katastrofa i votoroe [sic — should be vtoroe] rozhdnie, 128-52. Gnedin would be the only one to survive to old age from the Soviet embassy or trade mission to Berlin."

Kotkin either did not check, or chose to hide from his readers, the report (Spravka) on Gnedin from the Stalin lists.¹³ The report, prepared by the NKVD, accuses Gnedin of espionage for Germany in some detail — the most serious charges conceivable.

¹³ At <http://stalin.memo.ru/spravki/13-098.HTM>

Gnedin was named by other conspirators, including Mikhail Kol'tsov, in a face-to-face confrontation. Gnedin is also mentioned at least 52 [sic] times in Kol'tsov's confessions.

In the list itself Gnedin is "Category 1" — recommendation to execute if convicted. Yet Gnedin too was not executed (see Viktorov, above)!¹⁴

¹⁴ At <http://stalin.memo.ru/names/p87.htm#n76>

Once again, we see that the so-called "Stalin shooting lists" were not "shooting lists" at all, not "death warrants" — whatever that is supposed to mean. In Gnedin's case, as in Viktorov's, the Prosecutor and judges must have found some mitigating circumstances, or at least that some of the accusations were unreliable.

In 1941, under Beria, he was sentenced to 10 years. His letter to the Presidium of July 16, 1953, was evidently used in the campaign against Beria by Khrushchev et al.¹⁵

¹⁵ See <http://istmat.info/node/27469>

So was Gnedin telling the truth about being beaten by Beria and Kobulov? Maybe — or maybe he was just lying. July, 1953, was a good time to expect leniency if one gave the kind of evidence against Beria that Khrushchev wanted.

Kotkin ignores this (or perhaps he is ignorant of it). His account gives the impression that Gnedin was an innocent victim. Maybe he was. Maybe not. But the evidence at our, and at Kotkin's disposal today does not suggest innocence.

Was Isaak Babel' Innocent?

Kotkin writes:

Babel suffered from his association with Yezhov, who, under interrogation, had named him as a spy. According to the interrogation protocols, Babel implicated Eisenstein ("The organizers of the Soviet film industry were preventing gifted individuals from revealing their talents to the full"), Solomon Mikhoels ("constantly dissatisfied that the Soviet repertoire gave him no chance to demonstrate his talents"), and Ehrenburg ("In Ehrenburg's view, the continued wave of arrests forced all Soviet citizens to break off any relations with foreigners").³⁰⁶ Babel would also sign a bloodstained protocol confessing to membership in a Trotskyite espionage organization on behalf of France, linked to Malraux.³⁰⁷ (635)

Note 306 (1028): 306. Shentalinsky, KGB's Literary Archive, 42, 47. See also Povarov, Prichina smerti rasstrel; Pirozhkova, At His Side, 115.

Note 307 (1028): 307. Shentalinskii, "Proshu menia vyslushat," 430-43.¹⁶

¹⁶ This is the second part of Shentalinskii's book Raby svobody (1999). It is far easier to obtain it there than in the format cited here by Kotkin, a 1991 article in the hard-to-obtain journal Vozvrashchenie.

A confirmed anticommunist, Vitalii Shentalinsky is strongly committed to the position that Babel' and other executed or imprisoned artists were innocent. But even Shentalinskii admits that there is a great deal of evidence against Babel'. He was certainly closely involved with both Yezhov and his wife.

None of the books Kotkin cites have any evidence that Babel was innocent. Moreover, Babel made long confessions of guilt, some of which are quoted at length in Raby Svobody and other books by Shentalinskii. KGB's Literary Archive quotes excerpts only at pages 42 and 47. All the authors whose works Kotkin cites in note 306 assume, without evidence, that Babel was innocent.

On page 115 Babel's wife Pirozhkova simply writes that Meyerhold and Kol'tsov were arrested "at almost the same time as Babel." She fails to note that this was because they were all accused, and eventually convicted, of being involved in Nikolai Yezhov's plot to overthrow the Soviet government — a plot about which we have a lot of evidence, some of which I discuss in Yezhov vs Stalin.¹⁷

¹⁷ Pirozhkova reveals that when she was called for Party work (she was a Party member) she reminded her superior that she was the wife of a man — Babel — arrested for a serious crime. She was told that this "had no bearing on your situation," and was assigned to Party work like any other member.

Babel subsequently retracted his confessions. But Yezhov and Kol'tsov accused Babel, and perhaps others did too. According to Soviet practice, Babel' would have been convicted by evidence other than his confessions, which could not be used at trial if retracted by the defendant.

To make an intelligent assessment of Babel's guilt or innocence we would need both Babel's entire investigative file, and the confessions against him by his accusers. Since Kotkin includes a discussion of Babel in his book, he should have pointed out these barriers to understanding Babel's conviction and execution. But he fails to do so.

What About Meyerhold?

Vsevolod Meyerhold, the USSR's most renowned theater director, who had traveled to Leningrad to finalize the choreography of a mass spectacle of physical culture involving 30,000 young athletes moving in unison to glorify the regime, was rewarded by being arrested. At Moscow's infamous Butyrka prison, he would be tortured into confessing to espionage for Britain as well as Japan. "The investigators began to use force on me, a sick, 65-year-old man," he wrote in a letter to Molotov. "I was made to lie facedown and then beaten on the soles of my feet and my spine with a rubber strap. ... When those parts of my legs were covered with extensive internal hemorrhaging, they again began to beat the red-blue-yellow bruises with the strap, and the pain was so intense that it felt as if boiling hot water was being poured on those sensitive areas. ... I began to incriminate myself in the hope that this, at least, would lead quickly to the scaffold." Meyerhold's interrogators had urinated into his mouth and smashed his right (writing) hand to bits.⁴⁰ (649)

Note 40 (1029): 40. Koliazin, "Vernite mne svobodu!," 220-40.

The documents in Koliazin 220-240 record Meyerhold's attempts to retract earlier confessions. But we do not have the text of those earlier confessions. Why not?

As in the case of Babel', Kotkin should have pointed out that the fact that an accused person first confesses guilt and subsequently retracts his confession does not establish whether the person was guilty or innocent. What it does is to force the prosecution to place more importance on testimony against the defendant by others who inculpate him. This is may be what occurred in Meyerhold's case.

Kotkin fails to inform his readers that Meyerhold was named as a Trotskyist and spy by Mikhail Kol'tsov and Isaak Babel', among others. (RKEB 1, 270-272) He named others in turn. We don't have the testimony against Meyerhold given by Kol'tsov and Babel'.

The claim that the interrogators urinated into his mouth and smashed his right hand is contradicted by documents Kotkin himself cites! The words in the quotation above are from his statement of January 13, 1940. There Meyerhold claims that his NKVD interrogators told him they would leave his head and his right hand untouched." (Koliazin, 230)

There is nothing about interrogators "urinating into his mouth." Why did Kotkin feel obliged to compose these fabrications? Did he actually read

Koliazin, pages 220-240?

The fact that a person retracts his confession of guilt raises the question: "Was he lying then? Or is he lying now?" After all, we normally expect that both the innocent and the guilty will deny their guilt. But a person who has been beaten — tortured — into signing a false confession may well deny it later.

So we don't know. As in Babel's case Kotkin should have explained the difficulties in assessing Meyerhold's guilt or innocent.

Yezhov Named Both Meyerhold And Babel'

On page 740 Kotkin states:

On January 17, 1940, Stalin approved a sentencing list containing 457 prominent people; 346 were to be shot, including Yezhov, as well as the writer Isaac Babel, the journalist-propagandist Koltsov, and the dramaturge Meyerhold, three of the country's long-standing brightest lights, each of whom Yezhov had implicated as spies.¹⁹⁸

Note 198 (1041): 198. APRF, f. 3, op. 24, d. 177, l. 116-36.

This archival identifier will not help Kotkin's readers — it is an error for this one: "APRF. f. 3. Op. 24. D. 377. l. 116-136." This is the "Stalin shooting list" of January 16, 1940 where Babel' and Meyerhold are listed, along with many of Yezhov's torturer-interrogators who were complicit in his mass murders.

The Murder Of Zinaida Reich (Correctly: Raikh)

Kotkin:

Right around the same time, his [Meyerhold's — GF] second wife and lead actress, the Russified ethnic German Zinaida Reich, was brutally stabbed to death, including through the eyes, in their home.⁴¹ None of her valuables were taken.⁴² (649)

Zinaida Raikh's murderers were caught, tried, and executed. A report ("spravka") on the burglars and murderers is in the Stalin lists.¹⁸ Why doesn't Kotkin tell us that? Is it because it seems more sinister — as if Stalin, or Beria, or someone, might have had her murdered?

Kotkin's Omissions / Falsifications About September, 1939

September, 1939: The Soviet Seizure of Western Ukraine and Western Belorussia from Poland

There was no Soviet declaration of war. Potyomkin summoned Polish ambassador Grzybowski at 3:15 a.m. and read aloud a note, in the name of Molotov, unilaterally abrogating the Soviet-Polish nonaggression pact; the envoy refused to take the document.²⁵⁵ ... On the radio, Molotov announced a Soviet military action supposedly necessitated by the disappearance of the Polish state and the possible ensuing chaos. "The Soviet government regards as its sacred duty to proffer help to its Ukrainian and Belorussian brothers in Poland," he stated.²⁵⁷ In fact, the Polish government continued to function, having relocated to Kutu, in the southeast, on the Polish side of the border with Romania. (683-4)

The sentences above in boldface are misleading because Kotkin conceals from his readers many crucial facts. Here are some of them:

1. There was no declaration of war because the USSR was not at war with Poland.

The myth of the "joint invasion" is a fabrication by the anticommunist Polish Government In Exile. It was rejected by the Allies at the time but picked up once the Cold War began in the 1940s. All the Western Allies recognized Soviet neutrality.¹⁹

¹⁹ For evidence that the Soviet Union was neutral in the German-Polish War, see "Soviet Neutrality" at:
https://msuweb.montclair.edu/~furrgr/research/mlg09/soviet_neutrality.html

Winston Churchill strongly supported the Soviet incursion into Eastern Poland. In his radio speech of October 1, 1939, printed in the New York Times on October 2, 1939, page 6, Churchill, at the time First Lord of the Admiralty, said:

Russia has pursued a cold policy of self-interest. We could have wished that the Russian Armies should be standing on their present line as the friends and allies of Poland. But that the Russian Armies should stand on this line was clearly necessary for the safety of Russia against the Nazi menace.

Churchill also agreed that it was in the interest of the Allies to have the Red Army occupying these territories:

... here these interests of Russia fall into the same channel as the interests of Britain and France.

2. The Polish state had indeed ceased to function. Neither the Polish Army nor Ambassador Grzybowski were able to contact it. Grzybowski did not even know where it was.

3. Later the same day, September 17, 1939, the Polish government crossed the border into Rumania, where it was interned and was no longer a government.²⁰

²⁰ See the evidence at https://msuweb.montclair.edu/~furrgr/research/mlg09/polish_leaders_flee.html and "Moscicki and His 'Resignation'" at https://msuweb.montclair.edu/~furrgr/research/mlg09/moscicki_resignation.html

4. The Germans had told the Soviets that if they did not intervene a pro-fascist Ukrainian state would be formed next to the Soviet border.²¹

²¹ See the evidence at

https://msuweb.montclair.edu/~furrgr/research/mlg09/no_partition.html

5. No treaty was broken, since a "fundamental change in circumstances" had occurred.

Rebus Sic Stantibus

[Latin, At this point of affairs; in these circumstances.] A tacit condition attached to all treaties to the effect that they will no longer be binding as soon as the state of facts and conditions upon which they were based changes to a substantial degree.²²

Clausula rebus sic stantibus

In public international law, clausula rebus sic stantibus (Latin for 1 'things thus standing') is the legal doctrine allowing for treaties to become inapplicable because of a fundamental change of circumstances. It is essentially an "escape clause" that makes an exception to the general rule of pacta sunt servanda (promises must be kept).²³

²² West's Encyclopedia of American Law, edition 2. Copyright 2008 The Gale Group, Inc. — <https://legal-dictionary.thefreedictionary.com/rebus+sic+stantibus>

²³ At https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Clausula_rebus_sic_stantibus

The Polish Government had lost contact with its ambassador to the Soviet Union and with the Polish Army, which was in the process of fleeing to internment in Romania (some parts interned themselves in the Baltic states).

The German Army would have come up to the Soviet border if the Red Army had not intervened.

Kotkin hides from his readers that during the 1950s American professor George Ginsburgs published two articles that vindicate the Soviet position. Ginsburgs²⁴ concluded:

For all these various reasons, it may safely be concluded that on this particular point the Soviet argument was successful, and that the "above considerations do not allow for any doubt that there did not exist a state of war between Poland and the U.S.S.R. in September, 1939." (72)

In spite of scattered protests to the contrary, the consensus heavily sides with the Soviet view that by September 17, 1939, the Polish Government was in panic and full flight, that it did not exercise any appreciable control over its armed forces or its remaining territory, and that the days of Poland were indeed numbered.

De facto, then, one may well accept the view that the Polish Government no longer functioned as an effective state power. In such a case the Soviet claim that Eastern Galicia was in fact a terra nullius may not be unjustified and could be sustained. (73)

The Lie Of The "Joint Military Parade"

On the afternoon of September 23, a ceremonial joint military parade was held in Brest-Litovsk to mark the German handover of the town that morning to the Soviets. Presiding over the event, on an improvised low platform, were the respective tank commanders Heinz Guderian, who had been born just 300 miles away in Chelmno (Kulm), and Semyon Krivoshein. The two shook hands. But the Luftwaffe flew aggressively low passes, and the two sides tussled over the city's war booty.²⁷³ (686)

Note 273 (1035): 273. Krivoshein, Mezhdubur'e, 234-9; Schmidt-Scheeder, Reporter der Hölle, 101; Deutscher Allgemeine Zeitung, Sept. 25, 1939.

This is a falsehood. There was no "joint victory parade." Brest, on the border between the German and Soviet spheres of influence, was handed over to the Soviet commander General Semion M. Krivoshein by the German commander, Heinz Guderian.

Both men wrote about this event in their memoirs. Krivoshein wrote that a parade had been stipulated in the agreement between the Soviet and German commands and therefore he was forced to agree to one, though unwillingly. But Krivoshein refused to have a joint parade since the German troops had been rested for a week while his own had just made a night march of 120 km and would not have the spit-and-polish appearance necessary for a parade. The two commanders agreed that the German troops would march by while the Soviet troops, upon entering Brest, would stand on the side of the road and salute the German troops while the two orchestras played military marches.²⁵

Guderian called this a "farewell parade" and "ceremony of changing of flags," after which the German troops withdrew from Brest:

Eine Abschiedsparade und ein Flaggenwechsel in Gegenwart des Generals Kriwoschein beendete unsern Aufenthalt in Brest-Litowsk.²⁶

A farewell parade and an exchange of flags in the presence of General Krivoshein ended our stop in Brest-Litovsk.

Soviet Union in Timothy Snyder's Bloodlands Is False. (New York: Red Star Publishers, 2013), 329-330.

Krivoshein and — surprisingly — Guderian too agree that the Soviet forces prevented the Germans from driving off with trucks of booty looted from Brest. There is an excellent article online, in Russian, that gives yet more evidence.²⁷ Oleg Vishliov's well-documented refutation of the "joint parade" fiction is strongly recommended.

The Soviet Union Was Not An Aggressor

At least 70,000 Poles were killed and nearly 700,000 taken prisoner by the aggressors on both sides.²⁷⁶

There was no "aggression" on the Soviet side. Every country recognized Soviet neutrality. Kotkin has to know this. But his readers will not know it. Once again, Kotkin has falsified an important political-historical issue.

The following passage from my book Blood Lies gives the evidence that the Soviets were not guilty of aggression.

The USSR did not invade Poland — and everybody knew it at the time.

When Poland had no government, Poland was no longer a state. That meant that Hitler had nobody with whom to negotiate a cease-fire, or treaty. Furthermore, the M-R Treaty's Secret Protocols were void, since they were an agreement about the state of Poland. But no state of Poland existed any longer.

Unless the Red Army came in to prevent it, there was nothing to prevent the Nazis from coming right up to the Soviet border. Or as we now know they were in fact preparing to do Hitler could have formed one or more pro-Nazi states in what had until recently been Eastern Poland. That way Hitler could have had it both ways. He could claim to the Soviets that he was still adhering to the "spheres of influence" agreement of the M-R Pact while in fact setting up a pro-Nazi, highly militarized fascist Ukrainian nationalist state on the Soviet border.

Once the Germans had told the Soviets that they, the German leadership, had decided that the Polish state no longer existed, then it did not make any difference whether the Soviets, or some hypothetical body of international jurists, agreed with them or not. In effect the Nazis were telling the Soviets that they felt free to come right up to the Soviet border. Neither the USSR nor any state would have permitted such a thing. Nor did international law demand it.

At the end of September a new secret agreement was concluded. In it the Soviet line of interest was to the East of the "sphere of influence" line decided upon a month earlier in the Secret Protocol and published in Izvestiia and in the New York Times during September 1939.²⁹ In this territory Poles were a minority, even after the "polonization" (= making more "Polish") campaign of settling Poles in the area during the '20s and '30s.³⁰

How do we know this interpretation of events is true?

How do we know the USSR did not commit aggression against, or "invade," Poland when it occupied Eastern Poland beginning on September 17, 1939 after the Polish Government had interned itself in Rumania? Here are nine pieces of evidence:

1. The Polish government did not declare war on USSR. The Polish government declared war on Germany when Germany invaded on September 1, 1939. It did not declare war on the USSR.

2. The Polish Supreme Commander Rydz-Smigly ordered Polish soldiers not to fight the Soviets, though he ordered Polish forces to continue to fight the Germans.³¹

3. The Polish President Ignaz Moscicki, interned in Rumania since Sept. 17, tacitly admitted that Poland no longer had a government.

4. The Rumanian government tacitly admitted that Poland no longer had a government.³²

The Rumanian position recognized the fact that Moscicki was lying when he claimed he had legally resigned on September 30. So the Rumanian government fabricated a story according to which Moscicki had already resigned back on September 15, just before entering Rumania and being interned (NYT 10.04.1939, p.12). But even Moscicki himself did not make this claim!

Rumania needed this legal fiction to try to sidestep the following issue: once Moscicki had been interned in Rumania — that is, from September 17 1939 — on he could not function as President of Poland. Since resignation is an official act, Moscicki could not resign once he was in Rumania.

For our present purposes here is the significant point:

Both the Polish leaders and the Rumanian government recognized that Poland was bereft of a government once the Polish government crossed the border into Rumania and were interned there. Both Moscicki and Rumania wanted a legal basis — a fig-leaf — for such a government. But they disagreed completely about this fig-leaf which exposes it as what it was — a fiction.

5. Rumania had a military treaty with Poland aimed against the USSR. Yet Rumania did not declare war on the USSR.

The Polish government later claimed that it had "released" Rumania from its obligations under this military treaty in return for safe haven in Rumania. But there is no evidence for this statement. It is highly unlikely that Rumania would have ever promised "safe haven" for Poland, since that would have been an act of hostility against Nazi Germany. Rumania was neutral in the war and, as discussed below, insisted upon interning the Polish government and disarming the Polish forces once they had crossed the border into Rumania.

The real reason for Rumania's failure to declare war on the USSR is probably the one given in a New York Times article of September 19, 1939:

The Rumanian viewpoint concerning the Rumanian-Polish anti-Soviet agreement is that it would be operative only if a Russian attack came as an isolated event and not as a consequence of other wars.³³

That means Rumania recognized that the Red Army was not allied with Germany in its war with Poland.

6. France did not declare war on the USSR, though it had a mutual defense treaty with Poland. See this page 34 for the reconstructed text of the "secret military protocol" of this treaty, which has been "lost" which probably means that the French government still keeps its text secret.

7. England never demanded that the USSR withdraw its troops from Western Belorussia and Western Ukraine, the parts of the former Polish state occupied by the Red Army after September 17, 1939. On the contrary, the British government concluded that these territories should not be a part of a future Polish state. Even the Polish government-in-exile agreed!³⁵

8. The League of Nations did not determine the USSR had invaded a member state. Article 16 of the League of Nations Covenant required members to take trade and economic sanctions against any member who "resorted to war."³⁶

But no country took any sanctions against the USSR. No country broke diplomatic relations with the USSR over this action.

However, when the USSR attacked Finland in 1939 the League did vote to expel the USSR, and several countries broke diplomatic relations with it. This very different response tells us that the League viewed the Soviet action in the case of Poland as qualitatively different, as not a "resort to war."³⁷

9. All countries accepted the USSR's declaration of neutrality. All, including the belligerent Polish allies France and England, agreed that the USSR was not a belligerent power, was not participating in the war. In effect they accepted the USSR's claim that it was neutral in the conflict.

Here is President Franklin Roosevelt's "Proclamation 2374 on Neutrality," November 4, 1939:

... a state of war unhappily exists between Germany and France; Poland; and the United Kingdom, India, Australia, Canada, New Zealand and the Union of South Africa ...³⁸

FDR's "Statement on Combat Areas" of November 4, 1939, defines belligerent ports, British, French, and German, in Europe or Africa ...³⁹

The Soviet Union is not listed among the belligerent states. That means the United States government did not consider the USSR to be at war with Poland.

More Phony Charges of Torture

Around this time, death sentences based upon fabricated evidence were implemented for cultural figures, as well as former NKVD first deputy Mikhail Frinovsky, former deputy foreign intelligence chief Spigelglas, former intelligence chief and Comintern operative Trilisser, Yefim Yevdokimov, and Redens, Stalin's ethnic Polish brother-in-law (part of a "Polish diversionary-espionage group"). ... Under interrogation-torture, Redens had admitted his complicity in the annihilation of innocent people while working atop the NKVD in Ukraine, Moscow, and Kazakhstan. His wife Anna Nadya's sister and their two boys were not touched, and the family continued to live in the elite House on the Embankment and were allowed to visit Svetlana at Zubalovo (but not the Kremlin).²⁰⁴ (742)

Note 204 (1041): 204. Zhukovskii, Lubianskaia imperia NKVD, 214-5.

Pages 214-5 of Zhukovskii's book are about Efim Evdokimov, another of Yezhov's killers. Kotkin must mean pages 217-8, which are about Redens.

There is no evidence of "fabricated evidence" against any of the unidentified "cultural figures," or against Frinovsky, Shpigelglas, Evdokimov, or Redens. Kotkin has invented — indeed, fabricated! — the business about Frinovsky and Redens being "tortured."

During the Gorbachev era there was an attempt to rescind Redens' Khrushchev-era "rehabilitation" — that is, to "un-rehabilitate" Redens — because even Gorby's men, who were "rehabilitating" a very large number of people, thought Redens was guilty. But the statute of limitations — the time period during which his rehabilitation might have been withdrawn — had long elapsed. So Redens remains "rehabilitated." And therefore we can have access to his NKVD investigative file, since as of 2018 the FSB is only permitting access to the files of those persons who have been "rehabilitated."

Redens' file, now declassified, contains much useful evidence: see Yezhov vs. Stalin, Chapter 15, "The Testimony of Stanislav Frantsevich Redens." Redens testified at length and in detail about Yezhov's conspiracy against Stalin and the Soviet government. Kotkin does not mention any of this. Incompetence? Dishonesty?

In another chapter of the present book we examine Frinovsky's statement of April 11, 1939. We point out that Frinovsky is very clear that the Moscow Trials defendants were guilty; that the Zinovievist, Rightist, Trotskyist, and Yezhov-NKVD conspiracies, did exist and were serious threats. We point out that Kotkin does not reveal any of this to his readers.

An English translation of Frinovsky's statement has been online since 2010.⁴⁰ Kotkin could have cited it. It would have helped his readers. Why didn't he?

⁴⁰ It may be read in English at <https://msuweb.montclair.edu/~furrgr/research/frinovskyeng.html>

Finland, The Russo-Finnish War / Winter War, And The Nazis

Just as the Winter War had definitively pushed Finland into the German camp, the seizure of Bessarabia and northern Bukovina consolidated Romania as a staunch German ally.⁷⁸

Note 78 (1046): 78. Gafencu, Last Days of Europe, 390-2.

This is as phony a footnote as they come! In Kotkin's bibliography (1083 col. 2) the Gafencu book is by Yale University Press, 1948. As I write these lines I have that edition before me. There are no pages 390-2. The last page in it is numbered 239! What's more, the words "Bessarabia" and "Bukovina" do not occur in this book.

In the preceding footnote, number 77, Kotkin mentions that Romania had annexed Bessarabia. But Kotkin does not reveal that Bessarabia had been taken by force from Soviet Russia. Accordingly, Soviet Russia never recognized Romania's claim to Bessarabia. Britain, France, and Italy decided that Bessarabia should join Romania in the Treaty of Paris (1920). Japan did not ratify the treaty. The United States refused to do so as well, because Soviet Russia was not represented at the talks. Readers who do not study his footnotes, however, will not know this.

Since its founding in 1918 Finland had been extremely hostile to the Soviet Union. It had allowed foreign powers to use its territory to invade the fledgling Soviet Russia and had massacred communist and pro-communist rebels during the Finnish Civil War. It was no democracy — the very popular Finnish Communist Party was outlawed. Finland and Romania were already in the German camp and would have allied with Hitler in any case, since neutrality was impossible and they would never have sided with the Soviet Union.⁴¹

⁴¹ See N.I. Baryshnikov, "The Soviet-Finnish War of 1939-1940." Soviet Studies in History 3 (1990), 43-60.

According to German Foreign Minister von Ribbentrop, Finland was egged on in its hostility to the USSR by England.

England was behind Finland and according to intelligence received, England was also responsible for the failure of the Russo-Finnish negotiations last November.⁴²

⁴² Nazi-Soviet Relations 1939-1941. Documents from the German Foreign Office. Ed. Raymond James Sontag and James Stuard Beddie. Washington, DC: Department of State, 1948, p. 130.

The Finnish political scientist and military historian Martti Turtola has written:

It simply cannot be overlooked that Finland pursued a dangerously aggressive, menacing foreign policy prior to the war.⁴³

⁴³ Martti Turtola: 'Guilty or Innocent? Approaches to the Winter War in Research and Memoirs', in Yearbook of Finnish Foreign Policy. (Helsinki; 1990), 45. See the Finnish Wikipedia entry about Martti Turtola at https://fi.wikipedia.org/wiki/Martti_Turtola

Kotkin omits all this important contextual information.

Who Dismembered Whom?

Cripps believed it was possible to go beyond even the latter and get Britain and the Soviet Union to join forces against Germany, notwithstanding the Hitler-Stalin nonaggression and trade pacts, the dismemberment of Poland, the aggression against Finland, and now the Soviet annexation of the Baltic states.⁸⁵ A lawyer rather than a diplomat, Cripps was capable of criticizing Soviet realities, but he had defended Stalin's arrests of British nationals as spies in fabricated trials, as well as the Soviet Union's 1939 seizure of eastern Poland. (776)

Note 85 (1046) is about Sir Stafford Cripps.

Cripps, not Kotkin, was correct. The trials were not "fabricated." In previous chapters we have shown that Kotkin can cite no evidence that they were. But "fabricated trials" is an essential component of the Anti-Stalin Paradigm. So the mere lack of evidence cannot stop Kotkin and others from falsely claiming that they were fabricated. (For the positive evidence that they were not fabricated, see The Moscow Trials As Evidence.)

Kotkin does not mention that it was Poland that had "dismembered" Soviet Russia in the Polish-Soviet War of 1919-1921. In defeat, Russia was forced to give Poland Western Ukraine and Western Belorussia. In 1939 the USSR took back from Poland the areas that Poland had taken by force from Soviet Russia.

A discussion of the Curzon Line and the Treaty of Riga of 1921 is essential for any understanding of this issue. But the Curzon line is only mentioned once in this huge book (690) and is never explained.⁴⁴

⁴⁴ For the Curzon Line, see "The Curzon Line" at <https://msuweb.montclair.edu/~furrgr/research/mlg09/curzonline.html> and the whole article, "Did the Soviet Union Invade Poland in September 1939? NO!" at https://msuweb.montclair.edu/~furrgr/research/mlg09/page_of_links.html I also discuss it in Blood Lies (see the Index).

Chapter 14. A Little Source Criticism by Kotkin! Why Doesn't He Do It All The Time?

Poland, a nasty regime sandwiched directly between two nastier ones, sought a middle way. Some members of Polish ruling circles latched on to the idea of throwing in their lot with Hitler to deflect him farther eastward, even at the high cost of territorial concessions, and a few high-placed Poles fantasized about a joint Polish-Nazi attack on the USSR, an aggression in which they imagined Poland could wrest Ukraine from the Soviets, a delusion that Nazi officials cynically encouraged.⁸⁶ (596)

Note 86 (1022): 86. Gerstenberg knew how much the Soviets despised Beck. Tainy diplomatii Tret'ego Reikka [sic; should be "Reikha"], 581 (TsA FSB, d. N-21147, t. 1, l. 35-53).

Gerstenberg's information about Beck is at fourth hand: Göring — von Moltke — Gerstenberg — interrogator. That does not mean it is false — but it does not mean that it is true either. Here is the text, from Tainy diplomatii tret'ego reikha, 581:

Question: It is well known that Goering often visited Poland. Was he really only interested in hunting in Poland?

Answer: Goering often went to Poland and other countries to hunt, but in reality he was not so much interested in hunting as in carrying out political tasks under this guise. Before my departure for Poland Goering told me that he would be travelling to Poland for hunting and would facilitate my task.

And in fact in 1938 Goering arrived in Poland, where he went hunting together with Polish Minister of Foreign Affairs de Beck. During this hunting trip Goering gave Beck a check for 300,000 marks, after which Beck began to strongly champion friendship with Germany.

Question: How do you know that Goering bribed Beck?

Answer: I learned that Beck had been bribed by Goering from Moltke, German ambassador to Poland, who took part in the hunting trip. In this connection Moltke said that Beck would not escape from our clutches.

In today's Poland Beck is honored as a national hero. So Gerstenberg's testimony is threatening to the present Polish regime and its dishonest glorification of the racist and fascist Polish regime of the 1920s and 1930s. In 2013 the moderator of H-Poland, an academic mailing list hosted by Michigan State University, refused a post of mine about Gerstenberg's revelation. I was informed that the members of the board of the Polish Studies Association "have concurred that this is not a topic that we wish to pursue on H-Poland."¹ In other words, "If the Polish government and its propagandists find it uncomfortable, don't discuss it."

Kotkin is correct to point out that Gerstenberg's testimony is hearsay. And this raises an interesting question: Why does Kotkin employ source criticism here, when the fact alleged makes anticommunists like Joseph Beck and the pre-war Polish leadership look bad, while failing to use source criticism when the facts alleged reflect badly upon Stalin and the Soviet leadership? Why does he "cherry-pick" when to use source criticism?

An objective historian, determined to discover the truth at all costs, even if it should contradict his own bias, is obliged to employ source criticism all the time. But as the analysis in this book amply shows, Kotkin is simply not such a historian.

Moreover, Kotkin has "buried" this important fact at the end of a long footnote. Few of his readers will see it. It should have been promoted to the main text.

Did Stalin Praise Hitler For Murdering His Rivals?

Izvestiya dedicated four columns on its front page to Hitler's Reichstag speech about the Night of the Long Knives.³¹⁵ "What a guy [molodets]," Stalin exclaimed to his inner circle, according to Mikoyan's later recollections. "Well done. Knows how to act!"³¹⁶ (175)

Note 316 (956): Nekrich, 1941, 19 (citing a personal conversation in the 1950s with Surits, the envoy in question).

In reality this story is not in the 1995 Russian edition of Nekrich's book, the one that Kotkin cites here (see his bibliography at page 1100, column 1), though Nekrich does claim that Stalin was sympathetic to Hitler's action.

This would be fourth-hand information: Stalin — Surits — Mikoyan — Nekrich. But let's pursue this story farther. Valentin Berezhkov, one of Stalin's translators, also claimed that Mikoyan told him!

[[cyrillic]]Когда в 1934 году Гитлер уничтожил своего соратника, руководителя штурмовых отрядов Эрнста Рема, и других командиров штурмовых отрядов СА, Сталин дал этой кровавой бойне высокую оценку. Микоян рассказывал мне, что на первом же после убийства Рема заседании политбюро Сталин сказал:

— Вы слышали, что произошло в Германии? Гитлер, какой молодец! Вот как надо поступать с политическими противниками!²

When Hitler annihilated his comrade-in-arms, the head of the SA (Sturmabteilung) Ernst Rohm and other commanders of the SA assault detachments in 1934, Stalin gave this bloody massacre a high rating. Mikoyan told me that at the very first meeting of the politburo after Rohm's murder Stalin said:

— Have you heard what happened in Germany? Hitler, what a great fellow! That's how to deal with political opponents!

² [[cyrillic]]Бережков Валентин Михайлович. Как я стал переводчиком Сталина. At https://royallib.com/read/beregkov_valentin/kak_ya_stal_perevodchikom_stalina.html#20480

Berezhkov says nothing about Surits. He claims that Mikoian told him, Berezhkov, directly.

In his autobiography Tak Bylo ("Thus It Was") Mikoian tells a very similar story.

[[cyrillic]]... когда Гитлер, стремясь укрепить свою власть, послал своих соратников в казармы штурмовиков и учинил там расправу на месте без суда и следствия над верхушкой левых штурмовиков — Ремом и другими, это поразительное зверство вызвало всеобщее возмущение. И я был поражен, когда Сталин, возвращаясь несколько раз к этому факту, восхищался смелостью, упорством Гитлера, который пошел на такую меру, чтобы укрепить свою власть. "Вот молодец, вот здорово, — говорил Сталин. — Это надо уметь!" (374/446)

... when Hitler, striving to strengthen his power, sent his comrades-in-arms to the attack room barracks and carried out the massacre on the spot, without trial, of the leadership of the left-wing SA. Rohm and others, this amazing atrocity caused general outrage. And I was amazed when Stalin, returning several times to this fact, admired the boldness and persistence of Hitler, who took such measures to confirm his power. "There's a great fellow, that's great," said Stalin. "We must learn how to do this!"

We can't check this specific story by means of other sources. As far as we can tell, only Mikoian claimed to have heard Stalin say this.

What about the reliability of Mikoian's memoirs? Michael Ellman, a ferociously anti-Stalin scholar, has his doubts. At the very end, Mikoian — here we should write "Mikoian" — regrets the lack of democracy in the USSR. Ellman writes:

Tak bylo is lively and interesting, but in some cases one has the suspicion that what is written reflects the views of the editor [Mikoian's son] at least as much as those of his late father. Did A. I. Mikoian really dictate or write the final paragraph of the book or did the editor add it to make the book more palatable to modern readers? (141)

Ascertaining to what extent Mikoian's memoirs are accurate would require detailed checking of particular incidents against other sources. For example, neither Khrushchev nor Simonov remembers the bold speech Mikoian recalls giving at the October (1952) Plenum, and this speech differs substantially from Efremov's, Mukhitdinov's, and Shepilov's reports of what took place at that dramatic and sinister meeting ... It cannot be excluded that Mikoian here reports what in retrospect he thinks he should have said at the plenum rather than what he actually said. (148)³

³ Slavic Review, Vol. 60, No. 1 (Spring, 2001), 140-150.

We can go farther than Ellman. For example: we know that the defendants in the three Moscow Trials were guilty of at least the crimes to which they confessed. We also know that the Military conspirators, and specifically the commanders tried and executed with Marshal Mikhail Tukhachevsky in June, 1937, were also guilty. But Mikoian claims they were all innocent!

Mikoian tells the tale that Stalin was "prostrated" at the beginning of the war, was almost unable to act at all, and acted as though the others on the Politburo were going to arrest him. This is not only unconfirmed by anyone else in a position to know — it is clear that it is false. We have good evidence that Stalin was very active from the outset of the war.

Mikoian defends Khrushchev's "Secret Speech" of February 25, 1956, to the XX Party Congress. We know today that every accusation in that speech levelled against Stalin and Lavrentii Beria is provably false.⁴ In his memoir Mikoian repeats a number of these false accusations of Khrushchev's, and upholds Khrushchev's speech.

⁴ See Furr, Khrushchev Lied.

Gabriel Gorodetsky, whose book Kotkin cites fifty times, has this to say about Mikoian's credibility:

A. Mikoyan, the Politburo member and Commissar of Foreign Trade, whose memoirs have given rise to a number of false interpretations of Stalin's policies at the time, suggested that Schulenburg gave Dekanozov a clear-cut warning.

...Much as this revelation captures the imagination, it is not borne out at all by the actual records of the meeting.⁵

⁵ Gorodetsky, Grand Delusion: Stalin and the German Invasion of Russia. New Haven, CT: Yale University, 1999, 212.

So it appears that Mikoian lied a great deal in his memoir! At the very least it is a highly unreliable source. The story about Stalin praising Hitler for killing his rivals in the Nazi Party comes only from Mikoian. Therefore, absent independent corroboration, it should not be accepted as true.

Of course Kotkin could and should have known all this. When including this incident in his book Kotkin should have informed his readers about Mikoian's bias and unreliability concerning Stalin. So why does he include this story? Evidently, to associate Stalin with Hitler — a propaganda move, beloved by anticommunists.

Kotkin Repeats Rumors By Beria's Murderers

Kotkin:

Beria would now systematically annihilate Lakoba's kin and associates.⁴⁷ (507)

Note 47 (1010): 47. This started with Mgaloblishvili, whom Beria had chosen to lead the honor guard accompanying Lakoba's casket home from Tblisi and who was arrested for "ties." Popov and Oppokov, "Berievshchina" (1991, no. 1), 48-9. The story goes that Beria's men beat Saria to testify that Lakoba had wanted to sell Abkhazia to Turkey; she evidently refused, even when they beat her fourteen-year-old son Rauf in front of her. She was said to have died of torture in her cell. Medvedev, Let History Judge, 495-6.

"The story goes," "evidently," "was said to have died" — what kind of history is this? These are, what — rumors? From no source?

Popov and Oppokov (48) quote from an interrogation of Petr Afanas'evich Sharia by Khrushchev's men of August 15, 1953. Sharia states that Mgaloblishvili accompanied Lakoba's casket. But he says nothing about his arrest. This interrogation, or statement, or whatever, of Sharia's — if it exists — is not printed in the 1086-page volume Politbiuro i delo Beria published in 2013. But the same material is summarized in the Preface (Predislovie) to this book, pages 6-7, without any references.

Medvedev has no evidence whatsoever for the horrible story about torturing Lakoba's wife and son. The Russian language Wikipedia page about Saria Lakoba states that she died in a prison hospital, not in a cell. The only reference is to a book of memoirs, impossible to verify.⁶ The references on the Russian Wikipedia page on Lakoba have no such evidence either.⁷

⁷ In a book that Kotkin cites, though not here, Donald Rayfield tells the same story but cites no evidence whatsoever. Evidently, he had no evidence: Stalin and His Hangmen: An Authoritative Portrait of a Tyrant and Those Who Served Him. New York: Viking, 2004, 303.

This story is one of many attacks on Beria in Kotkin's book. Beria was murdered by Khrushchev, abetted by the other Presidium [formerly Politburo] members. This was an unprecedented event in Soviet history. Moreover, Khrushchev and Molotov agree that there was no evidence against Beria when he was either arrested or — more likely — murdered, on June 26, 1953. Therefore, in order to justify this act and the violent repression of persons associated with Beria that followed, Khrushchev et al. proceeded to invent stories about various crimes of Beria.

Popov and Oppokov summarized Khrushchev-era NKVD and judicial materials from the period of Beria's arrest. Medvedev wrote his book to curry favor with Khrushchev, and uses Khrushchev-era attacks on Stalin and Beria as his evidence.

It is simply not possible that Kotkin, who has spent decades studying Soviet history of the Stalin period, does not know these things. But it is certain that very few of his readers will know about them.

This Khrushchev-era attack of slander against Beria and his associates means that it is irresponsible to simply take at face value all the crimes attributed to Beria during the Khrushchev period and repeated during the Gorbachev period. We know many of them are lies. We have already said something about the provable falsehoods in one of the most important and most influential anti-Beria books of the Gorbachev period, Oni ne molchali.

Don't Believe Rudenko

Inside the Soviet police, first-class sadists were fewer than one might think. Boris Rodos, in that context, stood out, a "chopper" (kolun) who could reliably smash those under "interrogation" to near death. He would snap a whip across a prisoner's legs, continuing after he collapsed to the floor, pour freezing water over him, then force him to scoop his diarrhea with his tin cup and swallow, then shout, "sign! Sign!"²⁷² (548)

Note 272 (1015): 272. Petrov, "Rodos."

This is the article by Nikita Petrov, "Rodos: ostrov arhipelaga Gulaga," in Novaia gazeta, September 22, 2010 (1102).⁸ In it, Petrov claims to be quoting from the appeal to Stalin of February 20, 1940, of Belosudov, a Komsomol official, who stated:

[[cyrillic]]я попросил Родоса сводить меня в уборную помочиться, а он говорит: «Бери стакан и мочись». Я это сделал и спросил, куда девать стакан. Он схватил его и поднес мне ко рту и давай вливать в рот, а сам кричит: «Пей, говно в человеческой шкуре, или давай показания». Я, будучи вне себя, да что говорить, для меня было все безразлично, а он кричит: «Подпиши, подпиши!» и я сказал: «Давай, я все подпишу, мне теперь все равно.»

I asked Rodos to take me to the bathroom to urinate, and he said: "Take a glass and urinate." I did it and asked where to put the glass. He grabbed it and brought it to my mouth and wanted to pour into my mouth, while he himself shouted: "Drink, shit in human skin, or confess." I, being beside myself, what can I say, I didn't care any more, and he shouts: "Sign, sign!" — and I said: "All right, I will sign everything, I don't care now."

⁸ "NG" is an ideologically anti-Stalin newspaper of which former Soviet President and Communist Party First Secretary Mikhail Gorbachev is part owner.

If this statement is genuine, Belosudov claimed that Rodos made him urinate into a cup, then tried to make him drink the urine or sign, whereupon Belosudov agreed to sign. It was not "diarrhea," and Belosudov did not drink the urine. Where does Kotkin get these disgusting lies from, anyway?

What's more, Petrov is not quoting from Belosudov's appeal to Stalin. He is quoting from Prosecutor Roman Rudenko's February, 1956, recommendation to Khrushchev's Supreme Court to deny Rodos' appeal for clemency of his death sentence. It is in the volume Politbiuro i Delo Berta (2013), 864-866. Kotkin makes no use of this important document collection. It is also online at the excellent Istmat.info site (<http://istmat.info/node/22351>)

This document is part of Khrushchev's attack on Beria, whom he and the other Presidium members murdered, whether judicially, in December, 1953, or in fact, on June 26, 1953. We know that Rudenko lied in defense of Khrushchev's falsifications. Matthew Lenoë points this out in his book on the Kirov assassination, and Lenoë is extremely anti-Stalin.⁹

⁹ See Furr, Kirov 128-129 for further discussion, and citations to Lenoë's book.

For example: Rodos is charged with taking part in frame-ups against a number of high-ranking Party members, including Pavel Postyshev (Politbiuro i delo Beria, 864). But we know that Postyshev was not innocent! We now have the documentation that he was murdering Party members in the Ukraine, for which he was dismissed from the CC, then expelled from the Party, then tried and executed. (See the discussion in Chapter 14 for the evidence.)

So it is Rodos who is the victim of a frame-up here. We can't just "believe" Rudenko, who was busy doing Khrushchev's dirty work, either to frame Beria — if Beria were indeed still alive — or to justify Beria's murder. Why was Rodos prosecuted in the first place? If he had beaten prisoners at the order of the head of the NKVD, Beria, as charged, then he was just doing what he had been told to do — certainly not a capital crime. And we can't even establish that as a fact.

Perhaps Rodos refused to fabricate some anti-Beria stories, and so was executed. It seems that this is what almost happened to General Pavel Sudoplatov — except that Sudoplatov succeeded in convincing the prosecution that he was insane, and so spent two years in a hospital, and then fifteen years in prison (see the discussion later in this chapter).

Kotkin must know this. But whether he does know it and is lying, or does not know and is simply incompetent, the result is the same: his readers are deceived.

Don't Believe Serov, Either

Also on May 19, Beria had executed a confidential task: Radek had his head fatally smashed on the floor of the Verkhne-Uralsk prison, where he was serving a ten-year term. Rumors were loosed that Radek had been killed in a fight with a fellow inmate. In fact, the murder was instigated by a specially dispatched NKVD team—so much for the promise Stalin had made to not execute Radek, in exchange for testimony that Radek had duly delivered against Trotsky and Trotskyites.³¹⁵ (Sokolnikov, another defendant in the January 1937 Trotskyite trial who had been spared death in exchange for his testimony, would also be murdered in prison, in Tobolsk on May 21.) (637)

Note 315 (1028): 15. APRF, f. 3, op. 24, d. 455, l. 33-5 (June 1956 note from KGB chief Serov to the Central Committee); d. 448, l. 184, 189 (testimony by operatives Fedotov and Matusov). See also Petrov and Petrov, Empire of Fear, 69.¹⁰

¹⁰ Petrov and Petrov, Empire of Fear, was published in 1956. It is useless as evidence for anything.

Kotkin has not done his homework! Serov's note is full of provable lies. My article "Nikita Petrov's 'Amalgam'" discusses this document thoroughly; it may be consulted at the URL in this note, together with an English translation of Serov's fabrication.¹¹

Convicted Without Evidence, Or Did Stalin Kidnap and Murder General Kulik's Wife?

Two days before, Stalin had colluded with Beria to have Kulik's beautiful Jewish second wife, Kira Simonich, kidnapped. The despot then pretended he had no idea where she might be, advising Kulik to remarry and forget the "nympho female spy." She was the daughter of the former okhranka chief in Helsinki who had been executed by the Cheka in 1919; her first husband had been a NEPman with foreign connections; her two brothers, one of whom had been an officer for the Whites, were arrested for espionage; her mother left for Italy in 1934. Nonetheless, Kulik had refused Voroshilov's entreaties to divorce the fetching Kira.²⁸⁸ (758)

Note 288 (1044): 288. Kira was evidently seized on May 5, 1940, by a squad overseen by Merkulov; she was executed by Blokhin without indictment or trial. "Beria protiv Kulika," in Bobrenev and Riazantsev, Palachi i zhertvy, 197-264 (esp. 195-201, 211-3); Sokolov, Istreblennye marshaly, 300-1; Leskov, Stalin i zagovor Tukhachevskogo, 53-5; Montefiore, Court of the Red Tsar, 293-4.

Kotkin must think that Stalin and the NKVD simply did not have anything else to do! What was the point of this supposed kidnapping and murder?

In Stalin i zagovor Tukhachevskogo Valentin Leskov supports the theory that Tukhachevsky and the other commanders were in fact guilty! Kotkin does not tell his readers that. In the same passage cited by Kotkin, Leskov says that Kira was the daughter of the former head of Tsarist intelligence in Helsingfors (today Helsinki), shot by the Soviets in 1919. Leskov also opines that Kira was probably not murdered but recruited as a counterintelligence agent in the West. (SS) Kotkin cites Leskov's book. Why doesn't Kotkin tell us what Leskov thinks? Because that story does not have an anti-Stalin tendency?

Bobrenev and Riazantsev was published in 1993. The updated edition, Zaika and Bobrenev, was published in 2011. It contains the same long chapter: "Beria protiv Kulika," pp. 528-618. The documents quoted in it in short excerpts are published in full in the volumes Politbiuro i delo Beria (Moscow: Kurchkovo Pole, 2012) and Delo Beria. Prigovor. Obzhalovaniu ne podlezhit. (Moscow: MDF, 2012).

Boris Sokolov, author of Istreblennye marshaly, was expelled from the Free Historical Society for "an unacceptable attitude towards historical sources and incorrect citation of the work of others."¹² Gennadii Ospov, sociologist and member of the Russian Academy of Sciences, has called Sokolov "a most indefatigable historical falsifier."¹³ This kind of thing is very unusual, all the more so because Sokolov is fanatically anti-Stalin, a bias common among Russian academics.

¹² See the Society's statement of May 13, 2016, at <https://volistob.ru/statements/postanovlenie-soveta-volnogo-istoricheskogo-obshchestva-ob-isklyuchenii-bv-sokolova>

¹³ Quoted in the article on Sokolov at <http://53kanal.in.ua/novosti-ukrainy/item/3649-1453405599>

Here, indeed, is an issue that demands source criticism. What is the status of these confession-interrogations? For example, those of Vlodzimirsky, who was tried and executed in December, 1953, as one of Beria's "gang" and who was trying to escape his fate, quite possibly by saying whatever his interrogators wanted him to say? But in his interrogation of August 4, 1953 — if it is genuine — Vlodzimirsky said only that he had indeed kidnapped Kulik's wife and brought her to prison commandant Blokhin. He denied knowing anything after that, even the reason that she was seized.

All the documents in these collections are Khrushchev-era stuff that blacken Beria's name. Beria's men were under great pressure to accuse him of crimes. Even so, a number of them were executed in December, 1953. Others, like Boris Rodos, were executed during the following years.

General Pavel Sudoplatov, arrested in 1953, survived, spent fifteen years in detention and then in prison for, supposedly, being an "accomplice of Beria" in planning to overthrow the Soviet government, experimentation on people, kidnappings and murders. There is no evidence that he did any of these things — any more than there is that Beria was guilty of any of them.

Sudoplatov wrote that he was arrested and imprisoned because he refused to fabricate lies about Beria's activities. It is reasonable to assume that other NKVD men like Vlodzimirsky limited what they said to the minimum. In Vlodzimirsky's case it was not enough. He was tried, convicted, and executed by Khrushchev & Co. in December, 1953.

Kotkin is quick to claim that the interrogations and confessions of the defendants at the three Moscow Trials, plus all those of the high-ranking officers in the Tukhachevsky Affair, should be regarded as fabrications due to "torture." He has no evidence that they were tortured — he simply assumes they were.

So why doesn't Kotkin make the same assumption here, in the case of Vlodzimirsky's interrogation-confessions? Presumably, because these confessions accuse Stalin, either indirectly or — as Kotkin claims here — directly.

Former NKVD man Gui'st, the partial text of whose interrogation is dated September 1, 1953, told a story quite different from Vlodzimirsky's. Vlodzimirsky had not mentioned Gul'st's participation. (PiDB 329) Former Prosecutor (Prokuror) of the USSR Viktor M. Bochkov who was interrogated on January 24, 1954, claimed that he remembered nothing about any kidnapping of Kira Kulik, (PiDB 572).

None of these versions claims that "Stalin colluded with Beria," as Kotkin states. Evidently Kotkin fabricated this falsehood himself.

How Many Poles Were Deported And From Where?

In eastern Poland, the NKVD had deported more than 1 million of the 13.5 million residents to labor camps. (771)

There is no footnote, no evidence given, for this statement. Here are the two closest footnotes:

Note 60 (1045): 60. Gross observes that "the Polish Military underground organization, the ZWZ, which thrived under the Nazi occupation in spite of persistent Gestapo efforts to destroy it, never had a chance under the NKVD." Gross, Revolution from Abroad, 148.

Note 61 (1045-6): 61. Gross, "Nature of Soviet Totalitarianism." Because Poland underwent Nazi and Soviet occupations simultaneously, it would seem the ideal (if that is the word) place to make the case for "totalitarianism" as a concept encompassing both regimes, yet Gross, a proponent of the term, also noted significant differences between the nature and consequences of Nazi and Soviet rule. Gross, Revolution from Abroad, 230-1.

The "significant differences" between the Germans and the Soviets noted by Gross include the fact that, unlike the Nazis, the Soviets were anti-racist, and thus had great support from the Ukrainians, Belorussians, and especially the Jews in the newly-reclaimed territories of Western Belorussia and Western Ukraine. These lands had been taken by force by Poland from Soviet Russia in 1921. The Soviets liberated Jews hiding in the woods from the Nazis and from the Polish Home Army, a violently anti-Semitic organization praised as "heroes" in today's Poland because of their anticommunist terrorism. Communist partisans welcomed Jews into their units; the Home Army murdered them.

The Polish government severely repressed the languages and cultures of all non-Poles there, restricted their religious practices, and discriminated against them in other ways. Poland also sent many thousands of Polish "settlers," often military men, to "polonize" (make more Polish) these areas. These are the people — the Polish imperialist infrastructure — whom the Soviets deported.

Both works by Gross are from the 1980s, when the primary sources we have now were not available. They are worthless now. Gross himself, a ferocious anticommunist, is far from objective. The actual number of persons deported from Western Belorussia and Western Ukraine (formerly Eastern Poland) is 201,000.¹⁴ Kotkin has to be aware of this important and well-known document collection. But he does not cite it. Perhaps this is because the number of deportees is 1/5 of Gross's figures which therefore make the Soviets "look worse."

What Happened To Bronislava Metallikova-Poskrebysheva?

Stalin had allowed Beria to imprison Poskryobyshev's beloved wife as a "Trotskyite" in 1939. (Beria had sent a large basket of fruit to their two baby girls; he then executed their mother.)¹⁷ (889)

Note 17 (1067): 17. Recollections of one of Poskryobyshev's two daughters, Natalya: <http://sloblib.narod.ru/slob/poskreb.htm>. Poskrebyshev's first wife, Jadwiga, a Pole, had died in 1929 of tuberculosis.

There are a number of important matters to note about Kotkin's statement:

1. Beria had no authority to imprison or execute anybody. The NKVD could not even arrest anyone without an order from a Prosecutor. The judicial organs conducted the trials and issued sentences, which were carried out by the NKVD. In the case of Aleksandr Poskrebyshev's wife, this would probably have been the Prosecutor of the Soviet Union. Poskrebyshev was Stalin's personal secretary, meaning, in charge of documentation. He worked very closely with Stalin.

2. The daughter to whose brief online memoir Kotkin refers did not remember her mother — she was only one year old at the time. Everything she wrote, including the "basket of fruit," is hearsay.

3. There is little information about Bronislava Metallikova-Poskrebysheva. Evidently, no documents about her purported trial, imprisonment, and execution have been located. One source says she was arrested on April 29, 1939.¹⁵ Another states that she was arrested on September 8, 1940.¹⁶

Kotkin, like all historians, has the obligation to inform his readers about these evidentiary matters. The simple fact is that We Don't Know — words that every honest historian must be ready to utter (or to write), instead of fabricating, or repeating, rumor as bogus "fact."

According to Volkogonov, who evidently interviewed Galina, Poskrebyshv's and Bronislava's daughter, Beria continued to "visit with our family" (byvat' v nashei sem'e), and Stalin knew the family well. Galina, naturally, believes that her mother was innocent. But that is not evidence.¹⁸

¹⁸ Volkogonov, Stalin. Politicheskii portret (Moscow: Novosti, 1991), Chapter 3. There are many different editions both in print and online. This information is in Chapter 3, "Vybor i Bor'ba."

All sources agree that Bronislava Metallikova-Poskrebysheva was rehabilitated on October 10, 1957. That means that her NKVD investigation file should be available to researchers.¹⁹ It should have long been available to her immediate family. But evidently no one has requested it — or, at least, no one has published anything about it. Kotkin should have pointed that out, too.

¹⁹ As of this writing (late 2018) the FSB Archivists are only allowing access to files of "rehabilitated" persons.

Chapter 15. Conclusion

In historical scholarship, falsification, plagiarism, and fabrication were devastating types of fraud. They might not be indictable in a court of law, but they undermined the very foundations of scholarly authority. What was more, they tested the profession's ability and willingness to police itself.

Implications

The implications of Kotkin's virtual wholesale falsification of 1930s Soviet history go far beyond Kotkin himself, even beyond the field of Soviet history.

Certainly, one should never take Kotkin himself at his word. When, for example, the third volume of his Stalin biography is published, every reader should be aware that any and all negative statements about Stalin and those in the Soviet leadership who supported him — Malenkov, Kaganovich, Beria, Molotov — must be double-checked. That is what we have done, in great detail, in the present book.

Judging from other falsified works masquerading as scholarship such as Timothy Snyder's Bloodlands, we might predict that in his third volume Kotkin will accuse Stalin of having Solomon M. Mikhoels, a well-known director of Jewish theater in the USSR, murdered in 1948. The documents purporting to prove this are crude forgeries. But one can only discover this by careful study. Unless Kotkin undertakes such a study he is destined to repeat this scholarly canard, one fashioned originally by Russian Zionist writers.

Perhaps Kotkin will repeat the claim that, driven by antisemitism, Stalin might have deported Soviet Jews to Siberia; that Stalin "framed" the medical doctors who had treated Politburo member Andrei Zhdanov in 1948; that he masterminded the frame-up of Soviet doctors in 1952-53; that he "framed" the military commanders arrested, tried, and executed for treason during World War II, such as General Dmitry Pavlov; that he "framed" the Leningrad Party leaders tried and convicted (and some of them executed) in the "Leningrad Affair" of 1947-1950; and so on. There is no evidence to support these claims, frequently made by anticommunists, and in some cases we have evidence to disprove them. But will Kotkin's readers know that?

Kotkin will use Khrushchev-era and Gorbachev-era sources. But Khrushchev and his men, and Gorbachev and his men, lied and fabricated about Stalin and the Stalin period, to an extent that can scarcely be overestimated.

One would think that professional historians of the Soviet Union would have figured this out! But these anti-Stalin lies were so useful in the anticommunist struggle, both during the Cold War and since, that they have never been seriously questioned. They are still not questioned! Kotkin does not question them in Volume Two. There is no reason to think that he will suddenly begin to do so in his final volume. Indeed, he can't do so, for if he did he would deconstruct, disprove, virtually the whole of Volume Two, as we have done in the present study.

Because of the power of bias by omission — simply not mentioning evidence that contradicts one's preconceived paradigm or idea — double-checking Kotkin's fact-claims on these matters is not going to be an easy task even for those who are familiar with the primary and secondary sources in the field. The 75-year period by which, in Russia, documents are to be declassified has given us some access, at least, to primary documents from the 1930s and before. But it will be a long time before this 75-year time period elapses for events of the post-war period. The 75th anniversary of Stalin's death and the murder — judicial or otherwise — of Lavrentii Beria, will not occur until 2028. Even then, there is no guarantee that the Russian government of that day will indeed declassify all the primary documents related to the events of this period.

For the vast majority of Kotkin's potential readers, those who are not familiar with the primary sources, it will be impossible to double-check Kotkin's fact-claims. And dishonest or lazy scholars have plenty of dishonest scholarship from which to cherry-pick any conclusion their bias suggests. So we can predict, sadly but with confidence, that Kotkin's falsifications in that future volume will be accepted at face value by reviewers and by most readers, just as his falsifications in this second volume have duped them.

Some of Kotkin's earlier work — specifically, volume one of his Stalin biography — has been better. But in this second volume Kotkin has permitted his anticommunist biases to ruin his research. As we have demonstrated in the present book, nothing Kotkin writes that is negative about Stalin and those closest to him is true. Nothing!

Readers Want Bread, Kotkin Gives Them A Stone.²

Is Kotkin deliberately lying? This is a legitimate question in the light of all the falsifications, he has introduced into his book. I do not contend, however, that Kotkin is deliberately lying. It may well be the case that his anti-Stalin and anticommunist bias is so powerful that it has robbed him of all ability, as well as the desire, to look for the truth, to be objective. Kotkin may not be consciously lying. But he is deceiving his readers, because those readers expect a search for the truth.

However, Kotkin's subjective intention, even if we could determine what it is, is ultimately not important. We have firmly established in this book that Kotkin's research — the statements in his text, the citations in his footnotes — cannot be trusted, insofar as they concern Stalin. Since his book purports to be a biography of Stalin, this is a devastating discovery that utterly invalidates the book for any legitimate use. Unfortunately, Kotkin's book will continue to serve the purpose for which it is no doubt intended: as anticommunist "propaganda with footnotes."

Kotkin's Book Proves the Opposite of What It Is Intended to Prove

Ironically, Kotkin's book proves the opposite of what its author intended: it proves that Stalin committed no crimes during the 1930s! For if there were any evidence that Stalin did commit crimes during this period, surely Kotkin would have found that evidence and included it, or references to it, in this book. Kotkin's references to evidence — perhaps scare quotes are appropriate here, so "evidence" — are very extensive. He has clearly done a lot of reading.

Strictly speaking a negative cannot be proven. We have pointed out places in his text where Kotkin is guilty of this very error. But Kotkin has been researching the Stalin era in the USSR all his professional life. The fact that he has found no evidence of any crime by Stalin, and that every allegation of such in this book turns out, on careful inspection, to be fraudulent, is perhaps the best evidence we have at present that Stalin committed no crime that can be documented by evidence.

This conclusion will strike many readers as shocking, even outrageous. But the truth is not established by consensus, much less by the consensus of anticommunists. Anyone who bases her judgment not on the consensus of experts but on the evidence will be forced to draw this conclusion. That is what we have done in the present book. Doing so reveals the bankruptcy of the field of Soviet history of the Stalin period.

The Anti-Stalin Paradigm Exposed

This fact in turn exposes the bankruptcy — dishonesty and shallowness — of anticommunist and anti-Stalin scholarship. It is not a matter of Kotkin's unreliability only. There is no evidence that Stalin committed any crime in the '30s. Yet the flood of anti-Stalin and anticommunist falsehoods continues unabated. Evidently lies are necessary appears in order to make Stalin, the Soviet Union of his day, and the communist movement "look bad."

This level of dishonesty in the mainstream historiography of the Soviet Union means that little of the mainstream academic research on Soviet history of the 1930s is helpful for those trying to understand what actually happened in the USSR during this period. But the 1930s are crucial in understanding not only the successes, but also the later failure, of the USSR.

The Stalin period led not only to the successful industrialization, the costly victory against the fascist invasion, and the post-war increase in living standards for the Soviet population. It led to a worldwide struggle for workers' rights and for liberation from Western and Japanese colonialism.

It also led, upon Stalin's death, to the coup d'état on March 5, 1953, the second coup against Lavrentii Beria of June 26, 1953, Khrushchev's accession to leadership and the beginning of official, wholesale falsification of Soviet history in the service of "reforms" that abandoned, piece by piece, the goal of transitioning to communism. These developments led eventually to the renewed falsification of Soviet history under Gorbachev, the breakup of the Soviet Union, and the restoration of predatory capitalism.

The historian's purpose and aim should be to study historical events with a view to understanding historical change. Understanding the history of the Soviet Union is essential for any accurate understanding of world history. The last book by the late Moshe Lewin, a famous, albeit conventionally anti-Stalin and anticommunist, historian of the USSR, is titled The Soviet Century. By "century" Lewin meant the 74 years between the 1917 revolution and the end of the USSR in 1991.

In reality, the term could be applied to world history during this same period. The Russian Revolution, the fight for socialism, the international communist movement, were determining forces in world history. This is not the place to list the major historical developments of the "Soviet century." But every one of them was shaped in a significant way by the international communist movement and the USSR.

One brief example must suffice here. An accurate understanding of World War 2 must include the fact that, by stopping the Tukhachevsky- and Trotsky-led military conspiracies that threatened to put the massive human and natural resources of the Soviet Union on the side of the fascist powers, Stalin and the Soviet government saved the people of the world, including those of the West, from a far greater catastrophe than the one that did occur.

No account of world history that omits this fact has any claim to accuracy. Yet because of anti-Stalinism and anticommunism, this fact is not just unacknowledged — it is staunchly denied, as Kotkin does in Stalin, Volume Two.

Anti-Stalinists and anticommunists, including much or most of the Left, falsify Soviet history and deny the truth even when it is slowly, painstakingly uncovered. This denial and falsification stretches from the Left — Trotskyists and anarchists — to the mainstream and the Far Right fascists.

Do they believe their own falsifications? For the most part, they do. But why? Because of the dishonesty of mainstream historiography of the Stalin period. If the mainstream acknowledged and publicized the truth, instead of the flood of falsehood like that we find in books like Kotkin's, it would be far harder for people to ignore, or be uniformed about, the truth.

We cannot understand any aspect of the history of the past century without an accurate account of Soviet history of the Stalin period. This book aims to contribute, however modestly, to the aim of uncovering the truth about this era.

Nikita Petrov's 'Amalgam' — The Prison Murders of Radek and Sokol'nikov

Grover Furr

Introduction

Nikita Vasil'evich Petrov is a Russian historian, the author of several influential books in the history of the USSR during the Stalin period. His articles appear frequently in the Russian mass media and he has been featured in television interviews.

Petrov is a prominent figure in public discourse about the Stalin years and about the USSR generally. The organization that employs him, the 'Memorial' society, has published or aided in the publication of a number of volumes of documents from former Soviet archives. Petrov's work (with German historian Mark Jansen) on the career of Nikolai Ezhov, People's Commissar of the NKVD during the bloody "Great Terror," or Ezhovshchina, of massive extralegal executions in the USSR in 1937-1938, is a valuable source of quotations from primary documents and, to some extent, as a chronology. The same should be said for Petrov's works on the GULAG and his two biographical dictionaries on NKVD employees.

In sum: Petrov's works are useful as sources of documents and dates. But Petrov's own interpretations of these documents, and his assertions generally, show such a profound and uninterrogated anticommunist bias as to be not merely useless but harmful. The same thing is true of the article under discussion here.

In early 2012 Petrov published a book titled [[cyrillic]]Палачи. Они выполняли заказы Сталина ("Executioners. They carried out Stalin's orders.") It was published by Novaia Gazeta, the thrice-weekly newspaper which has frequently featured Petrov's articles. The subject of the present study is one of the chapters of this book titled [[cyrillic]]«Сталинский заказ. Как убивали Сокольников и Радека» ("Stalinist Order: How Sokol'nikov and Radek Were Murdered.") This chapter is the same as the text of an article in Novaia Gazeta on May 6, 2008 with two additional paragraphs and very brief biographical sketches of some of the NKVD men.

I have chosen to examine the specific article in question because it is one whose sources can be checked. In this case we are not left to either "believe" or "disbelieve" Petrov. Thanks to published documents from former Soviet archives it is possible for any careful reader to see that Petrov's article is grossly falsified.

Early in his article Petrov makes the following statement:

[[cyrillic]]Было неопровержимо доказано, что за убийством стоял лично Сталин.

It has been irrefutably proven that Stalin was personally behind the murder.

"Irrefutably proven" is a bold claim. It virtually challenges the reader to try to "refute" — disprove — Petrov's thesis that Stalin was personally responsible for Radek's and Sokol'nikov's murders. The present article does precisely that: it refutes Petrov's claim by checking the assertions Petrov makes in this article against primary sources that are now available. Doing so enables us to affirm that Petrov has deliberately misled — lied to — his readers. The claim "irrefutably proven," as Queen Gertrude remarks in Shakespeare's Hamlet, "doth protest too much"; it exaggerates in order to cover up the truth and is itself a lie.

Petrov's article ends by reprinting a report of June 29, 1956 by General Ivan Serov, at the time the chief of the KGB. We begin our study by examining Serov's statements in the light of evidence now available. This section is followed by a close examination of Petrov's own claims.

At the end we draw some basic conclusions about Petrov, his employer the "Memorial" society, the politicized nature of the study of Soviet history, and historical objectivity.

Serov's Lies

Serov's report dated June 29, 1956 is comprised of twelve paragraphs. We begin by discussing the assertions in each paragraph. Next we examine in depth those claims of Serov's concerning which we now have independent evidence. We conclude with the evidence that Serov himself, and one of those he names, Lobov, have previously been shown to have lied. In the text of this article we have reproduced quotations from Serov's report only when absolutely necessary. In other cases the reader should refer as needed to the attached translation of Serov's report.

Paragraph By Paragraph

The assertions in Serov's first paragraph are all a bluff. He cites no evidence to support them. Serov claims that "[d]ocuments in the KGB archive suggest..." But Petrov had access to this archive. If Petrov he found any such documents he would have cited them. Something may well exist, for Serov doesn't claim that the "documents" prove anything, but merely "suggest." This constitutes an admission that he cannot prove Beria and Kobulov planned to murder Radek and Sokol'nikov.

Second paragraph: no evidence is given to support what Serov claims about Kubatkin and Sharok. Petrov gives none either.

Third paragraph: No evidence whatsoever is cited to support Serov's claims about Sokol'nikov's murder.

Fourth paragraph: According to this and the following paragraph Sokol'nikov was murdered by a fellow prisoner named P.M. Kotov. No evidence is given to support Serov's statement that Kotov was really Lobov.

The fifth paragraph is evidently a quotation from a real document, a transcript of an interrogation of Kotov, relating how he argued with and then killed Sokol'nikov.

Sixth paragraph: No evidence is cited of the involvement of Kubatkin, as Serov alleged.

Seventh paragraph: Once again we evidently have a quotation from a real document: the report of Radek's death at the hands of a Trotskyite named Varezhnikov. It says nothing about any "plan." It is of interest that Serov did not claim Varezhnikov was really "Stepanov. " This elaboration was added some years later. This is logical since, as time progressed, former NKVD men spun more and more elaborate falsehoods at the request of Khrushchev-era investigators, as we shall see.

The eight paragraph is comprised of falsehoods concerning the careers of Kubatkin and Sharok. We will examine it in detail below.

Paragraph nine contains no evidence that Arnol'd or Stroilov ever "renounced their confessions." Had they done so, why would "Beria and Kobulov" have waited until September 1941, when the Nazis were closing in rather than employing "a specially designed plan" to have them killed, as they allegedly had done to Radek and Sokol'nikov 28 months earlier? Conversely, if Arnol'd and Stroilov had "renounced their confessions" and could be safely left to live, why not act the same way with Radek and Sokol'nikov?

In this same paragraph Serov lies about the shootings at the Orlov prison in September, 1941. Evidence about this incident was published in 1990. We will examine it below.

Ovchinnikov

The concluding paragraphs, ten through twelve, concern former NKVD man Ovchinnikov. We examine them in detail below in the light of primary sources now available.

Serov wrote:

[[cyrillic]]Определенный интерес в этом же плане представляет и судьба быв. начальника Прокопьевского горотдела НКВД Овчинникова, у которого на связи находился Арнольд.

Овчинников в декабре 1940 года был осужден Военным Трибуналом Западносибирского округа к 10 годам лишения свободы. Находясь под стражей, он рассказывал своим сокамерникам о фальсификации дела по обвинению Арнольда и заявлял о своем намерении написать об этом заявление.

24 марта 1941 года без наличия каких-либо дополнительных материалов дело Овчинникова было пересмотрено и приговором Военного Трибунала он был осужден к расстрелу.

The fate of the former Head of the Prokop'evsky City Department of the NKVD Ovchinnikov is of particular interest in this same plan, with whom Arnol'd was in contact.

In December 1940, Ovchinnikov was convicted by the Military Tribunal of the West Siberian District to 10 years imprisonment. While in custody, he told his cellmates about the falsification of the case against Arnol'd and announced his intention to write a statement about it.

On March 24, 1941, without the presence of any additional materials, the case of Ovchinnikov was reviewed and by verdict of the Military Tribunal, he was sentenced to death.

We now have a number of primary source documents concerning Ovchinnikov. They permit us to determine that Serov is lying here.

- a. The report of trial and death sentence of Ovchinnikov, dated March 24, 1941.
- b. A brief review of his case dated December 19, 1955.
- c. A review of Ovchinnikov's case dated January 6, 1956. This appears to be the review available to Serov himself.

In addition, we have:

- d. A memoir about Ovchinnikov's crimes from one of his victims, L.I. Medvedeva, written down in May 1989 in Tomsk.

Finally, we have a statement about Ovchinnkov in the work of two highly anticommunist and anti-Stalin researchers, Junge and Binner, in their work Kak Terror Stal 'Bol'shim' ("How the Terror Became 'Great'"). Junge and Binner cite repression statistics from Tomsk, where Ovchinnikov was chief of the NKVD in 1937-1938, to demonstrate the massive illegal repression and murders of which Ovchinnikov was guilty and for which he was tried and executed after Beria took over as People's Commissar of the NKVD.

As Serov reported Ovchinnikov was tried and convicted on December 2, 1940 and sentenced to 10 years (Doc. b.). Serov may have taken them from this very document, as the date and sentence are not given in Doc. a.

Document a. gives the fullest details about Ovchinnkov. As chief of the Tomsk city NKVD he had been convicted of many instances of torture, forcing false confessions, false arrests, false imprisonment; and falsifying evidence leading to death sentences against innocent people. Document d. recounts one survivor's memories of Ovchinnikov's depredations more than fifty years after they took place.

Document a. relates the fact that Ovchinnikov was sentenced under article 193-17 b. of the Criminal Code of the RSFSR — "abuse of his official position under exceptionally aggravating circumstances"¹, which permitted imposition of the death sentence. Ovchinnikov was sentenced to death on March 24, 1941 and shot on May 19, 1941.

The review of Ovchinnikov's case dated January 6, 1956 details his connection with Arnol'd and Shestov, and repeats the summary of his crimes. It adds that he engaged in "anti-Soviet agitation among the other prisoners" while awaiting trial. The review document states that Ovchinnikov had confessed his guilt "in part" but that the court also possessed witness and documentary evidence against him.

According to Document b., dated three weeks before Document c., Ovchinnikov was sentenced on December 2, 1940 to 10 years in a correctional camp and again on March 19-24, 1941, to death. This review makes it clear why there were two trials. In the first Ovchinnikov was convicted under article 58-10 of the Criminal Code of the RSFSR, while on March 19-24 1941 he was convicted under article 193-17 b. Article 58-10 dealt with "espionage," including giving or gathering state secrets to other governments, counterrevolutionary organizations, or private persons. Unless it entailed exceptionally serious consequences for the state, it required a sentence "not less than three years."²

[[cyrillic]]² Article 58 of the Criminal Code of the RSFSR 1926 version, at http://ru.wikisource.org/wiki/Статья_58_Уголовного_Кодекса_РСФСР/вариант_1926_года

So Ovchinnikov was tried twice for different offenses and was executed after his second conviction. Documents a. and c. mention only the latter, death sentence. This disproves Serov's statement that [[cyrillic]]²⁴ марта 1941 года без наДічия каких-Шбо допотштельных материалов дело Овчинникова было пересмотрено и приговором Военного Трибунала он был осужден к расстрелу.

On March 24, 1941, without the presence of any additional materials, the case of Ovchinnikov was reviewed and by verdict of the Military Tribunal, he was sentenced to death. [Emphasis added, GF]

Serov claims that the second trial was not in fact a trial at all but simply a "review" to punish Ovchinnikov for threatening "to write a statement" about the fact that the case against Arnol'd was supposedly "a falsification." We've already seen that this is false. Documents b. and c. make it clear that the March 1941 court action was not a "review" but a new trial, and that "additional evidence" was indeed brought forward for the new charge.

The NKVD-KGB information about Ovchinnikov's atrocities is independently corroborated by Document d., Medvedeva's account of 1989 written during the Gorbachev years when the search was on for horrors carried out during Stalin's time, and published in Tomsk itself in 2004. No one at either time had any motive to disprove any Khrushchev-era attack on Stalin — quite the contrary.

We include Medvedeva's account here for the sake of completeness. By itself, without any corroboration, it might be considered unreliable given the passage of more than fifty years between the events described and the writing of the memoir account. But it is completely consistent with the information from the official documents we have about Ovchinnikov.

Junge and Binner have this to say about Ovchinnikov.

The high degree to which the operation accord to order No. 00447 marks the boundary in the history of the disastrous year 1937 is shown by the following statistics of arrests and sentences in Tomsk and its environs (97) where the head of the NKVD, I.V. Ovchinnikov, was one of the most brutal security officers during the Great Terror.

³ Mark IUnge, Rol'f Binner. Kak terror stal 'bol'shim'. Sekretnyi prikaz No. 00447 i tekhnologia ego ispolnenii. Moscow: AIR0-20, 2003, p. 36.

We have information about Ovchinnikov from several mutually independent sources. Is it credible that a person such as Ovchinnikov was would have threatened to write a report about a falsified case? And to whom would Ovchinnikov have written such a report? He himself had falsified many cases, causing the imprisonment and deaths of many innocent persons. This was the conclusion not only of the NKVD tribunal in 1941, but of the KGB review of January 1956.

The conclusion is inescapable: Serov was lying. Ovchinnikov was executed after a second trial on additional charges. It is simply not credible that he would have complained about false charges against Arnol'd.

Serov unquestionably had access to the 1941, 1955 and 1956 documents and more. Therefore, Serov deliberately lied about the Ochinikov-Arnol'd situation. There is also no reason to believe Serov's claim that Arnol'd had retracted his confession. We will see this confirmed again when we discuss the Orlov Prison execution of September 1941, below.

Kubatkin's and Sharok's careers

Neither Kubatkin nor Sharok "had worked up to this time as ordinary employees of the NKVD apparatus," as Serov claimed. We have our evidence for this from Nikita Petrov's own two books on the NKVD: Who Led the NKVD 1934-1941. A Handbook. (Moscow: "Memorial," 1999), and Who Led the Organs of State Security 1941-1954. A Handbook. (Moscow: "Memorial," 2010).⁴

⁴ [[сyrillic]]Кто руководИШ НКВД 1934-1941. Справочник. (М. «Мемориал» 1999); and Кто руководИШ органами госбезопасности 1941-1954. Справочник. (М.: «Мемориал» 2010

Kubatkin is listed in the earlier volume. According to the account in Petrov's own book, by 1939 Kubatkin was a rising star in the NKVD. He had not been a "riadovoi, " or rank-and-file officer of the NKVD, since 1930. In May 1939 he had already been assistant to the chief of the special division of the Odessa ob last' division of the GPU (1934-5); chief of the Frunze raion division of the NKVD (Odessa oblast'); chief of the UGB of the UNKVD of Odessa oblast' (1936 — March 1937); student at the central school of the NKVD of the USSR from March to August 15, 1937; chief of the 1st section of the 4th division of the GUGB NKVD USSR after August 15, 1937; chief of the section of the 4th division of the GUGP of the 1st directorate of the NKVD of the USSR 1938-1939; and secretary of the party committee of the GUGB of the NKVD of the USSR from 1939 until June 1939.⁵

⁵ Kubatkin, Piotr Nikolaevich. In Petrov 1999, 255. At <http://www.memo.ru/history/NKVD/kto/biogr/gb261.htm>

A short career biography of Sharok is given in the second of Petrov's volumes on NKVD personnel. Sharok was not an "ordinary employee of the NKVD apparatus" either. At the time of Sokol'nikov's and Radek's murders

Sharok was assistant chief of the 1st division of the 2nd section of the GUGB of the NKVD of the USSR (November 1938 to October 5, 1939).⁶

⁶ Sharok, Grigori Fiodorovich. In Petrov 2010, 919-920.

Both Kubatkin and Sharok did receive promotions during 1939: Kubatkin to chief of the directorate of the NKVD of Moscow oblast' in June 1939; Sharok to assistant commissar of the NKVD of the Kazakh SSR (Republic) on October 5, 1939. There is no indication that these promotions had anything to do with the murders of Sokol'nikov and Radek. Moreover, strictly speaking, Serov did not in fact claim that they had! Serov wrote only that "shortly after" the murders [[cyrillic]]("вскоре после этого") they were given new appointments. This is not true either. Sharok's promotion in October 1939 cannot be described as "shortly after" the murders. And if these promotions were related, why did Sharok's come four months after Kubatkin's?

We know Serov was lying when he described Kubatkin and Sharok as "ordinary employees of the NKVD." Serov's report presents no evidence for any of his other assertions about this supposed "plan."

The Orlov Prison Executions Of 1941

In his report Serov wrote:

[[cyrillic]]Другие осужденные по этому делу Строилов и Арнольд, также отказавшиеся от своих показаний, до осени 1941 года содержались в Орловской тюрьме НКВД, а 11 сентября 1941 года по заочному приговору Военной Коллегии Верховного Суда СССР, вынесенному без каких-либо оснований, в числе других заключенных были расстреляны.

Other convicted in this case, Stroilov and Arnol'd, who also refused to testify, were kept in the Orel prison of the NKVD until the autumn of 1941, and on September 11, 1941, in absentia, by the Military Collegium of the Supreme Court of the USSR, issued without any justification, were shot along with other prisoners.

Arnol'd and Stroilov were not singled out at all, much less for supposedly "renouncing their confessions." They were among 170 prisoners previously convicted of serious crimes who were shot at the Orlov prison as the German armies advanced on September 11, 1941, evidently for continuing anti-Soviet activity. We know this was the charge from the documents published in an official Gorbachev-era Communist Party journal in 1990.⁷ Beria, commissar of the NKVD, had been informed by the heads of the directorate of prisons, Bashtakov and Nikol'skii, that at least 76 of the prisoners were carrying out anti-Soviet agitation and planning to escape, with the advance of German troops (Orlov was actually taken by the Germans on October 3, 1941). On September 8, 1941 the Plenum of the Soviet Supreme Court met, reconsidered Arnol'd's case in which he was charged under Article 58-10 of the Criminal Code of the RSFSR (he had originally been convicted of violating Articles 58-8 and 58-11 and received a sentence of ten years), and resented him to be executed.

⁷ "Tragediia v medvedevskom lesu. O rasstrele politzakliuchennykh Orlovskoi tiur'my." ("The tragedy in the Medvedevsk woods. The shooting of political prisoners of the Orlov prison.") Izvestiia TsK KPSS No. 11, 1990, pp. 124-131.

We can be reasonably certain that subversive activities were in fact going on because Dr. D.D. Pletnev, sentenced to 25 years imprisonment at the third Moscow Trial of March 1938, wrote about those activities in a letter, one portion of which has been published. On January 15, 1941, in a letter to Voroshilov, Pletnev complained about his prison conditions and stated:

[[cyrillic]]Я коченею от окружающей меня лжи и стужи среди пигмеев и червей, ведущих свою подрывную работу.⁸

I am numb from the lies and cold that surround me among the pygmies and worms that are carrying on their subversive work.

⁸ TsK KPSS No. 1, 1989, p. 119, col. 2.

That means that Pletnev's final sentence in this letter fragment in part confirms Beria's allegation of later that same year — that some prisoners in the Orlov Prison were in fact engaging in a repetition of the "subversive" activity for which they were imprisoned in the first place.

The 1990 article confirms that Arnol'd was convicted in absentia on September 8, 1941 along with the others. It proves that there was a "basis" for their re-sentencing to death — the alleged subversive activity — and that Arnol'd and Stroilov were not executed for "retracting their confessions" or, indeed, for anything related to their trial at all. Other Moscow Trial defendants were among those executed at the same time; no one has claimed that they retracted their confessions.

Serov cites no evidence that Arnol'd or Stroilov had renounced their trial confessions, and Petrov did not find any.

Serov's Lies During Khrushchev's Time

Matthew Lenoe⁹ gained access to many documents related to the investigation of the Kirov assassination and the Khrushchev-era attempt to blame it all on Stalin. According to Lenoe:

...the Khrushchev supporters in charge of the investigation, including KGB chief Ivan Serov, sought to collect as much material as possible incriminating Stalin. This is what Khrushchev wanted, so that he could discredit his political rivals...

The 1960-1961 investigation run by the Party Control Commission (KPK) was aimed explicitly at inculcating Stalin in the Kirov murder. (7-8)

⁹ Matthew Lenoe, The Kirov Murder and Soviet History New Haven: Yale U.P. 2010. Page references to Lenoe are to this text.

Lenoe reveals that Serov destroyed some evidence and withheld other evidence in order to construct a false scenario of Kirov's murder (591-2):

If the official charges in the first two trials — that former Zinoviev supporters / 592 / had conspired to murder Kirov — were entirely bogus, then the indictments in all of the succeeding show trials collapsed. ... But if there was some truth to the charge that Zinovievites conspired to kill Kirov, then that preserved the possibility of arguing that the latter charges were also valid, at least in part. Therefore Serov and Rudenko ... chose to make a clear-cut argument that Nikolaev had had no relationship at all with the ex-Zinoviev supporters convicted in the trial of the "Leningrad Center.

It appears that Serov or his boss had thought through this strategy, to deny any connection at all between Nikolaev and the Zinovievites, even before the "Secret Speech." On January 27, 1956 the KGB destroyed central records on the case file "Svoiak," the all-union surveillance operation against the Zinovievites. It seems likely that "Svoiak" contained more evidence than Serov wanted Molotov to see, either of counterrevolutionary talk among former Zinovievites and/or of Nikolaev's connections with the accused in the "Leningrad Center." Serov concealed other evidence of connections between Nikolaev and the ex-Zinovievites Kotolynov, Antonov, and Shatsky. The excerpts from Nikolaev's diaries that he released to the Molotov commission in April 1956 contained no references to these men. But we know from later releases of data that Nikolaev did mention all three in his diaries. Serov presumably feared that Molotov would construe such connections as evidence of criminal conspiracy.

At the same time the Molotov commission was debating these issues, Rudenko, Serov, and KPK officials were already taking actions based on the assumption that the charges in the show trials were false...

Serov's report¹⁰ (595-599) is full of outright lies. We will cite only a few of them here. Serov:

On March 13, 1938 the Military Collegium ... found Bukharin, Rykov, Yagoda, and other accused ... guilty in carrying out the villainous murder of S.M. Kirov...

¹⁰ This report is in English translation in Leno 595-599. The original Russian text has not been released by Leno or by his publisher, Yale University Press.

This statement of Serov's is a lie. The court's verdict says nothing of the kind. Bukharin and Rykov were convicted of entirely different crimes. Iagoda was convicted only of "giving special instructions to his accomplices working in the Leningrad Administration of the People's Commissariat of Internal Affairs not to hinder the perpetration of the crime." (796-7)

Serov claimed:

Yagoda in essence recanted his earlier testimony with regard to the participation of the Rightists in the murder of Kirov ... Rykov and Bukharin, who supposedly made the decision to carry out this terrorist act ... categorically denied ... (598)

This is false, as Serov had to know. Iagoda did not deny but rather confirmed the role of the Rights in Kirov's murder. Anyone who reads the trial transcript can see that Iagoda only denied that he himself had played any active role in, or had specific prior knowledge of, the plot to kill Kirov. Iagoda did insist, however, that he had given instructions to his subordinates not to hinder any such attempt as might be made. That is, Iagoda denied he was an accomplice to the murder, but agreed that he was an accessory. During the trial Prosecutor Vyshinskii and Iagoda argued at some length over precisely this issue. As for Rykov and Bukharin, neither of them was charged with making the decision to kill Kirov.

Lobov Lied

Serov's report on the Radek-Sokol'nikov murders states that P.M. Lobov was one of the participants. However, neither Serov nor Petrov offer any direct testimony by Lobov to this effect. Even if they had done so, however, that testimony could not be accepted, for Lenoë establishes that Lobov lied during the 1950s and 1960s — no doubt because Serov insisted he do so.

According to Lenoë, in 1956 Lobov's testimony was in accord with the conclusions of the March 1938 Moscow Trial. But by 1960 Lobov was giving false testimony that supported Party Control Commission member

Ol'ga Shatunovskaia's preconceived idea that Stalin had been behind Kirov's murder:

Another witness deployed by Klimov was P. M. Lobov, who had murdered Grigory Sokolnikov in 1939 for Beria.¹¹ Lobov's post-Stalin testimony showed extensive embellishment and grew more florid over time. Thus, in 1956 he testified that at the Kolyma labor camp Zaporozhets had told him that Nikolaev had been taken into custody once and that Yagoda had ordered him freed ... In 1960 Lobov went much farther, stating that he had personally interrogated Nikolaev, who intimated that he had high-level connections. He also claimed that at Kolyma Zaporozhets had told him that Stalin himself had ordered Nikolaev's release. This was precisely the smoking gun that Shatunovskaya and the other investigators needed to accuse Stalin of Kirov's murder. Lobov delivered this evidence, which he had not mentioned in 1956, very conveniently for the KPK [Party Control Commission] in October 1960. (622-3; evidence added, GF)

¹¹ Lenoe's "evidence" for Lobov's murder of Sokol'nikov is the same report by Serov that we are examining here.

Lenoe concludes that Lobov's testimony is unreliable:

Against this is the unanimous testimony of credible Leningrad NKVD officers who survived the Terror (credible meaning minus P.M. Lobov and P.P. Petrovsky)...

Serov's Report: Conclusion

Serov's report is a falsification. We can confidently assert that because every statement in it that can be verified — cross-checked against other evidence we now have — is false.

The only primary source evidence quoted in Serov's report are statements from NKVD reports that Sokol'nikov was murdered by Kotov and Radek by the Trotskyist Varezhnikov. Neither Serov nor Petrov cites any evidence that Kotov was really Lobov. Evidently even Serov did not claim that Varezchnikov was really an NKVD man named I.I. Stepanov, as Petrov does.

With the collapse of Serov's report as evidence that Stalin had Radek and Sokol'nikov murdered the main prop supporting Petrov's article has been destroyed as well. However, Petrov adds yet more details to the story, so we will proceed to study what Petrov wrote. Most of the assertions Petrov has added himself are falsehoods as well. We will examine them next.

Petrov's Lies

Besides appending Serov's article to his chapter in his book Petrov also reprinted it in his own book on Serov in 2008. But Petrov makes additions of his own to the story. Most of them are also falsehoods, like Serov's. The rest of this article examines them.

Stalin's "Vengefulness"

Petrov states:

[[cyrillic]]Но мог ли Сталин оставить в живых своих многолетних критиков и противников? Его мстительность вошла в легенду.

But could Stalin have left his perennial critics and opponents alive?
His vengefulness has become legendary.

Petrov provides no evidence that Stalin was "vengeful" nor does he refer to anybody else's evidence. This appears to be an example of "weasel words," of implying something that is not actually stated, since the sentence "His vengefulness has become legendary" is not quite an assertion that Stalin was, in fact, vengeful — only that he is assumed to have been such.

A commission formed immediately after the 20th Party Congress...

Petrov states:

[[cyrillic]]Расследование обстоятельств убийства Радека и Сокольников началось сразу после XX съезда, когда создали комиссию по изучению материалов «Московских процессов» 1936-1938 гг. В архиве КГБ были подняты и изучены все материалы, связанные с процессами. Вывод комиссии однозначен — все показательные процессы 1936-1938 гг. сфальсифицированы.

The investigation into the circumstances of the murder of Radek and Sokolnikov began immediately after the XX Party Congress, when a commission was set up to study the materials of the Moscow Trials of 1936-1938., All materials in the KGB archives related to the Trials were taken up and studied. The conclusion of the commission was unambiguous — all the Show Trials of 1936-1938 were falsified.

This is completely false. The first such commission was the so-called "Molotov Commission." As we have seen, Lenoë discusses in some detail how Serov, Khrushchev's man, withheld evidence from and lied to Molotov.

Despite Serov's withholding of evidence the Molotov Commission did not conclude that "all the show trials of 1936-1938 were falsified" as Petrov claims. On the contrary, its report of December 10 1956 did not reject the verdicts of any of the Moscow trials! The report refused to review the cases of the major defendants in the Moscow Trials. Though the report accepted some of the criticisms that Khrushchev's men, aided by Serov, vigorously promoted, it explicitly refused to reconsider the three Moscow Trials of 1936, 1937 and 1938. The commission's report concluded as follows:

считает возможным дела пересмотреть персонально в отношении каждого.¹²

The Commission concludes that there are no grounds for reviewing cases against Bukharin, Rykov [the trial of 1938], Zinoviev, Kamenev, Evdokimov [the trial of 1936], Pyatakov, Radek [the trial of 1937], Rakovsky, Yagoda, Krestinsky [trial of 1938], Sokolnikov, Serebryakov [trial of 1937], Zalutsky, Safarov [convicted in 1935 in connection with the murder of Kirov], Bakayev and Smimov I.N. [trial 1936], because for many years they headed the anti-Soviet struggle directed against the construction of socialism in the USSR. In relation to others convicted in these trials the Commission considers it possible to review cases individually for each.

It is not clear how Petrov thought he could get away with such an obvious falsehood. The Molotov Commission is well known, at least to historians of the period. Its final report is even available online.¹³

The Testimony Of Fedotov And Matusov

Petrov writes:

[[cyrillic]]Как пояснили вызванные в ЦК КПСС в 1961-ом бывшие руководящие работники секретно-политического отдела ГУГБ НКВД П.В. Федотов и Я.Н. Матусов:

« ...Оперативно-чекистские отделения при политизоляторах свои донесения о поведении Радека и Сокольникова и им подобных лиц направляли непосредственно в адрес лично Берии, который

их посылал или докладывал Сталину, что было работникам отдела известно как со слов Кобулова, так и по смыслу, сколько помнится, его письменных указаний на донесениях политизоляторов.»

Причем оба, и Федотов и Матусов, утверждали, что «убийство Радека и Сокольникова было совершено по указанию Сталина.»

As the former leading officials of the secret-political department of the GUGB NKVD¹⁴, P.V. Fedotov and Ya.N. Matusov, summoned to the CPSU Central Committee in 1961, explained:

"... The operational-NKVD branches at political isolators¹⁵ sent their reports on the behavior of Radek and Sokolnikov and similar persons directly to Beria personally, who sent or reported to Stalin what the department employees knew both from the words of Kobulov and from the sense, as far as I can remember, of his written instructions on the reports of the political isolators."

Moreover, both Fedotov and Matusov claimed that "the murder of Radek and Sokolnikov was committed under the orders of Stalin."

¹⁴ Main Directorate of State Security of the NKVD (NKVD = People's Commissariat of Internal Affairs).

¹⁵ Prisons for prisoners convicted of crimes against the State.

Perhaps Fedotov and Matusov did say something like this. But we know that Serov and the Shvernik Commission were not looking for the truth, but to support Khrushchev's preconceived position that everybody was innocent. (We discuss the Shvernik Commission briefly below).

Even if genuine, this is hearsay at best. In any case, no testimony should simply be "believed" even if it is not hearsay, as this is. Would Petrov advocate 'believing' the testimony of the defendants at the Moscow Trials?

Furthermore, neither Fedotov nor Matusov was in a position to know what Beria did with any reports sent to him or what Stalin did or did not order.

Fedotov, Matusov, and other former NKVD-KGB employees had plenty of motive to say whatever Serov wanted them to. Khrushchev had overseen the trial and execution of a number of KGB men who had worked under Beria and had refused to tell Khrushchev's investigators what they wanted to hear.

Stalin's Inscription On A Drawing

Petrov writes:

[[cyrillic]]Позднее, в 1940-е, Сталин сделал косвенное признание и даже указал мотивы убийства Радека.

Later, in the 1940s, Stalin indirectly confessed to and even indicated the motive for Radek's murder.

The inscription, apparently in Stalin's hand, says:

[[cyrillic]]«Рыжий паршивый Радек. Не сцал бы против ветра, не был бы злой, был бы живой. И. Сталин.»

"Radek, the lousy redhead. If he had not pissed against the wind, if he had not been unkind, he would be alive. J. Stalin"

Objectively speaking, Stalin's words here could never be interpreted as an admission of anything except, perhaps, some lingering affection for Radek. They could just as easily be evidence that Stalin regretted Radek's death! This inscription only demonstrates that Stalin knew Radek was dead and blamed it at least partly on Radek himself.

Radek's alleged denunciation of the Moscow Trials

According to Petrov

[[cyrillic]]Конечно, Радек вел с сокамерниками разговоры о том, что все «московские процессы» — выдумка.

Of course, Radek talked with his cellmates about how all the "Moscow Trials" were fabrications.

Petrov cites no evidence, even of a hearsay nature, to support this statement. Even if he did, that would not mean that Radek really did so, much less that the Trials were actually a fiction.

Evidence from the Trotsky Archive and other sources make it clear that the trials were not a fabrication by the Stalin leadership at all. A few examples:

* We know that the "bloc of Rights and Trotskyites" really did exist, because Trotsky and Sedov wrote to each other about it (Harvard Trotsky Archive).

Not incidentally, this also proves that the Gorbachev-era "rehabilitation" reports and related documents are false, since they deny the existence of the "bloc of Rights and Trotskyites" which we know did exist.

Moreover, the Gorbachev-era Soviet party leadership knew this too. We know this for certain because Arch Getty's article noting the proof of the bloc's existence was actually translated into Russian and published in the Communist Party journal Voprosy Istorii KPSS in 1991.

* At the 1937 Moscow Trial Radek told the precise truth about the letter he claimed he had received from Trotsky in the early months of 1932. We know this because the return receipt of this letter to Radek noting the date of delivery is preserved in the Harvard Trotsky Archive. Getty's article notes this fact too.

It would be a great coincidence if the only true statements made by trial defendants were precisely those we can now verify independently. This suggests that other statements made during that trial by Radek, at least, may also be true as well.

* Thanks to the work of the late American researcher Alvin Coox we have other non-Soviet evidence of the Right-Trotskyite and the military conspiracies. Coox interviewed former officers of the Japanese army who had been assigned to work with NKVD defector General Genrikh S.

Liushkov, who deserted to the Japanese army across the Manchurian border on June 13, 1938. In his published articles, written while he was working for the propaganda section of the Japanese army, Liushkov denied the existence of the conspiracies. But he confirmed the existence of these same conspiracies privately to his Japanese handlers. They in turn reported this to Coox, who was baffled by it.

It is possible that former NKVD men may have told Serov's men that Radek denounced the trials as fabrications. But that would only mean that they were telling Serov what he wanted to hear.

"A Document From The Archive Of The Shvernik Commission"

This document basically only adds to Serov's report the detail that, supposedly, the Trotskyist Varezchnikov was really

[[сугилlic]]... Степанов И.И., бывший комендант НКВД Чечено-Ингушской АССР, арестованный в феврале 1939 года за серьезные должностные преступления. В ноябре того же года по указанию Берия Степанов освобожден из-под стражи. В постановлении о прекращении дела указано, что он выполнил «специальное задание," имеющее важное государственное значение."

... I.I. Stepanov, former commandant of the NKVD of the Chechen-Ingush Autonomous Soviet Socialist Republic, arrested in February 1939 for serious misconduct in office. In November of the same year, at the direction of Beria, Stepanov was released from custody. The order to dismiss the case stated that he had fulfilled "special assignment of great importance to the State."

There is no evidence — not even hearsay evidence — to support any of the statements here.

The Shvernik Report itself contained false information designed to help Khrushchev blame Stalin for various crimes. For example, it states:

[[сугилlic]]Никакого «Антисоветского право-троцкистского блока» в действительности не существовало...

In reality, no "Anti-Soviet Right-Trotskyite Bloc" existed. ...

But thanks to the Trotsky-Sedov correspondence in the Harvard Trotsky Archive we know that such a bloc did indeed exist.¹⁶ The Shvernik Commission does not mention Varezhnikov — Stepanov in its brief discussion of the Radek-Sokol'nikov murders but only refers to unnamed

[[cyrillic]]... специально подсланными лицами из числа бывших сотрудников НКВД, отбывавших наказания за политические и должностные преступления.¹⁷

... persons — former NKVD officials — specially sent, who had served sentences for political and official crimes.

Petrov states:

[[cyrillic]]Рядовым исполнителям — Степанову и Лобову — в награду даровали свободу.

The rank-and-file perpetrators, Stepanov and Lobov, were granted their freedom as a reward.

Once again Petrov gives no evidence to support this statement. According to a report by employees of the Soviet Procuracy dated June 14, 1990 Lobov was sentenced in 1939 to 3 years exile in Kazakhstan. This is a penal sentence, not "freedom."¹⁸

¹⁶ RKEB 2, 630.

¹⁸ RKEB 3, 468.

There is no entry for either Lobov or Stepanov in either of Petrov's lengthy books on the personnel of the NKVD. According to Petrov Stepanov had been commandant of the NKVD of the Checheno-Ingush ASSR. This position was prominent enough to qualify him for an entry in these large volumes. Lobov's role in the Kirov case should have qualified him for an entry too. Petrov also omitted Ovchinnikov from these works. Yet Ovchinnikov had been head of the Tomsk NKVD.

The very brief biographical note on Stepanov that Petrov gives on page 53 simply states that [[cyrillic]]с февраля по ноября 1939 г. находился в заключении.

He was in custody from February to November 1939.

Petrov gives no source for this information. Nor does he give any reason for excluding Stepanov's biographical sketch from his two volumes.

As for Lobov, Petrov's short biography of him on the same page stops at his two-year sentence in 1935 and then skips to 1961:

[[cyrillic]]В 1961 г. Лобов был еще жив и вызывался в ЦК КПСС для дачи объяснений.

In 1961 Lobov was still alive and was summoned to the Central Committee of the CPSU in order to give his explanation.

A two-year sentence in January 1935 would mean that Lobov was free by 1937 and so could not have been "rewarded by his freedom" in 1939. In any case we already know that Lobov was not rewarded but exiled in 1939. Petrov's story falls apart at every turn.

Petrov obviously had some source for this biographical information on Stepanov and Lobov. So why did he not include them in one of his two books? We have already determined that the available information about Ovchinnikov disproves Serov's report. Therefore it cannot be an accident that Petrov omits Ovchinnikov, a significant figure in the NKVD, from his two bulky volumes while Petrov's short biographic note on Ovchinnikov (also on page 53) stops with 1938, the year before the murders of Radek and Sokol'nikov. Might it also be the case that the full details of Stepanov's and Lobov's biographies contradict Petrov's story, as in the case of Ovchinnikov?

Petrov's False Conclusion

As we have seen, in both his Novaia Gazeta article and his more recent book Petrov makes the bold claim:

[[сугилlic]]Было неопровержимо доказано, что за убийством стоял лично Сталин.

It has been irrefutably proven that Stalin was personally behind the murder.

The present article has established that Petrov's statement is false. In reality the opposite is true: there is no evidence whatever to support Petrov's claim. A statement that is unsupported by any evidence must be considered unproven. A statement that is based on falsified evidence must itself be considered false.

Our conclusion is therefore inevitable: Stalin was not guilty of the murders of Sokol'nikov and Radek. This tale is a fabrication by Khrushchev-era investigators, led by Serov, who were constructing this and many other false accusations against Stalin. This falsehood has been perpetuated by Petrov for the same purpose: to slander Stalin.

In this article we have exposed the falsehoods in Serov's report. Petrov could have done the same thing. Indeed, had he so chosen Petrov could have done it quicker and better, since he has much better access to archives and primary sources. But rather than perform the historian's function of verification Petrov chose to compound Serov's lies with yet more falsehoods of his own invention.

Conclusions — Nikita Petrov

Petrov has knowingly falsified evidence to blame a person — in this case, Joseph Stalin — for two murders of which he was not guilty. It is ironic that Petrov, a leading representative and researcher for a self-styled "human rights" organization, is guilty of what he and other anticommunists accuse Stalin of doing.

The goal of historiography and historians is to discover the truth about the past, as established by the best evidence and reasoning. But some historians do not try to discover the truth. These dishonest historians begin with a preconceived conclusion and then search for anything that might pass as evidence in support of that preconceived conclusion. People who do this are not really historians at all. They are propagandists attempting to disguise themselves as historians so their readers will wrongly believe that what they are reading is an attempt to discover the truth.

Those who call themselves historians but do not strive to be objective: to question their own preconceived ideas; to remain devoted to discovering and reporting the truth even when that truth contradicts their own cherished ideas — they are not really historians at all. They are publicists for some cause who have adopted the disguise of a historian, the better to deceive their readers. What they write is not history but "propaganda with footnotes."

Petrov is one of these. This has important consequences for all of us who read what he writes.

* Nothing Petrov writes can be accepted, even provisionally, as true. On the contrary: we must see his work for what it really is: a strained attempt to shore up his own preconceived ideas while disguising this attempt as historiography — that is, as an attempt to discover the truth — which it most definitely is not.

* We should never assume that Petrov is using his evidence honestly. His work is useless as a source of reliable historical information. Everything Petrov writes, every statement and footnote, must be checked and verified, because he cannot be trusted to use them honestly. Since this is impossible for all but specialists, it means that there is no reason for most people to read Petrov's work at all.

The "Memorial" Society

There are many so-called historians who falsely claims to be discovering the truth while in fact writing anticommunist propaganda. Often these fraudulent historians are based at prestigious institutions such as Oxford University, Yale University, the Humboldt University (Berlin), the Hoover Institution (Stanford, CA), and many others. Petrov is a top official in the Russian Memorial Society and has been its vice-chair since 1990. It is his prominence as a leader of the Memorial Society that accounts for his frequent appearance in the news media and his columns in Novaia Gazeta, a newspaper jointly owned by Mikhail Gorbachev and billionaire "entrepreneur" Aleksandr Lebedev.

"Memorial" presents itself as "an international historical, educational, human rights, and charitable organization." This self-description is false. In reality "Memorial" is an organization devoted to the spread of anticommunist falsehoods. It is funded by organizations such as the Soros, Ford, Jackson, and Guggenheim Foundations. Explicitly ideological anticommunist organizations funding "Memorial" include the National Endowment for Democracy (USA) and the Lynde and Harry Bradley Foundation. It also receives funds from the Russian government through the Social Chamber of the Russian Federation (Obshchestvennaia Palata R.F.).

An example of "Memorial's" dishonesty is its long list "Victims of Political Terror in the USSR."¹⁹ Here is one entry, found after only a minute or two of searching:

Mr A. V. Vaganov was arrested during the bloody Civil War, held in jail for four weeks, and then acquitted. What makes him a "victim of political terror"? By this standard a huge number of people are "victims of American government political terror." Where is THAT list of "victims"?

What's more, the list of "victims" does not bother to ascertain whether or not the individual arrested was guilty of the charges against him (or her). Persons found guilty of a crime are not normally called "victims."

"Memorial's" list is useless as a source of information. It seems clear that it is intended to be as large a list as possible, enabling anticommunists to impress others by telling them of this huge list of "victims of communist terror."

"Memorial" Proposes An Anticommunist "Purge"

In early 2011 "Memorial" posted a proposal on its website for a program to "de-Stalinize" Russia. In true Orwellian language the proposal is titled "A proposal for the establishment of a society-wide state-society program concerning the commemoration of victims of the totalitarian regime and national reconciliation."²⁰ This proposal is an attempt to take a far right-wing, anticommunist position on Soviet history— in some respects more extreme than that of the Cold War years in the United States — and make it into official state policy. It is an attempt to politicize history in an extreme right-wing direction; to impose a far right-wing, anticommunist orthodoxy on the whole country of Russia.

Here is one of the provisions in this proposal:

[[cyrillic]]«Приложение 8»

8.2. Принять официальное постановление о том, что публичные выступления государственных служащих любого ранга, содержащие отрицание или оправдание преступлений тоталитарного режима, несовместимы с пребыванием на государственной службе.

"Appendix 8"

8.2. Adopt a formal decree that public statements by civil servants of any rank, denying or justifying the crimes of the totalitarian regime, are incompatible with being in public service.

The Memorial Society "lovers of freedom" want all Russian civil servants to be "free" only to repeat Memorial's version of history! And they blame the USSR for "totalitarianism" while they demand that every public employee in Russia call the USSR "totalitarian" or lose their jobs!

The Memorial version of history is a falsification. The truth doesn't need this kind of imposition. Only falsehood requires the indoctrination and policing of opinions. "Memorial" is very far from the ideals stated in its inflated self-description. It's a right-wing anticommunist pro-capitalist group masquerading as a "human rights" group.

Their recent proposal to the Duma is useful insofar as it has exposed them for what they are. Few liberal capitalist organizations would propose the kind of restrictions on free speech that "Memorial" unblushingly proposes.

During the height of the Red Scare in the USA in the late '40s and '50s one had to take a loyalty oath. "Memorial's" proposed legislation goes far beyond "loyalty oaths" to police one's statements while off the job. What happened to "human rights"?

If "Memorial" were an honest organization it would not number persons arrested and then released for lack of evidence against them among the "victims of political terror." Nor would it propose that all government employees who made any public statement that disagreed with its, "Memorial's," view of the Soviet past, or anybody's view of history, be fired.

If "Memorial" were an honest organization it would not have a falsifier like Nikita Petrov as one of its officers and leading researchers.

"Memorial" is similar to other ideological anticommunist, pro-capitalist organizations, in that none of them are interested in the least in the truth, but rather in producing propaganda to falsely smear the communist movement. Nothing published by or under the auspices of the "Memorial" society should be believed in any way.

Why Do Anticommunists Lie?

Why tell lies when the truth is on your side? If the "Memorial" society were truly interested in human rights, they would also be concerned with the rights of those who do not agree with their, "Memorial's," interpretation of the Soviet past, and would defend the rights of those persons rather than trying to silence them with the fear of losing their jobs.

If anticommunists — and, it must be said, some who consider themselves communists, like Trotskyists — had honorable goals they would not repeat Nazi lies like that of the "Katyn massacre" and the "Holodomor." They would not claim that the Moscow Trials and the Tukhachevsky Affair were all frame-ups against innocent men, when all the evidence we possess today points in precisely the opposite direction — that the defendants were guilty of at least those crimes to which they confessed.

Petrov wants Stalin to "look bad." But Petrov is unable to find evidence that Stalin was, in fact, "bad." We can state this with confidence because he had such evidence Petrov would not have to resort to the kind of lies and fabrications that we have exposed in the article under discussion here. This practice is the rule, not the exception, in the field of Soviet history.

Bibliography

In the original publication, the bibliography and important primary source documents are linked here rather than printed:

<http://msuweb.montclair.edu/~furrgr/research/stalinwaitingbibl.html>

In Chapter 10, "Hammer," Kotkin falsely asserts that Stalin ordered Karl Radek and Grigorii Sokol'nikov to be murdered in prison. I have put a link to my article refuting this canard, which originated with Nikita Petrov, an official of the Russian "Memorial" Society, in Chapter 14 of the present book, and repeat that link here:

This documentation has been included by this editor. The index has been excluded from the EPUB.

Here are listed only materials that I used in this book and that are not listed in Kotkin's bibliography, which is posted separately.

Acknowledgements and Dedication

I wish to express my gratitude to Kevin Prendergast, Arthur Hudson — Arthur, may you enjoy your well-deserved retirement! — and Siobhan McCarthy, the skilled and tireless Inter-Library Loan librarians at Harry S. Sprague Library, Montclair State University. Without their help, my research would simply not be possible. With their continued help, I can persevere.

I again extend my heartfelt thanks to my skilled, wonderful Moscow colleague Vladimir L'vovich Bobrov, for all his tireless and brilliant help during the twenty-one years of our research together.

I would like to recognize Montclair State University for giving me a sabbatical leave in the fall semester of 2015, and special research travel funds in 2017 and 2019, which have been invaluable in my research on this book.

Dedication

I dedicate this book to Ellen and John Murray, of Oakland, CA, and Raj Sahai, of Berkeley, CA.

You have been infallibly supportive of my work, in every way. Encouragement and help such as yours can never be repaid. But it can be acknowledged, and I gladly do so here, with thanks and humility.

Introduction

This book is a study of Soviet-era documents, recently declassified, that bear on Leon Trotsky and his conspiracies against the Soviet government and Party during the 1930s. These documents are: Yuri Piatakov's statement to Nikolai Ezhov, chief of the NKVD, of December 19-20, 1936; the transcript of the trial of Marshal Mikhail N. Tukhachevsky and seven accomplices of June 11, 1937; and a collection of investigative materials from the former NKVD archive concerning the First and Second Moscow Trials of August, 1936, and January, 1937.

I obtained Piatakov's statement to Ezhov some years ago from my Moscow colleague and skilled historian Vladimir L. Bobrov, from the FSB (formerly NKVD) archive in Moscow. It has since been declassified and published online from the Russian State Archive of Social-Political History (RGASPI), also in Moscow. The texts are the same, though they were typed at different times and have different pagination.¹

¹ I have given the pagination for both versions in the text of Piatakov's statement printed in the Appendix to this book.

The 172-page text of the trial of the "Tukhachevsky Affair" defendants was silently declassified from the Russian State Archive of Socio-Political History (RGASPI) in May, 2018, and posted on the Russian historical site istmat.info. It is in printed form, perhaps to be circulated in a limited manner.

The third set of documents are from the two-volume work *Politbiuro i Lev Trotskii (sbornik dokumentov), 1923-1940*², edited by Oleg V. Mozokhin and published in 2013 in Prague, Czechoslovakia, by Sociosféra-CZ. This two-volume work is essentially unobtainable. As of November, 2019, the Worldcat meta-database of world research libraries contains an entry for this work which states that "no libraries with the specified item were found."³

³ https://www.worldcat.org/title/politbiuro-i-lev-trotskii-sbornik-dokumentov-1923-1940/oclc/889406153&referer=brief_results

In 2017 a one-volume version of this work was published in Russia. But this volume omits some of the most interesting documents from the two-volume work.⁴ My colleague Vladimir Bobrov obtained a copy of the two-volume, 2013 work at the FSB archive. I have used this copy for the present book.

⁴ https://www.worldcat.org/title/politbiuro-i-lev-trotskii-1922-1940-sbornik-dokumentov/oclc/1050151524amp;referer=brief_results I have compared the Tables of Contents of the 2013 and the 2017 works.

Mozokhin is a historian employed by the FSB, the successor to the KGB and NKVD, and author of many books and articles on the "special services." The two-volume 2013 work is cited on his personal page. But there is no information about why it was published in Czechoslovakia rather than in Russia, or why it is unobtainable.⁵

⁵ See <http://mozohin.ru/photos/image/Politbjuro-i-Lev-Trockij.html>

In the present book we will consider only the documents in volume 2 of the two-volume 2013 work (hereafter referred to as PiLT2). The first document in volume 2 dates from November 3, 1932. The latest is from August 24, 1940, and is an announcement of, and copy of the Pravda article on, Trotsky's assassination on August 20, 1940.

Our study of the documents published in PiLT2 yields some important results concerning Trotsky's conspiracies during the 1930s. The documents in this volume also touch on many other important issues with which we are not concerned here.

A. Introduction — Conclusion: The Results of This Study

What follows is a brief summary of the conclusions to be drawn from the evidence under examination in this book:

Trotsky Did Conspire with Germany and Japan against the USSR

The information in these documents that are examined in the present book constitutes additional strong evidence that Leon Trotsky did indeed enter into conspiratorial relations against the Soviet Union with both Nazi Germany and fascist Japan. It corroborates a large body of other evidence of Trotsky's conspiracies with the fascist powers. We located, identified, and studied some of that evidence in a previous work.⁶

⁶ Leon Trotsky's Collaboration with Germany and Japan. Kettering, OH: Erythrós Press & Media, LLC, (2017).

Much more evidence of Trotsky's German-Japanese collaboration is being disclosed as more documents from former Soviet archives are being released. We will collect and examine it in future studies.

The Statements and Confessions of Moscow Trials Defendants Reflect What The Defendants Chose to Say

All the documents under examination in the present book relate to the First and Second Moscow Trials of August, 1936, and January, 1937. Today we have a great deal of evidence that, in the cases of the three famous Moscow Trials of 1936-38, the NKVD did not force those under interrogation to confess to crimes they had not committed.

During his tenure as chief (People's Commissar) of Internal Affairs Nikolai Ezhov did frame, or simply murder, hundreds of thousands of innocent Soviet citizens. We have discussed this horror, the Ezhovshchina, in a separate study.⁷

⁷ Yezhov Vs. Stalin: The Truth About Mass Repressions and the So-Called 'Great Terror' in the USSR. Kettering, OH: Erythrós Press & Media, LLC, 2018 (2016).

In the first twelve chapters of Trotsky's 'Amalgams' we checked many statements by Moscow Trials defendants against independent evidence now available. In The Moscow Trials As Evidence we published an updated version of this study. On the basis of this examination we concluded that the testimony in the Moscow Trials proves to be truthful in those instances where we can independently check it. The interrogations published in PiLT2 provide a great deal of additional corroborative evidence that the Moscow Trials testimony was genuine — meaning, that those under interrogation answered the way they chose to answer.

Documents from the Harvard Trotsky Archive help to show that many of those interrogated here told the truth. We can also independently check a number of statements made in these interrogations against other independent sources, such as Mark Zborowski's reports to his NKVD handlers; Anton Ciliga's memoirs about his years in the Verkhneural'sk political isolator along with Trotskyists and other oppositionists; and Valentin Astrov's testimony.⁸

⁸ See Furr, Amalgams, Moscow Trials, and Trotsky's Lies, for studies of the evidence from Zborowski, Ciliga, and Astrov.

Our hypothesis that the prisoners' confessions in PiLT2 are genuine has been confirmed. Whenever we can check them by internal or external evidence they turn out to be genuine. There is no disconfirming evidence at all — no evidence that any of the confession statements were the result of compulsion of any kind. Therefore we must conclude that the statements made in the confessions contained in PiLT2 that we cannot now directly confirm are also genuine and, consequently, may be used as evidence.

The implications of this finding go far beyond the documents in PiLT2. The contents of these interrogation-confessions are consistent with those in the First and Second Moscow Trials. We have other evidence that confirms the genuineness of the testimony in these trials. Together with our analysis of the confession statements in PiLT2 we have even stronger evidence that the testimony of the defendants in the Moscow Trials is genuine — that is, not forced upon the defendants by the Prosecution or the OGPU-NKVD interrogators.

We should consider the contents of the confessions to be truthful unless we have evidence to the contrary. In a few cases, like that of I.N. Smirnov, we know that those under interrogation lied to the interrogators. We know Smirnov lied because we have evidence from Leon Sedov himself, found in the Harvard Trotsky Archive, that Smirnov was indeed the leader of the Soviet-based clandestine Trotskyist group.

The evidence is clear that the arrested oppositionists testified what they chose to say. In some cases they deliberately lied, or did not tell the whole truth, in order to deceive the prosecution. Swedish researcher Sven-Eric Holmström has discovered compelling evidence that at least one more prominent Soviet figure aided Piatakov in this Norway trip. If Holmström is correct, Piatakov remained silent about this person, no doubt to protect him.

Another example is Grigori Sokol'nikov's claim during the January, 1937, Moscow Trial that he had not received any communications from Trotsky. We know that in fact he did, because the Harvard Trotsky Archive preserves a return receipt from a letter Trotsky sent him. The NKVD evidently did not know about this, so Sokol'nikov's statement went unchallenged by the prosecution. It would be interesting to know what Trotsky said to Sokol'nikov in that letter. Probably it was similar to the letter he sent to Radek and whose contents Radek described at trial, since it was sent during the same period of time.

Ivan Nikitich Smirnov, Leader of the Clandestine Trotskyists in the USSR, Lied

The PiLT2 documents give us more information about the First Moscow Trial. We see I.N. Smirnov, who claimed at trial that he no longer "did any work" in the Trotsky conspiracy, lying to the investigators as soon as he is arrested. We know this now because many others testify to Smirnov's leading role in the conspiracy.

The Trotskyists Conspired to Murder Sergei Kirov

The PiLT2 documents give us important evidence that the Trotskyists, and therefore certainly Trotsky himself, were indirectly involved in the assassination of Sergei Kirov on December 1, 1934. The Trotskyists were planning similar assassinations and were in touch with the Zinovievists who in fact murdered Kirov.

One Trotskyist told another that it was "their people" who had killed Kirov.⁹ This was not in fact true — Kirov was murdered by a clandestine Zinovievist group — but it shows that the Trotskyists were aiming at the same thing.

⁹ Interrogation of Ivan Aleksandrovich Maslennikov, April 26, 1936. PiLT2, 249.

Valentin Ol'berg Was Guilty of Collaborating with Trotsky and the Gestapo

We learn a lot more about Valentin Ol'berg, one of the leading defendants in the First Moscow Trial of August, 1936. PiLT2 contains much more information about Ol'berg and his background, including testimony from his brother and his wife, and from others who knew and helped him. Ol'berg claimed to have been on a mission from Leon Sedov, coordinated with the Nazi Gestapo, to assassinate Stalin. We now have confirmation of his accusation from co-conspirators who knew about it.

Since the publication of PiLT2 in 2013, more evidence concerning Ol'berg and of those associated with him, including his wife, brother, and associates, has been declassified and made available to researchers. We will study this evidence in a future book.

Trotskyists Within the USSR Collaborated with Fascists, Ukrainian Nationalists, and Nazi Agents

We have more details about the ties between the German secret police, the Gestapo, and the Trotskyist conspiracy. As far as the Trotskyist conspirators are concerned, it appears that some of them, at least, did not take the initiative to contact the Gestapo but instead were persuaded to work with the Gestapo as a result of being under arrest. Their trust in Leon Trotsky and their intense hostility towards Stalin and the Soviet government made their Gestapo collaboration voluntary.

We learn more about these contacts from the testimony related to the Second Moscow Trial. Once Trotsky had made it clear to his followers that he was instructing them to collaborate with all who opposed the Stalin regime, the Trotskyists formed alliances with other Soviet oppositionists and dissidents; with Soviet citizens who had joined fascist anti-Soviet groups; with Ukrainian nationalists; with German technicians who, while working the Soviet mining industry, were also German agents; and with the Gestapo.

We have corroborating evidence about Trotskyist and fascist sabotage in the Kuzbass mining region, a topic that is featured in the Second Moscow Trials.

Trotsky Also Collaborated with Great Britain and France

The single interrogation of Grigori Sokol'nikov in this volume corroborates his own confession at trial concerning his contacts on Trotsky's behalf with the Japanese and British. His contact with the French is also briefly mentioned. Other confessions by Sokol'nikov had recently become available. We will examine them in a future study.

Piatakov Did Meet with Trotsky in Norway in December, 1935

The testimony in PiLT2 corroborates Piatakov's testimony in his Statement to Ezhov of September 19-20, 1936. This is particularly important since Piatakov was more closely in touch with Trotsky than any other conspirator whose materials we now possess. The details in PiLT2 also confirm the genuineness of Piatakov's testimony concerning his secret visit to Trotsky in Norway in December 1935.

B. Evidence and Denial

The "Anti-Stalin Paradigm"

The bourgeoisie turns everything into a commodity, hence also the writing of history. It is part of its being, of its condition for existence, to falsify all goods: it falsified the writing of history. And the best-paid historiography is that which is best falsified for the purposes of the bourgeoisie.

— Friedrich Engels, "Notes for the 'History of Ireland.'" (1870)

According to the only acceptable model of Soviet history of the Stalin period — we call it, for convenience, the Anti-Stalin Paradigm — Stalin was guilty of many horrific crimes, principally mass murder, and the fabrication of false charges against innocent persons followed by their punishment (often death). In mainstream historiography of the Soviet Union it is considered illegitimate to challenge any charge of a serious crime against Stalin. It is a fortiori considered taboo to conclude that Stalin did not commit any crime that he has been accused of.

Researchers of Soviet history of the Stalin period are constrained to adhere to the Anti-Stalin Paradigm regardless of the evidence. The ASP, therefore, is not a way of learning what really happened. Rather, it is a way of not learning what really happened. It is a way of telling historians: "Your task is to come to acceptable, anti-Stalin, anticommunist conclusions, and, where necessary, to back those conclusions up with phony evidence and fallacious reasoning." Or, at best, "your job is to confine yourself to drawing conclusions that do not challenge or threaten to disprove the ASP."

The Trotskyist Paradigm

A similar paradigm controls Trotskyist writing, which must conclude that "Trotsky was right" and "Stalin was wrong," regardless of the evidence.

Today we have a great deal of evidence that corroborates the charges leveled against Trotsky in the Moscow Trials of conspiring to murder Soviet leaders, sabotage Soviet industry, undermine the Soviet military, and collude with Nazi Germany and fascist Japan for the defeat of the USSR in war. But no Trotskyist historian can deal objectively with this evidence, or they will no longer be welcome in the ranks of Trotskyists.

Likewise, no academic historian of the Soviet Union can approach the evidence objectively and conclude that Stalin was not guilty of this or that crime of which he has been charged, or they will not be published, with serious consequences for their academic careers.

The Anti-Stalin Paradigm and the Issue of Denial

Whatever the subject of research, it is always appropriate, and in fact essential, to discuss questions of evidence. In this larger sense, there is nothing special about the need for such discussion in the field of Soviet history of the Stalin period.

However, the role of bias — anticommunist, and specifically anti-Stalin bias — is so great that it poisons the entire field of Soviet history, and so it must be confronted. Likewise, the issue of denial and evasion — the refusal to objectively consider evidence that sharply contradicts the prevailing Anti-Stalin Paradigm¹⁰, is so pervasive that we must say something about it.

¹⁰ Or the Trotskyist paradigm, which is, in effect, one variety of the Anti-Stalin Paradigm (ASP).

The Role of Denial and Evasion

President Trump and many congressional Republicans now treat anything other than partisan hackery for their own side as partisan hackery for the other side.

— David Leonhardt, New York Times, November 18, 2019

We predict that the result of this research will be ignored by mainstream Soviet historians, and of course by Trotskyists. The reader should understand the reasons for this denial and evasion.

The fact is that the academic field of Soviet history of the Stalin period exists primarily to promote falsehoods about that history. The truth about Stalin and the history of the Soviet Union during Stalin's time, and about Trotsky and his conspiracies, including with the Nazis, is simply too threatening to be honestly confronted. The evidence supporting these conclusions is too strong, and there is too much of it, for it to be mentioned, much less discussed. The only way to "save" the Anti-Stalin and Trotskyist paradigms of Soviet history is to ignore the evidence and to continue to repeat fact-claims that we can now prove false.

It would be excellent if some mainstream historians of Soviet history would subject the evidence in this book, and in my other books and articles, to scholarly critique. I would expect to learn that I had made some errors — after all, some degree of error is inevitable in all human endeavor. I would also hope to learn that I had overlooked some evidence and/or counter-evidence. That would be beneficial to me in my research. It would also contribute to the project of learning the truth about Soviet history of this Stalin era and about what Leon Trotsky was really up to, as opposed to what his acolytes claim he was doing.

I do not expect this to happen. Willful ignorance, and personal attacks on me for daring to contradict the prevailing "wisdom" — that is, falsehoods — about Stalin and Soviet history of this period, have been the only response to my research. I expect that "mainstream" historiography will continue to deny and evade the truth.¹¹

My goal is to discover the truth. I do not "defend" or "apologize for" Stalin. If Stalin committed crimes, I want to know what they were. The only way to know this is to do honest research. However, persons who perpetuate falsehoods in the service of a political agenda assume that everyone does as they are doing — that everyone, like they themselves, is bending, ignoring, or inventing evidence in the service of their own biases. Dishonest persons justify their own dishonesty by assuming that every else is also dishonest. This is why I am called a "defender of" or "apologist for" Stalin.

Techniques of Evasion and Denial: Logical Fallacies

Argument Ad Hominem

Example A: A Prominent Trotskyist

A prominent American Trotskyist — I will refer to him as W.A. — has called me a conspiracy theorist. Readers should recognize this as a logical fallacy, the argumentum ad hominem — an attack on the person making an argument rather than on the matter at hand.

Ad hominem (Latin for "to the person"), short for argumentum ad hominem, typically refers to a fallacious argumentative strategy whereby genuine discussion of the topic at hand is avoided by instead attacking the character, motive, or other attribute of the person making the argument, or persons associated with the argument, rather than attacking the substance of the argument.¹²

¹² See https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Ad_hominem

W.A. did not explain what he means by this remark. This is "name-calling." In itself it is without substance and requires no refutation. But it is nonetheless telling in the present context.

Wikipedia has a useful definition of Conspiracy theory:

A conspiracy theory is an explanation of an event or situation that invokes a conspiracy by sinister and powerful actors, often political in motivation, when other explanations are more probable. The term has a pejorative connotation, implying that the appeal to a conspiracy is based on prejudice or insufficient evidence. Conspiracy theories resist falsification and are reinforced by circular reasoning: both evidence against the conspiracy and an absence of evidence for it, are re-interpreted as evidence of its truth, and the conspiracy becomes a matter of faith rather than proof.¹³

¹³ See https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Conspiracy_theory

According to this definition, Leon Trotsky himself was a conspiracy theorist. Trotsky claimed that Stalin was conspiring — plotting — to wipe out personal enemies and any potential threat to his own power. There was not then, nor is there now, any evidence at all to support Trotsky's notion that Stalin was conspiring to do away with personal rivals and enemies

Trotskyists and Cold-War anticommunists may claim that the Soviet — "Stalin's" — accusations against the oppositionists in the USSR — Zinovievists, Trotskyists, Rightists, and others — also constitute a conspiracy theory. But this is false. We now know that the Soviet investigators and prosecution did not base their conclusions on "prejudice or insufficient evidence." They had a great deal of evidence! More and more of such evidence continues to be made public. We also have significant non-Soviet evidence that could not possibly have been coerced or planted by "Stalin" — i.e., the Soviets.¹⁴

¹⁴ See Furr, The Moscow Trials as Evidence.

W.A. adheres to the Trotsky cult — he "believes" Trotsky. If anyone were to simply "believe" whatever Stalin wrote or said, he would be ridiculed, and rightly so! "Belief" can never aid the search for truth. Karl Marx himself said that "Question everything!" (De omnibus dubitandum) was his favorite slogan. In this important sense, Trotskyists are not Marxists.

There is no evidence whatsoever to support the Trotskyist accusations. We have exposed and discussed a number of the lies that Trotsky concocted to create and sustain his anti-Stalin conspiracy theory. None of it is evidence. (Furr, Trotsky's 'Amalgams'; Trotsky's Lies).

This makes W.A. himself a conspiracy theorist in that, in defiance of the evidence and logic, he continues to uncritically believe Trotsky's charges against Stalin. It is a clever, though dishonest, rhetorical ploy to call someone you disagree with a "conspiracy theorist" when in reality the term applies to you yourself.

Example B: Stephen Cohen

Stephen Cohen, a senior scholar of the Stalin period and defender of the Anti-Stalin Paradigm, has called me "a Stalin terror denier or apologist;" "a pseudo-scholar who disregards or falsifies overwhelmingly evidence —

plain facts, to put the matter plainly," and "who has no standing ... among serious scholars here or in Russia."¹⁵

Cohen is "blowing smoke." Neither he nor any of the "serious scholars" of Soviet history of the Stalin period have any evidence, much less "plain facts", that Stalin planned the "terror." On the contrary: all the evidence supports the opposite conclusion. Cohen simply asserts that there is "evidence" that I am "disregarding" or "falsifying." But he cites no examples. No wonder: he can't do so, because no such evidence exists.

¹⁵ Personal communication dated July 2, 2019 from a colleague with an email from Stephen Cohen dated May 25, 2019.

Appeal to Authority

When Cohen refers to "standing ... among serious scholars" he is committing the logical fallacy of "appeal to authority." The fact that others disagree with me is not evidence that I am wrong. Any more than the fact that they do not agree with me is evidence that they are wrong!

Only primary source evidence counts, not the "authority" of scholars who, instead of pursuing the truth "and letting the chips fall where they may," choose to uphold the Anti-Stalin Paradigm out of whatever motive — careerism, anticommunism or loyalty to Trotsky.

Cohen is loyal to Nikolai Bukharin. In 1973 Cohen published a biography, Bukharin and the Bolshevik Revolution, that was to become famous. In the tenth chapter — the chapter that takes Bukharin's life from 1930 to his trial and execution in 1938 — Cohen relies heavily on Khrushchev-era materials about Stalin. In 2010 my colleague Vladimir L. Bobrov and I published an article in which we demonstrate that every anti-Stalin statement Cohen writes in that tenth chapter is provably, demonstrably false.

We also prove that Cohen deliberately lied. In his book Cohen quotes the memoir of Jules Humbert-Droz, a former communist and friend of Bukharin's. Humbert-Droz reveals that Bukharin told him in 1927 or 1928 that he and his followers were already conspiring to murder Stalin. This was before collectivization, the first Five-Year Plan, the famine of 1932-33, possibly even before Trotsky had been expelled from the Party (November 12, 1927) and, as far as we know today, before Trotsky himself was plotting to kill Stalin.

But Cohen withholds this information. He does not tell his readers that Humbert-Droz, whose memoir he cites in his Bukharin book, stated this. To do so would have undermined Cohen's desire to portray Bukharin as an innocent "victim of Stalin."¹⁶

Those who uphold the Anti-Stalin and Trotskyist paradigms do so in defiance of all the evidence we now have. What are they afraid of? We should be clear: they fear the overthrow of the Anti-Stalin Paradigm and the complete dismantling of the "Trotsky Paradigm," the Trotskyist cult which is structured around Leon Trotsky's lies and deceptions.

¹⁶ See Grover Furr and Vladimir L. Bobrov, "Stephen Cohen's Biography of Bukharin: A Study in the Falsehood of Khrushchev-Era "Revelations". Cultural Logic, 2010. At <https://ojs.library.ubc.ca/index.php/clogic/article/view/191531/188643>.

Fallacy of Personal Incredulity

The problems of logical fallacies and preconceived bias persist even among Marxists. Here is an example of fallacious thinking by the editors of Science & Society, a scholarly Marxist journal of worldwide reputation for eighty years. First, they announce in positive tones the publication of a commentary article of mine:

We are glad to be able to present Grover Furr's critical commentary on Gerald Meyer's article, "Joseph Stalin: Revisionist Biography," ...

Then there follow these words:

Furr is well known for his resolute defense of Stalin and his rejection of the entire corpus of literature, from both the capitalist mainstream and the left, depicting Stalin as an authoritarian and repressive figure, and one who was guilty of major crimes against humanity.

This is false. I do not "defend Stalin." I defend the truth, as demonstrated by the best primary source evidence. I work hard to be objective, to question and doubt my own biases and preconceived ideas, because failure to do so leads inevitably to confirmation bias and forfeits any chance of discovering the truth. If Stalin committed crimes I want to know about them. I want to find the truth, whatever it is and "let the chips fall where they may."

The Science & Society editors correctly state:

Furr argues, to the contrary, that almost all of these claims, from the Khrushchev "revelations" to the mountains of establishment scholarly works on the subject, are false.

That is true — though the editors neglect to say that I base my conclusions upon evidence and study of that evidence with firm objectivity. Then they state:

We need to be clear: the great majority of the S & S Editorial Board and Manuscript Collective do not accept Furr's position.¹⁷

¹⁷ "Editorial Perspective. In This Issue." Science & Society 82, No. 4 (October, 2018), p. 475.

This is an example of the fallacy of personal incredulity. On what basis do the editors say this? Not from studying the evidence, let alone studying it in a strictly objective manner. They just "do not accept" — that is, do not believe — it.

In reality, the S & S editors have no basis either to agree or to disagree with me. The "great majority" of the board is basing their "non-acceptance" of my "position" — by which they mean the results of my research — on bias and preconceived notions, no doubt bolstered by the "authority" of some person or persons unnamed.

This stance is not compatible with a materialist, scientific approach to history. Materialists decide questions of truth or falsehood on the basis of primary source evidence and solid, objective reasoning. Once again, this demonstrates the power of the Anti-Stalin Paradigm. Yet S & S is one of the foremost Marxist journals in the world today. How sad!

C. Objectivity — The sine qua non of discovering the truth

But how can we learn the truth? How can we avoid being blinded by our own biases and preconceived ideas? It is a basic tenet of materialism that one's conclusions about reality, including historical reality, must be firmly based on evidence. This is the only way to discover the truth in history. The primary source evidence must be identified, located, collected, studied, and conclusions drawn from it that are based on the evidence alone, not on preconceived ideas, biases, prejudices, without faults in logic and reasoning.

The materialist researcher must work hard to be thoroughly objective. She must be aware and suspicious of her own biases and preconceived ideas. Everyone possesses biases, prejudices, and preconceived ideas. So the materialist researcher must adopt a method that is close similar to that used in the "hard" sciences like physics or chemistry.

The objective historian must be self-aware. It is her own preconceived ideas and biases, not those of anyone else, which are most likely to mislead her and to poison her research.

- She must take special pains to look with increased suspicion at any evidence or argument that tends to confirm her own preconceived ideas. This is the threat of confirmation bias.¹⁸
- She must also force herself to look with an additional dose of sympathy and interest at any evidence or argument that tends to disconfirm her own preconceived biases.

¹⁸ "Confirmation bias is the tendency to search for, interpret, favor, and recall information in a way that affirms one's prior beliefs or hypothesis."
https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Confirmation_bias

This is the only way to operationalize — to put into practical use — the ideal of objectivity. If a researcher fails to be objective, she will never discover the truth, or even recognize it if she sees it.

D. Why Is There No German or Japanese Evidence of Trotsky's Collaboration?

"Most conspiracy theorists don't understand this. But if there really were a C.I.A. plot, no documents would exist."¹⁹

Instructions on concrete organization questions regarding preparation for underground conditions must be given only verbally... At the very least it should have been specified that these names and addresses be given strictly orally...²⁰

²⁰ O. Weber. "How Not to Prepare For Underground Conditions of Revolutionary Work." The Communist International. July 1, 1932, 417.

In the course of this study we will show that there is a large amount of mutually-corroborative evidence of Trotsky's German-Japanese collaboration from the Soviet side.

In addition we have important evidence from German and Japanese sources of collaboration by members of the Soviet opposition, including some who themselves claimed to have been working with Trotsky. Here are a few examples:

- The late Alvin D. Coox discovered and discussed the oral evidence he collected from former Japanese officers confirming that Genrikh S. Liushkov, an NKVD general who defected to the Japanese in June, 1938, told them rather detailed information about anti-Stalin military conspiracies in the Far Eastern Army and confirms that the Rightists — specifically, Aleksei Rykov — were involved in the conspiracy. In turn, Rykov and others implicated Trotsky.

- We also have evidence that Japanese General Hajime Sugiyama was in contact with Soviet oppositionists. This story was reported in Soviet newspapers and reprinted in the New York Times. We have confirmed it by obtaining the original Japanese newspaper article.

No evidence of German or Japanese collaboration with Trotsky has been discovered outside the former USSR. There are a number of possible explanations for this fact:

- Trotsky never collaborated with the Germans or Japanese. All the Soviet evidence is fabricated.

If Trotsky did collaborate the following possibilities exist:

- Many of these archives were destroyed during the war.
- Nobody has looked for it. At least, we are not aware anybody has done so.
- These archives too might have been "purged," as the Harvard Trotsky Archive has certainly been.

But, as suggested in the quotations above, the most likely explanation is that conspiratorial information of this kind is never written down. Therefore, there never was any "archival evidence" of this collaboration.

We know that some purging of the Soviet archives was done by Nikita Khrushchev.²¹ Elsewhere we have discussed the "purging" of the Trotsky archive at Harvard of incriminating materials.²² We know of two cases in which archival materials have disappeared.

²² See Furr, Amalgams, Chapter 6, and Moscow Trials, Chapter 6: "Non-Soviet Evidence: — The Trotsky Archive Purged."

In addition, most Soviet archives are not open to researchers. Given the evidence that we have discovered in the relatively few archival documents that have been published to date it seems likely that further evidence implicating Trotsky may be contained in archives that are still classified.

We now have a great deal of evidence that the military commanders led by Marshal Mikhail Tukhachevsky did indeed collaborate with the German General Staff. We have indirect confirmation of this from German sources, and more direct confirmation in a document from the Czech National Archive. We have massive evidence from former Soviet archives of the guilt of Tukhachevsky and his co-defendants. The German and Czech evidence confirms the Soviet evidence.²³

²³ For the document from the Czech National Archive see Furr, Amalgams, and Furr, Trials, Chapter 7: "The Mastny-Benes Note of February 9, 1937."

In discussing their espionage for Germany several Soviet defendants said they had dealt directly with German General Kurt von Hammerstein-Equord. Rumor of this collaboration has survived in Hammerstein's family. Although to our knowledge no written record of that collaboration exists, it appears that no one has actually looked for such records.²⁴ Nor has anyone ever undertaken to survey the surviving papers of other German generals allegedly involved in this conspiracy and named by Soviet defendants.

²⁴ Hans Magnus Enzenberger. Hammerstein oder der Eigensinn. Eine deutsche Geschichte. Berlin: Suhrkamp, 2008, pp. 234; 213-215.

But absence of evidence is only "evidence of absence" when evidence should indeed be present. We believe that the single most likely reason is simply that no one should expect a conspiracy like this to be documented anywhere, ever, much less in archives. The demands of secrecy and security require that such information be exchanged only by word of mouth.

The Kremlin Affair: Conspiracy and Evidence of Conspiracies

In 2000 Russian historian IUrii N. Zhukov published the only serious study that has yet appeared devoted to the Kremlin Affair of 1935. His conclusion is that, on the evidence, the "Kremlin Affair" was not a fabrication, but the uncovering of a real conspiracy.

Therefore, at the present time — until there is a substantial widening of the evidentiary base, until the declassification of the materials in the Central Archive of the FSB, we consider the following to be beyond doubt. Of all the possible hypotheses that can be formulated to explain both the "Kremlin Affair" and the Enukidze case, the only one that can account for all the known facts without exception is that which assumes that the conspiracy against Stalin and his group really existed.²⁵

²⁵ IU. N. Zhukov, "Tainy 'Kremlevskogo dela' 1935 goda i sud'ba Avelia Enukidze" (The Secrets of the 'Kremlin Affair' of 1935 and the fate of Avel' Enukidze). Voprosy Istorii No. 9 (2000), 83-113, at p. 109.

Zhukov cites powerful evidence in support of his hypothesis. He has some important things to say about evidence generally that is relevant to our purposes.

It goes without saying that in this hypothesis the lack of evidence should make us wary — either direct or indirect evidence, but indisputable. And for this we must decide the question as to whether evidence is to be expected in general in such cases. Could such evidence be found in the investigation of the "Kremlin Affair" and if so, what kind of evidence? Plans for the arrest of the members of the "narrow leadership"? A list of the future Politburo and government, or something similar. Or lists of conspirators, perhaps confirmed by their signatures? Or, perhaps, declarations, decrees, orders intended for publication immediately after the seizure of power and prepared in advance? Hardly, because any normal conspirator who was also preparing a coup d'état would do everything possible to be certain that no evidence of this kind existed.

It would be just as futile to hope to find while searching the homes of the conspirators, let us say, plans of the Kremlin, on which were noted the apartments and offices of Stalin, Molotov, and others, the routes of their usual walks. The conspirators — if they were indeed such — would not need them either. Both Peterson and Enukidze, who had lived and worked in the Kremlin, would have long known these things.

We could not expect to find evidence of any other kind that definitively reflected reflected the criminal plots that have been uncovered. Unless the conspirators suffered from dementia, they would never commit their plans to paper. Everything, absolutely everything, would be only in their heads. (Zhukov 110-111)

Zhukov cites an example of the kind of evidence that he finds convincing and reasonable to expect.

Now let us consider an alternative hypothesis, the most paradoxical one. Let us suppose that the conspiracy really existed. Are there any facts to confirm this? Yes, although they appeared only two years later, and also are of a very specific and unconvincing character — only confessions of suspects at interrogation. On the day of the arrests of Enukidze, February 11 [1937] in Khar'kov, and of Peterson, April 27 [1937] in Kiev they gave to different investigators confessions of guilt that are identical down to the details. They related how they were preparing a coup and the arrest or murder in the Kremlin of Stalin, Molotov, Kaganovich, Voroshilov and Ordzhonikidze.²⁶ (108)

²⁶ Zhukov discussed these specific confessions and the conclusions he draws from them in more detail in a meeting with Vladimir L. Bobrov on December 6, 2002. (Email letter "LETTER_V3o.doc, rec'd 12.08.02 doc" from Vladimir L. Bobrov to Grover Furr.)

The Conspiracy to Arrest Lavrentii Beria

How likely is it that agreements of espionage and conspiracy would have been written down in the first place? Anything written down at some point would surely have been hidden securely or, more likely, destroyed as soon as read. As long as such written evidence remained it would pose a terrible threat to any conspirator.

We can be certain of the existence of one such conspiracy in Soviet history — that among members of the Presidium to get rid of Lavrentii Beria — because it succeeded on June 26, 1953. Yet no prior written record of that conspiracy has ever come to light, and no single, reliable account of it exists even now. There are a few accounts by those who were involved (or claimed to have been involved). But these accounts do not agree. We know nothing certain about the conspiracy except that it succeeded. We also know nothing about Beria's fate — whether he survived to be tried and executed in December, 1953, as the official story runs, or whether he was killed, perhaps accidentally, on June 26.

This conspiracy must have involved at least half a dozen men. Accounts of it by its participants do not agree in details except in this: it was all planned and carried out through oral communication. There is no mention of it in writing. What does exist in the archives is the outline of a speech to be delivered by Georgii M. Malenkov at the Presidium meeting of June 26, 1953. It was at this meeting, we know, that Beria was either arrested or killed. Malenkov was certainly a party to whatever occurred. Yet Malenkov's archive contains only an outline of his speech, according to which Beria was to be removed as head of the MVD (Ministry of Internal Affairs, including the internal police force) and made Minister of the Petroleum Industry.²⁷

²⁷ The outline of Malenkov's speech is in Lavrentii Beria. 1953. Stenogramma iul'skogo plenuma TsK KPSS i drugie dokumenty. Ed. V. Naumov, IU. Sigachev. Moscow: MDF, 1999, pp. 69-70.

Rehabilitations

It is often assumed that, if a person convicted of a crime during the Stalin period has been "rehabilitated," his or her innocence can be assumed to be established. But this is false.

A leading anticommunist researcher on Soviet history, Marc Junge, has written:

Mit der vorliegenden Arbeit wurde das Ergebnis der Studie des Utrechter Historikers van Goudoever bestätigt, daß Rehabilitierungen in der Sowjetunion grundsätzlich ein politisches und nicht juristisches oder gar ethisch-moralisches Phänomen darstellten.

With the present work the result of the study of the Utrecht historian van Goudoever was confirmed that rehabilitations in the Soviet Union in principle represented a political and not juristic or even ethical-moral phenomenon.²⁸

²⁸ Marc Junge, Bucharins Rehabilitierung. Historisches Gedächtnis in der Sowjetunion 1953-1991. Mit einem Dokumentenanhang. Berlin: BasisDruck Verlag, 1999, p. 259.

In Khrushchev Lied we studied all the "rehabilitation" reports available in 2000, when a major collection of documents was published.²⁹ None of them provide any evidence of any convicted person's innocence. They are simply declared to be innocent.

²⁹ Reabilitatsiia: Kak Eto Bylo. Mart 1953 — Fevral' 1956 gg. Dokumenty Prezidiuma TsK KPSS i Drugie Materialiy. Moskva: Mezhdunarodniy Fond "Demokratiia", 2000.

In succeeding years we studied other "rehabilitation" reports. For example, in the case of the 1988 report on the remaining (as yet un-rehabilitated) defendants of the Third Moscow Trial of March 1938, the "Bukharin-Rykov" trial, we showed that the rehabilitation report lied about an important document that was published in 2006.

This 1988 report remains unpublished at the time of this writing (November, 2019).³⁰ To demonstrate that the Soviet Prosecutor and the Supreme Court were deliberately lying would cast doubt upon all the thousands of "rehabilitations" issued during the Gorbachev years. The so-called "revelations" of these years played, and continue to play, a huge ideological and legal role in the attacks on Stalin and on the Soviet government and Party during the Stalin years, and have been used uncritically by two generations of scholars of Soviet history since that time. There is a great deal at stake in perpetuating the falsehood that the Khrushchev-era and Gorbachev-era "rehabilitations" were honest and prove that the "rehabilitated" persons were innocent.

It may well be that some persons "rehabilitated" during the Khrushchev and Gorbachev years, and since the end of the Soviet Union, were in fact innocent of the crimes for which they were condemned. But, as Junge notes, the mere fact of "rehabilitation" cannot establish whether the "rehabilitated" persons were guilty or innocent.

Primary Sources

Only primary source evidence is acceptable evidence. Secondary sources — normally, studies by scholars who themselves use primary sources — are not evidence, though they can be very useful for other purposes: for example, in identifying primary source evidence and in providing interpretations of primary source evidence that can help in one's own interpretation of them.

No primary source evidence is "proof positive" or "a smoking gun." In historical study all primary sources are created by human beings, who have biases, prejudices, and memories that change over time. All primary source evidence must be carefully examined in the context of other primary source evidence. This essential practice is called source criticism.

Soviet Primary Sources

Cold-war anticommunists and Trotskyists sometimes claim that evidence originating from Soviet police, investigation, prosecution, or judicial sources should not be used because it may be false — obtained by threats to the arrestee, to his family or friends, or by promises, perhaps false ones, of lenient treatment.

However, all academic and Trotskyist researchers into Soviet history of this period, use Stalin-era sources all the time. Is it in principle invalid to use

Stalin-era Soviet sources when they appear to prove what the researcher wants to find but to reject them when they tend to dismantle the Anti-Stalin Paradigm by providing evidence that Stalin did not commit some crime of which he has been accused.

Trotskyists often recommend the many volumes on Soviet history of the Stalin period by the late Vadim Rogovin, a committed Trotskyist historian who made no attempt to be objective. Rogovin's sources are almost exclusively Soviet documents from the Stalin period.

Many people believe that any statement — confession, accusation, whatever — obtained while in police custody is useless as evidence. Marxist historian Roger Keeran has written:

[Furr refers to] the well-known confessions and interrogations of the condemned ... Furr never acknowledges that confessions, particularly when given under duress, are pretty useless as historical evidence.

French Marxist economist Frédéric Boccara has said:

I do not believe evidence obtained from persons in police custody.³²

³² Personal communication, November 2, 2019.

Many people are confused by, or even agree with, statements like these. It is important to examine such statements in order to point out how and why they are incorrect.

Anyone, at any time, can either be telling the truth; attempting to tell the truth (i.e. as they remember it or believe it to be) but be mistaken; or be lying. This is the case whether or not a person is under arrest.

- No evidence should ever be "believed." "I don't believe it" is not a category of scholarly analysis. Rather, it is an admission that one does not have any idea how to evaluate historical evidence.
- It is essential to discard the false notion that persons under arrest are "more likely to be lying" than persons not under arrest. All statements, made under any circumstances, by all persons, must be critically studied and compared with other statements.
- The fact that a person claims to be telling the truth at one time, and then at some later date claims that their first statement was false and that they are telling the truth now, is not evidence that either statement is true (or false). It is a basic error to accept the last statement a person made as true and all the previous statements as false, or vice versa.

Corroborating Evidence

When we find statements — fact-claims — made by different persons, at different times, in different places, that agree with each other, it becomes more and more likely that the statements are either true or reflect what the persons making the statements believed to be true.

"Forced" Confessions?

In 2007 Stephen G. Wheatcroft, a historian specializing in the Stalin period, wrote that a statement by Mikhail Frinovskii, one of Nikolai Ezhov's top lieutenants, was "forced":

According to Frinovskii's forced statements taken after his arrest...

Of course there are grave doubts as to how we should treat these forced depositions...³³

³³ Wheatcroft, "Agency and Terror: Evdokimov and Mass Killing in Stalin's Great Terror," Australian Journal of Politics and History: Volume 53, Number 1, 2007, p. 42.

Wheatcroft does not explain why he thinks that Frinovskii's confession statements are "forced" or what he means by "forced." Nor does he explain why he thinks that there are "grave doubts" about how to deal with them, what those "grave doubts" might be, or in fact how to "treat" them. He simply quotes them, and states that they may or may not be truthful.

In reality, there is no evidence that Frinovskii's statements were "forced" — assuming that this means false and obtained through torture, threats, promises, etc. Does Wheatcroft assume that persons under arrest do not make any statements that incriminate themselves unless they are "forced" to do so? That would be stupid. Persons under arrest may make truthful statements, including self-incriminating statements, for any number of reasons.

But why, then, does Wheatcroft call Frinovskii's confession statements "forced" in this case? I surmise he does this because Frinovskii's statement tends to exculpate Stalin of guilt for Ezhov's mass murders and repression in the so-called "Great Terror." This evidence threatens to dismantle the Anti-Stalin Paradigm, which controls research on Soviet history.

In this same confession statement Frinovskii admits that Ezhov and he himself, Ezhov's second-in-command, did indeed have NKVD men torture false confessions from defendants:

The investigative apparatus in all departments of the NKVD was divided into "investigator-bonebreakers", "bonebreakers", and "ordinary" investigators. ...

With such methods the investigations supplied the names.

In my opinion I would speak the truth if I declared, in general, that very often the confessions were given by the investigators, and not by those under investigation.

Did the leadership of the People's Commissariat, that is I and Ezhov, know about this? We knew.

How did we react? Honestly speaking — not at all, and Ezhov even encouraged it.³⁴

The confessions from Frinovskii's statement have often been quoted by mainstream researchers as evidence that many innocent defendants were tortured into signing false confessions. But the rest of Frinovskii's statement includes his confessions that the defendants in the Moscow Trials really were guilty. These parts are never quoted.

Like all evidence, the fact-claims in Frinovskii's statement must be carefully identified and, where possible, checked against other evidence we now possess. When that is done, it is clear that Frinovskii was not lying.

The Fallacy of "Torture"³⁵

The claim is sometimes made that someone was tortured into making a false confession. However, a claim unsubstantiated by evidence is not itself evidence. Even if we could verify that a person was tortured and subsequently confessed to a crime, that would not establish that the confession was false or that the person was innocent of that crime. Torture has historically been employed to extract truth as well as to elicit false testimony.

In theory, torture is outlawed in all legal systems so that the police and investigators will actually do some investigating, solve crimes, and catch criminals, instead of simply torturing innocent persons into confessing to the crimes they are supposed to solve. Torture of defendants is also outlawed to protect the individual suspect, so that he or she is not forced to falsely confess to crimes they did not commit.

But historians are not involved in a judicial process. No one's freedom is at stake. In the case of the history of the Stalin period in Soviet history, all the historical actors are dead. Dead persons have no rights that need defending. Works of historical research are not trials. Historians' conclusions are not verdicts.

³⁵ See also Furr, Khrushchev Lied, Chapter 10: "Torture and the Historical Problems Related To It."

The Fallacy of "Everyone Knows It"

Arch Getty, a prominent American scholar of Soviet history, has stated:

Had he [Oleg Khlevniuk] focused on the source base of Jansen and Petrov's book, for example, he would have noticed that their most sensational revelations, comprising more than one in seven of the footnotes, are from the NKVD interrogations of Ezhov and his henchmen. As everyone knows, these stories were invented by the police and beaten out of the accused.³⁶

³⁶ J. Arch Getty, "To the Editors." Kritika: Explorations in Russian and Eurasian History 5, 1 (Winter 2004), p. 233.

This statement is false. Getty does not "know" this. No one "knows" this. There is no evidence to support this statement, and a good deal of evidence to disprove it. Ezhov did renounce his confessions after the end of the investigation and at trial. But that does not prove he was lying first and telling the truth later, any more than it proves the reverse.

What researchers supposedly "know" — and, according to Getty, ought to say — is that Ezhov's confessions of guilt are false. Why? I think it is because in them Ezhov is very clear that he was deceiving Stalin and the Soviet leadership. For example, in a confession statement of August 4, 1939, Ezhov stated:

The [Soviet] government, understandably, had no conception of our conspiratorial plans and in the present case proceeded solely on the basis of the necessity to prolong the operation without going into the essence of how it was carried out.

In this sense, of course, we were deceiving the government in the most blatant manner.³⁷

Getty's statement is an example of the logical fallacy of "argumentum ad populum."³⁸ This is the fallacy that because many people — in this case, presumably, historians of the Soviet Union — believe a statement is true, then the statement must be true, or at least is "more likely" to be true. (It might also be classified as an example of the fallacy of "argumentum ad lapidem," or "appeal to the stone"³⁹ — dismissing a claim as absurd without demonstrating proof of its absurdity.

The evidence we now have substantiates the essence of Ezhov's and Frinovskii's confessions and those of others of Ezhov's men. This evidence is consistent with the hypothesis that the mass murders of July, 1937, through approximately September, 1938, misnamed "the Great Terror," were the result of Ezhov's own conspiracy against the Soviet state. These murders were a conspiracy not by but against Stalin. We discuss this evidence more fully in Yezhov vs. Stalin.⁴⁰

Argument by Scare Quotes

Sometimes the denial of evidence that is inconvenient for the Anti-Stalin Paradigm is expressed in the use of scare quotes. A good example is Matthew Lenoe's book The Kirov Murder and Soviet History (Yale University Press, 2010). I examine and critique Lenoe's faulty use of evidence and incorrect conclusions in The Murder of Sergei Kirov. History, Scholarship and the Anti-Stalin Paradigm. A detailed examination of the fallacy of "argument by scare quotes" may be found there in Chapter 4, pages 87 ff.

In the edition of his translation of one of Marshal Mikhail N. Tukhachevsky's confession statements, Steven J. Main writes:

The large part of this article consists of a translation — to the best of this author's knowledge for the first time in English — of what is purported to be Tukhachevsky's 'testimony', concerning his alleged role in the so-called anti-Soviet Trotskyite military organization, the 'existence' of which allowed Stalin the excuse to launch his bloody purge ...

The 'evidence' against the Red Army's top personnel began to accumulate ...

Using the recently gathered 'evidence', Voroshilov ...

Tukhachevsky's alleged 'guilt' ... Tukhachevsky's alleged 'confession' ...

Regardless, however, of whether, or not, the 'confession' was genuine, the 'plot' had been unmasked ...

'Testimony' of M.N. Tukhachevsky⁴¹

⁴¹ Steven J. Main, "The Arrest and 'Testimony' of Marshal of the Soviet Union M.N. Tukhachevsky (May-June 1937). The Journal or Slavic

Military Studies, Vol. 10, No. 1 (March 1997), pp. 151-155 and passim.

Apparently the scare quotes are supposed to alert us to the fact that he, Main, does not accept this testimony, evidence, existence, etc., as genuine. But Main makes no effort to try to verify his suspicions by studying Tukhachevsky's statement in the context of other evidence we now have. Like Wheatcroft, Main uses the confession while at the same time implying that it is not reliable. But in fact he has no idea at all how reliable (or unreliable) it is. He does not try to verify it or to disprove it.

The reader is left to wonder: Why does Main think Tukhachevsky's confession might be false? He does not claim outright that it is false, that the evidence it presents is phony. He only suggests, repeatedly, that it might be false. But to concede that the statement might be false, is also to concede that it might not be false — that it might be true. But to concede that would be a violation of the Anti-Stalin Paradigm — violation of a virtual taboo.

If Tukhachevsky's statement is true — and today we have a great deal of evidence to corroborate it — that would go a long way towards overturning the Anti-Stalin Paradigm. It would mean that, in arresting, trying, and executing Tukhachevsky and his high-ranking military accomplices, Stalin prevented the Soviet Union from militarily allying with Nazi Germany, fascist Italy, and militarist-fascist Japan. Such an alliance would have completely changed the balance of power in the world in favor of the Axis powers and had an incalculable effect on world history.

Chapter 1. Documents published in Politbiuro i Lev Trotskii, Kniga 2 (Prague, 2013)

This essay examines a collection of documents that has important implications for the study of Leon Trotsky's activities during the decade of the 1930s; for our understanding of the Moscow Trials of 1936-1938; and for the history of the Soviet Union during the period of Joseph Stalin's leadership.

Politbiuro i Lev Trotskii is a two-volume collection of documents from former Soviet archives. Almost all are published, and thus made available to researchers, for the first time. These volumes were published in a very small printing and are very hard to obtain. They are from the Central Archive of the FSB, the Russian successor to the NKVD, as the commissariat (= ministry) was called during most of the period in question.

There are no grounds to doubt that these documents are genuine. The editor, Oleg B. Mozokhin, is the chief researcher for the FSB. He has published a number of important collections and studies of documents from the former NKVD, including important studies of the repression and violence perpetrated during the 1930s by this agency of the Soviet government. We don't know why these specific documents were chosen for publication, out of the many thousands still in the archive.

The significance of these documents is as follows.

- They constitute yet more important evidence that the pretrial interrogations in the 1936 and 1937 Moscow Trials were not "fabricated" in any way by the NKVD, were not forced upon the defendants. Instead, all the evidence we now have supports the hypothesis that these trials were genuine, in that the Prosecution believed the charges they brought against the defendants, while the defendants testified what they wanted to testify.
- They are confirmed by evidence from outside the USSR, particularly evidence from Trotsky's own papers in the Harvard Trotsky Archive.

- They confirm, and are confirmed by, other evidence from former Soviet archives.

The purpose of this article is to demonstrate the truth of these conclusions, and to draw further conclusions from them that allow us to understand certain historical questions related to Trotsky's conspiratorial activities.

Direct Evidence that Defendants' Confessions Were Not Coerced

I.N. Smirnov was the leader of the Trotskyists within the USSR. This is confirmed by Sedov's letter to Trotsky of sometime in 1932 (hereafter referred to as "Sedov's 'bloc' letter") discovered by Pierre Broué in the Harvard Trotsky Archive in 1980.

La lettre à l'encre sympathique de Léon Sedov fait apparaitre l'esitence des groupes suivants : le groupe trotskyste d'U.R.S.S. (« notre fraction »), les « zinoviévistes », le groupe d'I. N. Smirnov, le groupe Sten-Lominadzé, le groupe « Safar(ov)-Tarkhan(ov) », « les droitiers » et « les libéraux ». (Broué 1980 p.7)¹

The letter in invisible ink of Leon Sedov's revealed the existence of the following groups: the Trotskyist group in the USSR ("our fraction"), the "Zinovievites," the group of I.N. Smirnov, the group of Sten-Lominadze, the group "Safar(ov)-Tarkhan(ov)," "the Rights" and "the liberals."

¹ I.N. Smirnov is identified as the source of the information in the Sedov to Trotsky bloc letter in Documents Nos 1 and 2, reprinted in Broué 1980, pp. 34-36 from the Harvard Trotsky Archive.

In the following statement, apparently the first he made after his arrest, Smirnov denies any oppositional activity whatever. He claims that he only retained doubts about the success of collectivization and industrialization and spoke about these doubts with a few "former" Trotskyists now reinstated in the Party, as Smirnov himself had been, and with a few others who had not been reinstated. When asked about the large archive of Trotskyist materials found at his home Smirnov replied that he had kept them only because they contained some letters from Trotsky and from other "former Trotskyists" and that he had intended to burn them. (20)

Thanks to Sedov's "bloc" letter we know that Smirnov was lying to conceal his clandestine Trotskyist activities. Therefore it is clear that this statement was not coerced — Smirnov made it voluntarily. At the August 1936 Moscow trial Smirnov claimed that he "did no work" in the Trotskyist underground.

Smirnov: I listened to those instructions and communicated them to the centre. The centre accepted them but I did not take part in its work.

... I did not officially resign from the bloc, but actually I did no work. (Report 1936, 81, 85)

Smirnov's trial testimony is what he chose to say. It was not forced upon him. We shall cite much more evidence that the defendants testified as they chose to do.² This is evidence that the confessions at the First Moscow Trial were not fabrications, faked or otherwise forced upon the defendants by the prosecution. There would be no reason for the prosecution to "force" Smirnov to deny that he had continued to lead the underground Trotskyists. If the prosecution were "forcing" confessions at all, they would have forced Smirnov to say that he had indeed continued to lead the Trotskyist underground.

This collection of documents, together with the testimony at the First Moscow Trial, does provide much evidence that Smirnov remained in the leadership of the underground Trotskyists in the USSR, and thus that his claim that he "did no work" was false. It follows from this that Smirnov's testimony at that trial represented what he wanted to say.

² For an extended study of this question see Furr, Moscow Trials.

More Evidence That Confessions Were Not "Forced"

A. Konstantinov

According to a report to the Politburo dated January 20, 1933 by Genrikh Iagoda, Assistant Chairman of the OGPU (predecessor to the police function of the NKVD), A.A. Konstantinov, a member of Smirnov's underground Trotskyist group, opposed forming a bloc with the Rights because he and others felt that the Rights could not be trusted.

(Iagoda) Recently we received information that not long before the liquidation of the "Union of Marxist-Leninists" a question stood before the Smirnov group about a bloc with the Rights. On December 2 of this year Konstantinov ... stated that "The question of a bloc with the Rights did stand before us, but we, of course, were decisively against a bloc with the Rights. On the one hand, the Rights are not a resolute group, they are cowardly and will not stick it out to the end, and on the other hand, they only have a temporary need of us as a group that would be able to help them in underground work. And generally, in the event of victory they will crush us...." (38)

We know that Trotsky approved of such a group at exactly this time, 1932 (Sedov's "bloc" letter). The OGPU³ would have no reason to invent a lack of willingness by Trotskyists to bloc with the Rights. This confession, therefore, reflected what Konstantinov wanted to say. It was not forced on him nor fabricated.

³ In July, 1934, the OGPU became part of the new NKVD, or People's Commissariat for Internal Affairs.

B. Aleksandr Ivanovich Shemelev

Trotskyist Aleksandr Ivanovich Shemelev confessed on April 5, 1936 that his group had heard from Sedov, through Gorovich (who had met with Sedov in Berlin) that Trotsky wished to "ustranit" or "ubrat" — "remove" — Stalin. We know that this discussion did take place because it occurs in the Sedov-Trotsky correspondence in the Harvard Trotsky Archive. But Shemelev said the exact words might have been "liquidate" rather than "ustranit" or "ubrat'."

It is significant that Shemelev refused to claim that Sedov's order was to forcibly remove (i.e. to kill) Stalin. Shemelev states only that he understood Sedov's order in that way. (221) This would make no sense if the NKVD had been trying to "frame" — generate false accusations against — either Shemelev or Sedov. Had the NKVD been "framing" the Trotskyists they would have tried to force Shemelev to claim that Sedov had ordered Stalin killed. So the NKVD did not force Shemelev to make this statement. Therefore, this interrogation reflects what Shemelev wanted to say.

C. Nikolai Issakovich Gordon

In an interrogation of October 20, 1936 Trotskyist Nikolai Isaakovich Gordon said that he had been told by Aleksandr Georgievich Beloborodov, a leading Trotskyist in Smirnov's group, that Smirnov was the person who had direct contact with Trotsky on behalf of the group. (321) This is confirmed by the Sedov "bloc" letter.

Gordon also revealed the following:

... The Trotskyists and Zinovievists in Rostov were united into one organization which, upon the instruction of the united Trotskyist-Zinovievist center, were preparing terrorist acts against the leadership of the VKP(b) and the Soviet government. (320)

Thanks to the Sedov "bloc" letter and the other letters from the Harvard Trotsky Archive that were published by Broué in 1980, we know that Gordon's testimony here is accurate. Smirnov did lead the Trotskyists, and the bloc consisted of Trotskyists, Zinovievists, and some other oppositionists that were not firmly in either of these two camps.

This, in turn, suggests that his further statement about its terrorist aims is also accurate. We will explore the issue of Trotskyism and terrorism before.

D. The Verification of Mikhail Sergeevich Ivanov

Document No. 291 (385-386) is a request dated December 19, 1938 of a certain Sobol'ev, a political officer of the border guards of the NKVD concerning one of his men named Mikhail Sergeevich Ivanov. According to Sobol'ev, Ivanov had expressed Trotskyist ideas in 1923-24 and was now being investigated for having signed the joint oppositionist "Platform of 83" in 1927. Ivanov claimed that he was not the "Mikhail Sergeevich Ivanov" — a common Russian name — who had signed this opposition statement. In Document No. 292 dated December 22, 1938, Aleksandr N. Poskrebyshev, head of Stalin's chancery, certified that NKVD man Ivanov was correct: the "M. Ivanov" who had signed the "Platform of 83" was a different person.

Serious Investigation, Not a Rush to Judgment

This is evidence that a serious investigation had taken place. A person accused of being a hidden Trotskyist was not simply fired from his job, much less arrested or imprisoned. Rather, the allegation was investigated and, in this case, disproven.

This was important, for by this time Trotskyism had been outlawed within the USSR as a terrorist and espionage organization rather than a political tendency. Documents in this volume contain plenty of evidence to confirm this charge. We will examine some of them below.

Confirmation by Evidence from Outside the USSR

Many statements made in the interrogations and defendants' statements in this volume can be confirmed by other evidence we now possess. The NKVD could not have fabricated this evidence because it originated from outside the USSR.

Statements Confirmed by Documents in the Harvard Trotsky Archive

A. "Remove Stalin" — ubrat', ustranit', ustranenie

Towards the end of 1932 Sedov and Trotsky discussed the slogan "remove Stalin." Broué discusses this in his 1980 article, in the subsection titled "Trotsky et le mot d'ordre 'Chasser Staline'" (20-22), and Broué identifies the relevant documents in the Trotsky Archive.⁴ Broué's convenient summary notes that Trotsky rejected this demand at that time.

The documents in PiLT2 show that discussion and disagreement over this slogan — in Russian, ubrat', ustranit', ustranenie — took place in Opposition circles in the Soviet Union at the same time. Party member Vasili Ivanovich Dzhoev's statement of ca. January 2, 1933 says that Gassiev, another Trotskyist, declared that "this leadership must be removed ("ubrat") (25).

Iagoda's Report

In a report to Stalin dated January 20, 1933 OGPU chief Genrikh Iagoda reported, inter alia, that a new letter from Trotsky had been received by Smirnov's group in mid-October (either October 17 or October 15). In it — unexpectedly for Iagoda — Trotsky said "The slogan 'ubrat Stalina' is not our slogan. 'Down with the personal regime' — that is not right." (37)

This statement in Iagoda's report agrees completely with the documents found by Broué in the Harvard Trotsky Archive (TA). We have discussed this in Trotsky's 'Amalgams'.⁵

At the January 1937 trial Karl Radek testified that, in his letter of the Spring of 1932, Trotsky had said that once "union" with the Zinovievists had been achieved "the question of removing the leadership" would have to be raised. This term — "remove Stalin" — can be partially traced in both the Trotsky-Sedov correspondence of late 1932 and in Astrov's confession and confrontation with Bukharin of January 1937.

We say "partially traced" because, in reality, only excerpts — called "vyderzhki" or "vypiski" at the top of each document — from the correspondence on this subject remains in the Trotsky-Sedov correspondence in the Harvard Trotsky Archive. Evidently these excerpts — all have been retyped in a uniform manner — were prepared by a secretary, probably Jean van Heijenoort, for possible use at the Dewey Commission hearings in Paris, which took place later than those in Mexico.

The full texts of these letters is not in the Archive. They have been removed at some time. This is further evidence of what Getty called the "purge" of the Trotsky Archive, involving incriminating materials.

Broué outlines the discussion between Trotsky and Sedov concerning the use of this slogan in several of his published works. In the documents we have, Sedov appears to have been the more ardent partisan of the slogan "remove Stalin." Trotsky agreed with the concept but in October 1932 told Sedov that they should not adopt it as yet, in order not to alienate other potential allies.⁶ Broué concedes that "we do not know which one convinced the other" (Léon Sedov 81). Writing in Russian Rogovin puts quotation marks around the phrase: "ubrat' Stalina."⁷

Rozenfel'd

Many other passages confirm that the same slogan was later interpreted to mean "kill Stalin." Boris Rozenfel'd, Kamenev's nephew (the son of his brother) said that his father and Kamenev had told him that the only way the opposition could come to power was by the "removal (ustranenie) of Stalin." (185) This sounds like a reference to the same interrogation of the young Rozenfel'd.⁸ In this previously published interrogation Rozenfel'd uses the term ustranenie and also the word "terror" (terror) to describe his own convictions and those of his father and others about Stalin.

⁸ Published in the collection Lubianka 1922-1936, pp. 628-631.

Dmitriev

On April 5, 1936, F.M. Dmitriev, a Trotskyist, confessed that Shemelev, a fellow Trotskyist, had said to him "at the beginning of 1935" that "one of the leaders" of the Trotskyist organization had recently told him that "the leadership of the [Trotskyist] organization considered essential the forcible removal ("ustranenie") of Stalin. (225) Shemelev also testified that the direction to use "terrorist" methods to "remove" (ustranenie) Stalin came from Smirnov as well. (281, 282).

Birkengof

We find yet more striking confirmation of the truthfulness of the interrogations contained in this volume in an interrogation of clandestine Trotskyist Aleksandr Il'ich Birkengof of May 23-25, 1936. Birkengof testified that he had been in direct touch with Yuri Gaven, who had himself met with Trotsky personally. Birkengof testified that in December 1932 Gaven communicated the following to him:

Gaven informed me that he had established contact with I.N. Smirnov, leader of the Trotskyist organization in the USSR, that the situation in the organization was tense since Smirnov had reason to think that arrests were imminent, and Gaven specifically told me that Smirnov himself expected to be arrested. ... By the way, I.N. Smirnov really was arrested soon thereafter. (298)

This corresponds exactly to what Sedov reported about Smirnov and his group to Trotsky in his "bloc" letter. Sedov referred to Gaven with a pseudonym. Broué discovered that Trotsky had lied when he denied that he had no contact with Gaven.

Gaven est « Sorokine », comme Holzman est « Orlov », et Smirnov « Kolokoltsev », dans la correspondance de Sedov et de son père.⁹

Gaven is "Sorokin", as Holzman is "Orlov", and Smirnov is "Kolokoltsev", in the correspondence between Sedov and his father.

We discuss Gaven and his testimony in more detail below.

⁹ Broué, "Compléments à un article sur les trotskystes en U.R.S.S." CahLT 24 (1985). Here, Broué concludes that Sedov had met with Gaven.

No Fabrication

The NKVD interrogator tried to get Birkengof to admit that by "removal" Birkengof meant "terror," i.e. assassination. But Birkengof refused to admit this and this refusal was reported in the interrogation transcript. (300) This is good evidence that Birkengof was not forced to confess. Nor did the NKVD forge or fabricate a false interrogation.

B. The Bloc of Trotskyists and other Oppositionists

We know about the bloc of Trotskyists, Zinovievists, Rightists, and other oppositionists from the Sedov "bloc" letter and the Sedov-Trotsky correspondence in the Harvard Trotsky Archive. Pierre Broué dates this exchange to 1932. The Sedov "bloc" letter refers to the bloc as something that had been in the planning for some time.

This bloc is mentioned in numerous documents published in PiLT2. in late 1932 or very early January 1933 Vasilii Ivanovich Dzhoev informed the GPU of a conversation he had had with childhood friend and current Trotskyist Ilia K. Gassiev. Gassiev informed Dzhoev about the Trotskyists' desire to "remove" (ubrat') the Party leadership.

Dzhoev stated that Lominadze, one of the "other" oppositionists, was also a member of the group and that Zinoviev and Kamenev were leading the "Trotskyist" (sic) group. Each of these details is confirmed in the Sedov-Trotsky correspondence in the TA originally identified by Broué in the Sedov "bloc" letter:

Le [...] (15) est organisé. Il comprend les zinoviévistes, le groupe Sten-Lominadzé et les trotskystes (anciens « ... ») ... La déclaration de Z. et K. (18) sur la faute très grave qu'ils ont commise en 27 a été faite lors de pourparlers avec les nôtres sur le bloc, juste avant la deportation de Z. et de K. (Broué 1980, p.36)

[The bloc] has been organized. In it have entered the Zinovievites, the Sten-Lominadze group and the Trotskyists (former "[capitulators]").... The declaration of Z. and K. concerning their enormous mistake in '27 was made during negotiations with our people concerning the bloc, immediately before the exile of Z and K.

Dzhoev added that Rykov had been "partly" drawn into it, but Bukharin had "not yet" been drawn in. He also stated that the bloc was working in the military, and that their goal was a coup d'état. Dzhoev repeated many of these claims in an interrogation of January 7, 1933, also included in this volume. (25-28)

When arrested and interrogated Gassiev admitted the existence of the underground organization, Lominadze's participation, Rykov's participation in its leadership along with "perhaps" that of Zinoviev and Kamenev (30-31). As we saw above, Lominadze is named in the Sedov-Trotsky correspondence. In his 1980 article Broué speculates that the "droiters" (= Rightists) would probably be Bukharin, Rykov, and Tomsy.¹⁰

¹⁰ Broué, 1980, pp. 12-13. In document No. 2 in his Appendix Broué quotes a letter from Trotsky to Sedov that refers to the "droiters." (35-6)

In the light of the much later "Tukhachevsky Affair" it is noteworthy that Gassiev testified that Simion Mikhailovich Budyonny and Mikhail Nikolaevich Tukhachevsky, both later promoted to marshal of the Soviet Union, were "close to us" in their sentiments. (30) When arrested and interrogated in May-June 1937 Tukhachevsky testified at great length about his conspiracy with Trotsky and his followers. We have a great deal of other evidence of his, and the military conspiracy's, ties to the Rights. Thus Gassiev's testimony is confirmed in part by Sedov and Trotsky, while Tukhachevsky's later admissions are confirmed in part by Gassiev. In another chapter in the present book we examine the role of Trotsky in some of the confessions and statements by Tukhachevsky and his co-defendants.

Iagoda's introductory letter to Stalin of January 20, 1933, in which Iagoda revealed that Trotsky had at that time rejected the slogan "ubrat' Stalina" (see above) also stated that "Smirnov's group" — that is, the underground Trotskyists — had also been discussing a "bloc with the Rights." (38) The Sedov-Trotsky "bloc" correspondence confirms this.

Naumov-Lekakh

In an interrogation dated October 4, 1934 David Borisovich Naumov-Lekakh, a Trotskyist, said that the Trotskyists were trying to unite all oppositionists of whatever stripe who were disillusioned with the Party's political line. (144) He revealed that the bloc with the Rights had been discussed since 1930. The "bloc" exchange between Trotsky and Sedov in the Trotsky Archive confirms that by 1932 the bloc had been under discussion for some time.

Naumov-Lekakh also discussed the Trotskyists' cooperation with Ukrainian Nationalists, who he said were strong in Ukraine than were the Trotskyists. Collaboration of underground Trotskyists with Ukrainian nationalists is also discussed in Ivan Serov's 1956 report to the Molotov Commission, a document we study closely in Furr, Collaboration, Chapter 4.

In a subsequent interrogation of December 26, 1934 Naumov-Lekakh mentioned among other matters that the Trotskyists in Moscow were working with the organization of Rights, specifically with Riutin. (141-145)

Bervitskii-Varfolomeev

Trotskyist Aleksandr Arsen'evich Bervitskii-Varfolomeev, interrogated on October 26, 1934, revealed that during the first half of 1932 he and an associate had discussed the need for "representatives of the Right-Left bloc to establish concrete contacts with Syrtsov." (159)

Lominadze

Lominadze, also mentioned in Sedov's "bloc" letter, is named many times in these documents. His associate oppositionist Ian Sten's name crops up once, in an interrogation of the Trotskyist Aleksandr Gavrilovich Kolodin of March 8, 1936. Kolodin identifies Sten as a "close acquaintance" of G.F. Dmitriev, leader of Kolodin's Trotskyist group. Dmitriev told Kolodin that Sten, a former Comintern worker, was in agreement with them. (214) Sedov also names Sten in his "bloc" letter to Trotsky.

Le [...] est organisé. Il comprend les zinoviévistes, le groupe Sten-Lominadzé et les trotskystes (anciens « ... »)

[The bloc] has been organized. In it have entered the Zinovievites, the Sten-Lominadze group and the Trotskyists (former "[capitulators]"). (Broué 1980, p.36)

Terror

On February 28, 1936 Trotskyist Ivan K. Fedotov testified that "terror" — assassination — was the tactic chosen by the Trotskyist underground in the USSR. Fedotov said that he had heard from fellow Trotskyist Kurt Miuller about Trotsky's directive for the use of "terror" against the Party leadership (206). The goal of assassinating Stalin, Molotov, Voroshilov, and Kirov was to clear the path for the return of Trotsky, Zinoviev and Kamenev to leadership of the country. According to Fedotov, Furtichev had informed him in early 1934 that the bloc was to act in Leningrad, where the bloc was the strongest. Fedotov understood that this meant an attempt to kill Kirov. (207) Kirov was indeed murdered on December 1, 1934.

Interrogated on April 26, 1936 Trotskyist Efrem Mikhailovich Bocharov testified about the activities of the Trotskyist-Zinovievist group. In 1930 the Zinovievist Bakaev told him that the goal of the Trotskyist-Zinovievist group was to take power "and bring Trotsky, Zinoviev and Kamenev to the leadership of the country." (253)

On October 17, 1936 Dmitri Ignat'evich Matveev, a Rightist, testified that in the Spring of 1932 Uglanov, one of the leaders of the Rights, had been carrying on discussions with Kamenev about forming a bloc between the Rights and the "Trotskyist-Zinovievist organization" for "join struggle against the leadership of the VKP(b)." This confirms the Sedov-Trotsky correspondence which Broué dated to 1932. In the "bloc" letter Sedov reported that the bloc with the Zinovievists was confirmed but that the Rights had not yet entered it. (315)

Sokol'nikov

This volume includes one interrogation of Grigorii Iakovlevich Sokol'nikov, who was to be one of the two major defendants in the January 1937 Moscow Trial. There is much of interest in this document, which mainly concerns Sokol'nikov's contacts with British representatives on behalf of the Trotskyist-Zinovievist-Rightist conspiracy. In it Sokol'nikov confirms that this organization planned to bring to power a government consisting of Rykov and Bukharin, (Rightists; Kamenev and Zinoviev (Zinovievists); and Piatakov and himself, Sokol'nikov (Trotskyists). Trotsky would take charge of the Party, though possibly not immediately after the seizure of power since Trotsky was "politically compromised in the eyes of the broad masses," but that Trotsky would assume the Party leadership "as soon as the situation is solidified." (325)

Sokol'nikov's description of the existence and leadership of the Trotskyist-Zinovievist-Rightist conspiracy is confirmed in general terms by the Sedov-Trotsky correspondence about the "bloc" as well as by other evidence. It is yet another example of the general truth that we have no evidentiary reason to believe that the statements made by defendants in the Moscow Trials were fabricated and every reason to conclude the opposite — that they represent what the defendants wanted to say.¹¹

These are the kinds of statements that have been widely dismissed as fabrications by those who contend that the Moscow Trials were frame-ups. In reality, all the evidence we now have tends to confirm that the interrogations and statements made by arrested suspects are genuine and represent what the persons making them wanted to state.

¹¹ We discuss the important question of Moscow Trial testimony in more detail in Furr, Amalgams.

Political Activity Continued in Political Isolators

In his 1980 article announcing the existence of the bloc of Trotskyists, Zinovievists, and other oppositionists, the Sedov "bloc" letter and Sedov's correspondence with Trotsky about the bloc, Pierre Broué claimed that the bloc was "ephemeral" and came to an end early in 1933 when the leaders of the Trotskyist movement were arrested to be imprisoned in the Verkhneuralsk political isolator. But Broué had no evidence that the bloc had come to an end, not that political activity was not possible in the political isolators.

We know that Broué was incorrect. In fact, years later Broué himself admitted that political activity continued in this political isolator. In his obituary of Ante Ciliga, published in 1993 in his own journal Cahiers Léon Trotsky Broué wrote:

Arrested in 1930 he was imprisoned in the isolator at Verkhneuralsk where he participated in the life of the 'Bolshevik-Leninist collective.'¹²

¹² Broué, "Ante Ciliga (1898-1992), Cahiers Léon Trotsky no. 50, 1993, 121-122.

A number of Rights and Trotskyites, I.N. Smirnov among them, were imprisoned in this same isolator at the same time as Ciliga. Ciliga was imprisoned at Verkhneuralsk from November 1930 to July 1933. Chapters 4 through 11 of his memoir The Russian Enigma testify to the very lively political life there and the privileges the prisoners enjoyed. As Broué himself noted, Ciliga testifies that the factions among the prisoners, including the Trotskyists, continued their activities there.

The documents in PiLT2 show evidence of this political activity. In a report to Stalin dated January 1-3, 1933, Genrikh Iagoda, at the time Vice-Chairman of the OGPU, quotes Trotskyist M. Novikov testifying to the political activity at Verkhneuralsk even before the arrival there of I.N. Smirnov and the Trotskyists arrested and imprisoned at the same time. (32) This corresponds with what Ciliga writes.

In an interrogation dated December 17, 1934, Trotskyist Isai Davidovich Fal'kevich testified about the words of a certain Rappoport, who had recruited him to the Trotskyist organization at the end of 1931:

He also told me that in the political isolator itself the Trotskyists were always fully informed on questions about new instructions from Trotsky and about the activities of Trotskyists in various places. (124)

Interrogated on April 29, 1936, Trotskyist Mikhail Georgievich Saf'ianov testified that at the end of 1935 he and other had been told by Shemelev, who had recruited him in 1933, that "terror" was now necessary against Stalin:

Shemelev set before us in the most frank manner the question of the transition to terrorist forms of struggle against the leadership of the VKP(b) and in the first place against Stalin... He said that this directive came from I.N. Smirnov, who was a supporter of terrorist means of removing [ustraneniia] Stalin. (281)

Smirnov had been in the Verkhneural'sk political isolator since early 1933. At the August, 1936, First Moscow Trial Smirnov claimed that he had "done no work," not participated in, the activities of the Trotskyist bloc while in prison.

Therefore we now have a good deal of evidence that Broué was wrong to assume that the bloc of Trotskyists, Zinovievists, and other Oppositionists ended when many of its members were arrested at the beginning of 1933. In fact, there never was any evidence at all to support Broué's contention. Why, then, did he insist upon on?

It appears that Broué's assertion was a "tell." A loyal, lifelong Trotskyist, Broué showed considerable courage in revealing the existence in the Trotsky Archive of the Sedov-Trotsky correspondence that proved that the "bloc" of Trotskyists, Zinovievists, and other oppositionists, had indeed existed, and that therefore Trotsky and Sedov had lied, over and over again, by denying that there was or could have been any such bloc with "capitulators."

Broué could have stolen or destroyed the evidence that Trotsky had lied, and especially the very damning evidence that the "bloc" of Oppositionists
